Mr. Gray: Also, my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, is working very hard to get the right kind of energy agreement with the producing provinces, which is something that the government of my hon. friends opposite was totally incapable of doing in spite of being in bed with the governments of the producing provinces. After listening to my hon. friend's questions, I understand very well why the Leader of the Opposition could not even get up the courage to come in and hear those questions. They certainly are not worth being present for, Madam Speaker.

TIMING OF PROGRAMS

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, I have a final supplementary question. This government is so interested in the affairs of Canada that 15 of 32 cabinet ministers show up in the House! There is no external affairs, no defence, no finance, no Prime Minister! You are the government! If you want to give us your portfolios, we will show up.

• (1420)

My final supplementary to the minister is this. The minister and his—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, they do not like their neglect pointed out to the public.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Order, please.

Mr. Crosbie: Thank you, Madam Speaker. The minister has had 15 months to bring forward an industrial policy. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has had 15 months to reach an agreement with the provinces and all he has done is put forward conditions that no one can accept, and it has stalemated our whole energy investment and recovery program. Will the minister tell us what the timetable is for achieving completion of these strategies and putting them into action so that the battle against inflation can start to be successful? When are they going to have a sense of urgency? When are they going to act to help the Canadians who are suffering so badly today?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, first of all I should point out that I understand the Prime Minister is taking part in a meeting of the Council of Maritime Premiers, and that the Secretary of State for External Affairs is accompanying the Governor General on an important mission to Scandinavia. I hope that this is not something that my hon. friend would see fit to oppose, or object to.

Mr. Crosbie: He is having a sauna. Where is the Minister of Finance? He came on the plane last night.

Mr. Gray: I think the evidence is clear that we are working vigorously to achieve progress, and that we have achieved progress in the areas my hon. friend has mentioned. If he is serious about what he is saying, he would do more than he has to make sure that we get the necessary co-operation, in particular from the producing provinces, in the energy area.

With respect to the number of ministers at present in the House, I might say that those who are here are more than enough to deal with the vapid and empty questions of the opposition.

PROFITS OF OIL COMPANIES

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, I have two supplementary questions to put to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources regarding the lack of an energy policy and the impact this is having on inflation and economic growth in the country.

Government policy in Canada has contributed to a surge in profits in the refining and retailing side of the energy business, causing Canadians to pay much more than is necessary for energy in this country. Let me quote an example. As a result of the deregulation of oil prices in the United States, Gulf Oil in the U.S. went from a profit of $247 million in the first quarter of 1980 to a loss of $186 million in the first quarter of 1981. That is in the downstream side of the business. At the same time Gulf Canada went from a $55 million profit to a $95 million profit this year. In light of this, what does the minister propose specifically to remedy the situation? How is he learning from what is going on in the United States, in the evolution of his energy policy for this country?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, first of all my hon. colleague has forgotten to point out that he has at heart the welfare of consumers. He should have indicated in his question, since he likes to refer to the United States' experience, that at the present time the American consumer is paying about 50 cents per gallon more than the Canadian consumer. We in this country have tried to protect the Canadian consumer from the inflationary impact of the very high price of gasoline. In all honesty, my friend should have referred to that.

He refers to some profit situation with regard to particular firms. I would suggest to my hon. friend that his party should get their energy act together because, for the last six months, what we have heard from the other side has been that a National Energy Program was going to destroy the oil industry in this country.

Some hon. Members: It is.

Mr. Lalonde: They say it is, and at the same time their official spokesman accuses us of letting corporations make high profits. Make up your minds, fellows.

POSSIBLE CHANGE IN TAXATION

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, the minister quite rightly points out what has happened in the United States. Let me quote the consumer price index figures which show that in July, 1980, Canada had a lower consumer price index growth, 10.1 per cent, against 13.1 per cent relative to the United States. This year the whole thing has turned around. We are now 2.6 percentage points higher, for a deterioration in the inflation performance in Canada relative to the United States of 5.6 per cent in less than a year. That is what is happening in this country, and the minister should listen to that.

Let me be quite specific in my supplementary question. Part of the Gulf Canada increased profits results from the paper profits that the minister referred to in this House a couple of months ago. These are caused by the minister through the imposition of his petroleum compensation charge, the Canadian ownership charge, and the Lalonde levy which result in real price increases to the consumer.

• (1425)

Madam Speaker: Order, please. That question is a bit long. I would ask the hon. member to try to shorten it.

Mr. Wilson: I was just coming to the question, Madam Speaker. The point is that what the consumer loses, the government gains by income tax increases. Since I indicated, in a letter dated April 17 to the minister, that the problem could be remedied easily by a minor change in the method of imposing that tax, what action is the minister taking as a result of my letter to save Canadians in excess of $170 million in taxes which go to his government?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, as far as the point raised by the hon. member with regard to inflation rates is concerned, because we were able to keep energy prices at a lower level last year, in particular, we have been able to maintain our inflation rate lower than that in the United States.

An hon. Member: That is wrong.

Mr. Wilson: Last year.

Mr. Lalonde: Last year; last July. That is what I said. As far as this year is concerned, if I were to listen to the official opposition, we would have even higher inflation rates—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Lalonde: —because what these gentlemen and ladies in the Conservative party are recommending is higher prices to the consumer than are in evidence at the present time. This is what we, on this side, have been fighting against. We have been trying to get an arrangement so as to continue protecting the Canadian consumer while providing adequate returns to the industry.

Mr. Andre: How do you justify the PetroCan tax?

Mr. Lalonde: As far as the last point raised by the hon. member is concerned, I have had an opportunity to discuss this issue with him. He knows that the situation is not as simple as he wants to make it appear, and as a consequence I do not intend to make changes to the present policy.

STATUS OF WOMEN

MANDATORY AFFIRMATIVE ACTION PROGRAMS— GOVERNMENT POSITION

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, moving on to the Minister of Employment and Immigration, who is also the minister responsible for the status of women, can he now confirm that he fully supports mandatory affirmative action employment programs for women and other disadvantaged groups, including contract compliance? When will the minister recommend to cabinet the immediate implementation of them?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I have indicated all along that we are prepared to take a wide variety of measures to improve substantially the equality of women in the work place. We have introduced a number of them during the past year, including new training programs, an affirmative action program in the public service, as well as the opening of new counselling centres. I have indicated that we are hoping to present in Parliament, in a matter of two or three weeks, a wide variety of recommendations and proposals dealing with changes in the labour and employment market in Canada, which will include a number of measures which will substantially benefit the working women in this country. I would ask the hon. member to restrain her impatience and see those recommendations in total so that we can have an entire strategy instead of just one or two measures.

Miss MacDonald: You always say that to women.

VOLUNTARY VERSUS MANDATORY PROGRAMS

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, that is a most disappointing answer, particularly in light of the letter I received from the minister on Friday which said that he would be approaching cabinet soon with a proposal respecting mandatory affirmative action, which is what my question was all about, not these other vague programs.

A recent document prepared for cabinet by the minister has also just come to my attention which states that what the minister is calling for is not mandatory action but voluntary action, voluntary affirmative action and voluntary contract compliance in the private sector. A memorandum last year dated May 21, 1980, from the minister's own department stated:

—four years of experience with a voluntary federal contracts program produced no results.

Why is the minister reversing himself?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is becoming convoluted in the wealth of her own speculations. I simply suggest to her that the commitment of this government to improve substantially the place of women and the equality of women in the work place is one which is well recognized. We will continue that commitment. We will have a number of recommendations that she, her colleagues, and many other people in this country might, and I hope will, support.

• (1430)

MINISTER'S SUBMISSIONS TO CABINET

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): The minister has totally reversed himself from May of last year to just the other day, as this document which was leaked to us shows. Finally, I ask the minister whether he will reconsider the key to providing greater equality in the work place, which is mandatory affirmative action and mandatory contract compliance? Will he consider taking this diluted document, throwing it out, replacing it with the one he prepared only a year ago, and presenting that to cabinet?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I want to caution the hon. member to place very little confidence in leaked documents that come by way of brown paper bags from moles they have inside some parts of the public service. The fact is that we are considering a wide variety of recommendations. As soon as they are completed, finalized and presented where all members of Parliament will see them, we can get into an honest debate.

RESTRICTIVE TRADE PRACTICES

CANADIAN COMPANIES INVOLVED IN LITIGATION IN UNITED STATES

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): My question is directed to the Minister of Justice. It arises out of an answer given by the Prime Minister last Friday when asked by the hon. member for York-Peel when the gag regulations were going to be rescinded. The Prime Minister at that time said:

There are still some cases before the courts now, some Canadian citizens and some Canadian corporations are still sought after by American law. We will protect them as long as is necessary,—

Can the minister specify what Canadian companies or individuals are involved in litigation in the United States? What are the projections for termination of that litigation and, consequently, when are these gag regulations going to be removed so that Canadians can understand the facts of this sordid mess?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I do not have anything to add to the answer given by the Prime Minister last week. The hon. member is asking for a very precise answer which I do not have at this moment. I do not know if I can make it public. The Prime Minister stated the government's policy on Friday. We have to protect Canadian interests with regard to actions carried out in Canada and not according to the laws of other nations. We must ensure that the laws which control Canadian industries and citizens are Canadian laws, not American.

REASONS FOR GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, I am surprised that the Minister of Justice does not know what litigation is in progess now because it is the underpinning upon which the Prime Minister says he is maintaining these gag regulations.

Why is the government protecting and sheltering Canadian companies potentially in violation of American price fixing laws? If the shoe were on the other foot and American companies were being protected by an American government, would this government not be complaining and screaming?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): The hon. member is asking a hypothetical question. We would have to deal with the serious situation at that time to ensure that action in Canada regarding an international situation was done according to international law. There was nothing illegal about being a member of a cartel with other nations in order to protect a Canadian industry against uncalled for action by the American government that was affecting another nation. It is an international agreement. It was completely legal. When they wanted to force Canadian companies to appear in the United States because of actions that were carried out and permissible under Canadian law, we felt it was our duty to make sure that the Canadian citizens and industry in Canada were following Canadian law rather than be subject to the laws of the Americans.

FORESTRY

RECOMMENDATIONS TO STRENGTHEN INDUSTRY

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, for the past two weeks I have been wanting to direct a question to the minister of forestry, but he is not in the House. I wonder whether the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, who has a certain responsibility over some forestry matters, would answer a question. Has cabinet yet considered a document which was to come before it in June of last year entitled "Strengthening the Canadian Forest Sector"? Has that document yet come before cabinet? Is the federal government serious about asserting and reassuming its role in the Canadian forest sector, particularly in the area of forest renewal and forest protection? I ask this in light of the crisis being experienced by the forest economy at the present time.

Mr. Roger Simmons (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, I am not certain whether the hon. member wants to know if a particular set of recommendations have been made to cabinet on strengthening the forest industry. I can indicate that a number of studies were authorized last year, a total of six. We have received a report on two of these, I believe, one or two. The others are ongoing. Once all six reports are completed, we will then be in a position to formalize our thrust.

PROTECTION AGAINST FOREST FIRES

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, you can understand the frustration which people in the forest sector are experiencing. Twelve billion dollars a year more than any other industry in Canada is earned by the forest sector in terms of export dollars, yet the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce cannot answer in this House whether cabinet has addressed itself to this serious situation. Is the federal government prepared to assume a role in the area of forest protection? I ask this in light of the drought that will again be experienced this year with a shortage of moisture and shortage of snow throughout the country from Newfoundland to British Columbia. Is there a contingency plan by which the federal government could intervene through the armed forces, or any other way, to protect our forests?

Will the government once again realize the importance of our forest industry and act in a manner consistent with traditions in this country, namely, research and development, forest protection and forest renewal, so that the provinces can make their contribution in this important area?

Mr. Roger Simmons (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, the hon. member comes fairly late to the cause. We have agreements with a number of the provinces. Within the last month or so we signed an agreement with the Province of New Brunswick, and just before that with the government of Newfoundland. We have other agreements which are either pending or have been signed, addressing the various issues the hon. member has raised in terms of stimulating the forest economy, protection, and silviculture. We have programs and multimillion dollar agreements which address these issues. I welcome him to a cause we have recognized for some time and have been addressing for some time.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

PLIGHT OF EMPLOYEES OF INSTITUTE IN PRINCE ALBERT, SASK.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Madam Speaker, there are 13 employees of the Institute for Development of Indian Government in Prince Albert who have been abandoned by the Department of Indian Affairs. The institute was established by the Department of Indian Affairs and turned over to the National Indian Brotherhood some time ago. During the last month and a half both organizations have abandoned these people. Will the minister assure this House that his department will relieve the insecurity and psychological stress which these employees are feeling, by indicating what action he will be taking?

Hon John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, it is not correct to say that the National Indian Brotherhood has abandoned these people. They had some rather extensive talks with me regarding the plight of this enterprise. It is an independent federal company, not a government company. We have looked at the situation from a legal point of view. I have not yet got the legal opinion as to whether, even if I could get Treasury Board approval, we could legally pay the salaries of these people who have been waiting for their wages. I have certainly sought a legal opinion, and as soon as I get it I will then assess the situation to see if we can offer some relief. That is the way the matter stands at the present time.

SALARIES OF EMPLOYEES

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Madam Speaker, I believe the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is ultimately responsible since it was the funding body. However, will the government take steps to get the National Indian Brotherhood, or the department itself, to take some action so that these people are not left in the position in which they do not know where their salaries are coming from, do not know what is happening to their superannuation, and do not even know whether their withheld tax has been forwarded to the Department of National Revenue?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Yes, Madam Speaker, we have endeavoured, as a result of representations from the hon. member last week, to make this situation quite clear. It is not a happy one, and the employees know it. We are now addressing ourselves to the question of whether there is some way they can be afforded relief in terms of arrears of their wages.

PUBLICATION OF REPORT ON MARKETING OF URANIUM

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, as a result of an answer by the Minister of Justice to a question raised by the hon. member for Cambridge, he indicated that in his opinion, or at least if he had an opinion, the operations of the cartel were completely legal in terms of Canadian law. That raises a couple of questions. If the operations are perfectly legal in terms of Canadian law, why was the report that was sent to the Justice Department not released immediately? If there is something wrong with the answer, why is this investigation being undertaken? Why is this excuse for an investigation within the department being given, and why is that report not available now so the people of Canada can see it and make their own judgment as to the propriety of this?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, there are two aspects to this problem. There is the question of having an agreement with other nations involving the matter of uranium, and I have said that according to international law that is completely legal. There is the other aspect of the possibility of a cartel within Canada in relation to the Canadian consumer. This is a different aspect of the problem. I was dealing with the former, the first one. They are two different things.

POSITION OF COMPANIES IN CANADA

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): Madam Speaker, I direct my question to the same minister because I do not think his answer clarified the matter. In fact I think he further confused it. Is the minister in receipt, either in the Bertrand report or from legal officers of his department, of an opinion that the action in fact was legal according to Canadian law? To avoid having to ask a supplementary question, may I ask whether it is the position of the chief law officer of the Crown that Canadian corporations, members of an international cartel which may have been in breach of another country's laws, namely, the laws of the United States, are of no concern to that chief law officer of Canada? That was very clearly the implication given in the second response to the hon. member for Cambridge.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I replied earlier to a question about the international agreement. Canada as well as other countries, including Great Britain and France, decided to enter into an international agreement in order to set the price of uranium. The Canadian companies subject to this international agreement acted in accordance with international law and, in my opinion, in their dealings with other countries, they fully complied with Canadian law. As for the offences committed within Canada, these companies must abide by the anti-trust legislation of Canada. We have received a report from the director which we are now reviewing. If there are grounds for charges to be laid against companies or individuals, we shall act in accordance with Canadian legislation and the laws governing marketing within Canada, and there is a major distinction to be made in this regard.

[English]

QUERY RESPECTING LEGAL OPINION

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): Madam Speaker, let me put it very directly to the Minister of Justice. He says their actions were legal, in his opinion. Is that opinion based on parts of the Bertrand report and, in addition, is that opinion based on an independent legal opinion, either within the department or outside, that the minister has received?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I have nothing to add to what I said earlier. I made a distinction between two aspects of the problem. I spoke about an international cartel set up by several countries which Canada decided to join. Under international law, we are entitled to take such action.

As for activities within Canada, this is a different problem. We have received a report from the director, Mr. Bertrand, and we are now reviewing it to determine whether charges should be laid. As soon as my officials have completed their review, we shall decide whether or not we should take action against individuals or corporations within Canada as a result of their activities on the Canadian market.

GRAIN

SHIPMENTS THROUGH PORT OF CHURCHILL—REQUEST FOR INDEPENDENT STUDY

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that the Canada Grains Council, which is controlled by the private grain trade and is subsidized by the Canadian taxpayer, has just released a report critical of the Port of Churchill, and since asking the Canada Grains Council to evaluate the Port of Churchill is similar to asking the minister responsible for the status of women to do a job evaluation of the position held by Doris Anderson—

An hon. Member: That's a joke.

Mr. Murphy: The minister is a joke, yes. Is the Minister of Transport prepared to set up an independent commission to study the Port of Churchill?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, there have been, and there are still going to be, many studies of the Port of Churchill.

An hon. Member: We can believe that.

Mr. Pepin: Yes, indeed. I am quite sure the debate will go on even after the studies. The one which is referred to will obviously make a contribution. In the meantime the Canadian government does its very best to help in the maintenance and the development of Churchill by a diversity of means I do not want to spell out.

On the subject of grain, though, I might indicate that the Canadian Wheat Board has already sold 250,000 tonnes through Churchill this year, at a price, and if the crop improves the Canadian Wheat Board says it may be in a position to increase that basic amount.

Mr. Murphy: Madam Speaker, the minister knows not of what he speaks. The 250,000 tonnes is a minimum amount. It is what we had last year. If we do not get some action by this government the port is going to close. Is the minister forcing the CPR to come to an interchange agreement in order to make sure that grain which is on CP lines can go through the Port of Churchill?

Mr. Pepin: This is being discussed at the moment, Madam Speaker.

Oral Questions

PUBLIC SERVICE

COMPULSORY RETIREMENT AT AGE 65—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, I direct my question to the President of the Treasury Board.

In view of the provisions in the charter of rights prohibiting discrimination on the basis of age, and the interest of some civil servants in continuing to work beyond the age of 65, is the minister planning to remove the compulsory retirement rule for civil servants at age 65?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): I thank the hon. member for the question, Madam Speaker. This is a subject we are examining at Treasury Board. As many hon. members may know, we have already encouraged deputy ministers to examine individual cases on a case-by-case basis to determine whether prolonging of employment beyond 65 is justified. I think it will become a subject of ever-increasing discussion, particularly with the adoption of the charter of rights, and I will assure hon. members right now that we will give serious consideration to bringing forward proposals as soon as our own examinations of the subject are completed.

WESTERN DEVELOPMENT FUND

FUNDING FOR LIGHT RAPID TRANSIT SYSTEM IN VANCOUVER

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

As long ago as December the Minister of State for Trade seems to have indicated that federal government financing for the Advanced Light Rapid Transit system in Vancouver would come from the Western Development Fund. On April 24 the hon. Senator Perrault announced that the funds would not come from the Western Development Fund. On Thursday, May 28, the Minister of Employment and Immigration stated in the House that the funds for the Light Rapid Transit system would come from the Western Development Fund. On Friday, May 29, I was advised by the government of British Columbia that Senator Perrault had stated that federal funds for ALRT would not come from the Western Development Fund.

Will the minister tell us whether the funds are coming from the Western Development Fund, can he confirm that there is a Western Development Fund, and if there is not a Western Development Fund will the minister confirm to this House what the Hon. Ray Perrault said last week, that no matter whether there is or is not a Western Development Fund there will be $60 million for Light Rapid Transit in Vancouver and that it will not be tied to the Western Development Fund?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, what is really important in the hon. member's question is the last part. The fact is that there are funds committed by this government to help the city of Vancouver and the province of British Columbia, not only to finance the LRT system but to begin developing a basis for much broader industrial activity relating to a very high technology enterprise. That is what is critical. This federal government does have a strategy for western development to help diversify its economic base and to provide for a brand new age of economic enterprises in western Canada.

ADMINISTRATION OF FUND

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Madam Speaker, what is important for this House is to find out whether there is a western development fund. This is a serious question and I ask the minister will he confirm that the funds available for light rapid transit are going to be available no matter what may happen to the western development fund? And will the minister tell us to which department that fund is allocated, and who is administering it, because the minister certainly is not?

Madam Speaker: I am not sure that the minister should answer that question. I am not sure whether it has been addressed to the proper minister. It seems to me that this responsibility for the west is not one to which ministers in the House can respond. Probably the question could be posed to the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Fraser: Madam Speaker, I accept your invitation but I would point out that the Minister of Employment and Immigration is in charge of a 13-minister committee on western development and he has been the spokesman for the fund.

Can the Minister of Transport confirm to this House that the Hon. Ray Perrault, speaking Thursday and Friday of last week to confirm that light rapid transit funding would be available whether the western development fund disappeared or not, was speaking for the government? And my second question is: where is the western development fund?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I am sure Senator Perrault would not have expressed that view unless he had solid grounds for doing so.

SMALL BUSINESS

PROMOTION OF DEVELOPMENT BOND PROGRAM

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism. Can he explain why there has been so little promotion of the small business development bond availability to the small business community, something that could be very beneficial at this time of high interest rates and other difficulties plaguing the small businessman?

[Translation]

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, I am glad the hon. member asked this question, because it provides me with the opportunity to promote once again the small business development bond program. The hon. member is certainly aware that the Minister of State for Small Businesses two weeks ago published a booklet outlining the small business development bond program. Copies of this booklet will be made available to all hon. members this week, as well as to chambers of commerce throughout Canada. I have personally issued three press releases on this matter, and the Minister of Finance two. We have also asked The Canadian Bankers' Association to promote this program. I feel, Madam Speaker, that we are taking every possible step to ensure that businessmen and businesswomen in Canada benefit from this program to the utmost.

[English]

INFORMATION REQUIRED

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): I want to draw to the minister's attention that there are many lending institutions throughout Canada whose branches say they know nothing about the small business development bond when an individual goes in to make an application. As the minister knows, this bond, according to the government's legislation, will expire at the end of this year, and I hope that does not happen. However, as time is going by, what measures does the minister propose to take to make sure that every chartered bank branch has the available information and co-operation for someone applying for this assistance?

[Translation]

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, I am grateful once again to the hon. member for raising this issue, because I am personally aware of several banking institutions, especially remote from larger cities and towns, which are not very aggressive when it comes to promoting the small business development bond program. The hon. member will doubtless be happy to know—as an indication of the demand for this program—that the Royal Bank of Canada announced last Friday that it was increasing by $275 million to half a billion the funds it is making available under this program.

Also, I will gladly raise this issue with the representatives of The Canadian Bankers' Association and ask them to keep on urging their local managers to make their customers aware of this program.

FINANCE

ADVICE FROM TORONTO HOME BUILDERS' ASSOCIATION

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance my question is directed to the Minister of State for Finance.

When I arrived home last weekend I had waiting for me a copy of a telegram which had been sent to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance by Mr. F. Peter Langer, the president of the Toronto Home Builders' Association. The telegram dealt with the pressing nature of crushing interest rate increases on not only the industry for which he spoke, but on the individuals desiring to acquire the products that that industry produces. In the body of the text, however, there appears some rather cogent and prudent advice to a government designed to reduce inflation and—

An hon. Member: Question.

Mr. Gamble: —the pressure on interest rates, and these recommendations are made by Mr. Langer:

A substantial reduction in government spending and tighter control of the supply of money—

Is the minister aware of the telegram apparently received by the Minister of Finance and, if he is, does he agree with the general observation made therein in connection with the way in which inflation can be retarded and, if so, is he prepared to make recommendations to cabinet to follow the rather sage advice that Mr. Langer has to offer?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I am not aware of that telegram, but the hon. member summed up its contents for us fairly well. We have opted for, on the one hand, a more restrictive policy, as the hon. member already knows that the monetary policy of Canada aims at restricting the money supply. On the other hand, the Minister of Finance has indicated clearly how he was keeping government spending in line with the general trend in the increase rate of the national product while reducing the deficit over the medium and long term. The hon. member might wish for more stringent measures that would go to the other extreme and be far more painful for the Canadian economy, and that would, above all, go against all the representations his colleagues have been making for a while now asking special programs for home building, special programs for farmers, special programs for small businesses. I doubt that he would get the support of the members of his party in advocating even more stringent restraints.

[English]

GOVERNMENT POLICY ON EXPENDITURES

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Let the minister rest assured that I will put my own words in my own mouth. I have not asked for those programs. What astounds me is that these same recommendations are apparently shared by the general population in Canada.

If the minister is not aware of the telegram, he will be aware of the recent Gallup poll taken with respect to this issue, and I ask him, having regard to that poll's results which show that 65 per cent of Canadians prefer to follow the Reagan policy of substantial reduction of government expenditures, is this the real intent of this government, and will it in fact substantially reduce its expenditures?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I have already indicated the underlying principles of last October's budget. The hon. member seems to be drawing conclusions from polls or opinions that would surely not square with those of the majority of Canadians. I believe the majority of Canadians approve the program introduced by the Minister of Finance aimed at reducing government spending and the deficit. In so doing, we are supporting the monetary policy implemented by the Bank of Canada and hope to reduce inflationary expectations and the real rate of inflation.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

WINDFALL PROFITS OF PENSION FUNDS—REQUEST THAT PENSIONS BE INCREASED

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that Dr. Robert Bandeen, the President of CNR, in writing to CN pensioners, is encouraging them to continue making representations to all bodies who have some responsibility in solving the complex issue of retirement income, I, on their behalf, put this question to the Minister of Transport. Will he suggest very strongly to Dr. Bandeen that the windfall profits being made by the pension funds which Canadian National Railways have really belong to the people whose funds they are? Will he suggest, therefore, that those windfall profits should be used not to pay off some other debt, but to increase the pensions of Canadian National retired employees?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I do not want to accept any of the postulates that were presented, but the other day in committee on a similar question which was biased toward an increase on an annual basis—an adjustment better than what has already been made—of CN pensions, I accepted the idea that I should talk to Dr. Bandeen very soon on that subject and report to hon. members interested in the subject.

CONSIDERATION FOR ALL RAILWAY PENSIONERS

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question. May I ask the Minister of Transport if he will not only talk with Dr. Bandeen, but will he also have words with the high-priced president of CPR, Mr. Ian Sinclair, to the effect that pension increases for railway employees on both lines should not be ad hoc—maybe yes, maybe no—but should be guaranteed annually in accordance with the rise in the cost of living?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I was in my office on Saturday and I received similar representations from other bodies, from another Crown company on that occasion. Repeatedly the government has indicated that the problem of pension was much wider than the public service, CN, CBC or whatever. That is why the government has taken a global approach to it, and report has been made on that particular approach.

REPORTED INTENTION TO PURCHASE OIL COMPANY

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Transport on the same subject. When he is speaking to Dr. Bandeen will he also ask him if the CNR pension fund will be used to purchase Gulf Oil? What guarantees will the pensioners have that they will obtain some of the benefits of this transaction? Will he report back to the House on whether Dr. Bandeen and the CNR pension fund will be purchasing Gulf Oil in the near future? It is very active on the Toronto exchange, which would indicate that something is up.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I was familiar with the rumour; I thought it had died in recent days. Be that as it may, the CN pension fund may very well have shares in oil companies at this time, but no reference has been made to me, anyway, in relation to the use of the CN pension fund for the purchase of an oil company.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. ANDRE—PROVISIONS IN MAIN ESTIMATES, 1981-82

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, I should like to bring to the attention of the Chair several votes in the Main Estimates, 1981-82 which I believe to be out of order and inappropriate for inclusion in the subsequent appropriations bill flowing from these estimates.

The general argument in regard to whether votes in the estimates are in order or out of order was made by myself as recently as March 24 of this year and by numerous members in the House going back to 1971. Arguments have been made repeatedly over the last decade that votes should deal only with the appropriation of funds and not seek to amend legislation. They have been the subject of several rulings by the Chair.

I do not think I am being presumptive in saying that the position of the Chair in respect to this dollar item issue, as it has been titled, is very, very clear. March 25, 1981, was the most recent time this subject came up in regard to Supplementary Estimates (C), 1980-81. At that time Madam Speaker quoted Mr. Speaker Jerome who on March 22, 1977, probably stated it as precisely as in any ruling of the Chair when he said:

—the government receives from Parliament the authority to act through the passage of legislation and receives the money to finance such authorized action through the passage by Parliament of an appropriation act. A supply item in my opinion ought not, therefore, to be used to obtain authority which is the proper subject of legislation—

So it is very clear. Therefore, in order to prove that votes should be struck down as being out of order, it is simply necessary to show that they go beyond appropriation funds and somehow seek authority from Parliament for the government to undertake action.

On the last occasion I brought this up, on March 24, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston)—it may have been spontaneous—resorted to the argument that an appropriation act is legislation and, therefore, it is fine to use an appropriation act for legislative purposes. As I indicated, that argument has been made repeatedly over the last decade and struck down by the Speaker every time. I will not go over that ground again, but I put the caveat that if perchance the President of the Treasury Board should make those arguments in a way as to be persuasive and cause the Chair to reconsider these clearly established rulings thus far, I would ask the Chair's indulgence to participate in any such debate if it should arise.

I will not take the time of the House to go over the reasons for the Chair's rulings. I will operate under the assumption that the ruling is clear and precise, and I will bring the various votes to your attention as to their eligibility or whether or not they are in order.

First I refer the House to vote 30 in the Department of Agriculture, page 2-26 of the Main Estimates, 1981-82. This vote is tantamount to an amendment to the Animal Disease and Protection Act. In essence, vote 30 indicates that, notwithstanding the restrictions of the Animal Disease and Protection Act in respect of conditions which must be satisfied in order for compensation to be paid, payment is authorized, even when the conditions of the act are not met. In other words, vote 30 seeks to amend the Animal Disease and Protection Act. The vote comprises the following:

Contributions including compensation at rates determined in the manner provided by Section 12 of the Animal Disease and Protection Act to owners of animals affected with diseases under that act that have died or have been slaughtered in circumstances not covered by the act.

This vote would seek to extend the provisions of the act to situations not covered by the act. This is the precise language, it is clearly legislating. I would consider it to be out of order.

Next I refer the Chair to the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, pages 7-12 and 7-14, votes 35, 40 and 45. In essence, each of these votes seeks parliamentary authority to establish new programs. Vote 35 deals with the Canadian home insulation program. In the commencement of that vote, the exact language indicates that it provides for the following:

Contributions in respect of a home insulation program in the provinces of—

Then it goes on. It talks about "a", not "the". In other words, it is establishing a new home insulation program.

Later in the description of the vote, it asks for authority to be provided to the governor in council to make regulations in respect of this program. The vote is seeking authority, on behalf of the governor in council or on behalf of the government, to make regulations in respect of the home insulation program which the vote seeks to create.

Vote 40 is precisely the same in respect of the home insulation program or the so-called HIP which concerns provinces other than those included under CHIP.

Vote 45 on page 7-14 deals with the Canadian oil substitution program. It seeks authority to establish this program and it also seeks authority for the governor in council to make regulations in respect to that authority. Presumably, if these programs were in existence by some legislative authority the votes would have read "contributions for the Canadian home insulation program", "contributions for the home insulation program", or "contributions for the Canadian oil substitution program". The votes go much beyond that and give authority to the governor in council to make regulations, and so on and so forth. They do not talk about the CHIP program, the HIP program or the COSP program; they talk about "a" program. The language is very clear; the intent is for Parliament to give authority to the government to do that.

In any case, I have been unable to discover any other place where authority for these programs could be obtained. To my knowledge there has been no legislation establishing these programs, nor is there any existing legislation which would give the government authority to undertake these programs. I have not been able to discover that, but perhaps I could be enlightened to the contrary if that is the situation.

I next refer the Chair to votes L45, L50, L55 and L60 under the "External Affairs" estimates found at pages 9-30 and 9-32. Each of these votes seeks authority for the governor in council to issue certain debt instruments, namely, non-interest bearing, non-negotiable demand notes. For example, the Chair will note in vote L45 it is stated:

—to confirm and ratify the issue of non-interest bearing, non-negotiable demand notes to international financial institutions for international development assistance in previous years in an amount of $169,177,325.

In other words, this vote seeks to confirm and ratify the issuance of these debt instruments. The other votes, vote L50, L55 and L60, are, in fact, for one dollar. They are in the classical one dollar mode, if you will. A vote for a dollar is clearly not seeking funds but the authority to undertake certain action. Your Honour's predecessors, and perhaps Your Honour as well, have ruled that a dollar item may be appropriate in amending previous appropriations acts, that is, transferring money from one vote to another which may have been authorized in a previous appropriations act. But a dollar item is not appropriate for granting legislative authority to the government. The dollar items here mention no such previous appropriations act. They are not an attempt to transfer funds from one vote to another; they are an attempt to grant the government authority to undertake certain actions.

The reason the authority is needed to undertake what is being undertaken arises from the Financial Administration Act. Section 80 of the Financial Administration Act states:

> Except as provided in this act or any other act of the Parliament of Canada,
> (a) a Crown debt is not assignable and
> (b) no transaction purporting to be an assignment of a Crown debt is effective so as to confer on any person any rights or remedies in respect to such debt.

Section 79 of the Financial Administration Act defines "Crown debt" as any debt for which the Crown is or may become liable.

In each of these votes the authority is sought to issue a demand note, which is a Crown debt. It could confer on the Crown or impose an obligation on the Crown to make payment on that note when it is demanded by the holders of the note, which are various international agencies. The Financial Administration Act says that can be done only with legislative authority, authority from Parliament. Hence, these votes in the estimates for a dollar seek that authority. That authority is not permissible under the rulings made by Your Honour and Your Honour's predecessor. Therefore, I submit all of these votes are out of order and should be struck down.

I refer the Chair next to the Department of Finance estimates on page 10-28, vote L15, which is precisely the same as the votes I mentioned previously. It is a dollar vote to authorize the minister to issue non-interest bearing, non-negotiable demand notes in such form as the minister may determine. In other words, all of the arguments I provided with respect to the votes under the Department of External Affairs estimates may be applied to the votes under the Department of Finance estimates. That is to say, the Financial Administration Act would prohibit the government from doing that without legislative authority. The government should not seek legislative authority through the appropriations bill to do that through a dollar item.

I next refer the Chair to page 23-64, Department of Public Works estimates, vote L70, which again is a dollar item. On examination of the vote it becomes clear that the intention of this vote is to amend legislation. It is merely for a dollar; therefore it does not seek funds. The purpose of the vote is to amend sections 34.14(2)(a) and (b) and section 40(5)(a) and (b) of the National Housing Act.

I next refer the Chair to page 29-12, Department of Supply and Services estimates, vote 5. It is stated under vote 5:

> —an amount not exceeding $3,020,000 in respect of the costs of free and subsidized publications shall not be taken into account in the calculation of the expenditures referred to in subsection 29(3) of the Adjustment of Accounts Act.

In other words, this vote clearly seeks to amend subsection 29(3) of the Adjustment of Accounts Act, which unamended would prohibit the government from undertaking this activity. I submit vote 5 is also out of order.

Finally, I refer Your Honour to vote 110, Department of Transport estimates, page 30-90. I would like to quote from line six of that vote:

> —provide that subsection 6(2) of the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act shall not apply in the case of the payment of assistance in the current fiscal year to truckers pursuant to subsection 6(1) of that act.

This vote clearly seeks to amend the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act, something which is not permissible. According to the rulings of the Chair, votes cannot be used to amend legislation.

Those are the only votes I intend to seek a ruling on. I humbly submit that each of the votes I have mentioned is out of order, given the clarity of the Chair's decisions in respect of what can or cannot be included in an appropriations bill arising from the estimates. I have the suspicion, Madam Speaker, that there are a great number of other votes in the estimates which may also be out of order. To be frank, I lack the resources to do the research necessary to confirm one way or another whether this is so. I do not have the back-up staff which the President of the Treasury Board has to make that kind of assessment.

After ten years of raising this point of order I am astounded that this same question has come up repeatedly year after year. The Chair has not been ambiguous but, rather, very precise and proper in its rulings, yet year after year when the main or supplementary estimates are before us they contain items which are clearly out of order to any fair-minded person. Frankly, it is bordering on contempt of Parliament. In fact, the regularity of the Chair's decisions in respect of the order of propriety of these items are just dismissed. The Chair's rulings seem not to matter one whit when preparation is commenced in terms of the next set of estimates. They just carry on. If some get struck down, that is just too bad; they just put in a new set the next go around.

It is getting to the point where I am wondering whether we perhaps should not entertain a new procedure of handling this. Heretofore, the responsibility, if you will, has rested upon the opposition to examine these estimates and to make our position known to the Chair; the Chair has examined the arguments and ruled one way or another. I do not mean in any way, shape or form to be critical of the Chair. I think the Chair has been quite lenient toward the government in the past by saying that though it has been suspicious about certain items, it would leave them there for now, but in the future it would have to be shown that they are in order. That kind of warning seems not to have had any effect.

I am therefore going to offer the suggestion that we might look at another arrangement whereby members of Parliament can raise points of order in respect of votes, and they will be deemed out of order until such time as the government proves, to the satisfaction of the Chair, that they are in order, rather than the reverse. I agree that that opens the possibility for abuse; but we have had ten years of abuse of Parliament from the government by its total neglect and disregard of decisions and rulings of the Chair in respect to what is appropriate for an appropriations act and what is appropriate for legislation.

I would ask the Chair to give this some consideration. It would be an awful lot easier for all of those people in the Bell tower to present argument justifying their actions than for some of us on this side to have to rely on our modest staffs to go through this horrendous document to find out whether, in fact, the votes are appropriate or merely a sneaky manner in which to try to obtain legislative authority for undertaking their actions.

Madam Speaker, I do not want to take up any more time of the House. I would ask Your Honour to give serious considerations to those votes and, perhaps, to the suggestion as to how we may handle this in the future, because ten years is enough time for anyone to learn, even the group opposite.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, in presenting his point of order, the hon. member makes much of the fact that this has been going on for ten years, with regularity, he suggests. I point out to him that, if anything, the objections have been ruled inapplicable with regularity, and in very few instances have there actually been deletions of items. In a moment, I would like to review with the House some of the instances in which such deletions have taken place.

The hon. member also very wisely, I might say, anticipated an argument which he is clearly incapable of answering; that is, the fact that what we have here is an appropriation act, an act of Parliament. He tends to reject that argument out of hand, and yet that has been the basis of many of the decisions by Speakers in the past. When this act is approved, it comes into force like any other act. While appropriation acts themselves are not subject to debate in this House, in accordance with the Standing Orders, they nevertheless cover the non-statutory items contained in estimates which are scrutinized by the standing committees of the House.

In the case of main estimates, as we all know, the period of time for committees to review the spending plans and to call witnesses is three months. I suggest that those three months should provide ample time to discuss the items, particularly those items which may be of concern to hon. members, such as the $1 items to which the hon. member has made reference.

The second point I would like to make relates to the types of votes. My comments concern those types of votes which have been questioned by hon. members over time, and which have resulted in some items being disallowed by Your Honour's predecessors from time to time. In reviewing those items, I noted that the votes which were disallowed contained requests to amend provisions of other acts, particularly where those changes were of a continuing nature and would not appear in the Statutes of Canada. I agree that estimates should not normally be used to change the basic purpose or intent of existing legislation. However, it should be appreciated that these proposals are not always straightforward. In many cases, this is the reason for debate.

I believe we have made every effort to follow this general guideline, and I suggest that we have been successful in this respect. The items which were allowed by previous Speakers were financially related and provided for expenditures of money, which is the purpose of appropriation acts.

Turning to a third point concerning the $1 votes objected to by the hon. member during the review of supplementary estimates (C), they contain requests for deletion of debts, which Your Honour may recall you disallowed, for loan guarantees and for authority to invest in international development banks, which Your Honour allowed to stand.

With regard to loan guarantees which are included in appropriation acts, it should be noted that they are one time in nature, financially related; hence, on the basis of previous rulings, the estimates would appear to be the proper vehicle for obtaining parliamentary approval. In any case, if there is default, the resulting expenditure will appear in estimates and public accounts.

With respect to investments in the International Development Bank, there are four such votes in the 1981-82 Main Estimates. These votes would authorize the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) to sign notes for a one-year period within a total commitment made by the government. In most cases, the cash requirements of the notes signed in a specific year fall due over a number of years, with the results that the cash requirement in the same year from the authority requested for a specific note is less than the note to be signed. The cash requirement for this note and from previous notes signed are displayed in estimates as "statutory" so that the government's spending plan contains the cash outlays for the fiscal year in question. I would also like to point out that these items are specifically defined investments which make them truly financial in nature, and that they are similar to other non-budgetary loan and investment votes.

In conclusion, I would like to say that I appreciate the concerns of the hon. member; but I would reiterate that the items contained in the Main Estimates which he has attacked, are financially oriented. They do not change the essence of other acts and, in my view, they are proper items to be included in these estimates and the resulting Appropriation Act. The hon. member makes specific reference, for example, to certain votes of Energy, Mines and Resources, certain program votes. Of course, legislation will be introduced with respect to these programs.

In summary, where authority is given through an appropriation act, then it would seem entirely appropriate to amend that authority through another appropriation act. Where there is an amendment effectively to other statutes, then I suggest, provided it does not go to the intent or purpose of that statute but simply to the financial provisions or a change in financial provisions, then that would also be an appropriate way in which to effect that change; namely, through an appropriation act.

● (1530)

Madam Speaker, I draw your attention for a moment to the disallowance of some items in supplementary estimates (C), in order to indicate the dilemma in which I find myself and to seek your guidance with respect to what steps you would consider appropriate.

You will recall, Madam Speaker, that eight items in supplementary estimates (C) cancelled debts and you ruled that they were pure legislative item seeking to amend section 18(1) of the Financial Administration Act. You ruled "that they should be and are hereby deleted from supplementary estimates (C) 1981-82". That was your ruling on March 25, 1981, Madam Speaker.

In the past we have always used these $1 items to delete such debts. Section 18(1) of the Financial Administration Act provides as follows:

The governor in council, on the recommendation of Treasury Board, may make regulations authorizing deletion from the accounts, in whole or in part, of any obligation or debt due to Her Majesty or any claim by Her Majesty that does not exceed five thousand dollars.

You can see, Madam Speaker, that it is not necessary to resort to legislation but simply to regulations to effect a deletion of debts up to $5,000. The question is, then, what procedures should the government adopt to delete debts which exceed that limit? I suggest, Madam Speaker, that this requires legislation and it occurred to us that the appropriate legislation would be an appropriation act. If not an appropriation act, Madam Speaker, I ask what kind of legislation would be appropriate? Perhaps an omnibus bill of some kind but it is clearly important that these come to the attention of members of the House and that is precisely why they are provided as one dollar items.

I would conclude, Madam Speaker, that the precedents we have followed in the preparation of the main estimates fully justify the items which have been attacked by the hon. member. I would hope that you would confirm that the main estimates have been properly prepared in accordance with precedent.

Madam Speaker: Indeed, this matter is a complicated one on which the Chair has had to rule quite often and one about which the Chair has suggested that some way of handling this particular problem should be devised by hon. members. I have a feeling that when I rule on the point of order that has been brought up, I will end up suggesting that again. However, the matter being complicated as it is, I thank both hon. members for their interventions and I will take the matter under advisement.

4. There are three forms of tax incentives available to the private sector for expenditures on R&D.

(i) The 100 per cent write-off

Since 1961, firms have been able to write off against income 100 per cent of current and capital expenditures on R & D, less government grants and tax credits applicable to such expenditures. This is an incentive since all R&D expenditures are of a capital nature (i.e., designed to yield future income) and the normal treatment would be to capitalize such expenditures and depreciate them over the economic life of the assets acquired.

(ii) The investment tax credit

Since March, 1977, current and capital R&D expenditures have been eligible for the investment tax credit. This now stands at 10 per cent except in the Gaspé and the Atlantic Provinces, where a 20 per cent rate applies, and 25 per cent for small business anywhere in Canada.

(iii) The research allowance

Since April, 1978, firms undertaking R&D expenditures have been eligible to deduct from income 50 per cent of the amount by which the present year's current and capital R&D expenditures exceed the average of the past three years.

5. Research and development as an activity is a complex process whose outcome is subject to varying degrees of uncertainty. R&D by its very nature is best viewed as an investment which has an expected pay-off mainly in the longer run and, for the individual company or industry, these pay-offs may not be realized for ten to fifteen years. Hence, the relationship between any given level of increase in R&D expenditures and its impact on the economy is both indirect and imprecise. Nevertheless, the results of various studies undertaken both in Canada and other industrial nations indicate that the contribution of R&D to economic growth and productivity is positive, significant and high.

Studies have shown that the returns from R&D investment have also been significant. At the industry or company level, some typical rates of return that have been calculated for specific industries are: chemicals, 30 to 50 per cent; petroleum, 40 per cent; and food, apparel and furniture, 15 per cent.

Moreover, those industries which purchase goods embodying innovations developed by others also benefit from R&D activities. This diffusion of technology serves to strengthen the economy generally by increasing the over-all level of productivity, thereby contributing to increased standards of living.

It is now generally recognized that the expanding industries of today tend to be those industries in which the rate of investment in R&D is relatively high. A recent MOSST study for example confirmed that, for the period 1961 to 1974, research-intensive industries significantly outperformed low-research-intensive industries by recording a higher rate of growth in output, employment and productivity and a lower rate of price increases.

6. Same as reply to question 5 above.

Order Paper Questions

EMBASSIES AND CONSULARS IN CANADA

Question No. 2,296—Mr. Flis:

1. What is the number of embassies and consular posts in Canada for the Soviet Union, Bulgaria, Roumania, Yugoslavia, Poland, Hungary, Czechoslovakia and East Germany?

2. Were personal estates of deceased East Europeans residing in Canada confiscated by officials from these countries and, if so, in what number for the years (a) 1970 to 1975 (b) 1976 to 1980?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs):

1. Soviet Union:	1 Embassy, 1 Consulate-General (Montreal)
Bulgaria:	1 Embassy, 1 Consulate-General (Toronto)
Roumania:	1 Embassy, 1 Consulate-General (Montreal)
Yugoslavia:	1 Embassy, 2 Consulates-General (Toronto, Vancouver)
Poland:	1 Embassy, 2 Consulates-General (Toronto, Montreal)
Hungary:	1 Embassy, 2 Consulates-General (Toronto, Montreal)
Czechoslovakia:	1 Embassy, 1 Consulate-General (Montreal)
German Democratic Republic:	No Embassy or Consular post in Canada

2. Departmental files have revealed no conclusive evidence of the confiscation of personal estates of deceased East Europeans residing in Canada by officials of the above countries in the years in question. Estate transfer is a matter under provincial jurisdiction and the Department of External Affairs does not have detailed information on this subject.

SATELLITE TELEVISION BROADCASTS

Question No. 2,303—Mr. Beatty:

1. Were protests made by the United States government to the government over Canadian reception of American satellite television broadcasts and, if so (a) on what date (b) by whom (c) in what form?

2. (a) What percentage of the (i) population (ii) geography of Canada can receive moderately clear signals from American satellites by TV R.O.s (b) what is the estimate of the number of (i) licensed (ii) unlicensed earth stations in operation in Canada?

3. (a) What percentage of the (i) population (ii) geography of the United States can receive moderately clear signals from Canadian satellites by TV R.O.s (b) what is the estimate of the number of (i) licensed (ii) unlicensed earth stations in operation in the United States?

4. (a) Does the government object to American reception of television signals from Canadian satellites (b) were protests made by the government to the United States government over American reception of Canadian satellite television broadcasts and, if so (i) on what date (ii) by whom (iii) in what form?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): In so far as the Department of Communications is concerned, the reply to the above question is as follows: 1. No protests have been made.

2. (a)(i) The strength of satellite signals is not uniform. Satellite antennae are designed to provide a certain pattern on the ground, and the strength of the signal diminishes in moving from the centre of the pattern outward. The U.S. satellites generally cover all of southern Canada and reach the majority of the population, some 20 million people.

(ii) U.S. satellite coverage of Canada reaches the more southerly portions of the country with what might be called a reasonable signal, and can be received on a larger more expensive earth station at points farther north.

(b)(i) The number of licensed earth stations in Canada, of all kinds, was 604 at the end of March, 1981.

(ii) An estimate at that time of the number of unlicensed earth stations in Canada places the figure over 200.

3. (a)(i) Canadian satellite coverage of the U.S.A. reaches well over 100 million people there.

(ii) Anik A and B cover the majority of the U.S.A., although the more southerly portions receive much weaker signals.

(b) It It is understood that there are over 4000 TV ROs licensed to cable companies. As the U.S.A. does permit operations of a TV RO without a licence, the number of unlicensed earth stations is not known.

4. (a) In 1972 there was an exchange of letters between Canada and the U.S.A. whereby each country agreed that their respective domestic satellite systems would not be used to serve the other country apart from exceptional, specified circumstances. This agreement still stands although informal discussions have been held concerning the revision of this arrangement.

(b) No protests have been made by this government to the U.S., concerning the reception in the U.S.A. of the signals of the domestic satellites of Canada.

REGIONAL NEWSPAPERS OF QUEBEC

Question No. 2,320—Mr. Herbert:

Did the Department of the Secretary of State finance projects to provide a profile of the clientele to be reached by regional newspapers of Quebec and, if so (a) how many were financed in the past five years (b) for each project (i) what amount was granted (ii) to which regional newspapers were the profiles provided?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications):

(a) The Secretary of State financed two projects dealing with the clientele of regional newspapers in Quebec in the past five years.

(b) (i) The first, entitled "English Community Newspapers in Rural Quebec" was completed in March,

1978, by the MacDonald Journal which received $4,805 in grant moneys under the Official Language Minority Groups' Directorate; the second, entitled "Survey of Readership of Anglophone Rural Press" was completed in the fall of 1979 by the English Community Newspapers Provisionary Committee which received $29,230 in grant moneys under the Student Community Services Program. (This project employed ten students during the summer months.)

(ii) The results of both studies were made available to all the regional newspapers, namely:

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, if question No. 2,393 could be made an order for return, that return would be tabled immediately.

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Is it the pleasure of the House that question No. 2,393 be deemed to have been made an order for return?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ABORTIONS

Question No. 2,393—Mr. Flis:

1. What number of abortions were performed in each province during each year 1975 to 1980?

2. For the same period in each province (a) what was the percentage of these abortions in relation to (i) population (ii) births (b) how many abortions took place in hospitals (i) with (ii) without abortion review boards and what are the names of the hospitals?

Return tabled.

[Translation]

Mr. Collenette: I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Cossitt: Madam Speaker, I would like to refer very briefly to certain questions that have gone unanswered for a great length of time. I refer to question No. 30, which I put on the Order Paper approximately two years ago, if my memory serves me correctly, and I have renewed it on successive Order Papers. It seems to me that it is a very simple question that could be very simply answered. It asks for the names of the Canadian Transport Commission members and/or their wives who have passes on Air Canada. That question has been outstanding for a long time, which leads one to think that there must be some type of cover-up going on.

Another question is No. 93, which simply asks for the list of executive assistants and special assistants to cabinet ministers. That should not be a national secret. It also asks, and this may be the touchy part, for the names of those who are under contract to cabinet ministers, what the contracts are for and what the amounts are.

Question No. 136 has been on the Order Paper for over a year. It deals with the fact that in the May, 1979 election I asked about the Liberal party renting an aircraft from Air Canada and when the following election came about in February, 1980, the aircraft still had not been paid for. It was confirmed to me by people in Air Canada about three months ago that the answer had been prepared for the government and would no doubt be tabled in the House within a week. As yet, absolutely nothing has happened.

There are four other questions, Nos. 775, 776, 777 and 1,057, all concerning a Lionel Martin, a freelance broadcaster with the CBC, I understand, who was broadcasting from Havana. I asked if the government would confirm that he had said certain things on the air in great praise of the Castro regime, to the point where in a matter of two hours he was able to determine that 10,000 refugees in the Peruvian embassy were nothing but a bunch of thieves, prostitutes and criminals. This was pretty fast work in two hours.

The last question that I would like to ask why it has not been answered is one for which I do not have the number in front of me but I am sure the parliamentary secretary will be familiar with it. This is a question about the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) going to Jamaica and accepting as a host Sir Harold Mitchell, chief executive and director of Luscar Ltd. a large coal enterprise in western Canada. I asked if the Prime Minister had followed the guidelines that he and his government set down, namely, that any benefit of a value exceeding $200 must be reported. That question has been on the Order Paper for one year and one month and is unanswered. It would seem to me that it would be a simple thing to answer that. Apparently the Prime Minister has gone back and accepted such hospitality again.

He drew up the guidelines, Madam Speaker. None of us can do anything, if we are over there in the seats of the mighty, over $200, yet he is apparently not following his own guidelines. I want to know why. Why will he not tell us? Obviously it is embarrassing or it would not have taken over a year to get an answer.

Those are the questions that I would like to draw to the attention of the parliamentary secretary. If he could possibly tell us now when some of them will be answered, it would be helpful. I hope he will not give us the percentages of how many he has answered of mine and how many come through every day, how wonderful everything is and how they are trying their best and that the questions will be answered soon. The government's definition of soon, unfortunately, does not correspond with what most of us think soon really means.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville (Mr. Cossitt) seems to have answered his own questions and has left me very little to say. Perhaps for clarity I could underline the fact that I have made a note of the questions he has brought up and I will do my best to get the answers.

As he knows, a number of questions are placed on the Order Paper every week. I think the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville is probably the greatest user of the Order Paper and that, of course, is his privilege. It requires a lot of time to get these answers, however, and it is a lot of expense.

The hon. member failed to mention that we have answered many of his questions recently, some of which are of long standing. I am sure he would not want to convey the impression that he is ungrateful that those answers have been tabled in the House, so therefore I bring that up.

Finally, I would like to point out that over 80 per cent of all questions on the Order Paper have been answered. I hope that we can answer the balance by the time the session ends.

Madam Speaker: Orders of the day.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—EFFECTS ON AGRICULTURE INDUSTRY OF HIGH INTEREST RATE POLICIES

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat) moved:

That this House condemns the government for its failure to help alleviate the harsh and harmful effects on Canadian agriculture of its deliberate high interest rate policies, for its failure to honour its responsibilities to the Canadian agriculture industry during the present time of economic crisis, and for its failure to take other positive steps to assist the Canadian agriculture industry such as:

1) extending the small business development bond to unincorporated farmers;

2) amending the Farm Credit Corporation Act, the Agricultural Stabilization Act, and the capital gains tax to ensure that Canadian farmers have access to necessary and sufficient funding; and

3) redirecting its spending priorities to positive agricultural programs which would benefit Canadians as a whole.

● (1540)

He said: First, Mr. Speaker, I would like to welcome our Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) home from his world travels. I hope the minister will stay in the chamber long enough, not only to participate in this debate but also to listen to some of the words of wisdom that I am sure will emanate from this side of the House. In any event, I say welcome back to our minister.

I think the motion we have just heard read is most appropriate in that it touches on and deals directly with a number of issues which are currently of tremendous importance to agriculture all across our nation. For that reason, I am pleased to lead off in this debate.

Over recent years, this House of Commons has not turned its attention to agriculture very often in an opposition day debate. Most of us would agree that it is important to turn our attention to this subject more often if we truly recognize the unquestioned importance of agriculture and the production of food to our nation. Our Canadian agricultural industry shares a disproportionately large amount of capital and operational costs when compared to most other industries. This is due mainly to the enormous amount of land required that at present day capitalized values, is completely impossible to justify in terms of agriculture production. Present day interest rates and escalating inflation are major contributors to this situation.

A recent feature story in The Globe and Mail pointed out that in Ontario debt service is now close to being the largest single farm cost. For 1980 it shows that cost to be $436 million, up from $374 million in 1979, an increase of 16.5 per cent in just one year. Feed costs in 1980 at $588 million were the highest. The story pointed out that by 1985, which is four years from now, Ontario farmers will owe $8 billion. It is fair to suggest that this same situation exists in most other farm areas across Canada.

In southern Alberta, one of our irrigation districts, irrigation farm costs have gone up this year by $6.14 an acre due to the increased cost of natural gas alone. This is the natural gas used for fuel and manufacture of fertilizers. That is direct consequence of the two natural gas taxes, about which we are hearing so much in Bill C-57. It is tragic and most unfortunate but right across Canada we are now witnessing a very significant increase in farm bankruptcies and bank foreclosures, surely a discouraging situation for younger farmers and those who are about to start farming.

Since the Easter recess, we have been encouraged by public remarks of the Minister of Agriculture to the effect that he was truly aware of the extreme financial hardships in agriculture; that he was fully aware of the inequity and unfairness of present monetary and fiscal policies toward agriculture; and that he was most surely aware of the government's loan guarantees to the troubled Chrysler and Massey-Ferguson corporations.

The minister expressed support for the widespread and popular suggestion that the small business development bond should be modified and broadened in its application to agriculture. Surely there is a genuine need for this financing device to apply to unincorporated farmers and that its provisions include farm operating expenses as well as capital expenses.

After recent comments from the Governor of the Bank of Canada and from the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), most of us have to conclude that this government has no plans other than to sit out the situation and follow the trend line of the United States Federal Reserve Board's interest rates. Yet in spite of this dismal outlook, there seems to be a feeling—indeed, it is the expectation of all sides in this House—that the small business development bond approach will be modified as so many members and agricultural groups have suggested. That is the very least the government can and should do.

I want to pause a moment to say that I am sure most of us have already noticed a letter from the Minister of Agriculture on this subject which appeared in today's Ottawa Citizen. I want to read into the record two short paragraphs so that we can all be conversant with it. In part, this letter reads:

> Under consideration is a change to the small business development bond section of the act to allow unincorporated farmers and businessmen to qualify for up to $500,000 in low-interest loans.
> That section restricts banks to interest charges of no more than 10 per cent.
> I am also considering changing the lending policy of the Farm Credit Corporation by instituting a moratorium for three years on payments of interest and principal on corporation loans.

I was very glad to see that letter, and I hope there will be a follow up very shortly.

I want to come now to a subject which is a little closer to my heart, but nonetheless just as serious, namely the Canadian beef cattle industry. I have a few remarks to make about it. Our Canadian beef cattle industry is presently struggling with the economic situation that I outlined in my opening remarks which applies to agriculture as a whole. As cattle producers, we are seriously concerned about the future of our Canadian industry in both the short term and the long term. We suffer from a lack of confidence in the long-term future direction and development of our cattle industry.

In spite of a 2 per cent increase in beef-cow numbers in 1980, according to a Statistics Canada figure, we are still probably at the bottom of the numbers cycle because of the fairly high rate of female slaughter in 1980. In my opinion, because of industry uncertainty we are essentially still at the bottom of both the breeding cycle and the beef supply cycle. Several other situations combine to add to our current cattle uncertainties.

Starting about a year ago, cattle feeders have consistently lost money for at last ten of the last 12 months due primarily to high interest rates, high corn and barley prices and abnormally high levels of live fat cattle imports from the United States over the last five months, a situation which still continues.

Another area of concern is the aftermath of three separate drought years across the western prairies in 1977, 1980 and 1981. I hasten to point out that recent good rains, mostly in Alberta, have changed the current drought picture rather dramatically. However, there are still large areas in southern Saskatchewan that are still very dry and where grain and grass prospect are still very poor.

In spite of good rains, even in Alberta there remains a critical shortage of surface water because of winter drought over the last two successive winters resulting in no snow run-off water for both stock water and the many local, individual spring flood, forage feed projects. That is where the drought is hurting, even where we have had wonderful rains. There is no surface water because there was no snow for two years in a row. The significance here is that for the second year in a row forage feed supplies for cattle will be poor, and carried over reserves are almost non-existent after the previous severe winter for feed stocks.

Another significant drought development was the movement of an indeterminate number of feeder cattle to feedlots and cows with calves at foot to market this spring. There was a serious movement of this kind of cattle in both Alberta and Saskatchewan and maybe Manitoba, although I am not sure of that. In spite of our cattle industry's position at the bottom of the number and supply cycle, 1980 total meat supplies were at a record level of 218 pounds per capita, with beef and veal at a total of 90.9 pounds, pork at 71.3 pounds—an all-time high for pork—poultry at 51 pounds—also an all-time high—and lamb and mutton at 2.5 pounds per capita.

On April 15 the Minister of Agriculture announced there would be no stabilization payments for slaughter cattle sold in 1980. The announced 1980 support price was $75.88 and the national average market price was $76.37, just half a cent per pound above the support price.

In view of the state of the industry, as I just outlined, and the point that we are at in the cattle cycle, and in view of the potential proliferation of balkanizing provincial stabilization programs, discretionary pay-out for beef above the required minimum would have seemed appropriate by the minister this year. The minister has already established a precedent for moving above the mandatory minimum support level of 90 per cent of the previous five-year average market price. He moved it up to 95 per cent and even to 100 per cent on other occasions. Why not this year when it is needed so desperately?

I now want to make some comments about the very recent hog stabilization payment announcement on May 21. Agriculture Canada announced a stabilization program of approximately $9, a few cents below it, per finished hog marketed during the fiscal year ending March 31. However, provincial hog stabilization payments will be subtracted from the amount payable under the federal plan. This is inconsistent with last year, when there were no penalties to discourage provincial subsidy programs and provinces now are actually being encouraged to get into some form of provincial subsidy. For example, Quebec has its own subsidy on weaner pigs and still gets the full federal payment while other provinces with subsidies at market hog level get no federal payment. Similarly, the British Columbia hog plan is not penalized because of the manner in which their program operates.

Over recent years the minister has been highly critical of the obvious balkanizing impact of the various provincial hog programs, and quite properly so. In this new announcement, not only is he inconsistent, but he is actually encouraging more balkanization of the Canadian hog industry. Moreover, many farmers, especially cattlemen, will now feel their concerns about stabilization are justified in that the government can manipulate the stabilization program in several ways, depending on the politics of the day and the money available.

Now some comments about the subject of beef imports. I am aware that the new meat import legislation will begin detailed examination in our standing committee tomorrow. I am very glad that we are getting to that stage of discussion; therefore, I do not intend to discuss that important bill in this opposition day debate. However, there are certain related matters pertaining to the guaranteed minimum access levels of beef imports that were negotiated during the Tokyo round of GATT negotiations that must be mentioned now.

I feel very strongly about the lack of incentive and confidence in the future of our Canadian cattle industry, as I have already indicated. This, referring to the GMA levels that came out of that Tokyo Round, is perhaps the single most important factor contributing to that negative and depressing feeling aobut our cattle industry.

It poses this key question: Is it worth while to spend 20 years or more becoming established in a beef cattle operation at the cow-calf-yearling level, on the grass, only to realize that our offshore competition will continue to get an ever-increasing share of our domestic beef market because of an overly generous guaranteed minimum access quantity base negotiated three years ago at the GATT, and that includes a human population growth factor to guarantee the growth of that offshore import share? That is the most depressing factor of all. It is discouraging cattlemen across Canada today. They are saying bluntly there is no future in beef cattle.

There is no question that our GMA level was set too high. This situation is more obvious now that our per capita beef consumption is lower than when the negotiations took place. As a result of that human population growth factor, those offshore imports will make up a larger and ever-increasing share of our market relative to the U.S.A. since the United States did not agree to a similar human population growth factor in those negotiations.

I now come to another topic, which is very important to the cattle industry today because it addresses some of the serious concerns in which we are involved. I refer to it as a deferred income averaging trust proposal. The minister is well aware of this program. He has heard a lot about it in recent years.

Recently the Minister of Agriculture has been making suggestions with respect to some form of livestock, especially cattle, insurance program, probably to be patterned after the crop insurance program if that is possible, and I rather doubt it. A much more appropriate proposal is the concept of a deferred income averaging trust account that has been put together by some provincial governments and the Canadian Cattlemen's Association, supported by a large number of its component members across Canada.

The plan is actually a form of personalized stabilization that would be applicable to any farmer. Essentially, the proposal would require changes in the Income Tax Act to allow individual farmers to set aside farm income into interest earning accounts in good years, for withdrawal as taxable income in low income years. Such accounts would be similar to RRSPs, but with a much higher ceiling. This personalized income averaging trust would deal directly with at least two inherent characteristics of agricultural production, especially in the cattle industry. They are not presently recognized and accommodated by our tax structure.

First, the cyclical nature of livestock production, especially beef cattle, results in quite dramatic changes in income. There are two aspects to this, the approximate ten-year duration of the cattle numbers cycle and the beef supply cycle, as well as the four-year individual production cycle of the cow-calf-yearling producer.

No other major agricultural commodity is subjected to such extremely long cycles, making planning, management and forecasting so difficult and even impossible. I made that statement several years ago and was challenged by an orchard man, a fellow raising apples. He told me how long it took to get an apple tree into production. That is probably true, but when talking about a major agricultural commodity I suggest that my remarks of the time still stand.

Weather and climatic conditions have a more profound and direct impact on agriculture than on most other enterprises, and I am sure that is an understatement. This climatic impact bears directly on net farm income whether localized or more general. Recent droughts—and I will cite three of them; 1977, 1980, and this year up to this stage—are good examples of this situation. Cattlemen learned long ago—I go back now to the lessons of the 1930s—that the prudent course to follow during a drought is to make your cattle numbers fit your available grass and hay. This means cutting your cattle numbers sometimes very drastically. For the second year in a row I have had to do that very thing in my own operations.

An income-averaging trust would allow drought cattle sales, which would be well above normal because you would be selling off many more numbers in a given drought year, to be exempt from tax in that year. Surely it is illogical and without understanding for governments to tax disaster situations, but that is what has been happening under the present tax structure. We sell additional numbers of cattle in the face of a drought, the proper thing to do, and then have to face the consequences of a much higher taxable income.

Better pasture management would evolve and the income from such drought-induced forced sales would be left earning interest if we could use this income-averaging trust concept. That same income could be withdrawn in a subsequent low-tax year and used for restocking or for operating funds during a pasture and feed recovery stage. I would point out that that recovery stage of ranges that get eaten down to a point where cattle must be removed can sometimes take two, three or four years, before the grass comes back, assuming, of course, we have adequate rainfall.

With respect to additional supplies of forage hay needed for wintering the basic cow herd, I have always reasoned that, in the event of needed government assistance, such as in 1980 when the government brought in its herd maintenance program, the criteria should be based on the amount of such feed necessary over and above the long-term average requirements which are produced on the individual cattle unit.

This concept is based on the assumption that most cattle units have developed their own forage feed production systems over many, many years which would see them through two or three average winters. When one bad one comes along as a result of a drought, they would have their own reserves to carry them over. When that feed supply does not grow, this becomes another matter.

Our present tax laws work against these longer term cyclical, climatic and unpredictable aberrations I have already discussed. It is well known that farmers for years have attempted to defer and average their incomes through very destructive and wasteful year-end purchases of livestock, machinery and other production inputs. We are all familiar with that. In the month of December you size up your situation having regard to possible income tax and look at the merits of sometimes buying significantly large numbers of cattle or machinery. This is simply not good business but it becomes necessary under the present tax structure.

Let me hasten to add that the five-year tax averaging provision presently available to farmers is much less than adequate due to the extreme cyclical nature of the cattle industry. Many of our situations, as I already indicated, last much longer than five years.

I suggest that the obvious merits of individual, self-managed stabilization accounts make this trust account proposal much less costly to the government and more efficient to administer by the government. The proposal has the support of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and most provincial governments.

Before leaving this very important topic there is a related matter worthy of comment dealing with the Farm Credit Corporation. I am sure most of us are aware of the shortage of funds in the FCC. It has been an almost annual occurrence in recent years during the last quarter of the fiscal year. Most of us would quickly agree that additional funding is necessary, and necessary now, either from government or the private sector.

In this latter respect, why not use the individual averaging trust fund I have been talking about as a source of revolving funds for the Farm Credit Corporation? The FCC could administer the fund and it would be a continuing source of their financing needs. Among other advantages, the plan would be well received if only because of the concept of well established farmers helping young farmers get started, and that is a very necessary thing these days. I have never seen conditions more difficult for new farmers to get out on their own and get started.

Before concluding these remarks, Mr. Speaker, I would like briefly to assess the prospects and the challenges of the decade we are beginning, not only for agriculture generally but, perhaps more particularly, for our Canadian cattle industry.

First there is a developing challenge for Canada, especially western Canada, to help supply a growing beef deficit in the United States west coast market area. That deficit is presently 30,000 head of cattle per week, and that amount is about one and one half times Alberta's present production. This deficit in the U.S. west is presently supplied from the mid-west states which are considerably farther away from that market area than is the province of Alberta and most of the province of Saskatchewan.

With ever-increasing pressure on disposable income, consumers will be even more price conscious, especially of the more expensive foods, usually led by beef. All meats will become more competitive and consumers will be demanding a leaner grade of beef. This is, or will be especially true in the United States.

Rising production costs, such as fuel, fertilizer and much higher costs for transportation and distribution, will tend to keep cattle on improved forages longer, and cattle feeding and processing will tend to locate near the point of origin of those live cattle, and by that I mean, at least in Canada, in the black soil zones of the western provinces.

Our livestock transportation problems will worsen. Our railway stock cars are becoming obsolete very rapidly, and both railways have clearly indicated they have no intention of replacing them.

There is an urgent need for interprovincial truck licensing agreements to facilitate long-haul trucking.

• (1610)

The Crow rates and domestic feed grain pricing policies remain key deterrents to real progress in beef and pork production. The government should find ways of encouraging the two groups in the west, the western agricultural conference and the commodity coalition, to continue their negotiations which are now reasonably close to a compromise on this entire debate. I think some appropriate urging on the part of the government in its own way might help to bring this serious problem to a satisfactory conclusion.

Various provincial incentive programs in both cattle and hogs, some with top loading features, not only will eventually make federal harmonization more difficult but will impose an increasing risk of denial of access to United States markets for cattle and hogs. That is a very serious situation that could develop over the current decade.

Our Canadian meat market development plans must ensure that our quota allocation policies enable us to expand sales into the United States. Right now there are some factors working toward actually reducing those quotas, which is a situation we should never allow to happen because, after all, we are sitting next door to the biggest and highest beef market in the world and should take advantage of it.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak to this motion today and I congratulate the member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave) for initiating this debate. I know him as a person who sincerely believes that the government must show concern for the farmer in these desperate times and must do something about high interest rates and the high debt load. I am also glad to see the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) here today. In my approach to this debate I am going to cover a lot of points besides that of cash flow.

I do have some difficulty in supporting some of the positions that the hon. member for Medicine Hat takes in many areas, although the first two points of his resolution could be adopted as a very helpful policy. We have heard much in this House and elsewhere about the sanctity of the family farm. All parties in this House agree on that. However, there the consensus seems to stop.

In order that food production can be maximized for Canada and the world we must give priority to the policy of security of farm income. Canadian farmers have always been eternal optimists, so much so that they continue to lose money year after year and still go on attempting to produce. Much of this optimism has been the result of minimal personnel requirements for running a farm and because those who work on the land are, in the best sense of the word, survivors. To survive, farmers have learned to make the most of as little as possible. The prairie farmer, and I speak mainly of grain farmers, for many years ran on what my father used to call haywire and horse manure. Haywire was used to repair almost everything, to keep the farm tied together. Horse manure was part of the basic fertilizer and kept the crops growing, and the horse was the main source of power.

In those days the farmer accepted whatever he got for his produce and very often received nothing for his labour. However, things have changed. Security costs more now. There is much more input into all types of farming these days from outside the farm, and most of these inputs must be purchased for cash. The farmer must have that cash to operate; therefore he must be paid enough for his produce to provide that cash. He needs that money to buy fuel, the price of which is going up daily; he needs it to buy power. A tractor nowadays can cost anywhere from $50,000 to $80,000. The cost of fertilizers and chemicals, which are closely related to fuel prices, are increasing very quickly. He has to have money to buy machinery and the increases in the prices of that machinery over the years has been fantastic. A machine costing somewhere around $500 before the war now costs $10,000, a twentyfold increase. The farmer needs to pay for labour, his own as well as others. Again, the cost has increased considerably. He also has to pay for transportation and for land.

Farming has survived as a way of life because many people find it so appealing that they continue to stay on under very adverse circumstances. But farming should be treated as any other business which must be nurtured and protected to survive. The family farm way of life has many natural enemies and the motion we are debating points many of them out. Surprisingly, the hon. member's motion and speech point out a number of suggested solutions. I say suprisingly because in his appeal he suggests that the government should intervene in farming more and more often. I am puzzled by that because what we have here is a free enterprise Conservative party asking the free enterprise Liberal party to intervene more often and more fully into the free enterprise area of farming. However, agriculture must have this kind of intervention to survive.

This crisis in farming that we are faced with right now is not new, nor is it unique. It is but another chapter in a 70-year period of instability of markets, fluctuation of prices and depression of incomes.

There are two basic problems facing agriculture today which must be considered. One is the cost of production and the second is the related question of prices, markets and incomes. The hon. member for Medicine Hat zeroed in on the problem of cash flow and the effect of the monetary policy of the government on the cash flow of farmers. The effects of the high interest rate policy and the monetarist policy on farmers have been greater than on most other industries. The government should not be asked at this time to deal only with problems of money. It should look at all the factors which are part of those two basic suggestions—the cost of production and the related question of prices, markets and incomes.

We need to establish as quickly as possible some kind of income security for farmers. I hope the minister agrees with this position. We can do this only by establishing producer control boards which have some effect on the supply of products on the market. We must prevent the dumping of agricultural products on the Canadian domestic market. Some changes in the Meat Import Act will possibly start to control the dumping of agricultural products on the Canadian market.

Also we must establish market prices for all farm products at a level which will cover the cost of production. In the past this was part of the reason for the establishment of the board, but generally it should be a policy of the government right across the country. The farm is the only place where the free market is expected to work. One would not expect General Motors to produce cars by the thousands, put them on the market and then say, "How much can I get for them?" They start out knowing how much the cars will cost and add on a substantial profit; this becomes the price of the cars. However, farmers and other primary producers are forced to produce, put their products on the market, and hope they receive good prices for them.

Also we must establish some kind of insurance for that income, such as crop insurance, a stabilization policy or some type of insurance for all producers. We should look at some basic guaranteed income for farmers.

I should like to deal with the area of grain marketing because it brings into Canada a major portion of our foreign exchange. We must establish an initial price for grain going overseas or being sold domestically at a level which covers the cost of production. We must expand the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board so that all grains come under such a ruling. We should guarantee farmers some return on their grain, even in those years when the market is not large enough to handle the entire crop.

Now I would like to turn to the cost of production with which farmers must deal. In the last few years a major concern has been the cost of land. There is a myth that if farm sizes are increased, the total number of producers declines and the efficiency of farms increases; the larger the unit, the more efficient. If we compare a prairie farm of 2,000 acres which is being farmed by one farmer with two farms of 1,000 acres each, we will see which one produces the most grain. Size does not necessarily mean efficiency. The process of attempting to increase farm size has resulted in sharp competition and inflated prices. Therefore, we must do something about limiting the size of farms; this should be looked at as an area of concern.

We must prohibit foreign and corporate takeovers of farm lands, again to limit the size of farms and increase the possibility of family farms surviving. Also we must look at interest rates which allow farmers to buy.

The other day I was interested to hear the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) speak about the cross of gold which was being pressed upon Canadians. I think he referred to a speech of William Jennings Bryan who was running as the Democratic presidential candidate in the United States. At that time Mr. Bryan became the champion of the emerging west by saying that the west must be protected from eastern bankers and protection-minded Americans who wanted to retain the gold standard. Perhaps the hon. member for St. John's West is attempting to become the champion of the emerging west this time around. Mr. Bryan talked about the need for cheap money, the need for funds for farmers to break their land, equip their farms and harvest their crops. These are the same requirements which farmers have today.

We can all agree that the high interest rate policy of the government has the same effect now as it had back in 1896. I think the motion which is before the House should be accepted, since it condemns the government for not doing anything about this particular area of concern.

What we have seen in the past 30 months is the death of the cheap money policy for agriculture. This destruction by the Bank of Canada, conducted by Governor Bouey, aided by the hon. member for St. John's West when he was finance minister and by the hon. member for Cape Breton-Highlands-Canso (Mr. MacEachen), continues. Their policies may suit the bankers. They may be worth while as far as money and finance are concerned, but they do not suit the farmers in Canada today any more than they suited the farmers in the United States in Bryan's time, 1896. I wonder what we can expect the Canadian farmer to do when he is faced with an interest and money policy which is based on beggar thy neighbour interest rates and which are designed to keep the balance of payments of the country at bay while farmers and other working people are offered a sacrificial lamb because of mortgage payments and the interest which they must pay. I also wonder what the farmers are supposed to make of the gradualism of the monetarist doctrine which is supposed to cut inflation while increasing everyone's interest costs substantially. If the government's policy is anti-inflationary, then thousands of Canadians have yet to find any evidence of it in their mortgage payments.

In addition to wanting the government's policy changed, as advocated by the hon. member for Medicine Hat, we want to put before this House the kind of policies which will change the structure of farming and agriculture in this country, to make it possible for a farmer to feel secure in his production.

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—EFFECTS ON AGRICULTURE INDUSTRY OF HIGH INTEREST RATE POLICIES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Hargrave:

That this House condemns the government for its failure to help alleviate the harsh and harmful effects on Canadian agriculture of its deliberate high interest rate policies, for its failure to honour its responsibilities to the Canadian agriculture industry during the present time of economic crisis, and for its failure to take other positive steps to assist the Canadian agriculture industry such as:

1) extending the small business development bond to unincorporated farmers;

2) amending the Farm Credit Corporation Act, the Agricultural Stabilization Act, and the capital gains tax to ensure that Canadian farmers have access to necessary and sufficient funding; and

3) redirecting its spending priorities to positive agricultural programs which would benefit Canadians as a whole.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I listened with eagerness to the previous speakers to find some new suggestions which I had not heard before on how to overcome some of the problems facing agriculture today in Canada.

First, I would like to say to the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave) who led off the debate that he might have left the House with the impression—an impression which I am sure he did not wish to leave—that I was on a vacation travelling around the world. In order to be back here for this important debate today, I travelled steadily for 24 hours yesterday.

I also wish to say to him that I was not leaving a luxurious place but, rather, we were in a rather humble country called Yugoslavia, at the World Food Council meeting. I had discussions with the minister of agriculture there with regard to signing a memo of understanding to exchange scientists, technicians etc., between our two countries.

I was very eager to hear some new ideas, but I must say that I have not heard one so far. I hope the rest of the speakers in this debate from the party opposite will be more progressive, if you will pardon the pun, as time goes on.

The hon. member for Medicine Hat is very interested in the cattle business. He has been saying the same things about the cattle business for many years. He will probably say that I have been saying the same thing about it, too, for many years. We have known one another for quite some time.

The past ten years in the cattle industry has brought more change than in any 70 previous years of its history. I remember when I was first Minister of Agriculture my advisers told me that I could expect one bad year out of five. Then when we had two bad years they said they had never seen anything like it. Then when we had three bad years they said they had never seen anything like it and that something must be going wrong. They had not been taught the economics to show three bad years could happen out of five. Then when four years out of five were bad in beef economy they did not know what to do because they had never been taught that kind of economics in school. It was something which they needed to develop a new theory about.

When we look at other areas of production we see some which are very healthy, regardless of what has been said by both hon. members who spoke before me. They left the impression that the whole of agriculture was economically unsatisfactory. They know that is not true. There are many sectors in agriculture today which are very healthy. For instance, the grain producing sector is pretty darned healthy when you look at the advance demand for payments which are interest-free.

By the way the two previous speakers spoke one would think there would be a tremendous demand for that money. This year those payments have been slightly more than the year before but less than $100 million. I have said that we would use over $100 million in interest-free payments to farmers who could not deliver the grain, but the reason we did not have to give that money to them was because they were delivering their grain. The transportation system was handling that grain better than it ever did before. It handled a year and a quarter's supply of grain in 12 months, which is a phenomenal thing for that terrible, dilapidated transportation system which some people say we have.

Maybe we have some problems in our transportation system, but we still have the best one in the world, and that includes the United States of America. It includes the railroad transportation systems in Japan and West Germany where there are tremendous economic theories. You can read articles about what tremendous giants these countries are but their railroads have tremendous deficits every year. Those countries do not do very much about trying to overcome that deficit either.

When the hon. member for Medicine Hat talks about offshore beef affecting our markets, he is talking through his hat. That beef did not affect our markets at all last year—he knows that because they did not even fill their quota. We saw the largest depression ever in the price of beef last year. Why? Because there was overproduction of domestic red meats in Canada and North America which depressed the price of beef more than anyone imagined. There was unrestricted production of pork which took away from the beef market. Consumers swung over to the depressed prices of pork and discontinued eating beef. In turn, beef prices went down. That was the free market system working to its maximum, Mr. Speaker, causing hardship, heartache and economic disaster, the likes of which we have never seen before.

That system just does not work in 1981. The economic theory that the market will take care of its own needs is wrong and cruel. What I am saying, when I talk about supply management, is that other people have agreed with those kinds of measures. They are the people who are not writing me letters about going bankrupt and they number about 70 per cent of the producers in Canada. They are involved in provincial boards which provide marketing contracts. If they are efficient producers they produce high quality products and receive a certain return, which is negotiated at the start of the year. The province the hon. member for Medicine Hat comes from has some of the strongest provincial marketing boards in all of Canada.

I do not understand why they do not want something better for beef, because under supply management one does not have the problems that he worries about, such as offshore beef or any other beef coming in from any other part of the world. Under GATT, the supply management type of system, imports are controlled that way. One does not have to worry. When beef took over 24 per cent of the market in Canada this year, was it for one week or for two weeks? No, it took over the slaughter market for more than nine weeks in Ontario, 24 per cent of it on average and 9 per cent all across Canada.

When I met the secretary of agriculture, Mr. Block, the other day, I said to him: "What would you do in your country if, say, we could take over your market that long?" He said: "Oh, you could not do it." He knows we cannot do it. We could ship all our cattle in Canada and only take over 10 per cent of his market for a few weeks, and he would never have to worry about us again. Then we would bring in all our meat from some place else in the world. We would do the same for coffee or anything else we do not produce: we pay according to the tune that the piper plays.

Coffee in Costa Rica costs $1 a pound, but we pay $4 for the same coffee in Canada because it is not produced here. We pay what the importers tell us that we will pay. I get so sick and tired of hearing about dreams that we are going to have this system work so good that everyone will be economically stable, prices will be stable, and economic conditions will improve.

However, when we see the other groups in Canada which are surviving, are doing a good job, are paying their bills and making investments, is there something wrong with that? If one reads the history of poultry production in this country, it used to be that a poultry producer was one of the worst risks that any bank, financial institution, or credit union could take on. Now when a poultry producer goes by, they wave and say: "Come on in; we have some stocks and securities that we want you to buy". The dairy farmers are not running around the block to get out of their way, nor are the poultry producers. Most of the horticultural producers in Canada are not doing that either. A strong agricultural economy has been built. The agricultural economy is very strong except for those two sectors which produce red meat, both pork and beef, because they are destroying one another as a result of overproduction, and hoping that the free market will solve their problems.

The hon. member for Medicine Hat said I was destroying the principles of stabilization in our country. The principles of stabilization are designed to provide equity among producers and equitable income in a fair manner. It says that in the act. A rich province might put in an expensive support program and then expect me to give it federal money, just as I do with a poor province which does not have the treasury to afford that kind of system. That is not what the act says and that is not what it is for. It is to provide fairness. Read what the act says and you will have a better understanding.

Six years ago we proposed harmonization of stabilization to the provinces. Some of the farm organizations said: "No way, we do not want it." The provinces said: "Whelan and his government are wrong in providing that kind of organization", that kind of economic stability in agriculture. One of the provincial ministers was at the meeting. He went home and in six weeks implemented it in his province. The province was British Columbia, which is not a huge agricultural province. The federal government actually spends double the money in that province that the province does. However, he went home and put that plan into force for beef producers in British Columbia. Even some of the beef producers who objected to the income insurance plan joined it just as soon as it became law. I said to one: "Does it work?" He said, "You want to bet it works!" I said, "Does it cause inefficiency?" "You want to bet it doesn't cause inefficiency; it gives me an incentive to produce." It is the only province in the country which increased beef production when the rest went down. Some of them went slightly down, and some even went down more than that.

In different parts of Canada it is said they have such a tremendous program for beef in Quebec, they are going to take over the market for beef. They say they have increased production of beef in Quebec 100 per cent. A hundred per cent of what? It was hardly producing any beef before and it is hardly producing any now. It would take another 40 years at the rate it is increasing production, but it is guaranteeing 95 cents a hundred weight on the hoof for beef cattle. Is there something wrong with that program?

Let us make a comparison with rich Ontario alongside Quebec. Quebec spends $400 million plus on its agricultural economy. Rich Ontario, the largest agricultural province of all of Canada, produces 28 per cent of the agricultural worth of the whole nation, but spends only a measly $200 million for its agricultural schools and every other program. We spend more in Ontario than the province does. However, one would swear by what they are saying on the unfairness of hog stabilization, etc., that we are not doing anything for them. Did hon. members see what they did in eastern Ontario? The hon. member should be aware of that.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Who?

Mr. Whelan: He is on the list to speak later in the debate. I hope the hon. member mentions how they cut back the tile drainage grant in eastern Ontario.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): You just wait!

Mr. Whelan: I hope the hon. member will flail them in Toronto for doing that. Tile drainage assistance is being cut back. That great farming government down in Toronto, the one that thinks so much of everyone, says, "You are not doing anything."

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): They do their farming on the Gardiner Expressway!

Mr Whelan: The old program of interest-free advance payments for grain has been there for a long time. As I said, this year it is not being used a tremendous amount.

An hon. Member: One has to have grain on the farm to get the advance payment.

Mr. Whelan: The farmer can get it if he is not a member of Parliament. I hope the hon. member is not applying for it because he is not entitled to it. A member of Parliament is a Queen's representative, and it is illegal for a Queen's representative to enter into a contract with the Queen. However, farmers can get up to $45,000 interest-free if there are two sons and a father or three brothers or three members running a farm. They can receive up to $45,000 interest-free. We have given money to the horticultural industry in Canada this year. We have advanced loans to those organizations which can prove that they will have the capacity and the ability to repay, in case some of the producers do not, to the tune of $50 million, interest-free also.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): What about the small business development bond?

Mr. Whelan: We have done this for the producers, yet we are told we are doing nothing. We pay up to $500,000 for controlled atmospheric temperature storage and cold storage and jacketed storage for storable products. For instance, the B.C. tree food growers of apples, pears, cherries, etc.—and the hon. member over there is waving. He is so happy with the program that I initiated.

Mr. Chrétien: Give him a standing ovation!

Mr. Whelan: They received $11 million interest-free so they did not have to sell their crops in a distressed fashion. The hon. member knows that the industry in the province of British Columbia is probably in the healthiest state it ever has been in. Parts of that industry in Ontario have taken advantage of that same program.

Then we can move into the western grain stabilization program where we put in $2 for every $1 that the producers put in. How much did they pay out? They say we never did anything, but how much did we pay out? We paid out a total of about $360 million since that program has been in force. It was not totally federal money, but over two thirds was federal money which was paid out. That fund is building up rapidly because they did not have to make a payment last year. I doubt if they will have to make a payment this coming year either because there is a demand for grain and the prices will be good, as hon. members know. That is one of the reasons land is still as high priced as it is in western Canada. If the agricultural economy was so bad, would anyone pay a reasonable price, or even, some might say, an unreasonable price, for land?

The agricultural industry is healthy and can become even healthier with some of the things we need to do. These farmers should organize and run their own businesses. For instance, where are the most successful pork producers in the world? In Denmark. The distance from one end of Denmark to the other is equal to the distance between Toronto and Windsor. How many hogs are produced in Denmark? Twelve million hogs. How many hogs do we produce in Canada? With over 4,000 miles from sea to sea, we produce 12 million hogs. Who markets the hogs in Denmark? The farmers market 99 per cent of them. Who markets the hogs in Canada? Everyone does. There is a hodgepodge of marketing systems. The poor Americans are beings subsidized to the tune of some $30 a hog, yet it is one of the richest economies in the world. The same thing is being done for Japan. The same thing is being done for the people who send satellites around the earth and spaceships to the moon, the U.S.S.R. They are buying that product below the cost of production.

It is said that stabilization is the answer to the problem. The hon. member for Medicine Hat has heard me say that stabilization is not the answer, because I do not believe, if we run an efficient system, that we should have to use taxpayers' dollars to subsidize the United States of America, the rich economy of Japan or the U.S.S.R. in any fashion or form with such a high quality product. For instance, in Denmark the pork producers control the production of pork, how many sows, or hogs go to market, and so on. They run the processing plants and they run their world market selling system also. It is an efficient system.

Our pork producers are some of the most efficient in the world. They are not going broke because they are inefficient; it is because they become too productive. We hear economists and politicians say that the problem is that our society is not productive enough and that is why we have inflation. Do they mean that you have to be overproductive, that you have to go broke because you are so efficient in order for the economy to work properly? I say that is a cruel system, one that is unnecessary in the year 1981. It is time that some of the theories on those things were destroyed, just as some of our old farming techniques were many years ago.

The hon. member for Medicine Hat and the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo) said that this day is a good thing. I say it is a bad thing, Mr. Speaker. The opposition has ten or 11 more of these days in June. If the opposition really wanted to do something they would give up five of them and we would bring in some legislation which could be passed through the House for the benefit of agriculture.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: All they will do is talk, as I am doing at the present time. They have a list of speakers today who will not say one thing that is new or one thing that we have not heard before. It may sound good and it may be politically wise but it will not be new.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): A point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if I might ask the hon. gentleman a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Would the hon. minister permit a question from the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker)?

Mr. Whelan: Yes, I will, Walter, for you any time!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The hon. minister mentioned that his department had legislation to put through. When is he going to put it on the Order Paper? We would be delighted to see it. Perhaps we could make some arrangement, if he would put his legislation on the Order Paper.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I put the Meat Import Act on after I had begged, as he knows full well. I thought it would have been rushed through but they talked about the agriculture estimates and all kinds of things. Now we are finally getting to the Meat Import Act after it has been on the Order Paper for more than six weeks. We have plant breeder's rights on the Order Paper and we could bring that in and put it through in half a day. I can bring in Canagrex legislation and put it on the Order Paper. I can bring in amendments to the Farm Credit Act if hon. members would agree to sit 24 hours steady. I travelled 24 hours steady yesterday to get back here for today. If we can sit in the House 24 hours steady and pass that kind of legislation, I will bring it in for sure.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: They have legislation before them but have not done anything with it at all. I will give them all they want, a whole wagon load if they want.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Have you got a spreader?

Mr. Whelan: I want to say a couple of words about interest rates. I do not think any of us are happy about interest rates being 20 per cent and up, but I recognize that the issues are complex. Even if I were Governor of the Bank of Canada, I probably could not deliver 15 per cent interest rates tomorrow, as some of us would like to see. What I want to do is discuss the impact of high interest rates on agriculture and lay out for you my analysis of the current situation.

Interest rates are a significant cost of doing business for the farmer because the modern scale of agriculture requires a good deal of short, intermediate and long-term financing. Many people today do not realize that in a lot of cases $100,000 short-term credit is not enough; in some farm operations $200,000 is not enough. Some bankers are saying, "Sorry, old boy", or young man, or young lady, we are not going to let you have any short-term financing this year, even though you paid us $50,000", or $80,000, or $92,000, "in interest last year". Letters which I have received from farmers show how much they paid to the banks in interest last year, but some of the banks are saying that they will not go along with them this year. This is my main concern about high interest rates. The banks can do some of the things that members of this House have suggested within the act under which they operate. We do not have to do what the House leader of the opposition suggested and bring in special legislation. They can provide longer-term money if they want to and they can give them moratoriums on their loans.

Some people try to put across the idea that the interest that banks charge is for handling the money. It is to cover the risk they take. Some people are under the impression that banks must have a dollar on deposit for every dollar they lend.

I have a letter from someone who has worked for one of the banking interests of this nation for many years. He said that in some instances they lend on a ratio of 100 to one. Imagine if I could sell eggs that way, Mr. Speaker! A farmer must have the produce but in many instances all the banks do is change paper. When interest rates increase suddenly and unexpectedly by almost one third as they did last December, and that high level is maintained over a period of months, there is the clear potential for an unacceptable degree of financial failure due to short-run cash flow problems. There has been a significant increase in the number of farm bankruptcies, and the situation bears close watching. I can assure you that the provincial ministers of agriculture and I are monitoring developments very closely.

It is my judgment that the problem at the present time is not serious enough to warrant the sweeping measures which are being proposed by some critics. It would be irresponsible to ignore the fact that realized net income of farmers is expected to be some 15 per cent to 20 per cent higher in 1981 than in 1980, even though interest charges are forecast to go up to 30 per cent.

It is obvious that while all farmers are paying higher interest charges, they are not all being forced to the wall as a result. For example, I am sure that if grain farmers in the west—I have already touched on this—had a hard run, more of them would have applied for interest-free advance loans.

The information I receive indicates that financial failure among farmers—and I am not just talking about bankruptcies— is concentrated among hog producers and beef feedlot operators, according to 90 per cent of the letters I receive. A market problem has clearly existed in these segments of the industry for some time.

I have explained to the hon. member for Medicine Hat that he is living in a dream world if he believes in the free market system where they move cattle across borders and across oceans. For instance, the cattle that came into this country and took over the slaughter market did not come by themselves. Some good corporate citizen of Canada bought them and brought them home and took over the Canadian slaughters market. He was able to make a few dollars on it and that is why he did it. That is the name of that game.

At that time I could have given interest-free money to farmers and they still would not have made a profit because those cattle depressed the market more than the money that would have been given to them interest-free. As the hon. member knows, the price of slaughter cattle dropped as much as 15 cents per pound as a result of the glut of big fat

American cattle that came here because they had no home to go to in the United States. Sooner or later I hope farmers in these segments of agriculture, pork and beef, will take to heart what I have been saying about the need for orderly marketing and better management of supply.

When high interest rates were added to the problems faced by hog producers and feedlot operators, who were basically in a loss position anyway, the inevitable exit of producers from the industry in a process of market adjustment was reinforced and made more painful. To say that high intererest rates have caused the farm bankruptcies, foreclosures and forced sales we have observed is to oversimplify the situation.

I took the initiative in April of requesting a meeting with The Canadian Bankers' Association. As a result of that meeting, the association agreed to convey to the top management of the chartered banks my view that, under present circumstances, the banks should be taking a more flexible and considered approach in dealing with farmers who are defaulting on their financial commitments. I am meeting with them again this week. The association also agreed to forward to the chartered banks, for reconsideration, cases of individual farmers which had come to my attention and which I thought deserved a second look.

My staff has been actively involved in talking to individual farmers and their bankers in an attempt to reach agreements that are satisfactory to both parties. In addition, the Farm Credit Corporation is giving special attention to hardship cases in which it is involved as a lender, either alone or jointly with the banks. To the extent that its resources permit, the Farm Credit Corporation is open to refinancing existing indebtedness when this promises to make the operation viable, and where it is necessary to make it viable.

I am not suggesting that this action on my part will put an end to bankruptcies and foreclosures among hog producers and feedlot operators. There are a lot of cases where there was a little equity in the operation to start with. The cumulation of losses in the last two or three years has produced a level of debt which would be unmanageable, and no matter how strong the recovery in the hog and cattle markets, it would be very difficult for them to recover.

However, I have no doubt that many of the farmers who are now defaulting on their financial commitments can have viable operations if they can just be tided over for a few more months, or even for two or three years, until markets turn around and they have time to readjust their operations. My message to the banks is that these farmers should be provided with the additional credit they need to carry on at a normal scale of operations for the next few months. My suggestion is that the banks should get away from the "rule-of-thumb" mentality that anyone who defaults is a bad credit risk and should not be given additional credit. Nor should the banks get too concerned about recent declines in the value of their security, associated with lower selling prices for hogs and cattle. When hog and cattle prices strengthen, it will not take long for the value of the banks' security to climb back to earlier levels.

I am pleased to see indications that the top level managers of the chartered banks are already aware of the special nature of the problems facing hog and cattle farmers, in particular, and are taking a sympathetic and understanding approach to farm customers who are having difficulties. I think this is a case where the banks can do a great deal to help, simply by considering their long-run commercial interests and the special nature of the agricultural industry which gives them so much business.

Farmers last year paid out $1.5 billion in interest payments and this year they will pay out more like $2 billion. Do you realize, Mr. Speaker, that that figure is more than double the budget which the Minister of Agriculture has? My budget for all of Canada hardly reaches the $1 billion figure. We participate in all regions of Canada in support of agriculture. We do more in support of agriculture than do the provinces, something which a lot of people do not understand.

If hog and cattle markets do not develop in line with current projections, measures specifically directed at these segments of agriculture might be required to maintain the basic core of our productive capacity in these areas. It is a situation which requires close monitoring, and that is exactly what I will be doing.

In this context, I think it is important to keep the farm bankruptcy situation in perspective. There were 222 farm bankruptcies in 1980, up 77.6 per cent from the 1979 level. That is something which makes you angry when you hear that something has gone up 79 per cent; 79 per cent of what? It is just like beef production in the province of Quebec.

Our latest information indicates that there were 93 farm bankruptcies in Canada in the first four months of this year, up 40.9 per cent from the same period last year. If you check small business, you will see the phenomenal comparison. We talk about 222 farm bankruptcies, but nearly 7,000 small businesses went bankrupt at the same time. One has to bear in mind that the bankruptcy rate is less than one tenth of 1 per cent of the farmers in Canada.

A lot has been made of the fact that there never used to be bankruptcies to any extent among farmers. The fact that we now have a greater number of financial failures among farmers in part reflects the fact that farming is run more as a business now than used to be the case. More and more farmers are using borrowed money to finance expensive machinery and equipment and increasing outlays for fertilizer, top quality seed and other purchased inputs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. minister but I must advise him that his allotted time has expired.

The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers) on a point of order.

Mr. Towers: Mr. Speaker, would the minister permit a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Because the minister's allotted time has expired, unanimous consent of the House in necessary. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Towers: Mr. Speaker, no doubt there is an oversight on the part of the minister or he had not reached a certain point in his speech. However, I understand he has been recorded on tape as saying that the government was going to change the Bank Act in order to facilitate certain benefits to small business people and farmers. Could the minister tell us when the legislation will be presented to change the Bank Act?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, it is not the Bank Act but the Income Tax Act which would require amendment. We think this aspect has some possibilities and it is under serious consideration at the present time.

Mr. Hargrave: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a short question of the minister?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Again the hon. member may ask his question if there is unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hargrave: My question is with regard to a figure which the minister mentioned. We on this side distinctly heard the figure 30 per cent mentioned with reference to an interest rate. Could the minister clarify that? I am sure we heard the figure 30 per cent.

Mr. Whelan: Madam Speaker, I did use that terminology. I said some people are forecasting that interest rates could go that high. In fact, some economists are forecasting a 30 per cent interest rate.

In the World Food Council we discussed interest rates as they pertain to poorer countries, poorer than Canada; for instance, the Philippines. In some of the South American countries the interest rate is over 30 per cent at the present time. I don't know how countries can produce food under those circumstances. Some Canadian banking institutions are lending money in those areas. I am told that in some parts of Asia interest rates can be well over 50 per cent. We abhor that kind of thing.

I also pointed out that interest rates were not the only bad thing. For example, when you go to world price for energy the impact will be even worse than interest costs. Some people on the other side may be advocating higher energy costs, but people earn $1 a day in places like Tanzania where diesel fuel and gasoline cost $5 a gallon and eggs cost $2.50 a dozen. These are the things we see happening with the high cost of energy and the input costs of agriculture.

Let me tell members from Saskatchewan that the cost of potash has increased over 200 per cent. I know the potash corporation in Saskatchewan last year had an increase in profit of 150 per cent. I guess that is what you call social democracy. That is the staff of life for many people. Potash fertilizer produces food. Economically millions of people in the world are being starved to death by interest, energy and fertilizer costs.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave) for introducing this motion. I have to express my extreme disappointment with the minister because he did not address his mind to the main part of the motion, let alone to the remarks of the hon. member from Medicine Hat which included some very instructive comments and objective thoughts to help the farming community in this country who are faced, in the terms of the motion, with the "deliberate high interest rate policies" of this government. For the first three-quarters of the minister's speech we heard that we may not have increased beef production in Canada to service the American market, but we certainly increased the bull production in Canada which could have more than serviced the United States. A lot of the ministers remarks were not even relevant to the motion.

I like the minister. He is a genial fellow, but he has had his chance to speak. I have only 20 minutes, which is even less time than the minister, but I intend to say a few more relevant things, with respect.

The minister seems to thrive on appellations, but there is one which goes back to storybook fame. It is "Old Thunder". It is lots of noise, lots of thunder but no fire in the old system. This minister with his orations, diversions and camouflage in terms of real problems in the agriculture industry will be known as "Old Big Thunder" or "Soft Thunder". Like summer lightning, he has some flashes in the sky but does not produce any heat.

One of the reasons I am speaking today is because the farm community is faced with high interest rates. We are talking about the farmers of this land. We are not talking today about the small businessman and the pensioner caught in the inflationary spiral. We are not talking about the Denmark hog grower, who is not suffering from 22 and 24 per cent interest rates. We are talking about Canadians.

The minister criticized the hon. member for Medicine Hat by saying: "Oh, well, you always say the same old thing." Of course the farmer, the small businessman and Canadian citizens always say the same old thing. This minister should come down from the clouds and get back into the fields of Canada and deal with Canadians. He will find that the farmer in the east, in the west and in Ontario, where bankruptcy is high, is saying the same old thing, that 23 per cent interest on loans for short-term capital is too high to be able to run a productive farm.

The rate of bankruptcies, which were not even heard of in earlier days, is now very high. As the minister said, last year 222 farms went out of production and already in the first quarter of this year there were 93. Those are farms that are out of production and will not come back into production for some time.

In Nova Scotia there is a farm loan board which provides substantial short-term help to farmers caught in this squeeze. Therefore, we do not have at the present time this horrendous bankruptcy situation. In Ontario, which used to be the heartland of Canada, I know of two cases where the farmers just walked off the land. They could not afford to pay 22 per cent on short-term money. They could not do what the hon. member for Medicine Hat suggested in terms of reducing in an immediate way farm credit procedures in order to get short-term help.

Of course people are saying the same old thing. They will continue to say the same old thing as long as this government sits on its derrière and tries to camouflage the fact that the farm community is faced with insurmountable problems as a result of interest rates that have never been so high.

I have no sympathy for the minister today, who outside the House is a genial fellow. I have no sympathy for the fact that he had to fly for 24 hours in order to get back here to participate in this debate. If the debate has done nothing else, it has at least brought the minister back to Canada to talk about Canadian problems and deal with the thoroughly irate farming community from coast to coast.

The Toronto Star, that pillar of journalism which is the masthead of the Liberal party, says day in and day out that the interest rate policy of this government is folly. The Canadian Federation of Agriculture has asked for short-term help to the tune of $200 million to assist farmers to renegotiate loans or who are caught in a mortgage vise. They want help now, not down the road.

We cannot accept the policy of gradualism of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). It will lead us right into the financial sink and down the tube if we follow that minister who does not bring in any policy. The Minister of Agriculture is monitoring the problems. All you have to do is look at the farm digest and farm papers to know that the farm community is in dire straits. Obviously some parts are stronger and healthier than others.

This minister comes back, moans and groans, rubs his tired eyes and talks about the sacrifice he made by travelling 24 hours to be here in the House of Commons to talk about something that is basic and important to every Canadian from coast to coast. That is the problem of the farm community having the productive capacity to produce food for all Canadians. Instead of talking about our potential to expand, all we received from him this afternoon was claptrap.

Every farmer in this country has sacrificed more than the Minister of Agriculture in trying to meet unconscionable interest rates. I hope they were watching television today to see the Minister of Agriculture try and camouflage the real problems. He did not even address the motion of the hon. member for Medicine Hat. It is not a highly provocative, partisan motion.

The speech by the hon. member for Medicine Hat was most even and objective. That member, a past president of the Canadian Cattlemen's Association, is one of the most respected members of the farm community of this country and was so long before he became a member. We are thankful he is now a member so that he can bring to the floor of this House some of the concerns of the farm community, let alone his special knowledge and interest in the cattlemen of this country. I am glad the minister was in this House to hear some of the hon. member's positive proposals. However, the minister did not even address them. The motion reads:

> That this House condemns the government for its failure to help alleviate the harsh and harmful effects on Canadian agriculture of its deliberate high interest rate policies, for its failure to honour its responsibilities to the Canadian agriculture industry during the present time of economic crisis, and for its failure to take other positive steps to assist the Canadian agriculture industry such as:

The hon. member for Medicine Hat referred to a letter in the paper which indicates that the minister may be moving after he monitors a little more. The motion continues:

> 2) amending the Farm Credit Corporation Act, the Agricultural Stabilization Act, and the capital gains tax to ensure that Canadian farmers have access to necessary and sufficient funding; and
> 3) redirecting its spending priorities to positive agricultural programs which would benefit Canadians as a whole.

That is a fairly even motion in view of the crisis facing Canadian agriculture today. The Science Council of Canada stated that if we develop our potential in agriculture, we can double our production by the year 2000. We must redirect some of our interests, energies and priorities into the farming community. However, all we got today was the same old camouflage evasion from "Old Thunder", except for the very last part of his speech.

I am glad the hon. member for Medicine Hat asked about the 30 per cent interest rate. From listening to the minister, I thought he was relating to what people were saying was going to happen in Canada, not in the Philippines or Chile. In any event, the minister clarified that in part. Let us hope there will be no more talk about 30 per cent interest rates. The 20 and 22 per cent interest rates are too high for the farmer to pay.

The minister complained that we are saying the same old thing. Interest rates have been going up on a monthly basis with a few little blimps downward every so often. However, the farmer is locked into a year contract or demand note, and a longer contract if it is a mortgage. Co-ops do not change that quickly. The farmer cannot readjust his planning to conform with these unconscionable interest rates. That is the fundamental problem affecting the farm community across the country.

I was going to compliment the minister before I listened to his oration. There are areas where we can move very positively in agriculture and where we can redirect expenditure and produce more. The hon. member for Medicine Hat talked about an averaging indexing proposal. The minister did not reply to that. It seemed sensible and logical. In good years the farmers could salt some away and use it in poor years. Because the minister did not reply to that, I am a little hesitant to compliment him.

Two weeks from today the minister and I will be at the official opening of the research station at Kentville, in Annapolis Valley in my constituency. That agricultural research station is for all of Atlantic Canada. There is no area of agriculture in this country where there is more potential than in research and development. I am certainly glad that we are going finally to have the official opening of this research station.

I could cite chapter and verse some of the problems there are now. I am sure the minister is aware of them. Unless we plan now for the future, some of the smaller markets in terms of dollars will be lost to Atlantic Canada. We are not like the big people from the west and we do not have the wealth of Ontario. Our low-bush blueberries in Atlantic Canada account for something like $18 million to a lot of farmers who need that income, yet right now, because of developments in high-bush blueberries in Michigan, New Jersey and the Carolinas in the United States, we in Canada are becoming very uncompetitive. Unless research is done now in terms of more mechanical means of harvesting blueberries to cut down on high labour costs and in terms of pruning these bushes rather than burning them with high cost oil and things like that, we will lose these specific benefits in Atlantic Canada from this industry. Obviously, they are very small, at the start, but when you count up all those blueberries and you find you lose $18 million, you realize that this is something very valuable to many farmers in Atlantic Canada.

I see that my time is almost up, but I was bothered by the minister's remarks today. I would have respected him even more had he come in and said he knows there are a heck of a lot of problems in the agricultural industry. Anyone who is confronted with these interest rates, whether he is a businessman or a millionaire, particularly farmers with crops that have to be planned on a seasonal basis, is obviously facing tough times.

I compliment the hon. member for Medicine Hat for bringing forward this motion. Those are my points about the small business development bond program and some of the proposals by the hon. member. I would really have appreciated the minister giving a considered reply to the speech by the hon. member for Medicine Hat, or at least responded to his motion, rather than giving us utter garbage for the first three quarters of his speech.

The minister knows more about this industry than his remarks indicate. From time to time I believe he really does have a sincere interest in agriculture. But I think my appellation of "Old Thunder", "Big Thunder", or whatever you want, is unfortunately too accurate. While the minister may have, and does have when he is not so tired, a sincere interest in agriculture, I am afraid that often the sound he makes in cabinet does not provide results. That is certainly the case with the sound he makes outside, but how much weight he carries in cabinet councils I am not sure. With his interest in agriculture he knows better than I that more research and development with a shift into higher spending has to be accomplished if we in Canada are to stay competitive in many areas.

There are many problems facing agriculture now in Atlantic Canada. Somebody earlier referred to GATT. Let me talk about research and development. We are at a lower level in Canada in terms of research and development than the United States and Russia. I have read several interesting articles on this subject and I intended to quote from one at quite some length. The agricultural reporter from Alberta, Mr. Schmidt, reports in a very interesting way on the comparison between the United States, Canada and Russia in terms of expenditures for research and development. Canada is at the bottom of the list. I understand that the minister's officials and Science Canada suggest that a dollar spent on research will in effect produce $7 in return.

I know the minister has been pretty busy and may not have had a chance to digest the traditional annual brief from the Agricultural Institute of Canada, but I hope his officials have considered it. It was presented to all the party caucuses in the Parliament of Canada, the government, Conservatives and the NDP. On page 1 of the brief there is a most interesting section on research and development which shows, in effect, the returns you get when you really spend money on research and development. Some of these facts apply very much in my riding because of the enhancement and development of the broiler industry. On page 2 of the brief, among other things, appears the following:

> The benefits accruing from agricultural research have been well documented. The safeguarding of wheat from the ravages of rust provided a benefit to cost ratio of 482:1; research leading to the reduction of fallow acreage in Manitoba provided a benefit to cost ratio of 278:1 but the benefit should continue to accrue for decades ahead; a benefit to cost ratio of 260:1 was estimated for R and D on chicken broilers; in Ontario input cost of $32 million for the improvement of corn provided additional returns of $2.6 billion or an investment return of 80:1.

I think my time has just about run out, but the second short paragraph on this page shows the Canadian picture in relation to that of the United States. It states:

> Ten years ago (1970), the Canada Department of Agriculture expenditure was 3.7 per cent of total Canadian Government expenditure. By 1978, agriculture expenditure had dropped to 2.4 per cent of total government expenditure and in 1979, agriculture expenditure was reduced still further to only 1.9 per cent of total government expenditure. Of this, only 10.9 per cent was expended on agricultural research.

There were many proposals and positive recommendations, many of which have been made before. Frankly, I think Socrates said a long time ago that there has not been a new philosophic or perhaps agricultural thought that has never been advanced before by man. These ideas are framed in different ways. A lot of these things have been said before. There is a problem in terms of research and development. Anyone can play with figures, including politicians, farmers and certainly financiers. If we are to plan for the future and look down the road ten years—and it often takes that long to do the work and see the results—instead of a declining budget for research and development within the agricultural budget we must have lead money and lead time. We must have a surplus of funds for research and development in agriculture. If we are to have the same budget, let alone a declining budget, the inflationary factor will mean we will be spending all the money and time on research and development just to maintain the status quo or to plug the holes in the proverbial dike wall of research and development, with no plans for new holes in that wall down the road. We must spend more money in order to develop better apple, potato, wheat, soft wheat and hard wheat crops, you name it, to say nothing of the low-bush blueberry crop that must be competitive so we do not lose our markets.

I do not want to trespass on time as I know other hon. members want to speak. We should perhaps have two days' debate on this subject, one for western agriculture and one for eastern agriculture. There are very real problems and I know the minister is aware of these. I certainly hope his officials are aware of problems in relation to the GATT negotiations and the potentially adverse effects of valuation procedures and freight rates in border states. If we are not careful we may be in greater difficulty because of valuation procedures and freight rates for imports. Valuation is supposed to be neutral and freight rates are supposed to be taken into account, but in terms of Canadian markets and producing areas adjacent to border states we could find ourselves in the position of having a real flood of imports.

There are many things one could talk about in the field of agriculture. I could even refer to the veterinary college in Atlantic Canada, the matter of feed grains in eastern Canada, the effect of marketing boards on price stability and production, and interest rates to consumers. There is so much to be said about agriculture, but I think the bottom line of my concluding remarks about agriculture is that I just wish that "Old Big Thunder" would not thunder so much from time to time—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

● (1730)

Mr. Marcel Ostiguy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to comment very briefly on today's opposition motion concerning interest rates. Mr. Speaker, I listened to the speeches of two opposition members, the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave) and the hon. member for Annapolis Valley-Hants (Mr. Nowlan), but neither of them came up with constructive suggestions. They criticized the 10 per cent segment of agriculture which may be in the doldrums, but they forgot to point out that 90 per cent of Canada's agricultural community is operating at full capacity.

Mr. Speaker, it is a fact that Agriculture Canada and the minister are aware of the problems caused by recent hikes in interest rates, particularly to young farmers who are just starting out in the agricultural business and to a few specialized producers involved in hog and beef production. Naturally, one cannot remain indifferent in the face of bankruptcy reports, as the minister said earlier, because in certain areas the bankruptcy rate is as much as 70 per cent higher than at the same time last year. Still, although interest rates do create serious problems for all farmers, the number of bankruptcies in Canada has always been very low. As I recall, a few moments ago the minister gave us a few statistics to show that last year 222 farm operations went bankrupt as compared with over 7,000 small businesses. Of course there are fewer bankruptcies in agriculture than in any other field. However, in most instances we are not in a position to find on our own the corrective measures to problems whose scope extends far beyond the jurisdiction of the Department of Agriculture. In the field which concerns us, namely assistance to farmers, the existing programs coupled with certain measures which have already been taken by our department contribute to lighten the farmers' financial plight.

Last week, when regional development deputy minister Couillard appeared before the Standing Committee on Agriculture, I heard opposition members belittling the new reorganization in the Department of Agriculture. And yet that reorganization was carried out to meet the needs of farmers and enable them to improve their efficiency and their productivity. It follows that when they raise their productivity they can lower their production costs. Throughout the debate, during an hour and a half last week, they harassed the deputy minister before the Standing Committee on Agriculture, telling him they did not understand why the Department of Agriculture has made changes within that service. Yet it was quite simple, and today members opposite blame the Department of Agriculture for doing nothing. It was precisely measures like those taken by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion that allow farmers to improve their production.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, as a result of recent increases, interest rates of chartered banks in Canada have reached almost 20 per cent. While everybody is clearly affected by those increases, farmers are especially hard hit, because they need short-term and long-term loans to purchase inputs such as the machinery, the seed, the fertilizers, etc. required for their annual production and to improve their operations. A while ago, the Minister of Agriculture pointed out rightly that some products such as chemical fertilizers from Alberta had increased by 200 per cent, that potash products had substantially increased. We did not hear the members opposite, especially those from Alberta, refer to such increases. Pork producers, of course, like all those whose prices are not controlled by marketing boards, are especially affected by rising interest rates. If we compare them with dairy producers who have a National Marketing Board, quotas throughtout the country and indexed increases for industrial milk and fluid milk.

In my own constituency of St. Hyacinthe, there are a lot of farmers in just about every type of production. I can assure you that the dairy producers are not complaining because they come under a marketing board. There are of course many farmers in my region who are pork producers. Since there was no pork marketing board until quite recently, when the Quebec producers voted for a board about four to six weeks ago, these producers have known fluctuating prices and they have certainly overproduced, which has brought about a fall in prices. Of course, decreasing prices and increasing interest rates do not help this industry. Not only must the farmers obtain bank loans at rates between 18 and 20 per cent to maintain costly operations and improve their buildings and equipment, but market prices are too low to allow them to get a sufficient income from their product. As I have just explained, Mr. Speaker, marketing boards make all the difference.

It is a known fact that, at the present time, financing costs represent approximately 15 per cent and can even reach up to 30 per cent of operating costs. However, the situation is perhaps of greater concern for young farmers and new operators who have to bear the costs of big mortgages in addition to the burden of those costly productions. These young farmers who want to make a start on our Canadian farms are the backbone of our farming sector and they are often forced to give up without any hope of being able to reintegrate the farming sector on the short term. We know, Mr. Speaker, that a disproportionate number of pork producers are now defaulting on their farm loans. The minister met recently with the Association of Bankers. We shall be meeting the association again this week.

I have personally met several bankers in Quebec. We are simply asking them to be a bit more indulgent toward hog producers. Several small processors also have problems because they have to support very large stocks from one crop to the next at current interest rates. Last year, farmers paid $1.5 billion in interests, and this figure will probably reach $2 billion this year. I am speaking about what action we intend to take, I have just mentioned that there have been meetings with The Canadian Bankers' Association. The Minister met them at the end of April and we shall be meeting them again this week. The Minister has pointed out that the banks and the government have a shared responsibility to consider the long-term interests of Canadian agriculture and our society as a whole during economically difficult periods.

The Minister has asked the bankers to consider refinancing agricultural loans now due over a longer period. I believe that it would be physically possible for the banks to do so to help the farmers who are now going through a difficult period, like all the other industrial sectors. As a result of this meeting, the association agreed to recommend a more flexible policy for the management of agricultural loans to its members, to the bank branches, in view of the high interest rates. The association has agreed to discuss with its members the possibility of paying particular attention to those who are facing real problems, such as pork and beef producers. The farmers have just completed their sowing, and they have had to invest large amounts of money in fertilizers and seeds. And considering the current low prices in the pork industry, it is my feeling and my conviction that the banking system will act on the request made by the minister just recently.

Of course, borrowers from the Farm Credit Corporation pay much lower interest rates than other borrowers. On April 1, 1981, the rate was set at 14 per cent. I would like to point out to opposition members that this is only 2 per cent more than last year, when they were the government, and this indeed was more than a year ago because they had raised the Farm Credit Corporation's rate to 12 per cent. And since that time, we have raised it to 14 per cent, which is only 2 per cent more charged on loans from that corporation.

The flexible repayment facilities offered by the Corporation are based on the nature of the borrowers' farm production and last year, when pork producers faced difficulties, each case received special attention and was dealt with fairly. There have been time extensions to repay farm loans. Four thousand five hundred long-term loans were granted in 1980-1981. Currently, the government is seeking as a priority a way of making more funds available to the corporation. As stated earlier by the minister, if the various pieces of legislation on the Order Paper can proceed—and there are now five or six in the name of the Minister of Agriculture—we will be in a position, hopefully within a reasonable time frame, to amend the Farm Credit Corporation Act so that farmers may obtain bigger loans. It must be kept in mind that both in Ontario and in Quebec farmland worth $500 per acre hardly 15 years ago is now worth $1,500 and $2,000 per acre. And as far as I am concerned, I can say that the family farm, my father's 100 acres, was sold for $1,500 an acre in 1960, and on resale just a month ago, it brought $2,000 an acre, which clearly shows the high increase in farm prices. What this means, Mr. Speaker, is that although the farmer must face high increases in interest rates like all other industries, his farm property has increased in value. The example I have just given is very typical.

Farm improvement loans granted between January 1, 1980, and March 31, 1981, totalled over $49 million. The maximum interest rate charged cannot exceed the chartered bank prime rate by more than 1 per cent. In addition, over the weekend I met people involved in the selling of farm equipment, seed grain and other input supplies. All of them told me that in recent months they have had at least a 20 to 25 per cent increase in sales. In connection with the hog stabilization program which is intended to help producers, the minister recently announced stabilization payments of $8.96 per head marketed between April 1, 1980, and March 31, 1981. This means that the total cost of the program could reach or even exceed $100 million. That, Mr. Speaker, is yet another move by the Department of Agriculture and the Canadian government to help out the farmers in Canada. I can say that in the province of Quebec which accounts for 38 to 40 per cent of all of Canada's hog production, approximately $40 million will be spent to help Quebec hog producers.

There have also been improvements with a view to processing applications more quickly and we have so advised the organizations with whom we have met recently. I was accompanied by a group of hon. members at that meeting with representatives of the UPA, the Coopérative fédérée and the Association des meuniers. We promised them that all correctly filled forms would be given special attention and that within four to five weeks of their being received farmers, precisely because of those high rates of interest, would receive their hog stabilization payments. The Agricultural Stabilization Board and the Department of Agriculture have introduced these stabilization payments in order to provide Canadian producers with fair and average support and income.

Agriculture Canada and the federal government have established many other programs designed to help producers increase their production and avoid disaster in periods of hardships such as the one we are now experiencing. For instance, there are the research programs. Over $155 million of the over-all departmental budget have been earmarked for research. In the riding represented by the hon. member for Annapolis Valley-Hants (Mr. Nowlan) a new research centre is soon to be opened. Earlier, the hon. member spoke of Canada's fourth veterinary college. One has to understand the reasons why this college is not yet under construction. There are four provinces each striving to get it. Once they are agreed about a site, Agriculture Canada will assuredly abide by the recommendations of the Howell report submitted over two years ago.

The crop insurance program is a cost-sharing program where federal and provincial governments each contribute 50 per cent. The bill setting up Canagrex, an agency specifically entrusted with exploring for new markets, will soon be introduced and will hopefully be supported by the opposition. Only last week, I replied to a question put by the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Caron) concerning maple syrup overproduction in that area. It is in instances such as these, Mr. Speaker, that Canagrex, which is to be responsible to the Department of Agriculture, will be involved in finding new offshore markets. This could work for maple syrup as well as pork, eggs, chicken, beef, or cheese. We know that Canadian producers are increasing their production considerably each year, which means that there is overproduction in many areas. As far as food supplies are concerned Canada is definitely not an importing but an exporting country. We need an agency like Canagrex, which the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) wants to set up, to help our producers.

We also have programs for drought-stricken ranchers. I would say that Agriculture Canada did everything possible last summer to help those western farmers who were severely affected by the drought. As far as stabilization payments are concerned, I just referred to them in connection with hog producers. We have had them for hog and potato producers and we will probably have them for apple growers. The Agricultural Stabilization Act provides for nine areas of production where, whenever the market price does not match production costs the Agricultural Stabilization Board steps in, which means of course the Department of Agriculture. As the Minister of Agriculture mentioned earlier, over $3 million were paid out to Canadian producers since the legislation was enacted.

Bill C-46, to regulate the importation of meat, that the Standing Committee on Agriculture will start considering tomorrow, is another major piece of legislation designed to help Canadian farmers. I hope members opposite will make sure it is adopted without delay. Bills C-32 and C-33 as well as several other bills now on the order paper are all pieces of legislation put forward by Agriculture Canada and the Canadian government to improve farm products. I should like to deal now with the Feed Freight Assistance Program of the Canadian Livestock Feed Board. When the chairman of the Canadian Livestock Feed Board appeared before the standing committee a few weeks ago, members of the opposition dared say to him: "You should call it the Eastern Canada Livestock Feed Board."

It is not with such remarks that we are going to help our farmers, Mr. Speaker. I suggest that our hon. friends should reconsider their position from time to time. To conclude, Mr. Speaker, we do not intend to take extraordinary steps just now. Our agricultural industry is sound and the changes already made to existing programs should adequately help Canadian farmers through this critical period. This situation is very likely to be temporary; should it persist, however, we would then consider more drastic measures. We deplore the problems now facing Canadian farmers, but we feel that we should not be the only ones to help them. The provincial governments should do their share too. Agriculture Canada is aware of its responsibilities and we intend to prove it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please! I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him is up.

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Mr. Speaker, I think one of the most frustrating situations is to have to sit and listen to a member such as the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Ostiguy) discuss some of the government's measures in a relatively nonchalant—I will not say an uncaring—way, an unfeeling way for a whole sector of our economy, which is in a great deal of difficulty right now. Indeed, it is in a crisis situation today.

Before the parliamentary secretary leaves I would like to address a specific point which he mentioned. I think the frustration I feel must be shared by the agricultural community across this country. I know that he will agree with me when I say that there is a large segment of the agricultural economy right now which is in big trouble—if he will admit that. One thing which must happen is that there must be a federal-provincial understanding of the problem. He is proud of the record he has. He says that it is the provincial governments which must come to the assistance of the farmers. The provincial government of Ontario came to the assistance of the hog producers just last week with a $10 million subsidy. Do you know what the federal Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) did? He said that the $10 million would be taken off the stabilization program. That is the kind of co-operation we receive from the federal minister at a time when the province is trying to provide some assistance to the industry. I guess that is the kind of response we can expect to receive from the minister if the attitude of members opposite remains the same.

First, I do not feel the government has identified the problem.

Mr. Ostiguy: It is fair for everybody.

Mr. Gurbin: There is a long discussion about that.

At this point in time, with several sectors of the agricultural community in severe difficulty, particularly the hog and beef sectors, an effort on the part of the provincial government to provide direct assistance which, at the same time is offset by the federal government, is not the kind of measure which will help the agricultural community. There must be some understanding and some co-operation. There should not be this passing the buck back and forth, trying to take advantage of the situation.

Yes, there are measures which have been taken by the federal government to assist agriculture in the past. There should have been a great many more measures taken. The key point is we are in a crisis situation today—not three months down the road, but today. It is at this time that we need some direct involvement from the federal government in a way which will assist the people who will end up, if not in bankruptcy, at least out of the farming community. This is happening daily and it will be exaggerated by the time fall arrives.

I would like to talk about the impact that agriculture has on the economy of our country. It may not be clearly understood by members opposite, but they should know that in Ontario alone there are 700,000 people who are directly and indirectly involved in agriculture. In the entire country 25 per cent of our people are involved in the food chain in some way or another. Agriculture is a vital link in the health of our whole economy. It is a vital link which is related to energy. It is linked in such a way that there must be a clear understanding between the ministers who are involved in each of these sectors. To my mind, this is something which is not clearly addressed nor clearly understood. The impact which the Minister of Agriculture has on the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) must be said to be negligible. That is one of our handicaps. There is not the understanding that agriculture is at the base of our economic health and that if it does not survive that our economy will falter. How can agriculture survive in a milieu where we have 19 per cent interest rates, where the agricultural community is looking at rates of 20 per cent and 21 per cent and where inflationary input costs are at 12 per cent? This is true across the whole community. Whether or not one sector is in more difficulty than another, the whole agricultural community must face these kinds of interest rates, these kinds of inflationary pressures.

In my area there is a concentration of beef farmers and hog producers. These people are the ones who are most severely affected right now. As the hon. member for Cambridge (Mr. Speyer) and I were discussing earlier, his area is much the same as mine. The people who are in those commodities face the same kind of distress. They need an answer now, not tomorrow or three months from now, if the number of bankruptcies is to stop increasing. We know that farming bankruptcies nows are up to 91 per cent as compared with last year. I do not know whether the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture understands that or not. He thinks it is all right; he is smiling. But it is not funny for the people who are looking at bankruptcy.

The bankruptcy figures for the agriculture community are really not the whole story. I do not think the government understands that. Those figures are just figures which reflect the people who had to get out because of severe financial pressures. The real story is how many people are getting out because they see their equity eroding, they see themselves in a position where, if the situation continues, they will have nothing left of this grand improvement in the cost of land which the parliamentary secretary was talking about. That improvement in the cost of land was to be the farmer's retirement fund. What the farmer faces now is the realization that the equity which he built up will pay off just his debt and the interest on his debt which he has accrued over the past several years by reason of not being able to realize a return on his product according to the costs he had to bear.

I do not know whether the government is in a position right now, or whether it ever will be, to respond to this situation. I have heard discussions about it and a great deal of talk. We have been addressing questions like this one for the past several weeks in the House of Commons. But I have seen no indication that the government is prepared to move. I have not even seen any indication that it totally understands the nature of the crisis we are facing. One of the first points which must be made is that the government must identify the problem and the clear impact that problem will have on the agricultural community. It is a situation which threatens to change the whole character of agriculture, if not in specific areas then at least in specific commodities.

Another aspect to which the parliamentary secretary pointed very proudly was the idea that agricultural research was doing its job and helping to improve the situation. Every time I hear the government talking in this way I become very concerned, since it is talked about in the context of a global community. Certainly we are in a global community; but we will be in no position to address the opportunities we may have in exports down the road, we will be in no position to develop a meaningful relationship with the third world or other industrialized nations, if we do not look after ourselves at home first. The kind of research which is going on in terms of economics in agriculture right now is really not adequate. The government does not have any figures. It has an agriproducts group division of the Department of Agriculture which is addressing this matter. But they do not know what is happening at the farm level. They do not know how many farmers are on the verge of collapse. They do not know the specific finances of individual farmers across this country. That is too bad, because it seems to me that that should be one of their first concerns, not to look outside the country when we have a situation where—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m.

At 6 p.m. the House took recess.

• (2000)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

[English]

Mr. Gurbin: Mr. Speaker, before the dinner adjournment I was trying to identify one of the major difficulties of the government in dealing with this problem. The simple fact is that there is a lack of understanding of the difficulties involved in the basic farm production unit simply because research, the complete orientation toward marketing and the whole agribusiness are devoted to looking at international events and at things which are happening in other countries. At the same time, we do not have in place any specific way of determining what is happening to an individual farm unit.

I certainly hope that as we start this debate again, the fact that there are so few hon. members present on the opposite side is no indication of the sincerity of the government on this issue. I think that the few who are now present are really part of the problem. We will not resolve the difficulty until they start to face the situation and appreciate that it is truly a crisis, not something which is going to go away as long as they do not react too strongly in one way or another. I want to assure them that this is a real crisis. The situation is very real. At the local level, the basic farm unit, particularly the beef and pork production sectors, is in severe difficulty today.

If we look back a little, we find that in 1941 there where 3.2 million farmers in this country. That is an indication of what is happening in the agricultural sector. There has been a gradual decrease in the number of farmers. Each year in Ontario alone there are 1,000 fewer farmers. This will result in a reduction of the basic farm unit. Even though individual farms are becoming more productive, we are seeing the concentration of the agribusiness in the hands of fewer and fewer, to a point where I think we must decide whether we are going to maintain this very economical and important basic unit which has given Canada what is really a very cheap source of food. Unless attention is paid to that factor, we are all going to suffer significantly in the end.

Another point that I would like to make is that these are people who are probably friends and neighbours of some of the hon. members opposite, people who probably voted for their party as well as ours, and people who may have even voted for the NDP party. However, the fact is that all of these people now find themselves in situations similar to the farmer who spoke to me yesterday for about an hour. He had been in the business for ten to 12 years, had built up his whole herd and put together a farming operation including machinery and significant land holdings. He came to a situation where he had to sell his basic farm unit to a foreign buyer. He must now find some way of recovering his financial losses and regaining a sound economic basis. He was a good manager. This is a farmer who knew the business, who had grown up on a farm and who understood agriculture. Through no fault of his own, he had to accept the prices which were being offered for his commodity over the past two or three years. Eventually he found himself in a position where he had to decrease his total production significantly. Lately this has happened to many people.

A number of things have taken place. One of the most significant groups to offer proposals for solving the problem is the Canadian Cattlemen's Association which has identified the difficulties in the beef sector. It has mentioned high interest rate costs, the inflationary increases in a lot of farm input costs, high energy costs, the importation of live fat cattle from the United States, and the difficulties experienced in 1976 when there was no import law. All of these things are balanced by the fact that farmers still have to accept poor prices for their commodity at the farm gate. They cannot see any way of recovering those losses in the reasonably near future. A number of factors are involved in that but I shall not dwell on them now.

What this amounts to in concrete terms is that in my constituency alone, the area of Bruce-Grey, this year the cost to beef producers will be $20 million. That represents the subsidy that those farmers are giving to the consumers of Canada. It is the cost to that one segment of the agricultural industry, and I think that is going to spell gloom for the whole industry, particularly in Ontario.

The Ontario Federation of Agriculture has made some specific proposals regarding interest rates and in conjunction with these, the Conservative party has made several significant proposals as well. These have been put before the House on other occasions and I am sure the Minister of Agriculture is aware of them. They deal with things like the Farm Credit Corporation and the possibility of increasing its funding by perhaps $150 million or perhaps reconsidering the interest rate it is charging now of 14 per cent instead of the 10 per cent it was years ago.

We are also considering whether the Farm Credit Corporation would be able to provide access to funds from regular banking or lending institutions which could be of more advantage to the farming industry. In addition, we are examining the stabilization program to see if improvements can be made to it so that the return to the farmer could be increased to the point of enabling him to survive. We are also examining relationships between the federal and provincial governments. Some provincial governments have offered to set up review agencies to deal with farmers who are in distress. Perhaps a mechanism could be set up to review specific cases of farmers in trouble and to find ways to assist them. This would be a valuable contribution by both the federal and provincial governments.

At the moment there is an offer from this side of the House, which I believe has the support of the New Democratic Party, regarding the small business development bond. In this House this afternoon we heard the Minister of State for Small Businesses (Mr. Lapointe) speak about a program to let people know what the bond is all about. That is fine, but perhaps it should have been done a year ago. What we need now is an improvement in this bonding mechanism so that it can be used by unincorporated small businesses and farmers for operating capital and inventory. Perhaps it could be extended beyond this year. Those things could be done now and we on this side have offered to have a one-day extended debate. I think the government should accept the offer.

In 1980 the Minister of Agriculture promised that he would do something for the farming community, but that promise has not been kept. I think that the will to do something is there, on the part of some hon. members opposite at least. Unless action is taken now, we know that by the fall of this year the number of farmers in trouble will not just have doubled or tripled but will have increased by five or ten times. There will be an increasing number of farms for sale and the entire agricultural economy will be on the verge of collapse. In the end, not only the farmers but consumers will suffer because of the lack of a constant and secure source of reasonably priced food.

Mr. Garnet M. Bloomfield (London-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak for a few moments tonight on the role of agricultural research in the Canadian economy. The attainment of the present success of the Canadian agrifood sector, developed under many natural disadvantages, has depended upon an expanding base of research and technology. The Canadian agrifood system is, I suggest, basically sound both technically and economically. During the post-war period productivity increased to almost double that of the other non-agricultural sectors. The system provides more than the equivalent of Canadian food requirements, and export sales amounted to about $8.0 billion in 1980 plus $95.0 million worth of food which was made available to the world food program. The system supplies Canadian consumers with adequate, high quality food at a cost of 17.8 per cent of consumers' disposable incomes, which is close to the lowest percentage of any country in the world.

Agriculture Canada, under the leadership of this government, has continued to develop strong mission-oriented, agricultural research and development programs which are making important contributions to crop and livestock improvement, to the efficient utilization of Canada's agricultural resources, and to market development. Such programs are accomplished through close federal-provincial co-operation, particularly in technology transfer, and are committed to the following specific areas of research and development.

Basic research is a prerequisite to achieving advances. Our programs in a number of promising areas, such as nitrogen fixation, genetic engineering, somatic hybridization, and cryopreservation are progressing and have provided some interesting practical results. The opportunities offered by biotechnology and especially its impact on the food processing industry, are currently being investigated.

Because of climatic and soil limitations, the improvement of crop production is particularly critical in Canada and a number of major programs are committed to this effort. Hardier varieties, better adapted to short, cool seasons, higher yielding capacity and of better quality are being produced. Resistance to crop pests is also important. This year alone, 46 new varieties have been licensed for every major crop and area of this country.

Columbus, a new hard red spring wheat variety developed at Winnipeg, will make a major contribution. It is the first wheat variety to possess resistance to sprouting and weathering. These characteristics will make it suitable for export even in bad years when other wheats would be downgraded to a level of food grain, meaning a significant difference in income for the producers.

Gordon, a new soft white winter wheat for Ontario, was licensed in 1980. It represents a yield improvement of close to 7 per cent over Frederick and combines better winter survival and pastry quality. Columbus and Gordon then, are two major achievements in wheat breeding.

There has been progress in the breeding and improvement of other crops also. Eight new corn hybrids were released. Grain corn has become a major crop in Ontario because of research which has produced better adapted hybrids and better cultural practices. Through research, corn, basically a warm-climate crop, has been grown in more and more northern latitudes and is now an important crop for Quebec, Manitoba, some parts of Alberta and the maritime provinces.

The soybean crop is one that could not have been grown in Canada to extent without research. Again, the production of a warm climate crop has been expanded because of better varieties and better cultural practices developed by the research branch of Agriculture Canada over the years. This year, Nattawa, a new variety of soybean in the intermediate maturity group, which matures up to five days earlier and yields about 10 per cent more than a standard variety, has been licensed.

Perhaps the greatest success in Canadian agricultural research is that of rapeseed. Rapeseed is an oilseed crop presently grown on more than two million hectares in Canada. It used to be grown on very limited acreage to produce a lubricating oil. Because of research it is now used to produce an edible oil and a protein supplement feed for livestock. It accounts for 40 per cent of the vegetable oil consumer in Canada.

Originally all the rapeseed varieties contained high levels of toxic materials that prevented their use in human and animal nutrition. Through research, the level of these toxic materials was dramatically lowered and rapeseed became suitable for use in food and feed. A new crop and a new industry have been introduced in Canada. Edible rapeseed oil is now known as canola oil. Canola oil is used domestically and is also exported, thus improving our balance of payments.

The research bureau has been the leader in rapeseed research and has collaborated closely with universities and the industry to make rapeseed a success story. Tobin, a new canola variety, is the latest variety developed by the research bureau of Agriculture Canada. It will be licensed shortly.

In 1980 the potato breeding program at the Fredericton research station was strengthened by the addition of five professional person-years because Agriculture Canada wants Canadian potato producers to take advantage of market opportunities. I am sure the member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Dionne) will be interested in that. Two new potato varieties were released in 1980.

With respect to animal production, research in progress on animal production will provide the basis for additional farm and processor incomes. Animal disease and insect control and improved feed efficiency are examples of practical problems which research has contributed to alleviating.

The foreign cattle breed evaluation program has produced interesting results in the search for faster growing, better adapted and more feed efficient beef cattle. An eight-year study demonstrated that the Hereford can be crossed with the Highland cow exceeded either parent breed in calf performance and cow productivity and proved to be an excellent range cow. Knowing there are 20 million hectares of range land in Canada, this new crossbred cow can make a significant contribution to beef production in Canada.

Land and water resource are the two natural resources on which agriculture depends. Because the food production capability of Canada's vast land mass varies so greatly, multidisciplinary teams of experts collaborate to provide information on how to make the best use of our land and how to improve its productivity. Thanks to the efforts of research branch scientists, we now grow crops on land that was part of the dust bowl of the "dirty thirties".

Water is vital to crop and animal production. In western Canada, research on the irrigation of drylands has led to increased productivity and economics in water consumption as well as to reduced salinity problems. In the east, research on soil drainage problems has permitted earlier planting and expansion of production into areas normally too wet for many crops. Plant and animal wastes are potential water polluters, but continuing research has provided practical solutions to the problem and led to the development of effective systems of waste disposal and utilization.

Energy conservation is a major concern of the research branch. Engineering research in this area covers a wide range from farm building insulation and temperature control, frequency and depth of tillage, irrigation practices and the production of fuel from animal or crop wastes. Other energy-oriented programs and biological research on the trapping of solar energy by plant and on the processes by which some plants convert nitrogen from the air into ammonia to nourish the plant. This research could result in earlier maturing plants and in savings in chemical fertilizer use.

With regard to food processing, its distribution and retailing, we find that challenging areas for research are ingredient technology, enzymology and fermentation, single cell protein, improved efficiency and waste utilization. In the area of food processing, research is directed at improving efficiency and at conserving energy. A new blancher which was scaled up from a pilot prototype developed at Kemptville, an Agriculture Canada research station, has been tested by industry. The potential energy saving is in the order of $100 per ton of processed product, a significant contribution of research to industry. Still in the food processing section, a vacuum essence concentration system designed at Summerland by Agriculture Canada has been sold on the international market. Technology transfer of a rapid continuous process for manufacturing candied fruit has resulted in the installation of a new processing line with annual capacity of 3.4 million kilograms of finished product in British Columbia. Research in the food processing sector is done in co-operation with and for industry, and it pays off.

In the area of international programs, Agriculture Canada continues to increase its contributions to international agricultural research. Being the major Canadian source of agrifood scientific, professional and technical expertise, Agriculture Canada plays an essential supportive role to the Canadian International Development Agency's activities. Canada's involvement is linked to the expectation that, in the long run, it will lead to mutually beneficial commercial relationships. Third world trade from such countries as Algeria, Nigeria, Mexico, Brazil, and others, which are giving top priority to the development of their agrifood sector, represent a medium and long-term opportunity for significant growth in Canadian sales of agricultural food and agricultural technology. Aid can promote this growth directly by the provision of Canadian goods and services which may lead to follow-up orders, and indirectly by making recipients more aware of Canadian agricultural capabilities. The expertise, knowledge and technology that Canadian scientists provide in developing countries has been developed in Canada for the use and benefit of Canadian producers and in support of Canadian industry. This excellence is recognized and used by other nations of the world.

Examples of aid programs staffed by the research bureau include wheat production in Tanzania; cereal breeding in Zambia; wheat breeding in Brazil; and fruit processing in Columbia. The India dryland project, for example, has been considered as an outstanding effort of which all Canadians should be proud.

I bring these examples of international aid programs to the attention of hon. members of this House to prove the excellence of the work of the research branch of Agriculture Canada. The expertise, knowledge and technology that Canadian scientists provide in developing countries has been developed in Canada for the use and benefit of Canadian producers and in support of Canadian industry. This excellence is recognized and used by other nations of the world.

In closing may I say that research has contributed to the development of a strong agrifood industry in Canada. The research bureau is organized to solve current and anticipated agricultural production problems in all regions of Canada. Having qualified professional and technical staff available at short notice proves an immeasurable value in times of emergency, be it caused by a new pest or a drought.

Last year's drought for example did not cause a major disaster, even though it did cause severe problems in some areas. New tillage methods, soil conservation practices, hardier plant varieties, more experience as to which crops to plant under varying soil and climatic conditions contributed to successful farming that would have been impossible in the past. The research branch personnel compiled, and published within a few weeks, information on livestock feeding under drought conditions. Soil moisture conditions on the prairies are monitored throughout the year and advice is given on moisture reserves under stubble and fallow by crop districts as additional information in support of farmers' decisions on farming operations.

Agriculture Canada must continue to play a lead role in research and must ensure that research helps farmers in the long run through difficult times in the future.

Mr. Fred King (Okanagan-Similkameen): Mr. Speaker, on previous occasions I may have brought to the attention of the House that the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) and I have appeared at various farm group banquets, the minister to bring the straight word, as written from Ottawa, and I to provide the comic relief. I think it somewhat ironic that our role should be reversed today.

Mr. Whelan: You have your right to your opinion.

Mr. King: One learns a few things just by being in this House and observing the events of the day. For example, I learned on Friday from the hon. member for Edmonton North (Mr. Paproski) that members do not offer personal greetings to family and friends from the floor of the House. I am particularly sorry because my son Gordon is in the gallery and my father Billy will this month celebrate his ninety-second birthday, a rather noteworthy occasion. It is good clean farm living that has kept him so long.

I also learned in my brief time here that 20 minutes is never as long as one anticipates. It therefore happens that much of importance that members would say is left in speech notes because time runs out. It is my intention to first list some of the positive things which this government could do for agriculture so that this government and this minister, who is so attentive to opinions of members of this House, particularly opposition members, will benefit and the nation will benefit from the advice and the direction which I offer.

Some government actions which are essential to both the short-term and long-term health of the agricultural sector of the Canadian economy, particularly the farmers in the area of Canada I represent, are as follows. Additional substantial financing of the Farm Credit Corporation could be part of a program of relief from the effects of extremely high interest rates. We can provide more adequate funding for agricultural research. We need relief from the proposed excise tax as it applies to the wine industry which directly affects the returns to grape growers.

We need the co-operation of all departments of government in helping to resolve the farm labour problem, particularly as it applies to itinerant and foreign labour opportunities. We need an extension of the small business development bond to unincorporated farmers, as is mentioned in the resolution. In the Okanagan we need additional funding to service the growing number of applications for cold storage construction assistance.

These are but a few of the steps, positive in nature, which this government could undertake specifically on behalf of farmers. Farmers are Canadians first and foremost and as such have a vested interest in every aspect of national policy. They would urge this government to a quick resolution of the dispute with Alberta and a radical change in attitude and policy by this government in its National Energy Program which, as constituted, is so damaging to the Canadian economy and the Canadian spirit of unity.

With world population expected to move to 10.5 billion persons by the mid point in the twenty-first century, agriculturalists world wide will be forced to make significantly greater progress in increasing food production than has ever before been previously demonstrated. In the next 70 years, to the year 2050, Third World nations must produce much more of their own food to satisfy the hunger of this expanding population whose numbers will come mainly from those countries least able to feed present populations.

In this circumstance, farmers in North America will be called upon to triple their present production over the next 40 years. The market will be there. The mouths of millions or billions of new inhabitants of this world will be opened. The challenge will be to put current know-how and future technological advances in food production into effect.

In the generations to come politicians, economists and farmers will be required to employ all of their ingenuity and skills in preventing global famine, in preventing the increased incidence of children with stomachs extended from malnutrition and to minimize the necessity for Mother Theresa, World Vision and other such selfless persons and groups to provide havens for the emaciated, starving poor of Calcultta's ghetto and other equally condemning sores in this world.

The challenge of this next century is that of a compelling necessity to return to basics in a world that has in the last century become preoccupied with more exotic pursuits. Food, clothing, shelter and water will become the imperatives superseding space exploration, armament development and transportation modes development. The imperative will be simply to eat. Competition for food will replace the present world struggle based on the distribution of earth's energy supply. It will represent an exciting opportunity for Canadian agriculture.

We in Canada are fortunate to live on a continent which has prospered and developed through encouraging initiatives and ingenuities of her people. It has been the effort and skill of the individual talented and experienced farm population of Canada, not the state, which has made North America the productive empire that it is.

With less than 3 per cent of the total population of North America active in farming, each farmer today produces enough food to feed 75 persons. By the year 2000, through enhanced technology alone, individual farmers will be producing food for 200 persons. This in itself will not be sufficient. The capacity to increase total production which is available now must further increase dramatically.

In addition, expanded and improved food storage, processing and transportation methods must be developed to avoid the type of wastage presently experienced. Water storage, distribution and conservation must be improved. Research into more efficient use of water in agriculture is an absolute necessity, even in water rich Canada.

This is a primary essential in the Okanagan valley, a fruit producing area with an average rainfall of only ten inches annually. Even in metric measure that is dry. However, we can meet the challenge in Canada. It is simply a matter of improving farm economics and the provision of a rational political climate in which to operate, both of which are jeopardized by the attitude of this government.

The family farm is basic to B.C.'s fruit and grape production. The family farm has proved to be a more efficient producer than either the corporate or the collective farm under any political jurisdiction. One need only compare the entrepreneurial family farm concern concept with its continued increasing productivity to that of the U.S.S.R. Under the collective farm system, communist nations have gone from net exporters to net importers of foodstuffs. Poland's current problems are largely a result of that hard fact. Collectivity stifles productive enterprises and inhibits progress. The role of the state is to encourage, not control productive unions. A stable farm income is the prime goal. The most prominent income problems facing Canadian farmers today are financing the acquisition capital and financing the cost of production, or paying for farm and equipment and then paying for its operation.

The minister is quoted as having stated recently in a speech that debt charges are the second largest farm cost, and the cost of money has gone up 2.5 times faster than any other commodity farmers have to work with. The question is, knowing that, what is the minister doing to help the situation which he describes?

The minister today in his speech pointed with proprietary pride to the buoyant nature of B.C. agriculture. I think that is a dangerous generalization. Without attempting to minimize the federal contribution made to the B.C. farming community in the form of ARDA, cash advances, cold storage construction grants, crop insurance, stabilization, etc., I must note that the chief distinction which marks B.C. agriculture is the B.C. government farm income insurance program. It is this provincial program which has created the optimism and vigour presently being experienced in B.C., and for this neither this minister nor this government can claim credit.

The compounding effect of high inflation and high interest rates is the foremost deterrent to farm efficiency and management at a time when farm production needs to be encouraged and strengthened. A 10 per cent annual inflation rate results in cost increases of more than 2.5 times in ten years. A 15 per cent inflation rate equates to a fourfold increase in cost inputs in that same period. This is the circumstance imposed by this government, and with this reverse incentive how will the farmer possibly be able to meet the demand for greater production?

Officials of the Housing and Urban Development Association of Canada recently called on government to moderate interest rates, reach an oil pricing agreement with Alberta, to reduce government spending, and restore consumer confidence. Similar advice has come from the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, representatives of small business associations and farmer groups.

David Slater, chairman of the Economic Council of Canada, told the Commons finance committee that Governor Bouey is having to go it alone in the fight against inflation because the government has no other anti-inflation policy in place. Mr. Slater said that a combination of policies might allow inflation to be dealt with and at the same time the real performance of the economy to be improved; advice offered to unhearing ears.

This government shows no sense of real restraint in its spending. Waste and neglect are its marks, patronage and self-aggrandization its tools. It is irresponsible government within Canada that is the root cause of inflation and high interest rates. We are captive of U.S. interest rates only because the government opposite chooses short-term political expediency over national well-being. That is why farm bankruptcies have increased by 77 per cent. That is why the younger generation of orchardists in the Okanagan are finding they cannot pursue their chosen vocation, some losing substantial investments. We are witnessing the destruction of hopes, the burying of ambition, the demoralizing effect of financial disasters created by careless and irresponsible action beyond the farmer's control.

Farm and Country headlines today read "Foreclosure rate soars", "Cruel interest rates take bigger toll than ever". Inside it states:

> That is the problem we have now: an horrendous 12 per cent inflation rate, and an even more horrendous interest rate of 19 per cent. You see, gentle reader, no one has confidence in our ability to handle money.

Later it states:

The only possible answer is tough federal action to bring about a balanced budget. Not this year, not next—because the sudden dislocation would cause too much hardship—but over the next three to five years.

That is what the Farm and Country says.

In the riding I represent, the Keremeos Co-op Growers Association and Similkameen United Growers Association are closing down their fruit packing facilities. At the present cost of borrowing, the move to keep abreast of modern technological advances in fruit handling is beyond the growers' financial capacity. As a result, the town of Keremeos with a population of only some 2,000 people is about to lose its major payroll, an annual loss to the business community of more than $1.5 million. This is the impact on only one community, a community which can ill afford such a knock.

We on this side of the House have been saying repeatedly that the need is to set proper and productive priorities in spending, not increase spending as the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) so frequently states. Why in the name of nationalism spend $1.5 billion, sending it out of the country to purchase a string of service stations which add not one barrel of additional production to Canada's oil capacity? It would be much better for Canada to have put that $1.5 billion, raised from long-suffering Canadians, into aspects of research and development, into cold storage assistance, into helping the Naramata irrigation district and others in equal distress to finance the upgrading of their water works. By all means, why not use the $1.5 billion to improve the role of the Farm Credit Corporation in helping Canadian farmers to meet the challenges in food production which Canada and this world face now and in the future?

The May 30 issue of The Financial Post front paged the story of a $2 million ultramodern hog farm within 20 miles of Ottawa which will be bankrupt by this weekend. The article elaborates:

The federal government has been taking it on the chin over the outcry at the rising tide of farm bankruptcies—

It goes on to state:

But there are indications from federal officials that Whelan put up a tough fight in cabinet for some sort of interest rate relief. He lost—

That is clout for you. It goes on to state:

But there's ample pressure on MacEachen to give ground.

Later it states:

The normally diplomatic and staid Canadian Federation of Agriculture has come out with a tough statement asking the government to use the federal Farm Credit Corp. to solve the problem.

It then states:

The FCC argues that the money should not detract from MacEachen's economic gradualism because it ought to be seen as an investment. The farmers would be paying it back. Treating it as expenditure in the federal budget is incorrect, says CFA Executive Director David Kirk.

It goes on to state:

—Ontario farmers are asking the Crown corporation to take over short-term and medium-term debt held by the banks and count it as long-term.

—FCC dislikes doing this, but has always had a policy allowing it in extreme cases. And there's no question that some farmers need that help now—

There is a positive suggestion for the minister. Spare some farmer the trauma of bankruptcy by long-term refinancing of present short-term debt through the Farm Credit Corporation.

The Canadian Federation of Agriculture has asked that additional funding be put into the Farm Credit Corporation to broaden the funding base immediately, and in light of the fact that farm bankruptcies have increased dramatically, time is of the essence. Additional funding is imperative.

On another matter, I would ask through you, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Agriculture get together with the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) to come to grips with the problem of temporary worker permits for farm workers visiting from other countries. The British Columbia Fruit Growers' Association and the Canadian Horticultural Council requested such, and while the minister expressed sympathy while attending the BCFGA convention in Kelowna last January, the Minister of Employment and Immigration has said no.

I have many more things that I would like to say but I will leave the matter of the excise tax until the debate on that subject later in the week.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Dionne (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, we are debating a motion censuring the government for failing to stop the increase in interest rates which have now become unacceptable to farmers. I agree that high interest rates may temporarily put farmers in a financial strait-jacket, but I suggest that we should have a look at what the minister and the Department of Agriculture are doing for Canadian farmers to protect them, and perhaps also at the level of productivity recorded in recent years by the farming community in Canada. Mr. Speaker, I am a front line advocate of the interests of our agricultural producers. This is why at the sittings of the agriculture committee I had asked how our taxation system applied to agricultural producers as compared with Canadian industrialists. At that time I had even suggested that the more dynamic producers in Canada be given an option to benefit from a farm loans accelerated repayment plan. Here is an example: I had then proposed that a farmer with a $200,000 loan repayable at the annual rate of $10,000 over a 20-year period, plus interests, be allowed to pay back $1,000, $2,000 or up to $5,000 a year without considering that additional repayment as an income so as to prompt the farmer into speeding up his payments to the Farm Credit Corporation, in turn making it possible for the FCC to have the funds required to make accelerated repayment loans to other agricultural producers. There is a shortage right now. The Farm Credit Corporation is already strapped for funds and we have hardly gone through six months of operations this year.

Mr. Speaker, that is perhaps a very significant factor. We might examine even further what would be the consequences of such a proposal. True, the interest rate went up 2 per cent lately. I am convinced that this additional 2 per cent will not push Canadian farmers into bankruptcy since the market value of a farm has already jumped by 18 per cent this year. Hon. members will agree with me that the agricultural producer's goodwill is growing ever higher.

I think we should all consider together the tools the Canadian government could provide the farmer with in order to improve his efficiency in these difficult but hopefully temporary times we are now going through in this country. I, for one, Mr. Speaker, wish the farmer was urged to modernize his operation and even use computers which would allow him, through a terminal, to keep constantly in touch with his accountant. Let me explain. The data would be transmitted to an accounting and management centre where complex accounting, feasibility and other data would be collected. On a technical level, crop rotation, work schedules, and irrigation, fertilization, selection and even feeding tables could be established. Even environmental or weather fluctuations could be programmed. A great deal of information which is very time-consuming to record could be regularly updated. Also, since our greatest weakness in agriculture has always been marketing, the information expert could keep the farmer daily informed of market fluctuations. The computer could even be used to monitor various things, for instance, to program animal feed or fertilization. This could allow a stricter control of the major and the minor components. Such expert programming could even result in a decrease in acreage, resulting in energy savings.

Mr. Speaker, I have this past year spent many hours sitting on the Committee on Agriculture. Recently, when we were considering the goverment's agricultural and food policies, I realized that several members, mostly from the opposition, did not understand how modern agriculture should develop in this country. While we were reviewing financial papers, we realized that many members asked serious questions, for instance, if the money spent on the agri-food industry actually benefited the farmers. The modern farmer must have up-to-date tools at his disposal. And I believe that the best tools are marketing and the development of new varieties, since marketing is a weakness in several sectors of agriculture in Canada. I have noticed this weakness in several productions, for instance western beef, which is world famous and which is certainly not marketed properly in eastern Canada. I believe that no money was ever spent to market or promote this excellent Canadian product and praise its nutritional value, which could increase sales on the Canadian market.

Take, for example, the dairy policy in Ontario and Quebec. I remember that a few years ago we had a surplus of millions of pounds of powdered milk and millions of pounds of butter, which meant millions in storage costs. Because of a firm policy and the establishment of quotas in 1975, which nearly caused a small revolution among Canadian producers, some restraint was put on dairy production. The producers decided jointly with the provincial and Canadian governments to launch a national publicity campaign to promote the merits and the sales of dairy products. Believe it or not, sales of dairy products in Canada have increased by 4 per cent this year. This is what I call a modern tool. Experts are hired to promote Canadian products in the country.

Another example is Canadian pork, which has the reputation of being the best in the world on international markets. The proof of this is that we export for about $200 million of pork to the United States every year. I am proud, Mr. Speaker, to underline these positive achievements of our Canadian producers. A while ago, I was listening to the hon. member for Okanagan-Similkameen (Mr. King), who blamed the government for its bad policies and for causing concern among farmers. I have doubts about this. If we had implemented the opposition's energy policy and paid world prices for our oil, I am convinced that it would have been much more harmful than the 2 per cent interest we are now paying, because farm loans amount to approximately $300,000 on the average in Canada, and if I am not mistaken, at a rate of 2 per cent, this means $6,000 in interest, and energy costs on a specialized farm would be much more than $6,000 at current world prices.

Mr. Speaker, I would not want some people to spread fear among our farm producers. For the informaiton of my colleague opposite, I also note that when I was in the opposition, the government removed the subsidies for building vegetable storage facilities. Canadian producers should thank the Minister of Agriculture for having reinstated these subsidies in order to help them take a greater share of the market instead of importing farm products as we did for so many years in Canada.

I should also like to mention all that is being done in agriculture with regard to quality, inspection, processing, storage, and as I have already said, research on pesticides. I had the opportunity of looking closely at the general research division whose general terms of reference were as follows:

To work toward the establishment of efficient, stable and profitable agriculture in Canada.

I am sure all hon. members in this House agree on the basic principles of the general research division.

To ensure that the essential natural resources of agriculture are wisely explored conserved, used and managed.

I also feel, Mr. Speaker, that all hon. members should make it their duty to study carefully what the general research division is doing for our Canadian agriculture. I am sure that many doubts would thus be dispelled from their minds.

● (2100)

Now Mr. Speaker, with your permission I should like to deal with stabilization programs. We saw the government act to stabilize potato prices during two consecutive years, because producers were selling their potatoes below the average cost. We recently saw the Canadian government stabilize pork prices to the tune of some $112 million. Of course, Mr. Speaker, the government cannot do everything alone, and perhaps the Canadian pork industry may not have such influence on the global price of pork as some may believe. But although the Agricultural Stabilization Act does not meet the expectations of Canadian producers 100 per cent, I feel the program is very generous, and having talked with a number of pork producers in Quebec, I must indicate they all agreed that such an offer from the Canadian government was very acceptable and very welcome.

There is something of interest to me which we might discuss together, namely the valuation of quotas. Clearly it will be recognized that the matter of quotas is very important to farmers, and there is an increasing need for farm product quotas to stabilize production. There is, however, a question I would put to every member in this House. It is whether we are going to give some value to that quota, because young people wanting to become farmers are already complaining about the excessive price of farms. It will be recognized that if quotas are valued at some $100,000, $150,000 or $200,000, it is almost impossible for any farmer to return to farming, or for young people to get into farming. I therefore feel that this matter should be very closely examined by everyone who shares an interest in Canadian farming. And in any discussion of the dairy policy, a good look should be taken at what Canfarm has accomplished, because Canfarm has been a very modern tool which made it possible for producers to monitor their milk production very closely through a computer program. We know that tremendous progress was accomplished in that area, and all Canadian producers in that industry should be commended for having been world pioneers.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to conclude without referring to prospects of food prices. In that regard, we should give credit to our Canadian farmers for their efficiency. Most Canadians are unaware that on average, in spite of inflation, today they are not spending a larger percentage of their income to buy food than ten years ago. Indeed, their personal income has increased more quickly than food prices during the last decade. In addition, Canadians spend a lesser percentage of their disposable income for food than people in any other country in the world, except the United States which, it must be stated, is the only country in the world where food is produced throughout the year. As indicated in the following table, in 1979 Canadians have devoted an average of 13 per cent of their disposable income, necessarily after taxes, to purchase food to be consumed at home and 4.3 per cent to meals taken outside for a total of 17.3 per cent against 17.7 per cent in 1971. However, it must be recognized that our low-wage earners or individuals on fixed pensions pay a higher percentage. American consumers alone spend a lesser part of their disposable income on food, that is about 16.1 per cent. In 1979, according to the Department of Agriculture of the United States, taking into account our more limited market and our shorter farming season, Canadian farmers, producers and food distributors had an outstanding performance. According to two international studies, food prices in Canada are lower than in most other countries. A study carried out in April, 1980, by the United States Department of Agriculture indicated that, expressed in Canadian dollars, a food basket with 18 items cost $50.85 in Ottawa, $45.32 in Washington, $66.89 in London and $82.17 in Paris. A study by the Bank of Switzerland confirmed the Canadian consumers' favourable position and indicated that a basket with over 39 items cost $134 in Montreal, $149 in Toronto, $191 in Brussels, and $223 in Geneva. Mr. Speaker, I am satisfied Canadian producers will maintain their effectiveness, provided they keep on getting from our Department of Agriculture the tools they need so badly. Although I may recognize that the current high interest rates may hurt our farmers temporarily—a 2 per cent increase, for instance—I am sure Canadian producers will fight back and demonstrate their effectiveness as usual.

[English]

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I wish to commend the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave) for putting forward this motion which we are debating today. I believe agriculture is one of the topics we do not discuss enough in this House. We do not give a high enough priority to it. I also believe that agriculture is the No. 1 industry in this country and the most important industry in the world. It is one that is undergoing very rapid change in technological devices, as the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Dionne) has just finished saying. It is one which will be very important in the years ahead as the world population continues to explode. What we need at this time, Mr. Speaker, is some long-term thinking about where we are going as a nation, where we are going as a world and what we will do for our farmers to ensure we feed the world's people. I believe that some of today's problems were caused by the shortsightedness of the people who guided our policies in yesteryear.

When I hear the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) get up and speak, as he did today, I am a little bit disappointed because he uses the line that everything in this country is the greatest, that we have the greatest policies in agriculture, that we have the greatest this and the greatest that, and the greatest minister of agriculture. To listen to the minister you would think the panacea is here, that he has reached Utopia and that the milennium is here. I find that thinking a little bit dangerous, because when someone thinks that everything is being done, then that person ceases to be useful in the function he is supposed to perform. It reminds me a little of Mohammed Ali, the old fighter who used to say, "I am the greatest." That worked for about 15 years when, suddenly, he stepped into the ring and met Larry Holmes, and he was out on the eleventh round. Maybe it is about time the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) reassessed the Minister of Agriculture and placed in that position someone who would think innovatively, someone who could think of some alternatives with regard to where we are going.

It is all right to boast a little. We have a lot to be proud of in this country. I disagree with the minister when he never ceases to boast, and when he never seems to come up with any new ideas We have a great many productive farmers in Canada, farmers who have done a great deal for our nation over the years, farmers who have increased their productivity faster than any other sector in the country, whether it be the workers of Canada, the manufacturing sector, or what have you. They have provided a base. I believe that we are now at an important crossroads. We must ask ourselves where we are going. We must ask ourselves where the farm community is headed. I believe the farmer needs some protection in terms of the price he receives for the commodity he sells. We need to improve our stabilization plans so that a farmer knows in the spring what he will receive for his product when he reaps it at harvest time. We need more marketing boards. Earlier today the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo) said that the farmer is the only person left in our society who is supposed to live by the so-called free enterprise system—and it is not working. It is not free. It is the small farmer who suffers. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the farmer needs similar protection to the worker through unions or through professional associations such as doctors and lawyers have, or through such organizations as the Manufacturers' Association. They need similar protection to the groups I have mentioned by banding together to form marketing boards which are producer-controlled. In this way they will receive for their product a fair value for the work they put into it and for the capital they invest in it.

In this country we have four good examples of national marketing boards. They are the chicken, the turkey, the milk and egg marketing boards. Even though these marketing boards are not perfect, and I have many criticisms of them, such as the price of quota—

My friend the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Dionne) has already indicated that the price of quotas in Canada is already too high for ordinary people, and I fully agreed with him when he said that we need a review of our quota policy in Canada.

[English]

Despite that we can learn a great deal from these national marketing boards. We can extend them to have them producer-controlled for all products in Canada. I believe that should come about when the producers want it, through their own democratic elections in their own organizations.

In terms of prices, the government must back up the Crow rate. It must preserve the Crow rate in this country which the farmers fought for over so many years. This rate has benefited the Canadian wheat farmer for decades.

I turn now to the question of expenses. Earlier today the hon. member for Prince Albert mentioned many of the problems farmers have when it comes to high interest rates, the cost of farm machinery and the cost of land. I have before me a couple of letters I received from two farmers, and I think they tell the story. One is from a dairy farmer in Ontario who says that in 1980 the interest on his loan was $26,000. In 1981, on that same loan, the farmer will pay some $58,000 in interest. The second letter is from a farmer in central Saskatchewan. Last year he had a loan on which he paid interest at 10 per cent, or $16,000. This year on the same loan the interest rate has doubled, it is 20 per cent. He will be paying some $32,000 in interest to the financial institutions of this country. This same farmer says that to meet his interest alone on 80 acres of land—half of a quarter section which he has in seed this year—the price of wheat would have to fetch $8 a bushel to finance the interest on a $60,000 loan. The price of a bushel of wheat now is about $7. Aside from the interest, he has fuel costs, living expenses, repairs, clothing and food for his family and everything else a farmer needs to live.

When I see statistics of this kind, Mr. Speaker, I wonder why the government is not more humane, why it does not place some controls on the banks to ensure that in this country we have a two-interest rates policy, a lower rate for the necessities of life, such as housing and farming, and a higher rate for unproductive borrowing for non-essentials such as television sets and the like. I have no idea why the Minister of Agriculture, who pretends to speak for the farmers, is not able to persuade the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and the Prime Minister to introduce such a policy, to force the banks to roll back interest rates for the necessities of life in our country. Instead, under the leadership of the Minister of Agriculture, farmers see less and less money being lent to them by the Farm Credit Corporation. In 1980-81, some $516 million was available to farmers. In this year, 1981-82, the sum is down to $500 million. In 1979-80, $628 million was available to farmers. So instead of making more money available to farmers at lower interest rates and putting it at the disposal of people who are productive, who produce goods which will go into the collective value of goods and services for all the people of Canada, we see the government doing the reverse of what I call sane and putting aside less money, despite the fact that farmers are in a severe financial pinch.

The other costs about which I think we must do something very shortly are the costs of land, the price of land and the size of farms. How large are we going to allow farms to become before we finally say, "Stop it. It is big enough"? It is big enough because large farms are not necessarily more productive. It is big enough because large farms mean fewer farmers and the destruction of a rural and family farm way of life. Bigger farms mean that there will be fewer and fewer villages and towns in the rural parts of this country. The time is going to come when we will have to make some pretty tough decisions in this country about the size of farms. It is about time that this House and the farmers of Canada started to put some thought toward an answer to that very difficult question.

The other matter is the price of land. A farmer the other day bought a quarter of a section of land near Regina for $60,000. A bit farther away, another farmer purchased a half section of land for $130,000. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, when is it going to stop? When is the wild and mad speculation in land going to stop, or are we going to have a crash in land prices in the next year or two like the one we had in 1929, like the crash in the stock exchange?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): How would you stop a Canadian from buying national land?

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, the House leader of the Conservative party asked a very good question. How will one stop a Canadian from buying land and driving up the price of land? I do not pretend to know the answers to that kind of question, but I think that it is a question which we will have to address as a Parliament because the price of land, today, in my part of the world, is going out of the reach of the ordinary person, the ordinary guy. I understand it is happening in central Canada as well. We will have to come up with a solution to the high price of land. I would like to see the Minister of Agriculture decide to introduce some policies and some discussions about the high price of land and do something about it.

Perhaps, as the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett) has just mentioned, we should introduce more programs in other provinces and nationally, as we have in Saskatchewan where we have a land bank program. Maybe that is part of the answer. Perhaps we should have a prices review board which looks at whether prices are being inflated artificially.

Perhaps we should change our laws regarding speculation, because one of the problems we are having today is that some foreigners are coming in and they do not really care what the price of land is. They have the money to pay for it and the interest rates do not really matter that much. They can write it off. Many Canadians who are not genuine farmers have that attitude. I am referring to people who are wealthy, have a few bucks and can buy a half section of land for $130,000 or $150,000. They could write it off as a tax expense, and this drives up the price of land to the ordinary farmer who needs it and cannot afford it.

Anyway, I think these are some of the questions we are going to have to address. If we do not do it soon, we will end up in this country with larger and larger farms, fewer and fewer rural communities and perhaps corporate farms such as they have in the state of Colorado where the whole rural way of life is destroyed. They are moving into another era where corporations are doing the farming, where farm workers are working the land, and another set of problems comes along with that. I think these are some of the problems that are facing the farmer.

In my remaining five or six minutes, I want to stress that it is important that we solve some of these problems because I think agriculture is very important to all of Canada. It is very important to the consumers of this nation. We have to be more self-sufficient in agriculture if we are going to stop some of the ups and downs in the pricing that we have today. Most Canadians do not realize what would happen if we took away grain and oil seeds in this country. In 1980, we were a net importer of food to the tune of around $2 billion. Many of those foods we are importing, such as beef and many others.

We could easily be self-sufficient if we had government policies which would help the farmers plan their production. Policies could be co-ordinated with provincial governments toward a goal of self-sufficiency in food production in Canada at as local a level as possible so that when ordinary people buy food as consumers they could purchase fresh food near a farm, food which had not been transported great distances and would not have diminished nutritive value which results from being taken off the farm or out of a garden for a long period of time.

I also think, from the consumer's point of view, that much more effort must be put into a nutritious food policy for Canada. We have had many changes in our food system over the last 30 years since the Second World War. We have more and more additives and chemicals in foods; hundreds of them today. We have artificial and manufactured foods. There is more and more evidence that what we are doing to our food system is affecting our health. It may be the cause of some of our modern cancers and different types of heart disease that we have in this country and around the world which we cannot cure. I believe the government must once again take the initiative and do some imaginative thinking about a nutritious food policy for Canada. To repeat what some farmers have suggested, perhaps there could be a labelling program for organic produce and subsidizing or aiding farmers who want to grow foods organically. We should do more research. As my friend, the hon. member for Chicoutimi said, we should do research into the effect of chemicals on our food systems and see whether we can produce more efficiently foods which are more healthy without the use of a lot of chemicals which are very hazardous, not only to human life, but to plant life and also to the life of the soil which deteriorates over a period of time.

These are some of the problems that we have as Canadians. We are going to have to solve them very, very shortly before the possibility of a solution evades us. I do not say that lightly. There has been a recent report by a doctor in Saskatchewan, a soil scientist—I believe his name is Dr. Reny—who said that in our own province, through the lack of proper summerfallow, the lack of irrigation in places, the lack of proper safeguards of rotating crops, tree lines and so on, and the use of chemicals and the like, the quality of our soil has deteriorated by about 50 per cent in, I believe, the last 30, 40 or 50 years.

If we do not start looking at some of these problems and if we do not start producing for tomorrow and tomorrow's generation instead of always producing for today and looking at today's dollar, then the time will come when we will not be capable of being self-sufficient in many parts of our country. If we do not start solving the problems of acid rain and understanding what it has already done to some of the crop line in southwestern Ontario and what it may do with the aid of the tar sands plants in the prairies and the wheat fields of the prairies, then, indeed, there will be a sad chapter for the future of the human race.

Those problems affect Canada and they will also affect the world. In terms of the world, I have always believed that we are a global family, that we are our brother's keeper, that we must do for others what we want for ourselves, and we must provide for people in Africa, Asia, China and all around the world the kinds of policies that we want for ourselves in this country.

In my opinion we have an obligation to do two things. We have an obligation to help other countries to become self-sufficient in the production of food. I believe we can do that because in this country we develop a lot of agricultural and food technology which is among the most advanced in the world. I think we have an obligation to use it to help other countries feed themselves and to put bread on the tables of hungry families. I do not think there is a country in the world, with perhaps three or four exceptions, that with proper irrigation and planning, and a bit of assistance from such countries as ours, cannot feed themselves.

We must also participate more in food aid programs where food aid is needed. However, we must never forget that we should not constantly just hand out food aid without trying to help people to help themselves. It is very important that we teach people to be self-sufficient.

As my friend, the hon. member for Saskatoon East (Mr. Ogle) says, we must all get away from importing luxury goods from Third World countries which we do not need and which they produce on the best land that they have. They are taking the most productive land in Guatemala, or other places in the world, and sowing crops like bananas and tobacco on it and exporting to us. Meanwhile, their own people go hungry because they are producing their food or whatever they can on secondary land. Situations like that must change, and our country and our government can take a leadership role toward that end.

A friend of mine has said that to feed the world, to provide adequate water to the world, to educate the world's people and to provide them with health services, we would need an additional $17 billion per year. That is a lot of money, Mr. Speaker—about as much as the world spends on arms every two weeks. It is spent on nuclear warheads, fighter planes, bombs, tanks, shells, guns and ammunition. It is enough to destroy the world many times over, whether it is done by the Russians, the Americans or any other country in the world. The madness goes on, the attempt of one to better the other. The madness might come to an end if countries like Canada would take the initiative as a respected middle power and say to the world that we must spend this money, the know-how and the technology we have to feed the world's people, to house and educate them and to provide adequate medical care for them.

I say to the minister, in conclusion, that we can start tonight. We are a great country. We have done great things and we are only beginning. If we realize that, we can do exciting things for our farmers, for our people and for the people of the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jim Schroder (Guelph): Mr. Speaker, I have great pleasure in speaking this evening in this debate. My experience in agriculture has not been limited to that of practising my profession. In any case, I am proud to be one who has been of some service to the agriculture industry in this country.

The farmer needs help but he needs different kinds of help. For example, he is probably the most misunderstood person in our community. He produces a perishable product and he produces a biological product. Many businessmen are upset if they are stuck with inventory and have no way of getting rid of it, but at least they can pack it away until the next season. If fall clothes are not sold this year, they can be put away until next fall. The farmer cannot do that with his produce. He is stuck with it. Sometimes he does not have enough and sometimes has too much, and so it is very difficult to cope. He has to be a small businessman, a big businessman and an agri-businessman.

Some suggestions have been made today relative to our minister. I should like to say that his has probably the most difficult ministry in government. He has a great urban group to contend with that does not really understand very much about the difficulties of agriculture. He has to talk for the farmer and he has to act for the farmer. I should like to go on record as saying that in my experience I think our minister does a good talking job and a good acting job. He certainly does his very best to convince members of the government and the people of Canada that the farmer is somebody who really is somebody.

Some reference has been made today to the fact that we should have a fourth veterinary college in Canada, situated in the maritimes. A report was commissioned from the former dean of the Ontario Veterinary College, Dennis Howell. I should like to read from his report as follows:

> Setting aside the contribution which a fourth school would make to the manpower needs of Canada, it must be remembered that, currently, an area of Canada where animal industry, both aquatic and terrestrial, dominates the economy is devoid of an animal health educational resource. In almost every brief submitted the opinion was expressed that a veterinary school located in one of the Atlantic provinces would add a much needed dimension to the livestock industry of the region by virtue of its scholarly activity, its research program and its inevitable role in professional refreshment. A second and no less significant point is: Can the young people of the Atlantic region continue to be denied, subtantially, the opportunity to fulfil their career objectives?

It follows, of course, that you cannot give this type of service to agriculture, with both the teaching facility and research facility, without the necessary faculty. There is considerable doubt about whether we should be robbing the other veterinary colleges in Canada in order to supply the necessary manpower to a fourth school. I think the following comment in the report is relative:

> In general, veterinary medicine lacks opportunities comparable to those enjoyed by the medical schools of Canada under the programs of the Medical Research Council.

The exception to this is a fellowship program under the Medical Research Council which has been particularly useful for research in veterinary medicine. The report continues:

> What is needed is a program, possibly administered by Agriculture Canada through the medium of the Agricultural Research Council, designed to train young veterinarians at various levels for future academic careers. Such a program should include summer studentships for undergraduates, scholarships for graduate studies, and fellowships for graduate studies, and fellowships for study in a post-doctoral sense. The stipends need to be attractive and should be at the same rates provided by the Medical Research Council for its comparable programs.

This government has shown a fair amount of leadership in trying to establish a fourth veterinary college. I believe that we will see it in the future and that it will provide the necessary service to make sure that our animal industry in particular is provided with the kind of diagnostic service and care which will make the economical production of livestock possible.

I am sure that my colleagues from the west can recall the days when we tried to establish a third veterinary college in Canada. It was finally established ten years ago and was called the Western Veterinary College. We had the same doubts then about whether it was feasible to establish another faculty of veterinary medicine to serve the agricultural industry in Canada. We had all the same questions about where we would get the faculty, whether there would be enough jobs for the graduates, and whether it was feasible to support it. Of course, we met the same kind of arguments and in many cases the conclusions were that we would be foolish to attempt to establish this very expensive school for training veterinarians for the future.

I am pleased to say that with the co-operation of the western provinces and the federal government, which supplied 50 per cent of the necessary funds, the third veterinary school was established in Saskatoon. Within a very short time it became one of the finest veterinary colleges in Canada. It has sent graduates all over the world and I am proud to say that it has proven to be a good investment in animal health.

Recently, I travelled with the North-South task force in various Asian countries. I was very pleased to see the number of graduates in agricultural and veterinary science that there are in the Third World as the result of their training in Canada. As far as agriculture is concerned, I like to think that our profession has served well and valiantly through the years. I hope that the fourth veterinary college will be established. Some kind of fellowship program could be set up to help provide the necessary faculty so that our agricultural industry in Canada will be the leader because of the kind of support it receives.

Probably many of you do not know that we in Canada have a reputation around the world for having healthy livestock, which means that markets are open to us because we have been able to keep out those diseases which ravage livestock in many other countries. We do this by maintaining an animal population free of disease. We have inspection services which are able to spot immediately when a disease has been brought into the country. We get rid of this disease by eliminating it. Therefore, we are free of diseases such as foot and mouth and hog cholera. Obviously one disease affects hogs and the other affects livestock. These two diseases are the scourge of many countries in the world. Canadian livestock is welcome almost everywhere in the world because of our high health standards. I do not want to take all the credit for the veterinarians but this standard is maintained because of the very fine management provided by farmers not only through their training in agriculture but through the usual Canadian ability to do things and to do them properly. However, this standard could not be maintained without the kind of veterinarian support they receive.

I think we can be proud of our inspection service. We can be proud of the fact that all our animals, because of their good health, are acceptable in almost every country in the world.

I am sure hon. members know that to be a veterinarian requires a very long training program. But looking at the total agricultural picture, it is a case of everyone working together to make sure that our animal industry is the finest that is possible. To my hon. friend who spoke before me I want to say that we have the finest agricultural industry in the world. With development of confidence, with service programs, particularly relating to animal health, which I am proud to say the present government supports and in which the minister is showing great leadership by promoting these activities in Canada, we will go on with a very fine agricultural industry. In spite of our problems with credit, in spite of the fact that we are producing perishable goods, in spite of the fact that we have a biological product, in spite of the fact that some farmers want help and some do not, in spite of the fact that we do not have unanimity as to what programs there should be to help farmers, there is no question that our government is convinced that farmers are very important people in Canada. The agricultural industry is the basis of our tremendous growth. Canada is the great country it is today because we have a healthy, vibrant and strong agricultural industry.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for Guelph (Mr. Schroder) for sharing part of his time with me so that I could close the debate.

The first part of my remarks are what I intend to say at the end of my speech, namely that today's debate, and I have listened to all of it, has been rather depressing for one like myself. I know that one of the healthiest industries in Canada is the agricultural industry. I know that the opportunity for agriculture has never been greater than it is now. I know that the world wants to be fed and insists on being fed. I know that farmers not only produce the food for our table but also will soon be producing the energy to keep us warm at night. The future for agriculture is unbelievable. Whether we worry about big farms or small farms, the fact is we are moving toward intensive and more efficient agriculture because there is a need for it. If we could get these people in Ontario, Quebec and the Atlantic provinces to realize that they have a job to do and could make some money, we would soon get this agricultural industry going even better than it is today.

Unfortunately, at times snags are put in our way. Governments have done much for the agricultural industry in this country. I think the U.S. government has done very well for its farmers too. We have done a good job for agriculture, but the job is never finished. Right at the present we have a dark cloud hanging over our heads. Some nitwits in the central banks of the world, backed up by the nitwits in the departments of finance, are determined to prove that although the book learning they acquired 40 years ago is not working out, they will show it to be correct. They think if they get the interest rates high enough, all the things they studied will come true. But quantitative evidence shows just the opposite. I will not make a speech about that tonight because I want to talk about the particular subject before us.

This subject tonight really deals with farm credit. Sure the small business development bond will be a big help. I hope the government will broaden it out to cover wider sources than just the incorporated farmers. My main topic tonight is the Farm Credit Corporation. We have had a long history of credit on the farms in Canada. I will not repeat what I said before as to what happened in 1919 in that great debacle or what happened in the 1930s and what was done by all governments in an effort to solve those crises because that is past history.

If we are going to meet the challenge today of feeding the world and keeping the world warm through the production of energy from renewable resources, we have to use supplies of credit. We are based on a credit system. If we are to have this silliness of a group of academic dropouts who man our departments of finance and who man our central banks around the world telling politicians what they have to do when they know it is wrong, that it has always been wrong and it still is wrong, then we have to depend on the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) to speak up on this subject in cabinet.

Mr. Jarvis: Heaven help us.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): I know that it has been said that he has enough clout. Believe me, if you ever want to have clout in the cabinet, just offer to resign and tell the people why you are resigning. All of a sudden 25 or 30 other guys in cabinet say "no, don't do that". But all you have to do is to put your resignation on the table. There is not a prime minister born now or in the future who would ever turn down a minister of agriculture, if you want to unite the people of Canada around an issue, that issue is interest rates.

The interest rate issue goes back thousands of years. In Canada it has taken our Parliament by the throat on several occasions. If you want to unite farmers from Newfoundland to Quebec right through to British Columbia, just fool around with this nonsense on interest rates. You can bring every farmer together. They could clean out 70 different members of Parliament if they wanted to. I simply ask the Minister of Agriculture to pay attention to some of the positive and helpful ideas which have emanated from this side of the House over the last two weeks.

Hon. members heard today from the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave). He put forward his concept of an individual trust system whereby the farmer in his surplus years puts his cash into a trust account. No subsidy from the government is required. He just wants to have that money available when the income is poor. It would not cost the government anything. The hon. member went on this afternoon to suggest putting this money directly into the hands of the Farm Credit Corporation, who act as a trustee, instead of putting it into a bank or a credit union. The farmers would be glad to put money into a farm credit trust fund at 6 per cent because they will not be taxed on it. The Farm Credit Corporation could lend that money out at 8 per cent and get the young farmers up and going. Get rid of this high interest rate of 20 per cent a year and above. This is not a laughing matter that will go away next week by dropping the interest rate a point or two. Anything above 6 or 8 per cent on the productive side of our economy is lunacy. The quickest way to get it down without a subsidy by the government is to lend the money at 8 per cent. Ask the farmers to put their money into a trust account under the hands of the Farm Credit Corporation and get 6 per cent. As long as the farmer is free of tax, he will accept that 6 per cent. Not only the beef farmer but the grain farmer will do that. He will not want any subsidy when he is saving tax. He knows that money will be available when his income is low and he can take it back as income.

If that idea of loans is put before cabinet with all the enthusiasm a minister of agriculture can mount, he will have 350,000 farmers from all across the country behind him. The minute he does that, just watch the banks and credit unions get their interest rates down for every other class of people.

This is not a question of grabbing money out of the treasury. The treasury does not have any. They are borrowing like mad to pay the high price of oil. This is a positive proposal by an opposition member who has made this type of proposal before. It was originally introduced in this House some years ago by the then hon. member for Swift Current. He is not here tonight. It has been improved on and made more powerful in the way the hon. member for Medicine Hat repeated it. According to this concept, if you are going to stablize the income of any farmer, you let him have an account he can put his money into when he has a surplus. He can earn money when it is needed. He only pays the tax on it when he draws it as income.

This is an individual accounting system which does not require 10,000 civil servants to examine every item. It is a matter between him and a trustee. When the farmer puts the money into that account, he entrusts the trustee to use it for a proper purpose, to earn money and to be useful to his country. At the same time, when he wants it, it is available.

The suggestion made this afternoon that the Farm Credit Corporation handle it makes eminent good sense. The farmer could be told to put money into the trust account where he would receive 6 per cent. It could then be loaned to other farmers who need it badly at 8 per cent.

The farmer gets a better, more saleable proposal than the one I made last week. Last week I proposed that we lend money through the Farm Credit Corporation at 8 per cent. When the debt was paid back under the contract, the Farm Credit Corporation would be quite justified in getting an interest in the additional profit. That is being done all the time in private business because businesses are caught in the same way as everybody else, including the farmer. They have to shift toward some type of equity financing on which there is no interest or some sort of an interest in their profit which has no interest on it as well.

My proposal is sensible. I use it all the time in private business and it works. No one loses under that system. There is no subsidy. The suggestion of the hon. member for Medicine Hat is so simple and obvious that grain farmers will put their money into those trust accounts.

Cattle farmers will put their money in and everybody who wishes he were a farmer would put his money in if he got the chance. They will not quarrel about the 6 per cent. If there is worry about the fact it will be in there for a long while, the interest could be indexed along with inflation to ensure the farmer does not suffer. Index the principal if you want. The fact remains that something practical has to be done, not next week but now.

These ideas have been put before this House for the past seven or eight years starting with the hon. member for Moose Jaw, the hon. member for Swift Current, the hon. member for Mackenzie and myself, to the then minister in charge of the Wheat Board who introduced the stabilization for grain. it was put forward then as a positive, simple alternative to help stabilize the farm income without any cost to the government. Keep the government out of it. Those proposals were passed over for this complicated, legalistic type of tax law that we got in the stabilization act. No one understands that law except the tax expert, and I sometimes have doubts about them.

I think I have driven home this point as well as I can. I do so not only on the basis that it makes good common sense. To go out and tell the farmer tomorrow that you are going to put this proposal before cabinet would shake this cabinet out of a year's growth. It would really smarten them up. If the minister says he is going to put it forward, and if cabinet cannot prove that it cannot be done without a shadow of a doubt, you are walking the plank and you are telling why. My God, they would come back from all over the world to make sure he does not walk it.

No one dismisses a minister of agriculture of this country without a revolution from one end of the country to the other as long as he is fighting on behalf of the farmer. It is something where you cut across party lines. Canada as it is with all its great diversity can only have one federal minister of agriculture. Sometimes he is from the west, sometimes from the east, but it cannot make any difference. He speaks for all the farmers. Regardless of what language he speaks or where he comes from and regardless of the difference of views of many farmers, as long as they know he is sticking up for them, they will forgive many of his blunders and mistakes. As long as you let them know you do not care what their politics are or where they come from and that they will get fair treatment, farmers will always back their federal minister of agriculture.

Some of us can speak with great experience on that, having once gone against all the farmers. When they came around in a year or so, the support was overwhelming, regardless of political affiliation. They did not care that I was called Conservative because they knew that I stood up for them. With everyone against me—only one other member of the Conservative caucus supported me—I survived. I was not afraid. I did not want to be minister of agriculture anyway.

No prime minister is ever going to fire a minister of agriculture. If you really want to shake up the self-styled leaders of the nation who parade up and down as cabinet ministers today, just say that you were listening to this debate and you think there is a lot of sense in it. We are not asking for subsidies so the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) will not be against you.

We are asking for a simple type of proposal whereby the farmer can put his money into some form of trust account. He will do it. All you have to tell a farmer is he will get out of taxes for a while and he will do anything. Get that money out at 6 or 8 per cent, whatever you can, just say you are going to do it and every farmer's hopes will rise again. If you say you are going to back him up and there will be no subsidy, no prime minister will turn you down. Think what a morale booster it would be for the Department of Agriculture. Instead of dragging along under this situation, catching hell from one end of the country to the other, they would have their minister finally speak up, saying he is willing to walk the plank if justice is not done to the agricultural industry. That is the challenge we put before the minister tonight.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. It being ten o'clock it is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 58(11), the proceedings on the motion have now expired.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

SOCIAL SECURITY
(A) QUERY RESPECTING AID FOR SENIOR CITIZENS
(B) REQUEST FOR EMERGENCY ACTION
(C) REQUEST FOR LEGISLATION TO BENEFIT WOMEN AGED 55 TO 65 YEARS

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday, May 19, as recorded in Hansard at page 9674, I raised with the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) the plight being faced by many senior citizens, and in particular I asked that something be done by way of making an increase in the old age pension on an emergency basis.

I asked in particular that the Minister of National Health and Welfare not tell us, as others on the government side do so often, about the $35 increase that was made last summer, because in point of fact that increase has been completely eaten up by increases in food and rental costs that senior citizens have had to meet. I also asked her not to try to make the point that that increase is fully indexed as though that takes care of the situation. I pointed out in fact that during the past year, when the over-all consumer price index has gone up by over 12 per cent, the actual increase in dollars in the total amount of the guaranteed income supplement has gone up by only 8.8 per cent.

The reason, of course, the indexing of old age pensions is always behind is that it is based on a formula that permits the department to go back a month and then three months behind that and compare that three-month period with the three months before that, with the result that when pensioners get an increase in their pensions, they are never getting an increase to help them meet the costs they are having to cope with right then. It is because of that situation, I contend, there should now be another emergency increase in the amount of the old age pension, whether it is added to the basic old age security or to the guaranteed income supplement.

The minister, of course, did the very things I asked her not to do. She reminded us of the $35 increase last year and told us about the quarterly indexing that is supposed to be up to date. These are myths that any senior citizen can disprove. Then she went on to point out that the plea we sometimes make for a special cost-of-living increase for old age pensioners related to the things that they actually have to buy would not be of much help because her department had done the arithmetic and had found out that over a ten-year period the difference would be about one percentage point or .1 percentage point per year.

I tried to make the point back to her that I was not talking about what happens on a ten-year basis, but about the difficulties that pensioners are facing right now. I contend that the case is very strong for an emergency increase in the old age pension right away, and I made a particular reference to needs of women between 55 and 65 who get no pension at all.

I know we are always told that there is not any money, and I know that my plea for a pension increase flies in the face of those in this House, especially to my right, who are forever asking for the government to cut expenditures. I remind the government and the House of a period I remember very well when the government was not spending money, in the depression of the 1930s, and the result was that things got worse and worse. I suggest if it were not for government money that is going into the pockets of people in the form of old age pensions, family allowances, unemployment insurance, veterans' pensions and all these things, our economy today would really be in a tailspin. I suggest that far from it hurting the economy to put money into the pockets of people who will spend it on things they need, it would actually be a help to the economy, and even the business interests that keep calling for cuts in government spending would be better off if our social programs were expanded.

I say tonight that I am sorry the minister took such a negative stand in response to my question. I still do not think that is the way she feels about these matters. I believe she wants to see pensions and other social benefits increased. I can understand her not being here tonight, but I see I do not even have the attendance of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Frith).

I gather that the one parliamentary secretary who is here at this moment is the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development (Mr. Irwin), who will respond. I hope he will do so with a sense of justice and fair play to the senior citizens of this country.

Mr. Ron Irwin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): First, Mr. Speaker, it is a myth that it is going to be easier for senior citizens in the next while. It is going to get more difficult with inflation and high interest rates. I see the latest census report in the U.S., which will probably mirror ours, indicates that for the first time since 1950 there are as many Americans above the age of 30 as there are below that age. That means that we have a shrinking work force which must provide for the economic well-being of a mushrooming elderly population.

Now I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) will be the first to admit, and I say this very subjectively, that the best social legislation has been the combination of Liberal-CCF-NDP legislation over the years, but I think it is going to be more and more difficult in these times to provide the necessary money. In the last campaign we had really only one monetary promise where money was going out with no return and that was in the area of social assistance, directed to the 1.2 million senior citizens eligible for old age security and the GIS. We kept that promise and it was very expensive. The hon. member says not to remind him of what was done, but it is a fact that we kept the promise and we put out a lot of money.

When the hon. member asked the question in the House, he stated that we had not indexed this properly, that it was only 8.8 per cent. I have checked this and that figure is for a nine-month period from July, 1980 to April, 1981. If we calculate it for a full 12-month period ending this July, it will be approximately 12 per cent, which means the single pensioner will get an additional $17 and a married pensioner $13. I know it is not enough, I know that we have to look first after the elderly and the pensioners in our society, but we are in very difficult times and that is all we can do at this particular stage in the development of our economy.

We are doing all we can for those over 65, and it was suggested by the hon. member that we go into those areas below 65, namely the single woman currently ineligible for old age security. I think he is right when he says that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) would do it if she could. She indicated a figure of approximately $730 million to do all those things she wanted to do, but I do not think she can. And I think she was quite forthright and truthful when she said in the House that the government is doing all it can to look after those over 65; it will be some time before we can look after those 55 to 65.

Mr. Knowles: By that time they will be 65.

Mr. Irwin: Well, within the last 20 years we have and are providing income housing, senior citizen housing, provincial assistance, old age security and the GIS. At its worst, things are much better now than they were 20 or 30 years ago, and there is some responsibility on our citizens to do some saving of their own for their future retirement. I do not think we can continuously put the debt on the young workers of this country and expect them to go out and produce and earn money and pay the income tax they will have to pay. This is a shared responsibility.

ENERGY—EXPORTS OF NATURAL GAS TO UNITED STATES

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, on May 13 I asked the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) if he would consider a policy in which he would not allow any further exports of natural gas from Canada to the United States until there was a firm commitment by the gas transmission companies like TransCanada Pipelines to serve the underserved areas of eastern Canada.

The reason I asked the question was that I was not sure whether the transmission companies like TransCanada Pipelines and the distribution companies like Northern and Central Gas Corporation Limited, which serves northeastern and eastern Ontario, had any clear direction as to just how rapidly they would served the underserved areas of eastern Canada.

There is a program in the National Energy Program called the federal distribution system expansion program which provides grants for distribution of natural gas in these communities, but the cost of the transmission lines into many of these communities will be very high. I am not sure whether that whole grant system will be adequate to cover it. For instance, in northeastern and eastern Ontario there are some 150 communities which need service, and the assistance will have to come out of that program.

In my own constituency it is estimated that it will cost something like $80 million to put through the transmission gas pipeline, part of which will be borne by TransCanada Pipelines and part by the distribution company, supposedly Northern and Central Gas Corporation. The volume of gas probably will not be adequate to amortize the cost, so it is a question of grants or the cost of that gas pipeline being borne ultimately by the producers of natural gas in western Canada, if it is added to the rate base of TransCanada Pipelines.

If we look at it in the national perspective, we see some six billion cubic feet of gas being used per year. This displaces about one million barrels of oil. We are subsidizing oil to the extent of $20 per barrel through the compensation program. So we will see a net saving for the country of some $20 million just in the communities along the north shore of Lake Huron. It is clearly in the national interest.

Whether companies like TransCanada will move to put in transmission facilities is highly questionable. They will not actually move ahead with it, unless they are certain that their chances of exporting gas to the United States will be virtually zero. I am hopeful the minister will ensure that more exports will not be approved to the United States until the underserved areas of eastern Canada are provided with natural gas. This only makes sense. We are spending a great deal of money under the Canadian oil substitution program to convert furnaces from oil to natural gas.

Obviously those gas transmission lines and distribution systems should be in place before we can carry out the substitution. I am hopeful the minister will adopt a policy of no further exports until the areas in eastern Canada which are not presently served with natural gas pipelines are being served.

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the central aim of our government's National Energy Program is to ensure that all areas of our country are supplied with indigenous sources of energy. In establishing that aim, we recognize the fact that we can no longer depend on oil, whether imported or domestic, to supply the greater proportion of our national energy requirements. That is why the Canadian Oil Substitution Program announced last week is so important. The program will play a key role in achieving our goal of reducing oil consumption in the non-transport sectors to 10 per cent of their total energy needs by 1990.

The administrative arrangements of COSP have been largely completed following extensive consultations. It is clearly evident that its successful implementation will be of universal benefit to the different sectors of the economy.

With specific reference to natural gas, the National Energy Program provides for federal financial assistance for distribution companies to extend service to communities which it would not otherwise be economical to connect. Officials of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources are presently at work with their provincial counterparts to develop criteria for determining which pipeline extension programs will be eligible for assistance, and to establish the process for selecting, from competing proposals, the specific projects to be funded. This work will be completed to allow the funding of projects in the 1982 construction season. For the fiscal year 1982-83, an amount of $170 million will be available for gas distribution system expansion. This is additional to $500 million to be made available for transmission system expansion to the maritimes and to Vancouver Island.

However, it is important that I should add that this is a long-term program. It will be impossible to subsidize all worthy projects in the first year. The federal government wants natural gas to be available to as many Canadians as possible and hopes that this system of grants will ensure rapid expansion.

The question of natural gas exports must be considered in terms of provisions under the National Energy Board Act whereby the board may only approve a new gas export application if an assessment of future gas requirements in relation to supply clearly demonstrates a surplus. The NEB will report on oil and gas supply and demand in mid-summer. No new export hearings are anticipated until late this autumn or next winter, and no new export approvals will be forthcoming, assuming that such are recommended, before late 1982.

To the extent that surplus may be available from time to time, there are benefits to the economy from natural gas exports. For example, this was an important factor in our balance of payments situation last year.

WESTERN DEVELOPMENT FUND—FUTURE OF PROGRAM

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, in the budget speech of October last the government announced a Western Development Fund. The words used were very precise. They were:

> We have, therefore, allocated $4 billion to a Western Development Fund.

It was also stated that the government expected to spend $2 billion over the next three years.

In the budget speech it was made clear that the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) who, I might point out, is a westerner from Winnipeg-Fort Garry, would be in charge of specific development initiatives which "will be selected in consultation with the governments of the western provinces." The Minister of Employment and Immigration was named to co-ordinate these efforts and to ensure early action as leader of a special group of ministers. This special core of ministers, as is well known, consists of 13 ministers who are to concern themselves especially with western problems. You might say they are a sort of posse and the minister from Winnipeg-Fort Garry is sort of the top hand. The promise of the Western Development Fund was repeated at the same time in the National Energy Program, which states:

> The government is anxious to complement its national strategy with more specific measures to address issues of long-standing western concern.

It goes on:

> As a first step the Government of Canada will establish a special fund of $4 billion to finance over the first part of the decade a series of economic development initiatives, to be chosen jointly by the two levels of government, in the four western provinces.

On December 16, 1980 the Minister of Employment and Immigration charged into print by announcing a new "blueprint document" on western strategy. Presumably this "blueprint" would let us know some of the ways the $4 billion fund would be used.

You can imagine, Mr. Speaker, with what cheers we westerners greeted the minister's call to action. I want to quote what the minister said at that time. It was stirring stuff, Mr. Speaker. He said:

> Westerners are pragmatic.

Those are his exact words. Having delivered himself of this eternal verity, he followed it with another. He said:

> When they see we mean business, they'll take it at face value.

That is strong stuff, Mr. Speaker. Since the minister was assigned the task of co-ordinating specific development initiatives, we westerners assumed that these development initiatives were related to the $4 billion fund, which we were assured by the budget speech in October had been allocated. And because we are pragmatic, Mr. Speaker, we thought "allocated" meant allocated. We thought that when the budget speech of October said, "We have therefore allocated $4 billion, that it had indeed been allocated. Now, what does allocate mean? I looked it up in the dictionary and it means, "to set apart for a particular purpose". That is an exact quote. In the words of the minister, "We westerners took it at face value". Why not? Every westerner knows that if the Liberal ministers in October of last year said they "have allocated" a $4 billion fund, then that is what they have done.

● (2220)

Mr. Knowles: Oh?

Mr. Fraser: In other words, they "set apart" $4 billion for development in the west.

Now we westerners also thought that if the Liberal government had already allocated the fund, that is, "set it apart for a particular purpose", and I am using quotes again, the Liberal government ought to know where the fund is. I mean that somehow or other they had it lassoed with the rope tied tightly to something. That is how we pragmatic westerners would have done it, and we would do it like that so no matter how much dust and feathers that fund kicked up it would still be tied to a post come morning.

So it came as a real surprise to find out through the press that maybe there is no fund. Maybe it never has been allocated. By golly, maybe those Liberal ministers in charge of western affairs never did get a rope on that fund. Why, back on May 4, the Canada Grain Council met. I will just read this to Your Honour because I know you are interested. The press reported:

> 'Ottawa's $4 billion development plan—promised in the Grit budget . . . has receded so far from sight that speakers at the council meeting made no overt mention of it.'

Those are big words for a western meeting.

It is pretty polite language for saying that the fund was a runaway that never got properly corralled. We certainly could see the problem. That allocated fund was out of the barn, so to speak, and not one of those 13 specially deputized ministers could catch it.

There was more than one westerner beginning to take things at face value, and I mean, by that: if you cannot see a fund, and if the fellow who says he has allocated it cannot show it to you, then, being pragmatic, as the minister said we are, we concluded that maybe there is no fund, and maybe there never was a fund, allocated or not.

But, as the newspaper article put it, no one made any overt mention of it. As a matter of fact, the Minister of Employment and Immigration did not even call a press conference to tell us polite westerners what we had pragmatically figured out, and that was that there is either no fund at all or it is running loose somewhere quite out of control. I mean, we think it is probably overtly out of control. That is, it is out in the open and disappearing just about as fast as a Liberal promise can gallop.

Well, last week I asked some questions in the House about the fund and whether the advanced light rapid transit system in Vancouver would be paid for out of that elusive fund. It took a far western Liberal to finally tell the truth, like a clean breeze from off the Pacific. Senator Perrault, according to the press, said the fund has not been allocated. Well, now, we had figured that out. It makes an honest man out of the senator, but a near liar out of the government's top hand. As for the light rapid transit, how will that be paid for? Says Senator Perrault, "We have sprung the money from a different source", or, as we westerners would say, "A source of a different colour".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the commitment of this government to the growth of western Canada is well known. Recent indications of this commitment, as noted by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) in his reply to the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) on May 28, show the role the federal government intends to play in the west, now and in the future.

One recent example is our contribution of up to $60 million to ensure that the Vancouver light rapid transit system is built. This contribution is a firm commitment of the government, and one which will have spin-off effects, we hope, both in the British Columbia industry which will service the system, and in the Vancouver project's demonstration of Canadian transportation technology for export.

As noted on that same day in reply to the hon. member, Senator Argue's recent announcement about the sale of grain to the Soviet Union stands as another example of this government's concern and commitment.

I can assure the House that there will be more announcements and more action in the next months which will, I hope, satisfy the concern of the hon. member and this government that the federal government is playing its proper role in ensuring orderly growth and expansion of the economic health of western Canada.

Mr. Knowles: But where is the fund?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until two o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

At 10.25 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

THE MONARCHY

TWENTY-EIGHTH ANNIVERSARY OF HER MAJESTY'S CORONATION AS QUEEN OF CANADA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, under Standing Order 43 I rise in the expectation that I shall receive unanimous consent for my resolution. Today being June 2, the anniversary of the Queen's coronation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor):

That on behalf of this House the Speaker send a message of gratitude, good wishes and loyalty to Her Majesty on the occasion of this, the 28th anniversary of her coronation as Queen of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: For presentation, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

INDUSTRY

ENCOURAGEMENT OF PULP AND PAPER MILLS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter urgent to the entire newspaper industry of Canada. Whereas this industry receives less than 7 per cent of Canada's newsprint production, the rest being exported, and whereas a number of pulp and paper mills are threatened with strikes, which will severely reduce newsprint supplies, and in view of the proposed adversiting tax changes for newspapers instigated by the government, which will impose severe hardships on the industry, and which have been described by Patrick O'Callighan as "Unprecedented attempts to intrude into the traditional freedom of the press", I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor):

That this House request the merciless Minister of Finance to cease his Big Mac attack on the newspaper industry, that the government encourage the mills to avoid any strikes, and encourage these mills to allocate a further 2 per cent of their production to Canada, in order that Canadians may continue to read such earth-shaking events as the Prime Minister's infamous sheik-yer-bootie two-step hustle, or the NDP Leader's enjoyment of Cuban cigars, plus the profound political insight provided daily by columnists such as Allan Fotheringham.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there inanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

TRANSPORT

RAIL PASSENGER SERVICE BETWEEN BARRIE AND TORONTO—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ron Stewart (Simcoe South): Madam Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43. There is an omission which is inconveniencing thousands of residents along the west shore of Lake Simcoe who regularly commute from Barrie to Toronto. Present service is inadequate, and surveys taken indicate there is both commuter demand and potential. The president of VIA Rail has stated that provinces should contract with VIA Rail to "run trains where local interests feel they should go". Residents of Simcoe South are caught between conflicting jurisdictions, VIA Rail and GO, neither of which presently satisfy popular demand. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis):

That the Minister of Transport use his good offices with VIA Rail and GO (Ontario) to expedite a contract or a swap of passenger runs which will result in improved commuter service and passenger profits for the rail carrier.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

S.O. 43

ACQUISITION OF PETROFINA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. A cloud of suspicion and mistrust hovers over the Petro-Canada takeover of Petrofina of last February. I raised this with the minister at the time, and believe that we need a full public disclosure, especially in light of the newspaper reports today alleging some rather serious improprieties in the share transactions. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly):

That the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources make public all of the materials gathered to date by his department and that of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, together with those of the Ontario Securities Commission, and further, that the minister establish a special public inquiry into the whole matter.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AGRICULTURE

HOG STABILIZATION PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Alberta hog producers will not receive any payment whatsoever under the Agriculture Stabilization Act, as per the Minister of Agriculture's announcement of May 21, even though the subsidization of pork production in some other provinces, through programs such as weaner pig subsidies, interest subsidies, manpower assistance programs, hog transportation subsidies, and the like, is often greater than the emergency support which was provided by the Alberta government, which the federal minister has conveniently ignored in determining who will receive payment. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

That this House instructs the Minister of Agriculture to acknowledge the unfairness of the federal decision, and make the payout to hog producers across Canada equal, and also instructs the minister to expose all forms of government assistance in all provinces of Canada to ensure fair treatment in the future for our hog producers no matter in what province they produce.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE LATE WALTER R. SHAW

MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Many Canadians across the country joined all Prince Edward Islanders, regardless of political persuasion, in mourning the death over the weekend of Dr. Walter R. Shaw, premier of Prince Edward Island from 1959 to 1966. In light of Mr. Shaw's life-long service to his beloved province and to his country in the fields of agriculture, politics, history, and community life, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper):

That this House expresses its profound sadness at the death of a great Canadian.

Madam Speaker: I am sure the House would want to express its sentiments by its applause.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

THE LEADER OF THE NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY

MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Last week the NDP leader's tour was a disaster as a result of lost airplane seats, and this week is rapidly going up in smoke as he spent hours discussing the relative merits of Cuban cigars with fellow socialist, Fidel Castro. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cambridge (Mr. Speyer):

That this House invite the hon. member for Oshawa, also known as the hon. member from La Mancha, to return to the country from which he receives his pay cheque and participate in the business of running a democracy.

FISHERIES

STATE OF INDUSTRY IN SOUTHERN NOVA SCOTIA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Miss Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Since the fishing industry in southern Nova Scotia is totally paralysed because of the poor market conditions for haddock, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Missisquoi (Mr. Bachand):

That the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans order the Fisheries Prices Support Board to convene immediately to see if it can assist the fishing industry and get the plants and fishermen back in operation at this most critical time in the fishery.

Madam Speaker: Is there consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HUMAN RIGHTS

CONDEMNATION OF PROPAGATION OF RACIAL HATRED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to propose a motion which I am sure will receive the unanimous consent of the House. Since the U.S. based National States Rights Party, which describes itself as "by far the largest white racist party in America", has established its mailing address at one of Canada's post offices in Toronto's east end and has distributed copies of its publication "The Thunderbolt" to many households in that area, and since on Sunday last the Ku Klux Klan engaged in a public cross burning in British Columbia, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-St. James (Mr. Keeper):

That this House condemn in the strongest terms the race hatred and intimidation used by organizations such as the National States Rights Party and the Ku Klux Klan, and since prohibitory orders have been issued by the post office against the National States Rights Party and "The Thunderbolt" magazine, that the Postmaster General investigate the possible use of other post offices by this organization.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the presentation of this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

PETRO-CANADA

ACQUISITION OF PETROFINA—NEWSPAPER ALLEGATIONS

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Ever since the announcement of the Petro-Canada takeover of Petrofina, we on this side have been very concerned about the obvious indications of insider trading leading up to the acquisition of the company by Petro-Canada. I am sure the Prime Minister is aware of the article which appeared this morning in The Toronto Sun which outlined substantial profits that were made in the period leading up to the takeover. It makes some very serious allegations as to the involvement of cabinet ministers and of a senator. What steps has the Prime Minister taken to assure himself that these allegations are not true? Can he assure the House that no cabinet minister made any material profit as a result of insider trading in these shares?

● (1415)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I have not had the time nor, I must say, the inclination to read the Sun article.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I remember that this kind of innuendo was brought up in the House a few weeks ago by members opposite, and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs undertook to refer the matter to the Ontario Securities Commission, which he did. We will hear from the Ontario Securities Commission, which is looking into this matter as it should, and I am sure the securities commission will be able to give the hon. member assurance that no cabinet minister was involved.

Mr. Clark: You are sure of that?

Mr. Crosbie: That is very casual.

ROLE PLAYED BY MAURICE STRONG

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, I am very, very surprised at the statement by the Prime Minister that he does not have the inclination to look into this article, which has some very serious allegations contained in it.

Mr. Trudeau: I never read garbage.

Mr. Crosbie: Start looking.

Mr. Wilson: The article further alleges that a company connected with Maurice Strong was also involved in very substantial profits arising out of the transaction. Since Mr. Strong was in a position of trust as a principal participant in the negotiations leading up to the takeover, has the Prime Minister had any discussions with Mr. Strong to assure himself that Mr. Strong is not involved with Sofigen, the company alleged to be involved in these profits.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, as to the preamble to the question, I am surprised that the hon. member is surprised. I think it is well-known that I do not read the newspapers very much, but I particularly do not read those that publish garbage.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: As to the question itself, no, I have not spoken to Maurice Strong about it.

Mr. Crosbie: You don't care about it.

Mr. Trudeau: Never garbage. That is what you are reading all the time.

Mr. Wilson: Madam Speaker, I am sure the Prime Minister is going to realize very soon that this is a matter of great concern to Canadians at large, and they do not regard this as garbage, rather they regard it as a very serious matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

STATUS OF INVESTIGATION INTO TAKEOVER

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister referred a minute ago to the steps taken by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, who agreed under some pressure from us about two months ago to undertake an investigation.

Would the Prime Minister outline the status of the investigation to this House? In addition, would he advise the House whether this investigation, as it is presently constituted, will address the allegations which are outlined in The Toronto Sun article?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, it is obvious that this investigation is continuing. It is now being carried out by officials of my department in the Bureau of Corporate Affairs, by the Ontario Securities Commission and by the Quebec Securities Commission. It is obvious that the allegations published today in a Toronto newspaper will indeed be followed up and studied by the people who are now making that investigation.

[English]

QUERY RESPECTING DETAILS OF INVESTIGATION

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Madam Speaker, my question is also for the Prime Minister. Even if the Prime Minister does not read garbage, fortunately or unfortunately a lot of people in this country do read garbage.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: He should not try to slough off an important matter such as this, which I suggest to the Prime Minister casts a cloud, certainly over all cabinet ministers if not all members of this House. May I just say, for the benefit of the Prime Minister, that the allegation is that there were purchases of Petrofina stock made just prior to the takeover by PetroCan. This involves a senator and his wife, two unnamed cabinet ministers, and a named cabinet minister, through an investment company, and some of these through nominee accounts.

• (1420)

These are important allegations that should not and cannot be sloughed off by the Prime Minister. If for nothing other than his own peace of mind, I would have imagined he would have inquired into the matter and would have reported here today. Will the Prime Minister please tell us what investigations he has made and what are the results of those investigations into alleged improprieties on the part of members of his cabinet?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I take note of the admission by the hon. member that some people do read garbage, namely, the people on the other side of the House. I can say that that is their problem. In so far as cabinet ministers are concerned, my information is that one was named, the member from Hamilton. I inquired of him, and he has already protested to the paper, asking for an apology because there is absolutely no foundation in fact in the allegations made against that minister. I hope the newspaper will make a very strong apology.

In the case of other allegations of unnamed people, I do not know. If there are some people who made money in a way they should not have, I trust the Ontario Securities Commission will determine that. As the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs told the House, he is also making an investigation. Between the two of them, one a federal investigation and the other an investigation by the Ontario Securities Commission, we will find out if there are some guilty people. If so, I hope their names will be made public and that they will be taken to trial. However, I do not know of any. Until the Ontario Securities Commission in particular has finished its inquiry, I think it is a bit premature to publish the names of "guilty persons".

PUBLICATION OF REPORT

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): There are a couple of corrections implicit in that. At least one cabinet minister reads garbage. The second correction involves the investigation by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs who has been quoted as indicating that in all likelihood the federal investigation, apart from the Ontario Securities Commission investigation, will not be made public. I would like the Prime Minister to expand on this and indicate to us why in any event before it is even completed there is an indication that it may not be made public. Why can we not have an understanding and commitment from the Prime Minister now, regardless of which names are mentioned, that that report will be made public. We have every right to know.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member says that we now have the admission of one cabinet minister that he reads garbage. The important admission is the one by the hon. member in his two questions that in fact it is garbage he has been reading. That is the main point. In so far as the Ontario Securities Commission is concerned, I have no control over it. I trust that Premier Bill

Davis, a good Conservative, will ensure that any truth that should come to light will come to light.

THE ECONOMY

ADVICE TENDERED TO MINISTER OF FINANCE

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I want to turn to some other garbage, the government's economic policy. My question is to the minister whose genius speaks for itself, the Minister of Finance. Is the minister aware that Governor Bouey told the Senate committee on national finance, and I quote from the transcript:

I think the economy is not all that far off from being as close to potential as it should be.

● (1425)

However, the Economic Council of Canada has stated in its annual report:

—this country is not making full use of its available human resources and of its plant, machinery and equipment.

I would ask the minister whose advice is he currently following; is he following the advice of Governor Bouey when he says that Canada is working at full potential, or is he following the advice of the Economic Council of Canada which says that Canada is not working at its full potential?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, in certain cases I follow the advice of neither. I want to make it clear to the hon. member that in so far as the administration and thrust of monetary policy are concerned, and I have stated so frequently, I obviously support the Bank of Canada, but it is not my intention to comment and adjudicate upon every statement made either by the Governor of the Bank or the chairman of the Economic Council before any committee to which they are summoned. I am not going to get into that business, and it is not my responsibility to vet their opinions.

EFFECT OF HIGH INTEREST RATES ON GROWTH AND PRODUCTIVITY

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, it is the minister's responsibility to make up his mind as to whether or not he thinks the economy is at its full potential, and what policy he intends to carry out to see that that takes place. That is what we are waiting to hear from the minister. I would like to ask the minister this supplementary question before he gets totally agitated. When the chairman of the Economic Council tells the finance committee, as he did on Friday, that the interest rate policy of the government is above what is sensible from the point of view of achieving this general objective of full capacity, full potential and the full use of our economy, is the minister not concerned that the effect of high interest rates at the present time is to discourage real growth and real productivity in the economy, particularly when all the evidence suggests that unless we have an economy working at capacity we are not going to achieve the growth and productivity he says he wants?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, first of all, though I heard about the testimony given by the chairman of the Economic Council, based upon news reports, I have not been able to receive a transcript. I have attempted to get a transcript. I have learned that oftentimes the transcript of the actual evidence carries a somewhat different interpretation than abbreviated newspaper accounts. I have not seen the testimony of the chairman of the Economic Council.

The hon. member talks about the necessity of growth and what our policy is in that regard. He ought to know that in the fourth quarter of last year the annual rate of growth in the economy was 8 per cent, and in the first quarter of this year it was 3 per cent to 6 per cent, a rate of growth which, in my opinion, is not compatible with the long-term necessity of reducing inflationary expectations in this country. If he believes in fighting inflation, then he ought to put that particular fact into his calculations.

RELATIVITY OF TAXES ON BANKS AND ON INDIVIDUALS

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, the calculations which are given to us by the Economic Council, and the calculations given to us on what is really going on in the economy from the point of view of idleness in the economy, idle hands and idle machinery and lost hopes, are published and there for all to see, and the minister can put them into his calculations if he wants.

The final question I have for the minister has to do with the proposals he has been making on a so-called tax-based incomes policy. When the industrial wage since 1970 has gone up 150 per cent, whereas direct taxes on persons have gone up 300 per cent, and when bank profits have gone up 210 per cent, but their taxes paid to the Canadian public have gone up 14 per cent, and when you put those figures into your calculations, which I hope you will take the trouble to do, how can you go around the country talking about punishing workers—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should know that he must address the Chair.

Mr. Rae: Madam Speaker, how can the minister go around the country saying to workers that they are to be the ones whose taxes are going to be clawed back by the government, when we see that their taxes have gone up 300 per cent and the taxes of the banks have gone up 14 per cent over the last ten years?

● (1430)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. gentleman asks me to explain that. That is not difficult, because at no point have I ever made a statement to the effect that I intended to claw back taxes from the workers of the country.

That is the kind of exaggerated hyperbole the hon. member uses every day, but that does nothing to help us solve our economic problems.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN SPEAKER'S GALLERY OF PROVINCIAL AND TERRITORIAL HOUSING MINISTERS

Madam Speaker: I would like to draw the attention of the House to the presence in our gallery of several ministers of housing from the Canadian provinces and territories, including the Hon. P. PETRO-CANADA

ACQUISITION OF PETROFINA—INQUIRY OF MINISTRY

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister, who should know that the Ontario Securities Commission is not responsible for the propriety of the actions of his ministers. The moral standards of his government are his business and the business of this Parliament, and those are the matters which are at issue and in question here.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: In his reply to one of my colleagues the Prime Minister said he was sure—he used the words "I am sure"—that the Ontario Securities Commission will exonerate any minister. He has said that he has asked at least one question of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. The Prime Minister of Canada has a positive obligation to satisfy himself as to the propriety of actions, and to satisfy the people of Canada as to the propriety of actions—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: Hon. members on the government side are trying to shout this question down, but I will proceed with it—in order to satisfy the Parliament of Canada as to the propriety of the actions of ministers of the Crown.

Will the Prime Minister of Canada tell this House now whether he has personally investigated and personally satisfied himself that no minister of his government has profited from insider information in relation to the Petrofina deal. And if he has not conducted that inquiry of each of his ministers, will he tell this House of Commons why he has not done that duty to protect the moral standard of his government?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, it is clear that the purpose of the Securities Commission of Ontario is not to inquire into the moral standards of ministers of my government but to find if there is any whiffle of truth to the allegations or innuendoes made by hon. members opposite. If there is any, I take it the Ontario Securities Commission will let us know.

Mr. Crosbie: Very casual.

Mr. Trudeau: Of course I am very casual. I have not asked all my ministers. One was named. I asked him. I have not asked the others if they were involved in anything. I have not asked them either if they have stopped beating their wives. Has the right hon. member opposite stopped beating his wife?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I will not dignify that last comment, coming from that source, with a response.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The House of Commons has an interest in the propriety of the actions of the ministers of any government, but I must say particularly of this government.

I hear an interjection coming from a minister of the Crown who is known to fly in the jets of companies which have had dealings with ministries for which he has been responsible.

PUBLICATION OF INQUIRY RESULTS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister has said an inquiry is being undertaken. We know that when inquiries are into oil companies, the results are published immediately. When they are into the conduct of this government, as they are with respect to the uranium cartel, those inquiries are hidden. May we have an undertaking that as soon as this inquiry is completed its results will be published and made available in total to the House of Commons and to the people of Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, as to the allegation of hon. members opposite, I am reminded that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources indicated to the House that cabinet ministers heard about the Petrofina deal at 5 p.m. on Thursday, January 29, when the market was closed. It remained closed until the deal was announced the following Tuesday, February 3. That is sufficient prima facie evidence that the cabinet was—

An hon. Member: What does that mean?

Mr. Trudeau: I do not just go around suspecting people of being dishonest. I know that is a different attitude toward life than that of the Leader of the Opposition, but that is my attitude.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, the attitude of the Prime Minister is not to answer questions which are put in this House. That one thing is very clear.

REQUEST FOR EARLY PUBLICATION

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, the minister's statement had to do with the cabinet as a whole. As I recall it, it did not refer to members of the cabinet committee which might have been involved in discussing this matter. Since the rights and proprieties of Parliament and of the cabinet are at issue here, we would prefer to have a parliamentary inquiry into this matter, but this government refuses that. This government has established its own internal inquiry, which it can hide, just as it has so far hidden the results of the Bertrand report into the implication of the Government of Canada and its ministers in the uranium cartel.

The Prime Minister has refused to answer my question. Will he give us an undertaking now that, as soon as that report is finished, it will be published in total and made available without modification and without delay to the House of Commons and to the people of Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the right hon. member accuses me of not answering questions, but he fills his questions with many spurious allegations, and he follows many detours, as he has done just now by including all kinds of allegations in his question. I find that it is my duty to answer some of those allegations rather than to go on to the rhetorical questions which came at the end. If the right hon. member would ask a straight question without all the fanciful preamble, he would get a straight answer.

REQUEST FOR COMMITMENT TO PUBLISH REPORT

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): For the third time, Madam Speaker, will the Prime Minister give this House of Commons an unconditional undertaking that the report of the investigation which is being conducted by his colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, will be published in total without modification immediately on its completion?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I will ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Oral Questions

FISHERIES

ALICE ARM, B.C.—CLOSING OF AMAX MINE

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. Late last week the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans requested that the Amax operation at Alice Arm be closed, and that was done. The reason the minister stated in his telex to the company last week for his request for closure has now been confirmed to be true; in fact the tailings at about five parts per million are above the 100 metre level.

Could the minister tell this House what steps or modifications he has requested of the company so that the tailings will not resurface? Is it his position today that that mine can reopen without modification?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I have just returned after some days of absence. I saw the information alluded to by the hon. member.

Yes, the company did comply with the request I made of it. We are checking into the material which seems to have surfaced above the level which was permitted by the regulations. I am meeting some of my officials to discuss this very question at three o'clock, and I hope to answer the hon. member's question more fully tomorrow.

• (1440)

MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, it is costing the company an estimated $350,000 a day to be closed down, while the minister travels in other areas of the country. The minister had a study done which demonstrates that the tailings ponds on land could be undertaken safely and economically for a cost of $26 million, or $1 million per year of mine operation, which is only a 2 per cent difference in return on investment.

Since four out of five of the government's own scientists recommended against marine dumping, which has now been proven to pollute the environment above the one hundred metre level, will the minister now either recommend to the company that they use on-land tailings ponds, or support the idea of a full public inquiry?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, my absence had nothing to do with the delay. The fact is, and we said so in the telegram, that delay was caused pending examination of the material by scientists. Surely the hon. member, who has been doing his best to have the whole operation closed down, cannot today have the comfort of saying he is trying to stop the company from losing money because we are asking that precautions be taken. He had better make up his mind what he wants to do.

The fact is, Madam Speaker, that we are checking into this problem, and in this situation we will take a responsible position and do what is necessary. I am not going to prejudge the scientists' recommendations.

Oral Questions

MODIFICATION OF DUMPING OPERATION

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, the minister sort of callously brushes aside the $350,000 a day costs that are accruing to the company, but it is abundantly clear to this House that four out of five scientists recommended against it. Has the minister recommended to the company any modifications in the dumping which has proven to be polluting contrary to the special order in council, and is it his position that the mine can reopen today?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I will recommend changes if they are necessary, when I have the information and not only the rhetoric of the hon. member.

STATE OF INDUSTRY IN SOUTHERN NOVA SCOTIA

Miss Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Madam Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. He is aware that this is the third week that the fishing industry has been paralysed in the southern end of Nova Scotia, due to the poor market conditions in the groundfish industry. Has the minister asked the Fisheries Prices Support Board to look into the problem, since both the Province of Nova Scotia and the dragger fishermen have asked him to do so, and if so can they not convene immediately this week to look into the urgency of the situation and, if not, will he ask them to do so?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, if I remember correctly, the legislation states that the Prices Support Board examines the situation at the end of a fishing season to see if the fishermen's income has been affected by factors such as markets. In this case, since the fishing has not taken place, it is difficult for the board to make a judgment, but I will ask them to examine this and see if there is in fact any room under the legislation as it exists for them to make recommendations to the government.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

STRENGTH OF ARMED FORCES

Mr. Ron Stewart (Simcoe South): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence and relates to the alarming rate of resignations and early retirement of long service senior Armed Forces personnel, a rate abnormally higher than the normal rate of attrition. I ask the minister is he aware that this phenomenon is as a result of low morale, unification, lack of separate identity, and because our forces are underequipped, undermanned and overextended? I also ask whether he is taking steps to stem this exodus, by monitoring morale and other problems created by unification, as I did through this direct mailer I hold in my hand, to my constituents in the Armed Forces, and is he aware that Armed Forces personnel were ordered by their superior officers not to reply to me through this questionnaire?

[Translation]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I would rather answer in French the question just put to me by the hon. member concerning the allegedly very low morale of our Armed Forces, and the early retirement of certain of our generals and senior officers. Such retirements are normally due to the fact that our senior officers, because of their outstanding competence and very thorough training in the Armed Forces, want to launch a new career in private enterprise or in the public service, anxious as they are to serve their country in a different capacity.

Madam Speaker, I have no indication that morale in the Armed Forces is at its lowest; on the contrary, since this government has re-equipped the Armed Forces with the best equipment possible and considering that their pay scale has recently been raised to a satisfactory level, I think that the morale of the Armed Forces is better than it has ever been.

[English]

REPLIES TO QUESTIONNAIRE

Mr. Ron Stewart (Simcoe South): Madam Speaker, in my view the minister's reply indicates his office has little or no understanding of this serious problem. Will the minister explain why 86 per cent of the respondents to the questionnaire said that morale was low, 84 per cent favoured separate identities and uniforms, and 74 per cent said unification was not working and was not effective?

[Translation]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I am fully aware of the questionnaire mentioned by the hon. member; I have it here in my hand. I believe the hon. member sent a questionnaire to his constitutents in the Armed Forces, concerning their identity, education, satisfaction, their morale and so on. Madam Speaker, I think one can indeed expect a reaction to a questionnaire which begins with a sentence like this, and I quote:

> I am very proud of the Canadian Armed Forces personnel, but I believe their morale is very low, that they are underequipped and that our Armed Forces are over-extended.

In my opinion, when a questionnaire begins on such a negative note, I cannot understand how people can answer in an unbiased mood.

POSSIBLE INVOLVEMENT OF CANADIAN TROOPS IN MIDDLE EAST

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of National Defence. Will he inform the House whether Canada has been approached, either officially or unofficially, by any foreign government or international agency, to supply troops for service in the Middle East?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): To my knowledge, I do not think there has been any official demand for Canada's participation in the Sinai area by Egypt, Israel, or any other country. I think it is under very serious consideration by the Department of External Affairs at the moment, and no decision has been taken on the project.

STATEMENTS BY MINISTER ON CANADIAN COMMITMENTS

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, I would have directed my supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs had he been here, but I assumed that the Minister of National Defence, since he spoke two weeks ago in a committee and said "at the present moment discussions are very unofficial," would now admit they are having unofficial discussions. He said also at that time that if Canadian troops were requested for peacekeeping purposes he would give it favourable consideration. He also said if they required troops for the rapid deployment force, that Canada would listen to such a request with sympathy.

Does the minister not feel that in answering so favourably he is giving a part commitment to employ our forces, and neither one of these commitments are under the United Nations which is concomitant to our supplying the forces, and would he care to tell us why he is making these partial commitments?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I think when I answered one of the questions in the media I said really that Canada would look with sympathy on any official request, as I mentioned before. To my knowledge there has not been any official request as far as Canadian troops participating in that venture is concerned. And I said at the time that we will look with sympathy, not meaning that we would decide to be involved in it, but you know very well the high credibility of Canada as far as peacekeeping is concerned. I think that everywhere we have been, the credibility of Canada as far as effectiveness and efficiency in terms of peacekeeping are concerned, has been very high. This is why I say we will look with sympathy, because I do not think Canada wants to refuse to keep the peace in any way we can in any part of the world. This is one of our aims.

TRANSPORT

MECHANICAL DEFECTS IN AUTOMOBILES—ACTION TO PROTECT CANADIANS

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Just over a year ago, as reported at page 1532 of Hansard, I asked the minister about rabbits—Volkswagen Rabbits, that is. The question concerned a serious and recurring compound failure of the braking system in Volkswagen Rabbits. At that time the minister undertook to investigate the matter and to bring about remedial action through representations to Volkswagen.

The minister should be aware that in December of this year an internal report produced evidence that there have been over one hundred documented brake failures in Volkswagen Rabbits in Canada, over 1,000 in the United States, and that, in fact, these brake failures are far in excess of the rate of failures in similar cars. For example, in the case of all similar class vehicles there was only one other failure in all other types of vehicles.

Since 12 months have passed since I first raised this question, can the minister tell the House why he has chosen to do nothing to ensure the absolute safety of owners of Volkswagen Rabbit cars? Is it true that the minister has instructed his officials to back off Volkswagen, to avoid embarrassment or potential costly recalls to them?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the last allegation is certainly false. I would not do that, for sure.

Recently there was a communique from my department with regard to the number of automobiles recalled in the last year. At the time I was assured that none were pending. The hon. member has again raised the question of the Volkswagen Rabbit, which I will look into again, but I have no reason to believe there were any difficulties with respect to that car.

MINISTERIAL ACTION

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, I personally received a large number of documented complaints with respect to accidents involving Volkswagen Rabbits, with brake failure as the principal cause. Bearing in mind that Volkswagen has refused to meet the repair costs to owners resulting from these failures, and given the fact that there have been many accidents and that there could well be more accidents and possible deaths, and in order to prevent a recurrence of further such accidents in the future, is the minister prepared to implement the defect notification procedures of the Motor Vehicle Safety Act and to demand compensation from Volkswagen? I might add that Volkswagen has chosen to compensate owners who take Volkswagen Canada to small debts court, but otherwise it refuses to meet the costs of repair.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I now recall very clearly that, indeed, action was taken with regard to this matter. Volkswagen issued instructions to people as to the proper use of the car.

On the subject of recall in general, I am sure the hon. member would like to know that 50 per cent of people who are entitled to repairs free of charge do not avail themselves of that right.

Oral Questions

THE ECONOMY

STATEMENT BY PREMIER OF ALBERTA

Mr. Stanley Hudecki (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Finance. In a recent speech the Premier of Alberta implied that responsibility for high interest rates can be attributed to the failure to reach an energy agreement with the federal government. Can the minister confirm or deny this theory?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, obviously one could speculate indefinitely about the causes of higher interest rates. However, I would indicate that it is the very nature of our economic system which explains that increases in interest rates are due, first and foremost, to a greater demand for money and for credit, and to all sorts of other developments occurring on the money markets.

NUCLEAR ENERGY

REQUEST FOR STUDY TO DETERMINE WHETHER INDUSTRY IS IN PUBLIC INTEREST

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister and is a different one from the others on this topic in which he was engaged earlier. A few days ago the Prime Minister defended Canada's participation in the international uranium cartel as being in the public interest, to paraphrase him somewhat. Yesterday, in a leaked document from an internal study conducted by EMR, various options to rescue and expand the atomic energy industry, which is currently suffering from terminal economics, were discussed.

Does the government have any hard evidence to prove that expansion of the nuclear industry, considering all the risks involved, is, indeed, in the so-called public interest? Will the Prime Minister assure the House that before any more nuclear reactors are imposed on the people of Canada, or any more money-losing exports are made to foreign countries, a detailed and comprehensive study will be undertaken to prove that our nuclear industry is, indeed, in the Canadian public interest?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, at present there are no plans to build new reactors in Canada. I think it will be several months, even years before decisions are made with respect to that. As far as potential exports are concerned, the hon. member is no doubt aware of the fact that we are now negotiating with various countries, namely, Korea and Roumania, for the sale of additional reactors. This would ensure the viability of our nuclear industry and would also allow us to create new jobs which would certainly benefit all Canadians.

[English]

Mr. Rose: Madam Speaker, Dr. Strangelove would have been enthusiastic about a reply of that nature.

POSSIBLE ALTERNATIVES

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Among the options offered by the EMR study to rescue the nuclear industry are the following: lowering Canada's international safeguard provisions, the milk-cow policy of building border stations to export power to the United States, and increasing federal subsidies in order to entice more provinces to build yet more nuclear reactors. Has the minister considered a no expansion policy for the atomic industry and the redirection of the hundreds of millions of dollars we are spending on this industry annually, shifting these funds into decommissioning and into waste disposal studies for the existing industry, as well as increasing encouragement incentives for conservation and a switch to alternative energy sources and technology?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, my hon. colleague probably received a watered down version of the study conducted by my officials because that was one of the options mentioned. The study was conducted by a departmental official, but, as I said, it is only a draft. We will be consulting with the industry and with those concerned, including groups opposed to nuclear power. Such consultations will take place this week and the next. Afterwards, the study will be reviewed, examined and improved and hopefully we will at some time in the future be able to make public a study which will be the final result of our consultations. Until then, however, it remains a working paper enumerating various options, of which the hon. member only gave a partial list. So I would suggest that he perhaps try to get a copy under the table somewhere.

GRAIN

COMPENSATION TO FARMERS FOR EMBARGO ON SHIPMENTS TO RUSSIA

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. It involves the promised compensation by the government to western grain producers as a result of the grain embargo which was imposed on Russia after Russia invaded Afghanistan. The Prime Minister is involved and concerned with foreign affairs, and I think rightly so. What I would like to have from the Prime Minister is his commitment that he will become involved and concerned with foreign affairs as they affect Canadian grain producers, and see that the compensation payment which has been long promised by his government is forthcoming as quickly as possible.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member talks about my involvement in foreign affairs, but he neglects to mention that we have just concluded, with the Soviet Union, the largest grain contract ever for the sale of Canadian wheat.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I do not know if members opposite are beefing because we are selling it to the Communists. Is that their point of view?

Mr. McKnight: Not true.

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member says "Not true".

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

Mr. Trudeau: The question of compensation was dealt with by myself and others in this House. We have said that when we were able to ascertain the amount of damages, damages would be paid to the western grain producers.

REQUEST THAT PAYMENTS BE EXPEDITED

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister's retort about the Russian wheat sale has absolutely nothing whatsoever to do with the question I asked. The Prime Minister should well know that the Canadian Wheat Board in this country is responsible for negotiating sales.

We have had assurances from the Minister of Agriculture that payments will be forthcoming in the next few days—that has been going on since last August. Will the Prime Minister pursue this matter? There have been studies done by the Library of Parliament and the University of Saskatchewan. Almost a year has passed since the end of the last crop year in which the compensation payments were due, and everyone agrees that there is some money due. Will the Prime Minister pursue this matter as quickly as possible to see that these compensation payments are forthcoming as quickly as possible?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member says that the recent wheat sales to the Soviet Union have nothing to do with this matter. He was the one who, in the preface to his question, raised doubts about the utility of my ventures in foreign affairs. That is why I say foreign affairs had something to do—

Mr. McDermid: He did not.

Mr. Trudeau: He did in his question. You read it. Read the "blues". That was the preface to his question.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MUNRO (HAMILTON EAST)—NEWSPAPER ARTICLE RESPECTING PURCHASE OF PETROFINA

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I have a question of privilege relating to remarks made by the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark), who talked to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), through you, Madam Speaker, about the morality of his ministers and made all sorts of innuendoes, naming me with particular reference to a Toronto Sun article this morning.

May I tell the Leader of the Official Opposition and all hon. members of this House that until I saw The Toronto Sun article this morning I did not even know of the existence of this company. I did not even know that there was such a company, and I informed the media of that fact. I have never had any dealings whatsoever with Petro-Canada stock of any kind, or Petrofina stock of any kind, either buying it, selling it, or even talking about it to anyone. That is the situation with respect to the "garbage" in The Toronto Sun this morning.

However, since we are on the subject of political morality, it is a well-known fact that Canadians appreciate the leaders of their country displaying guts and having guts. I wonder if the Leader of the Official Opposition would care to show this House and the Canadian people that he, indeed, has guts, and instead of making innuendoes of a most debasing kind, whether he would stand up in this House and make a charge and put his integrity on the line to back that up.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, on this question of privilege, let me remind the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) that his name was brought into the debate in this chamber by his leader and his Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

Some hon. Members: That's right!

Mr. Andre: Read the transcript!

Mr. Clark: May I also tell the minister that according to the general standards that I and other hon. members of this House accept, we will naturally accept his word as a minister and as an hon. member of this House as to what he has just now said arising out of a question of privilege.

The minister asks me to make a charge. Madam Speaker, I will make a charge. The charge is that this government is afraid to have a public inquiry into all elements of the Petrofina acquisition, elements which involve a significant profit being made by a company controlled by a well-known Liberal, Mr. Maurice Strong, and elements that involve a great deal of money being lost by Canadians because of the amount that they have to pay at the gas pump and elsewhere for this acquisition of Petrofina.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: I see now that I have listened to the two speakers that there is no question of privilege involved, except that the point has been made that if there is a personal charge to make, it should be made. Otherwise, the House must accept the statement of the hon. Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro). In the absence of a charge, I guess the matter must be closed.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, an article today in The Toronto Sun reports the following:

[English]

In a letter sent to former Petrofina chairman, Pierre Nadeau, Ouellet stated the investigation, while still not complete, would 'likely not' be made public.

Madam Speaker: Order, please! I understand that the hon. minister may wish to continue the debate which begun during the Oral Question Period, but unless he rises on a question of privilege concerning issues arising from the debate, I cannot allow him to pursue the matter.

Mr. Ouellet: Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which concerns me personally. During the Oral Question Period certain questions were asked by the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark), who lacked the necessary fortitude to direct a question to me personally so that I could clarify an article published in The Toronto Sun where I was quoted inaccurately.

Madam Speaker: Order, please! I do not believe that this constitutes a question of privilege. The minister would probably like to explain his position, but the Leader of the Official Opposition or another opposition member might ask a question later on. However, today, we cannot allow the debate to continue. The Oral Question Period has been over for five minutes already.

Mr. Ouellet: Madam Speaker, my question of privilege is quite simple. It was alleged that the study made by my department will not be made public, but I can confirm to the House that it will be.

Madam Speaker: I note that the minister has taken advantage of the fact that I allowed him to add to his question of privilege. He took this opportunity to announce something in the House. I am certain that hon. members will take note of this announcement and that other questions will be asked when the report is available. However, I must now put an end to what is essentially a debate.

[English]

Mr. Lawrence: Madam Speaker, if Your Honour could almost automatically turn what the minister said, which was not really a question of privilege, into a ministerial statement, then I think, in fairness, the rest of us as well would then have an opportunity to question him on something which should have been said a long time ago.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: I am no fairy who can transform things in the House into something else.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: That is entirely up to the minister.

[Translation]

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, the hon. member has just raised a very important question. There has been no statement on motions since this government was elected. Today, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) has made a statement about an issue raised during the Oral Question Period. This was not an answer because no questions were addressed to the minister. It was a policy statement, since the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) replied that he was not certain about the matter, and then the minister expressed certainty. This is clearly a statement, and I believe that under our Standing Orders, it is essential for Madam Speaker to allow hon. members to reply and to ask questions, such as whether this report will be published in the next year or the next century. This is a rather important question for the House of Commons.

Madam Speaker: The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition must recognize that I did interrupt the hon. minister as soon as I realized that he was making a statement. He had only spoken two sentences when I interrupted him. I have to have an idea about what an hon. member is saying to the House before interrupting him. I did interrupt the minister after his second sentence. I think that this time we must really put an end to this debate.

MR. STEWART—DISTRIBUTION OF QUESTIONNAIRE TO ARMED FORCES PERSONNEL

Mr. Ron Stewart (Simcoe South): Madam Speaker, I rise on what I consider something that has impeded my ability to function properly as a member of this House. On October 11, 1974, at page 343 of Hansard, the then minister of national defence, the Hon. James Richardson, stated as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I also wish to confirm in unqualified terms that any member of the Armed Forces is able to write to a member of Parliament on any subject with exactly the same freedom as any other citizen of Canada.

Apparently this is not the case in 1981. In March of this year, while carrying out my duties as member of Parliament for Simcoe South, I distributed a questionnaire in my riding and to members of the Armed Forces at Base Borden concerning a very public document, the Fyffe report. This report was brought down at the request of the then minister of national defence, my colleague the hon. member for Victoria (Mr.

McKinnon). I have since collaborated on the same type of questionnaire with the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie), who has experienced the same result.

It has been brought to my attention, Madam Speaker, that Armed Forces personnel have been ordered not to reply to this questionnaire. Despite this edict, I received almost 200 written replies, most of them signed, and dozens of telephone calls. One respondent wrote as follows:

> Service personnel are instructed not to answer this questionnaire.

A second stated as follows:

> My husband received your questionnaire at his office but was strongly instructed through a letter . . . not to answer the form.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I would appreciate it if the hon. member, rather than reading these kinds of documents to me, would give me some indication that there is an official document telling members of the Armed Forces that they cannot answer the questionnaire. I am not sure that that constitutes a question of privilege, for the hon. member at any rate. It might be a matter of privilege for members of the Armed Forces but probably not a question of privilege for a Member of Parliament.

Unless the hon. member can produce a document in order to begin exposing his question of privilege that the Armed Forces have in fact and officially been asked not to answer a questionnaire, I will not hear him any longer. If he does have some more documents that he can quote, I will listen.

Mr. Stewart: Madam Speaker, the real question is, how does one carry out one's duties if people are not allowed to answer a simple questionnaire? The reason given by the Armed Forces is the Queen's rules, which I have here. I do not think the Queen's rules should take precedence over this House and a member of Parliament doing his duty.

That is the whole point. If you find there is a prima facie case, I should like to move that this question go to the proper committee for study.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie) on the same question of privilege. I did get a notice so I will hear the hon. member.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, I wish to speak on the same question of privilege. I distributed one of these questionnaires in my riding and received a fair number of them back. They have now slowed down because a directive was issued in Winnipeg to the Armed Forces.

Your Honour said you wanted to know if there had been any official statement made to Armed Forces personnel, so I will just read this brief letter that I received from a serviceman in my riding, as follows:

> It was my every intent to respond to your questionnaire with the utmost sincerity. However, my superiors have informed me that I am forbidden from doing so according to Queen's Regulations and Orders for the Canadian Forces (QR & O), article 19.36 (2) (c) and (f). This article forbids the disclosure of information or opinion by any serving member.

That is a key point, Madam Speaker. A serviceman cannot express his opinion. The letter continues:

> As you can see, in the light of this, I am not free to communicate with you on this subject regretful as this may be. I would appreciate it very much if in the course of your discussions on this topic you would maintain confidence with regard to my name and person.
> Be assured nonetheless that I am a keen supporter of you and the fine work that you are doing on behalf of your constituents and the Parliament of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, I just thought I would put that in!

The hon. member for Simcoe South (Mr. Stewart) referred to the statement made by the then minister of national defence in 1974, that members of the Armed Forces could write to a member of Parliament "on any subject with exactly the same freedom as any other citizen of Canada."

The reason the matter was raised on October 10, 1974 was because the sitting member for Egmont obtained a newsletter issued by the then chief of defence staff to the armed services instructing personnel not to write to their members of Parliament with respect to any personal problems they might have.

There is a definite conflict here, Madam Speaker. We thought that one defence minister had cleaned up the whole matter on October 11, 1974 by saying that members of the Armed Forces could write to their member of Parliament, but the Queen's Regulations are still on the order paper when they should have been removed at that time. There is definitely a question of privilege here.

Who can give us a better opinion on the Fyffe report than members of the Armed Forces? We are very interested in having their opinion.

I think we should have a statement from the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne) to the effect that he will remove this regulation or have the subject matter referred to the defence committee so that it may be cleared up once and for all. We have two different statements from two different defence ministers or defence chiefs. I feel we have a bona fide case of privilege.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I note that you have suggested in recent days that one does not have to proceed with a question of privilege if the minister concerned is not present in the House. I would respectfully ask that you delay dealing with this matter until the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne) can come to the House, since the matter deals with government policy. There have been statements on this matter in previous Parliaments. I would ask that you defer it to another day.

An hon. Member: Why did he run out?

Mr. Collenette: I did not have any knowledge that this question was to be raised, and I believe that the Minister of National Defence did not know that it was to be raised today.

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I think the suggestion made by the parliamentary secretary is a good one. The minister was here today and so was his parliamentary secretary. I think it would be helpful if the minister were in the House and could explain the impact of the Queen's Regulations, particularly in view of the intimation as to the effect of those regulations on constituents. Naturally, you would have to wait for an explanation, but after that, as the First Commoner, you might want to look at this matter and discuss it. I have some feeling about the matter and I am going to look at some precedents myself with respect to it, because I say with respect that I think the matter may very well have an aspect of privilege to it which I would like to reserve the right to argue.

It may well be that it is the kind of thing that should be discussed by the Speaker and the minister with respect to those regulations. If there are people who have the vote but do not have the right to inform their member of Parliament so that he or she can conduct himself or herself on the floor of the House of Commons, then I think it is a rather important question going beyond merely a question of privilege.

Madam Speaker: I should like to accommodate the parliamentary secretary with respect to allowing the minister to intervene in this question of privilege, but it is so clearly not a question of privilege to me that I think I will rule immediately. I have a tendency to do that because when members insist on the presence of the minister in order to bring up their question of privilege, I have had the experience that the purpose in most cases is to turn the matter into a debate.

I have a precedent here from which I can quote. I think it will allow hon. members to agree with me that this does not constitute a prima facie case of privilege. It is a case on which Speaker Jerome ruled on February 20, 1975 and had to do with Air Canada and a labour dispute, at which time the corporation had asked its members not to answer a questionnaire. So the situation is quite similar. The then Speaker ruled that he could not extend the definition of a question of privilege to that particular circumstance, and he said as follows:

> The consequences of extending that definition of privilege to innumerable areas outside this chamber into which the work of an MP might carry him, and particularly to the great number of grievances he might encounter in the course of that work, would run contrary to the basic concept of privilege.

Speaker Jerome went on to say concerning the definition of privilege that he could not find that there had been an impediment to the member of Parliament in his work because certain members had not been allowed to answer a questionnaire.

I would say that this has to do with the administration and the rules within the Armed Forces. If hon. members feel that those rules are not helpful to them in the carrying out of their work, they should file a grievance in the appropriate place, that is to say, with the minister. This matter should be discussed with the minister either in the House or elsewhere. The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) I think was very close to admitting that it might not be a question of privilege. My judgment now is that it is not a question of privilege.

If the hon. member wants the minister to explain the rules and procedures within the Armed Forces, then I think he will recognize that can be done in the House on other occasions, that it is debate but does not constitute a prima facie case of privilege.

Mr. Taylor: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Does that ruling mean that members of the Armed Forces are second-class citizens and may not contact a member of Parliament?

Madam Speaker: No, it does not mean that.

MR. McKINNON—NOTICE OF QUESTION TO BE RAISED

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, I do not intend to speak on the substance of that question of privilege. However, one day last week I rose in my place and stated that I was going to raise a question of privilege on the following day concerning the Minister of National Defence. Yet the minister was again absent from the House. Is there any way by which either a member who feels he has had his privilege abused could warn a minister to be in the House for that specific reason and therefore expect the minister's attendance? It is well known that we must submit a letter to you, Madam Speaker, detailing the subject at issue. Is there any way by which your office could warn a minister of an impending question of privilege?

Madam Speaker: I think the hon. member is right in wanting to expose his question of privilege as much as possible when the minister is present in the House, but there is no way by which the Chair can force a minister to come into the House or to act as a messenger for members.

Notice of a question of privilege is very confidential. When I receive a statement from a member, I refer it to no one but keep it to myself. I ask for the statement because I want to prepare myself for the particular question of privilege and the ruling on it in the House. However, nothing prevents hon. members from phoning a minister's office or coming to whatever arrangement they want to with a minister. That is outside of the knowledge of the Chair and is something in which the Chair should not intervene.

MR. FORRESTALL—NOTICE OF QUESTION TO BE RAISED

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, I would not wish to comment in any way upon the ruling which you have just rendered for our benefit. However, I would like to serve notice, because the question of privilege, with all deference, I think has been misconstrued. The matter has been dealt with in this chamber. If I am incorrect in that, then at least it has been dealt with in committee. However, I will refresh my memory about it.

At a later time, then, I will rise on a question of privilege. It does not necessarily affect my privilege beyond that with which you have already dealt; I accept that. Nevertheless, it does indeed affect the privilege of 87,000 men and women who are not allowed to communicate, which gives rise to a question of privilege. I appreciate that you have put it in one context, but I reserve the right to view it in an other context.

Madam Speaker: I am sure the hon. member realizes that some 80,000 members of the Armed Forces do not participate in the privileges as defined relating to members of Parliament. Those are two different matters. If the hon. member does have a question of privilege based on something else, I can hear him at another time. He does not have to give me oral notice but should send me a statement in writing.

MR. KNOWLES—NOTICE OF POINT TO BE RAISED

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, it was my intention to raise a point of order this afternoon with respect to something which happened during the adjournment debate last night. However, the two ministers who are involved, although they were here, are not now in the chamber. I simply wish to reserve the right to raise the point at a later date.

PRIVILEGE

MR. COSSITT—ALLEGED INTERFERENCE WITH VISITING GROUPS TOURING PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Madam Speaker, my question of privilege arises from an incident which occurred in the Centre Block of the Parliament Buildings yesterday, June 1. May I briefly relate the incident as quickly as I can and then proceed to state quickly how it interferes with my privileges and with the privileges of other members of this House.

At approximately 2.30 p.m. yesterday a group of school children were being escorted through this building by a summer student tour guide, who I understand is a very competent person. Her name is Lorraine Séguin, whose home I believe is in the electoral district of Timiskaming in northern Ontario. Suddenly, a man who had been accompanying the group, without identifying himself to anyone as a senior employee of the House of Commons, threw his hands up in the air and commenced to harangue the guide who was addressing the group in French. Apparently this group was predominantly French-speaking. Miss Séguin is quite competent both in the French language and in the English language. In front of all of these people, the man in question reportedly said to her: "What you say is not true. Your French is no good. You do not know what you are talking about. I will remember you after this is over."

Those present were not only embarrassed but shocked. The exhibition was not a credit to the House of Commons. It was certainly not a credit to the competent people who work within the House. The official involved was a man by the name of Jean-Noël Tremblay who, I understand, holds the position of Director of Public Relations for the House of Commons. This is a position I did not know existed, nor have I ever heard of a competition being held for it. He is a former Progressive Conservative member of this House, which I readily admit. He is also a former member of the Union Nationale cabinet in Quebec.

Having led into this question of privilege by describing the incident which interfered with the performance of the guide's duties, I point out that there were other groups in the building at the time. One of these groups was from my constituency. There were other groups here who, I am sure, were from constituencies of other members. It has always been the privilege of a member of the House of Commons to invite or to host groups who are visiting these premises and to see that they are courteously treated and advised of what goes on here—

Madam Speaker: Order. It seems to me that the hon. member is complaining about an incident which took place between two employees of the House of Commons. The hon. member should know that a matter such as that should not be raised in the House. Rather, he should write to me or talk to me in my office so that proper redress can be taken, if such redress is necessary. It is certainly not a question that should be discussed in the House.

I hear the hon. member, but I ask him what other question of privilege is there? The hon. member must very quickly tell me what the privilege is. Members can still bring groups to the House of Commons. There are occasions when some discourtesy is displayed but we always try to correct it.

Mr. Cossitt: Madam Speaker, I will state my question of privilege very briefly. One of our privileges as members of Parliament is to bring groups to the Parliament Buildings, and we are permitted to help school children learn about the Government of Canada. I related the incident first simply to show what happened so I could go on to explain my question of privilege. A group from my riding was interfered with in that they could not proceed until this incident was over. I know there were other groups interfered with. Certainly the group involved was interfered with.

Could you give us some idea by way of clarification as to what on earth this Jean Noel Tremblay was doing in the House of Commons? I have not heard of his being hired either through an announcement or anything else, yet he is called the Director of Public Relations. Yesterday he interfered with a group which, in my opinion, was very bad public relations—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member wants to come to my office, I will give him full details of whatever functions people in the House occupy. I am telling the hon. member that this does not constitute a question of privilege, although he is relating it to the functions of a member. I said before that one has to distinguish between the essential functions of a member of Parliament and other functions he might choose to perform but which do not qualify to be called essential functions.

● (1530)

It is very desirable that groups be brought to the House of Commons to visit Parliament. It is an excellent education. I do everything I can to make the tours interesting for our visitors. I try to do everything in my power to facilitate those tours. If something went wrong, I would be glad to look into it. I assure the hon. member I will take the proper redress, if redress must be taken.

WAYS AND MEANS

TABLING OF NOTICES OF MOTIONS RESPECTING PETROLEUM ADMINISTRATION ACT

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I wish to table two notices of Ways and Means Motions to amend the Petroleum Administration Act.

[English]

Mr. Wilson: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order in connection with the notice of a ways and means motion just tabled by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde). Over the past year a somewhat questionable practice has crept into the activities of the House. On four or possibly five occasions the minister introduced as a ways and means motion a levy which was in fact a tax. I raise this at this time because, by doing it in this manner, there is no opportunity for those on this side of the House to question the minister as to the nature of the tax and the necessity for it.

I believe the minister owes the House an explanation. As I understand it from the calculations I have done, the various means which the government has at its disposal for financing the cost of the subsidy to maintain a single price for energy in this country have provided the government with a surplus of $250 million. Therefore, there is no basis at this time for introducing an additional tax which would further supplement that $250 million surplus.

It is important that the minister stand in his place and make comments as to why it is necessary to introduce this tax at this time. The minister should state why it is necessary to impose this on the Canadian people at this time and explain the future direction this tax will take.

Madam Speaker: I refer the hon. member to Standing Order 60(1) which reads:

A notice of a Ways and Means motion may be laid upon the Table of the House at any time during a sitting by a Minister of the Crown,—

That is exactly what has happened. The Standing Order continues:

—but such a motion may not be proposed in the same sitting.

The minister has done exactly what the Standing Order requires him to do. Therefore, I cannot accept the hon. member's point of order.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 2,083, 2,216, 2,300, 2,332, 2,406 and 2,471.

FEDERAL SALES TAX ON UNIVERSITY PURCHASES

Question No. 2,083—Mr. Gilchrist:

1. Has the government considered the request of the Canadian Association of University Teachers to abolish federal sales tax on all university purchases rather than continuing the present practice of only allowing an exemption on certain items used directly in teaching and research and, if not, for what reasons?

2. Will the government, in consultation with manufacturers and user groups, establish a list of chemicals available from Canadian production in order to allow all others duty-free entry into Canada thus avoiding the need to create a huge bureaucracy to consider the merits of each individual chemical which financially penalize university research and, if not, for what reasons?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)):

1. The Excise Tax Act now provides relief from the federal sales tax for a range of goods designed for use directly in teaching and research. Extending relief to all goods acquired by educational institutions would entail a significant revenue cost and thus does not appear feasible given the current fiscal position of the government. As well, an extension to all goods would be difficult to administer.

2. This issue has been and continues to be the subject of extensive discussions between representatives of universities, manufacturers and government departments. There are several Canadian manufacturers who specialize in the production of fine chemicals for laboratory use. It has been estimated that these producers are in a position to supply approximately 90 per cent, by value, of the chemicals purchased by universities for use directly in teaching or research. The remaining 10 per cent is made up of several thousands of different chemicals, most of which are used only in very small volumes by universities. It would be very costly for customs officials to check each individual importation against a list of chemicals available in Canada to determine whether it should be allowed duty-free entry or whether it should be subject to duty. Officials are now working with representatives of the Canadian Association of University Business Officers to identify specific chemicals not available in Canada on which the duty would represent a substantial cost to the universities. When these have been identified, action will be taken to provide for their duty-free entry under the Chemicals and Plastics Tariff Reduction Order.

HORIZON INSULATION LIMITED

Question No. 2,216—Mr. Miller:

1. Did Horizon Insulation Limited insulate any homes under CHIP and, if so, how many?

2. Were cheques issued by CHIP to home owners endorsed over to Horizon Insulation Limited and, if so, how many and what was their value?

3. How many homes insulated by the company were inspected by CMHC and how many were judged to comply with CMHC standards?

4. (a) How many bags of insulation were used in the homes by the company and what square footage was to be covered (b) did the amount of insulation used for the square footage comply with CMHC standards?

5. Were payments made to the home owners before the work was completed by the company and, if so, was this acceptable under CHIP provisions?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works):

I am advised by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation as follows:

1. Yes but the exact number is not available.

2, 3, 4 and 5. The computer system is not programmed to provide this information. The information could only be obtained through a manual check of the over 950,000 CHIP applications approved since the inception of the program. The labour costs involved in such a task would be prohibitive.

GOVERNMENT'S FISCAL YEAR

Question No. 2,300—Mr. Halliday:

For what reason does the government's fiscal year run from April 1 to March 31, rather than from January 1 to December 31?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): The fiscal years are chosen for reasons of administrative convenience. The federal government's fiscal year end was changed from June 30 to March 31 in 1906 after Parliament began sitting for a longer period each year. This change, to March 31, made it possible to prepare the public accounts for tabling while the House was still in session. There have been no convincing reasons put forward since that date to warrant changing the fiscal year end to another date. It is not uncommon for the fiscal year of governments to differ from the calendar year. All provincial governments in Canada, and many governments of other industrialized countries, have chosen fiscal years which differ from the calendar year.

DOT—PURCHASE OF MOBILE HOME

Question No. 2,332—Mr. Stewart:

1. Did the Department of Transport purchase a mobile home valued at $42,390 from City Motors, Corner Brook, Newfoundland and, if so, for what purpose?

2. Were public tenders called and, if so, what firms or companies submitted bids and what was the amount in each case?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services):

1. A contract in the amount of $42,390 was awarded by the Department of Supply and Services to City Motors, Corner Brook, Newfoundland, on behalf of the Department of Transport for the supply of two mobile homes to be used as housing accommodation at Deer Lake, Nfld.

2. No. However bids (requests for proposals) were solicited from 13 firms listed on official Departmental Source Lists. In response to this solicitation three firms submitted bids and the details are as follows:

(i) City Motors (Nfld) Ltd., Corner Brook Nfld. $21,195 each.

(ii) Lush Ltd., St. John's Nfld.—bid on two models:

(a) $22,835 each;

(b) $23,415 each.

(iii) Williams Mobile Homes Ltd., Gould, Nfld.—$25,800 each.

CMHC—PUBLIC HOUSING SUBSIDY COSTS

Question No. 2,406—Mr. Herbert:

1. By province, what was the amount paid by the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation in the last year for which figures are available for all ongoing operating subsidy costs for public housing?

2. What number of units were subsidized in each province?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works):

I am advised by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation as follows: see list below.

DND—SED SYSTEMS INC. CONTRACT

Question No. 2,471—Mr. McKinnon:

Did the Department of National Defence award a $386,390 contract to SED Systems Inc. for design and fabrication of the Canadian Mission Control Centre for the SARSAT program and, if so, on what date and at what location will the Centre be built?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services):

The Department of Supply and Services placed a $386,390 contract on behalf of the Department of National Defence for the design and fabrication of the Canadian Mission Control Centre for the SARSAT program.

The delivery date of the Canadian Mission Control Centre is February 10, 1982.

The control centre which is the computer based SARSAT system controller, is to be delivered and installed in the Rescue Co-ordination Centre at CFB Trenton, Astra, Ontario.

Mr. Collenette: I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

EXCISE TAX ACT AND EXCISE ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed, from Thursday, May 28, consideration of Bill C-57, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, and motions Nos. 1 and 3 (Mr. Blenkarn).

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes I have left in the time allotted to me, I want to bring to the attention of the House the fact that I take exception to the statement by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) that he is trying to keep down the cost of oil and gas in Canada and that Canadians are enjoying a cheaper price than people in other parts of the world. Naturally they are to a degree because the province of Alberta is prepared to grant that concession. Nevertheless, there are two or three points that have to be made.

Canadians must be aware of the cost of this subsidy, this one-price system across Canada. The federal government is paying out $3.6 billion each year for this subsidy so that there will be this one price across Canada. This works out to approximately $150 per person, or $600 per family. Normally a family is referred to as four persons, which seems reasonable. With each family paying $600 a year to provide that subsidy, plus additional taxes, over a four-year period that works out to approximately $4,500. It is one of those instances where the minister has not been honest with the Canadian people. When you consider that the people are taxed three and a half cents a gallon for Petrofina, plus the oil subsidy, it will cost them about $4,500 over four years. The Canadian people should be aware of that.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on Bill C-57, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act to provide for a revenue tax with respect to petroleum and gas. I rise to express my concern over the provisions in this bill which will raise the excise tax on beer and ale products far ahead of the relative tax increases on hard liquor.

I understand this tax will increase 29 per cent for beer, 155 per cent for wine and 6 per cent for hard liquor. This government's economic policies and tax policies are enough to drive anyone to drink. However, if the Canadian public is going to turn to drinking, the situation should be improved so that there will be more of a concession for soft liquor rather than hard liquor. As a result of the extra cost of the excise tax, the transportation of beer and so on, the average worker will be forced to change his style of drinking from beer to hard liquor.

As we know, the brewery industry creates a lot of employment. I would like to relate the figures for British Columbia. The B.C. beer industry employs directly 1,160 people, the B.C. winery employs 309 and the B.C. distillers 389 people. It is obvious that the beer industry employs almost twice as many people, to say nothing of those employed by related industries, including return of bottles and other activities connected with serving beer.

Everyone knows that beer is the drink of the working people. The working people expect to be able to relate more to soft liquors than hard liquors. It seems to me that only the Canadian government would adopt a policy changing the emphasis from soft liquor to hard liquor, a policy which encourages people to use hard liquor rather than soft liquor. The government appears to be doing this by placing a heavy tax burden on beer drinkers in Canada and a lesser tax burden on those who drink hard liquor. I think this is wrong, and I am sure we will increase social problems if we allow this kind of taxation to take place. People will turn to the use of hard liquor and we will see an increase in related problems, including drinking and driving and more alcoholism.

I should like to make a few comments based on a study which has already been carried out. It indicates that we have already seen the impact of this change in consumer drinking habits. Since the change was announced last April, hard liquor sales have increased by nearly 5 per cent while beer sales have dropped off 3.6 per cent and wine sales have decreased at least 2 per cent. I suggest this pattern will have an effect on the health of Canadians and increase traffic dangers because of an increase in alcoholism.

It is important to note that beer is the traditional drink of the average working Canadian. We cannot overemphasize that fact. I would urge the government to reconsider this bill before us because it will result in heavier taxation of the working people of Canada, which in turn will change their drinking habits.

The impact of this measure on the agricultural sector will also be severe. Some 63 per cent of agricultural products used by the liquor industry in Canada is used by the brewery industry. If this trend in decreasing beer sales continues, there will be a very severe impact on the producers of hops who supply the breweries. We can ill afford to see this decrease in our agricultural base.

We should be encouraging people to produce more agricultural products and to increase our agricultural base, particularly those who supply our brewery industry which uses such a significant amount of agricultural produce. Last year brewery purchases of agricultural products amounted to almost $100 million.

How much harder can we hit the working people? We are increasing costs to the brewery industry not only by increasing taxes, but also through the increase in the cost of energy and the cost of transporting their products in this province and throughout Canada.

Let me also comment on the indexation formula in this bill. It is the government's intention to increase indexation automatically without having to come back for parliamentary approval. That is not good enough. We do not want to see any increase in taxes without parliamentary approval. The fact that this government intends to index taxation on an ongoing, automatic basis without having to come back to Parliament for consideration and debate, and without allowing representatives of the industry to point out the difficulties such an increase will have, is something I do not think any member of Parliament should allow to happen.

It is difficult enough to try to make changes when we are allowed to consider and debate a taxation measure, but to allow indexing of taxation to take place automatically, with its consequential impact on the brewery industry, or on any other industry, without bringing a bill before Parliament for debate is unacceptable. We do not agree with that aspect of this measure.

The second part of our amendment would eliminate all taxes on liquor as proposed in this bill. We are saying the government should go back to the drawing board and come up with a tax system which will discourage increased use of hard liquor and encourage growth of the Canadian brewery industry. If it is the intention of people to drink alcoholic products, we would like to see them drink soft liquors. Our taxation system should be directed to making it easier for working people to drink soft liquors rather than hard liquors, which appears now to be the trend. We feel this is right because of the effect to use of hard liquor can have on the individual and because of the increase in social problems within the family, within the community and throughout Canada.

It has been a privilege to speak on this bill, Mr. Speaker. Thank you very much.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add some comments to the debate on this bill. In particular, I want to speak to the amendments which deal with the definition of "manufacturing". I want to demonstrate to members what happens when definitions are loose and imprecise, and when bureaucrats decide to play games with definitions such as that of manufacturing.

In 1977 a Toronto-based entrepreneur decided to become a manufacturer of bicycles. The company involved was long established in the bicycle trade. The management and senior staff could be classed as experts on bicycles. The company was started by Harry D. Shields and it bore his name as a limited liability private corporation. Mr. Shields, Sr. had retired from active participation in the business and the company was being managed and operated by his son Lorne Shields, who had grown up in the business, so to speak. He would be considered an expert in the Canadian market and in the sourcing of bicycles and components from suppliers anywhere in the world.

At the time of the events I am going to relate the bicycle manufacturing industry in Canada was in serious condition. The largest manufacturer, CCM, had posted several years of losses and the owners believed the company would not survive if some tariff protection was not put in place. After a hearing before the Anti-dumping Tribunal a tariff was placed against bicycles manufactured in South Korea and Taiwan.

Mr. Shields' knowledge of the Canadian market alerted him to the possibility that the Anti-dumping Tribunal would bring down a decision against imported bicycles from Taiwan and South Korea. He made a basic decision, sir, to become a manufacturer of bicycles. He set about organizing his venture. He leased a plant, acquired machinery and began assembling a staff to get production off the ground.

In manufacturing, if you are large enough you can design a product, build a prototype, test it, source components, place orders to subcontractors for some of those components and begin to manufacture. That is the textbook approach.

In Lorne Shields' case he knew the market because he had been in it for years. He knew he could sell all the bicycles he could make, so his task was to get hold of that market first and then search around for Canadian components after he had a good hold on the market. Like most manufacturers, his market sense told him it would be more profitable if he could ship from the end of his production line to his customers rather than build to inventory. He had pre-sold a year's production on this basis.

With all the excitement and pressure to get his operation off the ground, Mr. Shields had not reckoned with the bureaucracy of the Department of National Revenue. There has been an ongoing debate between Revenue Canada and the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce regarding the difference between manufacturing, assembling, processing and producing. If we go through the numerous statutes, we will find a variety of definitions which are usually qualified by the words "for the purposes of the act". If we go through the rulings of the Supreme Court of Canada, the appeal courts of the provinces, the Tariff Board and the Anti-dumping Tribunal, we will see this same pattern recurring regarding mix-ups and misunderstandings of definitions.

If we pursue the matter further through regulations and rulings, we will find another maze of meanings which could be shaded, tilted, twisted or made to stick merely by adding the words "for the purposes of the act". For example, if the words "for the purposes of the act" were put in, we could say that all apples are oranges—and that is just about the way some things happen.

Some rulings have no statutory or regulatory authority. They are departmental rulings whose authorities are ministerial memos. This is where Lorne Shields ran afoul of Revenue Canada. Mr. Shields called himself a manufacturer. Revenue Canada's excise division called him a manufacturer of bicycles and gave him an excise tax licence. He was allowed to import $100,000 worth of production equipment duty-free because it was to be used to manufacture bicycles. The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce said he was a manufacturer and allowed him to label the product "Made in Canada". Canada Manpower gave him a $15,000 grant to teach new employees to manufacture bicycles. Statistics Canada considered Lorne Shields a sporting goods manufacturer. The Ontario department of labour classed him as a manufacturer.

But Mr. Shields had not reckoned with a National Revenue dominion customs appraiser, Mr. John Peillard, who was doing his job. Mr. Peillard decided that Mr. Shields was an assembler of bicycles and thereby levied a 17.5 per cent duty on all parts he imported for his bicycles. In spite of the fact that all Mr. Shields' competitors were importing the same components duty free, Mr. Shields could not get Mr. Peillard to move from his decision. Mr. Peillard said that there was a ruling that 20 per cent Canadian content had to be evident before Mr. Shields could call himself a manufacturer. But he did not show the ruling to Mr. Shields. It was written, he said, in a ministerial memo, and that memo was confidential.

I told hon. members that I believe Mr. Shields had pre-sold a year's production based on an existing tariff under which manufacturers imported components duty free. To confound the matter further, it would have been possible, believe it or not, to import a complete bicycle at 16.5 per cent, and yet the components were bearing a 17.5 per cent duty. However, Mr. Shields' plan was to increase his Canadian content gradually as his market grew. He could offer subcontractors sufficient volumes to warrant tooling for certain components.

An uncontrollable hidden factor was foreign exchange. The dollar was unstable against most European and Asian currencies, but Shields did not know that was to play a part in the calculation of the 20 per cent Canadian content. If the dollar went down, the Canadian content would decline. Revenue Canada could then collect 17.5 per cent, assuming he reached the 20 per cent. So aside from competition in the marketplace, all the problems of starting up a manufacturing company, training people, arranging financing and so forth, Mr. Shields had to deal with a confidential ruling, the contents of which could not be revealed to him, which would add a 17.5 per cent duty to several components he used in the manufacture of his product. The Revenue Canada official told him that the ruling was in a ministerial memo which was confidential. He could not see the memo, he could be told only the gist of it; but even if Mr. Shields was able to prove Canadian content, he still had to contend with the Canadian dollar. A drop in the dollar would cause the tariff to be imposed.

There was a further penalty. The Revenue Canada official had the final say as to what constituted 20 per cent Canadian content. For instance, he would not allow freight, overhead, packaging or profit to be part of the cost.

In a country which is crying out for manufacturing and which has a terrible current account and balance of payments problem, can hon. members believe that a manufacturer would, could or should have to jump through these hoops in order to do business?

Of course, the result of the imposition of the 17.5 per cent duty on the imported components of Mr. Shields' bicycles meant that a calculated profit became a loss. Customs duties of $310,000 meant that on every bicycle produced money was lost. After a period of time Mr. Shields' bankers decided they could no longer finance the operation. Applications were made by Mr. Shields to the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce for assistance under the enterprise development program, but they came to nothing because the EDP had already mounted a $7.5 million rescue mission respecting CCM. What Mr. Shields did not know was that part of the deal was that the program would not fund an operation competing with CCM.

As Mr. Shields twisted and dangled on the bureaucratic string, various government departments were sealing his fate. He appealed to the then minister of national revenue, who is now a senator in the other place. The then minister saw the injustice. He could see that an even-handed approach to the problem was not being taken. He told Mr. Shields he would sort out the details and write to him. After numerous telephone calls to the minister, Shields received a letter prepared by the bureaucracy over the minister's signature which told him that no help would be forthcoming. The $310,000 customs duty had done its job. Seeing no relief, the banks placed Harry D. Shields Limited in receivership.

Lorne Shields was not finished, however. He launched an appeal to the Tariff Board and, some 20 months later, the board heard his case. I recommend that everyone read this case. It is appeal No. 1498 and was heard October 8 and 9 of 1979. The Tariff Board ruled that there was no regulatory or statutory basis for the 20 per cent Canadian content, and Revenue Canada had to refund the duties levied against Mr. Shields' company. What that meant was that $230,000 was sent to the receiver in bankruptcy, and a further $80,000 in customs duties was cancelled. But it was too late. Harry D.

Shields Limited was closed. It was bankrupt. Approximately one hundred people lost their jobs. Several suppliers went unpaid, and the tragedy is that an enterprise which came out of the shoot alive and kicking was to die because of the stupidity and rigidity of the bureaucracy. Somebody decided that CCM would live and that Harry D. Shields would be strangled in the web of the bureaucracy.

What happened to Lorne Shields? He lost his business. In order to live he sold most of his personal assets. He had a nervous breakdown. His father had a stroke which the doctors say was a direct result of stress and the bankruptcy of the business. The Department of National Revenue held $230,000 of Lorne Shields' money for more than two years. The government used that money. When the Tariff Board said there was no statutory or regulatory basis for collecting the $230,000, the government returned the money, but no interest was paid. It was just a cheque in an envelope.

We hear much in this House about justice, about helping those who cannot help themselves, about the just society, about participatory democracy and about a charter of rights. Well, just ask Lorne Shields how he feels about those cheap slogans which were born in an advertising office to adorn a speech or an election platform but, when put to the test, were cold and meaningless.

To Lorne Shields, there is no democracy in Canada. If a bureaucrat decides you are to be taxed, you are taxed whether it is legal or not. Lorne Shields learned that we are not all equal. If your business has loans guaranteed by the government, then you are more equal than a competitor who does not have those guarantees.

To the government, the competition policy means that the government eliminates competition from those who might challenge a company with loans guaranteed by the government, as they did with Harry D. Shields Ltd. And what happened to Mr. Peillard, the Dominion Customs appraiser? He was transferred to the electrical industry sector. One hundred people lost their jobs.

This is not, Mr. Speaker, an isolated case. There are many more people who have been turned off by imprecise definitions that vary from statute to statute, regulation to regulation. That is why I urge the government members to support our amendments and then follow through by placing the definitions of "manufacturing", "assembling", "processing" and "producing" before the committee of this House for resolution. Let us make a move against the bureaucracy so we will not have a repeat of the Lorne Shields affair.

There are untold numbers of businessmen in Canada who live in fear of the government bureaucracy. Those businessmen and thousands more who will follow them are part of the solution to the economic problem we face. They are part of the solution to the unemployment problem. More than one million unemployed Canadians want that problem solved.

Businessmen who live in fear of the bureaucracy will tell you horror stories. When I asked some of them: "Why do you not speak out?" one of them replied: "Look, I do not want a tax job done on me". That is pretty shattering. When I tried to establish that is not the way Revenue Canada operates, this is what they replied: "Those guys have all the definitions and regulations and rulings, and they twist and turn them to suit the statutes and regulations". And then he went on the say: "For example, take the term 'manufacturing' "—the very thing we are talking about today. You see, Mr. Speaker, it comes back from many sources. If the government believes that a competitive market serves the consumer best, it will take a new look at many of the regulations and procedures.

When the bureaucracy acts in such a way that it makes loans, grants or loan guarantees to one industry and then hassles that industry's competitors, it effectively eliminates any choice for the consumer, and that is what happened to Lorne Shields. He knew the market, he knew what would sell, he was trying to serve that market but he was frustrated in his endeavours.

There are many ways to handle the situation. The government could have said, as they did to the automobile industry, "Here is your Canadian content; we want a commitment from you that you will increase the Canadian component value on a schedule so that you will work toward an increasing Canadian content over a period of time". However, regardless of the method, it must be evenhanded. There is a constant battle over tariff rules and interpretations. You might recall a few months ago a number of businessmen from Manitoba descended on Ottawa because they had to pay a higher rate of duty on automotive products in their part of Canada than did businessmen in the same trade in Ontario. And this was just the result of an interpretation by people at the port of entry.

I have put forward to the members of the government a proposal that they do not support the change in the definition of "manufacturing", that they urge the minister to withdraw this section and refer it to a standing committee of this House, and that we begin to sort out the definitions of "manufacturing", "assembling", "processing" and "producing". You see, Mr. Speaker, I have confidence that we in this House have sufficient talent on all sides to solve this problem. I would like us to do that and to hand it back to the bureaucracy with the intruction that these are the definitions that they must use, and to get on with it.

In conclusion, let me say there are those who believe that there are two continuous struggles in this country. One is between the political parties whose ideology may differ, and there is an opportunity, as we know, to sort that out at election time. However, the real battle is between the government bureaucracy and the elected representatives of the people, and that is the battle we all must begin to fight. The bureaucracy is best served when the political battle is hot and when the party in power has a passive back bench.

I have issued the challenge, Mr. Speaker, to the government members. Now let us see if they are equal to the challenge and the task.

Excise Tax

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, as you know, under our House order of last Friday there will be two deferred votes this evening on Bill C-61. I am sorry, it is one deferred vote on Bill C-61. As a result of discussions between the parties, it has been agreed that that vote will be taken at 9.45 p.m. instead of ten o'clock.

Mr. Kempling: Yes, Mr. Speaker, we have had discussions and we concur that the vote will be taken at 9.45 p.m.

Mr. Knowles: Yes, Mr. Speaker, it was agreed that the vote be deferred to a time to be set by the House leaders and we have agreed on 9.45 p.m. I do not object to two votes being taken but I think that technically only one vote was set for tonight.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member is perfectly correct; one vote at 9.45 p.m. tonight.

[English]

EXCISE TAX ACT AND EXCISE ACT

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-57, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, and motions Nos. 1 and 3 (Mr. Blenkarn).

Hon. Bud Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, when the debate on report stage of this bill began, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) made what I thought was a good suggestion, given the number of amendments we have, namely that we consider the report stage as something like almost a second reading and then carry on with the vote. I do not know whether I have missed something in the interim, but it seems to me that seems to be the policy we are following. I do not know what the quid pro quo is. The other problem that you have is that if I have an amendment, and I happen to have one—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The House is debating the first and third amendment which by decision of the Speaker are grouped for debate.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Mr. Speaker, I am greatly saddened by many parts of Bill C-57, to amend the Excise Tax Act. Time does not permit me to expose all of the almost punitive provisions that are contained in this act. However, I will focus in on one of the greediest parts of the bill.

I should say at the outset that I am astounded by the lack of feeling and understanding shown by the Liberal government in its attempt to index taxes on beer, wine and spirits. By no means am I suggesting that the Liberal government has probably driven thousands of Canadians to drink—maybe it has. Rather, my message is that the Liberals are discriminating against those Canadians who do like to partake every once in a while. With this new and unprecedented indexing of taxes on beer, wines and spirits, Canadians can expect to pay up to $23.64 for a case of beer. This is a disgraceful increase of close to 160 per cent. Not only does the government seem to want to drive the cost of everyday goods and services up and up, but it also appears to want to soak Canadians for every penny it can get.

The government has been hearing a great deal lately from the opposition about inflation; and well they should. Inflation at 12.6 per cent, a new modern day record, is not a record that the Liberals should be proud of. The problem is, however, that the Grits seem bent on stimulating, not slowing down, this rapid climb toward world fame and lack of fortune. What does this mean for the average working Canadian? It means their dollar buys about one third as much as it did in 1971. They must pay about 7 per cent more for normal borrowing privileges than they had to pay when the Conservatives were in power. They have to pay about 60 cents more per gallon for gasoline and they are paying 15.2 per cent more just to eat than they had to pay last year. Now the Liberals are asking average Canadians to turn their pockets inside out and empty them just to buy a bottle of beer. When are the Grits going to get off the backs of the little guy and girl? That is a good question and I will give some of the answers right now.

The Liberals only have one solution to their years and years of overspending. They must raise more revenues to pay for their blank cheque spending habits. They will force average Canadians to fork over more and more money through a hidden tax which will be tacked on year after year, with no parliamentary say or control over it, and this is a very dangerous precedent.

The finance minister has said that the tax to be applied to this "all-beverage" class is simply a percentage tax and is therefore like many other levies imposed by the government. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this is a percentage tax. It is not, as the minister has claimed in this House, an ad valorem tax. In the strict sense an ad valorem tax is a constant percentage of the total sale price which is tacked on year after year. This percentage tax is changed only after all-party consultation and parliamentary voting has taken place.

This new scheme which is being deviously plotted by the Liberals would result in a submerged tax which would be indexed to the CPI rate of the all-beverage group. This means that whenever the price of production, the price of raw materials, the price of marketing, or any other price indicator, goes up by a certain percentage, the tax on the beverage will go up by a corresponding amount. This will amount to a piling on of taxes and, eventually, will probably force one of the government's main income earners out of business.

Indexation does not necessarily have to be a bad thing. For example, indexation of personal income tax was introduced at the request of Mr. Robert Stanfield to protect taxpayers from inflation and to attempt to instil in the government better fiscal management and discipline. The government was not to profit from inflation by automatically collecting higher revenues from people because they obtained cost of living increases to keep up with inflation. By indexing personal income tax the government forced itself to manage the economy better, so that it could collect more revenue based on real wage gains. As members know, the government has been trying hard to do away with indexation of personal income tax and we in the official opposition have been trying to stop it.

By indexing taxes on spirits the government is managing to do exactly the opposite of what indexation of personal income tax is doing. It is taking advantage of a formula which is meant to protect the consumer against inflation and fiscal mismanagement. Through the indexation of taxes on goods the government can not only protect its revenues but will be taxing people on inflation and doing it without referring the matter to Parliament. It will also be creating a thicker smokescreen which will hide from public scrutiny its lack of policies to fight inflation.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) has said that this is just another percentage tax. I would like to tell the minister something of the percentages ordinary Canadians must work with now. When citizens want to buy a home—something about which every Canadian has dreamed but because of Liberal policies will probably never achieve—they must pay close to 20 per cent mortgage rates. Those people who are renewing their two, four or five-year mortgages will be stampeded into paying twice as much per month as they paid in the past. If they are overwhelmed by this excess burden they must sell their dream home or have the banks foreclose on them. This has been the case in Toronto recently, where over 3,000 people have been literally booted out of their homes because of high interest rates. It is no wonder ordinary Canadians need the odd drink just to settle their nerves. But now the Grits will deny them that choice, too.

Here is another percentage for the Minister of Finance to ponder awhile. Since 1960 bankruptcies have gone up by a totally unacceptable 758 per cent. These numbers do not even include businesses which collapsed but did not make use of the Bankruptcy Act, those which were placed in receivership, liquidated by secured creditors, or those which simply closed up shop because they could no longer cope. It is no wonder thousands of workers and a multitude of businesses are fleeing for their financial lives to the United States.

I should add here that this financial bastion for Canadian businesses may soon be closing its doors. This, of course, is due to the preferential treatment given to Canadian firms over American firms in the National Energy Program. The Liberals are causing a backlash in the United States which will begin taking its toll on Canadian firms shortly if the energy program is not abandoned soon. The end result will be that Canadian firms will have no place left to go. They will have migrated to the United States where the economic and political climate is more favourable. They will be stifled there, too, because American firms in Canada have received such a beating from the Liberal government. This is reciprocity in quite a different form, for which we only have the Grits to blame.

I would like to return to the matter of bankruptcies for a moment. There have been some 27,000 personal bankruptcies since the beginning of 1980. How can the Liberals even think of adding insult to injury by putting beer, wine and spirit prices out of reach? What other commodity will they try to index in the future?

It seems that the Liberals are desperate for cash. Only now do they realize that they have grossly overstepped their spending bounds. Only now do they realize that the Progressive Conservative Party was perfectly right in its policy of reducing the NDP-Liberal created deficit. Only now will the Liberal party attempt to cut their expenditures to an acceptable level.

Now, though, they are using every and any means they can to extort money from the average Canadian. This money grabbing begins at the provincial level where the Grits are trying to finagle profits made on resources by western provinces through new equalization schemes. Of course, the provinces quickly saw through this federal ploy and they are fighting tooth and nail to save their new-found riches. Therefore, the Grits have once again created division in the country. First, there was the Constitution, then the National Energy Program and now there is the equalization scheme. Along the way they batter average Canadians by imposing hidden taxes on beverages.

The money grabbing continues. We see in this bill new taxes on oil and gas. The devastating effects that these new taxes will have on the oil and gas sector, as well as on the energy service sector, have been excellently explained by many of my colleagues in the debate yesterday and in the debate on this bill on Tuesday last. Therefore, I will restrict my comments to motion 22 in this bill.

At the outset of my remarks I described the indexation of taxes as being discriminatory. It is not discriminatory simply because of its adverse effects on the average working Canadian, but also because of the way it applies to the various items in the all-beverage subgroup.

During committee hearings the Minister of Finance entertained briefs from the Brewers Association of Canada. These briefs showed clearly that the result of excise levies introduced in April, 1980 was to initiate a swing from beer and wine to hard liquor. This is clearly demonstrated by facts and figures. The annual percentage change in sales for beer, wine and distilled spirits between 1974 and 1980 was 1.7 per cent, 8.3 per cent and 3.3 per cent respectively. After the announcement of the excise levies in 1980 the percentage change in sales for the April, 1980 to January, 1981 period was negative 3.6 per cent for beer, negative 1.8 per cent for wine and positive 4.6 per cent for spirits. During the committee hearings the minister said it was neither his intention nor his job to influence the alcoholic beverage choice of Canadians. Nonetheless, the effect of his April, 1980 announcement was to discourage the consumption of beer and wine in favour of the consumption of hard liquor, as can be seen in the figures I have quoted.

As you will recall, Mr. Speaker, the April, 1980 announcements included sharp and unprecedented excise levy increases of 29 per cent for beer and 155 per cent for wine, compared with a nominal increase of only 6 per cent for distilled spirits. The result was substantially to reduce the relative tax burden on distilled spirits compared to beer. If the unintentional shift in consumption choices from beer to distilled spirits is to be corrected, then the traditional relationship should be restored by increasing the levy on distilled spirits by a proportionate amount. If the shift in consumption from low to high alcoholic content beverages is not reversed, the economic impact on the brewing industry and on agricultural producers who depend on the brewing industry will be severe. In addition, the negative impact on jobs will be significant, as the production and distribution of beer and wine are much more labour-intensive than similar operations for spirits.

As an example of the potentially negative impact on jobs, I would like to quote from a speech given by my hon. friend for St. Catharines (Mr. Reid). He said:

> —the wineries and the grape growers employ over 18,000 persons. Is not that a segment of the community worth considering? In its brief to the standing committee, the Canadian Wine Institute hit the nail on the head when it stated that neither winemaking nor grape growing is a profitable business.
> For the information of members of this House let us say that in so far as wine production is concerned, the net return is less than 5 per cent of the capital cost investment. That is not a great venture from a profit-making point of view. There are already declining sales and, thanks to that earlier 155 per cent increase in the excise tax announced last April, this cannot fail to continue as the government loads quarterly increases onto the retail cost of wine. With this decline will come the collapse of the smaller wine industries—the cottage wine industries—which have improved the taste and quality of domestic wines. It will also lead to lay-offs in the larger wine industries.

This is but one example of what a seemingly minute tax can do to a thriving industry.

Furthermore, there is overwhelming evidence showing that a higher incidence of alcohol-related health problems, crime and accidents is related to a relatively higher level of distilled spirits consumption. This factor in itself should be sufficient to convince policymakers of the dangers involved in encouraging, through the tax system, the increased consumption of hard liquor. No country has ever set out to use the tax system to encourage, via the price mechanism, the shift in consumption patterns toward hard liquor and away from naturally brewed and fermented products such as beer, wine and cider; in fact, a number of countries have done exactly the opposite.

The proposal to index alcoholic beverage excise levies should be automatically dropped in favour of continuing to seek changes to rates of these taxes and duties by having them approved by Parliament as part of the traditional budgetary process. It is my feeling that most ordinary Canadians believe that government is there to serve and protect them in a reasonable and responsible fashion. This means that Canadians believe that, through debate and the normal voting procedure, decisions and policies are made which will serve to better society as a whole. This tax completely violates both the trust which Canadians have put in the system and the system itself.

During committee consideration the minister stated he did not believe indexing would affect the stability of the industry. However, one of the effects of the indexing scheme is that it would exacerbate the sales situation existing since the excise levy increases of April, 1980. Soon the price of two dozen bottles of beer will have increased by 157 per cent, as I stated earlier. The price of a 25-ounce bottle of inexpensive gin will increase by only 101 per cent. Obviously, this will further accelerate the shift in consumption patterns to hard liquor and away from beer and wine.

I will conclude my statements by calling on the Minister of Finance to eliminate this section of Bill C-57 which will index taxes on beer, wine and spirits to the CPI rate for all beverages and for once get off the back of the little guy who, by far, will suffer the most if this provision is approved.

Mr. Bill Wright (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I rise this afternoon to speak on Bill C-57, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act. There are five parts to this bill. The first part deals with the amendments to the federal sales tax system, such as the application of tax to marginal manufacturing activities and to advertising inserts in newspapers. Part II contains provisions for the new tax on natural gas and gas liquids. Part III deals with changes in the taxation of alcoholic beverages and technical provisions to the Excise Tax Act. Part IV establishes an 8 per cent tax on petroleum and gas revenues under a separate act. Part V describes the commencement date for the various provisions in the first four parts of the bill.

This is probably the most important piece of legislation needed to implement the national energy policy brought forward by the government on October 28. As hon. members may recall, this was the program brought in under the budget; or, should I say, bootlegged in by this government under the budget. There are 135 amendments to the bill, and hopefully hon. members in this House will see fit to accept many of the amendments which the opposition has presented and will present. It is an extremely large bill, comprising about 118 pages, and it is obviously very complex.

I would like to discuss a few of the items within the bill. The first is the federal sales tax which the government claims it will reduce from 12 per cent to 9 per cent. However, it will include marginal manufacturers in this tax so that many firms which manufacture the bulk of their products in Canada, but which must import some of their components to complete their products, will now be taxed. It seems to me that in many cases these small or marginal manufacturers will be encouraged not to manufacture their products here or will not be able to manufacture their products here or will not be able to manufacture them here because they will not then be competitive. There seems to be no clear answer from the government on whether this will harm the marginal manufacturers, even though a number of them appeared before the committee and indicated they would be hurt by this action on marginal goods.

I would like to turn to the second part of this bill, which is a tax on natural gas and natural gas liquids. As everyone in this House is aware, the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) stood in his place and said; "We have no intention of taxing natural gas, of putting a tax on natural gas exported to the United States". Then he turned right around and said: "We are going to tax all natural gas in Canada, whether it is consumed domestically or exported". As everyone is aware, the appeal court of Alberta recently ruled against the federal government taxing another government, namely, the government of Alberta. This is dealt with in a section of the British North America Act. This case has now been appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada. Hopefully the Supreme Court of Canada will render a decision on the side of the producing provinces.

The petroleum gas tax or revenue tax is clearly a tax on provincial resources. We and all of the provinces understand this to be illegal. I will probably come back to this point when the bill comes up for the third reading because I question whether we should discuss this bill on third reading. As I understand it, we are simply reporting the bill to the House, but there is a question in my mind as to whether we should actually be discussing certain parts of this bill while they are before the Supreme Court of Canada.

I would like to draw attention to something which is pretty important. Total exports of natural gas in 1978 were approximately 882 billion cubic feet. In 1979, under a Conservative government, exports rose to one trillion cubic feet. In 1980, under a Liberal government, they again declined to 800 billion cubic feet, which is the lowest total exports in the last five years. In addition, natural gas exports in 1978, in dollar terms, were $2.2 billion; in 1979, $3.1 billion; in 1980, $4 billion, in spite of a decrease in volume. Basically, the reason is that we tie the price of exports of natural gas to the price of imported oil. Even though they are unrelated, this government has a formula whereby it ties the two together. Therefore, we cannot export as much gas as we want. The government would be receiving $1.5 billion annually if it did not tie the price of natural gas to the price of imported oil. Of course, once again it is anxious not to give Alberta anything more than it possibly can. I cannot help but think how our balance of payments would be helped with that $1.5 billion per year, and I cannot help but think what it would do for interest rates in Canada if an additional $1.5 billion was coming in.

The natural gas companies in western Canada, which are mostly in Alberta, have stated that they could export 50 per cent more gas than they are allowed to at present if they could take it out of the ground and had a market for it. It is quite evident that many of these companies will go broke. These are average-sized Canadian companies which cannot get their natural gas out of the ground for at least five years. When they go to the bank they can only borrow funds to 25 per cent of real value. They cannot sell their gas because it is shut in by the policies of the government. They cannot export that gas.

Excise Tax

I should like now to come to what I consider to be an unbelievable tax which the government is going to introduce on wine, beer, spirits and tobacco. I am not opposed to a tax on any of these products but I am opposed to a tax which is indexed and which will automatically increase as inflation does. This is the first tax that the government will use on industry in general. If it gets away with this, we can expect that the tax on all items will be indexed against inflation. You and I, Mr. Speaker, will pay tax in future on every item we buy and that tax will be indexed to inflation. This is just the first step and I shall come back to it briefly in my conclusion.

I should like now to deal with Part IV of Bill C-57, which imposes an 8 per cent tax on petroleum and gas revenues. This is a tax at the wellhead and can also be interpreted as a tax on provincial resources. It will affect exploration and development by the whole petroleum industry. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) stood in this House and said that drilling is not declining. Every week and month last fall he told us that. He said that there was a surplus of oil rigs and that drilling companies were expanding because they anticipated an expansion of exploration and development. That did not come about because of the national energy policy, Mr. Speaker. There are now only 50 per cent of the rigs operating in Canada that were operating one year ago. Approximately $2 billion is flowing out of the country each year and will continue to do so for the next five years because of the national energy policy.

In the province of Saskatchewan one company shut down 190 wells within the last five months and another company shut down 125 wells. This begs the question, how could they possibly shut down producing wells? It is very simple. It was because they were losing money. Even though they are not allowed to shut wells down, they simply wait until the wells need repairs and then do not repair them. The repairs are put off indefinitely. This practice will continue until we notice a drop in production from these marginal wells. The Minister of Finance and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources continue to hold that this will not happen and that it is not happening. I could give the names of companies, Mr. Speaker, but I shall not embarrass them.

It is interesting that the oil industry raises 70 per cent of its funds internally while the utilities, most of which are owned by governments, raise less than 50 per cent of their capital internally. That is a turn around for the industry. The cash flow of the oil and gas industry in Canada has been reduced by 20 per cent to 40 per cent on account of the policies of the government which wants to control the oil industry.

I could go on and tell why this is being done, Mr. Speaker. I have said, as have others in this House before, that if anyone really wants to know what kind of Canada we will have in future, they should read the writings of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). He is nothing but a socialist. Any communist will tell you that the socialists are the tool of the communist party, of the communist world.

Mr. Rae: What are you the tool of?

Mr. Wright: I hear to my left the pinko Peter Pan of politics. He has had his opportunity to speak on this bill. He does not disagree with what I am saying about the socialists; he just thinks it is funny.

I should like to quote briefly from a brief submitted to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs by the Independent Petroleum Association of Canada. On page 9 of the brief there appears the following passage:

> We are mindful of the government's intention to direct three objectives of the National Energy Program, namely:
> 1) Security of supply and the ultimate independence from the world oil market;
> 2) A fair pricing and revenue sharing regime; and
> 3) Greater ownership and control of the oil and gas industry.
> The Minister of Finance has stated that "That two taxes contained in this Bill are essential for the achievement of these objectives."
> It is the position of the Independent Petroleum Association that the first objective, that of security or supply, is not possible under this fiscal regime . . . It is also our contention that a fair price and revenue sharing program that places the Canadian oil and gas industry in financial jeopardy to continue in Canada when more attractive foreign opportunities exist, is not conducive to future exploration and development in this country. Lastly, the ownership and control objective as stated by the minister has no place in an Excise Tax Act.

Mr. Speaker, this is submitted by an association of companies which are Canadian controlled, not foreign controlled, and which are moving to the United States. It is not the case that I cannot find Liberals to agree with this, but they are prepared to say: "We are going to change it in the future and it won't be that bad". But it is already that bad. Everyone should be aware that it will take two to five years to bring back the oil rigs that have gone to the United States.

The IPAC group concludes with this question:

> Is it then the intention of the government to enact selective tax legislation for every segment of the industrial base at some time in the future?

That being the case, the stability of the entire business and investment community will be in question. If it is not the intent of the government, why should tax laws be enacted which are so clearly discriminatory to one sector? That is the essence. It is a tax not upon one industry but upon all industries. This bill is a tax not upon one segment of the economy but upon all segments of the economy.

I shall summarize some of the items in Bill C-57. The national energy policy, which really brought about this bill, has reduced the cash flow of the oil and gas companies by 20 per cent to 40 per cent. Their earnings have been decreased by 60 per cent to 70 per cent.

This is a tax which does not approach earnings normally by simply taxing profits. The government does not want to do that. The government wants to tax these companies before they make profits.

This is a bill which does not help our balance of payments problems. It does not do one thing to help our balance of payments. This bill does not do one thing to help the deficit of Canada. We hear the Liberals telling us that they are going to reduce the deficit. How can the government reduce the deficit when it buys oil companies which do not produce one more barrel of oil? Money is leaving Canada. How is our deficit being helped when Canadian companies are taking their money across the border to the United States? There are companies in Canada doing nothing else but raising funds for Canadian companies that operate in the United States. As I mentioned before, approximately $2 billion a year is being raised for this purpose.

This is a bill which goes one step further toward government ownership of business in this country. Of course, the government likes to cloud the horizon by saying it is not trying to take over all business. Of course not. But if hon. members read the writings of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), they will find that he wants to control everything. Having 51 per cent will control all businesses in Canada. Last week, I believe, in Montreal the Prime Minister said: "All businesses in Canada at one time or another will have to come to the government for assistance". What a ridiculous statement to make. Of course, we know how ridiculous he is after listening to him during question period. I would be ashamed to belong to the same party as anyone making a statement like that. This is a statement with which the Liberals will have to live forever.

We regard this bill, this tax on industry, as punitive. If that is not a strong enough word to describe it, then I say it is vindictive. This government is out to get industry and private enterprise because the government wants to socialize or nationalize, if you will, industry in Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 40, it is my duty to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows:

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Since it has been agreed and ordered that there is to be a recorded vote at 9.45 p.m. tonight, does that not wash out the late show?

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, we did not specifically rule out the late show, but it is usual custom if we do have an ordered or a deferred vote—

Mr. Knowles: It is not usual custom. It is in the Standing Orders.

Mr. Collenette: —then we do not have the late show.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It seems there is agreement. Therefore, we will dispense with the late show. As a result the notation I just made regarding Standing Order 40 will be withdrawn.

Mr. Scott Fennell (Ontario): Madam Speaker, my colleague the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Wright) in his closing comment said that the government is out to get private enterprise and entrepreneurs. I maintain the government is out to get Canadians generally. The government does not select; it wants to get everybody.

I am delighted to speak to Bill C-57, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act. I would call it an act of confiscation. In the days since this bill was brought before the House, the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) has been heard to say that if injury of significant disadvantage is experienced by any group, he would remove the burden in the subsequent budget.

Those are lovely words, but who is the minister kidding? He is not fooling me nor is he fooling the public. Once that government grabs a little bit of money, it hangs on for dear life to it because it is known that this government never gives it back. The government's game is to take more and more and more. This government has no intention of rescinding anything it presents to this House.

I believe that the 8 per cent energy tax is totally immoral and is probably the most damaging tax imposed in Canada. It is not only destroying the possibility of self-sufficiency in the oil industry, it is destroying the Canadian economy. It is being felt in Ontario, Quebec and the eastern provinces. With this government's spending spree, it is obvious it loves to feed the inflation fire. That is the key problem in Canada today because it is ravaging the life of all Canadians.

This government, through the National Energy Program, has not only written off the western potential, the western spirit, the western hope, but has completely desecrated the Canadian economy. This government is more interested in buying service stations, maybe for the real estate, and oil from Mexico than in encouraging, through appropriate tax relief, oil production in Canada. This government will be so overcome by greed that it will dry up the source of supply, similar to what happens to a poorly managed dairy farm.

The wellhead tax on the production of gas and petroleum products is a cannibalization of not only the petroleum industry but the producer and the Canadian public. In Canada the price of gasoline has increased 60 cents since this government took over, all of which increase has gone into the government's coffers. Europeans pay $4.50 a gallon. Although a great deal of that price goes into government coffers, it pays for imported oil because the Europeans do not have the possibility of self-sufficiency. In this country, at the rate this government is going, I would say that in two or three years gasoline will cost $9 a gallon or $2 a litre. But the producer in the west will get nothing from any rise in price, nor will Canadian industry. All the funds will flow back into Ottawa. That is the government's game. Its plan is not to pay back loans from other people but to spend money.

Governments are elected, in theory, to tailor spending programs to revenues. This government throws out that theory; that is of no concern to it. It theorizes, not knowing how much it will take in, that everything it takes in will be given away, along with everything else we will have in the next 20 years. The government grabs money from every source it can. It is a wonder it has not jumped on the western farmer and the Ontario farmer. Their prices have gone up. Next it may place an indexed tax on wheat and really destroy this economy. That is the only thing we have left. We have no industy. Nothing has been done to encourage industry in this country. The government has created a complete division in this country.

Originally, under the British North America Act that is now being rescinded any royalty on resources belonged to the provinces. This tax inflicts upon the provinces a wound that will be deep and will have significance for many years to come. The federal government has the right to raise all the taxes it wants by a revision to the Income Tax Act. It could follow a logical system of raising money.

I said before in this House that maybe it is time to get some imaginative plagiarism of taxes from other countries, for example for building up industry. The United States had the same problem with the multinational oil companies. They put on a windfall profits tax which had a beginning and an end. In essence, it was indexed so that each year the windfall profits tax became less. It was a smaller percentage of the sale price of the fuel. We have never come up with an original program like that. We just hammer the citizens of this country over the head with a two by four. We do not use logic and we destroy the country in the process.

The Liberals love going to the trough. That is their expertise—they go to the trough and get all they can. If they want to get a lot out of the trough, I will tell them how to do it. Put the price of oil up to 75 per cent of the world price. Put on a windfall profits tax. Then watch the development in this country. Watch the industrial base in Ontario grow. The federal government will get more money than it ever dreamed of. Ontario will survive. My riding would benefit, as would Quebec and the maritimes.

We are only kidding ourselves. By the time we get up to 75 per cent of the world price, the government will take so much of that price there will be nothing left for the producer. I say put the price up now, put on a windfall profits tax and abolish this 8 per cent tax which cannot even be deducted from your profit and loss account. The petroleum industry would benefit, the drilling rigs would come back into Canada, service industries would develop and people would be employed in the west and in Ontario. The entire economy of this country would get moving from coast to coast. The automobile manufacturers in Scarborough will again be busy building trucks. That plant is now shut down about five days out of ten. Why? Who in the west can afford to buy trucks when there is no revenue coming in?

The government's greed is absolutely incredible. It recently put up the export tax because it is short of money and we have a balance of payments problem. Why not drop the tax and allow more products to be exported across the border? More revenue will flow back into Canada. It will come back into the hands of the producers and service industries which the government has the right to tax.

Export our products to those who want them. The Americans want our gas but at a reasonable price. Every time we sell our product, it leads to exploration for new gas. New oil will also be found. When you drill for gas, you do not know whether you will hit gas or oil. Therefore, more oil and gas will be brought on stream. Oil and gas from the north will come on stream much faster. At present we may have to wait 50 years before this oil comes on stream.

This government follows the easy way of bringing in oil—at the expense of the taxpayers. If this government were really sensible, it would bring back depreciation allowances, exploration expenses and development expenses which could be written off. I suggest it get rid of its petroleum incentive program. It is a joke. In fact, it states in an amendment that it is a joke. The government says that if you choose not to take the incentive program, you can deduct the amount you would get from your 8 per cent royalty tax. That is just money going through the system, that is all it is. It does not give anything to the oil industry. Everything that is given to them is taken away. In effect, you are putting them in the position of a possible 30 per cent negative cash flow. You are not giving them anything and the government is losing everything. It is losing revenue on the income of taxpayers throughout Canada.

We must get rid of the National Energy Program and the 8 per cent royalty. The government calls it an excise tax, but I call it a royalty because that is what it is. The government says it wants to Canadianize the industry. I accept that. I believe that is sound. At least some companies have worked hard to do this under this incentive, but it could have been done in a much better way which would have put us in a better light in the eyes of other countries.

This incentive of a depletion allowance, exploration and development expenses should apply to Canadian companies only. Believe me, Mr Speaker, it would get money out of the banks and back to work in this country. What has flowed south across the border will come back into Canada. The drilling rigs will return to this country and the economy will be booming. However, this government wants to hold this country down. I do not understand the reason for it, but they are against anything of a positive nature.

This excise tax hits the people of my riding. The government is putting indexation on the last pleasure of the working man. High interest rates are slowly but surely eroding his home base. He does not know if he can hang on to his house. The tragedy is the indexing of the tax on beer. I refer specifically to beer. It will never be a tax with representation. This tax on beer will never come before this House of Commons. We will never be able to speak on this tax again, nor the tax on wine and spirits.

The working man who works from eight to four of five can no longer afford many pleasures because of the inflation brought about by this government. Now the government is taking away his last pleasure. He is again being hit over the head by a two by four.

I am told it is to protect government revenues derived as a result of this tax from erosion. What about the erosion of the working man's pleasure? What about the erosion of his income? What is the government doing to the working Canadian? It is stripping him of his last pleasure. He is not only being hit with excessive income tax, but now the little bit of money he has left in his pocket to buy a small case of beer at the end of the week is being taken away from him.

Perhaps the government is dedicated to solving the problem of alcoholism in this country, I do not know. But I do know one thing about this measure. The government will lose more than it will gain because there are still many people with initiative in this country who will start to produce their own beer in their basements. Who could afford to pay $22 for 12 pints of beer, which I understand will be the price in about 1988? The government is taking away homes with high interest rates and it is now taking away the average man's beer. What are you going to do with that man on the street? This reminds me very much of what happened in Germany in the 1930s. People lost their homes, they began to starve, and then a powerful dictator came along to solve all their problems. God help us so that that does not happen here in this country.

I believe the indexing of the tax on beer is totally immoral and is a concept totally the reverse of that which Robert Stanfield had when he suggested the indexing of income tax. Indexing of income tax was meant to protect the working man against inflation and fiscal mismanagement, the cause of inflation. The government is now going to reverse that concept. The minister keeps talking about the next budget when he will take indexing out. I think the government had better start indexing itself because the government keeps taking money in.

I received an advertisement today which talks about a sudsidy of $800 to reduce consumption of petroleum products. The government is going to give each Canadian citizen $800. Do you realize, Mr. Speaker, that the government will have to borrow that $800 in Switzerland at 15 per cent interest rate, compounded over 5.5 years, which will mean it will have to pay back $1,600? Furthermore, the money will be taken away from the taxpayer to pay that loan back.

Why does this government not get to work, instead of continually increasing taxes, to find ways of cutting taxes and protecting the working Canadian? He is being rubbed the wrong way and pushed too far. This government is on a binge. This is the only way it can control Canadians, by taking everything away from them.

While we are talking about inflation, which I referred to as basically resulting from mismanagement by this government over the last 13 years, let me point out that in a recent Gallup poll 65 per cent of Canadians indicated approval of severe reductions in government spending, similar to what is taking place south of the border. They are talking about general reductions, and the majority of people expect a positive effect on the Canadian economy and our inflation. Instead of always coming to the trough here trying to get more money, why do members across the way not sit back in their offices and try to figure out how to cut spending?

The next part of this bill deals with small weekly newspapers. The Kent commission has been currently trying to determine the detrimental effects of control of the press basically by three groups in this country, the Toronto Star, Southam and Thomson. The Toronto Star stayed out of it because it has only one paper, but it is sold right across this country and it gets the Liberals elected every time. During the time the Kent commission has been questioning this monopoly control the government has been planning to hit small weeklies, the independent press in this country which combats these large chains of newspapers. They are the only papers which can still tell the truth.

The government has now found a new tax with which to hit and hammer them over the head, like with a two by four. The government is going to tax those weeklies on all their advertising and the supplements they carry. Advertising and advertising inserts are how these newspapers manage to carry on. Most of these weeklies do not make a lot of money. They are operated by individual owners who are trying to make a buck in small towns. These small newspapers are the only defence we have in print against those three major papers everyone knows about.

I hope the minister will reverse these taxes when it is shown they are hurting some specific industries. I hope he will abolish this tax so as not to kill the small independent newspapers of this country. Members on that side think these advertisers can distribute their material through the mail. The trouble is that the inserts carried by these weekly newspapers come out on Wednesday for sales that take place on Thursday, Friday and Saturday. Can you imagine putting these inserts in the mail? By the time they got to us the sale would be over and the prices would be marked up 50 per cent. Furthermore, this would involve another tax on the public.

This whole measure is supposed to give the appearance of this government's efficient commerce. To me, the government has done an absolutely disastrous thing by bringing forward this tax. I can only hope that, as in my wildest dreams, we can in some way defeat the government on this measure, as I think it represents an absolute disaster to Canada, the west and our national economy.

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to make some remarks about Bill C-57, presently before the House, entitled "an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas".

Let me say at the outset that there are certain aspects of this bill, as with any piece of government legislation, which will be helpful to Canadians, in particular those that deal with exemptions from excise tax as set out under Part I. This party generally supports the nature of those exemptions, with a couple of exceptions.

We have proposed an amendment relating to the exemption for utensils, instruments and equipment used in university teaching and research. This party would like to see the adoption of a minor amendment to clause 12 of the bill which would rule out the requirement that such devices be specifically designed for research, thereby exempting all such equipment employed in the conduct of research and teaching up to 50 per cent of the time. We would recommend the removal of the reference to the word "design" in the second line of clause 12.

In addition, we feel that included in the list of fuel sales tax exemptions there ought to be an exemption on fuels used in pilot training. If one has regard for the tremendously increased cost that Canadians of all ages must anticipate if they want to enter into pilot training, with the new Revenue Canada ruling that will disallow any tax benefit for flying training time in excess of the first 35 hours it becomes very important that a certain measure be introduced to ensure that the practice of flight training is given as much consideration as are other aspects of vocational and academic training programs in this country.

With that said, I think it is fair to say that speakers for this party, and in many cases my colleagues in the party to the left, have taken extreme exception to numerous aspects of the proposed legislation in Bill C-57. As the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Fennell) pointed out a few minutes ago, this move toward indexation of revenue sources, whether it be federal or provincial, as in the case of the recent budget by the province of Ontario which included indexing of that province's revenue sources, is a very retrograde step. It seems to me governments are elected to serve the people, that the people of this country are not here to serve their governments. The practice of indexing income tax exemptions under the Income Tax Act must be retained and the government should not even begin to contemplate, as the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) has often implied, deindexation of exemptions under that act. In that way government does serve the needs of the people by ensuring that the timeless pace of inflation does not erode the basic minimum income people are entitled to enjoy tax free within this country.

On the other hand, the indexation of government revenue sources such as that proposed respecting the spirits, wine and tobacco provisions of Bill C-57, and the move by Ontario to index provincial gasoline tax revenue, really must be recognized as being inflationary because indexation, as in the case of the present bill, on a quarterly basis relating to the consumer price index component of cost arising from those particular consumables—the basic process of calculating an increased rate of tax revenue on an ad valorem basis rather than on a straight value basis—has an amplifying effect. If the revenue is tied to a certain percentage of the retail sales price of a particular commodity, then every time there is an increase in the tax to keep track of that indexing formula, it will have a reflected effect on the consumer price index and then will lead a quarter later to the need to index the rate of tax up once again. There is an amplifying effect which fuels inflation inherent in these provisions to index tax revenue sources to the consumer price index. Therefore it is wrong.

Of course, as many of my colleagues have pointed out, there is a change in balance between the excise tax rate assigned to certain spirits and to alcoholic beverages of 40 per cent alcoholic content or higher. Changing the ratio of taxation on those alcoholic beverages compared with beer and wine leads to a situation in which people will ultimately be more inclined to buy hard alcoholic beverages as opposed to beer and wine. This is completely contrary to what is advocated by leading health and alcoholism authorities and to the practices of many other nations, most notably France, where in fact the rate of excise taxation against wine on a per unit alcohol basis is very, very much lower than against alcoholic spirits.

The brewing and wine-making industries made representations at the committee stage in opposition to this kind of indexing which, by the year 1991, I believe, could lead to Canadians paying some $26 for a 24-pack of beer compared with only $16 for a bottle of gin. The effect of that is quite obvious. The average Canadian making a visit to the liquor store is much more likely to buy hard alcoholic spirits than beer or wine.

As I said a few moments ago, the amplifying effect of this method fuels inflation because the rates of taxation are continually indexed upwards as the consumer price index rises, and the consumer price index will rise as tax revenues are increased. This is a very regressive measure and quite unacceptable to this party.

I want to talk for a short while about the energy aspects of Bill C-57, in particular the so-called natural gas and liquid natural gas tax provisions as set out in Part II of Bill C-57 and also the producers' tax and producer royalty provisions contained within Part IV of the bill.

Hon. members may recall that in the early autumn of 1980 a number of questions were asked of the government, and of the Minister of Finance in particular, as to whether he intended to introduce an export tax on natural gas. There were denials, most vehemently from the hon. Leader of the Government in the Senate, the senator from British Columbia, who pledged that there would be no such tax on British Columbia natural gas resources, as did the former leader of the Liberal party in British Columbia, Mr. Gordon Gibson.

In fact, hon. members may recall that over 32,000 residents of British Columbia sent in petitions to this House in the months of October and November opposing any tax on the export of natural gas and, by implication, on all forms of natural gas, whether exported or consumed within the province, because those are viewed by the residents of British Columbia, Alberta and the other western provinces as resources to which they are entitled under the provisions of the British North America Act and part of the deal under which British Columbia, willingly and happily, entered into confederation in 1871.

One might ask why the provinces are so anxious to maintain title to natural resources. The fact is that people, those in the more remote regions of Canada at least, are convinced they get better value for their tax dollar and for their resources by seeing those dollars invested and spent wisely and close to home by their municipal and provincial governments. Last autumn at the Union of British Columbia Municipalities meeting, the mayors of British Columbia unanimously opposed the imposition of a federal tax on the natural resources of British Columbia because those resources and the revenues they are capable of earning ultimately translate into the building of schools, roads, facilities, services and employment opportunities for the people of British Columbia.

There is a big revenue grab coupled with what I call the big lie which the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) and his colleagues regularly put out about how wealthy the western resource-producing provinces are. I invite more hon. members on the government side to visit towns like Calgary and Edmonton in January or February, or at any time of the year, and to view the lack of sidewalks in my own community, the lack of closed drainage ditches, the lack of adequate, completed parks, the lack of adequate hospitals and the lack of adequate playground equipment and facilities. These things are enjoyed in Ontario and Quebec, the much more established part of Canada. We are building an infrastructure out there which this part of Canada has enjoyed for over a century, and this costs money.

Therefore, if the per capita income from natural resources is as large as the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources often likes to proclaim—some $1,600 per person—he should be honest with the people of Canada and let them realize how large the per capita income is in other parts of this country which comes from manufacturing and industry. How large is the per capita income from government in the Ottawa area? How large is the per capita income in some of the less affluent parts of Canada because of government gratuities and redistribution under the formal procedure of equalization, to which all provinces agree? However, to go around perpetrating this big lie and proclaiming that the people of western Canada are greedy, selfish and too fat cat is absolutely intolerable to western Canadians. We invite the minister and others to travel to British Columbia, Alberta and elsewhere to see roads sliding down the sides of mountains. I invite them to travel to many of our backwoods areas where there is not the pavement there is in most parts of Ontario and Quebec.

Much building and investment must be carried out in western Canada, and western Canadians, thank you very much, would like to have more say about how those investments are made than the federal government believes is necessary. If they are not allowed, within the confines of confederation, to make those decisions, then we cannot fault western Canadians for looking for another way. There is a lack of trust. History has proved that the Liberal big spenders in Ottawa have no sense of value and no sense of thriftiness when it comes to reinvesting the great bounty we as Canadians all enjoy.

It is interesting to speculate as to why Alberta and Saskatchewan have heritage funds and why the province of British Columbia has a B.C. Resources Investment Corporation or a British Columbia Petroleum Corporation. Why is it that we are able to put something away for tomorrow and invest in the building and development of our future when the government in Ottawa is bankrupt and leading our country down the same road to absolute economic chaos?

I think the natural gas tax which has been levied through the budget and as reflected in Bill C-57 is nothing more than a revenue grab. Then the government imposes an 8 per cent production tax and, in addition to that, a producers' royalty on people who actually pay royalties to others for investing in our oil and gas industry.

The negative effect of these provisions of the National Energy Program are visible everywhere in our country today. For example, I imagine the bureaucrats, cabinet ministers and government members who contemplated imposing an 8 per cent producers' tax did not bother to calculate the rate of return on investment to determine whether investors in western Canadian oil and gas exploration could absorb such a level of taxation. And, of course, the massive number of jobs being lost in western Canada, the migration of whole industries associated with drilling rigs heading south where the rate of return is much larger, is indicative of the fact that this government is incompetent to do a quantitative analysis of the consequences of its policies before implementation.

I imagine, Mr. Speaker, that the government did not consider that a higher tax on natural gas, starting at 30 cents a thousand cubic feet or 28 cents a gigagoule and rising to double that amount within two years, would have an impact on farmers or on the important production of synthetic fertilizer from natural gas. It has now had that fact brought to its attention by the federation of Alberta gas co-ops and other groups, who made representations to the effect that the food we eat is really produced from our natural resources and that any increase in cost to the producer will ultimately be reflected in the cost of living index.

Of course, this government in its budget imposed a tax across the board at the wellhead which has its impact on home heating fuels; but that is compounded in western Canada where most people rely on natural gas for heating and comfort, which is a change from the way it was when I was a small boy 30 years ago and we had no timber, just a bit of coal, and we certainly did not have the warmth and convenience of natural gas.

Then suddenly this government increases home heating costs to western Canadians, indeed to the people of Ontario and Quebec that burn natural gas, by some 33 per cent from last October until next winter. That is a cost which has to be borne by the old age pensioners. I had the residents of a Kiwanis subsidized housing project in my riding receive a surtax on their December heating bill and every subsequent month which comes directly out of their old age pension, the supplement and widows' benefits. That surtax arises out of the National Energy Program. The plastics which are so essential to our manufacturing industry, the plastics that we waste too much of in this country, are also being taxed excessively.

We are doing this to initiate a concept of nationalization of our major industries in the energy sector. We started with the Petro-Canada acquisition and pretended that Canada was buying an oil company, but of course we were borrowing money through the chartered banks by assigning the term preferred shares to the banks who, in turn, conveyed that trust to foreign lenders, which made it possible for Canada to attempt to purchase a major part of the Canadian petroleum industry.

We now have across Canada brand-new Petro-Canada service centres that western Canadians avoid like the plague. In shopping centres which are competing with established centres they are putting in pizza parlours, convenience stores and clothing stores, which is again an example of the kind of irritant that western Canadians feel. It is an Ottawa Liberal attempt to invade and intrude into private sector business principles and traditions in western Canada which is totally repugnant to western Canadians. Of course, that leads to the question of which Liberal fat cats get the leases on these spaces. How many of these smaller deals, much smaller than the one that Mr. Strong apparently profited from tremendously by setting up the acquisition of Petrofina for the government, are benefiting people who happen to be friends, backers or bagmen of the Liberal party?

The Grits and their corporate friends are reaping high profits, and I suggest it is high time the government and the people of Canada know where these profits from high interest rates are going. I suggest that the high interest rates and high rates of return on investments being earned in Canada are being sucked off by certain financial institutions, friends of the Liberal party, who we will see emerge as the new Power Corporations of the future which want to take control of our oil and gas industry because they have special access to government and cabinet. I will name names. I am thinking of the Campeaus, the Strongs, the Desmarais and the McCains. I do not know how much others there are but it would seem to me—and this is certainly an irritant to western Canadians—that these individuals prominently connected with the Liberal party are probably somehow linked to high interest rates and the profits being accrued therefrom, and to the power plays being made in an attempt to grab a controlling interest in the oil and gas industry in Canada, particularly in the offshore areas.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Robert Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I enter this debate with a growing concern over the direction the government is taking with regard specifically to my region of the country, western Canada. It runs completely counter to the good of this region and thereby to the good of the entire country. The energy provisions in this bill are designed for short term financial benefits and narrow political gains in central Canada. In the long run they will be disastrous for both the economy and the political viability of this nation. The friction and ill feeling caused by these measures, not to mention the legal precedents being established daily, weekly and monthly in our courts, will in the long run fan the flames of western discontent to unmanageable proportions. Instead of a co-operative form of federalism, we will be faced with a never-ending series of confrontations between competing levels of government.

It is impossible to understand the consequences of this bill under discussion without looking at the historical background and the trends in the present dispute between Ottawa and the provinces. It has been suggested, unfairly, that the main difference between Quebec separatism and western alienation is that the former is rooted in cultural aspirations while the latter is predominantly based on economic considerations. This belief places undue emphasis on contemporary disputes between Ottawa and the western provinces and ignores the evolution of a unique western Canadian political identity.

It is true, however, that the debate over resources that we are participating in today has brought the economic aspects to the forefront more than at any time in our history. The oil and gas resources in question generate billions of dollars in revenue, not just to the provincial government concerned but to the municipal and federal, regional and city governments as well. This generation of resource wealth in our economy is significant at every level of government, and because of that everyone wants to grab an overly large share of the pie. Not only that, but in the case of Alberta the oil and gas industry accounts, directly or indirectly, for one half of the jobs in that province.

With stakes so high we should not be surprised to see that provincial leaders are unprepared to make concessions which might serve as a precedent for further loss of ownership and control in the resource sector. However, since the revenue is so large, Ottawa's stake truly is very, very high; but because of that it should not be perceived in terms of a little bit more revenue. At stake is not just revenue; if they believe that is all that is important, then they are making a big mistake.

An attitude of belligerence is being perceived in the west. It is an attitude which reflects the belligerence of the central government, regardless of its political orientation. It is an attitude of belligerence expressed by the centre to its parts. Is that really worth exchanging for a few points of revenue? Personally, I do not think so.

The legal issues in this debate are also of critical importance, but I do not feel that the legal issues should be the be-all and end-all. After all, we are subject to continually changing political circumstances which should not be left at the mercy of arbitrary courtroom discussion. A legally right position is not necessarily a morally right position, or a right position as it relates to equity within the relationships of the governments in this partnership. Even if we have a federal government which can legally take revenue, and even if we have court decisions coming down on the side of federal resource control, that does not necessarily make the trend right. As we discuss this issue and as we look at the legality of it, the dollar bills involved, let us not lose sight of the morality of it. Let us not lose sight of the equity as it relates to the partners of this great nation.

Provincial efforts to develop their resources have not been made any easier by the fact that the west, especially the prairies, was originally conceived as hinterland to the industrial heartland of central Canada. It is worth noting that while the British North America Act originally granted ownership of resources to the three original provinces of Canada, similar rights were not achieved in eastern Canada until long after provincial status was achieved. The reason for this is not all that flattering to federal governments of that era, either Conservative or Liberal governments. I would like to think that throughout history the party with which I sit had, in fact, been righteous always, but that is not true of any of the parties here. Alienation is not limited to the Liberal Party of Canada, the New Democratic Party or the Conservative party. Alienation is much bigger than that. It is, in fact, separate and apart from the various political entities which have controlled this country in the past and which, of course, are attempting to maintain the status quo. As my hon. friend for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon) was speaking he mentioned alienation, and I heard the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) holler across the chamber, "What does that have to do with this bill, these western concerns you are talking about? Get back to the bill."

Miss Bégin: Are you sick?

Mr. Wenman: No. You are the Marie Antoinette of Canadian unity as far as the west is concerned.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. If hon. members wish to entertain discussions, perhaps they can withdraw behind the curtain. Right now we are discussing Bill C-57 and the Chair would like to hear remarks with respect to this bill.

Mr. Wenman: Mr. Speaker, I want it to be understood that sometimes the banter which goes back and forth in this House of Commons is reflective of the central attitude of belligerence. In fact, that is the intent and purpose of this bill as seen by western Canada.

An hon. Member: The truth hurts.

Miss Bégin: Pretty stupid.

Mr. Wenman: When the minister calls a western concern about a tax on natural gas, which is inequitable and unfair, stupid, I am sorry she is in that frame of mind. That is the kind of attitude which is building the resentment which is, in fact, western alienation.

An hon. Member: Stop talking about alienation.

An hon. Member: Talk about the bill.

Mr. Wenman: Mr. Speaker, I hope the asides of members opposite will be reported. They ask me to stop talking about alienation and start talking about the bill. If there is any member of this House of Commons who can separate western concerns and western alienation from this bill which we are discussing I would invite them to come to western Canada in order to express that kind of separation. Mr. Speaker, I invite you to try to make that separation. The two are so intensely intertwined. If we could only get the message across, if all the speakers who have spoken here could get that message across and none other, then we would, in fact, be accomplishing a significant amount. Of course, the most important step which we would accomplish would be that this bill would not pass if an understanding of the situation in the west were held by members opposite.

In the interim between 1867 and 1930, when the prairie provinces were granted ownership of their resources, minerals had become an increasingly important source of revenue. At that point they were negotiable, the federal government was willing to say to the provinces, "All right, we will give you this revenue sharing. We will give you this source of revenue." Times have changed. At that time the government was a small part of our lives, now it is such a big part of our lives that the centre must acquire more revenue to waste in various massive government expenditure programs. The federal government granted provincial status to Manitoba in 1870 and to Alberta and Saskatchewan in 1905, but Ottawa retained control over their natural resources until 1930. When ownership was finally transferred to the provinces, the principle of control was that set out in section 109 of the BNA Act of 1867, which reads:

> All lands, mines, minerals, and royalties belonging to the several provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick at the Union, and all sums then due and payable for such lands, mines, minerals, or royalties, shall belong to the several provinces of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick in which the same are situate or arise, subject to any trusts existing in respect thereof, and to any interest other than that of the province in the same.

The intent of the British North America Act at that time was very clear, but it has become less clear through central government practice.

At the same time, the prairie provinces were extended the right to impose direct taxes within the province, a right conferred on the original provinces by section 92.2 of the BNA Act. However, the BNA Act also granted considerable powers to the federal government which were to have far-reaching implications for provincial jurisdiction.

Those far-reaching implications are being felt over a hundred years later in the bill which is before us today. They are implications and not intentions which were established at the beginning of confederation. It is those intentions which are being challenged here today in our opposition to this bill. Specifically, section 91 of the BNA Act conferred upon the Parliament of Canada the authority to regulate trade and commerce and the power to raise money by any mode or systems of taxation. I do not believe that, at the time these powers were conferred on the respective governments in 1867, they were intended to be absolute. Unfortunately, over time, they have become regarded in this way. The provincial view is that provincial Crown ownership is, in the words of Alberta's energy minister Merv Leitch, the "key to the answer to nearly all questions of jurisdiction over natural resources". In this view federal action is limited strictly and absolutely to specified circumstances of truly national dimensions or emergency.

Two early court cases, Smylie v R. (1900) and Brooks-Bidlake v A.G. British Columbia (1923) supported this view. Both cases involved the right of provinces to place certain conditions on the sale of timber abroad. Both judgments ruled in favour of provincial jurisdiction. More recent decisions show that the passage of time has modified legal views on the question of resource ownership. The federal position today is that Section 91 of the BNA Act gives them considerable scope for acting within the realm of resource control. They agree that the two cases I referred to earlier, Smylie and Brooks-Bidlake, do not apply when there is a question of provincial property, proprietary rights, versus federal powers over trade, commerce and taxation.

Two recent Supreme Court decision, Canadian Oil and Gas v. The Government of Saskatchewan (1977) and Central Canada Potash v. The Government of Saskatchewan, seem to support the federal position. In the first case, the government of Saskatchewan expropriated all oil and gas rights in the province and set up royalty and tax structures which would have effectively allowed the government to gather for itself all excess profits resulting from the sharp rise in the price of oil. The Supreme Court ruled that this represented an indirect taxation and was hence beyond provincial control because oil price increases would be passed on to the consumer instead of being taken directly from the producer. Moreover, it was found to intrude upon federal authority over trade and commerce because 98 per cent of Saskatchewan's oil was exported at that time. The second case, Central Canada Potash, involved an attempt by the Saskatchewan government to legislate the rationing of potash production between various producers. The potential of Central Canada Potash would have been greatly reduced by this action, and it appealed to the Supreme Court, which ruled that the issue was one of external trade, and thus the responsibility of the federal government. These decisions were the latest development in a process best summarized by S. I. Bushnell:

> The present trend of the interpretation of the trade and commerce power by the Supreme Court of Canada towards restriction of provincial power over matters which have economic ramifications outside the province, lead to the conclusion that control over natural resources has passed to the dominion through the trade and commerce power.

The decision in this court case is, in fact, one of the most significant in setting this trend toward federal control and ownership of resources. It is this trend, which is being established by precedent, which is so alarming to western Canada. This trend is further fortified by bills like this which set another form of precedent and another form of taking control. This affects the very basis, future, and potential of the provinces.

We have more recently seen the federal government employ the trade and commerce provision to hold down the price of domestic oil and use its tax power to capture the difference between the domestic price and the export price. Efforts by the provinces to halt this process have been countered by federal government measures, which were apparently legal, according to the strictest letter of the law, but which were hardly equitable to the producing provinces.

When one gets down to a debate of legality versus equitability, one finds western Canada to be in an impossible situation, because how can unequal parts ever be equal? When all the power and all the structure is based at the centre, and we are seeking equity, how can we possibly get it when we do not have the legal capacity or the power structure to make the changes? For example, when both Alberta and Saskatchewan attempted to raise royalty rates to take advantage of a massive oil increase in 1973, Ottawa responded by removing deductibility on royalty payments on federal income taxes paid by all companies. Rather than place such a heavy burden on the producers, who backed down? Was it the federal government, which should have backed down in the interest of Canada, in the interest of the region and in the interest of the producer? No, it was the provincial government which backed down in a spirit of compromise and a spirit of reality, it gave in; but by giving in, it gave everything that it had. It gave away the few levers of power that it had in a spirit of good will and in an attempt to come to some sort of compromise. Now it is left with very little.

The Lougheed government is attempting to use the only tool left to it, and that is control over production. However, this federal government and this House of Commons have allowed even that to be taken from Alberta, from the regions, and from the provinces. It has not just affected Alberta. It has affected the whole of Canada. We seem to view this so often as a set-up between a province and the country. But it is not a province versus the country; it is all for the benefit, or should be for the benefit, of the country. However, the federal government is prepared to take back this last tool through what it defines as an emergency. This Energy Supplies Emergency Act leaves very little in the hands of the provinces, and much less than was originally envisaged in the BNA Act of 1867.

In the words of Professor A. Thompson, the game is over if, in addition to setting prices unilaterally, Ottawa can compel the resource-owning provinces to sell. At that point, no real bargaining power is left to the province. De facto expropriation has occurred.

Can we move to de facto expropriation, the federal government, in fact, accomplishing expropriation of its parts? That is the question. Can we? The federal government seems willing to bargain with that, to play with that, and to take that chance of making the big grab; and it is losing all, because I do not think that the western part of this country can possibly accept that one last straw. That is what we are reaching.

It is so hard to explain that in this House of Commons. It is so hard to explain that to hon. members opposite who say we should get on with the issue of the bill when that is, in fact, the heart and soul and the very basic issue of the most important problem facing Canada today. It is that one more little step which is breaking the relationship of the parts to the centre.

Today we are discussing part of the enacting legislation of the National Energy Program which has continued this tradition of federal intrusion into provincial rights, but has again added a new precedent and a new element. Besides continuing to hold the price of oil below world levels and introducing new tax on net revenues, the federal government, for the first time, introduced a natural gas—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Again I must interrupt the hon. member; his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Mr. Speaker, I am also glad to participate in the debate during the report stage of Bill C-57 which is now before the House. In view of the limited time we have on such a fundamental bill, I will try to make my remarks fairly short and concise. I guess this is always an interesting challenge for any hon. member, and it certainly is for this hon. member. I do not intend to become involved with this question of alienation of regions today.

We have heard quite a bit from hon. members, and certainly from those from the west. I think they have justification to feel very aggrieved at certain elements of this excise tax bill, which is what it is, in terms of how it affects the natural resources of a very specific part of the country, namely, western Canada. Without getting into the exchange which has taken place between hon. members from time to time, my fundamental concern with this bill is what will be done if this bill is enacted. Certainly, those in the viewing public and in the galleries must feel that this is pretty dry subject matter. It is the type of thing which does not only relate to regional alienation, but also raises the fundamental question of how the whole parliamentary process alienates the people.

The indexation of excise taxes started out on a quarterly basis, and I gather it is now based on the cost of living on a yearly basis. This really takes away the very real and historic reason as to why there is such an institution as Parliament. You, Your Honour, know well your history, and some of us know our history to a point. This whole parliamentary process started with the fundamental battle of the power of the purse. Parliament was not called together to legislate laws relating to all the social injustices of the land and to pass unemployment insurance bills and medicare bills which have evolved as society has evolved. It was a fundamental fight between the old king and his dukes and lords to try to raise the money so that the king could fight the wars of the crusades. That, in an elementary way and oversimplified to a point, is how Parliament—from the French word "parl" meaning to speak—came to oversee expenditures. I do not know about the ladies but, in effect, the lords and dukes said, "Look, Mr. King, we are going to provide the horses to fight the crusades and money to help pay the soldiers, so we want to have something to say about when we fight and who we fight, or if we fight all the time and whether we are going to have another War of the Roses for 100 years." It is the basic principle, the power of the purse from which the parliamentary system evolved and accordingly, it is how society evolved. At least once a year Parliament had a budget and the elected representatives of the people could decide what would be done with the money.

Some people might suggest that we may be getting into that kind of imperial trapping here with the long-time government by one party. In effect, the people were able to tell the rulers or the prime minister of the day that they did not like a particular tax and that they would not vote for it.

Once the principle of indexation of the excise tax is established, Mr. Speaker, why would the government stop there? Why not have an indexation of income tax and corporation tax? In many countries, as in this, the parliamentary process has fallen into disrepute and it is under attack because of the social order of the day. We all know that of the 150 countries that constitute the United Nations, only about 25 have the type of government that we have.

As the intention of this bill is to index taxes, it is not beyond the realm of argument that the next thing would be to index income taxes and then corporation taxes. In that case, why need Parliament meet? Everything could be tied to a computer and to the cost of living. All we would have to do is push a button at home. That is what I find iniquitous and why I reject this bill.

Traditionally, ministers of finance have had to come into this chamber and face the people who are sent here to talk about finances and the taxes of the day.

The problem is not just the alienation of region against region which appears in this bill, but there is also the potential for a further alienation of the public from the whole parliamentary process.

There is a specific example of this which affects everyone who imbibes at all. It is something about which the working man, about whom we properly hear so much, should be aware and concerned, and that is the effect of indexation of the excise tax on the price of beer. Other members have spoken of how the iniquitous increases are beginning to challenge the way the Canadian consumer spends his leisure time if he wants to have some liquid refreshment. I do not think any country has ever tried to influence social mores by means of a tax bill and I do not think that the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) wants to do this either, but such is the direct effect of the excise tax.

It will mean a 29 per cent increase in the price of beer, a 155 per cent increase in the price of wine, but only a 6 per cent increase in the price of distilled spirits. When this indexation is compounded to 1991, it is clear that the cost of a two-dozen case of small bottles of beer will have increased by 157 per cent and will cost the consumer $23.64. By the same indexing principle, compounded to 1991, a 25-ounce bottle of relatively inexpensive gin will have increased 101 per cent but will only cost $16.42.

It does not take a teetotaler to appreciate the effect this will have on our social mores. We have to recognize that there are those who like to imbibe. Rightly or wrongly, the libation at five o'clock or six o'clock has become a way of life in most western industrialized countries—even in Russia I am told they imbibe the odd vodka. I do not know if they have beer in Russia, but if they do, I am sure that the working man who goes to his commune and votes for his commissars would not put up with a massive increase in the price to the tune of $23.64 for a two dozen case, compared to someone paying $16.42 for his gin or vodka. Revolutions have started on less provocation than the sledge-hammer approach of this excise tax index, compounded to produce this result.

While this appears to be a dry debate, there are elements which have some very real liquid connotations. As long as we talk only about the libation liquid and not about blood in the streets from the revolution which my hon. friend for Halifax-West (Mr. Crosby) mentioned, we need not worry, but all the same, revolutions have been started for less.

I say very seriously that this bill is bad in principle. It means more than the alienation of the region which is involved in the wellhead tax and the production tax on the natural resources of the west when there is no such tax on the natural resources of other parts of the country such as nickel, copper or electricity. The attitude is to grab some money—take it from the well. There will surely be alienation of the people who will be hit by this excise tax compounded and indexed to the cost of living. The government, which is not supposed to profit from inflation, has tried, as we all know, to index away the effects of inflation on personal income tax. But through this bill, if the cost of living goes up, so does the excise tax and the revenue to the government.

For that reason alone, I would have no hesitation in voting against this bill and I am glad to have the opportunity to speak against it this afternoon because of the effect it will have on the parliamentary process.

I see it is just about six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, so before I go on with my other points, may I call it six o'clock?

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m.

At 6 p.m. the House took recess.

[English]

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When the House rose at 6 p.m., the hon. member for Annapolis Valley-Hants (Mr. Nowlan) had the floor.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, in view of the order of the House earlier, I know we have limited time and there are not many minutes left. Without reviewing what I said before the supper break, I do want to say that Bill C-57 is a pretty dry sounding bill. It deals with excise tax and what it will do to Canadians from coast to coast, be they high income or low income Canadians, be they people who like spirits or wine or people who like beer. This bill packs a hefty wallop. Revolutions have been caused by incidents less iniquitous than those contained in this bill. Canadian people who, in the heat of the summer, might like their draught of beer are going to be rather concerned with the indexing provided by this bill. The minister may laugh, he may like the odd beer too, I do not know about that. But Canadians from coast to coast will realize that for the first time we are putting an indexing clause in a tax bill, not to help the aggrieved taxpayer to pay his taxes, but rather a clause whereby taxes will rise if the cost of living increases. This will occur to such an extent that a case of two dozen beer in small bottles, not the great big quarts that people in Atlantic Canada used to know in the days of yore, will increase by 157 per cent by 1991. Therefore, in 1991 a case of two dozen beer will cost $23.64. On the other hand, there will be an increase of 101 per cent on a bottle of gin, whoever drinks that, or vodka and some of the other imported liquor under indexation and the compounding of it, which is adding tax to tax. However, a 25-ounce bottle of gin or vodka will cost $16.42.

This is an iniquitous tax. If this Parliament approves a bill that forever and a day establishes a precedent for future days, not in the days of yore, then all taxes might as well be calculated according to the cost of living index. Why not calculate the personal income tax according to the cost of living index? Why not calculate corporation tax or for that matter any other type of tax in that way?

I say to hon. members that this is a fundamental affront to the whole reason why this place first began many years ago when the old dukes and the lords sat together and addressed the king. I am not referring to Mackenzie King but to the old royal kings. It might have been Mackenzie King, too, but in the old days they said "Look, Mr. King, you cannot fight the wars of the crusades unless we have a say in what you are going to do." That is why Parliament started under the old English system. It was the power of the purse, and who was going to impose taxes. Did the people have the right to send representatives to the capital of the land to discuss taxes?

But when there is an excise tax which affects items in this country, let alone beer which some people like to enjoy, I say it is an iniquitous bill. For that reason alone, I am very happy to speak against it in a constructive way.

I said earlier that we are not talking about the alienation of regions. We all know now that people think different things about members of Parliament, about what members can do and what they cannot do. Many people think that members of Parliament are trying to do things to them through the back pocket or via the open door.

I believe in this place. These are the words of the late right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert whose shadow still falls from time to time on this House, to its betterment. This is the only institution that is the embodiment of the personification of 22 million or 24 million Canadians, however many there may be tomorrow, on June 3, when we are all supposed to sign our census forms. Parliament is the living organ from coast to coast.

I could speak a long time about this. While men opposite, those in government, political adversaries, respected colleagues take a position, and I respect a person who does, I am sad about one thing. I am afraid that government ministers, not those on the back bench, have really lost touch with old Joe Canadian, old Jane Canada, Ms. Canadian, Mrs. Canadian and Mr. Canadian. They have been in power too long. They really have lost touch.

Getting off the subject of beer, which does not make this bill dry but makes it rather interesting, let us come to those things that other members have talked about in a serious vein. My whip tells me that I only have about two minutes left. I will not repeat all that was said about the inequities of the production tax, the 8 per cent wellhead tax, taxation of the natural resources in the west when we do not tax other natural resources such as nickel, copper or electricity in other parts of the country.

After we adjourned, the six o'clock news had confirmation that this national energy policy, which should be called nationalization of energy productivity, has failed. When I walked into the lobby at six o'clock, I heard over television an announcement by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) that those little old Canadians who worried about 18 cents in an election a short two years ago will now pay another nine cents a gallon because this energy policy is failing.

I wonder whether the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Mackasey) would stand in this House and tell us what a gallon of gas—not a litre—costs. Before the nine cents was added at six o'clock, because of what is happening in the national energy scene, the basic price of gasoline in this country was $1.60 a gallon.

The only thing that saved the government and fooled the people was the conversion to metric. We all got tied up with litres—a litre this, a litre here and a litre there. How many people know how many increases there have been since the election? Before tonight there were 11 increases. Eighteen cents was the dishonest open Sesame for the finance minister for whom I have no sympathy because that is how he engineered the takeover.

I understand my time is just about up. While metric and conversion to metric might save the government in the short term, unfortunately, to paraphrase another famous quote, in the long term Canadians from coast to coast are going to rue the day, and Bill C-57 is one of the instruments that should be put down, voted down and talked down by every Canadian from coast to coast.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I will not take too much time in this debate because much of what can be said has already been said. There are two or three points that are probably worth repeating and there are a number of new points I want to make in order that we can tie this matter together. Anyone who happens to have inadvertently tuned into this tonight must surely wonder why the House of Commons is devoting so much time to this piece of legislation, given that there are so many much more basic and fundamental problems confronting the country that ought to be dealt with.

I was speaking to my good friend Sid Parker over supper—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Deans: I realize I should not use his name, but I cannot remember his riding.

Mr. Nowlan: And he's a good friend?

Mr. Deans: He said he cannot help but wonder when we will begin to deal with the fundamental problems confronting the Canadian economy and the people of Canada. If legislation such as this, which under normal, more buoyant conditions would be seen as fine tuning the economy, is brought forward by a government faced with an economy that desperately needs new rings and valves, we have a major problem confronting us. I am surprised that we are being asked to do what we are being asked to do tonight.

I was looking at some statistics that I am sure you, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of your constituents have been looking at and worrying about. I can tell from the additional grey in your hair that it has been bothering you immensely. I know you have recognized in reading over this bill the impact of some of the proposals that have been put before us.

This bill is designed to inflict greater hardship. You would swear that if the government had sat down to find ways to undermine the economic fabric of the country, they would have come up with legislation such as this. If the government had fully understood the problems confronting this nation at the moment, the difficulties facing the average family, whether they live in British Columbia and cannot afford to buy a house, on the east coast and cannot find a job, in central Canada in Ontario or Quebec and find the entire manufacturing sector being undermined or in the mid-west, Alberta or Saskatchewan and see the effect of the government's taxation policies on their natural resources, it would know that people in all regions of this country are asking why, in the face of the evident problems, the tax on natural gas is being raised.

Why is this being done at this time when people are being asked to switch to metric, whether rightly or wrongly, and I will not enter into the debate on its merits at the moment. The government is asking us to switch to metric, but it has not recognized that small businesses in every single part of this country must lay out dollars they cannot recover from the sale of a product or produce they have available for the consuming public. This is simply because of the bank interest rates that have so detrimentally affected their ability to carry inventory.

Why would the government not eliminate the tax entirely on all of the equipment necessary for the very smallest of businesses to convert from today's weights and measures standards to the metric system which for one reason or another the government has decided must be put in place today no matter what the cost or burden?

My colleague for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis) spoke about the effect of this on small business. He pleaded with the government to rethink this ridiculous 50 per cent reduction from their tax burden in order to accommodate the changeover to metric. He pleaded with the government to go the whole way and remove the burden now from people who cannot afford to pay for something they frankly do not think they need. They should not be required to pay the tax at all. It might even be said that the government ought to foot some of the bill. After all, it is the government that made the determination that this changeover must take place.

I do not want to devote a lot of time to another matter that undoubtedly has taken a lot of time of the House over the last few days, namely the changes in tax on beer, wine and spirits. I think my colleague, the hon. member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke (Mr. Parker), said earlier today that this tax was aimed at the beverage of the working man. Is that not always the case. You never seem to tax the beverage of the affluent, you always hit the working man's pint of beer, and it has been that way since time began and taxes were instituted. This government follows that slavishly as if somehow or other there were no alternative ways to meet the tax burden that, over the course of the last many years, it has allowed the consuming public, the taxpaying public and the families of Canada to bear year by year.

This government speaks of its deficit and its tax problems as if somehow or other someone else created the problem or as if this problem were created by some other government. It fails to recognize what everybody else in the country knows, that we have been governed by Liberals for so long, in spite of that brief interlude of government by Conservatives, which reared its ugly right head, the Liberals have to assume the entire responsibility.

There is a tendency on the part of government now to introduce measures that would allow it to benefit directly from inflation. This is not the only government which has indexed its tax system to enable it to benefit from the inflation it claims day by day it is trying to fight. The province of Ontario just recently announced that it too was going to get on the inflation bandwagon as it affects the taxes it raises by indexing its taxes in some areas to the level of inflation so it would be able to reap the benefit of its own inadequacies and mismanagement.

I say to you that when a government is so incredibly negligent in its approach to the levying of taxes and, in fact, to the expenditure of funds generally, one cannot help but wonder whether this country has in fact any possibility of recovery, given that the Liberals have at least three more years to wreak their havoc on everyone.

There is an alternative, however.

An hon. Member: Not the NDP.

Mr. Deans: There is an alternative to these measures. It is an alternative that we in this party, in spite of the bleatings and hootings from certain Liberal backbenchers who rarely get to their feet to speak, suggest could be pursued by this government. It is an alternative that, if the public of Canada were made aware of, and knew what has really taken place, they would embrace.

I suggest to you that my colleague, the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae), when speaking during the question period, put some statistics before the House that are almost mind-boggling. It is hard to believe, without having the information provided by an independent source in front of you, that the conditions of the economy of this country have deteriorated to the level to which they have deteriorated.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that you know, and perhaps two or three other members would know if only they would take off their muzzles, rise to recognize it and do what they really feel they should be doing, that in spite of the fact that the average wage has risen only 150 per cent in the last ten years, the direct taxes levied by this government on the people of Canada, those very same wage earners, has risen by 300 per cent in the same period of time. I know my hon. friend, the member from Revelstoke sitting beside me knows, as I know that other members of the House know, that during that very same period of time bank profits, which the president of the Royal Bank and the Governor of the Bank of Canada seem to think are fair and reasonable in this country, rose by 210 per cent. Remember that wages in those ten years rose by 150 per cent, and taxes on wages in those ten years rose by 300 per cent. Bank profits during those ten years rose by 210 per cent. Do you know what the tax increase was on the banks during that period? Would you believe it was 14 per cent?

How can this government bring forward this piece of legislation which inflicts this burden upon people in this economy who frankly cannot afford to meet the commitment or the bill? At the same time, while sitting back watching the wage earners of this country being ripped off day after day by this government which does not care about their capacity to meet their needs, the government is turning a blind eye to the fact that banks, which have been able to take unfair advantage of the inflationary spiral fed by the policies of this government and its predecessor and supported day after day shamelessly by the Governor of the Bank of Canada and the bank presidents of this country, have seen their tax burden increased by only 10 per cent over ten years. These people who have reaped so much of the benefit over these ten years, with wages, I must say, considerably in excess of the wages of average individuals working eight hours a day, 40 hours a week, 50 weeks a year producing products that should be able to be sold in this country and across the world, these people who have benefited so greatly from government policies and supported by them almost without question, have seen their tax burden increase by only 14 per cent.

Mr. Knowles: That is no burden.

Mr. Deans: As my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), says quite rightly, that is no burden. You have heard, Mr. Speaker, as have I, my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, rise in his place for years putting before the government the plight of the pensioners of Canada, asking the government day after day if it does not understand that the pensioners in this country are unable to meet the ever-increasing cost of living, that they are unable to meet the inflationary spiral that inevitably affects every single part of their life because of the inadequate income levels they receive. Every day he rises and the government turns a deaf ear to that plea.

What purpose does the House of Commons serve if we are not able to deal with the major problems that confront the average individual from coast to coast in this country? What is it that we say to people today as they walk out and away from their homes, not because they do not want to live there, not because they have not worked hard every day or made the effort, but because we, sitting in the House of Commons, have no vehicle for bringing under control the policy of this government which seems bound and determined to undermine the very fabric of the economy of this country and the people who live here? I say to you, Mr. Speaker, this must exist in your constituency as in mine and in that of most other members, and you must have seen the way in which those young families have given almost everything they have to buy a home they were barely able to afford, only to be faced with such an increase in interest rates that not only are they forced to leave the home, but forced to leave their investment in that home behind them because they could not sell it to anyone else at current interest levels. The people who are living in the same communities cannot afford to assume the mortgage either. Why does this House of Commons not have the time to deal with that important matter? Why is it not possible for us to have a debate on what could and should be done to try to resolve that, when we can find time to talk about an excise tax which works an even greater hardship? We should be trying to find solutions to existing problems.

Mr. Young: That's the Liberals.

Mr. Deans: As my colleague, the hon. member for Beaches (Mr. Young), says, "That's the Liberals", and I suppose if we think about it and look back over the years, that is the history of the Liberal party. It has always said many good things, but when it came time actually to perform, the performance has never lived up to the expectations the Liberals have been able to raise.

Any day now the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) will be coming forward with one form or another of wage controls. As I pointed out earlier, wages have fallen far behind for four consecutive years. The wages of workers have fallen behind increases in the cost of living. That has happened for four consecutive years, yet the Minister of Finance, shored up by the Governor of the Bank of Canada, has the audacity—

Mr. Rae: Chutzpah.

Mr. Deans: —or chutzpah, to suggest that somehow these workers whose wages have not even kept pace with the inflationary spiral are responsible for the inflation we have and that he will move by one mechanism or another. He can have TIP or direct wage controls; he can call it what he likes; the fact of the matter is that he will move to restrict further the wages of those people while at the same time allowing the banks to continue to operate as they have. Together with the Bank of Canada and the Government of Canada, the banks have forced prices up and up and up. By a policy decision, they have forced small businesses into bankruptcy in record numbers in the last two years. As a matter of conscious decision they have forced small family farms into bankruptcy right across this country in record numbers over the last two years. As a matter of policy they have decided that there will have to be those who fall by the wayside. Inevitably those who fall by the wayside will be those who had little to begin with, and they will lose what little they have worked for.

I say it is an affront for the government to come forward with a legislative proposal of the type we have in this bill. It is a disgrace that we should be here tonight speaking about these changes, which are unnecessary and destructive, when we should be dealing with much more serious and much more far-reaching problems.

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton South): Mr. Speaker, I am always amused when I hear a member of the New Democratic Party attacking the Liberal government on its energy and economic policies. It is just hilarious. I tell the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) that the New Democratic Party had its chance to support a decent government and its energy and economic policies in 1979. You elected to choose that bunch over there. That is what you have to live with. I think it is ridiculous for the New Democratic Party to come in here tonight and raise hell with the government. Why are you not here defending members of this government? You put them there.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's remarks should be addressed to the Chair.

Mr. Roche: Mr. Speaker, I intended to address you. It is not my intention tonight to delay the continued process of this legislation, which was already been extensively examined, but I cannot remain silent in the face of the deepening crisis respecting the energy policies and price increases which are brought about by the National Energy Program, and I cannot remain silent in the face of the intended actions of the government through Bill C-57.

Not only as an Albertan but also as a Canadian I am opposing the taxes in this legislation in the strongest possible way because of the very serious impact there will be on the industry, our energy future and the economy in general.

The arguments our party has put forward in opposing this legislation have been very clearly and extensively delineated, particularly by my colleague, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), who did an outstanding job in his analysis, and the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson) and the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave), who also made distinctive contributions to this debate.

What are we facing here tonight? As was the case in the Constitution debate, again the government is impervious to the comments of hon. members who have a larger view of the power and the potential of Canada than the narrow, centralist concept espoused, most notably by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his chief energy aid, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde). As a result of what I call the continued centralist introspection which comes through in the government's policies and legislation, particularly respecting the Constitution, energy and economic fields, we have a country which is tied up in knots.

I returned this morning from a conference of educators in Winnipeg. We were discussing some of the larger questions of development and Canada's role therein. Some of those educators from across Canada turned their attention to the inability of Canada to make clear, comprehensive policies in the development field when we are at such an impasse in our federal-provincial relations. The people who were there this morning are intelligent, and they were asking why we have this continued impasse in federal-provincial relations in this country. It is madness, so much so that one person even suggested that if somebody could figure out a way to solve the federal-provincial deadlock and stop the wars which are going on in this country, that person would deserve the Nobel peace prize.

What we have now is a second imposition of a cutback in production by the province of Alberta. Alberta has now cut back production by 120,000 barrels a day in an effort to make clear to the federal government that a fair and just energy policy and pricing scheme and formula must be arrived at in the interests of all Canadians. We have had imposed on us a levy at the pump to pay for the resulting increased importation of oil.

We already know we are paying $5.5 billion a year—perhaps it will go up to $6 billion before this year is out—for imported oil while oil is lying in the ground in Canada which could be used instead. We have been through this many times in the House of Commons. I will not delay the debate any more tonight except to ask, on behalf of the people who sent me here and on behalf of Canadians as a whole, when this impasse will come to an end. When will we stop seeing oil rigs being driven out of the oil-producing provinces? Up to now, 139 oil rigs have been driven out of the country; 63 more are to follow. Each one of them is worth at least 60 jobs. Drilling activity is down 50 per cent. Canadians are being asked to put up with all of this. That is a policy of madness.

Is it too late? I do not believe it is too late. The people of western Canada are very anxious and concerned. They do not want to turn their backs on the rest of Canada. And I do not want to be accused of being an alarmist or crying wolf when I say again that the incidence of separatist feeling is increasing in western Canada and particularly in my own province of Alberta. I want to say that to the government again in a plea to have them hear voices other than the 20 people in Ottawa who, according to Richard Gwyn, have the ear of the Prime Minister. The Alberta gas co-ops sent 126 oil and gas well service industry representatives to Ottawa to speak in very clear terms of severe cutbacks, lay-offs, massive budgetary reductions and idle drilling rigs, and I want to know why those distinguished industry representatives cannot be heard here. Let me quote, Mr. Speaker, just one paragraph from their brief. It is well worth hearing again. They said:

> On behalf of our members, and for the benefit of all Canadians who are, or will, use natural gas or natural gas by-products as a source of energy, we protest the imposition of the recently announced natural gas excise tax.
> This excise tax will have particularly harsh effects on those with low or fixed incomes, unskilled wage earners, elderly pensioners, and farmers who have only limited opportunity to recover this additional cost.

Now, Mr. Speaker, are the Alberta gas co-ops not worth listening to? Is the Alberta Chamber of Commerce, which submitted a brief along the same lines, not worth hearing? These are the voices of responsible, moderate and productive groups in our country who want to move Canada into an era of high production, one of which we are capable and which must be achieved if we are to have energy self-sufficiency before the year 2000. I have already lost hope that we will have it by 1990. These people ask, and properly so, why is it that our resources are to be taxed when others, such as gold, uranium and hydroelectric power found in other provinces, are not? That is a question I would invite some member of the government to stand up tonight and answer. I would like to know why the government is so determined to nationalize the petroleum industry, why we see this same kind of philosophy in its attempted takeover of the CDC, a philosophy which we see espoused in so many of the government's policies.

We in Alberta, Mr. Speaker, want to participate fully in the continued development of our country. I say to you that the Prime Minister, who is giving some attention these days to North-South problems, is not going to achieve gains in the North-South if he is unable to solve some of the east-west tensions in our own country. That is something which needs the attention of our government in a much larger way, taking into account the responsible voices who are pleading with the government to get on with the job of developing our country and allow each region to participate fully so that we can proceed together in a world that needs our productive ability. It is not right that bankruptcies are up 300 per cent in one year in Alberta, a province that is supposed to have one of the most dynamic economies in our country. The deleterious effects of the cutback in oil production in Alberta are being felt in the secondary industrial aspects of our society.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that the combination of constitutional, energy and economic policies carried on by this government, which we see continued tonight in the government's determination to push Bill C-57, are destructive and are going to destroy our country. I do not want to be around in a few years' time when my children come to me and say: "Where were you when it was clearly apparent what was happening to our country, where was your voice?" I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that here I am, one of many people in this House representing millions of people who are fed up with the way in which our country is being mismanaged. This government must really be a lover of animals because I am telling you, it is sending our country to the dogs tonight.

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I am going to be reasonably brief in my remarks this evening. First of all, I want to do as my colleague, the hon. member for Edmonton South (Mr. Roche) did and direct a few words at the previous speaker, the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) who had the audacity, the bravery, the courage to take on the banks from the very, very safe position of being unable to do a confounded thing about it. He knows very well that in doing that, by supporting his friends across the way as that party did a year or so ago, he will never be able to do anything about it. I want to go on record as well as having said to my friends on the left that they had an opportunity to put into place a government that would have taken action on all of our economic problems and they blew it.

An hon. Member: You too defended Bouey.

Mr. Ellis: And my guess is that they will continue to blow it.

Tonight I want to deal with one very small segment of this bill, that is motion No. 9 in the name of the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), and I thank him for putting it on the Order Paper. He and I had some discussions on this, and while I could not possibly attend the various meetings in committee—and I make no bones about the fact that I do not get very involved in tax bills—they bother me more than just a little bit. Nonetheless, this particular item is one in which I am particularly interested. It has to do with the removal of the provision for commercial air service operators to deduct the tax on aviation gasoline used in flight training. This is an example, Mr. Speaker, of the government, as it has done in the past, taking a pot-shot at a very small segment of the economy, one with very little ability to fight back because it is not as big as the airlines, the banks or many other segments of the economy. In fact, it is made up of some very fine people who are very concerned about that segment of the economy.

The commercial air service operators who provide flight training are very concerned that the importance of this training is being lost sight of, as evidenced by these tax measures. In the mini-budget of April 21 last year, the sales tax exemption for commercial aircraft was amended to exclude aircraft used in flight training. In the same budget it was confirmed that refunds of the excise tax on aviation gasoline, which was imposed in December, 1978 ostensibly for non-commercial users, would not be available for flight training activity.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to take a moment and put on the record a picture of one of these small fixed-base operators. The one I will use as an example is a man named Jim Marker. Jim Marker has been involved in the education of students of flying in the Belleville area. In fact, he has been involved in all sorts of flying in the Belleville area for these many years. He is a very dedicated man. I doubt very much if he has ever taken a cent out of the business which he has supported so loyally for these past two decades. As a matter of fact, I know he has put money into the business on a regular basis. In fact, his position as a vice-president of a major corporation in the Belleville area is all that allows him to do this job as well as he does.

There was a need for better facilities for flying in the Belleville area a couple of decades ago. At that time there were no government measures which would allow for the development of this sort of industry in a small community like Belleville. Jim Marker bought the land, and having bought it he cleared it, cut down the trees and made it ready. He erected a small building on it to act as an office and a centre for pilots. It contained a room in which pilots would receive their ground schooling. In the very early days, of course, in the spring, it was all mud, so Jim went out and bought gravel with money out of his own pocket and spread that gravel on the runway to keep the mud down.

Obviously, any activity of this sort requires aircraft. So Jim went out and bought the aircraft, again out of his own pocket. In order to repair the aircraft he trained himself to be a first class mechanical engineer capable and licensed by the Department of Transport to repair aircraft. When it was obvious in the wintertime that the cost of having the snow removed from the runway to allow flights in the wintertime would be too expensive, Jim went out and bought a secondhand grader. He keeps the grader in excellent shape in order to keep the runway clear through all types of weather, all winter long.

In the summertime, of course, grass grows up over the runway, for it is a grass airstrip. While I had an opportunity in the few years when I was mayor of the city of Belleville to quietly help him by lending him some parks equipment every once in a while, to keep the grass under control, that has not been the case since. So Jim went out and bought a tractor to cut his own grass. He rides around in the evening and on Saturdays to cut the grass, since it is necessary to keep it done. He has built more hangars. In fact, he has been the strongest supporter of general aviation in the area that this country has ever seen. He stands out as a monument, as one who has devoted a good part of his life to general aviation. Now, Mr. Speaker, Jim will be taxed again. He has one voice in this House of Commons, and I am proud to be that voice. I hope that members of the House will understand that I am speaking on behalf of all the Jim Markers all across Canada who are oppressed by this particular tax.

The commercial flying training segment of the Canadian air transport industry has, over the years, served Canada very well, not only in times of national emergency but through its continued support in the development of the vital Canadian air transport system. This segment of the industry formed the nucleus for the British Air Commonwealth training program, a major contribution throughout all of the Second World War.

The benefits of a vigorous air transport industry to the development of Canada and its economic and cultural growth have been well recognized. The survival and the continued growth of this dynamic industry is dependent upon the preservation of a healthy, well-equipped and professional pilot training service. It is essential that Canada maintain an adequate pool of well-trained and experienced pilots to meet the present and future requirements for all classes of commercial air services, as well as government air services, corporate operations, military support and any future national emergencies. I know that one of the young men who trained in the Belleville area now flies for Air Canada. I should not really say only one, Mr. Speaker, since I know that there are more than one, there are a few. Some have gone to the military. The interest in flying training is something that, when engendered in a young man, usually turns out for the best of the country. Without that vital support, the Canadian air transport industry would be unable to accommodate the requirements of the public for essential air services from Canadian resources.

It is obvious that up to date professional training organizations play an important role in achieving and maintaining an acceptable level of Canadian flight safety, not only within the air transport industry but throughout the private and corporate sectors as well. Acquisition of modern, well-equipped aircraft is essential in order to train pilots to operate safely and efficiently in today's complicated environment. Flying training facilities and operations traditionally receive an exceptionally low potential return on investment, particularly as potential pilot entry into commercial aviation must, of necessity, be within an age group which is not able to afford high cost training.

As I said a moment ago, Jim Marker has probably not taken a red cent out of his operation in Belleville, yet it is open to people who fly across Canada. We have pilots who drop in to Jim Marker's facilities; the guest book is filled with people's names, from east, west, south and north. They land and use the facilities at no cost. There is no $5 landing fee in Belleville.

It must be recognized that virtually all flying training schools, such as the one about which I have been speaking, and clubs, are also licensed to conduct other commercial air services, some of which are exempt from the sales tax and gasoline excise tax. Mr. Marker has a small charter operation and runs some sightseeing flights. He maintains personnel at his facilities year round to service aircraft. He also maintains pilots and instructors who are on duty all the time. With relatively small fleets of aircraft, it is not possible to dedicate an aircraft to any one class for which the operator is licensed, but the aircraft must be utilized in all phases of the operation. The same aircraft Jim uses to take someone up to do aerial photography is the one that I may well use, if I happen to be in Belleville. Just recently I took the mayor, the city manager and some other very important people from the Moira River Conservation Authority for a flight up and down the Moira River. At that time the river was in flood and some 500 or 600 acres of the city were under water and many thousands of acres outside the city. The same aircraft I used for that trip will be used for flying training one day and for a charter flight the next.

It is also important, of course, to learn appropriate lessons from past experience. In 1977, in the national interest, the Department of Manpower and Immigration deemed it necessary to restrict the issuance of Canadian work permits to foreign helicopter pilots. As a result of this action, it became necessary for Employment and Immigration Canada to establish and support a two-year training program at a cost of some $2 million to upgrade the skills and experience level of Canadian pilots to ensure that Canada could continue to provide the necessary helicopter air services in the public interest. This experience graphically emphasizes the importance of maintaining policies which will support provision of regular and continuous professional pilot training and the economic fallacy of eroding this segment of the industry. Having regard to this fact, Mr. Speaker, it appears to be entirely inconsistent to now impose tax measures which would burden flying training costs and inhibit this activity.

A further adverse effect has now been produced by the sales tax on aircraft parts and equipment, inasmuch as such items bought for transportation of persons, freight or mail, if also used for flying training, will be fully taxed despite their part use for tax exempt activity.

As I said when I started out, this is a very narrow segment of the bill. It is one which is of importance to maybe a dozen hon. members in the House on both sides. However, it is extremely important. It is often overlooked. The little airport in Belleville which is run by Jim Marker, as I said earlier, does not charge $5. If the hon. member from Essex-Windsor (Mr. Whelan) happens to be flying over in his aircraft and finds he has to land, he can get in there safely. He knows that the radio facilities which are there are provided free of charge. There is no input from the federal government. Here we are, adding another tax on top of all of those taxes that the ordinary user of aircraft gasoline is faced with. The figure last fall was around 13 cents a litre, and now it is closer to 17 cents a litre. That is just in taxes and fees charged by the various levels of government against the private aircraft user, and particularly those who are using it for flying training.

It is coming at us from all sides. At another time and in another place, I intend to spend some time talking about the effect of the move by the Department of Revenue to reduce the income tax exemption for flying training to 35 hours. That is another very unsafe way of collecting a very few pennies. However, those few pennies are very important to those of us who are involved in flying training. They are very important to a segment of the economy in which people have dedicated a tremendous part of their lives to this very important activity. I want to say, as strongly as I possibly can, that this motion No. 9, in the name of the hon. member for Edmonton West is one that I want to support as strongly as I possibly can.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): I thank Your Honour for the opportunity to make some remarks on Bill C-57 which is now before the House, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act. At the outset, I would say that it is not my intention to direct my remarks to all the provisions of this bill of which there are 133, but rather I want to look at some of the background of these specific provisions which we now have before us and consider them in the light of the policies from whence they come.

It is simplistic to say that the provisions for the implementation of the government's tax measures are contained in this bill. In order to understand them and appreciate the basis for those provisions, we must look at what the government intends in terms of its revenue gathering and its aims and goals for the people of Canada which it exercises through its taxation policy. Just this weekend in the maritimes we have seen evidence of the conflicting views which exist in Canada with respect to the goals for the nation, and for the goals of the private sector versus those of the public sector, and how those goals intermesh.

The Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau), in a speech before the Council of Maritime Premiers in Fredericton, New Brunswick, just this past day, said that the federal government can no longer take responsibility for redistributing wealth in Canada and that it has lost control of the resources and the financial capability of Canada to the extent that it can no longer take on this responsibility. Premier Lougheed of Alberta, speaking in Halifax just the day before, indicated in his speech that he welcomes that. He welcomes it for a very good reason, because through Canada, in the private sector and among the provinces, there is the ability to accomplish many of the goals through the exercise of the abilities and capabilities of the private sector.

Therefore, the Prime Minister, in suggesting to Canadians that his federal government can no longer take responsibility for redistributing the wealth of Canada may, in the end result, be appealing to a sense of entrepreneurship which has not been exercised here in Canada heretofore. The province of Alberta, through the private sector in Alberta, and acting through the government of Alberta, may be willing to take up that challenge and achieve these goals in that particular area. This challenge would not only be for that particular area, but for all Canadians. So we must realize that behind the taxation measures which we see before us is the real government policy, the real strength of this nation in terms of what we are able to accomplish through policies and through government and the different trends which have now become evident.

As I have already indicated, on the one part the Premier of Alberta is taking the attitude and the position that the private sector can accomplish much, while on the other, the Prime Minister of Canada is saying that unless drastic measures are taken the government can no longer take responsibility for redistributing wealth in Canada. We have to ask, who ever asked the Prime Minister of Canada to take that kind of responsibility? Certainly we want and require a level of services which is standardized throughout Canada so that all Canadians will receive services. However, to go beyond that and to talk about the authority and the power to redistribute wealth is an entirely different proposition. Therefore, when the Prime Minister of Canada stands before the Council of Maritime Premiers and before Canadians and says that he no longer has the ability to redistribute wealth in Canada, many people welcome that remark and say that it never was his authority, and that it never was his responsibility to take on that challenge.

I want to relate some of those general remarks to the provisions in this bill because what we are looking at is an attempt to regain that ability to redistribute wealth and to regain the power and authority to gather in all the funds, the money which gives authority to that power. In the world we live in we have to recognize that money is power, that those who control the purse strings and those who have the financial resources can exercise control well beyond the simplistic dollars which are involved, because, as I have said, money is power in so many ways. So we have to look at these provisions in that light. Is this really an attempt to gain power? What is the government trying to do through the exercise of its legislative authority through this House of Commons under Bill C-57?

I say to Your Honour and to other people in this House that it is merely an implementation of a government policy to gain the financial capability which it perceives it has lost. Therefore, in spite of the Prime Minister's words, he does want, and he wants on behalf of his government and his party, to regain the ability to redistribute wealth in Canada and, in that way, control not only the private sector and that which is rightfully in the public sector, but control the whole economy. We have to look at the provisions of Bill C-57 in that light.

In that connection, I want to refer to the change which is evident in federal-provincial financial arrangements which have already been announced by the Government of Canada and by the Prime Minister, and have been evidenced by his establishment, through this House of Commons, of the task force on federal-provincial fiscal arrangements. Again we see this shift and concern on the part of the Government of Canada for its eroding position in relation to its revenue-gathering abilities, and as it relates those revenue-gathering abilities to its capacity to control the economy and the people of Canada.

What we have through this federal-provincial task force is a vehicle to spread the message of the Government of Canada, which we hear time and time again in this House in other ways and which we see evidenced here in this Bill C-57; that is, that the government needs more money. That is its problem. It is not getting its money.

I will explain why the Government of Canada is not getting the money that it needs to exercise the kind of financial and economic control that it has in the past. The reason is very simple. It is that the wealth of this country has shifted from the manufacturing sector, from the pure business community, to the natural resource community; that is to say, the wealth of this country is now evidenced by its natural resources and its ability to deal with those natural resources. The funds from them are now very clearly flowing to the provinces and the people who control the natural resources; they are not going through the same process as they have gone through in the past. In particular, that means that those who control the manufacturing and secondary industries in this country no longer have the financial clout and power that they had in the past. The government has to adjust to this change.

What the government is really doing is shifting taxation to that resource area in a way that has not been done in the past. What is at stake is not any great policy; it is just the gathering of dollar bills and the philosophy that with those dollar bills the future of this country can be controlled. We must examine the provisions of Bill C-57 in that light and ask what the end product will be, and why the government is moving in this direction.

Even though I come from eastern Canada, a part of the country that does not share the resource revenues at the present time, I have sympathy for the western provinces and for the philosophy espoused by Premier Lougheed in Halifax, Nova Scotia, the other night.

What the premier is objecting to is this reaction by the Government of Canada to the shift in power. The government is not willing to let the economy take its course, and transmit wealth. It is holding on to what it perceives as belonging to it in a way that works to the detriment of those people in the private sector and the resource-producing provinces which now have control of this wealth. It is not a simple matter of legislating a tax by means of this bill; it is a matter of legislating, assisting and conniving the transfer of power that the government seeks through this bill.

What I am referring to, Mr. Speaker, is the 8 per cent tax on petroleum and natural gas that will be imposed when this bill is passed. I realize and recognize, as do many Canadians, that to a great extent this will benefit many people in Canada. But we have to ask ourselves whether the fact that it is beneficial to a great many people is justification for the action. It is a question to which I am prepared to answer that I do not think it is the proper way to do it—to legislate through this Parliament the transfer of authority from the provincial authority that has these resources, to the federal authority that wants to hold on to its ability to redistribute wealth in Canada.

There are other methods to accomplish the same end but they involve agreement, reconciliation and understanding between the regions of the country. The ultimate result of enforced policy is rejection of that policy. That is what will happen if Parliament insists on this transfer of wealth through a legislative provision which implements a government policy of requiring that wealth produced by the resources of western Canada, and in particular Alberta and Saskatchewan, being transferred back to the central authority by means of an act of Parliament.

I do not believe that will work, Mr. Speaker. I believe that the government is making a serious mistake in taking that approach to the problem. It is avoiding the real issue, which is that there is a rationalization through which we can reach a mutual agreement for a sensible pricing formula for oil and gas. I realize that it may not be the price that the premier of Alberta would like and it may not be the price that we in eastern Canada are willing to pay at this point because we want the lowest acceptable price that can be enforced on the people of western Canada, and the governments concerned, for their oil and gas.

I think this bill avoids the real issue, Mr. Speaker. The government may think that it is solving its immediate problem by gathering revenue through this source, but an enlarged problem faces us in the years ahead. That problem can only be resolved if agreement is reached on what is a fair and equitable distribution of the resources and the proceeds of the sale of the oil and gas owned by the western provinces.

I am not one of those who says that we should go through with this because we in the east will benefit from it and it will remove our immediate problem. I think the problem has to be attacked on a broader base. The government is shying away from its responsibility in this area and it is just simplistic to blame the governments of Alberta and, to a certain extent, Saskatchewan, for the failure to reach agreement on an appropriate price for oil and gas and to substitute this taxation measure for that agreement.

I think that members on this side of the House are right when they object to Parliament being a party to the enforcement of this government policy. The government, concerned with its eroding position with respect to revenues, is simply using this taxation policy as a means of transferring resources.

In the case of the east coast, that area of Canada which borders on the Atlantic Ocean and which claims submarine lands that lie under it, the government is not even giving it the benefit of a statutory implementation of its policy; it is simply attempting to seize those resources, whereas it is depriving the western provinces through a taxation policy. The government will not face up to the claim of the provinces of Nova Scotia and Newfoundland to these resources. It simply denies their claim and uses its powers and capacity as the central authority to seize them.

This is more than a shame for the Government of Canada, Mr. Speaker; it is a shame for all members of Parliament opposite who participate in it. They are denying to the people of the Atlantic coast, particularly in the provinces of Nova Scotia and Newfoundland, the possibility of going beyond their dependence on federal transfer payments and federal welfare payments and moving into a new era where the resources can be developed for the benefit of the people.

We can see how the central government contributes to this strife and difficulty which sets region against region. I hope we on the east coast will not be drawn into the centralist view of coming down on those western provinces which have, by their own fortuitous circumstances, achieved a measure of wealth. I hope that we will not support the federal government in this war on western Canada and the seizure of its assets on the basis that the federal government will distribute those assets across Canada, perhaps to the momentary benefit of eastern Canada.

It is evident from the policy of the government on Bill C-48, the Canada Oil and Gas Act, that it plans the same kind of future for Newfoundland and Nova Scotia if those provinces are able to achieve the level of resource richness enjoyed in western Canada.

Whether hon. members opposite recognize it or not, the central government is setting itself not only against the western area of the country but against the east coast as well. It will not be very long before the province of Newfoundland and the province of Alberta are joined in battle. The battle they will be joining is the implementation of the policy now before us. Through its legal capabilities, its lawyers, its counsel, its many consultants, the federal government knows a great many techniques by which to accomplish its end. Unfortunately, the new techniques which the government uses to accomplish its ends are not acceptable to the people of Canada. The technique of establishing a taxation policy to accomplish ends that were not intended to be within the power and authority of the Government of Canada are not acceptable. But that is what is happening via this bill. The government is using its taxation policy to accomplish its end, and its end is the control of wealth in Canada. That would be acceptable only if the control of wealth was for the purpose of establishing and supporting federal programs required by all Canadians. But that is not the end purpose of the Government of Canada. Its purpose is to go further and control all Canadians and to gain control for the purpose of perpetuating itself in office, and for no higher purpose than that.

Let me turn to some of the specific provisions in the bill beyond that provision to which I have already referred, and that is the taxation on natural resources, in other words, our oil and gas. There are other areas in which the government has tried to enforce its policy. I am thinking of the taxation of beer and wine which again is unacceptable to a great many people. We ought to foster, through government policy, moderation in the use of spirits. We ought to ensure that taxation permits moderation and encourages people to utilize beer and wine, the more moderate spirits, over the alcoholic liquors. There are many other things I could mention but as my time is coming to an end, I want to conclude by saying that there are serious objections to this bill. We will have to take them into consideration when we vote.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join in the debate on Bill C-57. Essentially I want to talk about the impact this bill will have on the artists of Canada.

Various speeches have been made in this House outlining some of our objections to this bill. I understand even the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has talked about the inequities and evil of taxing spirits covered by this bill. In any event, I leave that topic to other members.

I wish to speak on the imposition of the sales tax on prints and original works of art, of which there are limited editions and copies. I shall talk about the government's stupidity in imposing a sales tax on these works of art. This is a provision about which the whole artistic community is scratching its head. In fact, the artistic community is downright angry at the blatant lack of wisdom in the imposition of such a tax under Bill C-57. What the bill essentially fails to do is to distinguish between original prints and reproductions manufactured by mechanical means. It is the inability of people in the Department of Finance to see that difference and to express that difference in law.

What the proposal will do is to reclassify artists and master printers as manufacturers. This is something which the visual artists in this country are not quite willing to accept. The effect of Bill C-57 will make works of art more expensive. It will make it more difficult for artists to sell their work to the private sector and to galleries. The income of over 50 per cent of full-time artists is roughly $6,000 a year or less, and making their work more expensive will make it more difficult for them to sell it. A fair number of individual artists supplement their income by having a run of sometimes 30, 40 or, at the most, 100 prints. These are wood block prints, stone prints and various other kinds of prints. These prints are generally sold through galleries. They provide an important subsidy to many visual artists. The sale of prints is also very important to a fair number of galleries. The selling of prints is generally the bread and butter for a lot of small private commercial galleries. This tax imposes an extra burden. It also adds an extra burden on the publishing and printing industry, that small section of our publishing industry which prints original fine art graphics. This tax is a needless hindrance. As well, it has some interesting implications with regard to the general acceptance of the free flow of art through international boundaries. Through this bill we will create a blockage, if you can call it such, of works of art coming in from other countries.

Most of the Inuit and native people's art consists of variations of prints. Again, an extra tax is being imposed on this art form. It is a stupid piece of legislation because it will cost more to collect the tax than the amounts of money which will accrue to the government. It is a blind interference in the art community. Furthermore, this tax will be difficult to apply. It will be a bureaucratic nightmare.

Through this bill, the government is discriminating against a particular form of art. Prints are one form of art. There are other forms of art, for instance, oils, acrylics and so on. What this tax does is to make one particular type of art form more expensive because of the extra sales tax being imposed on print making.

The artistic community has long felt that the government does not have a coherent artistic and cultural policy for Canada. The artistic community has long complained that the actions of one ministry work against the interests and the programs of another ministry. Tonight we have a typical example of how the actions and the thinking of a group of bureaucrats in the tax department are totally at odds with the stated intention of the government in the area of cultural policy.

Right now we have the Applebaum committee which is travelling across the nation trying to put together a coherent government policy on culture. Members of this committee are listening to representations and receiving briefs from right across Canada. Yet the government does not wait for those recommendations and findings to come in. The government is acting on its own in this area. It is an area which will certainly not win the government any points in the artistic community. Instead, the government will make it more difficult for artists to survive in Canada and it will force some artists to leave Canada and attempt to sell their prints in the United States. This bill will not help the young collector, for example, the young professional person who wishes to start a small modest art collection. These are the people who generally start their collections by buying a few prints. Now the cost of prints will be even higher.

In the well thought out document entitled "A Strategy for Culture" put together by The Canadian Conference of the Arts, the authors urged that there should be tax incentives for private investors. Yet the opposite is to be found in Bill C-57 which is before us tonight. The authors of this document urge that taxation policies should be used in a systematic way as a vehicle to encourage cultural development. But we have the exact opposite in this bill tonight. The writers also urge that the visual artists and craftsmen should, in all cases, be exempt from paying sales tax on materials and production equipment and from charging sales tax on their finished work. What we have tonight is the very opposite. We have a government which has set up commissions and which states certain goals, but in its action does exactly the opposite. This is not only true in the cultural field. We have seen examples of this in many other fields. There is always the promise, always the good talk. In fact, someone called it the sweet talk from the Liberals. However the reality is to be found in what the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) says and does.

The government has indicated that it wants to develop a coherent cultural policy. However, the history of this government in the area of culture is a dismal one. Most of the major artistic institutions in this country are on the verge of bankruptcy, yet there is no immediate action from this government. All we get is another royal commission. We have artists leaving the country because they cannot make a living in Canada selling their works of art. Instead of offering assistance, the government makes it even more difficult for artists to survive in this country.

In one of their major recommendations, the Canadian Conference of the Arts recommended that the Department of Communications have some muscle, that it have some influence in what other departments do and what their policies are in terms of the arts. Bill C-57 in front of us clearly indicates that the minister in charge of cultural affairs in Canada has very little power in cabinet, even when it comes to such a minor matter, and it surely is minor to the government, as sales tax on prints.

I again return to the question of why the government is doing this. Is there any rationale? Surely fundamental wisdom would suggest that it is more of a hassle imposing this tax than it will be a benefit. The amount of money collected under this tax will be negligible. The cost of enforcing it will surely be more than what will be collected under the tax. What gives? Where is the rationale? There is no rationale.

I suggest this is just a blind bureaucracy grinding along, having its own impetus, its own power to drive it forward. Rational arguments cannot stop it. It is honest to suggest that what we find in this bill is not rationality but irrationality. It will not benefit anybody. It will hinder the growth and development of Canadian artists in this country.

In conclusion, this provision in Bill C-57 is not one that will earn the government many high points in the artistic community of this country. They will view this as another example of a blind bureaucracy grinding away with a total lack of commitment and will to make certain that we have a coherent cultural policy. Even on such a small matter they cannot be swayed from their determined path. It is an indication to the artistic community that we have a government which, despite all its brave words about Canadian culture, is not willing to take some positive steps in that direction but in fact is so ignorant that it imposes further hardships on artists in Canada today.

For that reason, and for the many other reasons my colleagues have mentioned during this debate, we will not be able to support the bill in front of us this evening.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I thought I would have a good lead-in if I followed the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby). I now find I have an equally good lead-in following the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong). He talked about confusion. I have never seen a more confused bill in my life. It is from beginning to end a mass of confused notions bringing together such disparate elements as indexation of a variety of products such as beer, tobacco and wine on the one hand, and on the other petroleum, aviation, aviation fuel, flying training, prints and books. To cap it all, there is a shift from the imperial to the metric system in measuring some of the matters on which there will be levies.

We probably have to put it down to the fact that this bill is no more than a desperate search for funds required to live up to commitments which had better not been made at all. It is a frantic look for funds. In order to deal with the unusual purchase of Petrofina, which produced not one additional drop of petroleum in this country at a cost of $1.5 billion, there is to be a levy on all home owners for heating and all car owners for driving.

Instead of investing in Canada, this government seems determined to invest in Belgium, Saudi Arabia, Venezuela, and Mexico when the billions that are going overseas might be better spent here. In order to make up for that loss, there has been a scrambling around with this bill. I have forgotten how many pages there are. I am working at pages 75 and 76 because I think that is the convenient place to work.

An hon. Member: There are 116.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): The bill has 116 pages. It is a desperate effort to find more funds. I mention that one of the peculiarities of this bill is that in one set of clauses they deal with the levy on absolute alcohol content. There is to be a levy there of 54 cents per gallon on absolute alcohol content. I am not quite sure I know what absolute alcohol content is, but I stress the point that the tax is to be levied at so many cents per gallon. That is on page 75. In the next section we see that there is a levy of 27 cents per gallon on absolute alcohol, and in the third one, five cents per gallon on beer or malt. In the next part dealing with tobacco, cigars and cigarettes, it is so much per pound or per thousand. Going to the bottom of page 76, we find they talk about absolute ethyl alcohol. The ethyl is obviously metric. Here we have so many dollars per hectolitre. I defy anybody on the opposite side of the House to make a comparison and tell me how much $11.88 per hectolitre is in dollars per gallon. Is there anyone opposite who can do so? I bet the Metric Commission cannot do it. How about it? How many dollars per gallon is $11.88 per hectolitre? Work it out. While they are working it out, I will go to the next one.

• (2140)

They are still trying to figure that out over there. You can talk about confusion, but why should one type of absolute alcohol have a levy placed on it per gallon, and poor old ethyl be subject to a metric level?

An hon. Member: What about Mabel?

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): They have not got to "mabel" syrup at all. In any event, this is just one of the idiocies or confusions brought about by this particular bill.

Have you got it worked out yet? Apparently he has not.

On the serious side, and that is serious enough, we have to wonder whether the government should really be using tax incentives or disincentives to change the drinking patterns of the people of this country. You know what this government has done? We have a breakdown of the statistics on the changes in drinking habits of the people of this country from 1974 to 1980. There has been a drop in the consumption of beer as a result of levies placed on it, I think per gallon, but I am not sure, of 3.6 per cent over a matter of nine months, and a drop in wine consumption, but an increase of 4.6 per cent in the consumption of distilled spirits. This may very well be because of the distinction between gallons and litres, a litre being smaller with more of it being bought, but in any event there was an increase in the consumption of distilled liquor. I think that is a very dangerous trend. I am sure all our police forces in this country would deplore this emphasis on hard liquor, as certainly the beer industry does.

I wonder, however, whether it is the distilling industry which has this particular government by the left hand, that is urging it to increase the levy on beer while decreasing the levy percentagewise on distilled spirits in order that it can contribute more to that Liberal party.

I should like to draw the attention of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), since he cannot calculate the difference between gallons and hectolitres, to the economic effect of this shift in consumption from high to low alcoholic content beverages on the agricultural industry. The economic impact on the brewing industry and on the agricultural producers, who depend on the brewing industry, will be severe. That is pointed out in a letter I have from the Brewers Association of Canada. Some 63 per cent of the value of agricultural products destined for use in producing all domestically consumed alcoholic beverages is purchased by the brewing industry, and it is being taxed more heavily. If beer sales continue to decline, the brewing industry agricultural purchases, which amounted to almost $100 million in 1979, will decline accordingly. According to the figures which are produced here, that decline will turn out to be something of the order of 8 per cent or 9 per cent.

I should like to go on and quote further from this particular letter. I admit that it is biased in favour of the brewing industry and against the distilling industry, but the indexation notion is criticized severely.

I see the Speaker is becoming a little anxious. I reserve my right to come back to this when the matter comes forward again under other amendments.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

The House resumed from Friday, May 29, consideration of the motion of Mr. Kaplan that Bill C-61, respecting young offenders and to repeal the Juvenile Delinquents Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Lawrence (p. 9497).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being 9.45 p.m., pursuant to an agreement made earlier this day, the House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred division on the motion standing in the name of the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence), an amendment to Bill C-61, an act respecting young offenders and to repeal the Juvenile Delinquents Act.

Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Lawrence), which was negatived on the following division:

IMPACT OF INCREASE IN PRICE OF GASOLINE ON FISHERMEN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order No. 43. Since the disavowal of the East Coast Fisheries and Boundary Treaties by the American administration, excessive overfishing on Georges Bank has glutted the American markets for cod and haddock, resulting in a 33 per cent drop in prices to Canadian fishermen in 1981 as compared with 1980. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie):

That this House deplores the complete lack of principle and concern shown by the government in increasing the price of gasoline by 60 cents per gallon within the past year, including today's 9 cents per gallon, at a time of depressed fish prices, a move which has so seriously affected the Canadian fishermen that they have tied up their inshore fleet in Nova Scotia, since high fuel and operating costs make it uneconomical to continue operations.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

SUGGESTED REVERSAL OF GOVERNMENT POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Len Gustafson (Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, the deceitful Lalonde levy of 9 cents per gallon brings the increase in gasoline prices at the pump to 60 cents per gallon, while the price at the wellhead in western Canada remains at $17.75 per barrel. With the taxpayers of Canada paying $8.8 million per day to compensate for imported oil from Mexico and Saudi Arabia at $43 per barrel, giving a clear indication there is no relationship between the wellhead price of $17.75 per barrel and the price increase at the pump of 60 cents per gallon, which now becomes another broken election promise, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That the House deplores the government's policy and asks the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to reverse immediately the energy policy of this country or resign.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PETROLEUM TAX INCREASE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. On May 15, 1981, as reported at page 9637 of Hansard, the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) promised the House that he was not proposing to introduce any energy tax increases by the end of the year except as a result of production cutbacks in Alberta. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid):

That the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources immediately rescind that part of the petroleum tax increase related to higher imports and the lower Canadian dollar and not related to production cutbacks.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

IMMIGRATION

CUT IN FUNDING FOR SERVICES AND ADAPTATION PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the Department of Employment and Immigration cutting back the funding of the Immigration Services and Adaptation Program by 30 per cent this year, and considering that this will severely curtail the services provided by projects such as Operation Lifeline in Toronto which are involved in employment counselling and education for immigrants, and in view of the minister's task force which overwhelmingly pointed out that immigrants need these services, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the minister change his decision to cut back the funding of the Immigration Services and Adaptation Program in order that vital refugee and immigrant services can continue to be provided.

DEMAND FOR MINISTERS' RESIGNATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, under Standing Order 43. Whereas the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) won the last election by defaming the 18 cent per gallon increase on gas and promising a smaller increase; and whereas the Prime Minister has already, since his re-election, increased gas prices more than double the 18 cents and applied the increase also to heating oils and farmers, and has levied a $2.50 per barrel petroleum compensation charge to pay the subsidy on foreign oil at $40 per barrel while Canadian farms and businesses are going bankrupt and cash and jobs are being exported out of Canada to the point where the country is on the verge of breaking up, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper):

That this House demands the resignation of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources immediately. Canada does not need nor want persons at the head of our government who deceive the people and who are strangers to the truth.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INCREASES IN PRICE OF GASOLINE IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas on February 8, 1980, in Toronto, ten days before the last federal election, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) stated:

Mr. Clark has been asking us Liberals to make a clear statement on (gasoline) pricing . . . Well, let me make it. Our (increases) will be less than 14 cents a gallon.

Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby):

That this House censures the Trudeau government for pushing up gasoline prices in the Atlantic provinces since the election by 60 cents a gallon, mostly through new federal taxes which the Liberal party deceitfully campaigned against in the last election.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INCREASE IN OIL PRICES—CALL FOR REMOVAL OF MINISTERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the absolutely disgraceful sneaky announcement made yesterday by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) again raising oil prices, by an additional 9 cents a gallon, a price hike necessary only because of his inability and incompetence at the bargaining table, and in view of the blatant lies expounded by the Liberals during the last election campaign, especially by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), I move, seconded by the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Thomson):

That the Prime Minister immediately relieve these two ministers from their present roles in order that the country will have a chance to survive.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FISHERIES

SPORTS FISHING REGULATIONS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. There is confusion and uncertainty about the sports fishing regulations in British Columbia as a result of the government's indecision in recent months. Tackle shop owners, marine operators, fishermen, conservation officers, and tourist industry people have yet to receive brochures or pamphlets stating what the 1981 salmon sports fishing regulations are going to be. They are also confused and have their own interpretation of those regulations, based on news media reports and rumours. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton):

That the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans resign his cabinet position and immediately create a fourth position in his west coast information service for himself so that he can take on the primary task of distributing definitive regulations for the 1981 salmon season to all segments of the sports fishing and tourist industries.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PETRO-CANADA

ACQUISITION OF PETROFINA—PAYMENT BY CROWN CORPORATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. I draw to the attention of this House and the public the about-turn the Liberal government has taken in reneging and defaulting on its 1980 campaign promise to keep gasoline price hikes below the 18-cent level. Already Canadians have experienced seven price increases, driving the cost up by about 60 cents per gallon. Part of this alarming increase has been caused by the $1.6 billion purchase of Petrofina paid for out of general revenue, and costing approximately $67 for every man, woman and child in this country. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gustafson):

That the total cost of the Petrofina purchase not be paid for by taxing Canadians 2.5 cents a gallon on every gallon of gas purchased but that it be paid for entirely by Petro-Canada.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

GOVERNMENT POLICY ON INCREASED GASOLINE PRICES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and recognizing that the Liberals and NDP saw fit to bring down a government on an 18-cent excise tax on a gallon of gasoline only, while in just over a year the Liberal government has smuggled in seven price increases by the litre, thereby trying to camouflage a 60-cent to 62-cent increase per gallon on everything, including home heating oil, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre):

That the government recognize that these price increases are illegitimate, certainly unethical, and that it stop profiting from these increases by being the vampire of the consumer.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ENERGY

JUSTIFICATION FOR INCREASES IN PRICE OF GASOLINE

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister of energy. Yesterday the minister, without having the courage to come to the House of Commons with a tax increase, increased for the twelfth time in 15 months the price of gasoline by bringing in a 9-cent a gallon increase. That means an increase of more than 60 cents a gallon since December, 1979, by a government which campaigned for office on the basis of the following, and I quote an advertisement of the Minister of Finance which reads:

Vote Liberal and the prices will stay down.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1415)

Mr. Clark: It is interesting to hear some noise from a Liberal party that was silent through the constitutional debate, and silent as its leaders break their one promise to the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: How can the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources justify breaking the one major promise his party made in winning the election of February, 1980? Will he tell the House of Commons how, having opposed an 18-cent a gallon increase, he can justify increasing the price of gas by 60 cents a gallon, and going up?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: As is his usual practice, the Leader of the Opposition again managed to bootleg in a number of preliminary statements, to which I would like to refer. First, I do not know where the Leader of the Opposition was yesterday. I was in this House. I tabled a ways and means motion according to the rules of this House. You, Madam Speaker, ruled on this subject yesterday while the Leader of the Opposition was absent, recognizing that everything that was done was done according to the rules of this House.

Second, as far as the noise is concerned, the Leader of the Opposition seems to have his signals crossed. Most of the noise was coming from his side of the House, not this side, when he was asking his question.

The third point, and the main point of the question, has to do with the commitments of this party during the election.

There were two commitments made. Those two commitments have been and will be respected by this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: I am glad the members of the opposition have finally got to read something. We made two commitments. One is that the price in 1980 would be lower than $4 a barrel and would not include an 18-cent excise tax to which we objected. And that we have respected. The second commitment was that over the four years of our mandate, the four years covered by the Conservative budget of 1979, our prices would be lower to the consumer than they would have been under the Tory budget.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan: We thought you were Pinocchio; you are Dr. Goebbels.

Madam Speaker: I wonder if there is any use in my calling the House to order. I can see this is "wonderful Wednesday".

Mr. Nowlan: The minister is telling the truth inside out.

Madam Speaker: I would point out to hon. members that we have spent five minutes on one question.

MINISTER'S REASONS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, the minister can twist as much as he wishes. The people of Canada know that he promised to oppose 18 cents a gallon. He is socking a 60-cent a gallon increase to the people of Canada right now, and the Liberal party applauds.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Clark: An arrogant and callous government which once again breaks its promise to the Canadian people.

[English]

The minister knows very well that in February and March there was a $265 million profit in energy taxes over what is being paid out by the federal government in energy compensation. The minister did not have the courage to make a statement in the House yesterday. Will the minister of energy now tell this House of Commons and the people of Canada why he believes it necessary and how he can justify hammering the consumers of Canada with a new 9-cent a gallon tax on gasoline when the government is already making a profit on energy?

• (1420)

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, we are a long way from excessively raising prices and I must remind the hon. Leader of the Opposition that, thanks to the action taken by this government, Canadian consumers have benefited from $1.9 billion since December 1979, when the Progressive Conservative budget was defeated. It means that during that period each Canadian family of four was richer by $335 than would have been the case otherwise as a result of the Progressive Conservative budget tabled under the administration—

[English]

I would like also to state to the hon. member that, far from being in a surplus position, the government is still subsidizing the price of oil out of general revenues to the tune of $350 million a year. That is out of general consolidated revenues. The general taxpayers of Canada are subsidizing the cost of oil. We do not want the general taxpayers to subsidize the oil at more than that level, and that is why some increase has taken place. As far as a good part of that increase, at least half, is concerned, I suggest the hon. Leader of the Opposition should phone his friend, the Premier of Alberta, and if Alberta wants to—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Order! Order, please.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I find it amazing that we have a minister of energy who would prefer to phone Mexicans, Venezuelans and OPEC offering them the world price when he will not conclude an agreement with producing provinces in Canada which would save Canadians millions of dollars.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Clark: And I might add that Canadians can appreciate what 60 cents a gallon means.

[English]

STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF FINANCE

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I have a question concerning the truth for the Minister of Finance, because not only has this government broken its word of February, 1980, and broken it dramatically, but in this House of Commons on May 15 this year, less than a month ago, the Minister of Finance said quite clearly, and I quote:

—I am not proposing to introduce any new tax increases in energy.

He went on to qualify that by saying the one exception would have to do with compensation for cutbacks by producing provinces—the only exception. That was the promise he made on May 15; that was the promise his government broke yesterday. Will the Minister of Finance tell us why the word he gave this House on May 15 is worth nothing at all on June 3?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I draw to the attention of the Leader of the Opposition the clarification which I made to that answer on May 25. The hon. member for Simcoe North asked me a question on a particular Friday afternoon which I answered, and I realized before the end of the day it could be misunderstood. The first time I was in the House following that Friday I rose in my place and clarified the answer, because it was ambiguous. I said:

I believe that my answer with respect to no new energy taxes should be interpreted to mean that no new types of taxes are contemplated at the present time.

• (1425)

Mr. Nowlan: When did you correct your ad?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I went on to say, and I quote:

I do not want to mislead the House or the hon. member so I am taking the first available opportunity to say that no new types of taxes are contemplated at the present time, but obviously the petroleum compensation charge might be increased or indeed decreased, depending upon developments with Alberta, exchange rate developments or international petroleum prices.

I believe instead of the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition's rebuking me for the answer, he should at least acknowledge that at the first opportunity I returned to the House and clarified that answer. That was on May 25, eight days ago. That is the situation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

RECOMMENDATIONS MADE BY DEPARTMENTAL OFFICIALS

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, it is a shame that the Prime Minister is not in the House today to hear from the true source about what real garbage is.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilson: Let me direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources because he did not give an answer to the Leader of the Opposition in response to his question as to why it is necessary at this time to have this blockbuster tax increase imposed on the consumer. Consumption in Canada was down in the months of February and March, the latest two months we have on record, by 10 per cent, which will lead to about a 40 per cent drop in imports. The world price of oil has been level over the last four months, and it looks as if it will be going down because of the world glut. Surely this means that there is less need for a tax increase of this magnitude, or for a tax increase at all.

An hon. Member: Question.

Mr. Wilson: Would the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources table in this House the recommendations from his officials as to the reasons why it was necessary to hammer the consumer, as he did yesterday, without the courtesy of an explanation to the House regarding the need for this increase?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I would be very happy to repeat why there is a need for this increase. If the hon. member could get his friend, the Premier of Alberta, to abandon—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: We know who does not want to hear the truth.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Hypocrite.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Lalonde: If the hon. member wants to prevail upon the Premier of Alberta to abandon his cutbacks, the price of gasoline in this country will immediately be reduced by at least 1.5 cents a litre. That part of the increase is the result of the cutbacks which have been imposed and the punishment which is being imposed upon Canadians and Canadian industry by the government of Alberta. That is part of the explanation.

The other explanation is that the cost of imports has increased because of the value of the Canadian dollar in terms of the rate of exchange. Because of this, increases are required. Of the two cents, the cutback of Alberta represents 1.5 cents a litre, if we take into account the last two cutbacks.

Mr. Wilson: Madam Speaker, I thought I heard the minister say that one of the reasons for this is the drop in the value of the Canadian dollar. Surely the minister understands that the drop in the value of the Canadian dollar is the result of the policies he and his colleague, the Minister of Finance, have followed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilson: What the minister is asking Canadians to do is to pay the doctor's bill while he shoots himself in the foot. The minister is misleading the House—

An hon. Member: Too bad it is just the foot.

Mr. Wilson: —on the reasons for this 9-cent increase or the need for it.

• (1430)

REQUEST THAT INCREASE BE ROLLED BACK

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I ask the minister today if he is prepared to roll back this price increase, have a debate in this House as to the reasons for the increase and, if they can be justified, then to proceed? But do not hammer the consumer today without presenting that case to the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, what I can tell the hon. member is that if the government of Alberta—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: —eliminates the cutbacks—

An hon. Member: That is blackmail.

An hon. Member: Sit down, Marc.

Mr. Lalonde: If you do not have any respect for the House I think you would at least—

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

An hon. Member: The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition has lost control of his troops.

Mr. Clark: Go to court, André.

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, what I can tell the hon. member is that if the government of Alberta eliminates the cutbacks, this government is going to reduce the price of oil by 7.25 cents a gallon tomorrow morning, out of that 9 cents.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

POSSIBILITY OF INCREASED CHARGES BY OIL COMPANIES

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I was in the Alberta legislature two weeks ago and I heard the Alberta ministers get up and blame the federal government, and today we have the federal minister get up and blame the Alberta government. The problem is that the consumers are the ones who are caught.

The last time the minister brought in an increased price on gasoline the oil companies piggybacked an extra 6 cents a gallon on to that increase. These are the same companies that, according to the Bertrand report, ripped us off for $12 billion. Now, the government fired Bertrand, or at least moved him aside. Will the minister assure this House—and let us forget about promises in the past—he has put up the price of gasoline—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Waddell: My friends to my right were going to put it up as well, so they can just listen to this for a moment. Will the minister assure this House that he is going to stop the oil companies from adding any additional cost increases to last night's increase?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I would also invite my colleagues from the NDP to get their act together in terms of policy in this field. I remind them that their colleagues in Saskatchewan have been arguing and pressing for substantial price increases in the price of oil, and they cannot have it both ways.

As far as the companies are concerned, I also remind my friend that this government has imposed the tax that the provincial governments and the industry claim—

An hon. Member: Be serious.

Mr. Lalonde: —is going to reduce their cash flow by 25 to 30 per cent because of the large profits taken in the last year. These are steps that have been taken by this government to prevent excess profits being made by the oil and gas companies in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: As far as the specific point raised by the hon. member is concerned, my colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, is going to monitor the action taken by the companies, and I certainly hope that in the current context they will not add anything to the announced increases. I can assure my hon. friend that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is very much aware of this situation.

ASSURANCE SOUGHT RESPECTING AGREEMENT WITH ALBERTA

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, like a lawyer with a weak defence, the minister goes on the offence. It is not so much that Canadians are against higher oil prices, although they do not like them; what they do not like is the minister nickelling and diming us to death every couple of months.

I ask the minister will he confirm that in less than a month consumers will be facing another $1 a barrel increase, and will he tell this House when will there be an end in sight—

An hon. Member: Ask Lougheed.

Mr. Waddell: —to these continuous increases? When are we going to have a full agreement with Alberta and the producing provinces, and some firm assurances that we are going to know what the future increases are?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I would like to assure the hon. member that the $1 increase announced in the budget will come into effect in September, not in July of this year. In addition, we are involved in negotiations with the government of Alberta.

I have indicated my regret over the steps taken by the government of Alberta in cutting production another 60,000 barrels a day—

An hon. Member: You have given nothing.

Mr. Lalonde: —in the current circumstances where we are negotiating in a rather positive atmosphere.

I have been asked by the government of Alberta to delay the introduction of an energy security act because of those negotiations. I have agreed and said that I will not proceed with the debate on this proposed legislation at least until the fall, because of the negotiations. In spite of this, the government of Alberta has decided to add this cutback to the previous one, which means an increase to the consumer. I hope that we will reach an agreement whereby we will have predictable and moderate price increases to face over the next few years. What we are doing, what we are fighting for is an energy agreement that will mean the consumer will know what to expect, and by all accounts what the consumer can count upon is that what comes in the end will be lower than that foreseen by the Conservative party.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FINANCE

QUERY RESPECTING ENERGY TAX CREDIT

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, without engaging in an argument about who is going to have lower prices, let me ask about what I consider to be a very positive step that could be taken by the government.

This latest increase comes at a bad time because, as he knows, the consumer price index is at its highest level in 38 years. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said last May that for every dollar increase per barrel in the price of oil, the consumer price index goes up half a percentage point, which means that last night's increase will raise the CPI almost to 14 per cent. I ask the Minister of Finance if he is prepared to cushion this increase for the low and middle income consumer by bringing in an energy tax credit—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: The NDP voted against that when they defeated the Conservatives' budget. That is a Conservative proposal.

Mr. Waddell: —by bringing in a tax credit that will help—

An hon. Member: You have been reading Crosbie's budget.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I want to hear this answer.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hees: Your little brother voted against it, and now listen to him! Lord Almighty!

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, in the event the hon. member did not hear my answer, it was that it is not my intention to introduce an energy tax credit. The purpose of part of this charge is to avoid increasing the deficit in the petroleum compensation account, which at budget time was stipulated to be $350 million. If this particular charge were not imposed to meet the contingencies mentioned by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, the over-all deficit in the account would be increased as well.

Mr. Clark: Prove it, Allan. Table the figures.

Mr. MacEachen: That is the reason that, it seems to me, in order to maintain the fiscal framework and the stipulated deficit in the petroleum compensation account, it would be unwise at that very moment—

Mr. Clark: To help anybody.

Mr. MacEachen: —to frustrate the purpose by taking on a new expenditure.

ENERGY

ALBERTA GOVERNMENT CUTBACKS IN PRODUCTION

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, the energy critic of the NDP on December 13, 1979, voted against the energy tax credit that he asks for today.

My question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, the patron saint of Maurice Strong and the Belgians, and not of the Canadian consumers. In the last year there have been 12 increases in oil and gas prices in Canada, nine of which are solely and purely increases in federal taxes, with nothing for the oil producing provinces themselves. The minister has offered to reduce by 7.25 cents, I think he said, the 60-cent increase in the last year if Premier Lougheed would agree not to reduce oil production. Will he reduce it a further 52 cents and take off these federal taxes if Premier Lougheed agrees to do that, or is he asking only Alberta to make the sacrifice while the federal government gets all the tax revenues?

● (1440)

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I only wish to remind the hon. member for St. John's West that after having brought down the outrageous budget which he tried to impose on the Canadian public—

Miss MacDonald: For 18 cents.

Mr. Lalonde: —he walked around the country in January and February of 1980, during the election campaign, saying that his budget had already been overtaken by events and that he felt there should be further increases over and above those contained in his budget. He should be the last one to complain about tax increases.

As far as the government is concerned, I repeat that we have made commitments about the prices in 1980 and over the period up to 1984. I assure the hon. member that Canadian consumers—

Miss MacDonald: Are paying for it.

Mr. Lalonde: —will have paid less under this government than they would have paid under the Conservative budget.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REVOCATION OF PRICE INCREASES

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance. I cannot ask him to stop beating his wife, but I can ask him to stop beating the Canadian consumer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: When the 18-cent excise tax was proposed in December, 1979, it did not apply to heating fuel. In St. John's, Newfoundland, heating fuels are up 50 cents per gallon in the last year because of federal tax increases. They would not have been up a dime under our 18-cent excise tax.

Mr. Lalonde: What about the other increases?

Mr. Crosbie: The minister's colleague has tabled, since the budget, four increases by non-budgetary notices in the House. There were two yesterday—the Canadian ownership charge and the first Lalonde levy; $2.6 billion in additional taxation since the budget came down; over 15 cents per gallon. Is the minister prepared to revoke these increases and to eliminate these notices given yesterday in an effort, no matter how feeble, to meet his commitment to Canadians when he asked them to vote for him and the price would stay down? Will the minister make some pretence at trying to observe that, for the people of Cape Breton are now paying over a 60 per cent increase in their heating fuel oil and over 60 cents more per gallon for gasoline since he came to office and stabbed them in the back?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, of course I will not accept the suggestion of the hon. gentleman. In every speech he makes, he urges me to contain the fiscal deficit. The step which was taken yesterday will contain the fiscal deficit.

Mr. Crosbie: Meet your promises.

Mr. MacEachen: Let me also add that I will be pleased at any time to present my program, in comparison with that of the hon. gentleman, to my electors in Cape Breton-Highlands-Canso. I have no doubt which they will choose.

Mr. Nowlan: Will you show them your ad, Allan?

PRICE PAID BY FARMERS FOR DIESEL FUEL

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The price of diesel fuel to Canadian farmers has increased by some 62 cents per gallon or, to put it another way, the price of diesel fuel to Canadian farmers has doubled since the Liberals and the NDP combined forces to defeat our government in December, 1979, on the issue of oil pricing. During that period of time domestic oil prices have increased by some 30 per cent, from $13.75 per barrel to $17.75 per barrel. This currently represents 41 per cent of the world price.

In view of the fact that this price increase amounts to nothing more than a massive federal government rip-off, in view of the serious impact of this price increase on the agricultural producing sector and the need for relief in that particular sector, as was recognized in the Conservative budget of 1979 which provided for a rebate and an energy tax credit, will the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources recommend to his cabinet colleagues some relief for the producers of Canada?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the government has the fate of the producers of the country very much in mind, particularly the farmers.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: This is why, under our budget of last year and our energy program, we have proposed a scheme whereby—

An hon. Member: Scheme is the correct word.

Miss MacDonald: Try manipulation.

Mr. Lalonde: —Canadian consumers and farmers in particular will not have to pay the type of prices planned under the Conservative budget.

Mr. Clark: They will have to pay twice as much.

Mr. Lalonde: I want to stress quite clearly that Canadian consumers at large, as I have indicated, have saved $1.9 billion, thanks to the measures we have adopted.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: Also the farmers of Canada have benefited from this. A family of four has saved $335—

Mr. Crosbie: They have not saved a dime.

Mr. Lalonde: —since December, 1979. This includes the farmers of the country, as well as every other family.

Mr. Clark: Is that why they are going bankrupt?

Mr. Lalonde: That is what has happened under the Liberal government and the budget presented by my colleague.

REQUEST FOR RELIEF FOR FARMERS

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, since all we are able to elicit from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is nothing more than nonsensical rhetoric, I should like to direct my question to the non-Minister of Agriculture. I am sure he is aware that while domestic oil prices in the country have increased by less than 30 per cent at the wellhead, the price of diesel fuel to Canadian producers has more than doubled.

In view of the fact that the Minister of Agriculture is simply standing idly by, watching his colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, rape the producers of Canada, will he undertake to recommend to his cabinet colleagues some relief for the producers of Canada so that they can keep their input costs down?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows full well that the producers of agricultural products in Canada have many benefits from programs.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss MacDonald: Such as interest rates.

Mr. Whelan: First and foremost, any Canadian agricultural producer can compete with any farmer any place in the world. They get their fuel at 40 to 50 cents per gallon cheaper in Canada than anywhere else in the world.

EMERGENCY MEASURES

MEASURES TO ALERT ONTARIO CITIES FOR POSSIBLE EVACUATION

Mr. Jack Burghardt (London West): Madam Speaker, in light of the conference on emergency planning scheduled for June 5, I should like to direct my question to the President of the Privy Council. In the past few years the transportation of hazardous commodities has created an active awareness in all municipalities of the need for emergency planning. Many problems arise when a community is faced with large-scale emergencies, one being the large-scale evacuation of the populace. As is the case in most cities, the city of London does not have adequate alerting devices for a large-scale evacuation. I am aware that a federal warning system, controlled from Petawawa base camp, when activated, alerts ten counties in southwestern Ontario.

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Burghardt: Because hazardous commodities are transported through London daily, would it not be feasible to design a system to segregate communities, one from another, so that the mayor of a given community could request, under extreme emergency conditions, that the particular community be alerted from Petawawa base camp?

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for his question. It is a fact that Friday I will have an opportunity to meet my provincial colleagues to discuss the principles which will pave the way for improved co-operation between the various levels of government so that emergency measures in Canada will be better planned. This ought to enable all regions, including of course the region of London, to cope much more efficiently with various emergency situations.

[English]

With respect to the specific matter raised by my hon. colleague, I will give instructions to officials in Emergency Planning Canada and ensure that they report to me in time so that in the very near future I can report to the hon. member.

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

UREA FORMALDEHYDE—REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE TO HOME OWNERS

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, we need emergency planning for thousands of home owners who are being poisoned by urea formaldehyde foam.

• (1450)

My question is directed to the minister for CMHC. Thousands of angry home owners and renters are organizing across the country because they are suffering from health problems and their homes are worthless because of this poisonous form of insulation. They hold the federal government directly responsible, and particularly CMHC which endorsed this program through its own CHIP program. They want action, not just a survey by telephone of 400 homes.

I would like to ask the minister, through Your Honour, since CMHC is responsible through CHIP, will the minister right this wrong? Will he take initiatives to set up information, testing and advice centres through local CMHC offices? Will he help to provide different accommodations for people who have health problems? Will he extend the RRAP program, a home repair program already in place, to help people get rid of this contaminated foam in their homes?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, first of all I would confirm that I am aware of the problems addressed by the hon. member for Vancouver East.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cosgrove: I would like to say that in my own constituency there has been a meeting of affected home owners. I am quite aware of their concerns.

Mr. Clark: Got more hair than brains!

Mr. Cosgrove: However, I would hasten to advise the hon. member that I am sure she must have overlooked the fact that the CHIP program was transferred into the auspices of energy, mines and resources earlier this year.

Mr. Clark: Like the Department of Finance!

Mr. Cosgrove: I would like to remind the hon. member of the reply given by the minister just a few days ago in this House that, indeed, a special committee of cabinet is presently looking at the many problems raised in the question put by the hon. member. First of all, we are concerned to know the extent of the problem. We are concerned to know that a response in a scientific way is one which has a certain certitude and is not haphazard. As the minister indicated, the government has this actively under consideration. I would expect that within a few weeks we will be able to give a definitive answer.

Mrs. Mitchell: As usual, this minister is passing the buck and refusing to take any initiatives.

COMPENSATION TO MEET COST OF REMOVAL

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): My second supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Home owners who are afflicted by urea formaldehyde gas cannot live in their homes; they cannot sell them because they are useless; they are worried about their children who have bad health problems, in many cases; and most of them have their life savings in their homes. Will the minister, in view of this tragedy, approve a compensation program for home owners so that they can remove this hazardous insulation and be paid for it by the government which contributed to the problem?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I would remind the hon. member that the matter is now under review by an interdepartmental committee and that within a few days, we shall announce a series of measures that will specifically meet the expectations of the people, and that will indeed allow us to assess the exact extent of the problem.

I would submit to the hon. member that it is absolutely useless to make the kind of statement she has been making about Canadians that are now supposed to be ill. We will check the facts and the government will face its responsibilities only as far as it is bound to, nothing more and nothing less.

FUTURE INCREASE IN PRICE OF CRUDE OIL

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Madam Speaker, I would like to seek some clarification, if I may, from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Some of us were under the impression that, in the absence of any agreement with Alberta or the other producing provinces, there was to be a further increase of $1 a barrel on crude oil as of July 1 of this year. Did I understand the minister correctly to say that that will not take place at that time but will instead take place on the 1st of September? If Alberta again cuts back production we can, of course, expect a further increase of another $1 a barrel on the 1st of September. Would there then be an increase of $2 a barrel as of the 1st of September, 1981, in the absence of any agreement?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Obviously, if the government of Alberta introduces another cutback on the 1st of September, we will have to provide compensation for that unfortunate decision. As far as the first question is concerned, the budget announced an increase of $1 a barrel effective the 1st of July, but it will be delayed for 60 days before it reaches the consumer through the refinery process. Therefore that increase will not come into effect until the 1st of September, as far as the consumer is concerned. No other increase is planned, at least until the 1st of September.

FEDERAL SHARE OF INCREASE

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Perhaps the minister could correct my rather poor arithmetic. The way I then compute it, there will have been a total increase in September, of the total price of crude oil per barrel in 1981, which will be close to $10 a barrel by next fall. The federal government will be collecting approximately $8 out of that $10. Could the minister confirm those figures for me, please?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I think the calculations of the hon. member are excessive.

An hon. Member: Give us yours!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: I would like to remind the hon. member that, out of whatever total figure he has in mind, about $3, or somewhat over $3, would be the result of the Alberta cutbacks, a decision by that provincial government. In addition, there are $2 which go to the wellhead, to the producing provinces. Therefore I suggest that my hon. friend bear those facts in mind in making his calculations.

Mr. Clark: What are your estimates?

[Translation]

THE ECONOMY

ATTITUDE OF GOVERNMENT TOWARD THE CAISSES D'ENTRAIDE ÉCONOMIQUE DU QUÉBEC

Mr. Pierre Gimaïel (Lac-Saint-Jean): Madam Speaker, I will try to put a somewhat shorter question than my honourable colleagues opposite did. It is directed to the Minister of State for Finance. He is no doubt aware of the current situation concerning the economic mutual help unions in Quebec. In view of the importance of those unions, and of the fact that they have been, along with DREE, one of the major instruments of economic development in our Quebec regions for the last ten years, could the minister state the Canadian government's position on the current situation within the economic mutual help unions movement in Quebec?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, in the first place I agree with the hon. member that the mutual help unions are important to consolidate the economies of the various regions in Quebec. I would further suggest to the hon. member that under the present conditions, it is no wonder that a financial institution may face difficulties. However, the best possible protection for depositors or members of a mutual help union in my view is for them to retain their trust in that financial institution. Finally, under an agreement between the Quebec Deposit Insurance Board and the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation, in case the Quebec Deposit Insurance Board were in need of cash, a line of credit of some $100 million has been granted by the Canada Insurance Deposit Corporation, a federal institution.

PENITENTIARIES

RIOT AT MATSQUI INSTITUTION IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. As the minister knows, there has been a full scale riot at Matsqui Institution in British Columbia, starting last night, in which all cell blocks and a number of other buildings were burned and, in fact, completely gutted. At least seven prisoners were injured, one critically. The army has been called in, among other things, to evacuate staff from the roof of the institution.

Will the minister inform the House what sparked this very serious riot and what the present status of the riot is? Will he assure the House that he intends to visit the site of Matsqui Institution immediately to take control of the situation?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, when I came into the House at two o'clock today, the riot was still ongoing. In view of that I think that it would be better not to speak about the causes of it or about the steps which are being taken to quell the riot. However, I want to indicate to the House that the perimeter security is standing and that the community surrounding that institution is not in any risk. Members of the Armed Forces have come on to the site, along with members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, to reinforce the perimeter security.

A special inquiry will be held. In fact it was launched this morning in the normal course in relation to a serious incident such as this. When the disturbance is over I would be very glad to answer questions of the sort the hon. member has asked.

RECOMMENDATIONS OF PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is again addressed to the Solicitor General. As he knows, in 1977 a special subcommittee of Parliament passed a unanimous report making recommendations for changes in the penitentiary system, saying that there was a state of crisis in the system. In view of the fact that many of those recommendations have not been implemented by the government and by the commissioner, and in view of the fact that there clearly exists a state of crisis in the system today when we look at Laval, Dorchester, and now Matsqui, what steps does the minister intend to take to implement the unanimous recommendations of the special subcommittee report, to prevent the possibility of a very long, hot, and possibly explosive summer in the Canadian prison system?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I do not anticipate a long, hot, explosive summer in the penitentiary system. In fact I do not think this incident can be characterized as being a crisis. Almost all of the recommendations of the parliamentary committee have been implemented. There have been four progress reports made to the committee, of which the hon. member is a member. He has had a full opportunity, as have all members, to see the extent to which there has been full implementation of that report. A fifth progress report is in the course of preparation. I think it would be very far from accurate to say that there is a state of crisis in Canada's penitentiaries.

CURRENT POLICY

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Strathcona): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, if he can come back to his seat.

During the last election campaign in February 1980, the Liberals promised Canadians that the price of gasoline would remain low. In fact, the Minister of Finance published the following announcement about this issue in a paper in his riding on January 23: "Vote Liberal and Keep the price down!" Fourteen months later, Canadians have to pay 60 cents more a gallon, 9 of 12 increases of which only go to pay Liberal taxes. This is another example of a Liberal flip-flop. This 9-cent increase per gallon will add to the tax burden of Canadians. I shall now ask my question, Madam Speaker! Will the Minister state once again that his energy policy is the best solution and that he must, accordingly, increase the price of gasoline even though he has no valid reason other than masking his own and his government's inability to solve the energy problem?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I timed the question and I hope that you will give me as much time to reply.

First, I wish to repeat to the hon. member, to the House and to the Canadian people that our action as far as oil is concerned has saved each Canadian family of four members $335 since December 1979 compared with what the Progressive Conservative budget proposed. These are facts. These are figures which are easy to prove. Second, I also remind the hon. member that Canadians today will still pay 40 cents a gallon less for their oil than people in the United States.

Third, I remind the hon. member that our commitment, which we have kept, not to increase prices in 1980 as much as the Progressive Conservatives planned to do, that is not to impose the 18 cents tax, called for a price increase of under $4, and I repeat to Canadian consumers that our energy policies will mean that they will have to pay less than they would have had to under the terrible Progressive Conservative budget which was voted down in December 1979.

EFFECT OF NEW GASOLINE TAX ON CONSUMERS

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Strathcona): Madam Speaker, the Minister and his colleagues are against consumer rip-offs except when they are the main cause of them, as is the case for energy and uranium. Does the minister, who is a member from Quebec, a province where there are quite a few low-income people intend to tell Quebecers that this new tax will not affect them and that they can always rely on him and Liberal miracles to help them face the shameful increase in the price of oil?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, Quebec members as well as Quebec consumers and voters have a better judgment than himself. Of this I can assure him. I went to Quebec City two days ago to talk to people there. I am going tonight to speak to people in Montreal, and I shall tell them the facts as they are. We are not ashamed to defend our record in view of what the Progressive Conservatives intended to impose on the consumers. I also remind the House that if the Alberta premier were to decide to cancel the production cutbacks which he has imposed on Canadian consumers, we would reduce oil prices by 7.25 cents a gallon tomorrow morning.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. PATTERSON—MATSQUI INSTITUTION RIOT—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY SOLICITOR GENERAL

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Madam Speaker, my point of order concerns the reply given by the Solicitor General regarding the riot at Matsqui Institution. I believe that this is an incident of such magnitude that it would call for a statement on motions by the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan), because the military forces were called in and because of the fire that destroyed over 50 per cent of the facilities. I think this all adds up to the point where there should be a statement on motions by the minister. I wonder if he would give that assurance.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. That might be a request from the hon. member but I certainly have no jurisdiction to ask the minister to make a statement on motions. That is his choice and he can do so if he sees fit.

An hon. Member: He said he wants to.

An hon. Member: Here he is.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): A point of order, Kaplan!

Mr. Clark: Send Ouellet to court and stand up!

ENERGY

TAX INCREASE ON OIL PRODUCTS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, earlier today I gave you notice, and I now ask leave to move the adjournment of the House under the provisions of Standing Order 26 to allow an emergency debate on the unprecedented price increase and tax increase introduced yesterday by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde).

I might just elaborate very briefly on the reasons for my proposal. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources announced the government's decision yesterday to impose a major tax increase on oil products. It was a tax increase. A part of this tax increase represents an increase of 50 per cent of a tax established in the October 28 budget, which is part of a ten-year price plan. No justification of this tax was given to the House by the minister. It represents a major increase in energy taxes for the consumers of Canada with no opportunity for a debate on it here in the House of Commons.

In my opinion, its impact on the economy is similar to that which could be expected from a regular budget, and a regular budget would be subject to a full six-day debate. But the minister has chosen a manoeuvre which allows no debate at all.

Because it is the role of Parliament to debate substantial tax increases imposed by the government, I believe it is essential to allow full debate on this emergency situation in the House. Further, because this tax is effective immediately, time is of the essence.

Therefore, Madam Speaker, I think it appropriate to move to adjourn the House to permit us to debate a tax increase which was sneaked into this House yesterday, as we would debate a tax increase as introduced in a direct and regular way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: I have received the proper notice from the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) as is required under the provisions of Standing Order 26 for an emergency debate. I have, of course, examined his statement.

I have to admit that the problem raised by the right hon. member is obviously a very important one. It refers to a situation which undoubtedly has a certain character of urgency. However, I am also sure that it is a matter of continuing interest to all members of the House. As all hon. members are aware, there have been periodic increases in the price and tax of oil products.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): The public is aware, too.

Madam Speaker: The inevitable conclusion is that the problem is one of continuing concern.

The provisions of Standing Order 26(5) are very clear. Referring to the Chair, it reads:

In determining whether a matter should have urgent consideration—

And it concludes with these words:

—shall have regard to the probability of the matter being brought before the House within reasonable time by other means.

Standing Order 60(11) reads as follows:

The adoption of any Ways and Means motion shall be an order to bring in a bill or bills based on the provisions of any such motion.

The tabling of notices of ways and means is the first step in the legislative process, as the minister stated yesterday, which allow for ample debate when a motion is called.

Hon. members are aware that we are presently in a supply period which provides an opportunity for members to discuss a subject of their choice. The government House leader has indicated in his weekly statement on the business of the House that two days per week will be designated as opposition days under our supply proceedings.

For all of those reasons, I regret that it is not possible at this time to put to the House the motion proposed by the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition.

DEFENCE INDUSTRY PRODUCTIVITY PROGRAM

Question No. 1,284—Mr. Herbert:

In each of the past five years, what amount was contributed to the Defence Industry Productivity Program (DIP) fund and, by how much per cent, did the annual contribution change in constant dollars?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned, for each of the past five years DIP contributions were:

	Actual	1973/74 Dollars*	Percent Change In Constant Dollars (73/74 Dollars)
1979/80	$57.9 million	$33.1 million	+ 1.22 per cent
1978/79	$52.2 million	$32.7 million	+ 13.54 per cent
1977/78	$43.2 million	$28.8 million	− 10.00 per cent
1976/77	$44.9 million	$32.0 million	+ 4.92 per cent
1975/76	$39.0 million	$30.5 million

* Using the implicit price index for the gross national expenditure published by Statistics Canada, the above values have been computed in terms of the FY 1973/74 dollar.

DIVISION BETWEEN FOREIGN AND CANADIAN CONTROLLED OIL AND GAS PRODUCING COMPANIES

Question No. 1,665—Mr. Herbert:

1. Is the division between foreign and Canadian controlled oil and gas producing companies in the chart on page 20 of the publication entitled The National Energy Program 1980 based on 51 per cent ownership of voting stock or were effective controls the criteria used?

2. Does any change in control, in order to be effective, arising from a change in status of preferred stock attributable to non-payment of dividend, require approval of the foreign investment review agency?

3. What percentage of the voting shares of the Canadian controlled companies listed, other than Petro-Canada, are owned by Canadians?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Energy, Mines and Resources and Industry, Trade and Commerce as follows:

1. The division of companies between foreign and Canadian controlled is based upon the ownership of voting stock (50 per cent plus 1) expect where the Foreign Investment Review Agency has determined control on an effective control basis to be different from the statistical basis.

2. Ordinarily the transfer of control of a Canadian business enterprise to a non-eligible person arising from a change in status of preferred stock attributable to non-payment of dividends would not be subject to review under the Foreign Investment Review Act.

3. The ultimate Canadian ownership of the Canadian controlled companies listed according to Statistics Canada at the end of 1979 was as follows:

Pan Canadian Petroleum Ltd.	73.2 per cent
Dome Petroleum Ltd.	27.2 per cent
Norcen Energy Resources	93.1 per cent
Home Oil Company Ltd.	98.7 per cent
Husky Oil Operations Ltd.	83.7 per cent
Alberta Energy Company Ltd.	99.9 per cent
Ocelot Industries Ltd.	99.3 per cent

When the newly-established Petroleum Monitoring Agency completes its assessment, there may be changes in these ownership percentages.

ADVERTISING EXPENDITURES

Question No. 1,787—Mr. Stevens:

For the current fiscal year, what are the estimated expenditures of Consolidated Computer Incorporated for (a) advertising (b) free or subsidized publications (c) other information conveyed to the public?

Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned, the company has provided the following information: for 1980, Consolidated Computer Incorporated estimates that its expenditures in the requested categories will be as follows:

(a) Advertising: $69,300 (including $25,800 for pure advertising, $15,000 for promotional material, and $28,500 for trade shows).

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—AGRICULTURE—CALL FOR GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert) moved:

That this House condemns the inadequate policies of the present government in agricultural areas and calls on the government to institute an agricultural policy which would:

(1) implement a national stabilization plan available for all farm products and based on the cost of production and supported by producer and federal contributions;

(2) encourage the establishment of national orderly marketing agencies for all farm commodities;

(3) expand the role of a sufficiently-capitalized Farm Credit Corporation to include provision of short-term and long-term financing as well as operating costs for beginning farmers;

(4) provide continuing emergency aid to farmers on the basis of cost-shared agreements negotiated in advance to avoid the problems associated with last year's drought and herd maintenance programs;

(5) condemn the use of grain embargoes in Canadian foreign policy and pay immediate compensation to Canadian farmers who have waited for 17 months for payment on the Soviet grain embargo;

(6) affirm the role of the Crowsnest Pass freight rate in developing western Canada by implementing Crow-related rates to move semi-processed and finished agricultural products; and

(7) negotiate a land-use policy for Canada in conjunction with the provinces.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is the second opposition day on agriculture this week and the week is only half over.

The Canadian Federation of Agriculture has stated that we are in a crisis situation in the agricultural industry. I say that what is happening in the agricultural industry these days is more than a crisis, it is a disaster. Therefore, it is very important that we have an opportunity to debate this subject in this House on the second day devoted to agriculture.

Farmers are going under at a fast rate. We have heard about many bankruptcies. When the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) spoke on Monday, he also referred to bankruptcies. Most farmers do not wait for bankruptcy; they sell out when they can still see some hope of getting out of the situation with a few dollars. Surprisingly, the inflated price of land has had something to do with farmers staying in business. With the price of a farmer's land rising almost on a daily basis, a farmer finds that he can always sell his land to pay off his debts.

To date the government has admitted to the existence of a crisis. The government has projected disaster in some areas but it has suggested only band-aid treatment, but now it seems to be running out of band-aids. The government is cutting back on some programs which have helped farmers. Agencies, such as the Farm Credit Corporation, have less money this year than last. In some cases, instead of applying a band-aid, the government is applying a tourniquet. We all know what happens if you leave a tourniquet on for too long—the limb eventually drops off. That is what is happening in certain parts of our agricultural industry today. I sometimes wonder whether the government is trying to slip that tourniquet around the neck of the industry. Instead of solving the problem, it would eliminate that industry entirely.

The motion before the House is an omnibus motion. It covers many areas. There is good reason for that.

The approach of this government offers no real solution to the problem. This motion is an attempt to impress on the government the need for a co-ordinated approach to the crisis, which is, in fact, a disaster in agriculture. We need a planned and co-ordinated approach rather than a patchwork or band-aid approach. We need a plan which deals with high interest rates, the cost-price squeeze, high land prices, marketing problems, the emergency drought situation, transportation, rail line abandonment, and so on. We need Canadian foreign policy which does not use food as a weapon against the poor in other countries.

My party will be presenting some solutions to the crisis in agriculture. Some of our difficulties today are related to the failure of the stabilization program which has become a tattered patchwork quilt rather than insulating the farmer from the vagaries of the market place.

Many producers are upset by the recent decision not to pay hog support to producers receiving provincial support. Farmers in Saskatchewan will not receive hog support on their first 1,500 pigs. We agree with the government that an equitable national hog stabilization program is needed. However, the government has failed to provide that.

Farmers would support a national plan based on the cost of production rather than the present average market price with contributions by the federal government and the producers. This should be available for all commodities. The government should put its principles into practice. The Minister of Agriculture expounds these principles on a daily basis. Rather than just talking about orderly marketing, he should do something about it.

Plebiscites could be held under draft legislation which could be produced and debated, or the producers could have votes under the Farm Products Marketing Act to set up an agency for marketing of pork. New legislation might be required for beef. This would be a method of achieving lasting stability and fair prices.

The NDP motion seeks a policy which would put into place long-term stabilization plans. If an effective national stabilization plan is implemented, it must be based on certain principles. First, the program should be national to avoid provincial balkanization because some provinces produce more than others. Since agriculture is a shared responsibility, this will require provincial negotiations. Second, payments should be based on cost of production not on the average market price which may bear no relation to the cost of production. Third, the program should be funded by federal contributions and producer premiums, and payments should be quarterly. Fourth, a ceiling on eligibility should be included to discourage large scale corporate farms and encourage the family farm.

Fifth, the program should be available for all farm commodities and include segments of the industry which are separate marketing entities, such as cow-calf operations and weaner pig operations.

If this program is to operate in conjunction with a tariff and quota system oriented toward maintaining Canadian farm production and food processing with orderly marketing where possible, such a program need not be either costly or in constant operation. However, it should be in place so that it is there when it is needed.

We are losing our food production capacity in many vulnerable commodities such as fruits and vegetables. These sectors must be preserved and encouraged to expand. Without this kind of income insurance, this will not happen. The NDP policy would be to establish a stabilization program which would keep all farmers in operation and ensure them of an adequate income.

Over the past few months there has been much talk about interest rates and crushing debt loads which are affecting farmers and will affect them as long as the present high interest rate policy is maintained. Less has been said about the fact that high interest rates also affect the price the farmer receives for his product.

I would like to give one example. On November 21 last, before this current round of increases in interest rates, No. 1 Canadian western red wheat sold for $7.42 a bushel. Yesterday it sold at $6.40 a bushel, a lower price by more than a $1 a bushel. Why do I say the price dropped because of high interest rates? At high interest rate levels, buyers are not willing to keep much grain on hand. They reduce their inventories and consequently less grain is sold. Sellers do not want to move their product as quickly; they want to get the highest possible price.

Rapeseed prices have also been affected by this phenomenon. This loss of $1 per bushel in income along with high interest rates will affect the farmer considerably. He will have $1 per bushel less to meet the $2 billion commitment in interest payments which the Minister of Agriculture so carefully explained to us on Monday. The amount of interest paid by farmers right now is fully one third higher than it was last year. Farmers are caught in a classic cost-price squeeze. The cost of farming is increasing. The amount of income available to meet costs is decreasing sharply because of lower prices. Both these conditions are being caused by a conscious policy of this government to keep interest rates high.

Under these circumstances I think the government should have more than just a friendly chat with the Canadian Bankers' Association to try to do something about high interest rates. I believe the time has long passed for governments to consider debt relief and a moratorium on debt payments by farmers who have reached the point, as mentioned by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) on Monday, of requiring $8 per bushel to pay the interest on the money they borrowed to buy the land. The situation has developed to such an extent that the particular farmer about whom the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville was speaking, who owns a farm valued, now with inflated prices, at $400,000, finds that on every bushel of grain he sells he needs about $2 to pay the interest. Why should he farm? He could sell out, invest the $400,000 and get a foreign investor to buy his land, and he would earn about $60,000 a year in interest. Then he could sit back and watch a young Saskatchewan boy rent the land from this foreign investor. That young man would never be able to hope to buy the land under the circumstances established by this high interest rate policy.

The demise of the family farm, which again was discussed on several occasions last Monday, is part of the result of this kind of a policy. We believe the Farm Credit Corporation should attempt to meet the needs of the farmer for credit at a level which would allow him to survive. It might even be necessary to provide funds at a very low interest rate, possibly with only a service charge, to make it possible for the farmer to survive. We also need more money in that particular fund so it is not underfunded, as seems to be the chronic situation.

I would now like to turn to an issue that has occupied a considerable amount of my time and the time of this House of Parliament, and that is Canadian participation in the grain embargo on the Soviet Union which began 17 months ago, on January 4. I wish my time could have been spent a little better in this last few months. It has been no great pleasure to continuously ask the government what it is doing about this particular situation. It has been no great pleasure to be talking to a government which has been following a U.S. policy which has meant that innocent populations were denied food, with Canada dangerously alienating our best grain customer, the Soviet Union.

In the 17 months the government has been attempting to give us some answer, it has continuously suggested it would pay the farmers compensation because of the fact that farmers were the people who took the brunt of a decision made by both governing parties over that period of time.

Back on April 15 of last year I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) if he intended to support the previous government's policy on the embargo, and his answer to that question was:

> Indeed, Madam Speaker, that is our policy.

This commitment to assist the farmers has not been fulfilled. I am listed in Hansard index lists as having spoken on grain on 20 occasions in that period of time. Virtually every time I spoke in the House on grain I asked about the embargo, yet no one on the government side has been able to tell me how much, what grains or at what level farmers are to be compensated.

The grain embargo has affected the incomes of Canadian farmers. Are they not entitled to a public discussion about the compensation they have been promised? The embargo also affected the athletes of the country, and I think they also should be given an opportunity to discuss the government policy which has forced them into the position of missing the Moscow Olympiad last year.

Do we as Canadians really understand and support the implications of this policy? Do we know that it has recently been applied in the United States to Mozambique, a very poor country? It was applied to Mazambique because that government dared to expel four U.S. diplomats whom it thought to be CIA agents. Do we as Canadians want to go along with this kind of policy which threatens physical starvation in return for actions which the U.S. does not like? Do we really value human life of innocent people so cheaply? I have yet to hear the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) address himself to these questions, although there is no limit to the bureaucratic statements he has made in trying to keep the United States happy.

This motion condemns the decision taken by the government on the embargo, but it goes further, or it should go further. We should look at it and find out what the level of compensation should be.

Three or four studies respecting compensation have been undertaken. The Minister of Agriculture has refused to tell the House and the public at what level farmers will be compensated or what grains will be subject to compensation.

There has been no progress in the last 17 months in relation to the embargo. One of the studies was undertaken by a very august group which is probably the best analyst of grain marketing in this country. I will read the following statement from the annual report of the Canadian Wheat Board:

> However, having withstood much of the downward pressure from the expectation and harvest of large wheat and corn crops in the U.S., market prices in late December were showing signs of moving to higher levels in the winter. World demand remained strong with Chinese purchases continuing at a record level. The additional supplies of grain that could be provided by Canada during the winter months would be limited.

Then there was the embargo, prices went down and the Canadian Wheat Board will tell us that they went down, to the extent of a possible $100 million loss to farmers on wheat alone. A study, which I asked the Library of Parliament to conduct, showed a $150 million loss, or an average of approximately $1,000 per farmer. These two figures are approximately the same; one takes into account all grains and the other wheat only.

I would like to spend a few minutes on another matter. Over the years the New Democratic Party has devoted much time and effort to protecting the Crow rate. The Crow rate has been and still is a cornerstone in the development of agricultural policy in the west. What many people tend to overlook in Crow rate debates is that the question is far broader than simply the cost of handling grain. If I could convince a few hon. members opposite and to my right of anything this afternoon, it would be that the Crow rate does not involve a question of transportation economics alone. Rather, it is a question of the political economy of western Canada. The farmers of the west realize this. They know that the Crow rate is part of their birthright as farmers, and they know that the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan joined confederation with this rate in force at the time of joining. Therefore, it is a de facto constitutional guarantee to them, just as much as language and religion are to all of us. If the wider political economy of the west is taken into account when we consider the Crow rate and if we remove the Crow rate, we threaten the established agricultural economy of the west. The statutory Crow rate guarantee should not be removed, and variable rates should not be put in its place. That is what the railways wish to do. The railways dress terms up considerably and suggest such variable rates be called incentive rates. If those rates were put into place, we would simply allow the railway companies to increase the volume at certain points and effectively to abandon lines which do not pay, which would make it more costly for the farmer to get his grain to market.

The Crow rate problem involves the amount of money farmers will get. They are already in a price-cost squeeze. If additional transportation costs are added to their other costs, the pressure on them to get out of farming will be increased.

I see that the time allotted to me is coming to an end. I had wished to cover a number of other matters. One such matter is the price of land. The price of land has become a major factor in the cost of production. On Monday many speakers spoke about the cost of land, but no one suggested a basic solution. I suggest that the government should be considering some basic solutions such as controlling what land stays agricultural and what land does not. We should be looking at such things as increased farm size, which is causing the price of land to go up. We should be looking at foreign investment in farm land. We should be looking at speculation in farm land. Many people are buying land as a haven from inflation and have no intention of farming it. However, they are willing to pay almost anything for that land.

In closing, I wish to reiterate that agriculture is in a crisis situation which is approaching disaster. The band-aid solutions the government has used to try to stop this disaster are just not working. Farmers are being forced out of the industry on a daily basis. There will be a much greater movement out of farming throughout this year as well as when the effects of high interest rates are felt after the end of this crop year. What we are doing with this motion is calling on the government to put before this House a planned policy for agriculture which would deal with the problems of agriculture on a co-ordinated and far-reaching basis so that farmers can remain farmers and farm families can stay together.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Huron-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, one of the problems, which has plagued Canadian agriculture for decades, as all hon. members ought to know, is that Canadian farms have been losing their youthful population to the cities, where shorter working hours and higher wages have made the hard and risky life of farming seem an unfair burden. We have always had such an abundance of cheap food in this country that we have as a country been able to put this problem on the back burner, paying only lip service to the crisis toward which this situation was building. Today, June 3, 1981, we may see recorded in the census a welcome reversal of the trend of past censuses toward a depleted agricultural population growing older decade after decade.

In 1966 when the mid-term census was taken, only 13.5 per cent of Canadian farmers were under the age of 34, while nearly twice as many were over the age of 60. Ten years later, in 1976, there had been a change. The number of younger farmers had increased marginally, and the number of farmers at or near retirement age had declined slightly in percentage terms. It is obvious how important this trend is to Canadian agriculture.

Farming is hard work, and learning to farm well takes a long time, so long that it is almost true to say that one must be born to it. Obviously, if the majority of those born to farming continue to leave farming, there must come a point when there are too few farmers to produce food for the urban population. What saved us from ever reaching that point in Canada is that although our farm population was declining and getting older, both at once, it was also increasing its productivity tremendously through improved methods of agriculture. But these improved methods have depended on two forces: first, a great increase in the use of expensive machinery, expensive fuels and expensive fertilizers and pesticides; and second, a great deal of very important agricultural research to develop new seed varieties, new crops and newly introduced livestock breeds as well.

Two things have happened to agriculture in recent years which have created a brick wall for this kind of productivity increase. First, the cost of fuels and petroleum-based fertilizers which made these spectacular productivity gains possible has skyrocketed.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) just yesterday delivered another hefty blow to agriculture by adding nine cents to a gallon of gas. In the long run, consumers who will be paying for this increase by driving their cars will also be paying for it through increased food prices. But in the meantime, farmers are paying it, just as their crop year gets fully under way. They face the immediate pressure brought upon them by a budget that makes no allowance for cheaper prices for fuels used in food production, as the budget of our previous government did.

The other thing that has happened to agriculture is that the very valuable efforts of Canadian agricultural research are not being supported as they should be by this government. Research pays dividends many times the cost of research, but they come slowly and without much fanfare, and so a government that wants to cut costs in a showy manner yields, as this one has done, to the temptation to let agricultural research lie fallow, even though it is an investment that can profit us all whether we grow food or consume it.

Now that we have run up against this brick wall, making further productivity gains harder to achieve, we must hope that young farmers will still be attracted into farming, for it is as certain as snow in winter that older farmers cannot continue forever to put food on Canadian tables. We may all hope that today's census shows that the average age of Canadian farmers has declined further, and that we have definitely reversed the trend that was creeping up on us. Civilizations have died because their land base was depleted. We are foolish if we think that we, as an industrial society, are somehow exempt from this law of nature.

Another trend we might hope to see from today's census is a continuation of the trend toward higher farm incomes. Certainly we cannot hope to hold younger farmers on the land if easier and higher incomes continue to draw them to the cities. During most of the 1970s, farm incomes were beginning to edge up toward the average for Canadians as a whole. But in 1970, farmers earned on average only 42 per cent of what male workers as a whole earned, and by 1978 they still earned less than four fifths of the average. There are some compensations in life on the land to make up for the lesser income, but something of frightening proportion has happened since 1978 to create a crisis in agriculture that is this year growing much worse. Land costs, of course, increased tremendously throughout the 1970s, but farmers can live with that. Their problem is that they must finance the purchase of their land over many years and at the same time cope with the enormously increased costs of necessary machinery, more efficient buildings, and much higher annual operating costs.

Now, how is a young farmer going to do this? Well, the answer is apparent. Many of them cannot. Because it blindly follows a policy of short-term advantage, this government negotiated a few years ago a beef import quota that allows considerable surpluses of U.S. beef into Canada and depresses prices. The result is that most Canadian beef farmers are now operating at a loss. Any businessman can carry a loss for a while if he is efficient. But this year farm bankruptcies are up by 70 per cent over the first quarter of last year. And we can certainly expect to see considerably more farm bankruptcies this year, particularly in my province of Ontario. Obviously, many farmers cannot carry the losses they are now facing. And among those who are not bankrupt, many farmers are watching their equity decline month after month. There are beef farmers in Ontario paying $80,000 a month in interest payments to finance their operations. If the costs of borrowing were normal, they would possibly be in a slight profit position.

Mr. Whelan: Eighty thousand dollars?

Mr. Cardiff: That is right, $80,000. I can take you to a farmer who is paying $80,000.

Mr. Whelan: A month?

Mr. Cardiff: At present, far from being able to make a profit that allows them to retire some of their long-term debt for land purchases so that their equity position improves, many are watching the equity they have already built disappearing, while those important younger farmers who should be feeding us tomorrow are finding in increasing numbers that they cannot even manage to hold on to their land. There are too many reports of farmers in Ontario selling their cattle, hogs and quite often their breeding stock because they are in default on interest payments and, quite often, on their principal payments. There is a similar situation in Ontario as well where we are seeing very good productive farmland sold to quite often foreign investors and then leased back to the former owner for at least a five-year term. That seems to be the only way that some of the young farmers can stay on the farm and, hopefully, in the next five years will be in a position to buy at least a small piece of land in order to stay in agriculture.

This is a crisis, Mr. Speaker, not only for farmers but for all of us. Recent reports showing that consumer confidence is at its lowest ebb since early 1978 ought to be causing alarm bells to ring in the heads of this government opposite. We live in a country that can and should be growing, producing more and employing more people. Of course, inflation is a major problem, but it is being aggravated by this government. The high interest rates caused by government policy of depressing demand must either put more farmers out of business or put food costs up by more than is necessary. Only a very sinister government would even attempt to make it more difficult than necessary for Canadian families to buy food. But clearly, if farmers must pay interest rates that range up to 22 per cent or higher in order to buy seed, fuel and fertilizer, or to buy calves to raise, then they must pass on this cost in the price of their produce. The structure of the food industry is such that these higher prices at the farm gate are subject to markups that are figured in percentage terms, not in mere dollar terms. Thus the increase in the farmer's cost of production is magnified as the percentage markups all along the line are built into the price the consumer must pay. Even trucking the marked up food to market has taken a cost leap since midnight last night. Clearly, then, the present high interest rate policy is fuelling inflation in this most vital of all areas of consumer spending.

All these pressures are faced by farmers, Mr. Speaker. Higher land financing costs, higher cost of seed, fertilizer and fuel, as well as livestock, and tremendously increased rates to finance the cost of all these higher prices, are hitting farmers, while imported meat keeps the prices paid to Canadian farmers temporarily low. I say temporarily because once Canadian farmers go out of business in great numbers, there will be no more cheap imports. We will be in the position in agriculture that we are in energy where an incompetent government has just added 9 cents to the cost of a gallon of gas because it has followed a policy that depresses Canadian production and increases the need for imports. Today the consumer can see quite clearly how dearly this government intends to make him pay for its clumsy energy policy, and some day soon the consumer is going to face similar unnecessary burdens because of its clumsy agricultural policy.

We on this side of the House have recognized that the way to combat inflation is not by forcing food prices to rise because of a high interest rate policy added to the higher input costs, but to shelter the crucial food sector from any unnecessary exaggeration of the general rise in the costs of production. We who first introduced the small business development bond because we know that small business creates most of the jobs in this country have recommended again and again that this interest-cutting program should be extended to unincorporated farms as well. It is the consumer who will benefit from lower interest costs to farmers, not farmers themselves. By keeping the cost of food when it leaves the farm gate as low as possible, we would be helping to contain the added cost of the percentage markups added after food leaves the farm gate and moves through the processing, distribution and merchandizing system. If this government is at all serious about controlling inflation, Mr. Speaker, it would realize that its wisest course is to stop trying to make tax dollars out of the business of farm credit, and allow the small business development bond to be used by Canada's family farms, to everyone's long-term advantage.

This of course is not a permanent solution to the problem of farm credit, Mr. Speaker. Some more stable method of farm financing is necessary if we are to preserve the extremely efficient farming system we have developed. We need only to look at the dismal state of a country like Poland to see how lucky we have been that an efficient, self-motivating agricultural economy has continued in Canada to provide us with food as cheap as any in the world, or nearly so.

If we are to preserve this kind of efficiency in the future, then we need to provide the necessary financing instruments to help young farmers and expanding farmers buy their land and facilities. What we on this side of the House have suggested time and time again is an increase in the funding available to the Farm Credit Corporation. It is a very useful instrument for farmers who, along with the high costs of what they must buy and of the money they must buy it with, must also pay high prices for their land and buildings. The trouble is that there is not and never has been enough money for the Farm Credit Corporation. If the government cannot provide the lending capital itself, it should be bringing in legislation now to allow the Farm Credit Corporation to borrow in the commercial markets. What is needed from the government is the means of making that commercially borrowed money available to farmers at rates that do not force them to contribute to inflation. No doubt the finance minister believes that any mechanism to keep interest rates low when the Farm Credit Corporation is borrowing commercially must involve a drain on the treasury. But the finance minister might do well to weigh the costs of such a policy against the benefits. Revenues that are forgone in the interest of decreasing Canada's rate of inflation may replenish themselves in the savings realized in government expenditure later. Considering that the federal government will be paying indexed pensions to more retired civil servants than Canada has farmers, it is clear that the finance minister ought to be seeking ways of ensuring that he does not contribute to inflation through a misconceived policy.

It is important too for Canadian senior citizens that the costs of food be contained. Taking steps to ensure that food production costs are not pushed up by interest rates is clearly part of the duty of the government toward senior citizens for whom food costs are a very important item in the budget.

Canada's agricultural community is very strong. What it needs from government, above all, is a stable environment in which to operate. Increased lending power for Farm Credit is an important element in stabilizing farm financing, but it is apparent to all who deal with the Farm Credit Corporation that it also needs an improved operating budget. For too long now it has been starved of sufficient funding to maintain an adequate staff in its field and regional offices. This necessary area of the public service merits the kind of concern which has been shown for the propaganda arms of the government, such as the Canadian Unity Information Office and certain branches of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources.

It is clear from the fact that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) has not brought in legislation to deal with the enormous problems facing farmers that he has little clout in the present cabinet. If the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) will not listen to the Minister of Agriculture, then it is time he listened to reason and recognized that the agricultural sector is of the most basic importance to the economy and deserves to have its productivity enhanced, not destroyed by Canadian government policy.

Similarly, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston), regardless of what he may think of the Minister of Agriculture, should recognize the need for an effective administration of existing agricultural programs and should ensure that his cabinet colleagues do not squander on propaganda money which should be spent on programs like the administration of farm credit.

There is one area in which the Minister of Agriculture has recently shown his disregard for the responsibilities he carries, that is, in the area of stabilization payments. Beef producers in my riding and elsewhere who pay as much as $80,000 a month in interest charges on their operating capital have been told, along with cattlemen everywhere else, that they do not qualify for stabilization payments this year, even though they are marketing cattle below their total costs of production. How the Minister of Agriculture can justify not making stabilization payments when this named commodity is being marketed below the cost of production is an interesting and unanswered question.

One of two things should be explained by the minister. Either he should explain how it is that the prices being received for cattle are too high to justify stabilization payments, or he should explain how it is that he can permit a situation where farmers are producing beef at a loss now and still getting more than 90 per cent of the average price over the past five years. Either way, the failure to pay stabilization on beef cattle is a clear indication that the minister's policy is a failure in the beef industry.

In the hog industry his failure is even clearer. It is also calculated bad policy designed to create discord among the provinces. Presumably discord among the provinces is seen as a source of national unity by the minister's cabinet colleagues. When the hog stabilization subsidy was announced a week or so ago, the minister announced that he would be spending about $100 million on the program this year. A while ago he told us he expected the plan would cost about $146 million. But presumably the minister was told that his ministry was not important enough, when compared with spending money on promoting the Liberal view of Canadian unity, and was told to cut back on the program.

Well, he found an ingenious way of doing so. He has saved $46 million he expected to spend by cutting some provinces out of their share of the hog subsidy. In particular, Ontario suffers. The press release announcing the hog stabilization payments indicates that hog producers in Ontario will receive $3.63 per hog less than hog producers in provinces like Quebec on their first 1,600 hogs.

The reason given is that Ontario has a hog stabilization plan and that those producers who are covered by it will be receiving $3.63 per hog from the provincial government. The fact is that Ontario does not have a hog stabilization plan. It has a weaner pig stabilization plan, just as Quebec has. Market hogs are not covered under the Ontario plan, and weaner pigs are not covered under the federal plan. Clearly, under the legislation, Quebec hog producers are entitled to full federal coverage for their market hogs up to the limits of the plan, and so are farmers in Ontario.

Judging by his press release, the minister appears not to know the situation in his own province. The same lack of knowledge seems to govern his thinking when it comes to Alberta and British Columbia. One can sympathize with the minister's desire to save money, but to try to do so by making unreal and incorrect distinctions among the provinces is not only unfair and inequitable, but it makes a mockery out of the federal stabilization system. Many provinces have their own stabilization plan for hogs because the federal plan is so inadequate, paying only 90 per cent of the five-year average in the preceding five years. Ontario's own plan was brought in after close consultation with federal officials. The minister himself recognized that the federal plan is inadequate when he proposed two or so years ago to bring in a plan guaranteeing 100 per cent of the previous average market price, with producer involvement in the plan.

This plan was shelved, but provincial plans serve the need which the federal government will not serve. Now, through lack of knowledge or something worse, the Minister of Agriculture has made a mess out of the stabilization program in two of the commodities named for stabilization programs. He has undermined the value of provincial programs, since those producers who joined the provincial plan in Ontario—and perhaps those in other provinces—are penalized compared with those who did not join. The minister might object that those in the provincial plan receive the same money as those in the federal plan, but it is not true. The producers who enrolled in the Ontario sow weaner stabilization plan pay part of the costs of that plan directly and would still be behind those who did not enrol to the full extent of the premiums they have paid.

This seems like a clumsy attack on the provincial stabilization programs by a minister who has demonstrated that he cannot run the federal plan with anything like the degree of stability producers need, if they are to operate effectively in producing Canada's food. Perhaps his cabinet colleagues, who no doubt have told him to go and save money, will know how to help him out of this ridiculous position.

All in all the farmers of this country who once had considerable respect for the Minister of Agriculture, whether or not they agreed with his policies, are wondering what has happened to agricultural policy at the federal level, and so are their provincial governments. The present high interest rates policy, operating in the food production sector where there is no excessive demand to be curtailed, is feeding inflation in this most vital of all spending areas—food. The stabilization program designed to bring order into the fluctuations of price, which can cripple production, is being used as a clumsy tool of unrelated government ambitions while the industry it was designed to serve is being denied the full legislated benefits of the stabilization program.

It is time for the government to get its house in order in fulfilling its responsibilities to the agricultural sector of the Canadian economy. It is time for legislation to bring the Farm Credit Corporation and the stabilization programs up to what is needed to meet present realities, and it is time to ensure that farm financing is protected from insane interest rates.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, this is the second time this week that opposition parties have given us an opportunity to debate agriculture policy. I welcome their interest and concern, but I would welcome it even more if I felt they had expressed the same interest and concern in assisting us to move legislation through the House, particularly some of the agricultural bills which have been ready for some time.

It is difficult to understand why the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo) would use this day to debate agriculture, since we have already used one day this week. He knows full well that there is an agriculture bill before the Standing Committee on Agriculture. That committee of the House of Commons should be dealing at this very moment with that bill and possibly finishing with it. I realize the hon. member does not have a high opinion of what that piece of legislation is capable of doing, and I know it has some shortcomings, but it is a bill which the agricultural community has requested for a long, long time. It should be given speedy passage in the House.

As I said the other day, we are talking about agriculture probably instead of acting. Some of the things which have been said in the House are not accurate. Hon. members opposite have talked about me not being well-informed. When we talk about beef subsidization, we use the calendar year, for example, from January 1 to the end of December, 1980. The facts are available to anyone. The formula used by the stabilization board shows no payment for that year. We are using 90 per cent of the average of the last five years, which is statutory, and we must use current input costs. It shows no payment for that particular calendar year.

The big thrust that beef producers felt, as far as extra costs are concerned, especially in interest rates, was from the first of January, and maybe a short part of December, into the first four months of this year. That is where they really felt it and it really hurt, plus the fact that that is when the cattle from the U.S. came in here and depressed the market from 10 cents to 15 cents a pound, live weight. This would have destroyed, as I said the other day, anything that I may have been giving in subsidized interest rates, etc. However, that is what the Canadian Cattlemen's Association wants. They want a free movement of live cattle back and forth across the border. They have lambasted me for saying that we should have some kind of controls on that type of thing. The hon. member for Huron-Bruce (Mr. Cardiff) who just spoke said that I did not know what was going on. I certainly do know what is going on when cattle can move in, say, to the province of Ontario and take over 24 per cent of the slaughter market week in and week out. That is the system which the Canadian Cattlemen's Association has advocated for a long, long time. When I interfered with that, and when I put quotas on live cattle coming into Canada, who objected and wrote to all my cabinet colleagues, and said, "Do not let the Minister of Agriculture do that"? The Canadian Cattlemen's Association wrote every one of them at that time. I do not pretend to be a messiah, or anything.

Mr. Kilgour: Just a socialist!

Mr. Whelan: I do not pretend to be as smart as the hon. fellow who is making the noise over there. He would not know how to feed a sow or cow or how to take care of them in any fashion or form, either, as far as that goes.

Mr. Kilgour: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. That is a completely incorrect statement, Mr. Speaker. I happen to be in the cattle business.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan).

Mr. Whelan: Yes, I can imagine how the hon. member is in the cattle business. I can imagine for what reason.

However, I just want to say that the cattlemen have asked for the kind of a system they have, and they are the ones who are suffering the consequences. It is not of my doing, because the Americans did not even fill one third of the quota we gave them; but they retaliated on veal, they retaliated on pork and in other fashions. This is what I am saying, when we say that the trade system does not work the way it should.

Mr. Kilgour: Gene, you don't know what you are talking about!

Mr. Whelan: The free market system does not work at all, and it had a depressing effect on cattle, which it should not have had.

Mr. Kilgour: Socialize it, Gene!

Mr. Whelan: The fact that there was overproduction of pork in Canada also had a depressing effect on all other forms of meat consumed in Canada, whether it be poultry or beef. That was the free, productive system working to its full capacity or capability.

Mr. Kilgour: So let's socialize the industry!

Mr. Whelan: Some of the most efficient producers in Canada are suffering unnecessarily. It is not because of being non-productive, but as a result of putting too much product on the market. In essence, what some of the hon. members are suggesting is that we subsidize the U.S. economy because, for instance, pork products—

Mr. Kilgour: Balderdash!

Mr. Whelan: People are going bankrupt in the pork production industry. For instance, practically 30 per cent of their production goes to the United States. Therefore, they are putting it in the United States below the cost of production, and yet they are saying to the federal government that it must subsidize them. We are not controlling them on subsidization. They are making their own decisions. The finance establishments of this country were the ones which lent them the money.

Referring to the Farm Credit Corporation, it was set up to be the lender of last resort, not the lender of first application. It was to be the lender after all other lending institutions said no. Therefore, we encourage the private lending institutions to get into the lending business. However, it is obvious to me that a lot of them did not know what they were doing and did not understand agriculture. They made tremendous loans to these people.

When one talks about giving them the short-term money and paying $80,000 a year in interest, we know that that is reference to no ordinary farm. I am talking about some of the young farmers who are maybe paying $80,000 a year in interest, and then having the banks move in and foreclose this year because they get scared. I am saying that the banks should be giving them a stay of time, because I am sure some of these red meat industries will come around in time, but they need a stay so they can get back on their feet. However, they need some better marketing system than they have at the present time.

I have probably farmed as much in this country as anyone has, as much as many agricultural people, and more than most, as far as that goes. Sometimes we have talked with farm organizations, agribusiness groups with special concerns, service clubs, you name them, chambers of commerce or boards of trade. We have talked to them about agricultural policy to try to get their opinions.

Mr. Kilgour: That's just terrific!

Mr. Whelan: —to try to get their opinions.

Mr. Kilgour: Just speak to the subject, Gene; do not tell us what a great guy you are, okay?

Mr. Whelan: Well, Mr. Speaker, you have an assistant over there who seems to want to sit in your chair. I do not know. Maybe Your Honour should offer it to him, because the hon. member seems to be an expert on everything.

Mr. Kilgour: Just speak to the motion, Gene.

Mr. Whelan: So the hon. member is giving Your Honour a little free advice, which is about as much as it is worth, too.

Mr. Kilgour: Oh, that's fantastic!

Mr. Whelan: In most cases, my speeches are printed. I have to say they are made available to the media and to a wide range of interested people. I am sure that the hon. member from the New Democratic Party opposite must be on the mailing list. When I read the list of things which they say should be part of a national agricultural policy for this great country, I feel as though I am reading some of my own speeches. That must be where the hon. member got the idea.

Mr. Kilgour: Sit down, Gene!

Mr. Whelan: I just want to say that it is easy and to see that the NDP members opposite have never had the responsibility of being in office and forming the government. Converting policies into laws, plans and programs is not something which is done at a snap of one's finger. We are a responsible and representative government, and the laws must be debated and approved both by the Commons and the Senate. What is even more important, as far as agriculture is concerned, is that we are a confederation of provinces. Each of those ten governments has considerable jurisdiction and authority in the field of farm policy.

Mr. Kilgour: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: We worked very closely together. The hon. member for Huron-Bruce referred to stabilization. It is longer than two years ago that I proposed to the provinces that we join in a national stabilization program. This would produce harmony. I know the hon. member knows, just as well as I do, and just as sure as he is sitting there, what the farm organization said about Whelan's plan at that time. It said it was too lucrative and would cause too much production. That would have been with producer and federal government participation. Only one province really endorsed that, that is the province we both come from, namely, Ontario. The province said it was a good program and should proceed, but we did not have enough participation from the rest of Canada, so it did not. Now, from the telegrams, letters, and responses from delegations I am receiving, it is evident that they want that kind of plan. However, that kind of plan was proposed to them again two years ago. We will be talking to them again, not this month, but in July, when we meet with the provincial ministers in Alberta. At that time, we will again be proposing harmonization and stabilization to see if they will pick it up.

I am sure that all hon. members of this House are well aware that we have a national stabilization program. It provides for mandatory stabilization of a certain number of what are called named products, which include beef and pork. It also provides for any commodity to be covered in any year which is so designated. If producers make representations to me, and I feel that their representations are proper and that it should be a designated product, then we name it and go ahead and designate that product in faith. The record shows that we have used it time and time again for those producers who say they are affected by overproduction or an influx of crops in some other part of Canada or some other part of the world which depresses the prices which they are receiving for their crops here.

However, over the years, various provinces have chosen to implement their own stabilization program based on what commodities they think are most important to their areas, and also based on what their provincial treasuries can carry. I have been strongly opposed to this from the beginning. It balkanizes farming in Canada and works against the basic idea of confederation. Provinces have agreed, time and time again, not to piggyback and not to pile their programs on top of any of our federal programs. However, that is the very thing they are doing and the very thing they said they would not do. They said they would not piggyback on top of any of our programs.

Therefore, in essence, when we are working this out on hog stabilization, I can honestly say to Your Honour that my cabinet colleagues did not interfere at all, because that is a mandatory program. I make the decisions on how the payments will be made after I receive advice from the stabilization board. We have told them time and time again that to provide economic equity, we cannot have, say, a rich province putting in a program, while a province which does not have those economic resources has no program. We cannot say to them, "All you are going to get is a federal program, but you are paid as much as $12 a hog plus the $8.96 we are giving you, so you will receive over $20 a hog," while a person, say, in Manitoba will only receive the $8.96 and must depend solely on the federal program. There are provinces in Canada which have that kind of program. There are other provinces that have income assurance programs, such as British Columbia. Under that program they took our money, which is their right as that was the arrangement, but they objected to the way in which we ran it. All anyone has to do is to check the records and the precedents set under ASA 75 and see that the bill says very clearly that there must be fairness in the administration of the act. That is what we are trying to do, Mr. Speaker. We are trying to provide equity for pork producers. No matter what part of the country they are in, they are competing for the domestic market or the international market and economic equity must be provided for them.

It is wrong for anyone to say that I do not know what is going on with the hog industry in Ontario. I am well aware of the agricultural programs in the province of Ontario. The federal government contributes many more millions of dollars to agriculture in Ontario than the provincial government does, although it has the economic resources to do more.

I object when my old friend, the minister of agriculture for Ontario, says that this is a federal responsibility. He should look around to see the programs that other provinces have put into effect for agriculture in their areas. The purpose of stabilization programs is to offer a stop-loss factor. It is poor planning for producers not to be concerned about how much the market can absorb, especially with perishable dairy and meat products and things that have a short storage life. It is just economic nonsense and economic suicide. The programs that the provinces started on their own have been wrong, Mr. Speaker. I know that.

For the first time this year we have built a provision into the hog stabilization program that deducts provincial payments from the federal payment. We do not deduct the payments made by producers. It has not been well received by those provinces that have supplementary programs, but has been praised by the others.

It is the one thing that I could do within my authority to bring about equal treatment of all Canadian producers. I will not belabour that point, Mr. Speaker.

On the subject of orderly marketing, I will also welcome any assistance members opposite would care to give. They can start with the beef and pork products. I do not think anyone has done more to encourage producers to adopt orderly marketing than I have, Mr. Speaker.

But the point is that to encourage is all that can be done. How farmers market their produce is up to them. The fact that dairy farmers and turkey, broiler and egg producers have established national marketing agencies, is a credit to them. They have brought order into the production and marketing of their commodities and at the same time they have undertaken to provide Canadian consumers with a steady supply of high-quality produce at reasonable and stable prices. The figures show, Mr. Speaker, that over the past 15 years, the consumer prices of commodities marketed national supply management programs have increased less than the over-all food sector of the consumer price index and far less than prices for beef and pork, where producers insist on operating under something they call "free enterprise." It is free for some but the people who handle the product make the same or a higher profit than they did before. The producer has no real trust in the market place. Under the pork and beef marketing systems which are operating in Canada today, the producers must take what they are given for the produce. There is a hodge-podge of pork producers' organizations trying to do a job of marketing the product. They have not done badly. To subsidize the United States and Japanese treasuries by selling their product below the cost of production is just economic nonsense, but in essence that is what they are doing.

As we saw on Monday, however, the demand for supply management in the hog industry is growing. Several hundred producers were here on the Hill to demonstrate their concern. A similar movement is growing in the beef industry as well, although the Canadian Cattlemen's Association likes to pretend it is just a small radical group.

I base my view on the reports that come to me of meetings held in different parts of the country and on what the producers are saying. Some of them are even taking votes and the vast majority have voted for a better marketing system for their product.

Potato farmers in eastern Canada have just decided to form a marketing agency and I am confident that in a few years' time they will be operating a supply management system that gives them the same benefits enjoyed by dairy farmers and egg producers in other parts of Canada.

Not all commodities need national supply management to ensure an adequate return to the producer. There are more than 100 marketing boards across the country, operated by producers, helping them market their produce. For instance, Alberta has some of the strongest provincial marketing boards in the country and they are continuing to forge ahead. The Alberta pork producers have taken over a pork processing plant in Alberta and one in British Columbia. As directors, they have famous people who used to be members of this House—Dr. Hugh Horner and Dr. Bert Herridge, just to mention a couple of them.

Are these men incapable of making judgments and decisions? We all recognize them as capable men who have been very successful in other enterprises and they will be successful in this one. Why would Dr. Herridge offer his services as a member of a three-person beef commission which recommended a better system of marketing beef? It is because he recognized the failures of the beef marketing system which had been there since time immemorial. We had been marketing beef in a very old fashioned way. Not all producers need this type of system, but some of them do. The marketing boards provide a wide range of services for promotion, negotiating contracts, central selling and operating joint storage facilities.

Producers can accomplish many things by joining together to market their product. Five large supermarket chains distribute 65 per cent of the food that goes to the consumers of Canada. That means that over 300,000 farmers are trying to deal with five giants. The only way they can do that efficiently is by organizing themselves into a group that can negotiate a fair deal for them. Some of them are doing this. They are doing a good job and they are not ripping off the public.

I am not spending millions of dollars on those programs, Mr. Speaker. For instance, I am not spending one penny on the poultry industry. The hon. member for Huron-Bruce was formerly a member of a board in Ontario so he knows that there are contractual marketing boards in good old Tory Ontario. I grew crops for them at one time for vegetable processors and they did not give me anything for nothing, but if I were efficient and produced according to my contract, I could make a very good living. The hon. member knows that.

The farmers of Ontario who are operating under that system do not write letters to him or to me. They are not going bankrupt and they are making a decent living. There is the same kind of thing in some of the other provinces. Indeed, there are 110 such systems in Canada today. The jackasses who say that I created the marketing boards and who condemn marketing boards should investigate to find out how fair they are. There are some people who think—even though our farmers are efficient—that they should not have any say in how their product is marketed. I am not saying there are not even some within government who think that way or some within the civil service who think that way, but there are certainly some in society who think that way also. This country is one of the few which has granted that right to producers. It was granted by legislative assemblies and this House. A Conservative Prime Minister, R. B. Bennett, established the Canadian Wheat Board and that is the only time a marketing board was imposed in this country. He saw the necessity to put fairness into wheat marketing because of the unfair system that existed at that time.

Mr. Justice Emmett Hall is not known for his liberalism. His report on the western grain transportation system was really a western Canadian agricultural report. What did he say? He said that if there was anything obvious to him, it was pretty near unanimous support for the Canadian Wheat Board, which was evident in nearly all of his reports on western Canada. When we have loud noise and things like that, we have wind which causes drought. There is a drought here in the intelligentsia on agriculture today, slightly to your left at the present time, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I think there were two speakers before the minister. Courtesy was extended to both of them. I would invite hon. members to extend the same courtesy to the minister.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, when we talk about the national commodities that are marketed in a national forum, those with price setting capabilities which use a cost pricing formula, hon. members know that the products which are sold stay much below the inflation rate for food in Canada. If all products had stayed at about that rate, which is 9 per cent or 9.5 per cent, we would be the utopia of the world. But the products not grown under that system are the ones which are much higher.

Do hon. members remember there ever being a shortage of eggs, broilers, turkeys, etc., on the market? There never has. I have never given those producers one penny of taxpayers' dollars. I challenge anyone to find an industry, such as the egg industry producing one of the most perishable products in the world, which loses less than one half of 1 per cent of production. The loss is so small that you cannot measure it. In fact, there is no measure for it. The highest quality is put on the marketplace. Efficiency has never been greater in the egg industry than it is now. It used to take eight pounds of feed to produce a dozen eggs. Now it takes less than four pounds of feed to produce a dozen eggs. Up to one third of the laying crop used to be lost to mortality; they died trying to lay eggs. Now veterinarians and scientists have come up with serums, with feeding and nutrition programs, less than one half of 1 per cent of the crop is lost. The efficiency that has crept into the egg production system of this nation is greater than nearly any other part of our society. You hear these know-nothings say bad things about inefficiency, etc. But they have never been so efficient before.

I have just returned from a meeting of the World Food Council. All these things are being tried under socialist systems. In Yugoslavia it costs 25 cents to buy one egg. Think what a dozen eggs would cost. You do not buy a dozen eggs in Yugoslavia under that socialist system. We still have the independence of every farmer in a production unit. This is something which does not exist in their system. Ninety five per cent of our farm units are family owned and operated. They are very efficient and 95 per cent of our food is produced without any hired help. The family itself works. No other nation can claim that right. No other nation can claim the independence that our farmers have. No other nation can claim having vested in their farmers the right to run their own system, even as far as letting them sell their own products.

People say we have done nothing for agriculture. I know there are other things we can do, but we need the co-operation of the House and the co-operation of producers. I do not have to beg money from Treasury Board for these producers, as I am being asked to do for pork and beef producers, who stubbornly refuse to organize themselves a better marketing system so as to get from the marketplace what the products should return to them, which is a decent living for their managerial ability, for their capital invested and for their labour. That is all that is asked. No farmers have asked for exorbitant returns during my history with farm organizations or during my 19 years in this House of Commons. This is why I say we have such a healthy agricultural industry.

I visited the Winnipeg research station just the other day. A new variety of wheat is being placed on the market which will increase wheat production on the prairies in three years by 4 per cent. Scientists are working on several other varieties, including barley. Some varieties are almost ready to be released. But how long did it take our scientists to develop this new variety of wheat? It took 14 years to develop that one variety of wheat. Just imagine what a 4 per cent increase will do to production and to the economy of the prairie wheat-producing provinces. We have not lessened our drive on research. Research is the only area in my department which has had an increase. It was increased also by the former minister of agriculture, the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise). I have increased funds again this year. We are not downgrading research. We would like to have more money. In the federal system we do 98 per cent of all government agricultural research. The provinces do 2 per cent. With respect to public research, meaning universities and other such institutions, over 50 per cent is still done by us.

Agriculture Canada is the envy of the world with its agricultural production entity. Huge giants, for example, Russia and China and even the European countries, come to us wanting to sign agreements to work with our scientists so they can learn as much as we have.

The hon. member for Huron-Bruce knows that we are one of the most efficient pork producers in the world, but we are one of the worst marketers. I shall use an example I used the other day. Denmark, no bigger in size than the distance between the city of Toronto and the city of Windsor, produces 12 million hogs. All of Canada, which comprises 4,000 miles from sea to sea, only produces 12 million hogs. There is one big difference: the Danish operation, from production, to genetic breeding, to processing, to selling on the world market, is run 99 per cent by the Danish farmers. Only 1 per cent is run by somebody else. Our pork is every bit as good as the Danish pork. I think in some instances it is better. Our pork is better than the pork produced in the United States or for that matter pork from any other part of the world. When you buy Canadian pork, there is at least 10 per cent less moisture in it compared to American pork. This is a result of our feeding programs.

The hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave) made some good suggestions with regard to the Farm Credit Corporation. Other members have made good suggestions as well. The hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Dionne) made suggestions several weeks ago in a meeting of the agricultural committee. He suggested providing a trust corporation whereby farmers would be allowed to put some money into trust. They would accept a lower rate of interest, but the money in turn could be loaned to farmers. The Farm Credit Corporation will not be the sole answer to all problems, particularly when you see how some of our young farmers got into trouble, first by getting a loan from the Farm Credit Corporation, second a loan from their banking institution, and third getting a loan through some finance company for machinery.

There is no way that a minister could, even with pork prices being very good—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. minister but I must advise him that his allotted time has expired.

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, I think it is appropriate that we have had two days of debate in one week on our agricultural industry. The agricultural industry is something we should be concerned about. After all, it is the oldest indusry we have in Canada. Why should we not be concerned about it? Why should we not have two debates in one week? Probably we should have three debates in one week. In my opinion, much guidance and help could be given to the agricultural industry by the present government. We must also realize that the agricultural industry is a changing one. It is not the agricultural industry it was many years ago.

I remember an experience I once had. I would say it relates in some respects to the agricultural industry today. In 1965 I met an elderly gentleman. By his name I could tell that he came from a very rich agricultural area in my riding. I asked this gentleman, by the name of McEachern, why his ancestors would have a very rich agricultural area like Eldon Township in Victoria County and move up to land where agriculture was non-existent, literally speaking. The area was comprised of lakes and trees. He told me that the same thing is going on today. He said that our young people are being forced to leave agricultural areas for the cities. He told me that 100 years ago his ancestors came to the area because that was where the industry was, he said that history is repeating itself. The minister should keep this in mind when we talk about agriculture.

We must be aggressive in this field. We are forgetting that the entire lifestyle in agriculture has changed. People in the country want to enjoy the same things enjoyed by those in the city, and rightly so. They want leisure time and vacations. Our forefathers worked 12 to 18 hours a day on the family farm. The little red schoolhouse is gone. The farm children are bused to the larger schools where they mix with other people.

There is only one lifestyle today. There is not the city, town or country lifestyle which we had years ago. It used to be said "This boy comes from the country". Now we are all one. This is why we have to change our methods and our ideas concerning agriculture.

The minister and the government are forgetting about the increased cost of land. I will have something to say about the minister later. I know I am talking about something closer to his area than mine when I refer to an example in Dover township. I remember a chap who bought a farm 15 to 20 years ago for $60,000. The farm cannot be subdivided or developed in any way other than for agriculture. It is a low-lying area bordering the St. Clair River. When he sold the farm last year, he got $1.25 million for it. How could anyone in agriculture today on 200 acres even make the interest on that money? That is something the minister is forgetting about.

This industry needs proper supervision because of the many pitfalls. Let us look at machinery costs. When our forefathers settled this country, they used the services of the poor, humble horse which in return only required a flake of hay and a bucket of oats. It might have cost $125 or maybe less. The machinery that went with it cost very little more. To work the farm today, one of the cheaper tractors runs to $60,000. Most run to well over $100,000.

Mr. Bloomfield: That's not right.

Mr. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): I have some knowledge of tractors. I know that smaller tractors can be bought. I am talking about the farmer who goes out today to buy a tractor.

Mr. Bloomfield: That's not right.

Mr. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Well, I do not know the hon. member's background, but I do not think I am too far out on this. I know of many farmers who have paid $60,000 and they think they still have a small tractor. I do not think I am too far wrong.

What about financing and interest rates? How can we expect these people to have that kind of money? What does it cost to operate a farm? A while ago we heard from a chap who was paying $80,000 in interest on money for a feedlot. Are we forgetting all this? Yet the farmer does not qualify under the Small Businesses Loans Act.

Farming is industry. Some farming is big industry. This gracious government had all the answers in December, 1979. What is the cost of fuel to the farmer today? Diesel fuel costs have increased by 62 cents. What does my friend across the aisle have to say about that? It was his party in opposition which told us how to run the country. Where are their promises today? Why should the people have any confidence in this government? What about their promise for a better society which they made in the winter of 1980?

Last week I received a phone call from a farmer in my constituency. He not only complained about the high interest rates. I am not a corn grower; however, he asked me to bring this to the attention of the members of this House. He said that for a 45 gallon drum of Lastle corn spray he paid $1,000. I suppose this product has its origin in the chemical industry. In all fairness, I should mention that it probably would be diluted with water, but it is still pretty expensive spray for the corn field. This farmer will be meeting with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) tomorrow in Toronto along with the provincial minister of agriculture.

This is one of the plights our farmers are facing today. We have been ignoring this industry. We bend the knee to the motor car companies and other manufacturers which do not make as great a financial contribution to the economy of this country as the farmer. There are those who think the farmer's price is fixed in the world market. Price setting is beyond his control. All he can do is lower his cost of production. How can farmers do that? The cost of their tractors, fuel, and everything else is increasing. The increases are staggering. For some, the only option is to sell their assets and their farm and try to salvage something before they lose everything. We should have begun to help this depressed industry long ago.

I now want to refer to the chain store and the specials they carry in the red meat sector. Last week pork was selling in some chains at the following prices: liver, 29 cents a pound; pork hocks, 49 cents a pound. The consumer cannot keep this meat forever. He could not buy it last week and have it for the rest of his life. Picnic pork shoulder roasts sold at 89 cents a pound; pork butt roasts at 99 cents a pound; pork legs, 99 cents; pork loin roasts, $1.29; pork butt chops $1.19; loin chops, $1.89; and side ribs, $1.49. What is the cost of production of that animal? Stop and think about that. The farmer probably received 63 cents live weight.

Let us now deal with the beef industry. The chains go in and offer so much money for so many thousands or hundreds of thousands of carcasses of beef. I am probably a little bit premature because the advertising is not out, but I can back up these figures. Blade roasts, cut and trimmed, this week will sell for $1.39 a pound. This is lovely for the consumer. The government realizes there are more consumers than farmers, so they do not give a darn which way it goes. They receive more votes from consumers than from farmers. Blade steak roasts will sell at $1.39 a pound, short rib roasts at $1.39, cross rib roasts at $1.59, and rib steaks at $1.79 a pound. And we wonder what is wrong with our agriculture industry!

I will now deal with the Farm Credit Corporation. Not too long ago I went to the Minister of Agriculture regarding the case of a farmer who had gone bankrupt and was forced to sell. He had an 8 per cent mortgage. Three entrepreneurs came out. If they were connected with agriculture, it was very remotely at that time. They bought the farm and assumed the 8 per cent mortgage, the preferred farm credit rate of interest. It was a very good investment. This was brought to my attention and I confirmed it to the Farm Credit Corporation. It was true, and the minister said he would take steps to correct it. I honestly think he will. I have no reason to believe he will not. Probably he has taken care of it already.

I believe some of our Farm Credit Corporation people have too negative an attitude. When many of our young people try to buy a farm close to the family farm, which they need today to stay in production, they can get no positive response and are turned away. I suggest that the ones I have had experience with are very legitimate cases. Yet a chap or group not connected with agriculture can buy a farm or farms from underneath these young people, who I think have a right to wonder why.

The small business development bond is still denied our farmers. Our farmers are very capable business people and should not be denied the opportunity to take advantage of the small business development bond. I am not saying that is the answer to everything, but it would be a big help. I am asking why the Minister of Agriculture cannot get the farm community included under the provisions of the small business development bond program when he can go down to the Chrysler Corporation in Windsor with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) with huge grants. We have an agricultural industry we are so proud of but which is being depressed and set aside.

I am sorry the minister is not here as I would like to speak a little bit about him. I can assure Your Honour that I will be very kind, but I will be very honest. I have known the minister for some time, even before he was a cabinet minister. In the first election when he was the Minister of Agriculture I had more opposition from the present Minister of Agriculture than I did from the Liberal candidate in the riding, because people thought he was going to be the minister who understood the agricultural industry in Canada and was really going to help the farmers. The Liberal candidate who ran against me three times was rewarded with his Valhalla last week when he was appointed a judge.

An hon. Member: What else is new?

Mr. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Yes, and that is just part of it.

This is not true today of the Minister of Agriculture. They think of him as a very kindly gentleman, but they do not think he is getting his fair share or is speaking up for them. This was true to some extent in the last election, but it is very evident today that he has not fulfilled the dreams and wishes of the agricultural community in Canada. Probably he should rethink his approach to the agricultural industry.

I am not a farmer to any great extent, but I am proud to be associated with agriculture in a small way. I would hate to have somebody come along to me at some future date and say, "You can have so many cows, probably as many as you have now, but you can have no more". I do not say the minister's idea of marketing boards is all right. As far as possible we should have orderly marketing. But I think we will have to promote an educational system, and I am talking about the cattle industry.

Let me say something else to the minister. It is my prediction that we will see a great change in the red beef industry in Canada. When we can grow cash crops we will not be able to afford to have cattle on our prime lands. Our cattle will have to be raised on our less expensive agricultural lands. I know of many feedlots in Ontario that have been closed down. You can see them from the air, you can see many of them from the road, and I will name some of them. Probably some of these are in the riding of the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Bossy).

A very good friend of mine was chosen the agriculturalist of the year not too long ago in his home town by the Rotary Club, and I think the hon. member for Kent was there at the time. This man was in the cattle business but is out of it now. He was in the hog business but he has gone out of that too. It was not through poor management that Crawford Langstaff went out of those businesses. He went out of business because there was more in cash crops. It is true that he was sitting on some choice land. This is something that will have great influence on the way our agricultural industry will go, but it is something we must be prepared to live with and plan for.

The Minister of Agriculture said that we never imported eggs and we never imported broilers, and that we were the envy of many other agricultural countries of the world regarding our agricultural industry. We do not argue with that at all. However, I can remember not too long ago when we imported eggs. I can remember not too long ago when we imported broilers, and we still do. We import turkeys and we rent hens. If we want hens we go out and rent them to lay eggs. I know one chap who invited me into his egg farm. He had 19,000 laying hens and he did not own one. He rented them from a company. Who controls some of these industries? This chap was renting these hens from a company. I am sorry to say this guy is not in business today, but that is an example of some of the things that go on in the agricultural world.

When the minister said we were the envy of so many countries in regard to agriculture, I think probably this is the result of God's grace in nature, and because our agricultural people are farmers. That is probably the reason, more so than because of good government management. I do not think we can take credit for the fact tht we have bounteous agricultural areas and the way they produce. We luckily are situated geographically—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I must interrupt the hon. member as his allotted time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Ostiguy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, for the second time this week agriculture is the subject of debate in the House. To some extent I deplore today the fact that we were to appear before the agriculture committee to put more stress still on the beneficial effects of Bill C-46, the Meat Import Act. The motion introduced by the hon. member of the New Democratic Party contains six points, but I think that its main purpose is to say that the government should encourage the establishment of national agencies for the orderly marketing of all farm commodities. Surely the House is aware of the fact that we have in excess of one hundred marketing agencies, either federal or provincial.

Of course, through the National Farm Products Marketing Council, the federal government is responsible for three national marketing agencies, namely the Egg Marketing Agency, the Chicken Marketing Agency and the Turkey Marketing Agency. In addition, a few years ago the government established the Canadian Wheat Board and, more recently, the Canadian Dairy Commission. It is known that these marketing agencies have been a boon to Canadian farmers, perhaps more so in the case of milk since Canada is known for producing huge quantities of milk and dairy products which we sell on international markets. The Canadian Dairy Commission was not set up by milk producers. Heaven knows it was not a cinch! Suffice to recall the years 1974 and 1975 when farmers marched before the Parliament Buildings in groups, in huge delegations, to demonstrate and even decry the agricultural policies of those days. Since then, of course, the Canadian Dairy Commission has had very beneficial results, and I think that farmers who are now marketing dairy products would not leave that field under any consideration.

A while ago, the previous speaker referred to a farmer in his constituency who phoned him this week to complain that he had to pay $1,000 for a drum of grain corn spray, but the member forgot to say that ten years ago, the same drum might have cost $500. Ten years ago, grain corn cost $100 per ton compared to $175 today. He did not mention that fact. I referred to milk a moment ago. In 1968-70, milk cost $2 or $2.10 per hundredweight. At present, with the new indexation formula put forward by the Canadian Dairy Commission, the dairy producer gets $16 or $17—and the amount increases every three months—or even $18 per hundredweight.

Production costs have increased, of course, but the selling price of the finished product has also gone up substantially. Everyone knows that the profits derived from the orderly marketing of products by those boards and commissions are used to prevent the duplication of marketing services by providing leadership to implement and enforce quality standards, to seek and develop new outlets and markets. Those boards advise producers and take care of promotion and publicity so as to increase the sales while guaranteeing to consumers a security of supply at reasonable prices and to producers a fair return for their investment, their work and their production costs. Mr. Speaker, I think that it is most important that I deal briefly with the protection which should be granted to farming, so that the farmer will get a fair return for his product, but there is also the consumer at the other end.

It must not be forgotten that in this vast country where our agricultural industry stands as one of the most prosperous in the western world, a mere 5 per cent of our farmers are living from the farm while the other 95 per cent are just plain consumers. This I have been privileged to see some weeks ago, when we had meetings with the various farm groups from each and every Canadian province. The Canadian Consumers' Association went on record as stating that farm prices were too high, especially with regard to milk, butter and cheese.

I think that what the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) and the Department of Agriculture have been trying to do during this past decade and have very well succeeded in doing has been to make sure that farmers get decent income while providing consumers with a healthy and stable supply of goods at competitive prices. And this is why recently, Canadian and even international statistics have shown that of all industrialized countries Canada still had the cheapest food basket. What that means, Mr. Speaker, is that we have very good farmers, very good producers, but they must keep on being more efficient, and this is important. They must be increasingly efficient. Agriculture Canada, thanks to budget appropriations for research, aims at helping these farmers produce more, in order to lower production costs and, of course, protect consumers across the land.

These national marketing boards, at least the three that come under the National Farm Products Marketing Council and the Canadian Dairy Commission, have the authority to regulate supplies. This means they can monitor production to make sure that production levels meet consumer needs so that the market is never allowed to be glutted, as I will indicate later in the case of pork. It is a matter of more or less matching supply and demand, because these are the two main forces regulating the so-called free market. However, Mr. Speaker, we know about the controversy with respect to supply management. To put it mildly, the marketing boards have been widely discussed and, I feel, will continue to be for quite some time to come.

We live in a free society within the capitalistic system, where success is almost always linked with the concept of free competition. This of course is the law of efficiency, the guarantee of success. In the pork industry, for instance, the hon. member who spoke before me referred to the price of pork in food stores. Of course, consumers enjoy very low prices for pork chops, pork roasts, bacon or any other pork cut. And of course there is still no marketing board. In Quebec, a vote was held only a few months ago on a quota-fixing agency. Assuredly, every province will have to fix quotas within its own boundaries, and later on, hopefully, but this is not for tomorrow, pork producers will ask their provincial organizations to set up a national marketing board, as has been done with other commodities mentioned earlier such as milk, chicken, turkey, etc.

It is a fact that hog overproduction on the North American continent has caused a price slump and the Canadian hog industry must sustain the impact of the Chicago Stock Exchange reaction. Our hog industry produced over 12 million hogs last year. In my own riding of Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot, hog production between 1979 and 1980 increased by as much as 27 per cent; similar increases were recorded in several other Quebec ridings, and elsewhere in Ontario, Alberta and Quebec, which are the main hog producing provinces. That is why the Agricultural Stabilization Board under the direction of the Minister of Agriculture will stabilize hog prices at $8.96 a carcass which should result in expenditures of over $100 million. This will certainly not cover all the losses incurred by the hog industry, but will nevertheless help hog producers plan their production.

I can assure the House that I recently had the opportunity to discuss the situation with Quebec hog producers, and was told that there will not be new producers and that production quotas will possibly be introduced at least in Quebec, and I think that Ontario and Alberta will probably follow suit. We export hogs to foreign markets, especially Japan. We produce excellent hogs. But what I want to say once again to the House is that the Minister of Agriculture and the Department of Agriculture have come to grips with the situation and through stabilization will help this industry which, for the second year in a row, is going through difficult times because of overproduction.

Mr. Speaker, the situation is the same in all other areas of agriculture, and the government cannot intervene vigorously and impose marketing boards on Canadian farmers for every type of production. First of all, it must come from the grassroots and our producers themselves must say: We want to organize, join our forces, control our production. And I suggest that for many years the Minister of Agriculture has never abandoned Quebec farmers and that he supports this idea. On several occasions, he has asked Quebec farmers and especially hog producers to get organized as soon as possible.

An hon. Member: That is consultation!

Mr. Ostiguy: Right. Historically, Mr. Speaker, marketing boards have been set up at the request of producers to solve problems of particular concern to each type of production according to their needs and those of consumers and the possibility of increasing or reducing production depending on demand.

Markets for various commodities must also be taken into consideration. Naturally, a commodity for domestic consumption will not be dealt with in exactly the same way as another whose production exceeds domestic demand. In the latter instance we are at the mercy of export markets for selling our surpluses. Once again, when Canagrex is set up, it will help farmers, Canadian producers, dispose of excess production. We export over $1.5 billion worth of farm products and we need that Crown corporation, to be known as Canagrex, to help our farmers. Its agricultural development strategy will have four main objectives. First to promote the development of domestic and foreign markets for Canadian agri-food products. Second, to maximize the value of our agricultural production by ensuring that our resources are used to produce commodities whose markets are most attractive. Third, increase the productivity and efficiency of Canadian agriculture in order to give producers the best return possible while lowering the cost of food. And four, to stabilize farm income and maintain a steady supply according to market conditions.

That is but an outline of what Canagrex will be in a position to do, if hon. members will just give the Minister of Agriculture the time needed to introduce that very important bill in the House. Of course, we are not necessarily saying that this marketing board should be given supply management authority. The powers of such boards therefore have to be determined according to a lot of factors, and I have just mentioned a few. Very many things should be considered before steps are taken to have all the various types of agricultural production regulated by well-structured marketing systems. Mr. Speaker, we know what the Minister of Agriculture thinks about marketing boards. He had so very often the chance to take up their cause that it would be almost illogical to think that he does not favour marketing boards. I may repeat myself, but every time he meets with producers, he asks them to get organized into marketing boards.

Actually, the Minister of Agriculture not only stands up for the marketing boards which are already in operation but he favours also the setting up of new boards in areas where there are almost insuperable difficulties, and this is the case in the pork industry I have just mentioned. It is also the case in the potato industry in eastern Canada which has been in a difficult situation for many years.

An hon. Member: This is the area of the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Dionne).

Mr. Ostiguy: Yes, this is the area of the hon. member for Chicoutimi.

Two years ago, at the annual Agricultural Outlook Conference, our Minister of Agriculture met with his provincial counterparts and sought their support for the setting up of a potato marketing board in eastern Canada. Since then, a technical committee of federal and provincial officials has met several times. The ministers also had the chance to discuss the subject further, and a task force was established to hold public hearings and report on the subject. The report which was tabled a few months ago recommended the setting up of a board which will emphasize the exploration for new markets and the promotion of the product, but which will not be empowered to manage supply. That is another one of this minister's initiatives which was put forward. The setting up of such an office is a democratic process which should be initiated by the base, namely, the farmers themselves, and all those involved in the industry; provincial authorities should also commit themselves.

Mr. Speaker, this democratic process works quite well in the case of the Potato Marketing Agency for Eastern Canada. And I believe we can expect some action in this area very soon. The early stages of a marketing board are not always easy, as is well known, and I mentioned this a moment ago in the case of milk. A breaking-in period is required before the system works well and the various components are welded into a smooth organization. At the outset, therefore, all parties concerned must agree and recognize the need for the system, otherwise all efforts are doomed to failure. I believe my colleague for Chicoutimi knows something about this for having worked strenuously as regional president of the Quebec Federation of Potato Growers. It is essential to proceed with restraint and without undue haste. I believe that in time, the whole agri-food sector in Canada, from producer to consumer, will benefit from this.

In the area of farm credit, it is true that as a result of the financial hardships experienced by many farmers because of high interest rates, some government action in the area of farm credit is being considered. This matter was raised in this House recently and the government is now considering the possibility of empowering the Farm Credit Corporation to raise part of its funding in the private sector. Total long-term credit extended to farmers—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Mr. Speaker, I must admit that, like others who have spoken before me today, I am not a farmer but many of my constituents are. Indeed, farming is the largest single industry in my constituency. For that reason and for the effects of agriculture on the whole of western Canada, today's debate is of great interest to me.

• (1720)

One of the most significant areas in which westerners feel the federal government is not working in their best interests is that of its present inadequate agricultural policies. At present the minister sports a stetson and western boots and gallops about the country mouthing platitudes about helping farmers and fighting high interest rates charged by the banks, and making hundreds of other promises. For all his promises, he and his colleagues have been unable to do anything in a meaningful way to help the farmers.

Mr. Whelan: That is not true.

Mr. Sargeant: Perhaps the minister does not understand how serious is the situation of our farmers.

Mr. Whelan: We give them more money in Manitoba than the government of Manitoba does.

Mr. Sargeant: I know how he talks about high interest and farm incomes.

Mr. Whelan: You seem to forget about the herd maintenance program.

Mr. Sargeant: Also he talks about other problems, but perhaps it is just an intellectual exercise for him. I find it rather strange that hon. members on this side of the House were asked to extend a little courtesy to the minister when he was speaking, but he does not extend the same courtesy to me.

Mr. Whelan: I will, I will.

An hon. Member: You are getting to him!

Mr. Sargeant: While it might be an intellectual exercise for the minister, in my home province it is not an intellectual exercise. It is hard, cold economic reality, and it hurts.

In Manitoba last year total farm cash receipts were up only 6.9 per cent, while farm operating and depreciation charges were up 8.7 per cent. In other words, in 1980 the realized net income for the average Manitoba farmer increased by only 1.8 per cent. Considering that inflation was running at 11 per cent, Manitoba farmers lost quite a bit. If it was a bad year in general for Manitoba farmers, it was a particularly bad year for cattle and hog producers. Their cash receipts actually decreased by one half to one per cent. A little later I will talk about that.

What does next year hold in store? It will be more of the same. The projections that have been prepared call for a decrease of 8 per cent in the net income of Manitoba farmers in 1981. If the government has some agricultural policies, clearly they are not working. Certainly the government does not have the answers or, if it thinks it does, they must be the wrong ones.

Let me turn for a moment to some of the areas in which we feel the government has failed or taken wrong-headed actions. Perhaps the underpinning of our agricultural policies has to be a sound approach to the transportation of goods. My colleagues and I believe that for the further development of western Canada, the Crowsnest Pass freight rates are vital, must be maintained and extended.

Presently there seems to be a monumental battle taking place within cabinet as to how the Crow rate issue should be resolved. We have the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) staking his position; we have the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board in the other place with another position; we have the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) with a third position.

If that were not enough, we have the hon. minister from western Canada, who knows as much about transportation and freight rates as he knows about humility and women's rights, who also wants to get into the act. Of course, it is little wonder these ministers are confused. After all, Conservative provincial governments in Manitoba and Alberta tell them one thing, farmers' groups tell them another and the CPR, which incidentally contributes $35,000 to the Liberal party coffers, tells them something else.

The Crow rate is more than just a sacred cow. It is a vital component in a transportation policy which allows us to sell our landlocked grain in the competitive international market. If the Crow rate were abolished and farmers were forced to pay the commercial rate for moving grains, prairie farmers would lose $320 million per year. In other words, each and every Wheat Board permit book holder would pay an additional $2,000. When one considers that this extra cost will reduce the farm spending of farmers, it could take almost $1 billion out of the western Canadian economy.

The Crow rate benefit scheme proposed by some would give carte blanche to the railways to charge higher rates on those branch lines they wish to abandon. Farmers will be forced to abandon branch line elevators and, in turn, the communities which sprung up around them to service the elevators will wither to dust. Our rural way of life will be changed, perhaps beyond recognition.

Of course, any Crow rate benefit scheme would also be open to unwarranted government abuse. Crow benefit cheques would be presented as hand-outs to farmers, just as acreage payments were given prior to elections and then later withdrawn. If the benefit is frozen, farmers could be forced to pick up the tab on all inflationary increases.

Justice Emmett Hall said the following:

> There is a school of thought which keeps repeating that, yes we favour the Crow rate, but maybe there is another way of doing it. My frank opinion is that the other way is to load it on the backs of the grain producers.

In 1977 Justice Hall presented the report of his commission to the government. It was well received in the west, but successive governments have ignored this worth-while report. The NDP stands wholeheartedly behind the recommendations of the Hall report.

The CPR simply has not pulled its weight when it comes to hauling grain. Over 14,000 hopper cars have been provided by provincial and federal governments and by farmers' groups. Every year the government pays the railways $85 million in branch line subsidies and another $70 million to fix up the branch lines, because the railways have not reinvested branch line subsidies in branch lines.

The statutory Crow rate should be monitored for western farmers. At the same time the railways should be paid directly for their losses. However, the railways in turn must also pledge to fix up their track, buy more hopper cars and extend Crow related rates to processed goods. Extending the Crow related rates to processed goods would be a positive step in aiding our struggling cattle and hog producers.

Since 1972 the west has lost 40 per cent of its meat packing capacity because of high freight rates for meat. For example, from Saskatoon it costs $33.80 to ship a 1,000 pound slaughter steer to Montreal, but it costs $53.04 to ship the same animal processed as meat, hide, tallow and blood. If Crow related rates were established for meat, livestock and other processed goods, western economic development would be encouraged, but not at the expense of our grain farmers as could be the case under other propositions.

While I am on the subject of the problems livestock producers have with freight rates, let me turn to a fair return for producers. This is another area in which the government has failed miserably. Orderly marketing should be a priority for any minister of agriculture. He should be encouraging the establishment of orderly marketing agencies for all farm commodities.

In my riding of Selkirk-Interlake there are cattle producers and hog producers living alongside fishermen. The fishermen in Manitoba's Interlake have experienced the value of a marketing board for their product for over ten years. Through the work of the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation, fishermen have seen how the unstable, wildly fluctuating price which existed prior to 1969 has been replaced by a stable and fair return that has kept pace with changes in the economic climate. However, livestock producers have not had the same benefits as their neighbours, the fishermen. As many members of the House know, cattle prices are currently about 25 per cent below the cost of production and hog prices are worse.

Earlier in my speech I referred to the bad year experienced by hog and cattle producers in 1980. Their cash receipts were down .8 per cent and .3 per cent respectively. I would like to compare that to the areas where there are marketing boards—dairy and eggs. Manitoba dairy producers increased their cash receipts by 14.8 per cent in 1980 and egg producers increased their cash receipts by 16.8 per cent. While it may not be possible to state categorically that marketing agencies are responsible for all of this difference, there can be no doubt that the boards did provide their members a stable price and stable incomes, not the down-again-up-again incomes of some producers.

Surely the time has come to take effective action permanently to end the boom and bust cycles in our red meat industry. Recently the hon. member for Humboldt-Lake Centre (Mr. Althouse) asked the minister to hold a plebiscite to establish orderly marketing for hogs and cattle. The minister has not responded to that request and we are condemning him today for this lack of action.

However, should the minister have a change of heart, stop talking and start actively promoting the establishment of marketing boards, I suggest on behalf of my party that he consider a marketing board for rapeseed, flax and rye. Without such efforts by the minister, we may never see lasting stability and fair prices for many producers.

When I began to speak, I noted the minister's crusade against high interest rates and their effects on short and long-term financing and operating costs of beginning farmers. Here we believe it is the responsibility of the government to use the vehicles which it has at its disposal, such as the Farm Credit Corporation, actively to intervene on behalf of farmers.

One does not have to look much further than farm bankruptcy statistics to find proof of the crisis in farm financing. In 1980, as we all know, farm bankruptcies were 78 per cent higher than the previous year; and so far, in the first quarter of 1981, farm bankruptcies have risen a further 70 per cent. Record interest rates are squeezing our farmers right out of business and yet our government sits back and does virtually nothing.

There is a line from an old Woody Guthrie song that is rather appropriate today:

> The mortgage worked the steadiest and the hardest of us all;
> It worked all week and Sundays, it worked each holiday;
> It settled down among us and never went away.

Let me show the House how severely interest rates are affecting farmers. Here are two examples. The first case concerns a Saskatchewan farmer who bought one half section of land three years ago for $130,000. His three-year mortgage is renegotiable this year, which will result in an increase in the interest rate of from 10 to 20 per cent. This will mean a further doubling of the interest payments on his land. This farmer also owns a further one and one half sections which are paid for. For every bushel of wheat grown on this farm, including the owned portion, the cost of interest is increasing from $1 to $2. The cost of interest on wheat grown on the recently bought one half section of land is $8 per bushel. The current price of wheat at Thunder Bay for that same bushel of wheat is $6.57. Why should he farm? He can sell out, invest about $400,000, earn $60,000 per year on the interest, and watch some European rent the land to a young Saskatchewan boy who could only dream about buying the farm he now works as a tenant farmer.

The second case is a young Ontario tobacco farmer who has been farming since 1973. In the last couple of years his crop has been hurt by frost and disease. He recently formed a corporation solely to qualify for a small business development bond, but by doing so, he has increased his interest costs. On April 30, 1980 they were $26,934. On April 30, 1981 his interest had risen to $58,163. While extending small business development bonds to unincorporated family farms would help and should be considered, high interest rates simply cannot be sustained by farmers much longer. The Farm Credit Corporation should be used positively by this government, but instead the FCC is chronically underfunded and this year it has less money than in any of the last five years.

Months ago, groups like the Canadian Federation of Agriculture asked the minister to increase FCC funding by $150 million. Instead he raised FCC interest rates to 14 per cent. It is hard to believe that this same minister really wants producers to refinance short-term debts through the FCC.

My colleagues and I believe that the Farm Credit Corporation can be used to challenge the banks by allowing more flexible terms for borrowing and at the same time allowing more flexibility of use for the money borrowed. In the past our recommended changes have fallen on deaf ears, but I will repeat them on the unlikely chance that they may yet provoke some action.

First of all, the minister should agree to the Canadian Federation of Agriculture's suggestion and increase the FCC's available capital by at least $150 million.

Second, the Farm Credit Corporation should be allowed to borrow money on the Canadian market using government guaranteed long-term bonds.

Third, an annuity program for retiring farmers should be established to allow some relief from capital gains in exchange for long-term investment commitments with the Farm Credit Corporation.

Fourth, an income-averaging trust account should be established through the Farm Credit Corporation, as has been requested by the Canadian Cattlemen's Association, to allow farmers to average incomes and to provide the Farm Credit Corporation with more capital funds.

These are just some suggestions we have made regarding the Farm Credit Corporation and, of course, we could go into others, but I do want to mention one other change in particular; that is, removing discrimination on the basis of age as contained in the present Farm Credit Corporation regulations. The Human Rights Commission has found that restricting the Farm Credit Corporation assistance to farmers under 35 is a violation of human rights. I have attempted to have drafted a private member's bill that would right that wrong in the legislation; but House rules prevent me from introducing such a bill, as it has some financial implications. So I ask this government, one that seems fervently to believe in a charter of rights, to take immediate action to end that blatant discrimination.

Before I close, let me offer the government some thoughts on its ill-fated drought relief and herd maintenance programs. In my short tenure as a member of Parliament, I have not seen any other program that has so confused, frustrated, and angered my constituents. The rigid and inflexible criteria that were established in order to qualify for relief have kept deserving farmers from receiving aid, and at the same time have left them questioning the sincerity of the government's motives. Some are still awaiting aid, hoping these appeals will be successful, while others have been told that cheques they have received will have to be returned. What this confusing mess underlines is the urgent need for the federal government to negotiate cost-shared agreements with the provinces in advance, and that these agreements should form the basis of ongoing emergency aid to farmers. Instead of the present ad hockery, farmers would then know what to expect when emergencies arise.

In March, 1981 the government of Saskatchewan requested federal sharing for a long-term drought relief program. Since that time, the federal government has indicated its concern with the drought situation and has agreed with the need for a co-ordinated effort to deal with the problem. However, no cost-sharing agreement has been reached. Let us hope that the government moves quickly to provide our farmers with assured long-term relief.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, what is the situation facing our farmers today? It is bleak. We have a government unprepared to use the tools at its disposal to rescue farmers from the high interest rates. We have a government which is unprepared to assure producers a stable and fair return for their product through the establishment of marketing boards. We have a government which is split every which way on the question of grain transport and the Crow rates, and one which is unprepared to implement the recommendations of Chief Justice Hall for fear of upsetting their friends at CPR. As well, we have a government which is smitten by ad hockery and that refuses to establish a long-term aid program for farmers who must cope with the uncertainties of our environment.

What does that mean for our farmers? It means higher farm bankruptcies, more farmers selling their land to foreign speculators, an increasingly powerful agribusiness conglomerate, and even tougher economic times for the farmer who is just barely managing to get by. Surely we have good reason to condemn the inadequate policies of the present government in agricultural areas and to call on them, and, indeed, plead with them, to consider some of these very useful suggestions that would have nothing but a positive effect for our farmers.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Dionne (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, I have read carefully the proposal made by a member of the New Democratic Party, and I believe that we cannot reject it entirely. Where I disagree with the sponsor of the motion is when it comes to the means which he would use to achieve his objectives. Mr. Speaker, I think that whatever our political differences in the House of Commons, we must pay homage to the Department of Agriculture, and especially to the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), who has shown for several years that he can listen to farm producers from all regions of Canada. Mr. Speaker, obviously, the minister cannot solve by himself all the agricultural problems which face a country as vast as Canada. Of course, I have even more respect for the Minister of Agriculture because of the way he has consulted the producers in one region after another in Canada. It is easy for me to say this, Mr. Speaker, because I knew the Minister of Agriculture long before I entered politics. When I met him, I never thought that I would one day become a politician. I say this without any partisan feeling. What I like about the attitude of the Minister of Agriculture is that, as he so clearly stated in his speech earlier, he believes that the decisions must come from the farmer himself. I support this consultation policy favoured by the minister even though we have financial problems occasionally in several sectors of agriculture in Canada. It is, however, up to the farmers to organize.

Mr. Speaker, I was a farmer for many years and I would never have agreed to—sometimes risk capital of $500,000 is invested on certain farms—any level of government or public servants telling us what should be our role and our vocation.

Mr. Speaker, I think that we have to look at the progress made in Canadian farming. Recently the Department of Agriculture has stabilized and supported the price of certain products. I should mention that we now have marketing boards in Canada. We have the Turkey Marketing Board, the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency and the Chicken Marketing Board. Not so long ago certain opposition members now in the House must have heard, and I am convinced that these are not people who defend Canadian agriculture, blame the Minister of Agriculture for the slaughter of hens to maintain the price of eggs at an acceptable level. One day, they think one thing, and the next, they think another. When we try to stabilize prices to provide a better income for the producers of certain goods in Canada, there are always some people who are shocked to see that for once we want to provide a fair income to producers who have made major investments.

Mr. Speaker, we also have the Canadian Wheat Board, which is now working very effectively in Canada and whose role it is proposed to extend. We also have the Dairy Commission which, as I noted last Monday during another debate on agriculture, nearly provoked a revolution among dairy producers a few years ago when it made certain decisions. Today, like my colleague for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Ostiguy) also noted, the dairy producers would not want to leave the sector of agriculture since it has been stabilized once and for all, and I believe that this production could be a model for several others in Canada on the condition that the farm producers can play their proper role. Whatever the decisions of the Department of Agriculture, whether they come from the other side of the House or from this side, and whether or not they are the best possible decisions, if the farm producers do not want to co-operate with a farming policy, no board and no national plan can function. I could describe something which has just happened in the Quebec pork industry, for instance, where some say the support price of pork has been detrimental to the industry in other provinces. I disagree completely with that statement since the minister had announced a $100 million hog price stabilization program with a subsidy of $8.96 per carcass. Of course if some provinces have implemented different programs of their own, certain amounts may be deducted from the provincial program, but nevertheless the fact is that the provincial and the federal levels provide together a total amount of $8.96. The minister said a moment ago that he wanted to be fair to all Canadian producers wherever they live.

This week we discussed Bill C-46 which is tabled before the House and deals with meat imports. I took part in the discussions in the committee of agriculture. I expressed my views and urged the minister to take into account in his policies the needs of Canadian producers, our structures, our climate, while reviewing to some extent the GATT agreements which might often work to our detriment.

That being said, Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak today of a type of farming in which I was involved for several years, namely potato farming. I would like to try to explain how a marketing agency works, its complexity, how long it can take to establish one and how much time is often required to convince producers of the need for such an agency. Since 1970, I have worked in close co-operation with potato farmers from New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Ontario and Quebec, and we have held many meetings in Quebec City, Fredericton, Ottawa and Montreal and have achieved a fair degree of success.

Mr. Speaker, I recently attended a provincial potato growers convention held in Drummondville, Quebec, where producers agreed to abide by strict regulations, and it will no doubt surprise many to learn that Quebec producers agreed this year to set membership fees into the marketing agency at $35 an acre. Regulations are very strict and the agency will control production, quality, production costs and marketing. I was personally very surprised to see this. Since 1970 producers have been working on the establishment of this marketing agency.

In 1974 I was involved in a study on production costs for seven types of crops. I think any type of farming requires a basic scientific study of its production costs. No farmer in Canada can hope to have an efficient operation if his production costs are not adequate. I was looking at the way these potato growers in Quebec were going about this. Quebec produces only 50 per cent of all potatoes consumed in the province and yet, even though there is no overproduction, growers got together and organized. I was comparing this to New Brunswick and P.E.I. New Brunswick produces 600 per cent of all potatoes consumed in that province and yet to date growers are not organized. The situation is about the same in P.E.I.

Now that growers in Quebec are well organized, Mr. Speaker, I am sure that meetings between the five eastern provinces will continue so that this provincial marketing agency can lead to the establishment of a national agency. Because in my view, Mr. Speaker, we will still have to find a way to market our commodities from one province to another. I also considered how Quebec producers organized themselves to market their products. I looked more fully into the legislation or the services provided by the Department of Agriculture through subsidies which have transformed potato production in the province of Quebec. I say this, Mr. Speaker, because I believe it is possible and even desirable that a similar agency be set up in all other provinces.

I looked up the subsidies granted to producers by the Department of Agriculture for storage purposes. A few years ago, Quebec potato growers marketed their produce in the months of September and October, while the remainder of the year, potatoes had to be imported from other provinces or even from the United States. Thanks to the building of modern refrigerated storage facilities, Quebec growers now can market their produce practically year round, and washing facilities, also subsidized, have helped further improve the quality of the product. I think that we must pay tribute to the Department of Agriculture for these subsidies, given the fact that when the pre-washed potatoes from the U.S were imported into Canada they were in direct competition with the Canadian produce and looked much better. The situation has changed in the past few years and these washing centres have a very high efficiency rating since pursuant to the policy of the Department of Agriculture, many producers are requested to bring in their production to these centres where it is classified, packed and delivered.

We must therefore keep up the good work and once again, Mr. Speaker, what is most important, indulge in consultation. This process must be intensified in order to sell the idea and convince additional producers that no matter in which area they live they must develop these marketing tools. There again I agree in part with the suggestion made by a member from the Opposition but with regard to the manner in which to get it done I disagree with him. It has to originate from the people concerned, Mr. Speaker, and I am convinced that something imposed on them would not be that efficient. That is evidenced within the marketing boards that are at present successfully serving the interests of Canadian producers and they also put to the test the efficiency of these producers since the production costs of these boards are figured out in a very scientific way and are related to very cost-efficient farms.

I do not yet see the Canadian farmer's situation as being disastrous. However, he will soon have to get organized and the government, as advised by the minister and his officials, has never been against any well-structured organization of the Canadian farmers. Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to yield the floor for a period of five minutes to my colleague for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer) who is in a position, I believe, to make interesting suggestions regarding the farmers of Canada.

[English]

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I thank my good friend and colleague on the Standing Committee for Agriculture, the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Dionne), who has given me a few minutes this evening. I spoke to him previously and although I pointed out to him that some of the things I was going to say about the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) would not be very complimentary, he still granted me five minutes. At any rate, I want to point out some of the shortcomings in the minister's speech.

I was appalled that the Minister of Agriculture would talk for 20 minutes, have extra time, yet not mention very much about interest rates, which are a major problem in this country. Nor did he mention anything about energy prices and the problems industry will have as a result of the 9-cent a gallon increase we had yesterday. He did not mention the problems associated with Bill C-57 which will produce increases in natural gas prices, resulting in increased fertilizer prices. The minister did not mention anything about what needs to be done with the western grain stabilization fund. I have written letters to the minister with suggestions to make it more effective. Those are just some of the things the minister could have talked about in terms of implementing programs to benefit agriculture. He did not talk about grain transportation.

We heard that great grain farmer who comes from Winnipeg, the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy), talk about the Russian grain sale involving 25 million tonnes over the next five years. Yet we see no policies coming forth from this government to ensure that we have a transportation system in place to meet our commitments to the Russians. That is a national priority. This sale will benefit the whole country in terms of our balance of payments, our interest rates and the value of our Canadian dollar.

We did not hear the Minister of Agriculture mention those things. Nor did he mention anything about transportation as it relates to livestock. We have major problems with the CNR and the CPR with regard to the moving of livestock in Canada. Representatives of both the CN and the CP have been before the Standing Committee on Transport. There seems to be no leadership nor movement on behalf of the CN or the government to see that we have cars for moving livestock.

I did not hear the minister mention anything about the Grain Transportation Authority in Winnipeg which was set up by the previous minister of transport. A co-ordinator was appointed but it took the previous minister roughly five months to do that. It has been eight months since the director, Dr. Hugh Horner, resigned last October, and this government has not been able to find a replacement in that period of time. I would have liked to see some reference to that as far as agriculture in western Canada is concerned.

The Agricultural Stabilization Act is certainly in need of some amendments and revamping to make it more useful. Many producers would like to see more of a participatory plan where producers and the government could contribute to make it more meaningful when producers encounter problems in marketing.

The sheep industry in this country is in very bad shape. Literally we get clobbered when we get into the ethnic market. There are problems there. It is a small industry but an important one to the people involved. We did not hear the minister say anything about what he has done for the sheep industry. Nor did we hear anything about the Farm Credit Corporation.

There have been some interesting ideas expressed about how we could increase funding for the Farm Credit Corporation. As my colleague from the New Democratic Party, the hon. member for Selkirk-Interlake (Mr. Sargeant), mentioned, we could simply increase capitalization from the government. The head of the Farm Credit Corporation has suggested that it issue bonds to people who sell land. That is a way to increase the funds available to the corporation without its having to go back to the government or into the market itself. That would be a very useful tool to use. I suggest the minister should take that suggestion seriously and pursue it. It would be one way of keeping capital generated in agriculture and working in agriculture after land is sold. Very briefly, those are some of the things which the minister fails to recognize.

In the two minutes remaining to me, I want to castigate the minister as strongly as I can for some of the things he has said on Bill C-46, which is the meat import bill. He mentioned speedy passage. This bill was referred to in the Speech from the Throne which was delivered over a year ago. My colleague from Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave) and myself have both asked the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) to get the meat import bill on the order paper so we can get it through second reading.

The committee on agriculture did not meet for two months at the beginning of this year. We would have been very happy to get that bill through second reading and into committee. The agriculture committee has had one meeting on the meat import bill, and that was yesterday. Yet that bill was promised in the throne speech over a year ago. In my opinion, it is disgraceful that we could not have had that bill through committee, back into the House for third reading and thus have it passed. There was willingness by our party and also, as far as the NDP was concerned, to put it through second reading very quickly. I find it incredible that the minister would come here and say that we should have had speedy passage on Bill C-46. All the minister had to do was talk to his own government House leader to get it on the order paper. The opposition would not have put up any more speakers than needed in order to get it to committee.

LIBERAL PARTY ELECTION ADVERTISEMENTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Madam Speaker, with the latest increase of 9 cents per gallon in petroleum products, gasoline and heating oil prices have increased by as much as 60 cents a gallon in the last year and a half. Yet during the last election campaign the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), in newspaper advertisements, said "Vote Liberal and the price will stay down". Therefore I move the following motion, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, seconded by the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone):

That this House condemn the Liberal government for the deceitful and dastardly way that it has disregarded its campaign promises to keep oil price increases below 18 cents a gallon.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CALL FOR HOLDING OF GENERAL ELECTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the government's absolute deception of Canadians in taxing energy supplies to pay for its own financial incompetence, thereby imposing unnecessary excise taxes, high interest rates, and spiralling inflation upon all Canadians; and given the government's total failure to produce a long-range industrial development plan so that Canada might realize its true potential heritage for generations to come, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Reid):

That the Prime Minister admit to the lying, deceitful practices of his government since its election last February 18, by calling an immediate federal election so that the Canadian people might pass judgment on the dishonest political trickery of the Liberal Party of Canada.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

SALARY NEGOTIATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, in view of the fact that it was the clear understanding of all Royal Canadian Mounted Police men and women that their new salary adjustment would be retroactive to January 1, 1981, and in light of the fact that the government's incredible decision to make this salary award effective as of April 1, 1981, has fuelled anger and frustration within the ranks of the force to a level that is difficult to exaggerate, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I move, seconded by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes):

That the government be condemned for yet another breach of faith, the regrettable consequences of which will be a serious deterioration in the morale of the men and women on the force and a concerted demand for unionization to prevent similar inequities.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CANADIAN GENERAL ELECTRIC PLANT AT DAVENPORT, TORONTO—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I am sure the House will recall that on April 3 I asked the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) to look into and take action to solve a problem created by Canadian General Electric's takeover of Federal Electric in Winnipeg and the loss of jobs in Toronto. Subsequent to that the minister has indicated to the people involved that he is still looking into the matter. Therefore, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, seconded by the hon. member for Beaches (Mr. Young), I move the following motion:

That the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce be required to explain what action he took to safeguard the jobs of the workers at the Davenport CGE plant in Toronto, and further what action is now being contemplated by Canadian General Electric to ensure that these workers and their families will not be required to shoulder the burden of the corporate decision to discontinue building transformers in the city of Toronto.

CALL FOR ENDING OF ALBERTA OIL PRODUCTION CUTBACKS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the response of the federal government to the blackmail of the Alberta government which has seen a 2-cent per litre rise in the cost of gasoline, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Don Valley East (Mr. Smith):

That this House urges the Leader of the Opposition and his colleagues to impress upon their Alberta cousins, in particular Premier Lougheed, to end at once their threats to the integrity of the Canadian nation by restoring the oil flow so that the 2-cent per litre tax can be eliminated.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INCREASE IN PRICES—AID FOR PEOPLE IN REMOTE AREAS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, the motion that I shall move under the provisions of Standing Order 43 is with regard to recent increases in petroleum products. Considering the serious impact such increases in energy costs have as they are passed through to northern residents of our country, to whom energy and transportation costs represent the single most contributing factor in already disproportionately high living costs, I move:

That this House request the government to produce forthwith and lay before the House measures designed to shelter those Canadians who live in isolated, remote and northern regions of our country, from the effects of the latest unjustified increases in energy costs, and to consider the special circumstances of residents in such areas as they relate to the already excessive costs of transportation and being able to maintain an adequate and equitable standard of living.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

RIOT AT MATSQUI INSTITUTION, BRITISH COLUMBIA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Earlier this week a riot broke out in the Matsqui institution at Abbotsford, British Columbia, during which over 50 per cent of the medium security complex was destroyed by fire. Reports indicate that 200 members of the RCMP, 20 Matsqui police officers, and over 150 troops from Canadian Forces Base, Chilliwack, were called into action to restore order.

Because of the challenge to authority and the wanton destruction of facilities built by taxpayers' money, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen), the following motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43:

That the Solicitor General assure the public that those responsible for this act of destruction will be held accountable, and suitable penalties be imposed, including the withholding of pay, the use of the prison population in the rebuilding of the facilities, and any other procedures available to lessen the financial burden on the Canadian taxpayers.

SHIPPING

REPORTED INCREASE IN TOLLS ON ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The Canadian shipping industry was shocked to learn that the government is again considering a further increase in Seaway tolls, tolls that have increased by over 100 per cent since 1978, and on an industry now subject to world prices for bunker fuel oil while other modes of transport engaged in international trade enjoy the benefit of a heavily subsidized domestic oil price. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall):

That this House instruct the Minister of Transport that Canadians want to maintain a viable Canadian shipping industry and that the minister make a clear unequivocal statement that no increase in St. Lawrence Seaway tolls is contemplated in the foreseeable future.

ALBERTA CUTBACKS IN OIL PRODUCTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David Smith (Don Valley East): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under Standing Order 43. In view of the defeat by the Canadian people in the 1980 election campaign of the heartless Crosbie budget which proposed, among other things, a callous 18-cent per gallon tax on the price of gasoline and an acceptance of 85 per cent of world oil prices, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Guelph (Mr. Schroder):

That this House applaud the compassionate and reasonable responses now being made by the government in response to the Conservative plan to divide this country by supporting Premier Lougheed's dictatorial oil cutbacks.

NORTHERN PIPELINES

DANGER OF OIL SHIPMENTS TO WEST COAST—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I too rise on an urgent matter. Whereas on October 16, 1979, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the then leader of the opposition, spoke out against increased tanker traffic on the west coast of Canada, and that on October 17, 1979, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), the then prime minister, also opposed such tanker traffic, and that on October 23, 1979, the present Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) asked, this as reported at page 494 of Hansard:

Is the Prime Minister or the Secretary of State for External Affairs now prepared to tell us that under no circumstances will the government consider, support or recommend a proposal that involves tanker traffic on the west coast of Canada?

—and whereas the government and opposition in British Columbia are also opposed to such a plan, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell):

That this House of Commons recommend that the government reject the decision by the National Energy Board favouring a TransMountain pipeline from a west coast oil port delivering American oil to Americans at the risk of the beautiful and environmentally sensitive British Columbia coast.

ALICE ARM, B.C.—DUMPING OF TAILINGS BY AMAX MINE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Amax Canada Ltd. has decided to reopen its mine on the north coast of British Columbia despite the fact the company was alleged by Canadian environmental officers to be exceeding allowable limits on the dumping of tailings into the Alice Arm inlet in that province. Since the controversy continues as to whether Amax is actually harming the delicate ecology at Alice Arm, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro):

That this House urges the Minister of the Environment—not the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans but, rather, the Minister of the Environment—to launch immediately a full scale independent public inquiry into all facets of the issue.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

REQUEST FOR REDUCTION IN PETROLEUM COMPENSATION CHARGE

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the heartless Minister of Finance. The Bank of Canada bank rate has gone to 19.10 per cent, the highest in our history, a heartless rate. Gasoline prices in St. John's Newfoundland are up 64 cents a gallon since the minister took over this office. Heating fuel prices are up 43 cents a gallon, over a 50 per cent increase since the heartless minister took office. Yesterday in the supplementary estimates the petroleum compensation tax went up $2,143 million. The minister is going to take $4.8 billion from the consumers of Canada this year through the petroleum compensation charge.

● (1415)

Are not your interest rates and the gasoline and heating oil increases enough? Is it not time to give lower income Canadians a break? Will the government now consider reducing the petroleum compensation charge and the other new tax that has just increased gasoline nine cents a gallon this week?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has brought into his question a large number of comments and allegations which, if dealt with, would take most of the question period. I would tell the hon. member that even though there have been increases in the price of gasoline, Canadians, because of policies followed by this government, are paying the lowest price for gasoline of any industrialized country in the world.

FEDERAL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BANK

LEVEL OF INTEREST RATE CHARGES

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, for my supplementary I would like to pass on to something simpler for the minister to grasp. The minister's colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, said on May 15 that he would introduce legislation to tax away the excess profits of the Canadian banks and that young farmers should not be forced to pay 22 per cent interest rates.

The government has its own bank, the Federal Business Development Bank, wholly owned by the government. It exists to promote the establishment and development of business in Canada, particularly small business. That bank is today charging from 20 per cent to 23 per cent interest rates on its loans. This is the government's own bank, not some bank that is a figment of the minister's imagination. Will the government instruct its own bank to carry out the Minister of Agriculture's policy, or does the Minister of Finance admit that his colleague is talking completely through his little green hat and trying to fool the farmers of Canada in what he says?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I do not know what the hon. member is asking. He said he would ask something that would be simple. If he is asking me to subsidize interest rates charged by the well functioning Federal Business Development Bank, then that is a proposal that runs totally counter to the prescriptions which he offers in every speech, that I should restrain government expenditures and reduce the deficit. I knew there was a conflict between the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for St. John's West on their financial policy, but now there is a conflict within the breast and the full heart of the hon. member for St. John's West—the bleeding heart.

USE OF BANK'S PROFITS

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, I am not asking the minister a question about my views, nor about my prescriptions, but about the policy of his colleague, that heartless hippo who sits farther down from him who appears to have the heaves about interest rates. I have a letter from a small businessman in British Columbia who had a loan from the minister's bank at 14.5 per cent interest on December 2. It is now at 22.25 per cent. He is a small businessman.

The government owns its own bank. Will the government order its own bank to pass over any profits it has to its consumers in the small business and farming communities, so as not to have excess profits and to reduce its rates, giving a good example to the commercial banks of Canada about which his colleague is complaining, and bad mouthing, while the government goes on exhibiting the same practices as those very same commercial banks? That is what I am asking this minister.

[Translation]

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, I am surprised that the hon. member failed to do his homework before asking such a question. He should know that not only has the Federal Business Development Bank not earned any profits in 1979-80, but that it actually lost around $38 million. So the bank's losses could be passed on to small businesses, as the hon. member suggests, but that is not what we saw fit to do. During the 1980-81 fiscal year, the bank granted over $500 million in loans to more than 48,000 Canadian businessmen, and furthermore the bank experienced some losses because it got more involved in the financing of venture and working capital.

So I think the bank fulfilled its mandate rather than implement the hon. member's wild imaginings.

INTEREST RATE FORECASTS

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Finance. The bank rate today is 19.1 per cent, which is outrageous. Is the Minister of Finance aware that his colleague, that other minister of finance, the Minister of Agriculture, is forecasting an interest rate of some 30 per cent? The Minister of Agriculture forecast a 30 per cent interest rate in terms of the government's forecasting, as reported at page 10129 of Hansard for June 1. He said in part: "even though interest charges are forecast to go up to 30 per cent".

Is this the latest government forecast? Is this what the government is looking at in terms of the peaking of interest rates at the present time—a 30 per cent Canadian interest rate?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, since the Minister of Agriculture actually gave his speech I have not read it to refresh my memory, but quite apart from the interpretation the hon. member may put upon the speech, there is no forecast by the government that interest rates will rise to any particular level. As the hon. member knows, forecasting is one of the most popular businesses in the country. It is engaged in by hon. members of all parties. I have no objection if any individual wishes to make forecasts, but that does not constitute a forecast from the government.

Mr. Murta: Madam Speaker, it appears that what the Minister of Agriculture needs is not a big green cowboy hat but a big green muzzle to keep him quiet.

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION LOANS

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Madam Speaker, on Monday, June 1, in a letter to the editor of the Ottawa Citizen once again that other economic minister, the Minister of Agriculture, stated, and I quote:

I am also considering changing the lending policy of the Farm Credit Corporation by instituting a moratorium for three years on payments of interest and principal on corporation loans.

Can the Minister of Finance confirm whether this is government policy? It was in the newspaper under the name of the Minister of Agriculture in a letter to the editor. If this is government policy—and obviously it would be welcomed by the agricultural community—could the Minister of Finance indicate when this change may take place?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, if I understand the quotation read by the hon. member correctly, it said that the Minister of Agriculture was considering such proposals. That is fine. When they become government policy, they will be announced in the House.

Mr. Clark: By Marc Lalonde.

Mr. MacEachen: I am delighted that the Minister of Agriculture is discharging his responsibilities and taking, as he always does, a sensitive attitude toward the problems of farmers. I doubt if there is any farmer in the country who would share the rather insulting description given of the Minister of Agriculture by the hon. member for St. John's West earlier in the Question Period.

HOUSING

MEETING OF FEDERAL AND PROVINCIAL MINISTERS—GOVERNMENT'S PROPOSALS

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible for the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. Provincial housing ministers stated the following this week after a two-day meeting with the minister:

Mr. Cosgrove failed to make any commitment with regard to the future role that the federal government would play in resolving the serious housing problems facing Canadians today.

Since the minister has stated for many months that this was to be a major decision-making meeting to do something about affordability and about housing problems in Canada, will the minister report to the House today on what proposals he took to that meeting as the senior minister who is responsible for housing solutions in Canada?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, unfortunately the release which the hon. member has referred to was issued by the ministers prior to the completion of the conference, and I think that, for example, they had not had time to consider, in concert with CMHC officials and myself, such issues as the year for the handicapped when, with a number of housing officials, we agreed upon a number of specific steps that the federal government, together with the provincial governments, municipalities and some private agencies in this country, will be taking toward addressing such problems as those of the handicapped. I use that as one example, but there are many others. I suspect that is why we saw five of the ministers join together and observe Question Period when the conference ended.

ACTION TO CONTROL MORTGAGE INTEREST RATES

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, I asked the minister what proposals he took to these meetings to solve Canada's housing problems, and I assume his answer means he took none. The provincial housing ministers condemned the federal government because it is not taking any action against the amoral interest rates, particularly mortgage interest rates, which are up again today, and they also indicated they would welcome the creation of a fund through Canadian banks that would reduce the cost of mortgages and hold mortgage rates at a set amount. I therefore ask the minister will he take this matter to the cabinet and aggressively push for controlled mortgage interest rates?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, the hon. member does not give the source for the assumptions in her last question. I think I should take the opportunity of advising her and other members of the House that, on the contrary, the provincial ministers did express an appreciation for the initiatives of the federal government. For example, introducing the MURB provisions—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cosgrove: —for example, in introducing 5,000 social housing starts last year, and in supporting increases through the rehabilitation program. Unfortunately, Madam Speaker, these programs they felt perhaps were not adequate, notwithstanding the increase in housing starts last month at an annual rate of more than 200,000. However, I asked them, what programs, what initiatives, what things are you as provinces going to do in response to the initiatives of the federal government?

An hon. Member: And there were none.

REQUEST THAT MORTGAGE RATES BE PEGGED

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Minister of Finance. Contrary to what the Minister of Public Works has just told the House, housing starts in May are down dramatically and show signs of continuing deterioration. In light of that fact and that 1980 was a disastrous year for the housing industry, and in light of the fact that capacity in the housing industry has been hovering at 70 per cent for well over a year and a half, I ask the minister does he not think it is now time to peg mortgage rates and provide affordable housing for Canadians, and to separate mortgage rates from other interest rates to make sure that the Canadian people can have housing at an affordable rate, and that construction workers will have work in this industry which is so vital to Canadians?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member talks about the housing industry being a disaster. That, of course, is quite untrue. Housing starts in Canada during the month of May totalled 208,000 at a seasonally adjusted annual rate. This does represent a decline from a record high level in April and is more a reaction from that April increase than it is to any weakness in the housing sector itself, because the performance is considerably better and has improved very substantially over the first five months of this year. I do not think the hon. member is entitled to describe the situation as a disaster.

SMALL BUSINESS

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF DEVELOPMENT BOND PROGRAM

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Finance who continues to demonstrate his insensitive attitude toward all Canadians suffering from record high interest and mortgage rates. In view of the fact that the government watered down and limited the Small Business Development Bond program from the original proposal in the Crosbie budget, by not including unincorporated small businesses or the majority of farmers and fishermen, and by not including venture and working capital, and in view of the continuing increases in interest rates which are crippling this small business community, will the minister assure this House and the small business community at large that he will expand and extend and, indeed, improve the SBDB program as originally planned, in order to include all these sectors which suffer most from the government's lax and insensitive attitude toward interest rates?

• (1430)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, it is rather easy for hon. members opposite to specialize, in a sense, among themselves in their questions. One group of members which the hon. member has joined is asking us every day to launch further expenditure programs. Another group of members, led by the hon. member for York-Peel, is asking us every day and in every speech to restrain expenditures and to reduce the deficit. That obvious conflict is why the Conservative party has absolutely no credibility in the field of economic policy or financial management in the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member talks rather glibly about sensitivity. In my opinion the truly sensitive person is the one who is thinking of the long-term interests of the Canadian people, not short-term palliatives which are bound to worsen conditions in the long term.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

UNINCORPORATED BUSINESSES AND FARMERS

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, it is curious that the minister is not aware of the study which I have before me on the economic impact of the Small Business Development Bond program, commissioned by the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, by Infometrica, a computer system. His department is the other department in the country which has it. I am sure if he took the care, he would find out that the study concludes:

—that the SBDB will produce a net revenue increase to the federal treasury of $77 million in the first year of full operation.

Therefore his last answer is just hogwash. There is no sensitivity on the part of the government at all.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Does the hon. member have a question?

Mr. Jelinek: Madam Speaker, now that I have given the minister the facts of that program, I should like to ask him whether he thinks that the very survival of the small business community is more important than perhaps the purchase of Petrofina for $1.5 billion, which is really where government spending is taking place.

Mr. Paproski: Answer it, Allan.

Mr. Jelinek: I am asking the minister now—and not the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism—whether, in view of this conclusion on the program, he will take immediate steps to include sectors of the small business economy such as farmers, fishermen and unincorporated businesses, in the Small Business Development Bond program?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, I cannot believe what I am hearing from the opposition. Last week, as was reported in all Canadian newspapers, the Royal Bank announced that it was earmarking $500 million for the Small Business Development Bond program. RoyNat announced that it was setting aside $180 million for the bond. Now, Madam Speaker, if all chartered banks and financial institutions in the country are included, over $2 billion will be lent in the next 18 months during which the program will be in effect, at approximately half the going interest rate, in order to help small businesses wishing to expand their operations.

CORPORATE AFFAIRS

PUBLICATION OF REPORT ON MARKETING OF URANIUM

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. On March 4, in reply to a question put by myself, the minister stated:

—regarding the uranium inquiry, this inquiry by the director is not completed. Obviously, when it has been completed, his findings will be made public.

When does the minister intend to make the inquiry public, as we have now learned, both from the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice, that the report is completed? We have had representations all the way from 1977 that this report would be made public. If the minister declines to make it public, how can we believe his statement of June 2 when, dealing with the Petrofina study, he stated:

It was alleged that the study made by my department will not be made public, but I can confirm to House that it will be.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I would not want the hon. member to misinterpret what I said in this House last March. What I said in reply to a question was that the findings of the director of investigation would certainly be known and made public. This has been done since the document has been referred to the Department of Justice for review. I can therefore say that the findings of the director have certainly been made public. This is a known fact, as the hon. member is aware. The whole matter is now in the hands of the Department of Justice.

[English]

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, that is absolutely fantastic.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: On March 4, the minister told us that the findings of the director would be made public. Now we are told that the conclusions have been made public in the sense that there has been a reference to the Minister of Justice.

Miss MacDonald: Shame!

CABINET DOCUMENTS

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my follow-up question is directed to the Prime Minister. It touches on certain representations which he has made concerning the inquiry, including the representation in 1977 that it would look into everything, including possible government illegalities. Also it is in reference to the statement made by the then minister of consumer and corporate affairs that all documents would be shown to the director, including cabinet documents.

Would the Prime Minister indicate whether all cabinet documents, including minutes and memoranda of cabinet, were shown to the director, or is what is now being represented true, that the Prime Minister secreted these documents and said that the director could not pursue them?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I will have to take that question as notice.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I have no recollection of any documents having been refused to the director of combines investigation. But I am very happy to take notice of the question. Perhaps the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has the answer; I do not.

Mr. Crosbie: You are the hon. secreter.

PUBLICATION OF REPORT ON PURCHASE OF PETROFINA BY PETRO-CANADA

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. He has just said that his interpretation of publication of the findings of a report are that those findings will be passed to the Minister of Justice who can then keep them secret. That is his definition of publication in so far as the cartel inquiry is concerned.

Will the minister tell us whether that same definition of being published applies, in his judgment, to his commitment in the House to publish the report and the inquiry into the Petrofina matter? Will that also be published by passing it in secret to another minister who can keep it secret? Is that the extent of his engagement to the House?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, if the Leader of the Opposition were a bit more versed in law, he would know that two investigations were carried out by two different services in my department. The investigation concerning Petrofina was carried out by the Bureau of Corporate Affairs, and the procedure used is quite different from that available to the director of combines investigation. In the latter case, the director has the legal obligation—and if the Leader of the Opposition is not aware of this, I shall tell him—to do only one of three things. First, he can refer his investigation to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission, which was done in the case of the oil companies. Of course, the evidence that he collected was made public at the discretion of the president of the Commission.

The second option of the director of investigation is to refer his file to the Department of Justice, which must review it and determine whether or not to press charges. If the department decides to take action, the file is, of course, made public. Otherwise, and this is the third option, the director must comment on the findings of the investigation in his annual report. Obviously, these findings are made public since the report of the director of combines investigation is tabled in the House.

Madam Speaker, I deeply regret that some members are trying to misrepresent my comments of March 4 last. If I may, I would like to quote from Hansard, on page 7878, when I replied to a question asked by the hon. member for York-Peel in these terms:

In relation to the second question of the hon. member regarding the uranium inquiry, this inquiry by the director is not completed. Obviously, when it has been completed, his findings will be made public.

And this is what has been done.

● (1440)

[English]

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I, of course, would be the first to admit that I do not have the same experience with judges as the minister has had.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

UNDERTAKING TO PUBLISH REPORTS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, the minister has given two clear commitments to this House of Commons and I quote, as he did, that "the findings will be made public." These were two clear commitments given to this House with regard to two investigations of great interest to Parliament and to Canadians, one having to do with the uranium cartel and the other having to do with the Petrofina matter. My question to the minister is simple. Will he give this House an undertaking now that those reports will ultimately, and soon, be made public to this Parliament, and be published in their totality so that the whole House of Commons and the entire Canadian public will be able to see the contents of those reports, will be able to know that elements of those reports have not been hidden by the Minister of Justice, or by anyone else, from public view?

The question is simple. We have had a commitment from the minister that he would publish those reports. Will the minister keep his word, or is he trying to find some way to hide from Parliament and the people of Canada the reports on the uranium cartel and the Petrofina purchase?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, it is obvious that the Leader of the Opposition does not have as much experience as I have with judges because he was not able to complete his law studies. Of course, he will never have my experience in these matters. However, as concerns the two commitments I have made—

[English]

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order. I think we need some order.

Mr. Ouellet: Madam Speaker, it seems that members of the opposition do not know that their leader was no more successful in law than he was as prime minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: I made the commitment in the House that the report on the Petrofina case prepared by my officials would be made public, and I can assure once again the Leader of the Opposition that this will be done. As for the commitment concerning the uranium inquiry, I must remind the House of the comments that the hon. member for Yukon attempted to ascribe to me when he said, as reported on page 10009:

That is not what Ouellet said. Ouellet said it would be tabled.

I must point out that what was referred to the Department of Justice is a summary of evidence, and this was done under section 15 of the Combines Investigation Act. As I said, the Leader of the Opposition knows nothing about the law. I cannot blame him since he never managed to become a lawyer—

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

NEEDS OF CHILDREN IN MANITOBA

Mr. Laverne Lewycky (Dauphin): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. A recent report prepared by the federal government states that the Department of Indian Affairs is neglecting the needs of 14,000 Indian children in Manitoba. Considering that this is the second such report within a year—the other revealed the same results in Saskatchewan—will the minister inform the House what remedial action he plans to take at this time?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member may know, I am going to Manitoba tomorrow.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): I can only indicate that Manitoba receives a fair share of the total allocations in our budget relative to the number of Indians elsewhere in the country. I do not know of a more fair way to deal with this situation than to make the money available to all Indians in Canada on an equal basis, which is precisely what we are doing.

FUNDS FOR EDUCATION

Mr. Laverne Lewycky (Dauphin): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. In light of statements made by leaders of the Indian community and officials in the minister's department that the Indian education problem stems primarily from the lack of government funding, is the minister prepared to seek additional funds, instead of merely washing his hands of the matter, by transferring jurisdiction, along with the existing problem, to the Indian bands?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is referring to a report which has just come out. All directors of education in the department are meeting to consider the recommendations in that report. As soon as a study of the report has taken place, I will be pleased to indicate to the hon. member what action we will take.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

DELAY IN PROCESSING PENSION APPLICATIONS

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs. Veterans pension applications, new and appealed, are still not processed and finalized for as long as 62 months, as verified by the Legion. The United States department of veterans affairs takes from 60 to 90 days to finalize an application. What measures is the minister taking to correct this disgraceful situation in his department?

Hon J. Gilles Lamontagne (Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs): Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member was present at meetings of the House committee on veterans affairs and I think the presidents and responsible officers of most of the agencies for our veterans and of the pension commission and all the others were present. The hon. member had an opportunity to ask these questions, and he had some answers, which were very good by the way, that most agencies were progressing and the cases to be heard were less and less as time goes by. I think he had all the answers as far as the agencies are concerned, that progress is being made and will be made in the future.

REQUEST FOR CHANGE IN LEGISLATION

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Yes, Madam Speaker, we received answers all right. The chairman of the pension commission told us that he is hamstrung. He cannot correct a situation that is going from bad to worse because of the legislation with which he has to work. I should like to ask the minister if he will give a firm commitment to the House that he will bring in corrective legislation so that these applications can be processed within 90 days, instead of from one to five years. I want to point out that the mortality rate among veterans waiting for applications to be processed is exceedingly high and is a national disgrace.

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs): Madam Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that the question that he has submitted in this House will be discussed with the president of the pension commission, and if any correction can be made in order to improve the disposal of these claims, it will be made. We will do our utmost to improve the system, if it is possible at all, according to the law.

FINANCE

EXTENSION OF SMALL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BOND PROGRAM TO UNINCORPORATED FARMERS

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. The minister's colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, has been making a number of speeches across the country in which he has quite rightly said that if the farmers are to be able to continue to do the excellent job they do for this country, they must have far lower interest rates available to them. In order to accomplish that, he has urged very strongly that his colleague, the Minister of Finance, make the Small Business Development Bond available to unincorporated farmers—that is the vast majority of all Canadian farmers—to enable them to do their job at a cost they can bear. As a result of those recommendations from his colleague, does the Minister of Finance intend to act on that suggestion and, if so, when?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I answered a similar question just recently to the effect that when the decision is made about either the extension or widening of the application of the Small Business Development Bond, I would obviously be making it known in the House. No such decision has been made. I want to assure the hon. member that I had discussions yesterday and will continue to have discussions with the Minister of Agriculture with respect to what possible way we can move to assist the farmers of Canada meet the current situation.

Mr. Crosbie: Resign. That is the best way.

Mr. Trudeau: You did that.

Mr. Crosbie: That is what you should do. If you care about the country, get out and give it a chance.

Mr. Trudeau: Go to South Africa.

Mr. Crosbie: Why don't you go skiing again?

Oral Questions

REQUEST FOR EARLY DECISION

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, I know that the minister has been saying for quite some time that he is considering the matter and will make a statement soon. This has been going on and on. We wonder if he is trying to write a new meaning into the word eternity. I tell him that farmers all over the country are going out of business day by day. They cannot stand operating with all these very high interest rates. Would he give an answer on this most important matter no later than next week? Would he please assure the House that he will do that?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has talked about eternity. He seems to have enjoyed a good deal of electoral eternity in the House of Commons.

There are real problems in extending the Small Business Development Bond to unincorporated businesses and farmers. It is not just through ill will or a refusal to consider the problem. It would include a large number of farmers. I am sure that if these proposals were sound on their face, they would have been adopted by the former minister of finance when he constructed the Small Business Development Bond and excluded the groups which the hon. member now recommends to me. Obviously there are good reasons for the decision taken then, which still prevail.

FISHERIES

IMPACT OF INCREASE IN PRICE OF GASOLINE ON FISHERMEN

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, I also wish to address a question to the Minister of Finance. One year ago Canadian inshore fishermen in Atlantic Canada received 25 cents per pound for haddock and 22 cents per pound for codfish. Today they are offered 17 cents per pound for haddock and 16 cents per pound for cod. In view of the fact that the federal government, through taxes, has raised the price of gasoline by 60 cents per gallon within the past year, including the 9 cents yesterday, which is the highest single increase in any one day in the history of Canada, at a time when the price received by our primary producers has dropped by 33 per cent, what action is the minister planning to take, if any, to help the fishermen survive?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I must say that I find it interesting, if not curious, that hon. members from the opposition should get up and draw to our attention the increases in energy prices that have taken place. They have taken place, but what we have been telling the country, and what I repeat today, is that the energy price increases which have taken place under this government are considerably less than those—

Mr. Paproski: The fishermen would have been exempt.

Mr. MacEachen: —than those that have taken place under the present government. I refer to the recent meeting of the Conservative party in February, and to their official resolution in which they said that the PC party believes that Canada should move quickly toward 75 per cent of the world price for oil and gas.

Mr. Crosbie: You are there now.

Mr. MacEachen: The world price for oil and gas now is $43. Can you tell the fishermen how you would apply that, and meet the lesser prices which were announced and are in vogue at the present time? I categorize the opposition position as rather hypocritical. It will not fool the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: Two decades of the rosary for that, Allan!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister. The inshore fishermen in some parts of Nova Scotia, for the information of the minister, have been tied up for the past two weeks simply because it is uneconomical for them to continue fishing, and now this government has rammed its knee in their necks with the twelfth consecutive raise in the price of gasoline since 1980.

Let me ask the minister if he would stop being righteously indignant. Instead I should like to know what action he is planning to take—

Mr. Clark: None.

Mr. Crouse: —to help fishermen lower fuel and operating costs at least to the level of his promises during the last campaign—

Mr. Clark: That is pretty low.

Mr. Crouse: —so that the fleets will no longer be tied up beyond the fortnight they have been at the docks already and can contemplate returning to sea, and so that the unemployed shore workers can contemplate returning to their employment?

Mr. Paproski: Exempt them, as we would.

Mr. Crosbie: That is what we did.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member asks what we intend to do to help the inshore fishermen and all the consumers of energy in the country. My answer is the answer that was given yesterday—that we intend to pursue a policy that will be less burdensome, that will impose lesser price increases on the consumers of Canada than the budget which the hon. member supported unsuccessfully in December, 1979.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

GRANTING OF SUBSIDIES—INQUIRY WHETHER COMPENSATION PROGRAM IS CONTEMPLATED FOR QUEBEC

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment. Recently his department published a report indicating the regional distribution of federal subsidies for research and development. The published statistics clearly show that Quebec comes last on a per capita basis in the granting of those subsidies. Thus Ontario receives a yearly amount per capita of $86 while Quebec receives a measly $36. This is my question: is the government contemplating a catch-up plan in order to remedy this unfair situation not only for Quebec but also for some other areas of Canada?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, it is true that there are several factors governing the payment of subsidies made under the authority of the National Science Engineering Research Council or under the National Research Council. It is not merely a question of population, but the number of researchers and universities carrying out graduate studies, and several other factors are also taken into account. However, we are considering the problems raised by the hon. member and we are devising plans with a view to extending and correcting the few disparities which he pointed out in his question.

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT INTENDS TO DECENTRALIZE CERTAIN RESEARCH ORGANIZATIONS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question. In view of Quebec's special cultural make-up, will the federal government further decentralize some of its research bodies, such as the National Research Council of Canada, to make it possible for Quebec's scientists to work in an environment which is more congenial to them and more attuned to the priorities of that province in the areas of small business and its traditional industries such as the textile industry?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): If I understand the question correctly, Madam Speaker, I have already mentioned the case of the National Research Council. There are several statistical data related to various criteria. As I said, we are currently rethinking our policy to ascertain whether there are ways to correct the imbalance which some of the figures we have been quoted seem to indicate.

SALARY NEGOTIATIONS—QUESTION OF RETROACTIVITY

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, could you do me the favour of directing a question to the Solicitor General? Members, other than when they ask for you seem to get very little response today.

Using terms such double-cross, shafting, bad faith, breach of trust, and God knows—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member might help the whole process if he proceeded with his question.

Mr. Forrestall: I am, Madam Speaker. I have asked you to intercede for me. I undertand that is your role.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Forrestall: The RCMP officers across this nation are desperately upset over what they consider to be reneging on a clear undertaking by the Treasury Board last fall to make pay increases this year retroactive to January 1, 1981. Might I ask the Solicitor General, or ask you to ask him, why it is that he allowed Treasury Board and his colleagues to put himself in a position where the RCMP must talk tough and talk unionization in order to get from government fair and just treatment?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, since the pay raise was announced I have been in four provinces speaking to members of the RCMP about the matter. I know there is some dissatisfaction. I appeared before the Treasury Board on the matter but we did not get everything we wanted. Frankly, nobody gets everything they want. I can report, however, that the increase we are to pay is a good one in the sense that it is in line with other pays now being set by the Treasury Board.

I also remind hon. members of the House, that, in general, police pay has increased more quickly than the national average across Canada. That is not only true for the present but going back at least 15 years. Members of police forces are doing better and the RCMP is doing better than at any time in the past in relation to what other Canadians are making.

I have also heard rumours about the possibility of withholding services and so on—

Mr. Crosbie: God help the Prime Minister if that happens.

Mr. Kaplan: —but I put very little stock in them. The RCMP has never failed to serve the Canadian people. It has never held back its services from the Canadian people, even at a time when its salary level was far lower than it is today in relation to the salaries of other Canadians. Therefore, I do not think that members of the House or the Canadian population ought to be alarmed about reaction from some members of the force, or from some journalists or members of Parliament.

CONTINGENCY PLANS

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is also for the Solicitor General. I just remind him that there was a one-hour walkout in Montreal yesterday, that there are widespread reports of so-called "blue flu", and that RCMP officers from one end of the country to another are shutting off their radios. What steps and contingency plans does the minister have in place to guarantee and assure Canadians, such as those living in Halifax, which have been ravaged and rampaged by idiots over the last three or four days because of a police strike, that in fact emergency police services will be available?

Can the minister categorically assure the Prime Minister that when representatives of the summit nations will be here in July, the level of police and security required for such a visit will be in place?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, the pay package which the RCMP received includes a 12.2 per cent increase, and other benefits which amount to an additional few percentage points on top of the 12.2 per cent. Therefore I think it was a good pay increase in that sense, although it was not everything the RCMP wanted. However, I do not think consideration of withholding services is justified. The RCMP have always been counted on by the Canadian people and, in my opinion, they still can be.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CHRÉTIEN—URANIUM CARTEL INQUIRY REPORT—REMARKS BY MR. CLARK

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Earlier in the question period the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) said that the report on the uranium cartel had been referred to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) in order to hide it. I think my privileges have been affected very seriously. When the director of the combines investigation branch concludes that there might be a prosecution involved, under Section 15 of the Combines Investigation Act he must refer the file to the Attorney General of Canada whose decision it is whether or not a prosecution should ensue.

I would like to say to the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) that I intend to carry out my responsibility. This file was not referred to me by the minister but by the director. In addition, in every case it is important that the law of the land is respected and not played with by the opposition—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: I intend to look into the file to decide whether or not prosecution should ensue.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: It is very important for the public to understand that it is the duty of the Attorney General of Canada to decide those things.

Mr. Kilgour: Why do you not make it public?

Mr. Chrétien: A few months ago there was an investigation, a report—

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I think it is obvious to members that the hon. minister is continuing a debate which began in Question Period.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: The minister does not have a question of privilege. There is a divergence of opinion about how these matters ought to have been concluded. If the hon. member wants to make further points, he could do so at times when that is allowed in the House.

Mr. Crosbie: Outside. Go out in the hall.

Madam Speaker: Certainly the minister does not have a question of privilege.

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker—

Madam Speaker: Presenting Reports.

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I would ask the hon. minister to co-operate with the Chair. I have ruled that he does not have a question of privilege. He has made a point but it does not constitute a question of privilege, and I am afraid I cannot hear him any longer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Big Daddy is coming. What is your question of privilege?

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The Right Hon. Prime Minister.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The minister was at the point where I believe he was going to ask the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) to withdraw the accusation.

An hon. Member: So what?

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker has ruled. The Speaker is just a nobody, right, Pierre?

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I am afraid we will not be able to get through this particular part of the deliberations if hon. members do not co-operate and stop heckling. Otherwise we will not be able to determine who has a point of order and who has not.

• (1510)

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition clearly in this House imputed to the Minister of Justice the motive that he was going to hide information communicated to him in a way which was contrary to his duties as a Minister of Justice. I believe the Minister of Justice had a right to make this point to you, Madam Speaker. I submit that the Minister of Justice may have been a bit roundabout in making that point, but surely he has a right in this House to ask the Leader of the Opposition to withdraw that allegation, as I think he should.

Madam Speaker: I would like everyone to know what is going on. The Minister of Justice did not have a question of privilege. The Prime Minister rose on a point of order. I listened to that point of order. There was no question of privilege. He obviously—

Mr. Chrétien: I did not finish, Madam Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: He obviously gave an explanation for some of his actions. That is usually accepted by the House. It seems that point has been made.

Mr. Chrétien: On a point of order—

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Chrétien: I am not abusing the rules of this House.

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr. Chrétien: I won't give up.

Madam Speaker: Order. The minister did not have the floor, but I distinctly heard what he said. I have interrupted other members in this chamber—

Mr. Crosbie: You sure have.

Madam Speaker: —even though they said they still needed time to make their question of privilege. As soon as the Chair finds there is no question of privilege, that it is a continuation of a debate or expressing a grievance of some kind, the Chair sometimes interrupts. That is what I have done in the case of the minister.

Mr. Crosbie: Apologize.

Mr. Stevens: Apologize.

Madam Speaker: The treatment is no different, I hope. I like to be fair. I hope I have not treated the minister differently from other members.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Madam Speaker: I have to tell the minister that he does not have a question of privilege. I listened to the Prime Minister's point of order. The point was made, the explanation was given, and the House usually accepts explanations given by members.

Mr. Crosbie: Now you know how we feel.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): A perfectly supportable decision, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members are not supposed to comment on decisions by the Chair.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I will comment no further, Madam Speaker.

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the government House leader the business he intends to call today and tomorrow. I understand it is his intention to designate two allotted days next week. If he could do that, I would be grateful. Also, could he indicate the government's intention with respect to the business for next week.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, tomorrow we will be resuming debate on the second reading stage of three bills, hopefully. The first is Bill C-58, the Canada Elections Act, then Bill C-12, the Bankruptcy Act, followed by S-6, the Two-Price Wheat Act.

[Translation]

Monday and Thursday of next week will be two opposition days. On Tuesday and Wednesday we will continue the debate on Bill C-57 to amend the Excise Tax Act.

[English]

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, may I ask the government House leader whether the promised legislation in the name of the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs has yet had cabinet approval and whether it will soon be on the order paper. I refer to legislation to correct certain omissions in last summer's Bill C-40 having to do with the widows of disabled veterans and possible legislation respecting the War Veterans Allowance Act.

As a second question, may I ask the minister whether he has yet found a way to get Bill C-53 referred, after a short debate, to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. That bill has to do with sexual harassment.

As a third question, may I ask the minister if he is yet prepared to take the House into his confidence as to what his plans are about proroguing this session and starting a new one. It used to be when I was a lot younger that a session did not go beyond a year. This one has gone well beyond that. We are now into our 204th sitting day. In view of the fact that it might be good for the general atmosphere of the House if we had a new Speech from the Throne and a new start, I wonder if the minister could give us a response to this question.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: There are three questions, Madam Speaker. To the first question the answer is: not yet. To the second question: it all depends on the progress we make on other bills. To the third question: it is still too early to answer.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I would like to gain some knowledge of the Standing Orders of the House. A few weeks ago members opposite spent several half-hours debating whether or not the clocks in the House were in working order. That lasted days and days. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) has made a very serious accusation, yet I am discharging my responsibilities as Minister of Justice when I receive a report from the investigation director asking me to check the files to see whether or not there is a case for court action, and the Leader of the Opposition states that by acting—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. If I ask hon. members not to comment on my rulings, it is obvious that I cannot do so myself. Each time other members rose on questions of privilege, whether these had to do with clocks or something else, I did what I had to do under the circumstances and the way I handled the question raised by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) is not at all different from the way I acted with members of the opposition.

What the minister is now attempting to do, and what others do until I interrupt them, is to turn a question of privilege into a point of order, something which of course I cannot accept. Besides, the minister is in a very difficult situation because he cannot comment on that point of order without referring to the question on which I have ruled already. On several occasions the minister gave explanations to the House concerning his conduct. His explanations were accepted by the House until further notice. Should another opportunity arise, I am confident that when other questions are put to the minister he will give to the House whatever explanations he may want to give, but he may not do so at this time.

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, often in the past when the Chair ruled against a question of privilege based on the criteria established in practice and in the Standing Orders, a member could still rise on a point of order. So it is in this manner that I rise now on a point of order, which is not the question of privilege raised by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) which you rejected, because points of order can be raised by any member of this House. Now it is strictly forbidden, according to the rules, to make allegations about a member, and it is clear that during question period the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) accused the Minister of Justice and made allegations by saying that he was not doing his job and was not taking his responsibilities seriously. That is clearly against the rules of this House. I am not raising a question of privilege, as you have already given your ruling on that, but I am rising, as an ordinary member, on a point of order to ask the Leader of the Opposition to withdraw his very serious allegations about the Minister of Justice, if he has the courage to do so.

Madam Speaker, we are dealing with procedure, and it is indeed true that you have ruled against the question of privilege, perhaps before completely hearing out the Minister of Justice, but that was your ruling and I do not wish to go back on it. I will abide by your ruling and not comment on it. However, by rising on a point of order, I submit that it is the Chair's duty to ensure that no member of this House, whatever his title, be allowed to make allegations about anyone. In this case, the Leader of the Opposition is clearly at fault for having, during the Question Period, taken the opportunity to clearly, directly and unequivocally suggest that the Minister of Justice was not doing his job. I think that we cannot let that go by unchallenged and that is why I am rising on a point of order because I would like you to ask the Leader of the Opposition to have the courage to stand in his place and withdraw his accusations.

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, if there is any duty at all on a member, his first duty is not to attempt to do indirectly what would be wrong to do directly, and that is to question a ruling of the Chair. I must say I am rather surprised at my hon. friend moving in the direction he did, having regard to the skill and understanding he has of the rules.

The second thing is, it is incumbent upon every member of the House to address the House and the issues in a parliamentary way. If you examine the blues of the exchanges that took place you will find that the language used by the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) in the House was absolutely parliamentary. It was not out of order; in fact, it was in order. This place is not any thing else but a place of debate where strong positions are taken on issues that are important. Of course, that must be done within the confines of appropriate parliamentary language. I do not believe that any unparliamentary language was used, and I am sure if it was the Leader of the Opposition would be the first to recognize it.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): On this particular point, Madam Speaker, the question is always a very difficult and narrow one. I think I have been able to detect during the exercise by the government House leader and others on the government side this question of attributing motives to members of the opposition, trying to silence them in that way. What I would suggest to the House leader is the difference is this, that if the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) said the Minister of Juctice (Mr. Chrétien) would be failing in his duty if he failed to do something with a report, that would not be attributing a motive at all; that is, if he failed to do something having received a report. On the other hand, if I were to suggest that the intervention by the government House leader was an attempt to intimidate the Chair, then that would be a clear attribution of a motive to the government House leader.

I have used that example merely to establish the distinction in his mind, and I trust in the minds of my colleagues in the House. Unfortunately every time there seems to be criticism of the government side there is immediately this attempt to rise and say that members of the opposition are attributing motives. That is not the case. I would hold that there was no such thing on the part of the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition at all, in any way. This is merely a misinterpretation of the rules by the government House leader to his advantage.

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I have not yet given the floor to the hon. minister. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) sought the floor before the Minister of Justice. I will hear him now. Afterwards I will hear the Minister of Justice if he still has something to add. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General.

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): On the same point of order, Madam Speaker, I would like to point out that the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) may have acted involuntarily—and that is where we will see whether he is a gentleman or not—but he very clearly imputed motives to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien). Not only did he do that, but he also—voluntarily or not, it is for him to say, but I think it is important that he does if he has a minimum of seriousness and responsibility—stated, erroneously, that it was my duty to submit a report to the Minister of Justice, whereas it is very clear that that duty is not incumbent upon the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs but solely upon the director of investigation. It was my officials who, pursuant to section 15, submitted the document to the Department of Justice. Therefore, I think that the right hon. Leader of the Opposition will at least have to be honest enough to admit that he was wrong and to withdraw the accusations he made against the Minister of Justice and, second, to withdraw as well the wrong impression he gave about me and my responsibilities.

[English]

Madam Speaker: I am sorry, but I thought the hon. Minister of Justice was not rising again. If he is, it is his turn to be heard and then I will hear the hon. parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, I do not want to create a controversy, and it is very seldom I get up on a point of order, but on this point of order I would like to say that, as the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) said a moment ago, it might be an error made in the heat of debate by the Leader of the Opposition, who said the report had been transmitted to me by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs so it would be hidden. That is a very serious point, Madam Speaker, because the report had not been transmitted to me by the minister; it had been transmitted to me by the director.

I would like to take just a minute to explain for those who do not understand that law that my duty is to look into—

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

An hon. Member: Don't make an ass of yourself.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I know the hon. minister feels very strongly about the exchange that has been taking place in the House, but he must recognize that the Chair is also in difficulty because the Chair cannot allow the minister to comment or to continue with the explanations he has given and on which I ruled that he did not have a question of privilege. All I have done is rule that he did not have a question of privilege.

I will now hear the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Collenette).

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I am rising on a point of order in relation to the comments made by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker). I think what is at issue here, and I am speaking strictly to the rules—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I would like to be sure that the hon. parliamentary secretary is speaking to the rules. Is he speaking on the same point of order or is he introducing a new point of order?

Point of Order—Mr. Chrétien

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, the point of order originated with the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) and it was followed by a comment by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker). I do not want to talk about the substance of the matter because I know you have ruled on the substance. But there is a clear difference in this House with regard to the rules relating to unparliamentary language, which is listed in Beauchesne—though not all unparliamentary words are listed there—and the imputation of motives. Citation 322 of Beauchesne clearly states:

> It has been formally ruled by Speakers that a statement by a member respecting himself and particularly within his own knowledge must be accepted, but it is not unparliamentary temperately to criticize statements made by a member as being contrary to the facts; but no imputation of intentional falsehood is permissible.

That is the key, and it is very easy to use very parliamentary language in the imputation of motives. But that is not what is at issue.

● (1530)

I submit there is another reference to which Your Honour should turn, and that is 316(e) of Beauschesne, fifth edition, which clearly states:

> Besides the prohibitions contained in S.O. 35, it has been sanctioned by usage that a member, while speaking, must not:
> (e) impute bad motives or motives different from those acknowledged to a member;—

I submit what was done this afternoon clearly contravened the practices of this House and in no way dealt with unparliamentary language.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I am sure Your Honour will find that there is no point of order, as there was no question of privilege, but it might be useful, since several highly exercised ministers of the Crown have been engaged in this matter in their usual intemperate way, for me to review the record of what happened here today.

I should say that it is of more than passing interest to note the unease in the government benches having to do with the uranium cartel and whether the facts about that cartel will be made public or held secret. That is the matter which is of the deepest political interest and, I think, of interest to the country.

Let us review what happened. What happened was that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) said solemnly to this House of Commons that he would make public the findings of the inquiry into the uranium cartel. That is what he said; he put it on the record. He has today reinterpreted his statement to say that public means private.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition is debating the question. That was the whole substance of what was discussed during the question period. The Leader of the Opposition is now debating. If he has other things to add respecting the particular point of order which was raised, I can hear him.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, all I have to add on the point of order is that I do not believe there is one.

Madam Speaker: It seems to me that two things have been discussed. The Minister of Justice gave explanations about the procedure he was following respecting a certain report, and I ruled that there was no question of privilege.

Then a further point of order having to do with imputing motives was raised. At the time of the deliberations I did not have the feeling that motives had been imputed, but I do recognize that there is quite a lot of noise in the House and I sometimes do not hear all of what is said in the House. My impression was that the Leader of the Opposition was criticizing the actions of the minister and expressing an opinion about those actions of the minister, but that he had not imputed bad motives.

I can do two things with respect to this particular question. Conversation is rather rapid in the House. I was going to ask the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition if he thought he had imputed motives and, if he did, he might want to withdraw; but he has just now told the House that he has not imputed motives, and I am not in a position to contradict him at this point.

I will look at the records. If I find that motives have not been imputed—because my impression now is that motives have not been imputed—I will not come back to the House with this question. If I feel that motives have been imputed, I will then take the necessary actions to see that things are conducted in this House in a parliamentary way.

CHIP

Question No. 799—Mr. de Jong:

1. What is the present CHIP monitoring system and its objectives?

2. What has the present monitoring system revealed?

3. (a) Under what section of the Criminal Code will prosecutions be made (b) on what date (c) where will they occur?

4. Is CMHC considering revising (a) the standards for insulation materials because of possible health and fire hazards (b) insulation practices to insure that no long term structural damage to homes occurs and that maximum energy savings are achieved?

5. Will CHIP increase the number of inspections that it carries out?

6. On what date will the public be informed of the problems with the program so that they can make their insulation decisions based on sound information?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works):

I am advised by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation as follows:

1. Under the present CHIP monitoring system, CMHC inspectors inspect units identified by CHIP in accordance with the following selection criteria: all grants in excess of $500, random selection of one grant in 20, all units where doubt exists as to eligibility or where fraud is suspected.

Monitoring inspections are visual only and are undertaken by CHIP to ensure that materials, for which a grant is being paid, are properly installed.

2. The present monitoring system has revealed: cases of discrepancies between the amount of insulation installed and that claimed, cases of poor workmanship, in the majority of cases, the quantity of materials installed corresponds to that claimed.

3. (a) Prosecutions will be made under Sections 338, 338(i) and 423(i)(d) of the Criminal Code of Canada. (b) and (c) Prosecutions are expected to take place in Hamilton and Toronto in the fall of 1981.

4. (a) CMHC is continually revising the standards for insulation, primarily through the Canadian General Standards Board (CGSB) and the Canadian Standards Association (CSA), which are responsible for them. The health and fire aspects of the standards are also being studied by an interdepartmental committee. During 1981, changes will be made to the current materials acceptance program whereby a comprehensive evaluation report on the accepted materials will be produced and made available to the consumer.

(b) Changes in insulation practices are being made in two ways:

(i) More information is being provided to consumers and insulation installers through workshops sponsored by industry associations, the National Research Council and others.

(ii) Implementation of the CGSB certification program for insulation contractors should be in place by September 1, 1981. This program should help to ensure that good practices are followed.

5. It is not proposed to increase the percentage of inspections being carried out.

6. The public is immediately informed when changes occur. The publications, "Enersave" and "Keeping the Heat In", are available to the public upon request at no charge. In addition, the Enersave advisory service offers a free insulation analysis advising home owners on where and how to insulate and approximate costs. For more information about insulation, procedures, solutions and vapour barriers, the toll-free Enersave Heatline is available.

SURVEILLANCE OF COASTAL WATERS

Question No. 2,056—Mr. Herbert:

Have there been any changes in assigned responsibilities for the surveillance of coastal waters since March 4, 1976 and, if so, what are they?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council):

In so far as the Department of the Environment is concerned: No.

In so far as the Department of Fisheries and Oceans is concerned: up to December 31, 1976, waters outside 12 miles on Canada's east coast were managed through the International Commission of the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries (ICNAF). Under the auspices of this commission, a joint scheme of international enforcement was established which enabled member countries to conduct surveillance and inspections of fishing vessels of all member nations which fished in the ICNAF area. Canada played a lead role in this scheme and in addition to ships of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans utilized ships and aircraft of Department of National Defence and Department of Transport. Waters inside 12 miles which were not included in the ICNAF scheme were also patrolled but were under Canadian management.

On the west coast, there was limited foreign fishing activity outside 12 miles. The major countries were the U.S., Poland, Japan and the U.S.S.R. Management of the major U.S. and Canadian fisheries (halibut and salmon) were by international agreement through the International Pacific Halibut Commission (IPHC) and the International Pacific Salmon Fisheries Commission (IPSFC). Bilateral agreements with Poland and the U.S.S.R. were in effect to avoid gear conflicts with Canadian salmon vessels fishing outside 12 miles. Waters inside 12 miles were patrolled by DFO ships. Surveillance outside 12 miles was conducted by both DFO and DND vessels.

As of January 1, 1977, with the declaration of the 200-mile limit, Canada took over management of fish stocks inside 200 nautical miles of baselines along her coasts. Foreign nations were permitted to continue to fish under licence in this new zone for stocks surplus to the needs of Canadian fishermen. Their fishing operations were then subject to Canadian regulations, licences and enforcement programs. Surveillance operations within the new zone were also brought under Canadian management and violations were handled in Canadian courts. Surveillance is conducted by DFO ships with assistance from the Department of National Defence as required and through interdepartmental arrangements. In addition, Canadian observers are frequently on board foreign fishing vessels.

In waters of the former ICNAF area which are not inside 200 miles the ICNAF scheme of joint enforcement is continuing under the North Atlantic Fisheries Organization (NAFO) which is a successor to ICNAF. Waters under NAFO management are mainly the Flemish Cap and the southern and eastern extremeties of the Grand Banks. On the west coast, agreements between Canada and the U.S. are ongoing to provide co-operative management and enforcement of the halibut and salmon fisheries; however, neither country conducts any fishing activities for these species in waters of the other country.

In so far as the Department of National Defence is concerned: there has been no change in assigned responsibilities for the surveillance of coastal waters. However, the degree of support provided by the Canadian Forces to assist other government departments in carrying out their regulatory responsibilities, does change in accordance with circumstances.

In so far as the Department of Transport is concerned: yes.

1976 Extension of the Eastern Canada Traffic System (ECAREG Canada) to the entire Arctic region (NORDREG Canada); NORDREG as yet is a voluntary system.

1977 Establishment of exclusive fishing zones as follows: zone 4—east coast of Canada, zone 5—west coast of Canada, zone 6—Arctic region.

The establishment of these zones designates major areas as exclusive Canadian fisheries zones and will allow Canada to asset jurisdiction over fisheries conservation and management in the area involved; and extends seaward Canada's responsibility for pollution surveillance under Part XX of the Canada Shipping Act.

1979 Implementation of the Canada/U.S. co-operative Vessel Traffic Management Agreement for the Juan de Fuca region.

MAILING LIST OF INDUSTRIAL AND COMMERCIAL COMPANIES

Question No. 2,141—Mr. Blenkarn:

1. Did the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce or any other department make available to any member of Parliament, a mailing list of industrial and commercial companies operating in the member's constituency or any other constituency and, if so, to which members?

2. Are lists available to other members upon request and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce):

In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned: 1. To the extent that such information is readily available, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce provides non-confidential information on firms (e.g., their products, services, addresses, etc.), in response to requests from the public. It is my understanding that the department services many requests for such information from members of Parliament as well as from persons and firms both inside and outside Canada, and federal and provincial government departments. Because of the nature of the information, and the frequency and volume of requests for this service, no formal record or list of recipients of the service is maintained.

2. The names, addresses of firms, their products/services and, at times, the name of a contact point, are all considered to be of a non-confidential nature and would be available to all members upon request (either orally or in writing), as they would be to all members of the public.

FISCAL EQUALIZATION PAYMENTS

Question No. 2,180—Mr. Herbert:

1. What amount was transferred to the provinces under the fiscal equalization payments program, by year, for total payment and by province on a per capita basis?

2. What is the estimated per capita contribution for the year 1981-82?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)):

1. See lists below.

2. The estimated per capita contributions for 1981-82, by province, are as follows: Newfoundland, $712; Prince Edward Island, $771; Nova Scotia, $569; New Brunswick $588; Quebec, $291 and Manitoba, $355.

The payments in this table consist of payments described in successive fiscal arrangements statutes as "equalization". They include transitional guarantees for Quebec, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta from 1962-63 to 1964-65 and for Saskatchewan in 1967-68 plus the Atlantic Provinces Adjustment Grants. The most notable of the guarantees is an amount of $14,268,000 paid to Saskatchewan in 1967-68. Payments for the years 1967-68 to 1976-77 include amounts in respect of tax points abated for post-secondary education. Beginning with 1977-78 payments include amounts for the additional personal income tax transfer in respect of established program financing.

ment payments are therefore attributed to the year for which the revenues are equalized. The amounts shown for the years 1957-58 to 1978-79 are final. 1979-80, 1980-81 and 1981-82 are subject to adjustments.

While the payments are grouped by quinquennial arrangements, there were mid-period changes in (a) 1958-59 (when the Atlantic Provinces Adjustment Grants were started), (b) in 1964-65 when the standard of equalization was raised from national average to top two provinces but natural resources revenues were dropped as a positive element of equalization, (c) in 1973-74 when "school purpose taxes" were added and (d) in 1974-75 where equalization in respect of oil and gas revenues was modified so as to be applicable to all "basic" revenues from these sources plus one third of "additional" revenues.

DND CONTRACT TO L.E. MINOGUE CONSULTANTS LTD.

Question No. 2,470—Mr. McKinnon:

Did the Department of National Defence award a $132,853 contract to L.E. Minogue Consultants Ltd. for an assessment of modern steam versus second generation gas turbine plants for ship propulsion systems and, if so, what will be the practical application of the results of the study?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): The Department of Supply and Services placed a $132,853 contract on behalf of the Department of National Defence for an assessment of modern steam versus second generation gas turbine plants for ship propulsion systems. The study results will indicate the potential benefits of using each of modern steam plants and second generation gas turbine ship propulsion systems, concentrating on the potential saving in the areas of fuel, manpower associated with the powerplants and powerplant downtime.

PURCHASE OF BOEING SIMULATORS

Question No. 2,508—Mr. McKinnon:

Is the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce buying (a) a Boeing B757 simulator at a cost of $1,237,850 (b) a Boeing B767 simulator at a cost of $1,237,850 (c) an Airbus A-310 simulator at a cost of $1,134,350 (d) an Airbus A-300 simulator at a cost of $997,616 and, if so, for what reason at this time?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services):

No. The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is not purchasing the simulators but is contributing 50 per cent of the non-recurring unrecovered development costs associated with the production of these simulators under the Defence Industry Productivity program.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

EXCISE TAX ACT AND EXCISE ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed, from Tuesday, June 2, consideration of Bill C-57, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, and motions Nos. 1 and 3 (Mr. Blenkarn).

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, when I had to call it ten o'clock the other evening, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) was busy doing a calculation for me. I am sorry he is not here today. I was asking the Minister of Agriculture if he was aware of the burden the increased tax on beer provided for in this bill would place on the producers of grains used in the brewing industry. I am doubly sorry that the minister is not here today. He has probably gone off with his green hat somewhere. However, he was making a calculation. He was making a conversion regarding the levy on hectolitres of absolute alcohol or at least I thought he was. No, that was where the—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should be debating motions Nos. 1 and 3 of Bill C-57. These two motions would delete parts of clause 1(3). Will the hon. member please relate his remarks to the items before us for discussion.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, on a point or order—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The rules are quite clear. At the amendment or report stage of a bill remarks must be relevant to the amendments.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, the debate has proceeded for four days on the basis laid out in my own speech at the beginning. There was a general debate—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member does not have the right to prescribe the rules of the House.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With all due respect to the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), I am calling to the attention of the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) that we are debating at this stage motion No. 1 at the report stage of this bill, and motion No. 3 is grouped with motion No. 1 for debate. I am asking the hon. member to observe to some degree the rule of relevance. There has been a number of days of debate at this stage, and I am calling the attention of the hon. member to the rules of the House.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, it is certainly my understanding that the debate in which I was engaged was dealing with the general matter of the bill. We had an amendment respecting another bill before us on which we voted just after the conclusion of my remarks the other evening. I was not brought to order on this matter of an assumed or on alleged irrelevancy on that occasion, and I find it difficult to understand why I should now be brought to order on this question of alleged irrelevancy.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I wish to bring the attention of hon. members of the House to the Standing Orders of the House. The Chair is the servant of the House, and it is up to hon. members to decide whether the rules are to be observed or not observed. In terms of the rules and regulations of the House, we have before us motion No. 1 and motion No. 3 at the report stage of this bill. Those two motions are grouped for debate, and there is an obligation on hon. members at this stage to observe relevancy with regard to the amendments before us which are embodied in the motion.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I will ask Your Honour, then, if—

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) on a point of order.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, if you had been listening the first night, it was explained that, because there had been less than one half day's debate at second reading, the members of the House would have a wide-ranging opportunity to review the bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With all due respect, the hon. member has spoken before. He has made his point. I have reviewed Hansard. There was no House order. There was nothing on the record which substantiates the hon. member's position, and under the circumstances the Chair has no other obligation but to call to the attention of the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich the Standing Orders of the House.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, you mentioned that the Speaker and the Chair are the servants of the House. It would appear that we have two Speakers and two Chairs. Therefore, in the present circumstances, while reserving my right to intervene in the more specific debate on individual items having believed that I was still speaking on the general matter of the debate, I will, in response to the demands of the Chair, resume my seat.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is on motion No. 1. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the said amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion, the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to section 11 of Standing Order 75, the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

The question is now on motion No. 3. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the said amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion, the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to section 11 of Standing Order 75, the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

The House will now proceed to debate motion No. 2 standing in the name of the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn).

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West) (for Mr. Blenkarn) moved:

Motion No. 2.

That Bill C-57, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas, be amended in clause 1 by striking out lines 14 to 17 at page 2.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I was a little surprised, if I may say so, that we did not have the participation of the minister or parliamentary secretary with regard to the three days of debate we have had. There were certain points made, the minister intervened on a point of order to get our consent to put in an amended ways and means motion which, as we will see on clause 4, makes a fundamental and wide-sweeping change; but such is the performance that we are going to get.

In all honesty, Mr. Speaker, I anticipated that the minister would pay the House the courtesy of a reply to some of the points raised where there is a fundamental difference of opinion between the opposition and the government. The government has distinguished itself.

They were unexpectedly brilliant, since they remained absolutely silent.

Mr. Bussières: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Speaker, I have just heard the comments of the member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) and I am quite surprised. I was going to make some general comments as hon. members opposite did during the afternoon. However, I listened carefully when you reminded the members of this House that they should deal specifically with the subject matter and the object of motions Nos. 1 and 3. Those motions Nos. 1 and 3 especially concern the tax on cosmetics. I could have said a few words on the subject and called on the members to reject the amendments because such was your interpretation of the Standing Orders. I thought it would be inappropriate and disrespectful to the Chair to make a speech answering the objections raised following your comments.

Mr. Lambert: This merely confirms my view that during the first three days, the debate was on the bill generally.

[English]

Now, this particular item is very narrow and deals with a definition of "manufacturer or producer". One of the major changes in this bill has been to introduce the concept of a marginal manufacturer and to bootleg into the Canadian tax structure a value added tax in the guise of an excise tax.

At page 2, paragraph (3), we find under subparagraph (e) an amended definition of manufacturer or producer:

(e) any person who sells gasoline, diesel fuel or aviation fuel, other than a person who sells such goods exclusively and directly to consumers,

In this case, a person having bought wholesale quantities of fuel, diesel or gasoline puts them in small barrels to sell them to dealers. I think that my colleague, the hon. member for Burlington (Mr. Kempling) will explain the situation of a petroleum products dealer in his riding who happens to be affected by this section of the bill.

[English]

Now, why are we getting this value added tax? We are starting out with this particular point because there is no way that one can accept in the definitions clause these various definitions of manufacturers or producers. If the minister is having difficulty locating it I will read from the original act as to who is a manufacturer or producer. I can read a half page of very close text but it simply says the assignee, the trustee of a legitimate manufacturer or producer, the user of a patent or other right to goods, departments of government and other public authorities, and sellers of cosmetics.

The first amendment in the bill deals with sellers of cosmetics. Strangely enough, the very first definition in Bill C-57 is that of "cosmetics". We are dealing now with the definition clause. A general debate was called for because of the limited debate beforehand. Now we are getting down to the nitty-gritty, the start. We are just lifting the corner of the box on the idea of marginal manufacturers.

The hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) and many others will show what the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) is trying to do by establishing this category of person and what the effect of the tax will be. We can show the bottom line to the public because they are the ones who will pay it. Not only is it a value added tax in the case of some marginal manufacturers, but in the case of distributors of cosmetics there is a transfer of the manufacturers' excise tax to the wholesale level. This is a deviation from the principle of an excise tax at the manufacturers level. This is what we are supposed to have.

We will fight the indexing of the excise tax based upon the cost of living. Naturally this will save or eliminate the necessity of the Minister of Finance having to come to Parliament to obtain an increase in taxes or an increase in his revenues, simply by letting the percentage tax or the ad valorem tax accumulate and snowball.

The other night the minister responsible for financial institutions received the permission of the House to put in a different ways and means motion which changed the base period. It did not reduce the tax, but in essence it will raise perhaps as much as $25 million more by reason of the changes.

It is incumbent upon the House to realize fully what it is doing. I am satisfied that hon. members on the government side did not sit on the committee as parts of a floating goon squad, brought in from time to time to make a quorum. They sat there understanding and following the briefs, presentations and representations made by the public. They will realize that a fundamental change is being effected on the excise tax.

Part IV is a direct tax on revenue. In fact, part of it has already been declared illegal by the Alberta Court of Appeal. We will have more to say about that later on. In this particular amendment we are seeing a small corner of the box being lifted on the idea of marginal manufacturers and the application of the tax on those individuals. Since they have purchased goods on which they will not pay or be charged with excise tax, they will have to charge and obtain from their customers an excise tax based upon the increase in value because of the packaging or servicing of the commodity. This will be a value added tax.

I do not have any intention of going on at great length, but I hope some of my colleagues will deal with this particular point. We will come back to it as we deal with other amendments. We had an amendment to include diesel fuel in the bill. That has been left without amendment, but it is very instructive to see the amendment which follows that which we are trying to delete. According to clause 1(3), a manufacturer or producer shall be:

—any person who, by himself or through another person acting for him, assembles, blends, mixes, cuts to size, dilutes, bottles, packages, repackages or otherwise prepares goods for sale, other than a person who so prepares goods in a retail store for sale in that store exclusively and directly to consumers.

What about the Liquor Control Board of the province of Ontario which buys rum, sherry and other spirits in bulk quantities and bottles them? Are they to be marginal manufacturers? Since they are part of the government of Ontario, presumably they will fall under the rule established by the Alberta Court of Appeal, that one level of government cannot tax the activities of another level of government, in the case of gas owned, produced and distributed by the government of the province of Alberta or an agency thereof.

Also it would be very interesting to see whether the Government of Canada would dare to impose any tax on the Liquor Control Board of the province of Quebec, or La Régie des Alcools du Québec, on its wine importing and bottle operations. One could speculate at length on the activities.

We will see just how far this will go. Will it apply to an importer of coffee or an importer of tea who imports in bulk and packages under a private label for one of the big chain stores or department stores? I am not too sure whether that kind of service will be included. They are goods which the importer has blended, mixed and packaged. Presumably those goods will be subject to another tax by the Government of Canada. Whether there is a limited value or a notch is not disclosed; at least, I have not been able to find it. But no doubt there will be excise tax bulletins—explanatory—which will have the force of law. Hon. members opposite will have no more participation in etablishing those details than I will, but we will suddenly find them in force like statutes. All too often we will find public servants, when one protests or begins to examine these provisions, saying, "Well, they were made by Parliament." That is nonsense. These interpretation bulletins, explanatory texts or excise tax bulletins are internal regulations made by the department itself. They have the force of law.

• (1600)

I am objecting to the concept of the marginal manufacturer being brought in under this act, not necessarily at his manufacturers level, but as I pointed out earlier, in so far as a distributor of cosmetics is concerned, at the wholesale level. I am opposed to this particular amendment to the act and would urge the House to support my friend from Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson) and myself in having this portion of the amending bill deleted.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, very briefly I would like to state again the general principle governing the changes in definition found in section 2 and that are the subject of several amendments, two of which have already been discussed, namely amendments 1 and 3 dealing with the definition of manufactured cosmetics. The amendment now under consideration and other forthcoming amendments deal with the processing of certain products to be found under the heading of "marginal manufacturers." The purpose of this change in definition is to ensure that all production operations will be included in the cost to which the so-called manufacturer's excise tax applies. So, by collecting all the so-called manufacturing costs, the inequities under the present system will be removed. Mr. Speaker, such is the purpose of this change in definition, and I urge all members anxious to correct these iniquities to support the provisions of this bill, namely the definitions contained in section 1 and to reject the proposed amendment.

Motion No. 2 (Mr. Blenkarn) negatived, on division.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: According to a decision of Madam Speaker, motions Nos. 4 and 5 are grouped together for debate.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West) (for Mr. Blenkarn) moved:

Motion No. 4.

That Bill C-57, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas, be amended in Clause 1 by striking out lines 1 to 23 at page 4.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is what I would call the second highest summit in this particular bill, one which I think from the point of view of government represents the worst departure that we as members of Parliament could possibly contemplate in that the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), in proposing paragraph 6 on page 4 of Bill C-57, is asking Parliament to give him a blank cheque in perpetuity. He is asking that the excise tax on an alcoholic and tobacco subgroup be indexed on the basis of what was asked in the bill on a quarterly basis, which means that every quarter the government would examine the CPI and adjust the ad valorem tax of 9 per cent by the amount of the quarterly CPI advance—and up would go the tax by that calculation. If the tax is 9 per cent and the CPI is x, you get 9 plus x. At the sixth month rest we would have the 9 per cent plus y, which is the difference between the third month and the sixth month, and there would be a calculation. The calculation would be 9 plus x times 9 plus y divided by four, so that the introduction of the quarterly CPI operated as a snowball.

Much as any one of us likes to receive compound interest on our savings accounts or on our government bonds, the government was receiving tax on a compound basis. There was great objection to this. The first people to object were the chairmen of the liquor boards of Canada. There were delegates from the provinces of New Brunswick, Quebec, Ontario and one other province, if my memory serves me correctly, who indicated just what this measure would mean to the liquor boards across the country which, every three months, would have to recalculate the federal excise tax, as well as other changes with regard to the sale of wine, beer and spirits. The additional cost would amount to hundreds of thousands of dollars per year and would make their business very difficult. Such is the puritan ethic in this country that the government has the freedom to do anything it likes as long as it goes after alcohol. In other words, the end justifies the means. Of course, precisely the same steps were taken with regard to old demon tobacco.

It is not only the calculation of the tax based upon the CPI in the subgroup which is affected; that in turn is affected by the general CPI, by variations in the Canadian dollar, by conditions abroad where wines and spirits may be purchased, and by all sorts of influences that are beyond the control of distillers, brewers, vintners and the liquor commissions. I have some things to say about the practices of the liquor commissions too, Mr. Speaker, as I think they are highly objectionable.

If the House accepts the principle of this tax, then I can guarantee that, as sure as the sun rises in the eastern heavens tomorrow, the Minister of Finance will index tax in some other sector because it is so convenient. It is made to order for the bureaucracy and it is made to order for a minister of finance such as the one we have at the present time who does not like to face the House or to discuss the parlous state of the country's finances openly with members of the House.

We could find that the system will be applied to building materials or to educational materials. In the bill, schedule V deals with construction material and schedule IV deals with petroleum products. There is a culprit for that one, the provincial treasurer of Ontario, who in his last budget fixed the provincial tax on an ad valorem basis and a quarterly index.

If the price of gasoline goes up quickly in Ontario we know that we can thank the gentlemen who have devised this system so that they can shrug it off, as the Minister of Finance proposes to do. They can say that Parliament voted this formula and that it is beyond their control. This Parliament should be ashamed of itself for even considering it. Members of the government should be ashamed of themselves if they support the minister in this.

The protests were loud and long when it was proposed to index the tax quarterly. Then the minister indicated, just the other night, that he would need a ways and means motion in order to change it because on the basis of representations made by the industry—I wonder which brewers and which distillers got to the government—it was decided that the indexing would be annual. Since an annual indexing would mean a reduction of the tax, I insisted that there was no need for a ways and means motion. The minister, however, insisted that there would be more revenue. When I was shown the proposal, I immediately saw the shell under which the bean lies! The base period has been changed in the amendment.

I should like to read to the House what has been said about this move by the Brewers Association of Canada which put a fair assessment on the effect of the amendment proposed by the minister the other night. The minister was modest—immeasurably so—when he said that this would yield about the same revenues. A letter of yesterday's date from the Brewers Association of Canada reads:

> The annual increase in excise levies on beer will increase a further $1.6 million, an increase of 10 per cent from the $16.5 million originally proposed by the indexing provisions contained in the October, 1980, budget. The increase in excise levies on distilled spirits will be approximately $6.0 million, an increase of 17 per cent over the original increase of $36 million,—

We see that as a result of this little deal in the excise tax on beer and spirits distilled in Canada the government is going to get some $60 million. That is the value of the tax and we have not even gone into the wine area yet. The letter continues:

> These increases arise not because of the change from quarterly to annual indexing, which would have resulted in a decrease in revenue, not an increase, but because of a change in the timing of the changes and the base for calculating the increases.

Tables are attached to show this. The letter goes on:

> Had the point of indexing on an annual basis been set at October 1, rather than September 1 (still using the relationship of the Alcoholic Beverage Consumer Price Index for the year ended June 30, 1981, compared with that of June 30, 1980, for adjusting the excise rates), the inequity caused by the method chosen as outlined in the most recent amendment would not have been as great. From Exhibit C attached, it may be seen that the revenue from beer would be virtually the same as it would have been under the original Bill C-57. For spirits, the increase in revenue would still be higher, but probably only half as much as a September 1 date for annual indexing would cause.

Since the minister listened to industry once, perhaps he would listen a second time. It asks that the amendment put forward by the minister be amended to change the date of annual indexing from September 1 to October 1. This would diminish the tax. We must look after the Canadian public after all. Some Canadian beer and spirits are sold abroad but, strangely enough, the excise tax is not charged on spirits sold abroad. It is Canadians, and Canadians only, who have to pay the shot.

The minister will come back echoing the words of his colleagues in cabinet who say that the government needs the money. That is piffle. It is the minister's proposed spending programs which come out as "we need the money." The cart is before the horse, somewhat like an individual who might say "I am going to buy a $13,000 car. Now I have to earn a salary, and earn that much in order to pay for it." That is about the same logic. The average individual conducts his affairs on the basis of, say, a salary of $15,000 a year, that it costs him so much to live, and he can do this and that with it. In other words, you tailor your suit according to the cloth you have.

The government does not do that. The government and its bureaucrats lay out spending programs. Right now we are listening to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) and other ministers proposing to spend money like it never was in style. Then the government turns around and says, "We need the money." What do you think it is going to do? The government is going out to raid and plunder the resources of the western provinces, as it is doing. It is doing this because it is strapped for money. The Liberals are the ones who brought in this petroleum products equalization program encouraging people to consume offshore petroleum at prices up to $43. In order to compensate for that, the government tells the people of Alberta that they will get $17.75 per barrel of oil. Oil is a disappearing, non-renewable resource. If there ever was an idiot's program, this is it. I will define it for you. It is the bread and circuses of emperor Trudeau for the mobs in central Canada, as was done in old Roman times. The Liberals' popularity is bought on the backs of the resources of the western provinces. The government would not dare do it on the resources of the central provinces. This philosophy leads the government to that end.

The government needed $3.5 billion this year to pay for subsidized offshore crude. Where does the government get that money? The government takes it from the hides of all Canadians because so much a gallon is being tacked on. But the government did not do that; it is part of the blended Canadian price. Then the government takes some more. Hon. members should look at how much the federal share has gone up. In this bill we see an 8 per cent tax on revenue from petroleum and natural gas. This is an illegal tax on natural gas owned by the province, says the appeal court of the province of Alberta. But this bill says nothing about that. It just asks us to go ahead and legislate in the face of that opinion.

There is no need for this insatiable appetite for money by the government, that every dollar earned must be taxed, that every service performed must be taxed. I have had national revenue officials write articles and tell me personally that every day I earn my salary there is a portion caught by the Income Tax Act, and at that moment I owe it to the Crown. In the government's mind, that is the subservience of the individual to the state. How totally wrong that is. It is the state which is the servant of the people. The individuals, whether corporate or personal, are not the servants of the state. Nor do they exist for the glorification of the state. Nor should they accept greater direction. We now see a strong central government. They say——a planned economy worthy of Caesar, that is all it is. It is a type of state control with which socialists are rather more familiar, but they are interventionists and economic planners.

[English]

Those words sound so much better in French than they do in English!

That is why I ask my colleagues to help me oppose this pernicious tax. It is the principle of levying an indexed tax.

The government is interested in inflation. I see some members opposite shrugging their shoulders as though they do not know what is contained in the bill. So what, they say. Of course this government is interested in inflation. It would be far better for the government if inflation were at 100 per cent because government revenues would rise. The government could spend more and more money.

An hon. Member: The minister would be happy.

Mr. Lambert: Pretty soon, as in the Weimar Republic, people would be taking home their week's pay in a wheelbarrow, losing 10 per cent on the way.

I find this reproachable, which is a mild term. I am disappointed. It is an abdication of the government's absolute duty to fight inflation. But what does the government do? It kneels down with inflation and says "Let's go along together, sweetheart." Why do I say this? Because the more inflation there is, the higher the revenues to the government. This government's philosophy is a total abdication of the government's responsibility.

This trend started in 1969. At that time the government began indexing old age pensions on a modest basis. Then the old slicer started cutting into the salami sausage. The increase was to be 2 per cent if the cost of living increase exceeded 4 per cent. The 2 per cent was the maximum. Public service pensions were fixed that way at that time as well. Then the figure of 7 per cent came in. It would be the amount of the annual increase for the OAS, GIS, war veterans, what have you. Cushions under everybody, public servant superannuates as well as the superannuates of the armed services, except they had limitations on age.

We have now reached the point where the OAS and GIS are indexed quarterly and war veterans disability pensions, POW compensation and other pensions from the government are indexed annually on the total amount of the CPI increase of the year before. Cushions. Yet we hear fatuous statements from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) such as that they have wrestled inflation to the ground. He would not know inflation if it stared him in the face!

This is their answer. This is the ultimate. This measure should never pass. If the federal government does it, the provinces will do it. Some of the provinces are already emulating the federal government. It does not make a bit of difference; that does not make it right. John Q. Public is not only getting stomped on the neck but is getting his backside kicked doubly by this proposal.

As far as I am concerned, this shall not pass. Why do we get it at this time? Is this a ploy? Already we have seen some bargaining from quarterly indexing to annual indexing, which would have been a reduction. However, as I say, the bee moved under the shelves and they changed the base period, with the net result that the Canadian public will pay more in taxes. Why? So that the government can design more and bigger spending programs in the future.

I was looking over some schedules supplied to me in great detail by the Brewers Association. Presumably there will be some from the distillers as well as from the wine industry. The Ontario government is doing something to help develop the wine industry in its province. Strangely enough, we look upon our wine industry as part of a booze industry, as though there is something wrong with it. European countries, and in fact any country worth its salt, considers it a part of agriculture. I am sure some members opposite from the Niagara peninsula will say that their grape growers are as much a part of the agricultural industry as the orchard—the apple growers, peach growers, cherry growers and vegetable growers.

Ontario is trying to develop a credible wine industry, as is British Columbia. More power to them. There is nothing wrong with wine, taken in moderation. However, when a province takes artificial steps, as Ontario has done, by imposing a tariff on non-Ontario wines, I find that reprehensible. It is an open breach of the spirit of confederation. Having listened to the stuff that came from Queen's Park during the constitutional debate about the spirit of confederation, to my mind their remarks are pretty shallow. Our bucolic Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) should do some of the showboating he has done in other areas in the area of agriculture.

I next want to deal with the change in the tax on wines. I quote from the bill:

> 24. (1) There shall be imposed, levied and collected the following excise taxes:
> (a) a tax of sixty cents per gallon on wines of all kinds containing not more than seven per cent of absolute alcohol by volume; and
> (b) a tax of one dollar and twenty-five cents per gallon on wines of all kinds containing more than seven per cent of absolute alcohol by volume.

Further:

> 24. (1) There shall be imposed, levied and collected the following excise taxes:
>
> (a) a tax of thirteen and two-tenth cents per litre on wines of all kinds containing not more than seven per cent of absolute ethyl alcohol by volume; and
> (b) a tax of twenty-seven and five-tenth cents per litre on wines of all kinds containing more than seven per cent of absolute ethyl alcohol by volume.

In the original act, we see there is a tax of 25 cents per gallon on wines of all kinds containing not more than 7 per cent of absolute alcohol by volume and a tax of 50 cents per gallon on wines of other kinds. This tax, goes up to $1.25. There is an increase of 150 per cent in the tax on wine stronger than 7 per cent. I am just wondering whether the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Mackasey) will take part in the debate here regarding the brandy manufacturers and what is going to be done with all the domestic brandy manufactured from the surplus grapes the government of Ontario bought in order to save the industry from an absolute glut two or three years ago.

Those are the things you see when you start examining this terrible bill. The people of Canada are being taken to the tax cleaners. We have only started; wait until we get it all. Even with educational tools and equipment this tax applies. You should read the words used, Mr. Speaker, because what you have been accustomed to considering as educational equipment need not now be so considered and therefore be subject to tax. All this turns on is the word "designed". These are the things one finds so objectionable in this particular bill.

Having said all these things on this question of the indexing of the excise tax, I plead with my colleagues in this House, particularly those on the government side, to pause and recognize the nefarious results of the acceptance of the principle contained at the top of page 4, subsection (6) of clause 1 of this bill. I certainly hope all hon. members of this House would unite and accept the amendment I have put forward on behalf of my colleague, the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn).

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-57, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, and motion No. 4 (Mr. Blenkarn).

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood) (for Mr. Riis) moved:

Motion No. 5.

That Bill C-57, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas, be amended in clause 1 by striking out lines 1 to 23 at page 4.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is always difficult to follow the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) because he certainly covers the waterfront on these particular issues. What I want to do with regard to this amendment is to come back to some fundamental principles in relation to the taxes we are discussing in this bill.

It is important to remember that the taxes we are discussing today are excise or sales taxes, and federal excise tax has been a matter of some controversy when one reflects on events over the past couple of years. Excise taxes are by their very nature controversial because they are extremely visible and can also be extremely regressive.

I want to deal in particular with the tax on beer and the effect indexing that tax will have on the average Canadian consumer. We always approach this subject with some ambivalence, because part of the Canadian ethic, as has been described by many people, and most recently today by the hon. member for Edmonton West, is that our attitude to alcohol in our culture is an extremely ambivalent one. Overconsumption of alcohol causes tremendous problems for individuals who suffer from that problem, and it causes tremendous difficulties for the families, the people close and dear to the people who suffer from overconsumption of alcohol.

Still, the consumption of alcohol in our society now is not generally regarded as evil. It is something that is regarded as a form of pleasure; it is, I think in a society which has, thank goodness, become less puritanical than that of our predecessors, something we can engage in without shame.

I want to express my support for what the hon. member for Edmonton West said about the wine industry. It is extraordinary that in Canada we do not regard the wine industry as part and parcel of our agricultural industry, something that should be given far more encouragement by the government than is the case.

The consumer of beer, I think, would be shocked to hear that 45 per cent of the retail price of a bottle of beer goes to his federal and provincial governments in the form of taxes. This puts us very, very high in the international sweepstakes on beer taxation. Spain is the lowest with 6 per cent, West Germany has 20 per cent, the United States comes in at the same, 20 per cent, the United Kingdom comes in at 35 per cent, Canada is on the high side with 45 per cent, with the highest being Ireland at 53 per cent. One can see by comparison with a number of other countries that Canada already taxes its beer industry at a very high rate.

I am focusing on the beer industry because it is an industry that is particularly hard hit by this measure. I am not excluding the effect it has on the hard spirit or wine industries. Other members of my party will be focusing on the effect on the wine industry as this bill progresses, but I want to focus on the beer industry.

It is important to note a report submitted to the Department of Finance by a commodity tax review group in 1976. Quoting from this report, it states:

> Beer is consumed by approximately 12 million persons in Canada each year who are predominantly in the lower and middle socioeconomic groups. Because excise taxes are regressive, it is these persons (particularly in lower income groups) who pay the greatest proportion of the taxes on beer. These are also the families who would benefit most favourably, financially, from a reduction in taxes on beer—in some instances more than from an elimination of the personal income tax.

It is that regressivity that I think we should put at the forefront of the question. If it can be shown, and I think it can, that excise taxes have a regressive effect as a form of taxation, and if it can be shown that these taxes fall more heavily on the working people and people who are earning less than $15,000 a year, then we have to ask ourselves why does the government decide that this particular form of excise tax on alcohol, beer, wine and spirits is going to be subject to indexation, an automatic increase regardless of the impact it has on the industry, regardless of the impact it has on consumption patterns, and regardless of the relative burden of taxation as between beer, wines and spirits?

There are really, I guess, two separate questions here which I would like to touch on. The first is the question of principle which was discussed at some length by the hon. member for Edmonton West, and that is the principle whether we should be indexing any of the excise taxes on alcohol at all, and whether the principle of indexation is one which we should endorse. The second is the impact of indexation on this particular industry. Does it really make sense at this particular time? It is with those two questions that I want to deal before the dinner hour.

The first question is the principle of indexation. At a time when the government is talking about the need to create an anti-inflationary psychology in the population and telling us that there is no quick fix but that we have to be determined to hunker down and to fight inflation in a real way, it seems to me ironic, to put it mildly—and I think in fact it is hypocritical, to describe it accurately—for the government then to turn around and say it is going to impose a system or notion of tax on this particular industry which is based on the phenomenon of inflation, which benefits from the phenomenon of inflation and which means that government revenues will automatically grow in response to inflation.

The government can say, and I have heard it said—it has been said in committee—that there is nothing wrong with indexation because we have accepted the principle of indexation, that it was proposed by the Conservative party, and so forth. It was accepted by the Liberal party, although now it is starting to have some second or third thoughts about it if one listens to the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). We have accepted the principle of indexation with respect to personal deductions involving personal income tax. But there is a very real difference, because that kind of indexation to increase deductions does two things. First, it guarantees that there is a limit on the revenue which the government can automatically receive from inflation, and at the same time it provides compensation to those Canadians who are suffering from the impact of inflation, the economic theory and the principle being that if Canadians receive some kind of tax relief, the chances are that by providing that kind of cushion all Canadians will not be forced to go to the private market in order to find their own private solutions to the very serious public problem of inflation.

So there really is no point comparing the principle of the indexation of personal deductions, which we accept, and the principle of indexation of the excise tax on alcohol, which has the opposite effect from that intended. The indexation of alcohol has the effect of increasing the price of the product in addition to whatever other increases in the cost of the product there are.

The cost of beer, wine or spirits can go up as a result of a number of factors. In the case of some industries it goes up because of the increase in the import cost due to the devaluation of the dollar or in the case of the beer industry it could be because of an increase in the cost of barley which is set by the Canadian Wheat Board. This is something we do not mind; we want the producers to get their fair price. Or it could increase because of labour costs or whatever other costs there are in the industry. But to add to those costs an automatic benefit to the government in response to inflation simply fuels inflation.

As I say, as far as revenue goes, when one looks at the whole range of the government's sources of revenue—and when we talk about public spending we are dealing with tens of billions of dollars—the revenue windfall to the government is not significant. What is significant, though, is that it is one of inflation's minor victories. It is a minor victory for the federal government in simply deciding it is going to get into the act and it is going to benefit from inflation, but the effect it will have on the consumer will be negative. It will simply increase the cost and will guarantee that costs will continually and perpetually be going up.

The second principle with which I want to deal is the other effect it has and the reason it is wrong. It is wrong because it takes away the discretionary ability of the government year in and year out to deal with the relative burden of taxation on any one of the industries in question. We know that in Canada the relative burden of taxation on the beer industry is high compared with the liquor industry, for a number of historic reasons. In other words, beer is taxed relatively more in relation to hard spirits in Canada than it is in most other countries. The figures are very clear. There are all sorts of factors. There are health factors. There are consumption factors. Employment questions are involved. All these considerations should be dealt with on an annual basis by the government.

If the government is going to engage in a serious change—which I suggest to the minister indexation is—and if the government is going to lock in current taxation patterns, then surely to goodness the minister has an obligation to put before the House more information with respect to consumption and with respect to the relative effects on health of the consumption of beer versus the consumption of hard liquor. Surely to goodness the government has an obligation, if this is the kind of permanent regime in the taxation of alcohol that we will have, to conduct socioeconomic and health studies in order to justify this kind of change. The government has not done that. The government has simply introduced this tax for one very simple reason, and that is that it sees the Tory provinces doing it. The government sees that Quebec has done it. Just two weeks ago Frank Miller put in his budget the notion of an ad valorem tax and the notion of an automatic benefit to the province, so the federal government has said that in a world of sinners it will not be the only angel and will get into the act in order to guarantee it will get its share of the revenues as well.

What an illogical system! What an absurd justification for that kind of policy! What kind of impact will this have on the average consumer and on the industry? What study is being done by the federal government on the effect on consumption? What effect will there be on the health of the industry and on the health of the consumers of these products?

Before five o'clock I want to make one final point by saying that if the government is going to be introducing a commodity tax proposal before this House—as the Minister of Finance suggested in committee he would do—why introduce this year a change which has not really been studied, its impact has not been examined and the committee has not had an opportunity to look at all of the implications of moving to this system of indexation and making a significant change in our commodity taxes?

This matter has not really been examined by this House or by the committee. I say to the minister, put this measure off. We will debate it. We can keep on debating it. There is no need to introduce it this year. Let us carry on with the existing system. The government can increase the taxes of whatever industry it decides by two cents, a nickel or a dime. That is the way governments have always conducted their business. It is deplorable, but that is the way it is done. However, the government should not introduce such a major change respecting the taxation of commodities which are important to employment and providers of what I still think are innocent sources of pleasure for the Canadian public.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is it the case that the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) has completed his remarks?

Mr. Rae: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have completed my remarks.

Private Members' Business

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): In that case I have to determine whether the House is ready for the question. Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

• (1700)

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, there are one or two members on this side of the House who still want to speak to that particular clause.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Well, there is a difficulty; I am caught by the clock. The hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood indicates he has finished his remarks. I have put the question and I do not see another hon. member standing to contribute to the debate. Does the hon. member for Bow River wish to contribute to the debate?

Mr. Taylor: I move adjournment of the debate.

An hon. Member: Call it five o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): We cannot go both ways. I simply need to understand whether or not there are other members who wish to speak. If there are, I have to see them.

Does the hon. member for Bow River wish to rise and speak and be recognized on motions Nos. 4 and 5?

Mr. Taylor: Yes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Has the hon. member spoken before on—

Mr. Taylor: Not on those clauses.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): In that case I will recognize the hon. member for Bow River, which is to say that debate can go on.

An hon. Member: Five o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I believe the usual consultations have taken place, perhaps the Chair is aware of it, and rather than moving to private members' bills, there is some agreement, I gather, among the various elements of the House to move to public bills and consider Bill C-246, in the name of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The Chair has no information whatsoever in that regard. If the minister indicates there is a House agreement, I would obviously look to the House leaders to indicate whether or not that is the case.

Mr. Knowles: Is that the bill respecting the Official Secrets Act?

An hon. Member: Yes, it is.

Mr. Knowles: That is what we agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I think we will dispose of the matters ordinarily related to private members' hour at this point, and then I will move to Bill C-246, an act to amend the Official Secrets Act. I gather that is the nature of the agreement among the House leaders?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely, notices of motions (papers), private bills, public bills. Does the House agree to stand all items under the heading notices of motions (papers)?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): There being no items on the Order Paper under the heading "Private Bills", the House will proceed to public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River) moved that Bill C-246, to amend the Official Secrets Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I take pleasure in taking this opportunity to speak on this bill, to amend the Official Secrets Act. I do not think it is any secret that although the bill bears my name it really is merely a carbon copy of a bill introduced many years ago by my predecessor, Mr. Gerald Baldwin, Q.C. I think he is well known as the father of information and the surgeon general of official secrets.

This bill was introduced by that distinguished parliamentarian in 1977, but that bill's lot was not as lucky as this one. It did not make the list of bills debated during that session of the Thirtieth Parliament. Today it has finally made it and here it is up for debate after many years. I see in fact that Mr. Baldwin has come here in order to see that the government members do not talk the bill out, and it is a pleasure to have him with us in the House today. I just hope I can do the justice to the subject that I know he would.

I say the bill is up for debate but I really do not think there is much room for debate. I believe it is worthy of speedy passage and that tradition should be dealt a severe blow today and this private member's bill should not be talked out of existence. It should proceed through second reading and on into committee stage.

However, Mr. Speaker, I may be an optimist but I know that the government will not likely let it go. We would love to watch a member from the government benches get up and say: "We see no reason for this bill not to proceed. We feel it is in the best interests of the entire body politic." We would love to hear that and to read it tomorrow in Hansard. It would be a great pleasure to hear government spokesmen plead with us not to talk this bill into obscurity. I am a realist, however, and I doubt that will happen because the government in fact cares more about its own self-interests than the interests of the people. Government members care more about covering their behinds with official secrets acts than about giving the people of Canada the information that they have a right to see, a right which in fact should be heard.

I do not think Mr. Baldwin will be surprised when the government says, for one reason or another, that the bill cannot go forward. I will not be surprised, the party will not be surprised, in fact I doubt if any members on this side will be surprised if the bill is not sent forward by the government. All I can say, Mr. Speaker, is that we would like to see the government surprise us and let Mr. Baldwin's bill go through.

In looking at the bill we can see that it is neither lengthy nor complicated. The subject matter has received a lot of attention over the years. In fact, it was mentioned by the Secretary of State (Mr. Fox) recently as an area which needs revision. Perhaps that in fact will be the excuse for not allowing the bill to proceed today. We have heard that before. We heard it in the Thirtieth Parliament when the then minister of justice, now the minister of energy, mines and "nationalization", said it would not be long before revisions would see the light of day. That was quite a while ago. We have seen no revisions, and if we look on the Order Paper today we will see there are still no revisions by this government.

The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), when he was the government House leader, wanted a revision of the antiquated act that was before Parliament and he realized at that time that for the freedom of information bill, which he had introduced as Bill C-15, to be meaningful legislation it had to incorporate the changes to the Official Secrets Act. In fact, he had the guts to say at that time, and I quote from Hansard of November 8, 1979:

> I should report to the hon. member that in fact there is a motion prepared. It is my hope we can deal with it at the same time as the freedom of information legislation. I hope so. I could not put that down today because, quite frankly, I have not had time to consult with the hon. member for Peace River, but I have talked to him about the actual wording of the motion. He knows the intention of the government. Now that he has raised it, and I was going to raise it later, I want the House to know that we will probably be putting that motion on the Order Paper, I guess within a day or so, so that the House can see what we have in mind.

We can see very clearly that my colleague's intentions were to get this done and to see the Official Secrets Act part of the freedom of information bill. Unfortunately, the now famous Liberal-NDP coalition got together and decided that that was not to come about. Instead we have today economic ruin, energy collapse, and of course no revision to the Official Secrets Act. This government seems much too content to continue with its cloak and dagger syndromes of secrecy to come and say the same as the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton did. They just do not have the courage to see that kind of thing come through.

• (1710)

I should like to address the purpose of the bill. In fact the bill does very little; it only proposes to amend two sections. It proposes to do very little, but in fact it means a great deal. The two sections it proposes to amend are sections 3 and 4.

First I should like to look at section 3. It is amended in order more clearly to define what is an act of espionage. It would not weaken the powers of prosecuting a true agent of espionage, but it would make the section applicable to actual cases of espionage. In fact, I think this is actually the intention of section 3.

Looking briefly at section 4, the amendment to this section is to rid the statute of the unreasonable and unjustifiable clause which makes it an offence to leak information that is deemed to be anything on which the government has its name. Presently it is an offence to have this information, to hold this information, or to divulge such information, if it is felt by the state that it is "prejudicial to the interest or the security of the state".

The term is so vague and so meaningless that it has come to mean that almost any petty document or anything covered by the act in fact can constitute an offence under the act. Therefore, the purpose of the bill is to implement a few necessary amendments in order to prevent the government's discriminatory use of power through the Official Secrets Act.

Also the purpose is to prevent the exposure of members of Parliament, public servants, the press, and members of the public in general, to prosecution and possible lengthy jail terms for the most trivial exchanges of information. Another purpose is to prevent the government from using the threat of prosecution to prevent embarrassing leaks of information. We must face the fact that public servants, members of the press or even members of Parliament may be wary of discussing anything if they fear prosecution under the Official Secrets Act.

Of course, the government tells us that it would never use this power under section 4 unless it was absolutely necessary. The government indicates that the section is necessary for the good of the nation. Thank goodness the government is so concerned about our well-being! After all, if it were not for the government's concerns and the existence of section 4, many evil corrupters of state would have never been prosecuted. I am referring to evil people such as the dangerous person who endangered the entire welfare of Canada, the infamous Dr. Treu! We can thank our lucky stars that we had section 4 and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to ensure that he would be taken care of.

Then there was the sinister publisher of what the Prime Minister called "that piece of garbage", The Toronto Sun. Thank heavens we had section 4. They made sure that Peter Worthington, Dr. Treu and that piece of garbage were not allowed to bother us; it was all put in its place. To think that without section 4 these people and that piece of garbage would never have been taught a lesson! They would have got away with actions which were harmful to our well-being. It does not matter that both cases were eventually acquitted by the courts! We still showed them: "Don't mess with the state or the state will mess with you"!

So we have the word of the government that section 4 will be used only when necessary. We all know just how good that word is. If we do not, perhaps we should ask Dr. Treu or Peter Worthington. I think they will tell us.

We may all breathe easy with section 4 around; we do not have to put up with undesirables who go around acting against the interests of the Privy Council. We can be saved from having to put up with the "oh, so embarrassing" situation of seeing members of the Privy Council embarrassed. No, sir. There will be no Watergate in Canada; there will be no Pentagon papers in Canada. Section 4 will see to that. There will be no uranium cartel scandal up here! Sure, we can kick and scream that something is afoul in government, but section 4 ensures that nothing is leaked. There is no chance of embarrassment for cabinet on uranium.

We must ask ourselves if it is better to have section 4, so that the government is better able to protect its honour from goof-ups and costly mistakes, or would it be better if the people of Canada were informed? Surely we would all agree that it is better for the people of Canada to be informed.

It is not a matter which is open to debate. I think the government admitted as much through the introduction of the freedom of information bill. Even the judges who sat on prosecutions under section 4, both in Canada and in the United Kingdom, with one notable exception, said that not only were the defendants not guilty, but the Official Secrets Act itself was the guilty party.

I should like to take a close look for a moment at the Peter Treu case. This will demonstrate why the act must be revised, not tomorrow, the day after or the year after, but today. Of course, Dr. Peter Treu was a matter of great discussion in the House. It was before my time, but in reading the record I found that it was all there. I think what took place is astounding.

I was amazed to see that a member of Parliament was chastised by a provincial judge for remarking in the House on the question of circumstances surrounding the prosecution and conviction. I was amazed to read the words of the minister of the Crown who answered the query of the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Jelinek) as to whether or not Treu's prosecution was linked to espionage. The reply of the minister was that Treu was not prosecuted for such deeds; yet he was prosecuted under the Official Secrets Act.

This seems somewhat strange. Also it was amazing to discover that that prosecution, although not linked to espionage, could be tried in camera or, in other words, in secret. I thought that only happened in the days of the Star Chamber. I was amazed to discover that Dr. Treu was warned, after his prosecution and sentencing of two years in jail, that he could not discuss his trial with anyone aside from his own legal counsel. Also I discovered—and this is very important—that anyone discussing Treu's case or trial with him could be in violation of the Official Secrets Act. I am sure we could understand all of this if Treu were indeed an agent of espionage, working for the forces of evil in attempts to destroy our country. But I think it is a little hard to believe that of Peter Treu.

I should like to quote a few passages from the thus far unpublished memoirs of Mr. Baldwin. In his file Mr. Baldwin devoted two chapters to the Official Secrets Act. By reading his words into the record, I hope hon. members on all sides, especially those on the government side, might be enlightened on the seriousness of the bill and what it is trying to accomplish.

Very simply, Mr. Baldwin said:

> In retrospect, as I look back in leisure, I have a feeling of anger, as well as sadness, that our system has been allowed to degenerate to such an extent that those who feel they have a grievance are liable to be intimidated as was Treu to prevent him from making complaints.

He continued further on the page:

> After listening to what he said and adding to it what I had learned from his friends—

Of course, he was referring to Dr. Treu.

> —plus all I had from documents I had obtained, and reading the court records, I ultimately pieced together a very bizarre tale. In my life in Ottawa I had learned much of the slithery, self-protective devices used by those in power to cover their flanks and protect their tracks when they felt they must do so, but this case was in a class by itself.

Then Mr. Baldwin proceeded to relate the actual circumstances surrounding the Treu case. He tells an incredible story: how the state went out of its way to persecute and prosecute a man who did not deserve such treatment. It is good reading. When it is published I hope all hon. members of the House will consider reading it, because all of us can learn something about ourselves from it.

On the actual charges which Treu faced, which were the possession of classified material and that his storage of those materials was somehow endangering the security of the state, Mr. Baldwin had this to say, which I think is relevant to the matter:

> How did these ridiculous charges come to be laid? On whose advice? What documents were produced to the Attorney General to persuade him that the safety of the realm depended on the prosecution of this man on such trumped up and silly charges? I'm afraid these and many other related questions may never be answered unless we get a freedom of information law which will permit a court in the fullness of time to approve the disclosure of such facts which could provide the answers.

Thus we see the connection between the Official Secrets Act and the Freedom of Information Act, albeit in a slightly different way. Then Mr. Baldwin said:

> The case became something of a cause célèbre, and focused much attention on the Official Secrets Act, so much that in spite of opposition in certain government quarters it was pretty well conceded that for there to be a useful freedom of information law, there has to be radical surgery on the Official Secrets Act in general, and section 4 in particular.

● (1720)

Here it is, Mr. Speaker. Bill C-411 has come back to haunt the government as Bill C-246, with its ghost looking down from above. We cannot escape it this time. The time has come to answer to the people of Canada. If this government is truly sincere about freedom of information, about the right of the people of Canada to have and to hold information which rightfully belongs to them, then we must let this bill proceed. It is surgery which is needed. Let the government spokesman rise to close the incision which was opened by my predecessor. I hope he will do that.

It was not long ago that I rose in my place to give my first speech, my maiden speech, in this House. At that time I was speaking on a motion to refer the Official Secrets Act to committee. The government refused this simple request, even though an identical motion, or an almost identical one except that it was toned down to meet the expected objections of the government, was agreed to one year earlier when the present government was in opposition. I still wonder why they changed their mind. The reason given by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Desmarais) was as follows:

> The wording of the motion is quite wrong. It prejudices the work of the standing committee. I also believe that this is not a suitable time to refer the Official Secrets Act to a standing committee of this House.

The reason he felt that the timing was wrong was, I believe, that the McDonald commission had yet to release its final report. I do not think that excuse holds water for two reasons. First, the McDonald commission released an interim report which was specifically on official secrets and security matters. I wonder if the hon. member for Dollard read that report. In speaking to my motion, in October of last year he said:

> The McDonald commission has been examining the policies and practices which now apply to the protection of the security of Canada—

Later on he said:

> But we have yet to receive a comprehensive report from the commission of inquiry on matters of security policy—

I do not think the hon. member could have read the interim report. It is lengthy, very comprehensive and, in fact, contains many recommendations.

This brings me to my second argument against his objections of October last, which is the fact that the McDonald commission did not do a truly non-partisan job on the matter and the report should be viewed in that light. This can be exemplified through another quote from Mr. Baldwin's memoirs, which are receiving much attention today. Of the commission's interim report he said the following:

> In a portion of this report so worded as to make it clear that only the government side has been heard, special mention of the Treu case was made and it was suggested other charges could have been laid on which he could have been convicted but the government couldn't find witnesses! This is exactly the same sort of vague statement which had been relayed to me and to members of the press gallery in an attempt to persuade us to lay off this case and leave Treu to the government's tender mercies. This should never have been said! In effect it constituted a trial of Dr. Treu on a charge never laid against him, and on which he was never called to defend, and to which he could not effectively reply, especially with the wide publicity given to the report.

The parliamentary secretary's other reason for refusing to allow the motion of last October to go through—which I again remind him he and his party had agreed to unanimously and defended with such fortitude before—was that the motion prejudiced the committee's work. That is nonsense. If it was so prejudiced, why did he vote for it the time before? Is his party of such hypocritical nature that it believes his excuse washes down with a bit of governmental backwash? I do not want to hear those excuses today. We want the government to come clean, either to say that it likes the Official Secrets Act the way it is—that is, firmly entrenched in the secret passageways of governmental administration—or, if it means what it says, that it should come clean and let this bill go through.

Failing this, there is still one other alternative, and that is to lay its own bill on the table today. I think the government has one ready, but I do not think it knows if it wants it. The government may think that it can hoodwink the public with a watered down freedom of information bill and say that it is enough. I know what the government will say. Someone from the government side will probably get up and say that the timing is bad. He will say that Bill C-246 is not right and that the government will not let it proceed. The government will not let the people go. It could not wrestle inflation to the ground, so it will be content to wrestle the people of Canada to the ground.

I ended my speech on this subject last October with a favourite quotation which my predecessor uses on many occasions. It is from the Bible. I think that it is very timely and pertinent to the particular piece of legislation we are debating today. Once again I would like to close with that quotation and say to the government: "The truth shall set you free".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ron Irwin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Mr. Speaker, I commend the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper) for once again bringing this very important topic to the attention of the House.

The Official Secrets Act was passed in 1939. Prior to that time the legislation concerning this area was really an English statute which we had adopted in 1911. There were very minor changes to it in 1950, 1967, 1970 and 1972. Over one half of the prosecutions under the act were as a result of the defection of Igor Gouzenko in 1946. At that time he tried to set up a network of spies in Canada.

The hon. member for Peace River is trying to make much of the amount of activity there has been under this act since then. As the hon. member knows, there has not been much activity. There have been only four cases prosecuted under the act. There was the Biernacki case in 1961, the Featherstone case in 1967, the Treu case in 1978 and The Toronto Sun case last year.

As far as Biernacki goes, he was a Polish landed immigrant who tried to set up a spy network in Canada. He was acquitted, and in the words of the learned trial judge the information was "insignificant, worthless public information".

As far as the Featherstone case goes, we were lucky with him. He was sending charts of marine wreckage to the Russians, I believe it was. Apparently submarines can hide behind this wreckage and go undetected by radar. This was an open and closed case and Featherstone received a two and a half year sentence.

All members of the House are familiar with the Treu case.

As far as The Toronto Sun is concerned, they had an alleged top secret report which showed suspected Russian spy activity in Canada. The editor of the paper was acquitted because the document no longer, if ever, was secret.

So, as I have outlined, there really has not been that much activity under the Official Secrets Act. This sometimes makes me wonder whether we are, perhaps, allowing too many of our state secrets to escape to the enemies of Canada—and we have several, economic and otherwise—without recourse. It is important that we discuss the Official Secrets Act, but it is also important that we not say that it is part and parcel of what is going on in a parliamentary committee. Surely the hon. member would agree that we must have some sanctions against those who sell our state secrets or give our state secrets to foreign powers, allowing them to become threats to our economy and to our nation as a whole.

We must decide—and we are—how broad or narrow the access to information legislation should be. We must also decide how broad or narrow the Official Secrets Act should be. Are we making it more difficult under the access to information legislation for the public, members of the opposition and members of Parliament to obtain information? Are the Prime Minister's guidelines sufficient if they are adhered to?

The other day a member of the opposition said that perhaps we should have a preamble to the access to information legislation which basically incorporates the concept which the Prime Minister was alluding to last April when he established five simple guidelines. We must decide—and we have discussed this before in the House—whether to take the espionage section out of the Official Secrets Act and place it in the Criminal Code, with a proper sentence. We must decide whether to take the unintentional or the leakage sections out of the Official Secrets Act and place them in special legislation, and repeal the present act.

Basically, all I have heard today is the same rhetoric I heard in earlier discussions. There has been nothing in any concrete form. There have been many allusions to measures we have taken, but more to the state of the economy, the energy plan and the Constitution.

If we are to discuss access to information and the Official Secrets Act, then let us discuss them. Let us not enter into other topics of discussion. It is important that members of Parliament understand what must be done and what we are doing under access to information legislation and under the Official Secrets Act. It is also important that bureaucrats understand what is being done and, finally, that the public also understands.

● (1730)

I think that the hon. member opposite does not understand the act because his definition deals with the security of Canada. Even members of his own party have criticized that definition in this House, yet he proposes it in his bill today. I agree with those members of his party who believe that by putting that forward he may be extending the scope of the legislation that narrows the bill. I do not think he intends that, but that is exactly what members of his party are saying. I would not support what he is saying even if he extended the definition.

The explanatory note to the bill reads as follows:

This bill is necessary for freedom of information to become a meaningful piece of legislation. Unless amended, the Official Secrets Act and the access to information act will contradict each other.

What is the contradiction, Mr. Speaker? First we have to see if there is a conflict, and if there is, whether it is contradictory.

The access to information act provides for access to records. Clause 4 of the bill defines the word "record" very broadly, as follows:

—includes any correspondence, memorandum, book, plan, map, drawing, diagram, pictorial or graphic work, photograph, film, microform, sound recording, videotape, machine readable record, and any other documentary materials, regardless of physical form or characteristics, and any copy thereof;

Section 4 provides for a number of limited, narrowly-defined exemptions. Under the access to information act the civil servant who issues the information requested, is protected if he follows a certain pattern of notice. This is not the case under the Official Secrets Act; something is either an official secret or it is not.

Clause 71 of the access to information act protects the public servant. It reads as follows:

Notwithstanding any other acts of Parliament, no civil or criminal proceedings lie against the head of any government institution, or against any person acting on behalf or under the direction of the head of a government institution, and no proceedings lie against the Crown, for the disclosure in good faith of any record or any part of a record pursuant to this act, or for any consequences that flow from such disclosure, or for the failure to give any notice required under this act, if reasonable care is taken to given the required notice.

We have to remember that we are dealing with records under the access to information act. I would ask the hon. member to read Section 3(1) of the Official Secrets Act to see if there is a conflict. It reads as follows:

Every person is guilty of an offence under this act who, for any purpose prejudicial to the safety or interests of the state,

(a) approaches, inspects, passes over, or is in the neighbourhood of, or enters any prohibited place;

There is no conflict between that section and the access to information act which is being examined in committee. The section continues:

(b) makes any sketch, plan, model or note that is calculated to be or might be or is intended to be directly or indirectly useful to a foreign power;

Again, there is no conflict between to the access to information act and the Official Secrets Act. Subsection (c) may have some relevance. It reads as follows:

(c) obtains, collects, records, or publishes, or communicates to any other person any secret official code word, or pass word, or any sketch, plan, model, article, or note, or other document or information that is calculated to be or might be or is intended to be directly or indirectly useful to a foreign power.

There might be some relevance at first blush but I assume no one in this House would want to release state secrets, as password or a code word, under the access to information act, that would be useful to a foreign power.

Moving to Section 4, only 4(1)(a) and 4(4)(b) have any relevance to the disclosure of government information.

Section 4(1)(a), makes it an offence for an individual to disclose information to any " . . . person, other than a person to whom he is authorized to communicate with, or a person to whom it is in the interest of the State his duty to communicate it;".

This would not, of course, conflict with the access legislation which authorizes disclosure of information to the public in general.

In Section 4(4)(b), the only relevant provision makes it an offence if someone "allows any other person to have possession of any official document issued for his use alone, or communicates any secret official code word or pass word so issued, or, without lawful authority or excuse—".

Again, the same argument can be made as in relation to paragraph 4(1)(a), that this is overridden by the authorization provided by the access legislation.

I believe there is need for an overhaul of the Official Secrets Act and I shall deal with that later, but I cannot agree with the proposition put forward by my hon. friend. However, I believe that the approach proposed by the bill is quite inappropriate and I do not accept the argument that we do not have time to do a proper review of the act.

As I have explained, I do not accept the position that the Official Secrets Act must be revised in this piecemeal fashion in order to avoid conflict with the access to information act. I think there is a proper time for debate on the access to information bill and that is when it comes out of committee. We are pressing to have it out of committee, back in the House and passed before the summer recess. If that does not happen, the official opposition and perhaps the NDP will be to blame.

In the new bill there are seven pages of government entities in which the public will have access to information. In certain entities there will not be that same openness. These could be put into the competitive group, first, and then into the group where we have a small interest. We do not think it is fair that a company which competes with a government company should have an unfair advantage, and we do not think it is fair that other companies competing with government companies, do not have the same cost in keeping up with the access to information act. We have left alone the entities in which the government has only a small interest, but some of them may be brought in. For instance, the Canadian Development Corporation is not included, nor is a motel in the maritimes in which the government has a small interest.

With regard to environmental information that has been requested, it is now the objective case that is being used. Due to the recent amendment, the minister will no longer be able to say, on a subjective basis, "I think you should not have access to this environmental testing information." An object test will be used and if the applicant for the information is not satisfied, he can apply to the court.

I should like to quote from an article which appeared in The Globe and Mail on June 3 by Robert Sheppard as follows:

> The new tack is part of a series of amendments Secretary of State Francis Fox announced yesterday that he is prepared to accept when the bill comes up for final reading.
> It represents a marked departure from the first draft (not to mention briefs by the Canadian business community), which would have allowed the withholding of financial or technical information supplied the government in confidence by private firms on the grounds that to allow access to such information could result in financial loss or prejudice competitive positions.

I only quote from The Globe and Mail because, as everyone knows, it is probably our most severe critic. I think that is a favourable comment.

To go back to my other point, I think the Prime Minister's guidelines of April of last year are excellent if their spirit is followed. We have no access to information, and we still do not have the legislation. In April of last year, the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) set five guidelines for all civil servants. The first guideline sets out that part of their duties is to discuss the goings on of government with the public and people who want access to information. Under the second guideline it is stated that public servants must be frank in their discussions. I will not read all the guidelines because they have been circulated. But under the third guideline it is stated that public servants are not to speculate on policy deliberations or future policy decisions. Under the fourth guideline it is stated that it is normal for public servants to be quoted by name and the individual can be interviewed for radio and television as well as for the print media.

● (1740)

The fifth guideline gives me the most problem. It probably gives the bureaucracy the most problem also. It reads:

> These guidelines cannot and do not authorize the disclosure of information which is specifically prohibited by law. Public employees acting in good faith under these guidelines will not be considered as having violated their oaths of secrecy.

We are hoping that the seven pages in the access to information bill listing the entities which are mentioned and the guidelines which have been set down will make it much clearer to the bureaucracy and public servants just where their duties lie vis-à-vis the public, without having to worry about being chastised by their superiors, the deputy minister or the minister.

In the four minutes I have remaining I shall discuss parts of the Official Secrets Act that I hope will be amended in the near future.

Under the penalty section, which is Section 15, it is now left to the discretion of the Crown attorney, who takes the case, or the ministry of justice as to whether they should proceed summarily or by way of indictment. If the Crown proceeds by way of indictment, the maximum term is 14 years. If the Crown proceeds summarily, the penalty is $500, 12 months, or both. That is under Section 3 or Section 4 of the Official Secrets Act. In my opinion, it gives too much discretion to the individual Crown attorney. One responsible commission suggested that in relation to espionage, the maximum term be life. As far as the intentional and unintentional leakage is concerned, that same commission suggested the maximum term be six years and the discretion of indictable or summary process be taken away from individual Crown attorneys.

As far as presumption is concerned, perhaps the charter of rights will say, when it is passed, hopefully, by the fall of this year, that everyone who is presumed innocent before the law can challenge the presumption that we have passed as a federal government under the Official Secrets Act.

There is an excellent article by Mr. M. L. Friedland of the University of Toronto who reported to the McDonald commission. This article is entitled "National Security: The Legal Dimensions". In it he goes through the different presumptions. They really are archaic and, I think, dangerous. To give an example, if presumptions A and B are true, therefore, C and D are true. These are presumed true without having to be proven or called in evidence. Not only are there presumptions, there are double presumptions, and that is probably the worst example in any federal act of the presumption of innocence being taken away.

There is no right to a trial by jury under the Official Secrets Act. I think there should be a right to a jury. A jury could be an optional choice, as the McDonald commission suggested. In other words, the accused could ask for it. Second, the onus is on the crown, namely the government, and it must show by trial that it would not be in the best interests of the country to have a jury. If there is any doubt though, that doubt should go to the accused. Finally, the jury should be sworn to secrecy. The procedure is, therefore possible.

I think we can get carried away with freedom of information. There is a responsibility for government to handle the massive amount of information that we accumulate from the public, usually because it is mandatory.

In England in 1972 the Franks report was issued. It is very relevant to our situation because our legislation is based on the English legislation. It reads:

> We have so far indicated these wider issues in the most general terms. But they can be more simply expressed. Even a democratic government requires a measure of secrecy for some of its functions, as a means whereby it can better carry out its duties on behalf of the people. Among the primary tasks of government are the defence of the nation from external threats, the maintenance of relations with the rest of the world and the preservation of law and order.

Once again I commend the hon. member for bringing this matter to the House. But I would think that at this stage as a government we have proceeded closer to reality than ever before in the history of our country. Very shortly we will have an access to information act that, in the words of many witnesses who came before the parliamentary committee, is much superior to the U.S. model from which we derived the original concept. I am very proud of it. I am very proud that we, as a government, are putting it forward. I think it is unjust criticism to suggest that we are doing nothing. It is always in the best interests of the government, because it is easier, not to give the public information. We are giving the public that information. We are standing on that bill and I hope that in the fall the hon. member will acknowledge that something is being done.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, first I shall say a few words in support of the bill presented by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper) and to commend him for continuing in the tradition of his predecessor, Ged Baldwin, who distinguished himself not only in this area of the Official Secrets Act and by pointing out to Canadians the terrible manner in which the Peter Treu trial was conducted but also for his outstanding work in the area of freedom of information legislation. As I say, I must express my gratitude to the hon. member for bringing this important subject before Parliament today.

Just a few moments ago I came from the hearings of the justice committee dealing with freedom of information legislation and access to information legislation. I think it should be stated very clearly that there are a number of major flaws in that legislation including, among others, that there is a transitional period which renders largely ineffective the provisions for a review, presently contained in the bill. Unless that transitional provision is changed and unless there are certain other changes made to sections of that bill which are so central to the issue, we will have great difficulty in recognizing it as being a bill which moves us forward in the area of access to information.

The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Irwin) stated that many witnesses who appeared before the committee indicated that the bill was superior to the American bill. I attended those hearings, and I would challenge the hon. member to indicate any witness who appeared before that committee, whether representatives of the Canadian Bar Association, representatives of access, representatives of the consumer association or any other witnesses, who stated that this bill was in any way superior in its exemptions, or in any other way, to the U.S. legislation. I think the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) has been listening to departmental officials, because he certainly was not listening to the witnesses who appeared before our committee.

We are dealing here with a proposal by the hon. member for Peace River to get rid of a bill which is surely an anachronism and one of the most archaic bills presently on the statute books of Canada. Frankly, it is a bill which tends to bring into disrepute the administration of justice generally in this country.

The McDonald commission purportedly examined the effects of the Official Secrets Act. In so doing, it vilified, in a manner which I found shocking, the reputation of Peter Treu. He was not on trial before the McDonald commission, and yet that commission saw fit to cast very serious aspersions on his activities. I might say, if that is any indication of the calibre of report which the commission will be submitting to the Government of Canada, then the taxpayers of Canada have had some $10 million of their money wasted.

Why is it essential that this motion be supported? Primarily because we have a government in Canada which is wedded to a concept of secrecy. The government suggests that freedom of information is being brought in. Indeed, all parties in this House support the principle of freedom of information legislation. However, the bill leaves a great deal to be desired. There are still far too many statutes which contain secrecy provisions. The most odious of all of those statutes is the Official Secrets Act.

Nothing is being done by this government to remove the sweeping sanctions which exist under the provisions of the Official Secrets Act for disclosure of information, in some cases trivial information. Under the ambit of section 4 of the Official Secrets Act, it is an offence to disclose any information, no matter how minor. That flies in the face of the government's supposed commitment to open access to information.

There have been many recommendations for changes to the bill. The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie pointed out some of the concerns. What we are looking for on the part of this government is an indication that they are at least serious about having this matter studied. That is all that is being asked for, that the justice committee have an opportunity to examine the defects in the bill, which are admitted by members from the other side. For example, the right to trial by jury, which is surely fundamental, is denied to those persons being prosecuted under the Official Secrets Act, as well as the fact that the sanction of the criminal law in its full force applies to activities to which surely it should not apply in this day and age. As the hon. member for Peace River indicated, there are many other weaknesses in the bill.

What we suggest is very much along the lines suggested by the Canadian Civil Liberties Association in their excellent presentation to the McDonald commission, focusing particularly on section 4 of the Official Secrets Act. They urge that the test that should be applied is one of a reasonable expectation of serious injury to the physical safety and defence of Canada, but beyond that the criminal sanction should not apply to the unauthorized disclosure of government information and that certainly that criminal sanction should not apply to those who may receive that information, whether it be in the press, Parliament or elsewhere.

They urge a number of safeguards, even within the range of safety and defence secrets, including the fact that the material must not have previously entered the public realm, or the fact that the accused knew or had reasonable ground to believe that the material at issue fell into the requisite category or that the document in question was improperly classified. The offence of receiving such information should be removed from the statute books.

As I indicated, some of the safeguards are lacking now, such as the absence of the right to trial by jury, the Draconian penalties in many cases, and the failure of the bill to accord the right to a public trial. These are the kinds of things this motion urges be changed.

We welcome the motion. We urge the government to accept the very reasonable suggestion that this bill, which has been condemned so roundly by many groups going back to the 1969 McDonald commission and a similar bill which was thoroughly condemned by the Franks committee in Britain, be studied to bring our legislation into the twentieth century.

If the government is serious about its commitment to freedom of information—a commitment given, we suspect, because of the weakness of their bill on access to information—hand in hand with that legislation must come the obligation of the government to overhaul substantially this archaic piece of legislation, the Official Secrets Act, so that the government is not giving with one hand and taking away with the other.

In conclusion, we strongly support this motion. I commend the hon. member for Peace River for once again drawing the attention of Parliament to the importance of this subject matter. I sincerely hope the government will see fit to support the motion.

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I will only say a few words on this so that there will be time left to vote on it. The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Irwin) said that there are some shortcomings in the bill. If that is so, it is all the more reason why it should be sent to committee where any shortcomings can be corrected. There is no reason to talk out a bill because it has one or two shortcomings. It is the job of the committee to find if there are any and, if so, to correct them.

There are two things the Official Secrets Act should not do. This bill will correct that. If necessary, it will be even further corrected by the committee. First, it should not be used to hide information. There are grave suspicions today that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is using the bill to hide information in connection with the uranium cartel. It should not be a case of hiding information to which the public is entitled. The Official Secrets Act is to stop information which, if made public, would endanger the country, not to hide information from the people in order to protect the government. That is very important.

Second, this bill should not be used to threaten the citizens of Canada. There have been threats against a number of people, including a bus driver and Peter Treu. If something improper is done, a charge should be laid. There should be none of this threat business. The bill uses such loose language as "is calculated to be". That is like using the word "deemed" in the Income Tax Act. You can deem this and deem that. Here we are calculating. There should be proof before someone is charged under the Official Secrets Act.

I have only a minute or two remaining to me. I want to leave time for a vote on this bill because the subject matter should be sent to a committee. If government members are serious, they will support the bill. If they are trying to fool the people, they will talk it out.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Guy Dubois (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I believe that the present government is most responsible, and that is why it will not support this bill. After hearing the comments of my friend, the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson), and examining the bill introduced by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper), I studied the Official Secrets Act carefully, and it seemed to me that the wording, and especially the explanatory notes of the bill, were somewhat misleading. It seems to me that the changes sought by the hon. member merely deal with the manner in which evidence must be produced under the act. The explanatory notes state, and I quote:

> This bill is necessary for freedom of information to become a meaningful piece of legislation.

It also says:

> Unless amended, the Official Secrets Act and the Access to Information Act will contradict each other.

Mr. Speaker, I disagree completely with this statement because when one looks at the Official Secrets Act, in Chapter 0-3 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, and at Bill C-43 now before the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, and makes an in-depth study of their contents, one realizes that they deal with quite different matters. I believe that the hon. member is confusing the two principles involved because the Official Secrets Act—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The Chair is going to see the clock. Before I so indicate, I might point out to hon. members that the House is honoured to have in the gallery a man who for many years was associated with the bill dealing with freedom of information. I refer, of course, to the previous member for Peace River, Mr. Ged Baldwin. On behalf of the House, I would like to express our pleasure at seeing him again.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

EXCISE TAX ACT AND EXCISE ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-57, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, and motions Nos. 4 (Mr. Blenkarn) and 5 (Mr. Riis).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. When the debate was interrupted earlier at five o'clock the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) had been recognized. The debate was on motions 4 and 5 in respect of Bill C-57. Shall the Chair recognize the hon. member for Bow River?

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I have great pleasure tonight and some agitation in speaking to motion No. 4 because it deals with a tax that I think should never be allowed in a democratic country.

In dealing with indexation of tax I want to go back to the basis of British liberty. Hon. members who know their history will know that King John had the habit of demanding taxation from his people, to the extent that his people just could not afford to pay. He was ruining his country, and even though it was a feudal system at the time, the demands were so great that the people just could not stand the burden. Consequently, on June 15, 1215, when King John returned from a trip, a group of English people were there to meet him. After discussion, they forced King John to sign what has become known as the Magna Carta, or the Magna Charter. Throughout the world, and especially throughout the British World, 1215 at Runnymede was the time when the fundamental bases of the rights of people were established.

I want to deal with just one aspect of that charter. The great council forced King John to agree that when financial aid was required by the Crown and the Crown wanted an additional amount, the Crown could not levy taxes on barons or on estates. Rather, the great council had to be called together, and the great council would determine how much the king would receive. King John did not sign the Magna Carta readily, but he had to sign it. The great council of that day made certain rules and regulations so that the many provisions of the Magna Carta could be enforced. The Magna Carta of Runnymede of June 15, 1215 contained the basic rights certainly of the British people and probably of people who love freedom all over the world. It was a great charter of English personal and political liberty which was obtained from King John. There were 61 or 63 sections of the charter, but the meaning of the charter could be summed up by the term "no taxation without representation". I think that is the real history of the success of democracy. The right to levy taxes without representation was taken from the king.

Parliaments and governments evolved, and when governments wished to levy taxation, that was not permitted without representations from the people. Parliament had to be called annually so that those representations could be heard. That was the only control over governments wanting to increase taxation. They had to bring such matters before the representatives of the people so that they could be debated. That practice, of course, has carried on to this day.

Today there is a necessity to call Parliament and every legislature in Canada at least once a year, not necessarily to pass laws, although that is done, but to make sure governments have money to operate and to make sure representations are heard before taxes are increased. This does not involve taxation already in place, but it does affect proposed tax increases. Any proposed tax increase must be dealt with in that way.

Motion No. 4 deals with clause 1 lines 1 to 23 at page 4. It is proposed that there be an arrangement whereby it will not be necessary to have representation with respect to increased taxation. I want to emphasize that. If that indexation of taxation goes through respecting the items to which it is to apply, it will no longer be necessary to call the representatives of the people together. It will not be necessary to include this matter in budgets. It will not be necessary to have it carried in the press. It will simply be done by the government without hearing representations from the representatives of the people. This government wants to do the same thing for which King John was called to account. It wants to impose taxation without representation. In the days of King John, any additional levies on the people had to be discussed with the great council.

I would like to deal with indexing for a moment. This party has made indexing of pensions part and parcel of our policy. Hundreds of people across the country agree with that policy. I remember attending a forum in 1979. All candidates were asked what they would do about indexing pensions. It was easy for me to answer. When a pensioner secures a pension, that pension is to pay for his food, clothing and shelter. Then, if food prices, rents or clothing prices increase, how can a pensioner meet those costs with the pension he was granted before those increased costs came into play?

Indexing adds something. Perhaps it is not enough, but it adds something to the amount of a pension so that the pensioner can meet increased costs which arise through no fault of his own. Those costs may rise because of inflation, because of taxation or because of any of several other causes. Indexed pensions give pensioners something additional with which to meet those increased costs.

I come now to what happens when taxation is indexed. The very reverse happens. Pensions which are indexed increase to meet increased costs. That is very helpful, but when there are unusual price increases such as increases in the price of heating oil, gasoline or rents, even indexed pensions are not sufficient. It becomes very difficult for pensioners to survive. However, when we index taxation as well, we aggravate the problem. Taxes are a charge on the individual, and pensioners and veterans are included with everyone else. When we increase taxes, we take away from pensioners and veterans part of what they need for a living. When additional taxation is levied, that increases the cost of goods. Consumers must pay increased costs for goods plus increased taxes. That is what motion No. 4 is all about. I refer here to subclause (6). That is what I claim is contrary to the very spirit of British law. It is taxation without representation.

I want to emphasize that, Mr. Speaker, because I believe that the Ontario legislature and now the House of Commons are embarking on a plan of taxation that cannot be authorized in a democracy. If we authorize it, we are defying the very basis of the Magna Carta. We are saying to the government: "Go ahead and increase taxes without representation." That is neither sound nor right, and I violently oppose the inclusion of indexing of taxes in this bill. Taxes are a charge on the individual and when they are increased without even a debate, without the press carrying the story, without any chance of dealing with it at all, that is wrong. Whether or not the House of Commons or the legislatures are able to reduce the normal tax, at least it is debated and people have a chance to prepare for the increased deductions from their pensions or wages.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I have listened to the hon. member with a great deal of consideration and patience and I do understand the philosophical points of view the gentleman is making, but I still have a problem, which is that motions Nos. 4 and 5 relate to the revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas. And as I understand it, earlier today the Deputy Speaker made it clear to the House that he was going to require members to be relevant to the motions in front of them.

Mr. Rae: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I will deal with the point of order in a moment. I repeat, as I understand it the Deputy Speaker made it clear that members would be asked to be relevant to the particular motions before them. I have no choice but to be consistent with the ruling made by the Deputy Speaker.

The motions here are with relation to revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas. That is the matter that this House should be considering now.

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, the only concern I have was that you mentioned the tax on petroleum and gas. It seems to me that we are at the moment debating an amendment which would have the effect of taking out all the definition sections dealing with the consumer price index and its relation in particular to the indexing of alcohol and tobacco.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I see that other hon. members want to raise a point of order as well and I will listen to them.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, with respect, I think you have misread the motion. You seem to regard the words:

—and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas—

—as describing what this particular amendment is about. Those words, Sir, are part of the title of the bill. Bill C-57 is an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas. If you look through the entire 135 motions you will find those words in every one of them. What you have to do is go a bit further and see what happens if you strike out lines 1 to 23, for example. It becomes quite different.

Mr. Taylor: With respect, Mr. Speaker, I would point out that motion No. 4 as prepared, and allowed by Madam Speaker, would amend clause 1 by striking out lines 1 to 23 at page 4. And when I go to page 4, lines 1 to 23, the provision deals with alcoholic beverages and the consumer price index.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That is right.

Mr. Taylor: If I am out of order it is because I am using the word "food". However, I am now going to refer to beer and wine, if you like, but I am afaid that if this principle is accepted for beer, the next thing we know it is going to be placed on red meat.

Mr. Epp: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I think I can answer the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor), and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) as well. This matter of King John and the Magna Carta, the Chair has some difficulty in relating that to the issue of petroleum and gas. That is the difficulty the Chair has.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Now I understand that the principle may be the same but I would ask the hon. member to try to address himself more particularly to the section on petroleum and gas. As I said before, I understand that the Deputy Speaker earlier today did request members to try to address themselves more particularly to the issues involved.

Mr. Epp: Repeat the words every five minutes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): No, it will not do to repeat the words every five minutes.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): How about "magnum carta".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It would be appreciated by the Chair if the hon. member, who is rather well respected in the House for his contributions, could try to address himself more particularly to the motions in front of him.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I will certainly try not to make it difficult for the Chair. I think you have enough difficulties as it is. And I will not say beer, wine and spirits every five minutes, but I do want to deal with the principle of this indexing of taxation. The very clause that we are discussing, clause 1, lines 1 to 23, deals entirely with the consumer price index and its application to cigarettes, tobacco, wines, spirits, beer and that type of thing.

Before our short interlude, I was endeavouring to show that indexing of taxes is unsound, and now I want to deal with that for a moment or so. Let us take the case of beer. The liquor Control Board of any province, but let us say of Ontario because that is where they used this principle just recently—

An hon. Member: Those Tories in Ontario.

Mr. Taylor: —or the one we have right now in this House, which is, in effect, in Ontario.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Budgetary.

Mr. Taylor: From now on, with this principle of indexation of taxation on gasoline at the pump in Ontario, which is the same principle, no longer will the treasurer have to bring this matter before the Ontario legislature, or, to make it applicable to what King John was doing, the great council will not have to be called. The Ontario government will simply increase the taxation without representation, and that is the part I object to in this particular bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Taylor: Now I do not want to prolong this debate but I want to deal with the matter of indexation of taxation long enough so that the Canadian people will know what we are talking about. If this principle is not accepted, then the government of the province or the country will have to bring its budget before the House or legislature before it can increase the taxes. There is no other way they can do it; they have to bring it before the representatives of the people. In other words, a great council must be called.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Taylor: And here we are saying in this bill that no longer will the great council have to be called, no longer will the representatives of the people have to be called, we will do it all by ourselves. We will increase your taxes.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Shame.

• (2030)

Mr. Taylor: If this bill is passed in the House, I urge Canadians to challenge it in the courts. It is unsound and contrary to democracy; it will destroy the very essence of our democracy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Taylor: Governments cannot go hog-wild today. There must be reins on them. Debate in the House and the press can slow them up somewhat, but if this bill is passed, all reins will be cut and the horses will gallop home with any increase the government chooses.

We expect the wages of employees to increase. Then what happens? The people pay the increased cost of beer, for example, and the government uses the increase to add another tax increase. Therefore, the people pay the extra taxes without representation and the incomes of people decrease. Indexing of pensions is to increase pensions so that they can meet increased costs; indexing taxation will decrease the amount the pensioners or people have with which to buy their daily bread.

What if the cost of transportation increases? This is something over which the government, the legislatures or the governments of the provinces have no control. If the cost of transportation increases, that increased cost is added, for example, to the cost of beer. Then through this iniquitous tax, the government adds an increase on top of that. So the people pay the increased costs of transportation, and they pay the increased tax without representation. Again the incomes of people are decreased.

If the liquor board increases the price of beer, as it does periodically, to perhaps meet the cost of malt so that farmers will receive a little more, then the people who consume the beer have to pay the increased cost. If the farmers receive a little more, I am glad because they need a little more. Then the government can add another sum to that increase without representation.

An hon. Member: Pyramiding.

Mr. Taylor: Pyramiding is correct; it is an undemocratic principle.

Mr. Epp: It is wrong in the private sector.

Mr. Taylor: Yes, it is wrong in the private sector, as my hon. colleague says. I know I have only two minutes remaining, so I will talk fast.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Taylor: Another point which aggravates me is the manner in which the bill is written. However it is written, it is wrong. For example, if there is a 10-cent increase in the price of malt, the government does not have to go by it. According to clause 1(6)(a), the government can adjust the tax or alter it "in such manner as the governor in council may, by regulation, prescribe". Perhaps the government would reduce the tax, but the point is that it may increase it. This is another section which allows the government to pyramid again.

I contend that this tax is undemocratic. It should not pass any legislature without the representation of the people. It will destroy our democracy. I ask Canadians to rise up and ensure that we do not pass this. Democracy will be destroyed if taxes are passed without representation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) for alerting the Canadian people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKenzie: I am glad to see such a large attendance in the gallery tonight. I hope they will all go home tonight and write letters to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) protesting automatic increases in their taxes for years to come, whether it is taxes on beer, wine, petroleum, gas or whatever.

Apparently we are covering all sections of the bill tonight, as Mr. Speaker pointed out earlier. We must ask ourselves why we are into this. We have a very devious Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). I have given a lot of thought as to why the Liberal party would want to bring in huge increases in the cost of gas. The Liberals tried to remove the indexation on income tax, and now they are trying to implement automatic indexing of tax increases for the future. This will just destroy the parliamentary system; there will be no point in any of us coming here.

I have it figured out. The Prime Minister is setting up the Minister of Finance as a patsy. The Prime Minister has always recognized—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I have the benefit of the advice of one of the more well-known members of Parliament in the House. I tried to express this earlier, but I will repeat that motions Nos. 4 and 5 relate to clause 1(6) which deals with the following:

—the Alcoholic Beverages Subgroup or the Tobacco Products and Smokers' Supplies Subgroup of the Consumer Price Index—

That is what the hon. member must address himself to. Short of that he will be called out of order.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, are you correcting your earlier statement that we are dealing with oil and gas? Your Honour said earlier that we could discuss oil and gas; you have not corrected that.

I have already spoken on beer and spirits. If Your Honour is saying that I can be recognized again on beer and spirits, then there is complete confusion in the House tonight. Your Honour will have to allow me to speak on gas increases. That is why I am up for the second time. I have already spoken about the government getting on the backs of the little guy by putting the price of beer out of his reach.

Bill C-57 reads as follows:

—to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas—

It does not say that it is only in respect of beer, wine and spirits. Your Honour said that you were getting your advice from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): No, I did not.

Mr. McKenzie: He is not always right on what goes on in the House.

As I was saying, the Prime Minister is setting up the Minister of Finance as a patsy, directing him into these different things because he has a way of removing aspirants to his job.

We are paying $40 to $50 per barrel for imported oil. We could be obtaining it in Canada over a phased-in period of about three years at 75 per cent of world price. In three years' time we would be paying the provinces $33 per barrel. The provinces cannot survive with the federal government paying $17 for a barrel of oil. This is why 1,400 wells have closed down in Saskatchewan and they are losing 40 cents per barrel.

The Minister of Finance informed us during question period this afternoon that at the Conservative convention in February of this year we passed a motion that we work toward 75 per cent of world price. That would certainly be far more advantageous to the Canadian people than paying world prices to the OPEC countries of Venezuela, Mexico and all the rest. If it were phased in over a three-year period, it would be very advantageous to the Liberal government to pay, for instance, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta $25 a barrel next week. Then we could get on with the tar sands, and the government would not be automatically indexing tax increases to pay for the sending of more money to the Arab countries. That is a ridiculous argument. As I mentioned earlier, the Prime Minister knew how to get rid of John Turner and Mr. Macdonald. The news media praised the Minister of Finance for being a brilliant debater. I do not think he knows what the Prime Minister is leading him into.

We have seen how the Liberal government has dealt with the Canadian people over the years with regard to solving all their problems. The Liberal government introduced blank cheque spending in 1968-69 when the Prime Minister changed the rules. There was no more parliamentary control over expenditures. Since that time, the only solution to any problem has been to spend more money, print more money or borrow more money. Of course, the government has added two new dimensions—it now has a scheme to try to take over provincial revenues on resources. And now, of course, automatic indexing of taxes has been introduced. This is nothing but a licence to steal, Mr. Speaker. The motion before us clearly states that it is an act to amend the Excise Tax and Excise Act and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas. This evening the latest news was that Canadian drilling rigs are leaving for Australia. In the last two weeks we have driven another 60 rigs to the United States, for a total of 205 which have been driven out of the country. This means a tremendous loss in revenues. This is why the Liberals must bring in this ridiculous indexing of taxes.

If you want me to spend some time with respect to beverages, beer, wines and what-have-you, Mr. Speaker, I will. I want to point out that indexing does not necessarily have to be a bad thing. For example, indexation of personal income tax was introduced at the request of Mr. Robert Stanfield to protect taxpayers from inflation and to attempt to instil in the government better fiscal management and discipline. The government was not to profit from inflation by automatically getting higher revenues from people because they obtain cost-of-living increases to keep up with inflation. By indexing personal income tax, the government forced itself to manage the economy better so that it could obtain more revenues based on real wage gains. As hon. members know, and as you know, Mr. Speaker, the government has been trying hard to do away with the indexation of personal income tax. We in the official opposition have been trying to stop that move. I intend to speak at every opportunity I am afforded on Bill C-57 in order to filibuster and block this ridiculous bill until we get the message across to the Canadian people. It is nothing but a licence to steal, as I mentioned earlier.

Why must we have this indexing? I think we are entitled to an explanation as to why the government is bringing in a measure as horrendous as this. The Liberals promised energy prices below those proposed in the Crosbie budget. However, gas prices at the pumps have risen by as much as 60 cents to 70 cents a gallon since the beginning of 1980. The government now says that it wants to encourage Canadians to switch from heating their homes with oil to heating them with gas. Then it turns around and slaps an excise tax on natural gas which will be equivalent to about 12.5 cents per gallon of gasoline by 1984. To raise the amount of money which the Liberal government plans to raise by taxing consumers through the petroleum compensation charge would require an excise tax greater than a dollar per gallon of gasoline.

We must also look at the increase in unemployment insurance premiums. They are up 33.33 per cent. This is why we must have indexing of taxes. This is the position in which we have been placed by the Liberal government. Spending under the Liberal government will be $6.2 billion per year higher by 1983-84 than it would have been under the Conservative government. This government will spend a total of $16.8 billion more between 1981 and 1984 than planned by the Crosbie budget. That amounts to $1900 per taxpayer. And we heard the Minister of Finance telling us that he is planning to cut back and curtail spending. The government has no intention of doing any such thing.

The Liberals also promised the Canadian people a progressive reduction in the size of the deficit. In 1983-84, the deficit will be $500 million larger than last year's deficit and $2.7 billion larger than the deficit projected by the Crosbie budget for 1983-84. That is a fantastic amount of money, and the government's only solution to this is to automatically index taxes. Over the next four years the government's total cash requirements will be $12.7 billion higher than what was projected in the Crosbie budget. To meet these requirements, the government will either have to borrow more money, thus driving up interest rates, or print more money, thus driving up inflation.

The Minister of Finance also tells us he is exercising restraint. He does not even know the meaning of the word. If he were exercising restraint, he would be restricting the growth of government. The following is a classic example of nothing being done to restrict the growth of government, which is why we are indexing tax increases. It is the unchecked growth of government which has allowed the number of Crown corporations to increase from 35 in 1962 to over 400 in 1980. I believe the figure today is something like 437 Crown corporations. If you asked a Liberal how many Crown corporations we have, he could not even tell you. We have tried to do that in committee and they only guess at 200 or 300. They could not care less. This growth in the number of Crown corporations also explains part of the reason for the huge federal deficit. The government is encouraging empire building within the civil service.

Another thing we are lacking in this country with this government is honesty. The type of answers we receive to legitimate questions asked in this House are an absolute disgrace. I was one who was opposed to televising the proceedings of the House of Commons, but I am glad they are being televised today since I receive feedback from my constituents when I return to my riding on weekends. The people who watch the televised proceedings tell me about the dishonesty and the deceitful answers given by the Prime Minister, the finance minister and the energy minister. In a question addressed to the energy minister on June 1 last, he was asked about the huge increases in gas prices and about a billion dollars going to Belgium and about a million dollars going to Switzerland to buy oil companies, which does absolutely nothing for Canadians. The minister answered that we should refer to the U.S. experience. He said that at the present time the consumer in the U.S. is paying about 50 cents per gallon more than the Canadian consumer. That is true.

An American who lives very close to the Canadian border is in a very fortunate position, at least he was until this latest 9-cent a gallon increase. This is what is happening under Liberal energy policies. Figures show that some 24,000 U.S. motorists crossed into Canada at the Fort Erie-New York border crossing in a single day just to buy our gas. You can imagine what the figures would be like for all of Canada.

The problem is that it is costing Canadians over $100 million a year so Americans can fill up at our stations. The more gas they buy, the less we will have for our own use, and the more expensive it will become for us to use it. The situation in Fort Erie has become so bad that residents of the area cannot get out of their driveways because of the line-ups of Americans waiting to fill up.

That $100 million is a very conservative figure, Mr. Speaker, and the government's solution to that dilemma is to index the excise tax.

I offered a solution to all of this on January 28 this year and I should like to read to you what I proposed as a sound alternative when I said:

Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. It is costing Canadian taxpayers $12 million daily to import foreign oil, an increase of $6 million daily since January, 1980, which is creating jobs and great wealth in OPEC countries—

And I should include Mexico and Venezuela. I went on:

Therefore I move,—

That this House instruct the government to withdraw its energy policy, which is counterproductive to Canada's becoming energy self-sufficient, and that it revert to the energy policy outlined in the PC budget, which would make Canada self-sufficient, encourage investment in Canada, keep Canadian oil companies from moving to the United States—

And Australia, Mr. Speaker.

—and put a halt to the exodus of millions of dollars leaving the country.

I would suggest that that is what the government should be doing instead of introducing a ridiculous bill to index more taxes.

That is all I have to say, Mr. Speaker. I shall speak on the next amendment and the next one and the next one. I am going to filibuster this if I have to stay here until the end of August.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, there is a place for philosophy and respect for the principles of government, but there is no place for either in the hands of the government of this day. I am rather surprised that my highly respected friend, the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) would expect that this government would consider that justice had anything to do with taxation and its procedures.

During report stage of Bill C-57 a great many remarks were made which related somewhat to the excise tax on a wide range of products and services. In general terms, this legislation could not be called anything but repugnant.

The fact that it will increase government revenues is contrary to the election promises of this government, but promises are only to be made during campaigns and not during government, according to this one. That is not the primary source of objection, but rather it is the scope of changes that this bill will effect on the revenue-gathering process that is so utterly objectionable. Taken in its entirety, this document emphasizes the fact that the government is virtually bankrupt. It is going to ask the taxpayer to bail it out. Bill C-57 is an excessive money grab, and it is when one scrutinizes the bill clause by clause, that one discovers the truly insidious nature of this revenue grab.

While I only have time today to speak on a few problems that this bill presents, I want to make it perfectly clear that there are a great many more sections of this bill that concern me. I am confident that my colleagues on this side of the House will be making full and adequate representations on these further clauses on behalf of taxpayers as did the previous speaker.

A number of people have made representations with regard to the portion of Bill C-57 that imposes indexed excise taxes on alcoholic beverages. The Canadian Brewers Association, the Canadian Association of Provincial Liquor Commissions, and Ontario winemakers have made appeals to many members of this House for changes in this portion of the legislation.

Particularly upsetting to these groups has been the proposed indexation of these excise taxes to the consumer price index. Objections to this proposed practice have been both philosophical and practical in nature. Let me make it quite clear that while no one objects to the federal government's right to collect revenue from the sale of alcoholic beverages, it is the fashion in which it proposes to do so that has thrown this industry into a turmoil, and people who respect democratic government into a state of fright.

For myself, I have some trouble with the way in which it abrogates the right of Parliament to consider appropriation bills. If this measure is in fact accepted—and I am repeating what others have said, but it bears repeating—it will no longer be necessary for the minister to stand up in the House when presenting the budget, and say "I am going to change the excise taxes on alcoholic beverages by a specific amount." He no longer has to come before Parliament; he no longer announces to the people that the tax rate is going up. That is the principle of government and has been since King John, since the Magna Carta and since Runnymede. That is the principle of democratic government as we have known it. To me it is just another example on the long list of affronts that those opposite have made to the rights of Parliamentarians—taxation without announcement, taxation with deceitful representation.

As well, it joins the growing list of ways in which the government is trying to deceive the Canadian public on matters of revenue gathering. Some would argue that any provincial sales tax is, in fact, an indexed tax, and while to a limited degree that is true, a provincial sales tax does not have the same effect as would this proposed indexed excise tax.

In order to make this point more clearly, let me review the fashion in which this indexed tax will be administered. Prior to the introduction of this budget, excise taxes on alcoholic spirits were at a fixed level of $17.15 per proof gallon. Prior to April 1980, the level was $16.25 per proof gallon, and had been at that level for a number of years. With its excessive requirements for revenue, the government decided that alcoholic beverages was an area in which taxation was not keeping pace with the need for revenue. Therefore, in Bill C-57, it proposed a change whereby the amount of excise tax collected would be indexed to the alcoholic subgroup of the consumer price index. It was proposed that the taxes be adjusted quarterly.

With that brief understanding of the way in which the tax would be administered, one can quickly see that the tax would generate its own increases. An increase in the excise tax prompts an increase in the price of alcohol, which in turn moves the consumer price index up, which prompts an increase in the excise tax. The provincial sales tax may generate further revenues when there is a jump in the consumer price index, but the tax itself, however, does not generate its own increase, as would be the case with this proposal. It is pyramiding the impact of the indexing of a tax. The indexation of excise taxes on alcoholic beverages not only escalates inflation, but it gives the government an overwhelming interest in inflation. It puts the government in conflict with its own policy because the higher the price, the greater the revenue, the more it spends. And they coax people into thinking it is a good government!

Now what of other objections that have been raised against this proposal. One is that it would create inequalities between various product types in the industry. The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) said in his speech that he was particularly sensitive to changes in the weight of taxation between the various products. However, this is not borne out in this particular part of the bill. It is widely known that consumers have only a certain portion of their disposable income to spend on any particular facet of their livelihood.

If a bottle of beer costs $1, and a mixed drink costs $2, then it is obvious that the consumer will take more of the lower priced product. However, because changes in excise taxes will be indexed to a percentage change in the alcoholic subgroup of the CPI, a producer of a lower priced product is able to gain a further competitive edge over those of higher priced products simply by raising the price of his product. That is to say, if the price of a bottle of beer goes to $1.10, then the percentage change in the excise tax would be felt more heavily by those selling the higher priced product. If one were to speculate, one would expect that a failure of the grape crop in Italy would give a tremendous advantage to domestic wine producers in that year. On the other hand, the price of imported wines from Italy would greatly increase, and domestic producers would gain a distinct advantage. That is the way it would appear.

However, because of the fact that the increased price of foreign wine would reflect in the consumer price index and thus alter the excise tax, there would be an impact on domestic producers who would lose a proportion of their competitive advantage because the increment of tax would take hold. It is also true that rampant inflation in another country would have an across-the-board effect on the prices of alcohol in this country. The fluctuations in currency, exchange rates, etc, would not simply affect the imported product; they would affect all products that are sold when measured to the CPI.

One need not go abroad, however, to see the awful effects of this legislation. Ontario, for instance, by its very size, controls a very large portion of the sales of alcohol in this country. If the government in Ontario decided to alter the tax it collects on the sale of alcohol, then that would have a major impact on the CPI and, in turn, it would have an across-the-board effect on tax, and thus on prices all across the country. An increase of price in Ontario would have a definite and dramatic effect on the alcoholic subgroup on the CPI. In short, price mark-up in any jurisdiction could cause a price mark-up in every jurisdiction.

Looking at this whole question from an entirely practical point of view, the government may in fact be cutting off its nose to spite its face. Everyone is aware of the fact that there is a point beyond which no product can be taxed. That is to say, taxation beyond a certain point will result in diminishing returns by virtue of a decrease in sales. I am afraid that that might just be the case in this instance. There is another factor. When the price of any product gets too high, no matter what the control, people may find ways and means to produce a product which is beyond the tax arm of the government.

Because of our recent economic hard time, the volume of sales in the alcoholic beverage groups is increasing only about 2 per cent a year. This is due strictly to the dollars and cents involved, and it has occurred during a time when excise tax remained largely unchanged. In 1977, the federal excise tax on alcoholic spirit was, as I mentioned earlier, $16.25 a proof gallon. Last April it changed to $17.50 a proof gallon, an increase of 90 cents. This change was made in the normal way of announcing a tax increment and it was voted upon in this House. The tax remained at that level until the introduction of the last budget.

By way of illustration, had the excise tax on alcoholic beverages been indexed to changes in the alcoholic subgroup of the CPI over the same period of years, the tax would have stood at $20.77 prior to the introduction of this budget. Rather than a 90-cent increase over a three-year period, there would have been a $4.50 increase which, in itself, would have constituted a 500 per cent increase in federal excise tax rates. That is how it multiplies. It feeds upon itself when aided by inflation. If one acknowledges that the growth rate in sales stood at 2 per cent when there was a 90-cent increase, one can only wonder to what level sales would have fallen had that figure been increased 500 per cent. I wonder, just as an aside, how many bootleggers we might have had in this country by this time.

One can clearly see from this that it will not require a very long period of time before the government finds its revenues declining as a result of these numerous and dramatic changes in the excise tax rate levied on alcoholic beverages. I have no sympathy in particular with either the tobacco industry or the alcohol industry. I am probably one of the heavier users of tobacco in this House. I am not proud of it, but I guess I am the victim of my own weakness. But the alcohol part of it does not bother me that much.

Mr. McCain: To get back to the philosophy, we are in a position where there would have been a 500 per cent increase in the taxation rate had we indexed it to the CPI. That is a very serious threat to the basic economy of this country. It is not because the government is taxing tobacco and alcohol that I complain. I say, go ahead, but it is the thin edge of the wedge to God knows what method of taxation as it feeds itself along. If this country accepts this thin edge of the wedge, then it can brace itself for tax rates which will be hidden, which will be generated without legislation, which will be unknown to the taxpayer and over which he will have no control.

Solutions to the problems created by this method of taxation are numerous. The liquor commissions have stated that their desire is to get away from any link to the CPI because of all the anomalies it creates. But whether excise tax is indexed to the CPI or to the landed cost of the product at the wholesale level, or whether it is based on changes in price in individual products is not the chief concern. As I have mentioned, this method of increasing revenues is the insidious work of a near-bankrupt government. This government's lack of concern for winemakers and brewers and even for the level of its own revenues is unacceptable to those of us on this side of the House. So eager is it for greater revenues that it has charged ahead like a bull in a china shop. The government is acting in an irresponsible fashion that will, in the short term, satisfy its lust for money, but will, in the long run, do damage to domestic industries, put jobs on the line and affect government revenues in a way that was never intended.

It is for these reasons, Mr. Speaker, that I am happy to say that I support the amendment to remove the indexation of excise taxes on alcoholic beverages and tobacco products because it is not good for Canada to have tax money raised without the knowledge of the people and without the people of this House.

I suppose we will see again the coalition government we presently have get together on this measure. If we do not, it will indicate very clearly that there is no longer concern in any party other than the Progressive Conservative party for the democratic process in this country.

I am not concerned about the vote on an amendment; I am concerned about the vote on this bill. But if the bill when passed, amended or otherwise, is supported by the New Democratic Party as they put their Cuban cigars in their ashtrays to cool while they slip and slide in to vote with the government as part of the coalition—

Mr. Munro: From Castro?

Mr. McCain: Probably from Castro, yes.

An hon. Member: He is on his way back with a full package.

An hon. Member: A commie troika.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain) has the floor.

Mr. McCain: Mr. Speaker, the problem with my colleagues to the left is that they have guilty consciences. It is just like pricking a boil. It bothers you when you are lying still, but when you start to prick it, it really hurts. So let us prick it some more.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCain: This will really bring it down to the nitty gritty. Have they abandoned their principles to protect the taxpayers of Canada? Have they thrown away all the positions they ever had to continue as part of the coalition? What is their intention? We will watch with great interest how they vote not only on the amendments, but also when the final vote is taken on the bill, because neither the amendments nor the bill are any good.

• (2110)

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I feel I have to say a few things about this bill and the amendment, although I cannot say what I want to say as eloquently as the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) said it on the topic I want to relate to this evening, namely what the concept of a parliamentary democracy is all about. It relates to the amendment we are discussing this evening to delete lines 1 to 23 of clause 1 on page 4 of the bill.

We are all here on behalf of our constituents. We see the government spending roughly $60 billion. Divide that figure by 282, and it works out that each one of us in this Parliament is responsible on behalf of our constituents for spending something like $200 million, a lot of money. It is an amount that none of us should take lightly in terms of seeing that it is spent in a proper fashion. Really, that is what a parliamentary democracy is all about. When we are elected to come here on behalf of our constituents, we do the best that we can to scrutinize government spending so that it is spent in the most desirable way possible.

That also has some implications with regard to how the money is to be raised. If this bill is passed without the amendment, we will have some very grave concerns in the future about how money is to be raised in the sense that it can be raised automatically without any regard for the concerns of members of this House and, therefore, the concerns of our constituents.

Something else to bear in mind in terms of treasury bills is that those responsible for initiating the spending of money are the members of the cabinet, of which there are roughly 32. If you divide $60 billion by 32, each cabinet minister is responsible for something like $2 billion of spending. That is a very sobering thought. When you look down the benches of the cabinet and think that each of those individuals is responsible for something like $2 billion of Canadian tax money, you get the willies, as should every taxpayer in Canada. To entrust the spending of $2 billion, as an average figure, to each cabinet minister is, I repeat, a very sobering thought.

They want to establish a principle whereby they can automatically increase the amount of money they raise without justifying where that money is to be raised. We saw that happen yesterday when the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) tabled some supplementary estimates. One piece of paper accounted for over $2 billion of additional government spending, an amount equivalent to the total budget of my province of Manitoba. It seemed just like an afterthought following Question Period. There was no opportunity for the elected members to question the minister on where the money will come from and how it will be spent. That is what we see happening here.

As I said previously, a system will be put in place under this bill whereby that amount of money can be increased automatically without a proper examination by members of this House.

That is the reason why the Senate is not able to initiate money bills or the spending of money. They are not elected and therefore not accountable to the taxpayers of this country as are members of this House.

If we continue along the line this bill will set as a precedent, this chamber will become as useless in terms of being a watchdog on government spending as the Senate. The Senate has a lot of shortcomings. I am somewhat of a defender of the Senate. It has a useful role to play in terms of being a watchdog and taking positions that elected representatives may find difficult to take at certain times. However, one of their shortcomings is that they cannot be responsible for government spending because they are not elected, and therefore not accountable.

That is contrary to the parliamentary system as it was developed and spoken about earlier this evening by my colleague for Bow River. It is a problem in terms of the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. He cannot speak in this House because he is not an elected representative. He cannot come to this chamber to speak even though the Canadian Wheat Board is set up in such a way that the only people who can really ask questions about it are the elected representatives. You could call him the minister unresponsible for the Wheat Board in the sense that he cannot speak in this House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. With all due respect to the hon. member, I have been listening carefully to his arguments and I fail to see the relevance to the amendment before the House. I invite him to relate his argument to the matter under discussion.

Mr. Mayer: I thank you, Mr. Speaker, I certainly respect your judgment. Let me get back to the amendment before us. Clause (a) reads:

(a) aggregating the Alcoholic Beverages Subgroups or the Tobacco Products and Smokers' Supplies Subgroup of the Consumer Price Index, as the case may be, as published by Statistics Canada under the authority of the Statistics Act—

What we are talking about is the consumer price index and how it is to be used as a method of indexing the taxes in the subgroup referred to in that clause of the bill. I have some problems with the consumer price index. That is a topic that could be discussed at length on another occasion.

Very briefly, when we talk about a basket of goods as being static, that basket does not change as prices change. We assume that once a consumer buys the goods in that basket, he will continue to buy those items in the same quantity no matter what the price may be. We want to tie the index to something the validity of which I question. It goes on to say that this may be:

—adjusted or altered in such manner as the Governor in Council may, by regulation, prescribe, for each month in that period—

That means the governor in council, the cabinet, may decide that the consumer price index is not valid for purposes of this indexing procedure. It may change it at will without any reference back to the House of Commons. This is a deplorable type of clause to put in a bill. It further removes the accountability of the government through the elected members of Parliament to the citizens of this country who pay the tax.

As was pointed out by other speakers, you end up with a pyramid situation where you have tax on tax on tax. Let me give an example. An increase in the price of bread may come about as a result of an increase in the price of flour, presumably as a result of an increase in the price of wheat to the farmer. That could cause an increase in the consumer price index and therefore an increase in this tax. As the consumer price index goes up, the tax goes up, which could cause the consumer price index to go up again. You get a snowballing effect. It keeps going faster and faster. That is similar to the insatiable appetite this government has for money. It is in a frantic search for funds. When looking around for places to derive revenue, it starts looking at such things as are mentioned in this bill.

That, very briefly, is my concern. I do not want to take too much of the time of the House. Let me close by making the observation that this is a very large bill, 116 pages long with 132 clauses. It is very complicated in terms of the average Canadian trying to understand how our taxation system works.

When it becomes difficult for the average Canadian to understand how the taxation system works, he loses respect for law and order in this country. That is a very serious implication which can be drawn from this bill. I do not know how anyone going through this bill can really understand the total implications of what we are discussing this evening. Therefore, it is incumbent upon us to take as much time as we require to look at each clause so that we as legislators can do the best job we can on behalf of those who sent us here to represent them.

I could go on, Mr. Speaker, but I will respect your observation that I stay on the topic. I will certainly be up to speak on other clauses of the bill as they come before us.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I had been tempted not to join in this debate until after the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain) spoke, and then I realized the necessity of setting him straight. His speech was, of course, very interesting although somewhat irrelevant in parts, but in his final comment he wanted to know how the NDP was going to vote. I want to ease his mind lest he should feel the urge to go out and get drunk—not that he ever does—not knowing how we might vote on the final vote. The fact of the matter is that we are going to oppose it, and I would not want him to think otherwise. My comment about his going out to drink was made facetiously. I am sure he does not. However, I do—

Mr. McCain: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order, and I do so on two bases. First, the remark was entirely irrelevant, and second, his implication as to my intentions or my inclinations was rather improperly stated before the television of this nation, and I would ask him to withdraw those remarks.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sure the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) will take note of the remarks of the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain).

Mr. Deans: I certainly do. In fact, before the member rose, I pointed out that my comment was intended facetiously, so I do withdraw it. I am sure that had he been listening—

Mr. McCain: I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Deans: I withdrew it.

Mr. McCain: He withdrew it, that is fine. Thank you very much.

Mr. Deans: There is no problem. I do not think my comment was any less kind than his comments about us at the end of his speech. However, let me say I had wondered why it was necessary to go on with this discussion ad nauseam. I had thought for a while that perhaps as a result of the representations that had been made to the government through the committee and the representations that had been made to the government here in the House of Commons during the course of the debate, the government might have indicated that it understood the basic and fundamental problem with which we are attempting to come to grips.

This is a twofold problem. It is not a matter of whether you support or do not support the brewers or the distillers. It is not a matter of whether you think beer should be cheaper or more expensive. Quite obviously those matters are important, and the argument made by the brewers in particular that as the price increases the sales volume decreases, could be met by some people, with applause, I suppose, and by other people with some consternation. We do not want to enter into whether or not that is the effect. Many of us could tell what the effect will be, although there is evidence to show that as the price of beer rises disproportionately to the incomes of individuals, there is a definite decrease in consumption levels. The unfortunate part about that is that probably the people who should be decreasing their consumption do not, and the ones who do, really do not suffer that much from it in any event.

Let me deal with the basic problem, which is this. Is it fair to index taxation in the way this bill does? This is not the only government in Canada which has chosen to index taxation. The government of the province of Ontario recently received an overwhelming mandate from the public and then proceeded to sock it to them, so to speak. The government made a decision, as has this government, to index its taxation system in a number of different ways, including indexing the level of tax it gets from the sale of petroleum and the sale of alcoholic beverages.

What is the effect of this? To begin with, the comments made earlier by one of the Conservative members, perhaps the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor), were interesting to the extent that he pointed out that henceforth it would be unnecessary for the government to come to the House of Commons for approval of increased revenues, and if we were to carry this to the extreme, it would be entirely possible for the government to index every form of taxation to one escalator clause or another—to the cost of living or something else—and thereby eliminate the fundamental need and requirement for Parliament to ever sit, because there would be no need for Parliament. The primary purpose of Parliament is to pass judgment on the taxation imposed by the government from time to time, and on the way the government expends its funds.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Annually.

Mr. Deans: Annually, I agree, and that is from time to time. You may find that hard to believe, but it is so. The difficulty is this. My experience tells me that Parliament has lost the capacity to control expenditures. Parliament is not given the opportunity to deal with the expenditure levels of government until long after the government has spent the money. Therefore, that part of the two-pronged system intended to protect the public has already been lost. I suggest to members of Parliament that we should be vitally concerned about that loss and we should be devoting some of our time to looking at ways and means of ensuring that we can once again in the House of Commons exercise some control over the expenditure levels of government. However—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has again been listening attentively to the hon. member. The measure before us is a tax measure with an escalation provision. The measures by which the House deals with expenditures do not appear to be relevant to this particular amendment and debate.

Mr. Deans: I appreciate your intervention, Mr. Speaker. I want to say that on the other side of the argument there is the requirement for Parliament to exercise control over the taxing measures, so what I was saying is that on the one side Parliament must have control over expenditure, and on the other side Parliament must have final say over taxing measures.

What we are being asked to do is to give the government the right to raise taxes based on a formula which in itself is based on an index system over which the House of Commons has absolutely no control. If the House of Commons has not control over expenditures, then it can hardly influence the cost of living factors involving those expenditures, and if, on the other hand, the House of Commons has no control over taxation, because the government has assumed that control for itself and no longer is required to come back to the House for approval, then the very fundamental purpose of the establishment of the House of Commons in the first place has been undermined.

The reason, therefore, that I rose, and I suspect why other members have risen, is in order to allow the government time to think through and decide whether this is a principle it would want to enshrine in the legislation of Canada. There is a considerable difference between indexing the incomes of pensioners, on the one hand, in an effort to ease the burden of inflation as it affects those people, and, on the other hand, indexing the flow of revenue to the government itself.

I suggest to you that, without having gone through the historical records, and without having gone to all the precedents, I would wonder seriously whether legislation such as this is constitutional. I would seriously ask the question: can the government, without having come to the House of Commons for specific approval to raise taxes based on specific requirements, for all time establish an index from which it can derive additional benefit based on a tax established to meet a particular condition of a particular time? That is the fundamental question. It is a very serious legal question. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) might well take it under advisement.

• (2130)

Mr. Rae: When he cools down.

Mr. Deans: If he is over his fit of pique of this afternoon. This matter is much more fundamental than just the price of beer. It is much more fundamental than just the price of cigarettes. It is more fundamental than just the price of gasoline or fuel. It has to do with the very essence of parliamentary democracy. That is why I say this debate must continue. It is not a matter of taking one side or the other in the debate; it is a matter of trying to guarantee to those who will come after us and who will fill both government and opposition benches in this House that they will have the opportunity to do what they are elected to do and what they are sworn to do at the time they take their seats.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deans: I thank hon. members very much, and I will not say anything nasty. When hon. members take their seats, they are sworn to pass judgment on government proposals to levy new taxes or increase old taxes. Mr. Speaker, if you were not in the chair, I am sure you would be standing in your place arguing this very point on behalf of your constituents. I know some government backbenchers have an interest in the parliamentary system.

An hon. Member: Name one.

Mr. Deans: I am surprised that not one—at least not one I have heard—has risen to defend this principle. They will not always be in government.

Mr. MacLaren: What?

Mr. Deans: I know that will come as a hell of a shock, but hon. members opposite will not always be in government. There will come a point when the Tories will want to raise taxes or the NDP will want to raise taxes. I may not still be here; I am prepared to admit that; but nevertheless there will come that point in time, and having once put in place this mechanism of indexing, there will be no opportunity for a single member of the Liberal backbench who is sitting in opposition some day in the future to rise and object or stop it. That is what is wrong with this measure. It is equally wrong, regardless of what the levy is upon. It makes no difference. It happens that we are talking about beer, but we could be talking about almost anything else, and I think we have to look at this from an objective point of view. It may well be that some people's views are coloured because the measure before us deals with alcoholic beverages. We cannot allow that fact to interfere with this basic intrusion into the fundamental democratic process by the action of the government. We just cannot do it this way. Any government worth its salt would be prepared to come forward with legislation at the time it wants to raise a tax and put it before the House of Commons. Any government worth its salt would put before the House of Commons not only its proposal for an increase but also the reasons for the proposal. Any government worth its salt would have no hesitation in bringing such measures forward because it would be prepared to justify those measures before the public.

The hon. member for London West (Mr. Burghardt) was just recently elected. If this procedure were applied across the board to every tax measure, can the hon. member for London West imagine the effect that would have on the parliamentary process of which he worked so hard to become a part? The hon. member would no longer have any say. Surely no one in this House would want to deprive the hon. member for London West of his say.

Therefore, it seems to me each one of us has an obligation to continue to make the point as forcefully as we can. If there is a reason to raise a tax, it should be brought forward. If we believe there is some reason for altering a tax, either because of an inability to spend money wisely or because, having spent it wisely, we feel we need more, then for heaven's sake, let us have the intestinal fortitude to come forward with our taxing measures when the time is right. Let us not hide behind blanket legislation because that kind of legislation is destructive. Though that kind of legislation applies only in small measure in the bill in which it is contained, if it is allowed to be carried forward as a precedent and as a practice, it would render the House of Commons unnecessary. It would make the House of Commons even more unnecessary than it seems to be at the moment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I think we are embarked this evening on a fundamental debate about the rights and privileges of Parliament. In fact, I think those of us on this side of the House who have risen so far have risen basically on questions of privilege. It is my understanding, having been a student of political science for a number of years, that there is a requirement on the government to come to Parliament once a year to raise the revenues it requires. It does this with estimates. It tells us how it is going to spend the money. It is also required, through budgets, to come back every 12 months and to lay out the manner in which it proposes to raise revenues. The measure we have before us tonight is a denial of the general tradition.

Someone used the right word this evening. This measure is repugnant. It is an insult to this House and an insult to every single member in this House that we should be asked to approve this authority now for all time and for the rest of the life of this government. That is what it could very well amount to. If hon. members opposite sneak in this indexing of the tax on beer, wine and tobacco, they will say, "Boy, we outfoxed them on those items; we will get them now on the rest". Indexation of all taxation will then be with us. Inflation will also be with us to stay because it looks very much as if this government had no intention or inclination, and certainly no ability, to deal with inflation. Inflation will be with us as long as this government is here. With inflation and indexation there will be no requirement, when this principle is spread to the rest of the taxation in this country, for this Parliament to assemble. It is that principle we are fighting tonight through this amendment. We are determined that that principle shall not be incorporated in the tax law of this country.

In an earlier intervention I quoted from a letter I received from the Brewers Association of Canada. I use this just as an example. That association is protesting against the proposal to index the excise levies on alcoholic beverages. That is natural, of course, because as inflation continues, there will be increases in levies on beer, and beer is what this association is concerned about. Let me read just a portion of this letter to indicate to the House, to the country, to those in the gallery and to those who read Hansard, just what this will mean in the next decade if this legislation is accepted now, becomes the law of the land and remains unamended for a decade. I refer to this letter dated April 24 from the Brewers Association of Canada. At the bottom of page 3 it says that the minister has also stated he did not believe indexing would affect the stability of the industry. However, one of the effects of the indexing scheme is that it would exacerbate the sales situation existing since the excise levy increased in April of 1980.

In my earlier intervention I indicated that from April of 1980 until January of 1981 there has been a decrease in the sale of beer of 0.36 per cent and an increase in the sale of distilled spirits of 4.6 per cent. I am not so much concerned with that, Mr. Speaker, as I am with this illustration. I come back to the text where it says that by 1991 the price of two dozen small bottles of beer will have increased by 157 per cent.

Let us not forget that indexation is compounded. It is not just a simple application of a percentage on the same base each year, it is the application of that percentage on the incremental base each year. The letter goes on to say that by 1991 the price of two dozen small bottles of beer will have increased by 157 per cent to $23.64, while the price of a 25-ounce bottle of inexpensive gin will have increased by only 100 per cent to $16.42. That is just one instance of what indexation is going to do.

I have in front of me the consumer price index as published in April, 1981, by the bureau of statistics, as we used to call it. The provision we are considering on page 4 of the bill has to do with the portion of the consumer price index—and I am very much in order, Mr. Speaker—which deals with tobacco and alcohol. I do not quite know what percentage of the index it is, but I will give you the change in the index between April of 1980 and April of 1981 for just that portion. For tobacco and alcohol prices in April of 1980 it was 178.0 on the basis of 1971 equalling 100. In April of 1981, one year later, it was 198.9. Let us say it was 199 for ease of substraction. Therefore, the difference is 11 per cent.

Now suppose beer and tobacco cost $1. We apply the 11 per cent, and the price becomes $1.11. One year later, inflation has shown no signs of decreasing, so I suspect it would be another 11 per cent. This time the 11 per cent is applied not to $1 but to $1.11; we are compounding.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is a mystic figure that somebody worked out. I wish I had been the one to do it but I was not. Happily I remember it. The mystic figure in compounding is 72. If you have, say, 11 per cent, you divide that into 72 and you get roughly 6.6. So what happens is that in 6.6 years prices double. That mystic figure of 72 is worth remembering. If the increase were, let us say 15 per cent, divide that into 72 and it is a little less than five. So that in 4.8 years the cost of a commodity would double if the index were increased by 15 per cent a year. Mark you, we are compounding, and this is a very staggering thought.

Now what is the total CPI during that period for all items? In April, 1980, it was 205, and one year later it was 231, a 30 point increase or about 15 per cent over that year. I am making a very rough calculation because we are working with a 200 base here. If this notion is transferred to other tax levies, we are going to see that in four and a half years at 15 per cent, the taxes will be doubled. I hope the people in the gallery realize that and I hope the people watching realize that these are the dangers we are facing tonight. We are facing a completely mute government; not one of the members of the government has risen to comment on any of these matters during the consideration of this amendment—not one of them.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it will be a simple matter in two or three years for the government to say: "We do not really have to call Parliament because our taxes are rolling in at a pretty good rate". Because, mark my words, Mr. Speaker, if they get this principle installed here on beer, wine and tobacco, they have their foot in the door. This minister may not know it, but his Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) does and so does his Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). They will totally disregard Parliament. They will have all the revenue they want without bothering to call Parliament. They shake their head, Mr. Speaker. They are incredible. They have been brainwashed. They just do not believe what has been going on in this country.

An hon. Member: Puppets.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Puppets is not the word for it. That requires pulling strings. Well, I guess they pull their strings and form their mouths into smiles and their heads wiggle back and forth saying, "No, it is not going to happen."

Well, it is going to happen, it has happened and it will happen if this particular measure is accepted.

• (2150)

Therefore, I implore all hon. members of the House to look at it carefully in light of my comments and the comments of the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans). The comments were very, very pertinent—the government is attacking the very foundations of parliamentary fiscal control. It is not just expenditures, but revenue raising. If I am not mistaken, there has been more than one monarch in the world who has literally lost his head over this very matter, along with his wife. I do not know where that puts us here.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): MacEachen is a bachelor!

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Then I will refer to both the king and the prince.

Mr. Ferguson: Be careful what you say about the monarchy.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I am all for parliamentary government. The Monarch does what her ministers advise.

I caution backbenchers to think about these matters very seriously. They should not be taken in or exhibit bland acceptance of the specious arguments of their ministers in caucus and in the House. They should stand up and tell us—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has done extremely well in keeping his remarks relevant to the motions up to this point.

Mr. Friesen: Not only were they relevant, they were interesting.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I invite him to maintain the high standard with which he started his remarks.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Of course I could quote from the book entitled: "Select Documents of English Constitutional History". However, I do not think I have enough time to do it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. member believe these documents are relevant to the motions before us at this point?

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Yes, I do, because Parliament itself is at issue.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With all respect to the hon. member, motions Nos. 4 and 5 are the issue before us.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): That is true, Mr. Speaker. I have stood corrected before this evening by Your Honour for having been irrelevant or irreverent—I am not sure which—on a previous intervention. I would not want to transgress further.

Aside from the stupid business about which I was talking earlier concerning pounds in this direction and kilograms in the other direction, on page no. 4, a fundamental principle of government is at issue. I am afraid an unthinking majority opposite might very well be taken in by the arguments advanced by their frontbenchers, if they show up. If nothing else, we must preserve the rule of Parliament over the income and the outgo of government; it is fundamental to the parliamentary process. Our entire parliamentary tradition is built on it. If we let that slip through inadvertence, through thoughtlessness or because we are brainwashed, it would be a great loss. I am sure no one on this side of the House, even the hon. members at the far end, has been brainwashed in this particular matter.

If we allow this bill to go through, we might as well say farewell to the whole parliamentary process. I am sure Mr. Speaker would consider it to be a loss from which we would have great difficulty recovering.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I contribute my modest remarks to the matter before us tonight. Personally I thank the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain) and the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) for their remarks. They were extremely important, although somewhat convoluted.

The problem before us has been addressed very effectively throughout the evening. It starts with the clause relating to alcoholic beverages and moves down to cover the question of indexing. The question of indexing, as it relates to this section and its broad, general implications, has been dealt with very effectively. There is another clause which is of great concern. I am referring to the simple phrase:

—adjusted or altered in such a manner as the governor in council may, by regulation, prescribe—

Frankly, this clause provides another example of a government ruling by regulation. We have carried this battle in the House since I have been here. Certainly I have been here only a short period of time, but repeatedly the question of the cabinet running the country by regulation and then imposing it without the benefit of the House, because of its Liberal majority, has arisen. This simple clause will provide cabinet with a further power to extend indexed taxation. It is another example of a government ruling by regulation. It is a small item, but it is one that we have opposed vigorously.

When the vote on this clause takes place, I have no doubt that the majority over there will put through this particular provision. Eventually we will wind up with another general statement which allows a great deal of discretionary power and then places that power in the government's hand in the form of regulation. We have dealt with this matter in many bills, whether it was the one my hon. friend brought forward concerning the Bank Act or other legislation. It is not an acceptable procedure in this clause; it is a portrait of arrogance. Literally the government does not know how to compromise or work co-operatively within the parliamentary framework.

We might be dealing strictly with a clause on alcoholic beverages such as beer, wine and spirits, but really what we are talking about, in a rather frank and direct form, is regressive taxation. This is the favourite of the government. Rather than trying to raise funds or revenue in an equitable and fair manner and basically dealing with a progressive taxation system, over the years the government has loaded the burden of taxation on those who can least afford to pay. There is no doubt about the track record of the government. It has displayed a continual moving away from a progressive and fair system of taxation where the raising of government revenue moves out of the corporate sector and into the personal sector. Then in the personal sector it moves down the income scale. Essentially, the rich get richer and the poor face more taxes. Now they are facing an indexed regressive taxation. It is amazing—rule by regulation, continued arrogance, lack of co-operation, and now more and more regressive tax where the burden is loaded on those who can least afford it.

May I call it ten o'clock?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

DEPARTMENT OF EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION
(A) PROMOTION OF OFFICERS SERVING AT AIRPORTS
(B) DIFFERENCE IN TREATMENT OF SENIOR OFFICERS

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Mr. Speaker, recently the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) introduced a new policy on the basis of a so-called study by which he promoted immigration officers at four international airports from the PM-1 level to the PM-2 level. Those officers now working at Vancouver International Airport, Calgary, Dorval or, of all places, at Mirabel, are automatically working at the PM-2 level without ever having competed for a PM-2 level job.

As a result of a question I asked the minister, I found out that he is still not aware of the whole range of discrimination he has brought about by this change in policy. I questioned the minister in committee about the range of discrimination which he has introduced.

I would like to enumerate a few of the situations which have been brought about by this new policy. New casual employees, that is, those employees who come on staff as summer workers at these airports, immediately begin work at the PM-2 level, while senior officers working at inland ports remain at the PM-1 level just because they happen to be at inland ports. Part-time workers are started at the PM-2 level while full-time, experienced officers remain at the PM-1 level.

As a result of this policy, it is impossible to make a lateral transfer from an inland port to one of the airports I have mentioned, since transferring from a PM-1 to a PM-2 position would be involved, and the minister told me himself that one would have to compete for that kind of promotion. New recruits who come out of training programs and on to the staff at these airports as full-time employees in the immigration service are immediately senior to the seasoned employees who work at inland ports. The minister says that is all right since one has to compete for these positions. As the minister has said, one must compete for PM-2 positions unless you work at one of these aforementioned airports. Presumably, he is saying that geography is now more important than skill, experience or competition, as long as you are geographically located in the right place and you happen to choose an international airport when you go into the service, rather than an inland port. An officer at an inland port must be a specialist in many kinds of immigration problems, as a PM-1 officer. Meanwhile, the PM-2 officer at one of the airports I have mentioned specializes in only one or two areas, but he becomes a senior officer and automatically receives a higher level of pay.

When it comes to student visas, the PM-2 officer at the airport must only stamp the student's visa, which only takes a few minutes. This is because students who come into the country by way of airplane have had their visas processed by officers in a foreign immigration office who do all the work for the PM-2 officers at the airport. Meanwhile, the PM-1 officer at the inland port must do all the work to introduce a student into the country. He must handle all spontaneous applications for landing a new immigrant, those who come up to the border crossing and say that they have relatives whom they are bringing into the country or that he or she has married an alien and wishes to bring that person into the country. The PM-1 officer must do all the paperwork involved in this type of situation, which is about a four-hour job. The PM-2 officer, the senior officer, even though he is junior to the PM-1 officer at the inland port, gets only a few of these cases, thus avoiding all the paperwork. The skills activity evaluation that the so-called study group did gave this four-hour job four points on the activity scale.

In April, officials rewrote the job descriptions of the officers at Vancouver International Airport, making them counsellors. The same month they wrote a letter saying that these officers will not be doing any counselling because they happened to be PM-2 officers.

In his answer to me as reported in Hansard at page 10012, the minister said that these evaluations "were achieved in very close co-operation with the workers themselves." Mr. Speaker, I suspect the shadows of the evaluators passed by some of these employees, because they never saw them. It is strange that the border passing point at Douglas dropped from number four in activity to number 14 on this new scale of evaluation. How it got ten points below that mausoleum known as Mirabel is beyond me. Douglas, and Pacific Highway processed a total of 258,497 secondary examinations in one year. These officers are PM-1s. I have three questions to pose to the parliamentary secretary tonight, Mr. Speaker.

First, will a PM-2 be transferred from the Vancouver International Airport to an inland centre as a PM-2?

Second, will or can a PM-1 be transferred to be reclassified to a PM-2 position, and what will happen? Does the officer remain a PM-1?

Third, in order for an inland border PM-1 to transfer into a PM-2 office position, must he compete for a position that was granted to a possibly junior employee and, furthermore, be insulted in the process?

[Translation]

Mr. Dennis Dawson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question put by the hon. member, especially since last week, when the Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration scrutinized the estimates of the Department of Employment and Immigration, the minister had an opportunity to reply to the hon. member. Understandably, to the hon. member this matter is of tremendous importance, especially since it involves his constituency. But he must also understand that the decision to classify positions at five large Canadian airports, namely Dorval, Mirabel—to which the hon. member referred—Toronto, Calgary and Vancouver, all major ports of entry into Canada, is based on a comparison of examiner workloads involving specific criteria, according to a formula under which are measured the work diversity, complexity and hazards inherent to errors at each point of entry into Canada. As explained by the minister, the formula was developed in total objectivity and with the full co-operation of labour leaders. It is normal in my view that within a department such as ours, studies be undertaken, in co-operation with public servants concerned, in order to determine whether it is possible to arrive at objective criteria to avoid discrimination between the major and problem ports of entry across Canada.

Clearly, when Mirabel is compared to certain border points of entry into Canada, it is realized that conditions there are much more complex. There is no question there of immigrants or visitors from the United States, but complex cases from abroad. The Treasury Board has approved the formula, which meets current criteria in the classification standards for groups PM, PM-1, PM-2 and PM-3, as well as classification principles in force in the Public Service. A review of conditions in all points of entry will be made in April 1982, two years after the implementation of the new formula. Certainly, the Department will consider representations such as those made by the hon. member. The situation is very well understood, and everything will be done to ensure that there is no discrimination against people, whether from his constituency, from an airport, or from a port of entry into Canada where problems may be somewhat easier to solve.

NATIONAL CAPITAL—DELAY RESPECTING RIDEAU CENTRE DEVELOPMENT PROJECT

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, on March 5, I directed a question to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove) concerning the long awaited and much needed Rideau Centre development in my riding. My question had been prompted by press reports to the effect that the Rideau Centre development had been put off once more because of legal and administrative problems. The Rideau Centre has been the subject of several interventions in the House by myself of course, as this is my riding. I must say that this development has received the almost unanimous support of hon. members from both sides of the House, Liberal as well as Progressive Conservative, in the national capital area, at least on the Ontario side.

Hon. members have often heard me deal with this subject over the past eight or nine years. The least people can say about the Rideau Centre is that it remains an audacious, original and extremely complex project which seeks to revive an important part of the very core of our national capital. The idea to develop federal lands, in co-operation with the private sector, has progressed considerably over the past eight or nine years. The Rideau Centre project was introduced at the initiative of the National Capital Commission and approved by cabinet in July 1973. Therefore, it is nothing new. Over the years, all levels of government have been consulted and involved, and have co-operated with citizens' groups and representatives of the industry in the study and preparation of the general plans for the development of the Rideau Centre. There was no lack of publicity about the project, especially when they had to cope with difficult problems and it appeared to be in danger. Indeed that is what prompted me to ask the minister the question on March 5, because certain media were saying that the project was again in the throes of death. The problems have been numerous. All groups at all levels had to be conciliatory. There were intensive consultations on the ways and means to carry out this very important project the purpose of which is to revitalize a very fashionable neighbourhood of Ottawa which is in my riding of Ottawa-Vanier.

In fact, the aim of all those who support the Rideau Centre project is to reverse the North American trend of letting city cores decay or even die. Everyone involved in this project has worked toward a general design, making the downtown area stimulating and prosperous. For this to happen, it must be a people's place, a place people can call home, living and working here in peace and security. The city core as an attractive and vibrant spot should be a magnet for visitors.

Statistics published in 1971 convinced the federal government it had a duty to help transform downtown Ottawa. In 1961, the central business area of Ottawa accounted for 65 per cent of total department stores sales in the national capital region. Ten years later, this figure had shrunk to 31 per cent, and by 1976 the latest statistics we have, the figure was 22 per cent. This decline in spite of increasing revenues, salaries and population in the region demonstrated to us, at least, that downtown Ottawa was dying.

During times of economic difficulties as we are experiencing at present, it is not easy to mount a scheme costing hundreds of millions of dollars and create several thousands jobs. The Rideau Centre itself will create 2,000 or 3,000 jobs on site and off the site. It will stimulate the economy of Ottawa and the region. As well, it will provide an attractive, stable and yet lively milieu.

In a way, the Rideau Centre began with the renovation of the historical section, Sussex Drive and the Byward market. In this zone, new shops and apartments are already occupied. Restored old buildings have been put to modern use, several restaurants and boutiques are prospering, and I am convinced that the Rideau Centre will bring new economic and social life to the district. The Rideau Centre project offers possibilities for employment diversification. For example, it will create further employment opportunities in the tourist industry. The construction of a congress centre will attract various groups and associations throughout North America and hopefully Europe, for meetings and conventions here in Ottawa. Tourism provides spin-offs in many areas, other than those directly related to hotels, restaurants and transportation. Retail and wholesale trade and other commercial and business services benefit from tourism.

I anticipate something constructive happening with this project. I want to thank all members who have assisted and supported this project, but special mention must be made of the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) for his constant support. I think he joins with many of us in hoping that this project will come to a successful conclusion and that it will alleviate the economic and other difficulties we have in the national capital at this time.

● (2215)

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I think I ought to point out that, from an economic standpoint, the construction of the Rideau Centre will create several thousand permanent jobs. The Centre will bring in several million dollars annually in taxes and property taxes at all levels of government. It is a challenging project, but not easy to carry out. I know that the Minister of Public Works and all his colleagues who held that portfolio before him have worked very hard to see this project through. I also know that for over a year now legal complexities have often jeopardized the success of this project and I was told that the minister has worked unremittingly in attempting to find a satisfactory solution. Therefore I would like to hear the minister bring us up to date on the situation of the project and perhaps pass along encouraging and interesting news.

[English]

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to reply to the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) that after seven years of hard planning and negotiations, the signing of the documents will take place tomorrow, thus permitting the Rideau Centre project to proceed.

As the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier has said, the centre is a large real estate complex to be developed largely on Crown lands. This 14-acre site within view of Parliament will become the nucleus of a much larger plan involving major improvements to municipal infrastructure services, vehicular, public transit and pedestrian systems, not to mention several private sector commercial developments in the Rideau area. In this instance the Crown has sold its lands to the private sector and has retained certain air rights over the project. The Crown has the right to repurchase its lands with all of the buildings for $1 in 52 years.

Our objective was to revitalize the eastern core of the nation's capital, to create permanent employment and to work for the construction industry in addition to promoting the use of idle federal lands. In addition to the hotel complex described by the member and in addition to the 650,000 square feet of retail space, which includes the Eaton department store and the Congress Centre, there will be 1,500 parking spaces, a transit mall and pedestrian walkways.

The project will create approximately 2,000 person-years of construction work on the federal lands between 1981 and 1983 and another 1,000 person-years work for the construction industry in general for this region as a spin-off in the support industry. This project will create permanent employment for approximately 1,500 people.

The federal participation is $19 million from public works and $11 milion from the National Capital Commission. The private sector and other levels of government will contribute over $173 million to the project.

I would like to acknowledge the very significant role of the chairman of the National Capital Commission, the Hon. Bud Drury, former minister of public works, in the project and the support of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) and the hon. member who has asked the question. As well, credit is due my officials in the Public Works and other ministries who have demonstrated resourcefulness in bringing this project to fruition.

In summary, the Rideau Centre will be an attraction and a boon, not only for the residents of the national capital region but for all residents of Canada and abroad who visit our national capital. Most important, construction begins on Monday.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Adjournment Debate

EMPLOYMENT
(A) TRAINING AGREEMENTS WITH INDUSTRIAL ASSOCIATIONS
(B) NEED FOR CO-OPERATION WITH LABOUR UNIONS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, in the early part of May, the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) announced agreement with the coal mining, shipbuilding and aerospace industries for co-operative programs to train skilled workers in order to meet the shortages in those industries. The press briefings which were provided with the announcement said that these are "endeavours by industry, labour and government" to meet the needs of the industry for skilled workers. My question arises from the fact that I was unable to find, when the announcements were made, that there had in fact been any consultation or discussion with the unions representing the workers concerned. All of these industries are industries in which virtually all the production employees are organized and belong to unions. The government has repeatedly indicated it wants the co-operation of business and labour.

● (2220)

We have had intensive studies by joint government, industry and labour committees of a series of individual important industries in Canada. We have had a major study done by labour and management committees into the needs to meet the financial and human needs for the megaprojects we expect to see in the next two generations.

Yet when it comes down to the actual planning, the department by design or by omission completely ignored the unions which represent the workers now in the industry.

Let me quote for a moment a couple of clauses from the agreement with the coal association. I quote as follows from the general agreement:

> That employment and career opportunities created will be made available, firstly, to employees of the respective member companies in which the opportunities are created, and secondly, to Canadian citizens or other permanent residents;

If you are going to make opportunities available for skills or upgrading of employees now working in the companies which are organized by unions, this cannot be done without consultation with the unions which represent the workers. I say that not to have brought the unions in right from the beginning was an error of major proportions.

There is a clause which states:

> That Affirmative Action/Special Measures will actively be promoted among participating member companies, whenever possible.

Again, that certainly cannot work in a friendly co-operative spirit without the co-operation of the unions. That was not done and to my knowledge it has not been done until now.

I asked the minister a second question having to do with an earlier announcement last January that there would be a $350 million industrial training program for hard-hit areas which included Windsor, Sept-Isles and Sydney, Nova Scotia. Again, when that program was announced, in checking with unions I found they had not been consulted. That was last January. When I raised the question on May 20 I was told by the minister that whatever had happened in the past, the community committee in Windsor where the auto workers are so vitally involved was working.

Just in the last day or so I spoke with the representative of the auto workers' union in Windsor, and I can tell the parliamentary secretary to the minister that he is completely dissatisfied with the role which the union is being permitted to fill. Today I received a report from a senior member of the steelworkers' union of the national office in connection with the two other cities involved in that industrial adjustment program. He reported that in Sept-Isles there was some talk about a committee being set up and a chairman appointed, that there might be involvement with the union but that so far there has been no action. In Sydney, he says, there is no news. Some initial announcement was made, but there was no real follow-up, and the little information they received was considered "a bunch of junk".

I say that this program is doomed to failure unless the government is seriously committed to doing what it has always said, and that is to encourage and to require the full co-operation of unions, not after the plans are made and not after the contracts are signed, sealed and delivered, but right from the beginning when the idea is conceived and when the government department begins to consult with the industry. Just at the same time the government must begin to consult with the union. Otherwise the programs are doomed to failure.

Mr. Dennis Dawson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I hope you understand that we are in complete disagreement with the hon. member because, as Your Honour knows, and as has been stated in the House by the minister, officials of the labour organizations were immediately contacted concerning—I will start with the second case—the cases to which the hon. member referred regarding Sydney, Sept-Iles and Windsor. The officials were contacted right after the March 16 announcement designating Port-Cartier-Sept-Iles, Tracey-Sorel, Sydney and Windsor for special adjustment assistance.

More specifically, for the community of Port-Cartier-Sept-Îles—

[Translation]

With respect to Port-Cartier and Sept-Îles, Mr. Speaker, I can assure you that the Canadian Paperworkers International Union, local 1125, the Fédération des travailleurs du Québec, local 8399 and the United Steelworkers of America were all consulted on their involvement in the community adjustment aid committee for Port-Cartier and Sept-Îles.

[English]

In Sydney, Nova Scotia, the Cape Breton Labour Council and the United Steelworkers of America were contacted concerning their participation on a community adjustment committee for that community. The Confédération des Syndicats Nationaux, La Fédération de Travailleurs de Québec and United Steelworkers of America were contacted in relation to their participation in the projects for Tracey-Sorel.

In Windsor, consultations were with the Windsor and District Labour Council, the Canadian Council of United Auto Workers and the Essex and Kent County Building and Construction Trades Council, which are members of the community adjustment committee for that community.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the minister said to this House on May 20, 1981, in answer to a question from the hon. member for Winnipeg-North (Mr. Orlikow) that the conclusion of agreements with the aeronautical industry and the coal mining and other mining companies regarding manpower planning is one of the most important initiatives ever taken by this government for efficient human resources planning in order to fullfil the need for skilled manpower in some industrial sectors.

Both management and labour unions, contrary to what the hon. member said, actively participated in the negotiation process through the two members of the Employment and Immigration Commission, one acting on behalf of the unions, the other on behalf of industry.

I should like to point out, however, that manpower planning is usually the responsibility of management, and that those agreements are intended solely to serve as a general framework within which government and industry can co-operate. The provisions for training are meant to give the companies involved information on the training programs offered by the commission. Specific manpower planning and training programs will be implemented by each company and in every case, as in the past, Mr. Speaker, both unions and employers will be consulted. I believe this refutes easily the allegations of the hon. member. I am sure those programs will be implemented without delay: we can then find out whether or not the communities involved were consulted.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

FINANCIAL HELP TO MEET ENERGY PRICE INCREASES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that senior citizens and other pensioners are the hardest hit by the dishonest campaign promises of the Liberal government and its 12 oil price increases in 15 months, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie):

That this House provide pensioners with financial help that will protect them from all the Liberal tax increases that exceed 18 cents a gallon for gasoline and home heating fuel; reimbursement of 40 cents a gallon today but probably $4 tomorrow.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADIAN UNIVERSITY SERVICE OVERSEAS

TWENTIETH ANNIVERSARY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, on June 6, 1961, representatives of 21 Canadian universities and 22 non-profit organizations and churches met to found CUSO. Since then 8,000 Canadians, of all ages, have worked in developing countries, passing on skills and gaining insight from their years abroad. Today 611 volunteers serve in Africa, Asia, Latin American, the Caribbean and South Pacific. On this twentieth anniversary occasion, I move, seconded by the hon. members for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine East (Mr. Allmand) and Saskatoon East (Mr. Ogle):

That this House recognizes that CUSO represents a high profile and important Canadian presence overseas, and that this House encourages Canadians to continue their financial and moral support for this important instrument for peace and international understanding.

Madam Speaker: I am sure the House will want to express those sentiments by its applause.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

LOCATION OF NUCLEAR CONTAMINATED SOIL NEAR BANCROFT, ONT.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings-Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas Madawaska Mines has withdrawn its consent to locate radioactive soil from Scarborough on its property in Faraday township near Bancroft, and whereas this decision was recently telexed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde), the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove) and the Atomic Energy Control Board, and whereas there is substantial local opposition from governments and citizens to this proposed relocation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bruce-Grey (Mr. Gurbin):

That the Government of Canada direct the Atomic Energy Control Board to withdraw its plans to locate the contaminated soil at the Madawaska mines site near Bancroft, and further direct the AECB to conduct full and complete consultations with all elected representatives and citizens to ensure that the best interests of the residents concerned are fully considered so that matters dealing with industrial waste relocation will be taken into account in the future.

FUNDS FOR FARM CREDIT CORPORATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of pressing and urgent necessity. Given that the two opposition day debates this week have been on the crisis in Canadian agriculture, given that yesterday the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) was urged by 700 farmers in Toronto to drop high interest rate policies which are bankrupting Canadian agriculture, and given that next week there will be a cattle producer strike in Saskatchewan because of a specific lack of government action on grain embargo compensation and herd program maintenance, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon East (Mr. Ogle):

That this House immediately and unanimously urge the government to make $200 million available to the Farm Credit Corporation for a program of short, medium and long-term loans which would also include funds for operating costs to help meet this crisis on Canadian farms.

RETROACTIVITY OF PAY SETTLEMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the RCMP were promised pay increases commensurate with their duties and responsibilities, and that they would be effective January 1, 1981, and are sorely disappointed with the amount of the increases announced and the effective date of April 1; and whereas it is essential that the RCMP be properly compensated for their work in order to cope with the heavy security needs of this country, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That this House urges the cabinet to review the decision by the Treasury Board, with the objective of providing more reasonable increases and making the effective date of same January 1, 1981.

MIRABEL—REQUEST THAT EXPROPRIATED LAND BE RESOLD—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt Saanich): Madam Speaker, under Standing Order 43 I seek the unanimous consent of this House to introduce a motion on an urgent matter.

Twelve years ago thousands of acres of land were indiscriminately expropriated to allow for the construction of Mirabel airport. In view of the fact that admittedly too much land was expropriated, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour):

That the House urge the minister in charge to speed up the land resale process in order to make amends to those people who occupied and still occupy that land.

PROFITS OF CHARTERED BANKS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that this House notes that the chartered banks' profits for the second quarter of 1981 were only 49 per cent higher than the second quarter of 1980, and that this 49 per cent increase was slightly lower than their profits for the first quarter of 1981, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo):

APPOINTEE TO DUBIN REPORT ADVISORY BOARD—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. There is overwhelming opposition to the appointment of Walter McLeish to the advisory board on the Dubin report. All air industry associations and their respective unions have opposed this move. In fact the president of the Canadian Air Traffic Control Association has publicly stated in the transport committee, and I quote:

I had a very unpleasant experience with Mr. McLeish in October of last year, and until such time as that is resolved, I feel I can no longer accept Mr. McLeish's word on anything.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall):

That this House instruct the Minister of Transport to remove Mr. McLeish from his position so that the advisory board on the Dubin report can function without prejudice and without conflict of interest.

OUTCOME OF SALARY NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Solicitor General. It has to do with the scandalous treatment by the Treasury Board and the government of the salary question with respect to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Yesterday the minister said that the RCMP has never failed to serve the Canadian people. Given that statement, with which the House is in general agreement, does the minister not feel it is important that the RCMP be treated appropriately with respect to salaries? Given the assumption, which was in the hearts and minds even of the negotiators for the government with respect to salaries, that the increase would be effective from January 1, 1981, what does the Solicitor General intend to do to right the scandalous settlement with this group, which the minister has described as one which has never failed to serve the Canadian people?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I do not accept the characterization of this pay increase as scandalous. It is a pay increase of 12.2 per cent plus certain other benefits, such as the achievement of full pay after 36 months for new recruits instead of after 48 months, and such as double time instead of time and a half for overtime service by members of the force on days of rest. A number of components are welcomed by the force.

The increase does not go back to January 1, and I am having discussions with the Treasury Board on that aspect of the package. However, to characterize the increase as small is totally unfair to the Treasury Board because, if we look at other pay increases the Treasury Board has accorded in the last several months, we find that this is right in line. If we compare how the police are doing with how the average Canadian is doing—and I do not think that is an invalid comparison—members of the police profession have been moving ahead, and are continuing to move ahead.

As I say, we are looking again at the three-month period, at exactly what did happen and at what undertakings were given in the past. I think members of the force themselves would have to acknowledge the facts I have indicated respecting this pay increase in relation to other pay increases. It is not bad. No one gets everything he wants from his employer, or from the Treasury Board when it is a public service matter, but if we look at this in relation to what is being done, it cannot be rejected as being scandalous.

REVIEW OF TREASURY BOARD DECISION

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, the minister must be aware that there was an expectation—and he has almost acknowledged that there was an expectation—during the period of negotiations that the period under the new schedule would begin on January 1, 1981. What has happened is that there is a 12 per cent increase for a 15-month period rather than a 12 per cent increase for a 12-month period, which in effect is a reduction of what was negotiated and what was expected.

Will the minister give an undertaking to the House that he will use the procedures which are open to him, the cabinet and the Treasury Board, to effect a review of that decision by the Treasury Board, so that what is regarded generally in the force as a slap in the face, despite what the Solicitor General said, will be rectified and the matter will be put right, and so that the minister and the government will be able to live up to what the minister himself said when he characterized the Royal Canadian Mounted Police as a group which has never failed to serve the Canadian people? If that is the case, and if that is the view of the government, then the RCMP ought to be treated as such. I ask for that undertaking from the Solicitor General.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I am happy to give that undertaking because, as I indicated in my first answer, that is in fact going on. However, I want to point out to the House that the Treasury Board looks at this as money. This is taxpayers' money, and if this pay increase is to go back for three additional months, from the point of view of Treasury Board and within their terms of reference, it will affect the amount of the increase in percentage terms. If the hon. member understands that, then he understands the basis on which this review is taking place.

DATE OF IMPLEMENTATION

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): The hon. member understands quite well the basis of the review. The Solicitor General has undertaken to see if there will be a review, but the approach he has taken indicates there will be really no review at all, that they are just going to play around with the dates.

My question to the Solicitor General is simply this: will he ensure that in the course of that review there will be put to the Treasury Board, the undertaking that the salary negotiations would date back to January 1, which everyone understood and took for granted? Will that in fact take place, because that is not what the Solicitor General talked about just a few minutes ago?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I repeat that we are looking again at that three-month period. However, if that three-month period is treated as the hon. member suggests, it is a great deal more money, and the Treasury Board looks at money from the point of view of the taxpayers and also from the point of view of other settlements it is making.

We want to be fair to the RCMP, but we want to be fair in relation to all of the other pays set by the Treasury Board, and to the burden on the taxpayers. These are all considerations before us.

The RCMP have a point about making their year a calendar one, but if it is, they will be just about the only one out of 370 pays set by Treasury Board that operate on the calendar year instead of the fiscal year, which is the normal operating period of the government. These considerations are all there, but basically we are talking about taxpayers' money—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): And fairness.

Mr. Kaplan: —and I would remind the House that police officers, the RCMP in particular, have been doing better than the average Canadian over the last 15 years, for example, and that is also a consideration.

CORPORATE AFFAIRS

POSITION OF CANADIAN URANIUM COMPANIES

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice, who will know that with respect to the uranium cartel certain inquiries were made by the Moss subcommittee in the United States, during which a Gulf memorandum was filed as an exhibit in which the scheme of the cartel was outlined. The memorandum stated in part that:

> —an opinion will be rendered by the Minister of Justice of Canada which will prevent any action being taken under Canada law against participants in the agreement—meaning the cartel:

> —at least as long as the present government is in power.

Will the minister confirm that there were promises made to Canadian members of the cartel that there would be no prosecution under Canadian law and, in the absence of making public the Bertrand report with respect to the inquiry, how can Canadians be assured that justice will appear to be done as well as actually being done?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I am not aware of any such promises made to anybody. I have received a report from the director of combines investigation and I am studying it at this time. If there is enough evidence to prosecute, I will face my responsibility as Attorney General of Canada and initiate prosecution. I have done it in the case of the newspapers a few weeks ago and there was—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: No, it is my duty to look at the nature of the report and see if there is cause to prosecute companies or individuals, and to proceed if I am satisfied as Attorney General of Canada that there is sufficient evidence to warrant prosecution. I just said that I have done it in the case of the newspapers a few weeks ago, and I am studying this one. It is a very voluminous piece of work involving 75,000 documents; there is the evidence to look into, and the report which I am studying at this time, and in due course as Attorney General of Canada I will face my responsibilities.

PUBLICATION OF REPORT

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Attorney General. In the event that no charges are laid with respect to the uranium cartel on the basis of the report, is there any law which would prevent the Government of Canada from making public the details of this sort of mess?

● (1125)

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, when the Attorney General of Canada receives a report from the Director of Investigation and Research, he must, after due consideration, decide whether or not to prosecute. If he does, then the report is naturally made public before the courts. If, on the other hand, he decides not to prosecute, then the report stays as is. The Director of Investigation and Research can comment on the Attorney General's action in his annual report or he can pursue the investigation if he wants to. However, the report I have received remains a privileged document between the director and the Attorney General, pursuant to the Combines Investigation Act. I know of no other precedent where a report was made public other than through a court proceeding and never was a report made public when the Attorney General ruled against prosecuting the companies or the individuals involved.

THE ECONOMY

MEASURES TO MAINTAIN EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance. The figures released today by Statistics Canada show that unemployment hits hardest those who are, in a sense, in the front line of the government's interest rate policies, such as construction workers, where employment is down by 6,000, and agriculture, where employment is down by 2,000, to name just two industries.

Will the minister not now repudiate the view of Governor Bouey of the Bank of Canada that labour markets are tight? Will he not now take measures which will change the policy before interest rates start eating away further at employment?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I draw to the attention of the hon. member that although seasonally adjusted unemployment is up slightly from last month, which was the best employment record in five years, there is another figure which he or his party draws to our attention occasionally, namely, the actual count of unemployment. The number of unemployed decreased from April to May by 32,000.

These are important facts the hon. member ought to bear in mind, plus the fact that in the last year the number of jobs created in Canada has been the best of any industrialized country in the world. It seems to me that these facts do not encourage anyone to take the action which the hon. member recommends.

Mr. McGrath: Tell that to the million unemployed.

STATISTICS OF UNEMPLOYED

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, in the "Allan in Wonderland" world in which the minister inevitably lives, he has managed not only to readjust the employment rate seasonally, but in the case of the construction industry, he has managed to adjust the seasons. We are now heading into the winter downturn of the construction industry, which is quite an achievement for the minister.

The minister asked us to look at the real figures. One spokesman for Statistics Canada was quoted this week as saying that if an interviewee were asked the question whether or not he or she had worked during the week, and that person had worked for one hour during the week, the person would be classified as employed for the purposes of the statistics.

Does the minister not think it is time that the Statistics Canada survey indicates what are the real levels of employment, underemployment, and enforced idleness in the economy? We know that in addition to the over 800,000 people who are listed in the figures, there are another approximate 500,000 who have been either laid off or lost jobs and are discouraged from seeking further work. If the minister wants to talk about the real figures, does he not think a more realistic figure, or one that could be provided in the Statistics Canada survey itself, would be 1.35 million unemployed, rather than the 845,000 unemployed figure which the government released today?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I do not agree at all with the private statistical service which the NDP usually provides to us, when economic indicators are rather strong, in order to distort the economic picture in Canada.

Mr. Rae: Madam Speaker, if reliance on Statistics Canada is a private survey, then it is something in which the minister himself engages more than once a day.

● (1130)

BANKS AND BANKING

INCREASE IN PROFITS OF CHARTERED BANKS—INCREASED CHARGES TO FARMERS AND SMALL BUSINESSMEN

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): In light of the fact that the profit figures for the chartered banks today indicated a substantial increase, up 49 per cent—an increase which follows a 27 per cent rise for all chartered banks for the period between 1979-80—and since tax rates for the chartered banks are still at 20 per cent, will the minister now reconsider his government's rejection of a policy which would require the chartered banks to set aside a fixed portion of their financial portfolios for mortgage loans, loans to farmers and small businessmen, at rates which bear some relation to their costs, and the borrowers' ability to pay, so that we can stop this policy of driving people to the wall and forcing idleness and real hardship on the Canadian people?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I may have misunderstood the member's first question. I thought he drew upon Statistics Canada and its information to demonstrate certain employment trends in the construction industry. Then in his next question he said that we should disregard Statistics Canada—

Mr. Rae: That is not what I said.

Mr. MacEachen: —upon which he relied in his earlier question, because it is not reliable.

Mr. Rae: That is just misleading.

Mr. MacEachen: Maybe the hon. member would clarify his own thinking before he puts questions to me on the orders of the day.

CORPORATE AFFAIRS

INVESTIGATION OF URANIUM INDUSTRY—ACCESS TO CABINET DOCUMENTS

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. It touches upon the question I raised with the Prime Minister yesterday, to the effect that if the Prime Minister, and now the minister, could assure the House that all information, including all cabinet documents, such as minutes and memoranda, were shown to the director of investigation under the Combines Act and, if they were not, why were they not. I ask this question because it was rather startling to hear the Prime Minister say yesterday that he did not know of any documentation not having been shown to the director, since it is our understanding that it was the Prime Minister who carefully stashed these documents away so that the director could not see them.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I regret having to tell the hon. member that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs does not get involved in the investigations conducted by the director of combines investigation. It would be improper for the minister to interfere in the work of the director. Therefore, I cannot answer that question. I have no information whatsoever on the documents which the director may or may not have studied. The mandate of the director is to make his investigation and I take it for granted that he did a good job.

[English]

LAYING OF CHARGES

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my question is again for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In light of the fact that the report, which we understood was to be made public, has now been referred to the Minister of Justice, with no guarantee that it will ever be made public, and in view of the fact that the Prime Minister stated that "In so far as any other illegalities having been entered into by anybody, producers or for that matter the government, we hope it will come out in the investigation by the combines investigation office"—would the minister indicate to the House why he feels it is fair to ask the Canadian public to accept this degree of secrecy, bearing in mind that it is like asking suspects in a group to pass judgment as to whether other members of the group should be charged with certain illegalities?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, it is obvious that the hon. member's attitude is changing as weeks go by. Only a few days ago he and the members of his party made a fuss over the departure of Mr. Robert Bertrand, the director of investigation. In their opinion, that man was highly qualified to carry those investigations through to their successful conclusion. Today, the hon. member seems to believe that Mr. Bertrand did not do his work properly. Madam Speaker, I am convinced that in the discharge of his responsibilities, the director of investigation used all his powers to conduct a successful investigation.

THE ECONOMY

REQUEST FOR CHANGES IN GOVERNMENT POLICIES

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. One of the really disturbing tragedies in Canada today is that month after month, year after year, one out of ten Canadians who wants to work cannot find a job, and the Minister of Finance would have us believe that he cares. Through you, Madam Speaker, I challenge the Minister of Finance to demonstrate that he cares. He controls financial policy, and there are two areas of public policy—

Madam Speaker: Could the hon. member please come to his question?

Mr. Hawkes: Yes, Madam Speaker, I will get to my question. I would like the minister to indicate to us whether or not he is prepared to change the National Energy Program in the direction of achieving self-sufficiency and creating more jobs, and/or is he prepared to change his high interest rate policy to provide some relief to the employment generating parts of our economy, for example, export industries, housing, and other areas which are labour-intensive? Can the minister demonstrate that he cares by changing one of those two policies?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the policies in effect in Canada cannot be all wrong, as the hon. member seems to imply, because year to year we have created 417,000 new jobs in Canada, a percentage increase of more than 3.5 per cent. That record of employment growth is the best record of any industrialized country in the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Employment growth is better than it was a year ago. Unemployment statistics are better than they were a year ago. Last month we had the best unemployment figure in five years. This must indicate that we are doing some things right.

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, as a result of that display, we can expect an advertising campaign telling Canadians that 7 per cent and 8 per cent unemployment rates are okay, just like an energy advertising campaign which tells us the world is fine.

Some hon. Members: Question.

JOB CREATION

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Will the minister answer my question? Will he provide some stimulation, either through the reduction of interest rates and/or a change in the National Energy Program, which will create jobs in this country to enable us to overcome the bad habit of accepting the fact that one in ten Canadians will be unemployed forever?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I have said to the hon. member that in the past year Canada has had the best record of any industrialized country in the world with regard to job creation. We have record participation in the labour force, a record of some 60 per cent. It seems to me that the hon. member ought to be somehow supporting the policies which have brought these rather marked developments about, rather than asking me to change policies.

Since the hon. member has raised the question of the National Energy Program, I should add that he knows that next week the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources will be meeting with his counterpart in Alberta. The intention of the meeting, of course, is to review certain aspects of the National Energy Program. We have indicated that we are prepared to make accommodations in our position provided that there are reciprocal accommodations on the other side. I believe that is a very positive approach.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

OPERATORS OF CAMERAS WITHIN PRECINCTS OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Communications in his capacity as reporting to this House for CBC. My question concerns the corporation's dispute with NABET broadcast units. Is the minister aware that the men who are operating CBC cameras in Room 130-S, first thought to be CBC supervisory personnel, are now alleged to be freelance strike breakers? If so, what does he intend to do about it?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): No, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Rose: Madam Speaker, I have never heard such an answer before. It is beautiful. Anyway, it is obvious that the minister will not do anything about it.

CONTINGENCY PLANS TO TELEVISE JULY SUMMIT CONFERENCE

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Last week Mr. Desroches of the CBC management told the Communications and Culture Committee that the CBC is preparing "contingency plans" to broadcast the OECD summit meeting in July if NABET's conflict with the management is not resolved by that date. I would like to ask whether the minister could tell us, within those contingency plans, if he knows there is an intention to use the House of Commons technicians in July at the conference centre, forcing those employees to scab.

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): No, Madam Speaker.

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

UREA FORMALDEHYDE—COMMITTEE PROGRESS

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madame le président, my question is directed to the very preoccupied Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, but there are a great many Canadians who are equally preoccupied with the controversy surrounding urea formaldehyde foam insulation. I wonder if the minister can give us a progress report on the inter-ministerial committee looking into some form of compensation or assistance to people who have installed this UFFI material in their homes.

Can the minister also tell the House whether this committee will say what happens to those people who have installed urea formaldehyde foam insulation, and who may or may not have a health problem and want to get it out of their homes, but find themselves in a legal bind because they owe it to prospective buyers to tell them that they have the stuff in their homes? Does the Government of Canada have any responsibility? Does it consider that it has any moral responsibility to those people who have the stuff in their homes and who want to get it out of their homes? Does the government have any responsibility to these many thousands of Canadians?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, obviously the hon. member asked several questions. I will try to answer briefly. First, the interdepartmental committee will get together early next week to study a series of hypotheses which the cabinet will finalize at its next meeting. Second, as to the government responsibility, I have already said, and I repeat to the House, that the government does not accept any legal responsibility in this matter over which the government is nonetheless particularly concerned. We are just as anxious to find concrete solutions as those who have to cope with this problem, and I would ask the hon. member to wait until next week when, after the cabinet meeting, the government will announce a series of appropriate measures.

REFERRAL TO PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): My supplementary question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who will be interested to know that at this very hour a group is forming in the community of St. Leonard in her own riding, one of the many groups which are concerned about urea formaldehyde foam insulation.

Once the government releases this report which the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs promises will come out next week, will the Minister of National Health and Welfare immediately refer the UFFI matter to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, or a special subcommittee, so that the whole question of compensation, the health factor, and, indeed, the procedure leading up to the ban, can be investigated by calling witnesses? Would the minister not agree that this House and the Canadian people need to know that the government has received the correct advice and made the right decisions?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): My answer is no, Madam Speaker, for the good reason that referral to a committee of the House would not be of much help to Canadians for the moment. As was indicated by my colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, we are reviewing the types of assistance that we can eventually offer upon request to people who are experiencing difficulties. In reply to his preamble, I can say that on Monday morning and Monday evening in Montreal, I did receive people from my constituency who, like people throughout St. Leonard, have unfortunately had their brick houses insulated with urea foam even though this was specifically forbidden when we certified it.

FISHERIES

INQUIRY RESPECTING COMPENSATION TO QUEBEC FISHERMEN BANNED FROM COMMERCIAL FISHING

Mr. Rémi Bujold (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Madam Speaker, my question for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans concerns the decision of the Quebec government not to re-open commercial salmon fishing on June 8, next Monday. In his statement, the Quebec minister of recreation, hunting and fishing, accused the federal Minister of Fisheries of not having taken into account the regressing stocks of breeders and not having consulted the Quebec government before making his decision. Is it true that the decision of the Canadian government will be harmful to breeding stocks? Were there consultations with the Quebec government before this decision was made, and finally, what will be the decision of the Canadian government as far as compensating those Quebec fishermen who will not be able to fish salmon commercially during the summer?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, a decision has been made. The ban on commercial salmon fishing will be lifted after nine years, with of course due consideration being given to present stocks. This fishing will necessarily be on a rather small scale, but I felt that commercial fishermen had contributed to stock conservation by abstaining completely from fishing in certain provinces including certain rivers in Quebec, for a nine-year period. In fact, the federal government had to support the cost of this ban by paying compensation for nine years. There have been consultations with Quebec authorities at the official level. A meeting was scheduled with the minister responsible, Mr. Lessard. He cancelled the meeting, for which I do not blame him as I think that he was ill. I was prepared to arrange for another meeting, but unfortunately the Quebec government held elections and consultations were not possible. As the season was about to open, a decision had to be reached so we made it. As for possible compensation, I must say that if the Quebec government decides to extend the ban, it will have to bear the costs of its decision.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

EFFECT OF INFLATION ON DEPARTMENTAL ESTIMATES

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. Defence estimates for 1981-82 show an increase of 3 per cent, according to the minister. This increase, in real terms, was based upon the inflation model of November, 1980. Now the rate of inflation is considerably higher. I wonder if the minister could tell us what he plans to do to provide the increase of 3 per cent in real terms when some of it has already disappeared due to increased inflation.

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, the hon. member should know that it is the same model, the same way of calculating, as when he was minister of national defence. The 3 per cent is taken after everything has been deducted, that is after the inflation has been calculated on this model. If the inflation is higher than previously set by this model, this extra inflation is calculated and it is paid at other times.

INCREASE IN BUDGET

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): I doubt if the minister understood the question too well by the answer he gave to that question. The DND inflation factor indicated for May of this year was 13.4 per cent, as opposed to last fall when it was 11.9 per cent. Therefore over half of his 3 per cent which he boasted so much about has disappeared. We both know that the minister does not have that kind of funds available to spring from somewhere else. Does the minister intend to inform our allies, and our forces for that matter, that our boasted 3 per cent increase is now inoperative or misspoken, or just another Liberal smoke and mirrors act?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, the hon. member should know that when we talk about 3 per cent real growth in the budget of national defence, we really mean a 3 per cent real growth, and we are not faking or anything like that. I think it was well stated by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech regarding this 3 per cent. However it is calculated, it is a real growth of 3 per cent in the defence budget.

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

FUNGICIDE CAPTAN—ENFORCEMENT OF REGULATIONS

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. She will recall that a few days ago the Minister of Agriculture tabled two letters in the House from the assistant deputy minister of health protection to the assistant deputy minister of agriculture, in which the recommendations regarding the fungicide, Captan, are as follows, very briefly: "All registrations of Captan-containing products sold for domestic use to be discontinued", and then it goes on to recommend against food being sold which has been contaminated with this fungicide. It says it should be treated first of all.

My question is to the Minister of National Health and Welfare as she has responsibility for the health of Canadians. What is the hon. minister doing to enforce these regulations which have been put in place by her officials?

• (1150)

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No regulations have been announced by my officials because we do not administer the Pest Control Products Act. That act comes under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Agriculture. Therefore I directed the letter to the Minister of Agriculture.

The hon. member forgot to mention my second letter which is key to the matter in that it explains the procedure used by the Minister of Agriculture in setting up a committee to look into implementing my recommendation.

Because the word "domestic" might have led to some confusion, a correction was made in a second letter written by my officials replacing the word domestic with the word dwellings.

I am telling Canadians that our recommendation to the Minister of Agriculture is that people should not use Captan in their city gardens. As for crops grown in vast open spaces and sprayed by technicians who know how to handle this fungicide, that is a different matter.

VERIFICATION OF UNCONTAMINATED FOOD

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, the minister is quite correct in that she does not administer the Pest Control Act, but she does have responsibility for the health protection of Canadians.

One of the recommendations contained in Dr. Morrison's letter to Agriculture Canada reads as follows:

> All registrations of products containing Captan for use on foods or food crops require that foods sold at the retail level be free of Captan residues as determined by the official method.

What steps is the minister taking, given her responsibility to protect the health of Canadians, to see that food sold at the retail level is free from all residues of the fungicide Captan which, as she knows, can cause foetal abortions, cancer, and deformities, according to the scientific evidence?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, this has nothing to do with regulations. It has to do with the usual monitoring carried out by the health inspectors of my department, which is a continuing procedure.

We have decided that the best way, which is our recommendation, to control the eventual danger of Captan on commercial crops, as well as imported produce, is to continue our random sample analysis of produce in supermarkets and grocery stores across the country and to check the level of Captan residue when the level is low enough, which is the case now. However, we will continue to permit this produce to be sold everywhere, which we think is the best way to control the Captan used. At any rate, there are three items more vulnerable to retaining Captan residue. These are raspberries, grapes, and another one the name of which escapes me at the moment, that are presently being studied by Agriculture Canada.

AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

VOLUNTARY RESTRAINTS BY JAPAN ON AUTOMOBILE EXPORTS TO CANADA

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The number of Japanese vehicles imported into Canada in 1979 was 61,400, as a result of which the Japanese enjoyed 8.7 per cent of the total Canadian market. In 1980 the number of Japanese vehicles imported into Canada was 150,000, give or take a couple of thousand, which was 21.5 per cent of the Canadian market. In 1981 the number of Japanese vehicles imported will be in the order of 174,000. According to my calculations that is about 28 per cent of the Canadian market. Why has the minister made such joyous statements about this 20 per cent increase in the Japanese intrusion in our market?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, I think my hon. friend should do his calculations again. We think that the level of 174,000 vehicles from Japan for the period April 1, 1981, to April 1, 1982, would represent some 16.5 per cent of the Canadian market, which is roughly equivalent to the level of imports in the preceding 12 months.

The level of 8 per cent in 1979 was an aberration from traditional levels, being less than half of what it was in the preceding year.

The important thing is that the Japanese authorities have decided themselves to take action on a unilateral and voluntary basis to restrain exports to Canada, responding to Canadian concerns about the diversion of cars from the United States as a result of the Japanese actions concerning the United States. This action by Japan represents a substantial rollback from the number in the preceding 12 months of 185,000 units. Therefore, we have dealt with the concerns of diversion, as well as having given an important breathing space to the Canadian industry to complete its restructuring in the interests of the industry and its workers.

RATIO OF MARKET TAKEN BY IMPORTS

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, surely the minister understands that the reason the Japanese achieved a very high level in the 1980-1981 calculation was because they imported into Canada far more vehicles than they anticipated they could sell, in order to gain a bargaining position.

How can the minister claim that 174,000 vehicles in 1981 represents something in the order of 16 per cent of the market that we are talking about? I might add that 150,000 vehicles in 1980 represented 22 per cent of the market.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, the most I can suggest to my hon. friend is that either we are talking about different periods, different calendar or different fiscal years, or my hon. friend should get back to his basic arithmetic studies, which is probably the best suggestion for him. First, we are talking about a level of imports into Canada from Japan for the 12 months April 1, 1980, to April 1, 1981, of approximately 185,000 units, a surge having taken place in the first few months of 1981.

Japan did respond to our concern about the risk of diversion, about the over-all level of imports and the surge of imports in the first few months of this year. What has been accomplished through our discussions has been to achieve a substantial rollback in the level of imports into Canada from Japan for the 12 months April 1, 1981, to April 1, 1982. No amount of mathematical twisting and turning by my hon. friend will change that basic fact.

THE CONSTITUTION

RIGHT TO LIFE OF UNBORN CHILDREN

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton South): My question is for the Deputy Prime Minister who is probably aware of a letter written to the Prime Minister on May 26 by the President of the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops, Archbishop MacNeil of Edmonton, a man well known to the Deputy Prime Minister. He wrote that despite assurances of the government previously being given that the proposed charter of rights would not impede the rights of the unborn, mounting evidence has shown that further interpretations of the charter could well remove all protection to the right to life of unborn children.

Does the government intend to comply with the request officially made on May 26, on behalf of the Catholic Church of Canada, asking the government to introduce an amendment to the charter, if it is approved by the Supreme Court? This request reads:

—which would guarantee that the charter would not prejudicially affect the rights of the unborn.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I must tell the hon. member that I am not aware of the letter of May 26. I have had correspondence with Archbishop MacNeil and I have discussed these questions with him.

I am not aware of that letter and I would like to have a look at it and base a reply later on an examination of the letter.

REQUEST FOR AMENDMENT

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton South): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Justice. Does he intend to take note of this official statement on behalf of the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops of May 26? Will the Minister of Justice reconsider what is being said by increasing numbers of legal experts as well as religious authorities, that the proposed charter of rights will indeed open up a possibility of an interpretation which will impede the rights of the unborn? Will the Minister of Justice bring in an amendment that will guarantee that the charter is not intended to affect prejudicially the rights of the unborn?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, that question was debated at length in committee.

We stated very clearly, according to the legal advice received, that the charter of rights was absolutely neutral in terms of the unborn, and that the question of abortion was to remain the responsibility of the House of Commons and the Senate. I have no reason to change my mind about it. The decision has been made. Of course, sometimes these things are subject to controversy. Even if I wanted to have an amendment made to the charter, it is not possible because the agreement of the House is to call for a vote after two days of debate, with no possibility whatever of any amendments.

AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

JAPANESE AUTOMOBILE IMPORTS

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Last evening the minister announced a 6 per cent reduction in the number of Japanese motor vehicles that will be imported into Canada in the period April 1, 1981, to April 1, 1982. Will the minister advise whether included in that number of Japanese vehicles to be imported into Canada are those to be imported by General Motors, Ford and Chrysler?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Yes, Madam Speaker, those imports are included.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

COTTAGE DEVELOPMENT AT SHOAL LAKE, MAN.

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of the Environment and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, I will direct my question to the Deputy Prime Minister. It is with regard to the question of development of cottages on Shoal Lake and the protection of Winnipeg's water supply, a water supply which serves half the population of that province. In view of the environmental assessment review which was announced on January 13, 1981, why has the government approved cottage development in that location before receiving the report of the review committee?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I regret I cannot give the hon. member the information he asks for, but I will take the question as notice.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

COMMUNICATION BY MEMBERS OF ARMED FORCES WITH PARLIAMENTARIANS—STATUS OF 420 RESERVE SQUADRON

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, I have two brief questions I would like to direct to the Minister of National Defence. One arises out of the subject matter of a question of privilege dealt with by the Speaker earlier this week. Nevertheless it is still important. It deals with the capacity of members of the armed forces to communicate with their duly elected representatives. Second, so I will not have to ask a supplementary question, will the minister touch upon the 420 ARS?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, with regard to the hon. member's first question, normally Armed Forces orders and regulations are written to protect the integrity and non-partisan attitude of the members of the Armed Forces. This provides for better discipline and order. In no way should these regulations be interpreted as preventing members of the forces from communicating with members of this House. I would like to stress that practically every week I reply to representations from members of all parties in this House who have received communications from members of the Armed Forces who have been in contact with their member of Parliament. We try to do the best we can. In any event, the orders and regulations do not prevent members of the Armed Forces from communicating with their members of Parliament.

Second, with regard to the hon. member's question about the shift of the 420 squadron from Shearwater, I can well understand his interest in this matter. We made a decision to move this reserve squadron from Shearwater. However, after receiving representations from the hon. member, the local authorities, and my friend from Halifax who sits to my right, I asked my officials to re-examine the decision and, if possible, come up with some alternatives. If there are no possible alternatives, I asked them to give me an assurance regarding the viability of the 420 squadron as a reserve squadron, because we care about the reserves.

MINES AND MINING

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL TASK FORCE REPORT ON SAFETY

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour. In view of reports that the Burkett federal-provincial task force report on mine safety is to be released today in the Ontario legislature, will the minister advise whether he will be tabling that report in this House, and advise what action he is planning to take to implement the recommendations of the report, especially as they apply to those working in federal jurisdictions, such as uranium mines?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, the Burkett commission, which was a joint commission of the federal and provincial governments into the safety of mining in the province of Ontario, completed its work in very good time. The commission has come forward with about 83 recommendations. They have done an outstanding job. I will be tabling a copy of that report in the House as soon as it is translated. I will urge the officials to have that ready as quickly as possible.

I might say that some of the recommendations deal with the question of uranium mines which are under federal jurisdiction. For example, the Burkett commission finds that the referencing of Ontario's safety and health regulations by the federal authority is a valid procedure. That matter was of concern to some people. In general, the recommendations are being studied in detail by my officials. Those that affect federal jurisdiction may be reflected in the package of amendments to the Canada Labour Code which I hope to introduce in this House in September.

PRIVILEGE

MR. McKENZIE—INCONSISTENT RULINGS OF COMMITTEE CHAIRMEN

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, my question of privilege pertains to inconsistencies with respect to rulings made by committee chairmen. It seems that what is an acceptable motion in one committee is not in another. As you, Madam Speaker, are in charge of the committee clerks, I would strongly suggest that you look into this matter and attempt to develop a system in which all clerks are consistent in the information they provide the committee chairmen.

I have been severely restricted in my desire to act as a responsible member of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs as the result of an incorrect, or at least inconsistent, ruling made by the chairman, the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Dupras).

I have two precedents for rising on this particular question of privilege, the first one being a motion in the communications and culture committee which passed and was reported to the House of Commons May 28, 1981.

The second precedent was a motion which passed and was reported to the House Friday, February 28, 1969, from the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates. I am sure Your Honour will want to look at these motions. I will not take the time to read them into the record now. The ruling by Mr. Speaker Lamoureux on a challenge to this motion occurred Monday, June 18, 1973. The Speaker upheld the prior motion. In doing that the Speaker said:

> There can be no doubt that standing committees are empowered to make reports in relation to their study of estimates. The first example of such a report was that of the fourth report of the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates made February 28, 1969, concerning the use of one-dollar items for the purpose of legislating. That report followed upon the adoption of the revised rules in December 1968.

Last Thursday I presented a motion in the veterans affairs committee with regard to a very serious problem concerning the processing of pensions. It takes one to five years to process these.

What recourse do I have because a clerk made an error in committee? This should not restrict my functioning as a member of Parliament in committees. Can this motion be made retroactive due to the seriousness of the problem caused by the clerk and chairman of that committee?

Madam Speaker: As far as I can understand the hon. member's intervention, I can state quite clearly that he does not have a question of privilege. However, he is raising an important point. I understand there were some inconsistencies in the reports of the different committees, that something was permitted by one committee and not by another, namely the one in which the hon. member was trying to have something done. I can tell the hon. member I will take measures and ask the Clerk to inform and brief the clerks of committees as to what is acceptable and what is not acceptable to be reported to the House.

That does not address itself to the particular problem which the hon. member has, but the time to seek the redress he is asking for is when there is a motion for concurrence in the House on that report. The House may deal with it at that time. I think the hon. member will get satisfaction at that time.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. BAKER (NEPEAN-CARLETON)—PARLIAMENTARY REFORM—ANNOUNCEMENT BY MR. TRUDEAU OF ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order having to do with House business. The other evening, on June 3, 1981, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made a speech at a fund-raising dinner of the Liberal party in Winnipeg, Manitoba. In the course of his speech he was dealing with the question of representation and membership in the House and he said:

> We've announced that a Parliamentary Committee will be established to study and make recommendations on how to make the Senate and the House of Commons more effective instruments for the expression of regional interests and priorities as well as an expression of the national will.

When I read that I checked the Order Paper to see if there was anything on it about this parliamentary committee. I have not been able to find anything. I am just wondering if there has been something that has come forward about this but which has not got on to the Order Paper, and what the intentions are with regard to it. Perhaps I could be enlightened in some way because it does affect the business of the House and I think it would be important to know what the situation is.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member probably has all the reason in the world to want to be enlightened, but I am afraid the Chair can do nothing for him. The hon. member knows that the Speaker cannot deal with statements made outside the House. If an announcement has been made in the House I am sure it would be reflected—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): It wasn't though.

Madam Speaker: Perhaps the announcement has not been made in the House, but had it been made I am sure it would be reflected normally. The hon. member is seeking information on a statement made outside the House. He has means of doing that during the course of Question Period or at other times. I would urge him to do it then.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 2,282 and 2,400.

[Text]

FATHERS OF CONFEDERATION BUILDING, CHARLOTTETOWN

Question No. 2,282—Mr. Herbert:

1. Which department was responsible for the construction of the Fathers of Confederation Building in Charlottetown?

2. Since the completion of the building, what amount was spent on (a) additional work (b) repair work and is any work contemplated during 1981?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): In so far as the Department of Communications is concerned, the reply to the above question is as follows:

1. None—The Fathers of Confederation Memorial Building (The Confederation Centre of the Arts) was erected in 1964 by the Fathers of Confederation Memorial Citizens' Foundation.

2. (a) Since the completion of the building the federal government has participated in repair and renovation programs in the amount of $2,025,000.

(b) The repair and renovation programme will continue during 1981.

WINTER CAPITAL PROJECTS FUND

Question No. 2,400—Mr. Herbert:

1. For each year to date, by province, what amount was loaned under the Winter Capital Projects Fund and authorized by the Appropriation Act 1972?

2. What percentage was repayable and what amount was repaid to date?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)):

In so far as the Department of Finance Canada is concerned: see lists below.

1. The issuing of loans under Winter Capital Projects Fund was authorized by: Vote L12a Appropriation Act No. 1, 1973; Vote L13a Appropriation Act No. 5, 1973; and Vote L13a Appropriation Act No. 1, 1974. In so far as the Department of Finance is concerned the first list reports the loans issued to the various provinces.

2. The acts identified in No. 1 provided for the forgiveness of that portion of the principal amount equal to 50 per cent of the normal direct on-site payroll costs incurred during the program plus an additional 50 per cent of the normal direct on-site payroll costs incurred during the periods of December to May of 1973, 1974 and 1975. The second list reports the net loans repayable and the amounts collected to date.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENT TO SHORTEN PERIOD REQUIRED TO HOLD ELECTIONS

The House resumed, from Tuesday, April 14, consideration of the motion of Mr. Bussières that Bill C-58, to amend the Canada Elections Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Hon. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I am very grateful to have this opportunity to rise to comment on Bill C-58. I have been waiting for a long time to have introduced the platform on which one could build a number of reforms that are obviously required in our Canada Elections Act.

Each time I have submitted myself to the electorate of Esquimalt-Saanich for election I have discovered a number of, perhaps not abuses or improprieties, but shortcomings in the act, and on each occasion I have prepared for my own use and for the use of my party a summary of the shortcomings that occurred to me and the group that was working with me during the election so that one might have at hand a full list of these various shortcomings.

I think basically the best time for a discussion or a debate on electoral reform is immediately after an election when matters are still fresh in one's mind. In the absence of the ability to call that debate so soon after an election, the best we can do is make use of this opportunity, and each opportunity that does present itself, to raise during the general discussion at second reading those problems and shortcomings which have occurred and manifested themselves during an election campaign.

I have a long list, seven, eight or nine of them. In the most recent election I suppose I added several. In my first election I was not all that sure and was not able to compare it with any previous experience. In my second election I was able to see there were shortcomings, and now, following my fourth election in February, 1980, I have made a list of those shortcomings.

Bill C-58 is designed primarily to deal with shortening of the election period. It does deal with other matters, of course. There are some very narrow administrative matters connected with the shortening of the period, limitation of the number of copies of the list and maps, and we hear about things that ought to be at the polling stations, including one copy of the preliminary list of electors for every polling division comprised in his revisal district, and so on. This is an administrative matter too, but I have a suggestion to make about that as well.

There is reference to election day and the returning officers transmitting notices of grants of polls, combining urban advanced polling districts and so on. I do feel on the strength of that that it is possible to make a very broad comment on a number of matters relating to that period when elections take place, now a matter of some 59 days, and not just confine my remarks to the preparation of the electoral rolls.

My first comments, however, are going to be concerned with the preparation of the electoral roll. My suggestion—I have made it before in committee and I am going to put it on the record again—is for the establishment of a permanent voters' list. We do need a permanent voters' list. It is crucial to the whole matter of shortening the election period, if that should be the desire of the House. It is certainly the desire of the government or it would not have brought forward a motion containing this shortening from 59 to 47 days. In my view there ought to be, and there certainly is in certain provinces of Canada, certainly in British Columbia, a permanent voters' list.

This matter has been explored in other countries. Perhaps the argument is that there are too many dead people on the lists, that their names are not struck off before the election period and that someone will vote for them. I feel that in a democracy as mature as that in our country we should be able to have confidence that our fellow citizens will make sure they are not voting twice or that they are not voting on behalf of a dead relative who happens to be on the list. There are means of checking that. Even with the mobility of the population of Canada today I think one could devise a number of ways of making sure that a permanent voters' list is kept up to date. It would not be a very difficult matter, as I see it.

We might have provision within the law for a check of the voters' list on the second day of January and the second day of July. Perhaps it should be mandatory for people who have moved since the previous registration date to amend the permanent voters' list. This could be done in municipal offices. The list could be used for other purposes as well, but I think there ought to be a check twice a year.

There should also be checks x number of days after election writs are issued just to be sure that the list is brought even more up to date. Perhaps it should be law that January 2 and July 2 are designated as days on which people make sure their names are on the voters' list. With present technology and computerization I see no reason in the world why it should not be possible to have a permanent voters' list and why we cannot be sure that when election writs are issued the list can just be run off and sent to the printers. In this case we are not talking about printers but about instant print reproduction facilities. In this way the voters' list would be available to those who need it during election campaigns. As hon. members know, many people need voters' lists. If they are available on a permanent basis, that might be very helpful.

A census is presently being taken. A voters' list might be very helpful to census takers when they are updating and forecasting mobility within the country. I foresee a variety of uses to which a permanent voters' list could be put, and those uses are aside altogether from the essential nature of a voters' list. I do believe a voters' list would be an essential tool for a well-run election.

Another matter was on my mind during the last election campaign. It has to do with the problem brought about by people who make holiday plans based on discount air fares which are now available if people book well in advance. Sometimes bookings have to be made three months, four months or five months in advance, before there is any notion that there is to be an election. People decide to take holidays at certain times in order to take advantage of excursion fares which are offered by a number of airlines. These people book in advance and make down payments. Sometimes they make the whole payment and get a special advantage. Then an election comes along, and it is held right in the middle of people's holidays. Such people find that they lose their right to vote on election day and that the provision for advance polling is not adequate.

I think there should be greater flexibility in returning offices respecting early voting. I admit that there already is some flexibility; however, a returning officer very kindly sent his comments about this to me. He says he is a little worried about extended voting in the offices of returning officers. I wonder why he should be worried. If it is a matter of space or staff, if we had a permanent voters' list well in place right at the beginning of an election period, there ought not to be any great problem having people working and having people voting in returning offices. I think the misgivings expressed by the returning officer in his letter, a copy of which I have in my hand, are premised on the notion that the prevailing regime with respect to voters' lists will be carried forward into the next election.

In any event, if there is provision in the law for advance voting during most of the period of an election, as soon as the list is available there should be accommodation so that voters can come in and vote. Of course, they should have to prove that they will not be available to vote on election day. They should have to give just cause for advance voting, but they should be offered the opportunity to vote at the returning office during the major portion of an election period.

Another matter which worries me somewhat is the matter of proxy voting. I think we need an enlargement of the classes of persons and a simplification of procedures governing those who may vote by proxy. As hon. members know, at the present time a person may proxy for only one voter. I will be making a suggestion about having polling stations in nursing homes and so forth. It may be that in some areas mobile polling booths are not practical. Therefore, it should be possible, for example, for the matron of a nursing home, a doctor on duty or someone responsible for the care of individuals in a nursing home to be given a proxy vote in order to vote on behalf of those who are immobilized in the nursing home. I see no reason why it should not be possible for one person to vote by proxy for several others. Are we afraid that people will take advantage of this and invent people on behalf of whom they can vote? That is possible, but if that is the situation, I think it is a sad comment on our electoral system. As I say, I believe there is room for enlarging the class of persons and the number of persons for whom proxy votes can be cast.

This brings me to another important matter which I raised in a private members' bill as long ago as the Twenty-ninth or Thirtieth Parliament. During my second term of office I became aware in a real way of the difficulties which can occur when people cannot get out to vote either at advance polls or on polling days. In all constituencies there are persons who, through no fault of their own, have great difficulty getting out to vote or finding proxies.

My suggestion was shot down by the Chief Electoral Officer at the time. I managed to get it as far as the committee where I fought for it and defended it, but where it was turned down. I have some reason to suspect now, Mr. Speaker, that the Chief Electoral Officer may have modified his views and would be prepared to accept this notion. With all due respect, I think it is for Parliament, not the Chief Electoral Officer, to decide whether there shall be mobile polling stations. Therefore, I feel we should more fully explore this notion of a mobile ballot box for hospitals, shut-ins in nursing homes and, particularly as this is the International Year of the Handicapped, the disabled.

It is a simple matter, as I see it. The poll clerk and scrutineers would be available, they could travel around in a mobile van which could be rented on the day of the vote, or even I suggest for an advance poll. I see there are some smiles on the other side; perhaps they can see some way of sneaking around some of these suggestions which I am making in all honesty. I see no reason why a group of four or five persons in a small van, fully equipped, could not visit the hospitals and actually go into the hospital room and have the person, even those immobilized in bed, mark the ballot. I cannot understand what this smirking is about on the other side. It can only be imagination about machinations, I think. So I would revive that matter as one which I consider worth exploring more fully, and in the course of time I hope I might have the opportunity to introduce an amendment to that effect to this bill.

Another matter involves visiting polling stations on voting day to see if there are any problems and, if not, just to say hello to people. There are some who may do other things on voting day but I have made it a practice to be of service to the community and to visit as many polling stations as I could within the area. Now some, such as my friend, the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle), would be unable to visit all the polling stations in their riding in one day. However, in mostly urban, slightly rural, constituencies such as mine it is possible to visit at least half, I would say.

One of the problems I find when I do this is that people show up because they live nearby, they see the polling station on their way to work and so they say this is where the vote is going to take place and they walk in expecting to be able to vote. It may just be that they are in the wrong polling station, they may have moved six months ago from the place where their name is on the list and they really have to go some distance away. I have suggested to polling officers, and also to the electoral officer of the riding, that he provide to each polling station a map showing the locations of the stations in the ridings in some detail. If the people chosen as scrutineers really had their wits about them and they made sure that maps were available, when people came in they could look at the map and say to the people concerned: "Look, that is where you live and this is where the poll is in that particular riding; you go down this street, turn right, follow the streetcar tracks and you will get there". I do think that is an important service.

I also think it is very important that there should be available in polling stations a full voters' list so that people can check to see whether they are on the list and which poll they would vote at. There is a practice in some constituencies, I believe, to send out what are known as vote-at cards. These are rather difficult to organize at the last minute no matter how many people you have to do it. It is also a little dangerous because there is a temptation to put a little bit of advertising on these cards and then, of course, the voter walks into the polling station with your card in his hand and this gets pretty close to the bounds of illegality and could thereby get you into difficulty. In my riding we decided in the last four elections that we would not issue these cards for that very reason. Despite the best will in the world, people will pull this out of their pocket and say this is where I go to vote, and then you have your picture there with the space to mark the ballot and so on, which is, of course, a no-no. And so it should be; I have no quarrel with that at all.

However, we must try to overcome difficulties that people have. People have other things to think about than that single day. After all, the candidates have focused on that single day, but the rest of the voting population, or a large part of them, are focusing on getting their daily bread, as they do on other days. Therefore, while they are determined to get to the polling station, they may make a mistake as to where they should go, so I feel there ought to be all the necessary facilities within each polling station to enable a voter to find his way to the right polling station.

The alternative, I suppose, would be to put his vote in a jumbo box and strike his name off the voters' lists then rush to the phone and make sure that the appropriate polling station strikes his name off the list. But I think that is too complicated. I think the best way is to provide a service which will enable people to find their way to the appropriate polling station.

There is another matter which struck me as very odd; I cannot understand the rationale behind it. A rural voter may go the the polling station on voting day with a neighbour and swear himself for inclusion on the electoral list. An urban voter may not. Perhaps an urban voter is not supposed to have a neighbour. A rural voter may have a friend or neighbour accompany him to the polling station in order to swear before the poll clerk that indeed the person has been living at a certain address in the rural riding for a number of weeks, months or whatever it is. If a rural voter whose name does not appear on the list can place it on the list in such a fashion, why is it not possible to have the same facility for an urban voter? It just does not make sense.

I suppose it stems from historical usage. Perhaps it is "historical abusage", I am not sure. In the early days of voting, the facilities for communication were not what they are today. I can visualize the set-up in the rural areas of the prairies, particularly. A farmer who is busy with his crops cannot get away from the farm because of the weather. He can be busy with his livestock or his family and cannot get away during that narrow period so that his name will be included on the voters' list. He could make arrangements in advance to have his stock watered or his cows milked, if that is the case, so that he would accompany a neighbour on election day to have his name included on the list. This is the possible historic explanation; there cannot be any other. Therefore, I feel there is a good argument in favour of extending this facility to urban voters. Of course, this is the permanent list of which I spoke earlier.

I should like to turn to a somewhat more subtle area, that of the screening of returning officers. Heretofore they have been appointed because of political affiliation. Then it is more or less a permanent appointment. If their performance is good, they will just stay on or remain in office.

Certain stories reach us immediately after an election campaign which happily are forgotten 15 or 16 months after the election. These stories concern bias displayed by returning officers or conflicts of interests which suggest that perhaps there was an inclination to guide an elector in one direction or another or to make decisions which adversely affect one candidate as against another. I know there are provisions within the bill for appeal both during the election period and after, but it would be much better if we could be absolutely clear on this matter and not have the problem arise at all. My suggestion is that there might be a need for screening returning officers for conflicts of interest which might be evident or for political bias.

An interesting matter was the subject of a letter which appeared in The Times-Colonist in Victoria last month. I suppose this comes back to the matter I raised concerning mobile ballot boxes. I should like to read this short letter. It deserves to be put on the record because it underlines the need to help those people who find themselves unable to get to the polls on voting day. The letter does not include any address. This person may be speaking for herself or on behalf of others. I do not want to embarrass the author of the letter; therefore, I will not use her name. The letter reads as follows:

> It seems that I and other shut-ins are second-rate citizens. Believe it or not, in Canada we are not able to vote. Oh, sure, we can vote by proxy, but I don't want to and I shouldn't have to. My vote is supposed to be secret. How can it be if I tell another person? I want and demand my constitutional right to vote. Surely this great government can arrange to have ballot boxes brought around to shut-ins' homes.

I talked about nursing homes and hospitals. I agree that there are homes and apartments where people are shut in or unable to move because of handicaps. Those people ought to have their secrecy preserved; they should be able to vote.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I have suggested that with mobile voting stations there should be no problem, even if it takes three or four days. Gracious goodness, with our facilities we should be able to work out some system whereby people who cannot get to voting stations can vote two or three days beforehand and have their votes locked up to be counted on voting day. I am delighted to see that there was a positive response on the other side of the House to this notion. I do not want to see the secrecy of the vote denied to anyone. We ought to show them respect, whether they are confined because of illness or handicap. In this year in particular I think we should be thinking of the handicapped. When a person is sick in bed, I suppose it is a handicap as well. We must find a way of overcoming this problem.

There is some suggestion in the bill about the need to avoid the lengthy process of printing and using copy houses which permits the photostatic method of reproducing the electoral roll. This has been considered by some. I sent a copy of the bill when it was printed to the returning officer in my riding in order for his comments. He appropriately replied to the Chief Electoral Officer and sent me a copy of the letter which he wrote. He indicated that he was delighted there was an extra facility which meant that he would not have to take the voters' list to a print shop where it must be typeset, which takes a fair amount of time. This is no reflection on the typesetters; it is just a matter of time since it could be reproduced by the electrostatic method.

He does comment about having the returning office opened up for a longer period than in the past—21 days instead of 14—so that people could come in and vote. I think I have covered this matter. I can see no reason in the world why, if necessary, the returning office cannot be a little shop, or an office at the back or front end of a shop, which would be manned at all times by a returning officer and his staff. I am sure all parties would be delighted to change scrutineers, from day to day if necessary, so that when people did come in for an advance poll it would be possible for them to vote.

One other matter which caused concern in the 1979 election, one which I suspect may arise again, was that there were a great many people caught by surprise because of the change of designation. There were a number of British subjects who had voted in the past and they were warned that if they did not become Canadian citizens and get their names on to the voters' list they would find they might be denied the right to vote. Indeed, I think all members sent out notices with our householders' mailing indicating this change.

It must be borne in mind that these people have been in this country for a good many years, with their children and their grandchildren, many of whom were born here. They had assumed that they were Canadian citizens and they were rather affronted, if not insulted, when they found they were not, just by the effluxion of time, considered Canadian citizens. Some of them may have lost their ability to vote. At the time this caused a great deal of hard feeling. If that provision is within the Canada Elections Act I think it would be worth while to take a closer look at it in committee.

I see that you are indicating to me that my time has almost expired, Mr. Speaker. I want to thank you for bearing with me as I have gone through these various matters which have been concerns of mine in each election. I am glad that the opportunity is before us now to consider this matter. I hope it will be possible to open up this bill and add to it amendments which will rectify some of the shortcomings, as I have decided to call them, of the previous acts.

Mr. Douglas Fisher (Mississauga North): Mr. Speaker, like the previous speaker I, too, have looked forward to the opportunity of speaking on this bill. However, in light of the hour I wonder if I might call it one o'clock and resume my remarks after lunch?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I have already recognized the hon. member for Mississauga North. If he is in the House at two o'clock the Chair will recognize him then.

Is it agreed to call it one o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 2 p.m.

At 12.55 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, as I mentioned, I welcome this bill and the idea that we can shorten our election campaigns from 60 days to 47 days. I am sure that this idea is a welcome one in my riding in Mississauga as well. I see the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) here. When he spoke on this bill in April, he wondered if we could make it retroactive to 16 election campaigns!

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fisher: My first campaign was in 1980, but it was my eighth campaign involved with Liberal party politics.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fisher: I have been an organizer and a volunteer in eight federal campaigns since 1963. In each campaign I have been struck by the fact that it is getting easier and easier, from the politician's perspective, to shorten campaigns. I refer to both our national and our local campaigns.

Nationally, of course, since 1963, when I got started, we have seen the advent of better and better air and jet travel. Jet aircraft are being used for leaders' campaigns and for the media, taking our leaders right across the country so that they can speak in any corner at any given time during the campaign. Because of good television coverage, they are able to be reported right across the nation; and with increasingly sophisticated advertising techniques, we are able to carry our own biased or political messages right across the country.

At the local level, we have seen the same kind of changes since I got started in 1963. We have seen, for example, that we now include the party name on the ballot so that candidates do not have to spend so long identifying themselves with the national message that the national media and the national leadership are carrying to the voters. We see that there is much less focus on local meetings and local debate; we see, instead, at least in the areas where I have had experience, that people are campaigning more in shopping plazas, along streets and door to door. I think all of this makes our local and our national campaign much more flexible and much easier to shorten.

I welcome this bill, but as we look at it, I think we have to apply three principles and see if the bill passes the test. First of all, we have to ask, is the bill fair to everyone; not only fair to every party, but fair to the incumbent and the challenger? We have to make sure that the large numbers of people who are waiting outside this House to replace us are at least given a fair chance, if not a lot of encouragement.

Second, we have to look to see whether this bill will encourage greater efficiency in our electoral system. We do not just want to look at a hypothetical public attention span. We also want to look at our officials and the people who are the referees in elections to make sure that they agree with this measure.

Third, because I think that in this kind of an arrangement appearances are everything, we want to make sure that there is consensus among all the parties. This bill comes from two previous bills. It has a non-partisan atmosphere attached to it and it is of a housekeeping nature.

● (1410)

In a 1975 report on the 1974 election, the Chief Electoral Officer made a recommendation to the then president of the privy council, Mr. Sharp, that we shorten campaigns. Following that, a bill was introduced by the previous Liberal administration. Another bill was introduced by the previous Clark administration. The report to which I have just referred was tabled in the House in 1976.

The Chief Electoral Officer divided our election campaigns into three distinct periods of time. From his point of view, these are three distinct activities. The most important stage was the last stage, that is the last 30 days when we are getting ready for the actual balloting. This is when we see the candidates nominated, ballots printed and distributed in the proper numbers, local officials recruited and trained and the advance polls and regular polls opened and operating properly.

The Chief Electoral Officer made the point in his report that this is a period we cannot shorten nor alter in any way. This last 30-day effort should not be interfered with. Therefore, he examined the first two stages in the first 30 days of our current electoral campaign. This is when people are enumerated, when lists are published and errors and omissions are corrected. The electoral officer found plenty of room for improvement in this area. He was able to recommend two things. He recommended, first, that the period be shortened by 13 days, from 60 days to 47 days; second, that there was a new way to treat voters' lists which would save $2 million in 1974 dollars, a welcome saving and a sizeable amount at any time.

Since that time there has been considerable support for this idea, that is to say, that we shorten our campaigns. I obtained four newspaper clippings through our library services. I think they quite well represent public opinion. The first one is dated February 3, 1981, after we reintroduced this bill, an editorial article in the Star Phoenix, which reported the following:

> Even a minimum of 47 days appears to be too long in this age of speed in communication with voters.

On February 11, 1981 the Chronicle-Herald underlined the same idea. We read in its article the following:

> The bill should be put through and made ready for the next election, and not allowed to be withdrawn for consideration in another session.
> And while the MPs are at it, perhaps they might consider further reducing the time allotted for campaigning.

These two newspapers expressed opinions that they were not happy even with the 47-day period allowed in this bill, that the period should be shorter.

Following the 1980 campaign, under the title of "electoral reform", the Winnipeg Free Press, in an article written on February 18, 1980, expressed this thought:

> This time, Canadians, by accident, had a campaign of more nearly European length with no ill effects.

> No one could seriously complain that, in the six weeks they gave themselves, the parties did not have an opportunity to get their messages across to the public. Indeed, the job could have been done quite adequately in a couple of weeks less.

Those three opinions reflect reaction to this bill and to the 1980 campaign, which was quite a short campaign. After the 1979 campaign, which we all recall was a long and prolonged affair, particularly with the preparation leading up to it, the Toronto Star reported on May 24, 1979:

> Shorter, sharper election campaigns would benefit Canadian democracy by concentrating debate and focusing public attention on the issues and policies involved.

I agree with the opinions expressed in those newspapers. If hon. members go through the clippings which the library provided to me, there are plenty more sentiments like that in newspapers from across the country, all of them urging us to shorten campaigns and to act expeditiously.

I think these newspaper articles reflect public opinion in two ways. I think the newspapers quite rightly see the current length of our campaigns as wasteful. These articles also show that shorter campaigns would be equally effective and equally fair.

Speaking on behalf of our audience, that is our voters, they do not believe there is any element of unfairness if we shorten our campaigns. But this question of fairness versus efficiency has to be considered pretty seriously.

The Chief Electoral Officer has told us how to shorten our election campaigns so that the process itself, the mechanics, is fair. If we follow this method, he says that voters will get listed properly, that there will still be plenty of time for correction of errors and omissions, that we would still be able to have open and proper nomination procedures, and that our balloting will continue to be scrupulously conducted by well-trained local officials.

In short, our referee will be properly conducting the match according to all the rules that we consider decent and proper. If we accept the advice of the newspapers in addition, our audience will be more than satisfied. Forty seven days will give everybody more than enough time. Our audience will see the process is fair as well.

I am trying to stress that fairness cannot be taken in isolation; it has to be balanced against efficiency. Both the Chief Electoral Officer and the newspaper critics, who have been following our habits as politicians, are saying that we can get along much faster without sacrificing fairness. We can be more efficient without being unfair.

The third principle that we have to look at is the question of consensus. What is the status of that? I think we have to have agreement from most parties in order to proceed with this bill. The public has to see that parties of all sides think that it is a good idea. So far since April we have heard from five speakers on this bill. I think they have been in agreement in principle. We have heard from representatives of one Ontario rural riding, one Toronto urban riding, an Ottawa suburban riding, a Winnipeg urban riding, and today a B.C. riding. Each member has indicated his general agreement with the idea that we can shorten our election campaigns.

We know that the bill was introduced by both a Liberal and a Conservative administration. There were, however, two important questions raised by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) when he spoke in mid-April. On April 14, at page 9282 of Hansard, the hon. member wonders whether urban ridings might find a short campaign a little easier than a suburban riding and even easier than a widely spread rural riding. A couple of pages later the hon. member raises a second important question, whether the method favours incumbents. I shall examine those two concerns because I think they are honest questions. I would like to give the hon. member my impressions as to how we should treat his two questions.

I remember working in the Manitoba provincial campaign in 1977, a campaign which took six weeks to conduct from start to finish. The Churchill riding is enormous; it is almost as big as the federal seat. It cost approximately $2,000 for the candidate to fly around the riding just once. The riding stretched north of Flin Flon across to Churchill and it took in a lot of the geography north of Lake Winnipeg. It was filled with tiny hamlets with 100 to 200 people living next to a lake. The candidate would fly in on a float plane, visit them and then go on to the next spot. He built up an organization in each of those municipalities as he went through. I am happy to report that the mechanics of the campaign went very smoothly.

I watched his efforts closely. I was intrigued by the way he was going to operate. With the use of aircraft and sometimes with the use of canoes, he was able to visit personally every little hamlet at least once. He got to the bigger places twice. Through radio, television and local newspapers he was able to advertise his campaign, tell people what his platform was, what his background was and what the party generally was promoting across the province. In six weeks I did not see any way that he suffered as a result of its being a large constituency. Even though it was a provincial campaign, I believe his constituency was larger than most of those represented in this House, with the exception of those in schedule 3 of the act. As I mentioned, he got to the larger centres at least twice. He had the provincial leader in there twice.

Unfortunately, at the end of the campaign he only collected 12 per cent of the vote. That was not his fault. It was the fault of those of us sitting in Winnipeg. He convinced me in that experience that technology for travel and communication made a modern local campaign highly effective. If you look at the result, the 12 per cent of the vote he received, it would appear that technology and travel make a provincial or national campaign highly effective. He got a pattern of the vote remarkably similar to the pattern obtained in most other ridings across Manitoba by the Liberal party in that election.

I do not want to make too much of one example, but I think it is illustrative. It is a practical example that helps us to see that travel by aircraft in remote places is often as effective as a car or walking in a crowded urban centre. He certainly got to all his constituents.

The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton asked about suburban places. I feel very confident replying to him and telling him about my own experience because I come from a suburban city west of Toronto. We have 93,000 voters and 400 polls. There are 55,000 households in my riding which is about the equivalent number of voters in smaller constituencies.

My riding is made up of people from all backgrounds and all kinds of living circumstances. They are in apartment buildings, subdivisions, instant villages and towns and historic little centres. Malton and Streetsville are there, towns which started up in the middle of the 1800s. Meadowvale, a town which started five or six years ago, is also there.

In 44 days, between January 5, 1980, when I was nominated, and February 18, when the election was held, we recruited 650 to 700 workers. We canvassed every poll in the middle of the winter. We put up over 4,000 lawn signs and conducted two mailings. I ran my own personal campaign. Some would say that was the weakest part of the effort. We went to 16 different local meetings that had been organized by schools, churches and ratepayers groups. If at the end of that effort someone did not know about my campaign, it was more accidental than purposeful. It was not a result of the time allowed, 44 days. My opponents did the same and they did it in the same time period.

In 1979, the campaigns in my constituency were conducted with the same intensity. It was spring, not winter, but the campaigns were no tougher. They were prolonged, but they were no better. My opponent in 1980 was an incumbent. He had been a challenger in 1979. He had been nominated in 1978 and had spent a year or a year and a half knocking on the 55,000 doors in our riding. Once the bell went, he did the same things as the Hon. Tony Abbott, my predecessor. He canvassed every poll, put up thousands of lawn signs and he defeated Mr. Abbott. He did it with a highly effective campaign that was dragged out from 1978 through 1979. His result was the same as mine. His took a year and a half, mine took 44 days.

I have had personal experience in a surburban area, and in northern Manitoba I witnessed with great interest a campaign. The key was the issues, personalities and the parties, not the length of time. I want to make that point quite strongly. We want to be able to say that time does not necessarily penalize people if they come from bigger areas, wilderness areas, spread out or heavily populated areas. A long campaign will not necessarily help the candidate.

Does a short campaign help an incumbent? That is the question asked by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton. It is a very important question. Do shorter campaigns create advantages for those of us here? Again I will refer back to my own riding. If ever there was a long campaign, it was the one in 1979. The local Conservative challenger at that time started in 1978. He succeeded. In 1980, with 44 days, I succeeded.

Mr. Wilson: Obviously personalities don't matter.

Mr. Fisher: I hear my neighbour for Etibocoke Centre (Mr. Wilson) making a few comments in agreement on this. I appreciate his support.

The same kinds of examples are everywhere. In 1979 the Liberals lost. In 1980 the Liberals won. Long campaigns and short campaigns did not make any difference. In both cases incumbents fell, challengers rose and governments changed. Personalities, parties and issues were the key, not the length of time.

The questions of geography and incumbency that the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton raised are answered by those parallels from the 1979 and 1980 campaigns. Look at those two elections which happened so closely together. One was long planned and the other spontaneous. If we look at the similar campaign techniques used in two different campaigns with different issues and different problems for the voters to solve, we see that, by and large, the campaign techniques themselves were not the key. The issues, personalities and substances of the campaigns made the difference.

The inquiries by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton are important. We have to satisfy those inquiries in our own minds and for the sake of those who come after we change the law. We must have a proper answer for those people as well. We have to draw a distinction between creating a fair opportunity, on the one hand, and reacting to people who do or do not take advantage of that opportunity, on the other.

We here cannot be responsible for making other people good campaigners. We can look at the outside world and determine that technology, communications and modern campaign techniques work in favour of shorter campaigns. We can make that decision. We can also decide that a 47-day campaign is a fair opportunity. There will be some who argue with us and there will be some who, if they had a hundred years, could not get elected. We are not responsible for those people.

In 1896 Tarte helped Laurier to get elected. He said at that time that elections are not won by prayer alone. In the same way, elections are not won by opportunity alone. We make the opportunity. Others will take advantage of it.

I have tried to stress in my speech that there are three principles we have to apply to any change in the electoral law. First, we have to see whether it is fair. Second, we have to see whether it is efficient. Third, we have to see whether there is general agreement among the responsible parties that we should progress.

I do not think this should become a partisan issue. I think in terms of fairness I have tried to express that the referee, the Chief Electoral Officer, tells us that if we follow this legislation we will have a fair process, a fair administration. As far as he is responsible, he has told us that this legislation has elements of fairness in it.

Second, our audience is telling us that it would be fair and adequate to shorten our campaigns. They are saying through the newspapers—and I think the newspapers are speaking on behalf of their readers—that 47 days is long enough and we do not need to drag ourselves out even longer. Third, are the players, ourselves. I think we are seeing increasingly an agreement here. We have heard five speakers, and I am the sixth, and all of us have said we agree that campaigns should be shorter, even if there have been some queries about how we accomplish it.

I think the fairness question is settled. On the efficiency question, there is an obvious attraction. There is an attraction for politicians everywhere in cutting 25 per cent off the length of a campaign. We are now dealing with election expenditure limits and if we can cut 25 per cent off the time, then those limits will become even more generous and we might find ways to save within those limits. Certainly the public is going to save. The public has been told by the Chief Electoral Officer that in 1974 dollars we will save $2 million in the printing of the lists alone. I think that efficiency is worth pursuing even if the parties as private groups do not find efficiencies of their own.

Finally, on the third principle, the consensus principle I think is being reached here. We have seen the bill come from both sides of the House. We have heard a positive speech from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I think we have some details we can satisfy in this debate, but I think the quickest way we can show consensus is by putting the bill into the committee, getting it out of the committee, voting on it and putting it into place, which is what I think the public and all our audiences want us to do.

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, this has been a subject matter with which I have had some experience, having been engaged in some ten elections, and it is an item which is of very major concern to me. I can agree with the hon. member for Mississauga North (Mr. Fisher) in most of what he said, except that I would have to say that I think it is the prerogative of any party to nominate anybody at any point in time that it chooses, and in this political structure of ours I do not think we should be complaining because one guy had 18 months and another guy had only 47 days. That is not pertinent at all. No matter what the act may be, there will still be that prerogative to do just that. Certainly the public or any party in this House would not prevent any change which would constrict the time of nomination and thus the time of the election campaign conducted by an early nominee.

As for the time of the campaign, I think that in virtually any constituency, the time is adequate, except for some of those in the very large constituencies, such as Yukon, the Prince George-Peace River and the Peace River constituencies in Alberta, and others which are nearly equally as large. I do not know whether you would ever have time to cover those constituencies in any time frame. If there are hardships which would be imposed by a restriction of time, they would be the ones which would really feel it at its worst.

It does seem to me that if other jurisdictions, such as, let us say, the United Kingdom, can conduct an election in 28 days, surely Canada could stand a reduction to something like 45, plus or minus a day or two, as this bill is now proposing.

There are, however, some frailties in the act as it presently exists. I do not wish to be construed in this instance as speaking with any political malevolence at all, but I would like to see a better elections act, particularly as it relates to a rural constituency. It is in that frame of mind that I want to make a few suggestions.

For instance, the restrictions upon advertising for a convention in a rural constituency impose restraints and constraints which I do not think should be there. I think one should be permitted, as a political party or as an aspiring candidate prior to his official entry into the race, to advertise as one sees fit. I say that because I do not know how you are going to scatter the name through a community 200, 300, 500 miles in length if you do not have the opportunity to advertise.

If you are an incumbent member and you are the only candidate at a convention, I can see that it does give you some advantage. As has been pointed out by the hon. member for Mississauga North, there are advantages and disadvantages. But if you are opposing an existing member, one of the advantages I think a new face in a campaign requires is the opportunity to advertise in pursuit of the nomination, and to advertise the meeting at which he hopes he may be the successful candidate. To include this in the cost of an election, or even to preclude the possibility of publicizing his name and ambitions, I think is a most unfair restriction.

If it were—and this, I suppose, is political—the intention of the government to pursue these constraints and make sure they were exercised with equal hardship on all candidates, that would be fine; but in my experience in the last two elections in this nation that has not been the case. It appears that liberties have been extended to candidates, perhaps I should say of all parties, and there has been no inclination by the Chief Electoral Officer or the returning officer to really see that this facet of the requirement of the elections act is enforced. I think we should either eliminate constraints upon advertising for a convention, or there should be a notice to all parties, to all returning officers and to all known or prospective candidates that, if they breach the law, they shall not be eligible to participate in the election.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I would ask the hon. member to indicate to the Chair how that pertains to reducing the number of days for an election. This bill is very, very narrow in scope. It aims at reducing the days during an election campaign, and I think the remarks of the hon. member are not directed to this.

Mr. McCain: Mr. Speaker, if it be the desire of the Chair and the House to restrict debate to the literal phraseology of this bill, then this is really an exercise in futility. I had the understanding, as I think the hon. member for Mississauga North had, that in fact we were going to be allowed to discuss the election process and the requirement for change in that election process. I do not have any criticism of the hon. member for Mississauga North, but I do not believe I am wandering any further afield than did he; and I am certainly speaking on the elections act which is about to be amended. I hate to take issue with you, Mr. Speaker, but I do submit that the elections act is part of the subject matter of this bill. We do have a specific amendment, and with that I agree.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): May I interrupt again. I listened very, very attentively to the remarks of the hon. member for Mississauga North (Mr. Fisher), which were always related to the constraint and time limit during an election. Perhaps there was an understanding between the parties, and the Chair is very disposed to go along; so if there was I would like to accept the word of the hon. gentleman. If there is such a disposition I am quite willing to entertain any debate at all if that is the understanding, because I am here at the service of the House.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to see that there is consistency on the part of the Chair after the decision taken yesterday on Bill C-57, which was to call on the rule of relevance immediately when one saw that particular comments were not relevant to a bill. This is something that many of us have advocated for quite some time. It was started yesterday on Bill C-57 and I would support the Chair.

What is before us right now is a specific amendment to the Canada Elections Act. There will be ample opportunity to discuss the Canada Elections Act and potential amendments at the committee. Mr. Hamel will be bringing forward his recommendations within the next few months. Perhaps in the fall we will have that opportunity. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I think you are entirely correct in requiring members to speak specifically about the question at hand, which is the limitation of the electoral period from the present period to 47 days.

• (1440)

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I just want you to know that it was unnecessary for the parliamentary secretary or anyone else to say he supports the Chair. I assume it would be unparliamentary for him to do otherwise than to support the Chair.

Mr. Collenette: McCain was not supporting the Chair.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, if I may say so, as I was listening to the hon. member, I felt he was dealing with the impact of time, which is the essence of this bill, on the electoral process. I say with respect that I felt that was the thrust of his remarks. I naturally join, if it is necessary at all, in suggesting that the ruling of the Chair is supreme. However, I thought that was the hon. member's thrust.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I have listened to the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), and with all due respect—

Mr. Taylor: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I will listen to the hon. member's point of order later.

The Chair was listening quite attentively, and I think the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain) was referring to a certain restriction in the Canada Elections Act which prevents publicity prior to a campaign. That does not relate at all to the bill we have before us. That is why I invited him, if possible, to talk about this matter. In the past the Chair has been very lenient most of the time, but it is not often we have bills which are as narrow in scope as this one, and I invite hon. members to co-operate.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I would like to make one or two points in relation to this item. For many years the practice in the British House of Commons and in most legislatures, if not all, in this country has been that at second reading of a bill debate is on the principle of the bill. The principle of a bill involves more than just the clauses of the bill. If that were not so, when a government introduces a bill, debate would be confined. Zippers would actually be put on the lips of members.

If Your Honour will just hear me out, when a bill is introduced, the government knows that there is open debate at second reading. In committee of the whole hon. members are confined to individual clauses. At the third reading stage hon. members can attempt to defeat the whole bill, but the only stage at which hon. members can deal with the principle of a bill is at the second reading stage. The principle of a bill involves more than just the particular clauses. The principle of this bill involves the Canada Elections Act, and I contend that if the ruling is that we must confine ourselves to clauses, we are running a committee of the whole at the second reading stage, which is definitely wrong.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I think I have listened to the hon. member long enough to understand what he means. It is precisely the principle of the bill we are discussing. The principle of the bill is that it limits election periods, and again I invite hon. members to respect that and to address their remarks to the constraint placed on us with respect to the election period, but certainly not to advertising prior to an election, as the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte was doing previously.

This is one of those rare bills which is narrow in scope. That is why I invite hon. members to observe the rules of relevancy.

Mr. Taylor: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it the same point of order?

Mr. Taylor: No, a new point of order. This bill amends the Canada Elections Act—

Mr. Collenette: You are arguing with the Chair. That is disgraceful.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

Mr. Collenette: A man with your experience arguing with the Chair; that is disgraceful.

Mr. Taylor: You have not even heard my point of order, Sir. Are you psychic or something?

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. I think the hon. member wants to debate the same point of order. If the hon. member is suggesting to the Chair that we are debating the whole of the Canada Elections Act, he is mistaken; we are debating an amendment to the Canada Elections Act which places a limitation on the election period. I invite hon. members to talk about that. I will recognize the hon. member in due course if that is the subject to which he wants to address his remarks.

Mr. Taylor: This is not second reading then; this is Committee of the Whole. You are running a Committee of the Whole at second reading.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order.

Mr. Taylor: Look at the rules.

Mr. Cousineau: You are breaking our hearts, Gordon.

Mr. McCain: Mr. Speaker, nothing I said was intended—

An hon. Member: Arrogance.

Mr. Taylor: What are you afraid of? Are you afraid to discuss the Canada Elections Act? This ruling is wrong, completely wrong.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Perhaps the two hon. members who are interjecting could retire behind the curtains and have their conversation. We will listen to the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte.

Mr. Taylor: The trouble is not behind the curtain, it is in the House.

Mr. McCain: Mr. Speaker, nothing I have said or referred to has been irrelevant, in my opinion, to a rural member, in view of the time constraints which will be imposed.

My remarks in relation to the convention structure were to the effect that, if time constraints are to be imposed by this bill, it would be desirable and conducive to a more efficient and effective election campaign in a rural constituency if there were a change in time frame and a change in time standards respecting advertising for a rural convention. It was not my intention to deviate from matters relevant to the constraints imposed on a rural constituency if the time is changed. It is in that context that I hope Your Honour will consider listening to additional remarks I have to make on this subject matter.

It is imperative that there be some reconsideration of the whole system of proxy voting, particularly if election campaigns are to be shorter. In an urban constituency the act lends itself to prompt accommodation of the proxy voter who happens to live in that urban constituency; but if we put further time constraints on this act, we will be putting additional constraints upon the time in which a proxy vote can be cast in a rural constituency. There will be a reduction in the amount of time in which the work force of any party will be able to prepare for the facilitation of proxy voting. Therefore, in conjunction with a reduction in the election period I think some consideration should be given to the terms under which proxy votes, absentee ballots and the votes of debilitated people and others can be cast.

If Your Honour will bear with me, I would like to suggest that, in rural constituencies in particular, returning officers should have the capacity to appoint deputies considered by them to be capable. The procedure followed, of course, would be defined either by legislation or regulation. However, a delegate of a returning officer should be permitted to accept, receive or collect proxy votes. Under the present system time is short in a rural constituency. For instance, during the last election campaign the returning officer for my constituency was located at one end of the constituency. I do not quarrel with that. However, if we are to have time to get the work done, the returning officer should have appointees who can do his duties and take his place in the outlying areas of the constituency.

I said I did not want to be political, and I do not; I merely want proper consideration given to this legislation as it relates to time. When we reduce the amount of time, we affect the total campaign in a rural constituency. If the time is to be shortened, I think there should be a system whereby supplies needed by candidates are delivered promptly by the returning officer. Sufficient supplies should be delivered by the Chief Electoral Officer of Canada to returning officers so that representatives of candidates will not have to make three trips, as my staff did in the last election campaign, to obtain necessary forms such as agents' papers.

If we are going to cut the time, it is imperative that the Chief Electoral Officer put everything required in place on the first go around. I do not want to have to make three trips again, nor do I wish to impose that upon any candidate who may succeed me. I suggest that the returning officer should be able to appoint certain agents to conduct, for instance, advance polls. If there is to be a constraint in time, it would be a very excellent idea if the deputy returning officer in the advance poll could almost automatically become an appointee of the returning officer in a rural constituency to receive and perhaps to make available those votes required in proxy or absentee voting or from disabled voters. I think that is the spirit and intent of the act, but if we constrain the time it will be even worse than it has been to date.

If the House will just bear with me a minute, I will not take much time—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCain: —on this subject matter but I am—and I announce this in advance—going to deviate from the constraints you have imposed on me; that is, with your generous permission.

There has been a serious difficulty in some constituencies in Canada, by virtue of lack of co-operation between provincial and federal returning officers, in the establishment of poll boundaries. In a non-political way I appeal to this House of Commons, as a group participating in government, can we not demand of the Chief Electoral Officer and, in turn, his returning officers that there should be co-ordination between provincial and federal returning officers so that poll boundaries can be common? You have no idea, Mr. Speaker, of the difficulty this can create in some areas. In cities it does not make any difference, but in rural communities traditional boundaries are of major significance. I thank you very much for your generosity on that one, because I do think it needs to be on the record.

I think it is very difficult to discuss the subject matter of reduction of time in an election, and as you are considering it, Mr. Speaker, do not consider it on an urban basis. There is so much difference. With all due respect—and no allegations or accusations are made—if I were the candidate for the city of Saint John I really would not need much more than a bicycle, particularly if I wanted exercise. I could bicycle across the constituency in ten or 15 minutes. Even the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne) experiences a great deal more difficulty in conducting a campaign than does the member from Saint John.

I think the time constraints are going to have a very definite impact. It may be necessary to give further consideration to more of this act than just the one section as you look at it from the rural point of view. We are not just changing time per se; we are going to change the entire pattern of contact between the rural candidate and his constituency. I think we have to give consideration to perhaps a little bit more allowance for expenses of rural candidates than we have given.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That is relevant.

Mr. McCain: I say this because I want to point out the difficulties of advertising in a rural constituency. Again I come back to the city of Saint John, New Brunswick, which I know so well. One can use any one of each section of the media and advertise in that constituency effectively, but if a candidate in Carleton-Charlotte stays within the legal constraints of expenditures, I have to look as a candidate at the city of Fredericton, Saint John and Moncton for television and radio. I have to look at Woodstock, Fredericton and Saint John again for press. I have to look at all the weeklies, all dailies, the radio stations and television stations that cover the southwest part of New Brunswick. If you are going to constrain this time, the candidate in Carleton-Charlotte cannot physically cover the same degree of ground that he is able to cover with a longer time period.

Would the government, then, give some consideration, in very difficult advertising circumstances, to the constraint of time plus a little bit of leeway so that one can make contact other than by the media when it is impossible to make it physically, as I have been accustomed to doing? If you cut 15 days off the Carleton-Charlotte candidate, whoever he may be, that means just that many more communities which he is not going to see.

It is a funny thing, but in constituencies in the city it appears that you do have to keep a profile and you do that in the press. In the rural constituencies both the local and national press only recognize the giants when they speak in this House. If they are in the city of Saint John, Halifax or Toronto, they get publicity. The rural candidate is not going to get any freebees in the world of the media, printed or electronic. Therefore he is at a disadvantage if he wishes to get his name known. If you are going to cut this time, these are additional considerations which I think have to be extended to them.

I think I have kept at least one part of your requirements for the consideration of this bill and the mutual understanding on it. I have not been, nor do I intend to be, political, but I do ask whoever chairs this committee or participates in it to review some of the remarks I have made as a country boy in this nation who has some idea of the difficulties of conducting a political campaign under the constraints of this act and who will suffer under the additional constraints. This I think is what the people want and I am willing to abide by it; but if I am to do that, I hope the House, in its consideration of this bill, will give some additional consideration to the necessities of rural campaigning and this time constraint.

How are you going to get around Peace River, Alberta, or Prince George-Peace River, British Columbia, or some of the northern parts of Quebec, in this period of time? Can you make any opportunity for candidates to travel through their constituencies faster? You can do it faster by plane than I can by car, and that is the only thing I can afford under this structure. So should there be an additional expenditure allowance in rural constituencies for plane travel under the time constraints we are going to impose? What is the answer? Before this bill is finalized, let us give that subject attention.

Mr. Chuck Cook (North Vancouver-Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I must be political with a few opening remarks, and this is pertinent to this particular bill.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cook: I consider this bill to be far too little and far too soon. I do not believe the bill should be before this House at all. It is a waste of Parliament's time to be considering it at this time.

It was said in The Speech from the Throne:

> You will be asked to appoint the committee of Parliament to examine the electoral system in order to ensure that the highest degree of representativeness and responsibility is achieved and that the confidence of Canadians in parliamentary institutions is strengthened.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), speaking in Winnipeg just the other night, said:

> We've announced that a parliamentary committee will be established to study and make recommendations on how to make the Senate and House of Commons more effective instruments for the expression of regional interests and priorities as well as the expression of the national will.

Now, for heaven's sake, when you have a government that is planning to rip the electoral act totally apart, change the rules of the game as evidenced by the statements of the Prime Minister, to bring this piddly little bill into the House at this time and ask us to do a little bit with it—

An hon. Member: It is your bill.

Mr. Cook: Yes, but we were not planning on having the rest of it.

An hon. Member: We did not advocate proportional representation; that was you.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

An hon. Member: Why don't you listen?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

Mr. Cook: What I am suggesting is that attempting a snip, when really what the government is planning to do is to destroy the whole animal, is ridiculous and we should not even be discussing this matter. However, it is before us and there are a number of comments that must be made relevant to this particular piece of minor legislation.

• (1500)

Now I can become slightly non-partisan and point out that the length of elections in Canada now runs 59 to 60 days. Every province in the country has made changes. In Newfoundland, it is 21 days for an election; Prince Edward Island, 26 days; New Brunswick, 36 days; Quebec, 32 days; Ontario, 37 days; Manitoba, 35 days; Saskatchewan, 28 days; Alberta, 29 days; British Columbia, 38 days.

If we really look at the 1980 election, we find that the writ went out on December 13. The election campaign, particularly in city ridings, did not get under way until early in January when the children went back to school. I do not think many members were out knocking on doors and saying, "Merry Christmas, please vote for me". If they did, perhaps they are not here.

The length of time of an election is only one small issue in terms of the entire question of electoral reform. This bill should not be before us at this time; it should have been held back. In approximately three months, in September, the report of the Chief Electoral Officer on the changes he wants in election law will be available.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said he has some major changes he wants to make. Why should we be bothered with this minor matter which ties in with every change that may be advocated in Parliament in terms of an election? Will 47 days be enough? I do not know because I do not know what are the other considerations. They are asking me to buy this pig in a poke and to decide that the election period should be shorter, without telling me what else they have planned or what other major items they will attempt to foist on Canadians. Until I am told those things, how can I possibly talk about 47 days or about electoral lists which will no longer be printed but will be mimeographed? These matters should not be before the House at the moment; it is a waste of time.

Why was a committee not set up for this matter and all other changes considered at the same time? Why was there not an omnibus bill? Why have they not brought it all in? Why have we not had a chance to look at everything?

There is a stack of bills which are waiting. Various matters are involved. Some of them are good; perhaps some of them are not so good. Every one of them has some relationship to the legislation before us. When they talk about 47 days, they should realize that they are changing every facet of the Canada Elections Act. This 47 days makes a difference to the Canada Elections Act, as does the question of the printed list.

For example, the hours the polls are open might be irrelevant, but moving after the list is out is relevant to the 47 days, as is voting by proxy. Holding the level of the membership of the House to a particular figure is relevant to 47 days; perhaps it will mean many more voters in individual ridings. Will the candidates have a chance to talk to everyone involved? There is some doubt about that.

There are ridings in British Columbia which are over 500 miles long. The government should talk to members representing those ridings to hear what they have to say about the 47 days. Will they be able to get around those ridings within 47 days? I realize that originally the length of an election was established based on the difficulties of travelling by horse drawn wagons on muddy roads. Even though it was done in that manner, the distance in those early days were much shorter. The difficulties in terms of travelling about ridings in the maritimes or Ontario in those days were not the same as they are today with the large size of ridings, particularly in western Canada. Those ridings are what we might call big ridings in the big sky country. Some ridings are hundreds of miles in size. Even with paved roads and instant communication by telephone, 47 days may not be enough. I want those members to have an opportunity to consider the 47 days.

I suggest that other things could be done to the bill which would make the 47 days reasonable and would allow the electorate to be well informed. We are not only here to please ourselves and to be fair to all candidates. We are supposed to be fair to Canadians and to let them consider what each party is advocating and what is the philosophy of each party, and to provide them with a reasonable time in which to make up their minds.

Perhaps 47 days is the answer, but I think the government will find out that hon. members from large rural ridings have other ideas relating to the 47 days which may make the 47 days acceptable to all. The publication of the results of the opinion polls relates to the 47 days; whether or not the results of such polls will be published. There are two acts to amend the Canada Elections Act in that regard. There are a number of ideas about which hon. members have felt strongly enough to propose bills dealing with individual changes. Surely they must all be considered. Surely the opinion and the report of the Chief Electoral Officer must be considered. The Speech from the Throne and the attitude of the Prime Minister and his government toward major changes must be considered. They relate to the 47 days as well.

We should not be discussing this matter today; the bill should not be here at this time. We should be talking about the bankruptcy bill or something which is important to the country, rather than wasting the time of the House as we are doing today with this bill. There are acts regarding deposits, partisan poll officers and the representation of parties at polls to be considered. This 47 days as opposed to 60 days will make a difference as to whether or not these things will be possible, whether or not injustices will be involved. There is the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act and byelections preceding redistribution. This 47 days will have a lot to do with those bills, as well as with the mobile polling stations under the Canada Elections Act. If there are a couple of mobile polling stations in a 500-mile riding, I wonder how much the candidates can cover in 47 days. I am referring to many areas in western Canada or, for that matter, in the north.

What about the use of contributions, limiting them to federal uses? Well, I apologize for that one. It should not be included in here, because it has nothing to do with the act under discussion.

The period of 47 days is related to campaigning by non-residents and to permanent voters' lists. Those matters have a great deal to do with this particular piece of legislation. Many hon. members on all sides of the House have taken a look, or would like to contemplate, the potential of a permanent voters' list. This might make this legislation palatable to those with huge rural ridings. It can be done in many ways. The Australians have one system, but there are various ways in which it can be handled.

As I suggested, there were comments in the Speech from the Throne which proposed major changes. Also there was the speech in Winnipeg by the Prime Minister reiterating them as recently as last Monday. We know that the report of the Chief Electoral Officer is due in September. There is a raft of bills dealing with the Canada Elections Act, yet we have a little bill before us indicating limiting an electoral campaign to 47 days and stating that the list will no longer be printed. How can we deal with those matters in a vacuum without contemplating all other potential changes, ideas or concepts which might be very useful or interesting? Perhaps when we see the rest of the legislation it will be entirely possible that we may have a circumstance where 47 days will not be the ideal time. It may be that there will be an all-party agreement that, perhaps, with this change and that change to the Elections Act we could conduct a proper federal election. This would be an election that would be fair to all Canadians. It would ensure that they have their information and that the examination would be conducted in the same time as that established in many provinces. Perhaps 35 days would be equally acceptable, I do not know. I do know that this bill should not be before us now because of the vast changes which will come about in the election process in this country when this bill comes into effect.

When we talk about the potential of proportional representation, I connect it to the question of a 47-day election campaign. An election is called, and 47 days later the voting takes place. If there is any form of proportional representation which falls into this category, it really means there will be two elections. It takes probably a week or two to get on the list on the basis of proportional representation; and, depending on the system used, a separate voting may be required within the election to determine who will be on the proportional list. This may require that a party convention be called, or it may mean that some form of primary election will have be held, as is the case in the United States. Under these circumstances, obviously, 47 days simply will not suffice, since at least two weeks of those 47 days will have been used up in order to determine who the proportional representation candidates are.

With that hanging over our heads, I wonder why we are even contemplating 47 days until we know what the rest of the package will be and whether 47 days will have anything to do with it at all. Yet this government brings in this measure to be debated on a lazy Friday afternoon. We are required to talk about it while the government does not understand that it should not be before us. Surely to goodness there is not that much poverty of mind and wisdom on the government benches that they cannot realize the implications of some of the legislation which should be before this House.

Mr. Taylor: Do you want to bet?

Mr. Cook: No, I will not take a bet on that; I might lose.

Before us is a bill which covers a vast subject. What has been printed is, if I may use the expression, a half-assed proposal dealing with the subject.

What else is there to say about this whole matter? Not that much. I think we have made the major points about what should not be included in this measure. In view of its terms, we would also like to see what would happen if it were to pass. If we ever get to the point of having an elected Senate, will this bill apply? Will the Senate have a 47-day election period as well?

Mr. Collenette: Come on, we're not talking about the Senate, we are talking about the House of Commons.

Mr. Cook: If the heckler over there is going to make comments, will he either make them quietly so that I cannot hear them at all or will he make them loud enough so that I can hear him properly? There is nothing worse than knowing only that a heckler is saying something and yet not being sure of what it is he is saying. This is what has happened with the hon. member opposite. Mind you, if he is that embarrassed about what he has to say that he wants to tone it down to the point where he cannot be heard, that is just as well.

I compliment the hon. member for Mississauga North (Mr. Fisher) on a speech well made. I thought his comments were fair. I tend to agree with some of his ideas. I only hope that he will consider expanding his thoughts from the narrowness of what is contained in the bill with regard to the 47-day proposal.

There is a second proposal in the bill which has received very little discussion in this House. It is a rather important proposal since it involves a radical change. If accepted, it will mean that the voters' list will be handled in a totally different manner from the way it is at present. I suggest that in some ridings this may present quite a hardship. It will not be bad in a city riding where there is a returning officer and a returning office, and where one can view the mimeographed lists readily. I wonder what effect this measure will have in those 500-mile long ridings where the returning officer is at one end of the riding with the mimeographed list and the electorate is spread widely throughout the riding. How many hours or days will it take them to reach the returning office to view the list? I presume that the returning officer would send the list via special delivery through the Post Office to designated points throughout the riding where people can actually see it.

These problems are not addressed in the bill before us, nor have they been carefully considered. It is very unfortunate that this piece of legislation has been brought before the House at this time, especially since statements of all kinds have been made indicating that some major legislation will be forthcoming which will probably deal with proportional representation which, in turn, will change the entire ball game. We know that the Chief Electoral Officer will be suggesting in his report up to 100 minor housekeeping changes to the Elections Act.

Each one of these changes should be looked at in light of the 47-day potential and with the possibility in mind of a different method of printing the lists. I want to be able to consider these changes and discuss them. Once that is done, once all the changes have been put together properly, the government can bring their 47-day legislation to me. At that time, and under those circumstances, I think the legislation would receive a very fair hearing. But it cannot be dealt with in the abstract. It cannot be dealt with today. All the questions that are raised in my mind cannot be answered today, since I do not know what will be contained in the Chief Electoral Officer's report. I do not know what the Prime Minister will propose in the fall. Quite frankly, for a year now an ad hoc committee and the Chief Electoral Officer have been involved in discussions about many of the controversial measures involved in the Elections Act. They have been attempting to arrive at an agreement with all parties, in a way which would be fair to the Canadian people. I would like to see the conclusion of those discussions before it is said to me "Let us have the 47-day provision." I want to deal with the total picture.

I could not possibly vote for this bill at this point in time, even though I find myself generally in agreement with the 47-day provision. I want to hear what the people from the large rural ridings have to say. I am sure the first question they will ask is "What else is involved in this legislation?" They will go on to ask: "How does this 47 days relate to the voters' list?" I ask myself, how does this 47-day provision relate to my time as a member to get through a 500-mile long riding? Does this 47 days relate to informing the voters or making up the voters' list? How does this 47 days relate to every other section in the Canada Elections Act and amendments thereto?

I believe the government has done us a disservice by bringing this bill before us today. I hope that it will not be placed on the Order Paper again until the fall and until we see the rest of the package on the electoral reform in this country. We know it is needed. We want it, as do the other parties, but we want it all at the same time. We want it to be coherent and we want it to fit together properly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Scott Fennell (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I am glad I had the opportunity to clear up the process with you before speaking on this bill, both earlier and during the few minutes in the House.

To me, this bill parallels the fill in the Ontario weekly newspapers, and that is what it is. It is fill. It does not really attack the problem of the Elections Act. We are talking about 47 days versus 59 days. The consequence of this 47 days will be the erosion of the democratic process in this country. Basically it gives the incumbent an advantage. Since the government has a majority, it would give the government an advantage. I have to state right here and now that I cannot support 47 days. I will give Your Honour more reasons as I go on.

The bill is totally incomplete. It does not cover anything. In my riding, I have a microcosm of Canada. I have urban development, I have an industrial area, and I have a large rural area which makes up the largest part of my riding. My first election campaign took me 365 days. Now I am being asked to cut my next election down from 64 days, which we happened to have the last time, to 47 days. I do not think there is any way that I could go back and be re-elected under these conditions. I will have had to work at it the four years I will have been here—something like 1,500 days.

There is just a little side point, one little item, which is missing from this bill. We talk about 321 members who will have 47 days the next time.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That is right!

Mr. Fennell: Those hon. members will no longer be known as backbenchers. They will be known as the 47-day upper benchers sitting in the gallery because there will be nowhere else to put them, or else we will all crowd in together when we come in for a vote. I hope we are given 47 days to vote.

Another point which I feel was left out of the bill is that volunteers in a campaign who are supposed to raise money have no longer been given a challenge. They have a great opportunity to go and raise all the money they want. But now, the government wants control of the election, so it gives back the money, and I disagree with that. I think perhaps the new candidates should be helped out, but the incumbents should raise their own money. They have about 1,500 days in which to raise money while they are in office. If they have done a good job, they will receive all kinds of money to run their campaign. If they are not re-elected, that is their own fault.

There should be some method of improving the electoral lists because one of the major problems of our campaign offices is dealing with people who did not get on the list. I have an unusual situation, particularly in part of my rural riding where people are not allowed to register when they come to vote. Half of those people in my rural riding can register when they come to vote and the other half cannot, and they must be enumerated. There is no geographic difference. These people live on farms where the enumerator does not get around. These people are out in the fields and the wife is out to work. It just does not work.

Perhaps 47 days might be practicable if people were allowed to register at the polls. During this debate some members have suggested that a permanent list would solve the problem of 47 days. I shudder at the thought of a permanent list, and I will tell you why. It is because we would create a whole new bureaucracy right across Canada, in 281 constituencies. I cannot accept that. I believe that 59 days is a minimum we can deal with.

One little point which is missing in this bill is the matter of a deposit. In 1867 it cost $200 to put one's name on the line to get elected. On a relative dollar basis, with the inflation we are experiencing, that deposit should be $20,000, but maybe I will cut it down and say that we should be required to put in $2,000. It is just a little extra point that is missing in this bill.

Another little point is with regard to the hours. It was tough for the people in Vancouver to find out that the Liberals had won the election while they were still voting. There should be some adaptation made there. I really feel strongly about that. There are several private members' bills but—

Mr. Fisher: Vote Liberal!

Mr. Fennell: —it is just a point. We have to look at this total package. It is simply not enough. This bill is not doing anything for the country. We are not representing our constituents if all we tell them in this bill is that there will be 12 days fewer than the last time around. I think that is totally unfair. Basically, it is fine. If I had a district to represent such as downtown Toronto, where there is all these highrises, it would be simple. All one does is to go up and down elevators. One goes up the elevators and then one walks all the way down. I do have some apartment buildings in my constituency, and it is a lot of work. However, I could cover that in 47 days.

What this bill will do to my constituency is turn over 80 per cent of my rural constituents into second-class citizens, and they are the ones who are the guts of the country. They are the true entrepreneurs. They are the people who started this country. They are second, third, fourth and fifth generation farmers. Even 59 days is not long enough for us to see them all. How much less would we see them in 47 days?

One matter which has been touched on in this debate is proportional representation, a matter which has been missed in this 47-day bill. I would suggest that if we are going to talk about proportional representation, we should look at the whole of government service. Let us start electing our senators, perhaps for life, if so desired. However, they should be elected as proportional representatives. We have a great big area at the east end of this building. We could be doing a lot more productive things with this area than what I have seen in the two years I have been here.

I would have one suggestion on the 47 days proposal. If we knew for sure that there will be no election for at least four years, perhaps we could accept the 47 days, because incumbents and new candidates would have enough time in three or four years to build up an organization and to build up their image. Perhaps when the bill goes to committee an amendment could be made which would provide that for elections which are four years apart, an electoral campaign of only 47 days would be allowed, but for elections which come sooner, that is, snap elections, the length of time of the campaign would remain at 59 days. That way, there would be an opportunity for good candidates to be picked, and if there had to be last-minute choices, there would be better people to choose from. All parties have the same problem of finding candidates when there is a snap election. Your Honour knows that. That is probably how I was elected the first time; they did not have time to look around. However, they are happy with me now. Personally, I think I can do it in 47 days, but I feel sorry for the new guy who comes in and does not have the same opportunity that I had with 365 days.

I have another possible amendment which could also be discussed in committee. Why not do away with elections altogether and just let the Gallup poll take care of it? That seems to be how we do it anyway. Let us make it equal so that we in the opposition have the same opportunity as the government. If we see our poll results are really high, we could say, "Hey, we are going to have an election". We could go to the country and it could be done in hours with computers. Think of the word processors and the computer facilities! We could do it in 47 minutes. We would not have to wait the 47 days. Think of the financial savings! The only company who would make any money is Torstar. It happens to practically own the Gallup poll.

I feel badly about the disenfranchised electors, those unfortunate people who are not in the country, particularly during a winter campaign, but are in Florida, Arizona, Hawaii, and California. Let us try to really help those people and set up polls—

An hon. Member: El Salvador.

Mr. Fennell: —where our Canadians are. We may as well go where they are. So let us set up polls in Florida, Arizona, Hawaii, and California. When I retire from this House, I would like to be in charge of that.

An hon. Member: El Salvador!

Mr. Fennell: Well, the hon. member is welcome to El Salvador. I would just as soon have Florida or Hawaii.

I think this bill is failing the country. It is failing the people. It is satisfying only one party. It is appeasing the appetite of one party. It is not helping us. We will have disadvantage for all time. Forty-seven days is not enough time for any new person to get elected. I believe we should vote against this bill and we should strongly urge the committee which will be examining this bill to review the entire election act. The committee should look at proportional representation and I suggest that Senate members be included on this committee. All of this should be done properly. Some members in the other place have more experience than we have had here. I maintain that we must review the entire picture, not just the 47 days versus the 59 days.

• (1530)

I represent a rural constituency. I feel very close to my constituents. Incidentally, they are all staunch Conservatives. I feel most strongly that I should have the opportunity in the next election of having those extra 12 days so I can visit all my constituents, sit around their stoves, have lunch and coffee with them. On that basis, I hope that some of the words I have expressed will be accepted. I hope that when this bill goes to committee it will be redrafted.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. The hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Fennell) mentioned that he had had a private conversation with the Chair earlier today. He ought to be commended for the remarkable effort he has made. I just say it was an extraordinary effort and it was very much appreciated.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if in those few words you uttered, there was a message for me. I heard the argument in the House earlier today about the business of relatives.

I think the hon. member made an excellent point that the bill is targeted to accomplish a specific end. It is not just a 47-day election campaign, but it deals with time limits for all kinds of processes which must be examined. It is also critical for members of this House to bring to the attention of the House the climate or the milieu in which this reform will take place. You cannot exercise your responsibility on behalf of Canadians in dealing with a specific narrow piece of legislation without trying to examine, as best you can, its implications for the total system.

Perhaps much of the constitutional debate would have been more enlightening if more attention had been paid, not just to the specifics of the resolution which bound the discussion, but also to sets of general principles and a general framework of the relationship between Canadians and their government. That is what a constitution deals with.

An election act and its subparts deal with the rights of Canadian voters to choose their peer group, which is their jury. In the case of federal politics, that peer group or jury is to be found in this chamber. Any attempt to alter the relationship between the individual voter and his or her right or obligation to choose who represents him or her is a matter which should be undertaken only after very serious thought, and only in the context of our particular form of parliament.

I stand here in this House with a sense of foreboding about the consequences of the proposed change. I think that perhaps the principle which is really basic to that sense of foreboding begins with the notion of process. As we debated the Constitution, I felt that it was most unfortunate that it was a piece of legislation introduced to this chamber by a government, by a small group of members of this House, who had a long-term vested interest. I wonder what the constitutional resolution would have looked like had we had an advisory group consisting of knowledgeable Canadians with no vested interest in this particular source of power called the House of Commons of Canada, to give us ideas and advice. If an advisory group had come up with ideas, suggestions and potential legislation for the House, after which legislation had been brought forward which all members had an opportunity to debate freely, and on which to vote freely, perhaps it would have been better.

I had the same feeling about this proposed electoral change. I think it behooves us in this House to begin an examination of this proposed change with the following in mind: let us assume that government members, members of the Liberal Party, like sitting on that side of the House and like the responsibility of forming a cabinet and deciding which legislation comes forward. But when they propose a particular piece of electoral reform, can they be objective and dispassionate about the consequences of that proposed reform, or is re-election to this chamber uppermost in their minds? I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that is a great deal to ask of any man or woman. It is far too much to ask of the present cabinet, far too much. Everything that has happened in this House since the formation of that cabinet leads inexorably to the conclusion that the retention of political power is the dominant principle in their decision-making.

Mr. Kilgour: It is the only one.

Mr. Hawkes: My seatmate said it is the only one.

If in the Constitution and if in the National Energy Program we see that the cabinet proposes legislation, legislation that is not good for Canada but good for re-election, if that is the dominant principle, we can expect to find it also in the government suggestion for electoral reform.

I ask hon. members to consider the following: if the first clause of this bill were that the cabinet and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) have an obligation, were required by law to select, a minimum of 12 months ahead of time, and to make known the date of the next federal election, then we could have a different attitude toward this piece of legislation. If you approach Canadians on this matter, it comes through that they have some sense that election periods sometimes go on for too long. It is a little more difficult, and it takes a little more time, energy and sophistication to realize that it is the government, and the government alone, which can set the date of a federal general election. Therefore, it is the government, and the government alone, which knows the date of the next federal election for some considerable period of time.

We do not have to look very far back in history to find evidence that the government, the cabinet in particular, backbenchers, fund raisers and a number of people, know with increasing certainty, and with considerable lead time what the date of the next federal election will be. The campaign begins on that date. Government members have that knowledge. They can begin to plan their publicity campaigns and election material and recruit their volunteers. Under our present system they have an unfair advantage.

We look at the past few election campaigns and we see that taxpayers' funds were used to begin the campaign. Look at the legislation generally brought into this House in the 30-day period prior to the dissolution of the House before a general election. Look for the bribery component in most instances. Look at what cabinet ministers do with government jets in the month prior to the dissolution of the House and calling of an election. Look at what they do with press releases and the utilization of staff and their physical location. This is an unfair situation which has existed since the beginning of this nation. The only check on the use of that power is the moral fibre of those who wield it.

The bill before us runs several pages. The underlying principle is clearly that government members opposite have decided to increase the four year advantage by another 12 days. They want to reduce the possibility of being defeated, the possibility of fair play by another 12 days. I want to issue a challenge to members opposite. They can have a 47-day election period, probably with unanimous support in this House, under one condition: give us the date of the next federal election at least six months or possibly 12 months in advance so that everyone has an equal opportunity to plan, nominate candidates and raise money. The parliamentary secretary to the government House leader says to me across the floor of this House from behind the curtain "We are not as dumb as you guys. We believe in hanging on to power."

Mr. Collenette: I didn't say that.

Mr. Hawkes: That is sufficient justification for the thesis I am advancing. They say, "if this bill is allowed to pass, will I be a victim? No. I have an advantage over all of those who choose to unseat me. I have access to this chamber and to the press gallery for an additional 12 days. My opponents have 12 days less to become known, to make my record known to the electorate in an attempt to unseat me. Anyone who wants to take my seat will be disadvantaged."

If I were totally motivated by the desire to hang on to power, I would have no trouble with this bill. However, in the long term, on account of short-term gain, to retain power will erode the commitment of the Canadian people to the democratic process. It is another step in the direction which is inherent in the Constitution. It is a fundamental belief in oligarchies, that the strong shall rule the weak. It runs counter to the very first paragraph of Beauchesne, which is the book which each of us receives upon election to this House, about the purpose of this House and Parliament.

I can see the unfairness of this 47-day period even more clearly in the case of a byelection. If you are an astute observer of the rhythm of this House as it unfolds and transpires toward a general election, you can begin to make a reasonable guess as to whether or not we are heading toward an election. That guess is likely to be reasonably correct unless, all of a sudden, an unfavourable Gallup poll comes in, and then it changes dramatically and quickly.

The provisions of this bill would affect byelections. Do all political parties have the same opportunity to see a byelection coming? Do they have equal opportunity to contest that byelection? We need only look at the past decade of behaviour by this government in relation to byelections. You can see how cleverly they wield the power to name the date.

Mr. Collenette: It is the law.

Mr. Hawkes: Who made the law?

Mr. Collenette: Everyone in this House.

Mr. Hawkes: The transitory majority wants to change the fundamental law of this country, the Constitution. That same transitory majority wants to amend the fundamental democratic protection we have which is inherent in the elections act. To be on that side of the House and say that it is this House and all of the regions and a reasonable portion of the people in those regions who support the Constitution, or this kind of electoral reform, is to be dishonest. It is dishonest to make that kind of statement. This is a transitory majority, primarily from two provinces, that is determining the Constitution of Canada. That same majority is seeking to weaken—

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question.

Mr. Hawkes: I would be happy to accept a question.

Mr. Fisher: I am curious about how the hon. member can reconcile an apparent contradiction in his comments. I am asking this honestly out of my own curiosity. One of the great differences between a parliamentary system, which I think the hon. member has actively supported and endorsed in the past and probably still does, and a presidential system is that a presidential system has a fixed election date and a parliamentary system has a floating date. Can the hon. member tell me how we can protect Parliament and still have a fixed date?

Mr. Hawkes: Kindergarten teachers could think up such complex questions. Had the hon. member been listening, near the beginning of my remarks I said that the government could simply name the date one year in advance instead of 47 days in advance. Why not tell us one year in advance when it is going to be? It would not be a violation of the parliamentary principle. There is one other part of the parliamentary system which is not the same as a presidential system, and that is that the government can be defeated by a majority of the members of this House who have the guts to do so.

• (1550)

An hon. Member: That's what happened a year ago.

Mr. Hawkes: No, what happened a year ago was an extension of the parliamentary secretary's basic commitment to retaining and hold power regardless of whether it was good for Canadians. That is what happened a year ago.

You could have another provision in the electoral law, that when the government is defeated, we can have our 60-day period. It could occur under that circumstance. But in the absence of a government defeat, give us all equal notice, six-months' notice or a year's notice, and that will not violate parliamentary democracy. That certainly is not the presidential system.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit another question? Does the hon. member feel that the Canadian people would like us to have campaigns that last a whole year?

Mr. Hawkes: I think I can speak on behalf of the voters of my riding who have noticed that some campaigns seem to go on for two or three years. The Liberals run a campaign as a government from the day they are elected till the next election. That is the point I have made. Those of us who would like to spare the voters of this country long election campaigns might be better served with certain knowledge of the date of an election further in advance. In the absence of that knowledge, I suggest that the New Democratic Party as well as this party begins to move into an election stance a considerable length of time ahead of an election. Many, many ridings in this country and many political parties had campaign headquarters rented and phones installed for the 1979 election in May and April 1978, yet that election took place only in May of 1979. The government controlled this, a great deal of money was wasted and Canadians were subjected to a very long election campaign.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Now they are opening ministerial offices all over the country.

Mr. Hawkes: That is true. The campaign offices today are called ministerial offices and the taxpayers pay for them. That is the difference. Once an election period starts, it is the donors to political parties, hopefully, who pay for most if not all of what those election campaigns cost.

An hon. Member: How much did the Conservatives get last year?

Mr. Hawkes: There was another question which I did not quite hear from across the floor.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Cousineau) on a point of order.

Mr. Cousineau: My hon. friend is suggesting, I believe, that the members of the party in power are the only ones who receive funds during election campaigns. So, my question is this: has the Progressive Conservative party not also received gifts from the public at large?

[English]

Mr. Hawkes: We receive gifts from the public at large. I suggest the Liberal party uses taxpayers' funds which, in my riding at least, are not perceived as gifts but rather as compulsory contributions to good portions of the party.

My concern is that there are so many members opposite who have questions about this bill—

[Translation]

Miss Bégin: I would add that the Progressive Conservative party also sends Liberal ministers requests for funds accompanied by membership cards, like the one I received today, in an attempt to collect funds, because I think the public is giving them quite a lot of trouble.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) will write Norman MacLeod and please take me off his mailing list.

An hon. Member: Me too.

Mr. Taylor: Take me off too.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, is the quality of debate going up or down? I would point out to the minister that I have received two letters from the Liberal party, and furthermore I responded with a donation of ten cents.

An hon. Member: Too much.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: They even squandered your dime.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I was just beginning to make the point that as you begin to examine the principles of this bill and try to write them out with some sense of clarity for the Canadian people, the degree of interest on the government side noticeably increases, and this expresses itself in an attempt by them to ask questions and receive some clarifications.

I hope that has been helpful and that it might encourage some members opposite to sit down and actually read the bill, then prepare some words of wisdom and come to this chamber and talk about it. If they intend to vote for it, Canadian people might be mystified that none of them took the trouble to come and talk about it, that they would simply stand up and vote for it without coming to the chamber to defend it. I think democracy might be somewhat better served if we were to hear some set of real or invented reasons why this bill is supportable.

It is drawing near the time for private members' hour and there is much more about which I would like to talk. Once you restrict the total election period to 47 days rather than 60 days, there are many clauses in this bill which need examination, because they really affect the voters of this country. If I may bring to the attention of the House an example, and this is not a complete list, the time allowed for revision historically has been 14 days. Any of us who have been elected to this House have encountered new Canadian citizens, people who have achieved citizenship in the preceding two months or one year, who did not comprehend the need to read the list and make sure their name was on it but who had been looking forward to the opportunity to vote. Nobody found them and nobody got their names on the list in 14 days. That seven-day revision period is one that should be looked at very closely. This is a complex country in a complex world, and seven days is not enough.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to participate in this debate. I see I have about a minute and a half in which to condense all I hope to say.

An hon. Member: It's too much.

Mr. Kilgour: They say "too much" on the opposite side. I would like to point out that in my respectful submission, the bill is the parliamentary equivalent of using a band-aid for a severe case of appendicitis. It is not likely to do much about the basic problem, whether it is a band-aid, or in this case this bill, but it allows those opposite in the government to go forward pretending they are doing something about the grave problems of electoral reform. Why not reduce the electoral period to ten days or a week, as I believe somebody suggested on the other side of the House? Why do we need 47 days? It seems to me if you want to assure your re-election, you should have an electoral period of seven days. Since my time is up I would suggest that perhaps somebody would at least address himself to this question, if anyone on the opposite side has the guts to speak on this bill later on. May I call it four o'clock?

• (1600)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. It being four o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely, public bills, notices of motions and private bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Does the House agree to stand all public bills and orders preceding Order No. 33?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

REGISTERED CHARITIES ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo) moved that Bill C-233, to encourage the role of the voluntary sector in Canadian society, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of Bill C-233 is to encourage government action to support the voluntary sector in our Canadian society. The bill calls for a mechanism. It calls for a commission to take existing reports, studies and recommendations and consolidate their suggestions for early action by the government.

The importance or the relevance of the bill is that if we are to maintain a caring society, it is imperative that we undergird the voluntary efforts of millions of Canadians in the face of today's inflationary times and the difficult economic situation many Canadians are facing.

The bill encourages action in two areas affecting the voluntary sector. It relates to the tax law and suggests the need for an amendment which could be prepared to give donors to voluntary agencies the same tax incentives as are given to those who donate to political parties. This was addressed by my colleague, the hon. member for Edmonton South (Mr. Roche), on June 9, 1980, when he spoke on a private member's motion.

The second matter to which the bill relates is the sharing of goods and services and the importance of taking tax dollars which have already been used to provide goods and equipment for government to operate and communicate and see that that asset is used during off-hours or non-peak periods by voluntary agencies in order to maximize the use of those tax dollars. This can be done and has been done in some areas where there has been a will to do so. The bill lists several areas which are examples only of what might be done.

The idea I am setting forward in Bill C-233 is not a new one. It has its roots in a substantial volume of research and study which can be traced at least as far back as the 1951 Massey report of the Royal Commission on Arts, Letters and Sciences. There is a large body of research into the needs of the voluntary sector as well as the different means of providing aid in kind assistance to address particular needs. My bill calls for a commission to report its recommended guidelines to the Minister of Finance within six months of its establishment.

Registered Charities

In encouraging passage today by the House of Bill C-233 I would like to underline the importance of the contribution made by the voluntary sector to both the Canadian way of life and our national economy. I do so having been involved in the voluntary sector as a field director for CUSO, as a director of the national voluntary thrust of the Canadian Centennial International Development Program, as an executive director of the Manitoba Association for World Development, as chairman of the Inter-Church Aid Committee and as one who has sat on the boards of a number of voluntary agencies nationally and a number of community and service clubs at the local level.

According to a survey, highlighted by Statistics Canada in the context of National Volunteer Week which was held April 27 to May 3, some 2.7 million Canadians, or 15.2 per cent of the country's working age population, performed volunteer work between February, 1979, and February, 1980. The survey, to be published later this month, was the largest ever conducted on this topic in Canada. A total of some 18,700 households were contacted, which represented 43,000 persons. Results also indicate that 54 per cent of the volunteers were women and 46 per cent were men. An estimated 49 per cent of the volunteers were between the ages of 25 and 44. Another 36 per cent were 45 years of age or over, with the remaining 15 per cent divided almost equally between the 20 to 24 and 15 to 19 age groups.

I would like to quote briefly from the introduction to the forthcoming publication, as follows:

> While volunteer work is as old as charity itself, it has become increasingly topical in recent years, and the escalating interest appears to be attributable to a variety of factors. In part it can be related to the advocacy of women's groups and others who wish to promote the recognition of the importance, relevance, and value of unpaid community work, both in itself, and as it relates to possible subsequent paid employment. It can also be traced to a recognition that during times of fiscal restraint at all levels of government, the work of volunteers represents an even greater contribution to community well-being, which would otherwise not exist. Current levels of interest in this topic are also a result of a growing awareness that many of the services provided by volunteer workers, and the profound dedication which they bring to their work, cannot be fully duplicated in the field of social services provided by paid workers.

These figures in the survey now provide an up-to-date framework for the body of research which includes "People in Action", the 1977 report of the National Advisory Council on Voluntary Action, which was presented to the then secretary of state, the present Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts). It also includes two reports prepared under the auspices of the Canadian Council on Social Development entitled "Volunteers: the Untapped Potential" which was produced in 1975 and "Tapping the Untapped Potential: Towards a National Policy on Volunteerism" which was published in 1977. The body of research culminated in the briefs prepared for the meeting between government and the voluntary sector held January 29 to January 31 here in Ottawa called "Consultation '81" and organized by the Committee of National Voluntary Organizations.

Two additional statistics which were circulated at Consultation '81 arose from the labour force survey released by Statistics Canada on January 28 of this year. Total volunteer hours worked during the year ending February, 1980, were 373,991,000, which is equivalent to approximately 218,000 person-years of volunteer labour.

If this volunteer labour were compensated at the average industrial wage, it would represent a wage forgone by these volunteers of $3.5 billion for the year ending February, 1980.

The keynote address at Consultation '81 was given by the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Fox), and I would like to read excerpts of that speech since, in the non-partisan atmosphere which exists with respect to this subject, many of the minister's remarks can be shared by many of us here. The minister said the following in that context:

> There was a time when a fair amount of mistrust existed in the minds of members of voluntary organizations when they viewed government. There were reasons for that mistrust. In some cases, organizations which had established themselves to promote sound goals were superseded by government programs which took over their mandate. When we now look at that pattern, we wonder if it was the right approach. Would we have been better to have helped voluntarism to give help, rather than giving help ourselves? This is a question which I feel we should answer in seeking stronger linkages between voluntarism and government. I think that political leaders have come to realize that the voluntary movement offers a rich resource for the delivery of help and services.

The minister was speaking—and I do not wish to take his remarks out of context—of the much debated argument over the advisability of financial support of the government for the voluntary sector, and the possible costs of independence and initiative which are so vital to all voluntary activity. It is my hope, in returning to the notion of aid in kind assistance, that the independence of any agency would be both encouraged and nurtured and their effectiveness so enlarged that centrally-administered government programs could be reduced.

The minister went on to discuss some of the ways by which he felt government could be beneficial to the voluntary sector. He said:

> One way is through the tax system. The give and take proposal is an example . . . In my role as "advocate minister" to the voluntary sector, I am of the view that I must ensure that the National Voluntary Organizations' tax credit proposal is given a thorough hearing by government.

● (1610)

He went on to discuss the problem of the definition of the term "charitable organization" for use by Revenue Canada in granting charitable status to a voluntary organization. This would enable it, as you know, Mr. Speaker, to issue tax deductible receipts for donations.

The minister stated that his colleagues:

> —are anxious also to put at the disposal of the voluntary sector the results of government conducted research . . . This will be done by establishing a resource centre devoted to this task.

He also said:

> I am committed to the development of a comprehensive federal government action policy developed jointly with the voluntary sector . . . I have directed my department to provide toward this end the support services of the Assistance to Community Groups Program, which I am renaming the Voluntary Action Program . . . I want to emphasize that this is much more than a cosmetic change. We are devoted to implementing a new thrust to co-operate with the voluntary sector.

He went on to suggest:

> —a joint means by which we may ensure that information flows within your own network of organizations, and between government and yourselves.

It is my hope, Mr. Speaker, that the government would see the commission proposed in this bill as a vehicle for the marriage of the research that has already been completed over many years and what the Secretary of State calls a new thrust to co-operate with the voluntary sector. With the announced commitment of the minister and the well known capacity of the voluntary sector for moving things ahead, I believe that such a commission could bear fruit in under six months. The evidence has been gathered; now is the time to show that commitment to follow the words of praise with some government action in terms of goods and services and some tax incentives.

This perception has been confirmed for me by the significant national support I have received from circulating this bill throughout the volunteer community in Canada. I believe that this response has also been communicated to the Secretary of State and to the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). They will be aware of the support for Bill C-233 expressed by such organizations as the United Nations Association in Canada, the Canadian Mental Health Association, The Order of St. John, the Canadian Paraplegic Association, Frontier College, the Canadian Diabetes Association, Inter Pares, The National Voluntary Organization, the Canadian Public Health Association, and CUSO, whose anniversary we were marking in the House this morning. There are many more, but I would like to go on record as thanking those organizations and others for the inestimable gift which their endeavours represent to all Canadians.

As well, Mr. Speaker, I would like to give this House some indication of the support and interest of many of the smaller agencies. I have found across my riding interest from such groups as, to mention but a few, the Kitchener-Waterloo Regional Council of Canadian Bankers, the North Waterloo Boy Scouts Association, even a chapter of the Mennonite Church. I have found that interest also among the many individuals who see this direction and stimulation by government of that sector as being vital to the quality of life we accept.

Although I would like to continue this discussion which I feel has a direct bearing on the lives of a great majority of concerned and committed Canadians, as has been borne out by the responses to me and to other members of this House, according to our tradition it is now time for the House to hear from other members and representatives of the government. I am as anxious, as are any of these groups and individuals I have mentioned, to hear the response and find out what the timetable will be for action, because there has been a lot of rhetoric around this theme for many years from the government. However, regardless of the government's decision on whether to talk the bill out or let it go on to committee, I hope that it will indicate very shortly a timetable or deadline as to when it will move to support this sector.

I want to thank this House for this opportunity to speak about some of the lessons I have learned in my life from the various voluntary agencies of which I have been a part and from others. I know that all members of this House join with me not only in congratulating the volunteers of Canada for their contribution, but by passing this bill or letting it move through the House to the next stage, indicating on the part of the government and of Parliament their sense of urgency in developing and encouraging this great Canadian resource. This resource needs to be tapped as well as do the natural resources about which we talk so much, for if it is not cared for, we cannot, within the budget of Canada, replace what is there in terms of making our society the compassionate and caring community that we have and that we cherish.

Mr. Kelly: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the last speaker? I will preface it by saying that I am supportive of his bill's intentions but I would like him to tell me how this new commission would affect the existence of the present National Advisory Council on Voluntary Action? Does he see one replacing the other or does he see the two of them merging or the two of them coexisting?

Mr. McLean: I think, Mr. Speaker, the commission is to take the evidence which has been compiled, for example, that contained in the government's major study "People in Action"; the reports of the existing council which are on record; and to recommend to the Minister of Finance what decisions should be taken in relation to the budget and what policy decisions should be taken by cabinet in relation to goods and services that could be made available. So the commission would be established for a short term with a specific task, not to do the work of the councils, but rather to take the evidence and turn it into political action so that we do not have more reports on the record, more briefs and more indications of support, the only consequence of which is to leave that sector frustrated.

Mr. Kelly: One further question, if I may, Mr. Speaker. The commission then would exist for one purpose only and after it has made its recommendations it would then automatically disappear. Is that correct? There will be no specific time limit on it? It would not exist for six or eight months and then disappear?

Mr. McLean: Mr. Speaker, the provisions of the bill call for a period of not more than six months, and if the evaluation of the existing recommendations can be done and presented to the Minister of Finance in three months, then the commission would go out of existence. Obviously a private member's bill cannot deal directly with finance. Therefore, I am recommending a mechanism to take the intentions of the government, of this party when we were in government, and to move that forward, not to go on and on with reports that everybody only nods to. So the commission has a specific limited frame of reference.

Mr. Douglas Fisher (Mississauga North): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak very briefly about this bill because I support it, and I would like to underline some of the sentiments written into the bill and some of the ideas that the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. McLean) has brought out over the past few minutes.

It seems to me the hon. member referred to some of the non-partisan statements being made by the Secretary of State (Mr. Fox) on the topic of voluntarism and he was quite complimentary about the atmosphere that the minister had created. I would like to turn that compliment around and apply it to the hon. member for Waterloo whose speech was a non-partisan effort which underlined quite clearly his evident concern for voluntarism and community improvement. I think the hon. member should be congratulated for his very evident non-partisan spirit on this.

All of us, I think, support at least the principle behind the bill. The hon. member spoke about the very delicate balance between the public and private sector. I have noticed over the past year as the member for Mississauga a distinct difference between the atmosphere in my riding and, for example, that in the city of Toronto. In my riding a great premium is placed on voluntary activity and on the contribution of a citizen to the betterment of his community. In other communities, such as Toronto, the government might be somewhat more active and step in and take an activist's role; whereas, in Mississauga the government tends to encourage local groups and let the groups do the work themselves.

It would be quite accurate to say that in my riding we would prefer to see volunteers take the lead in community improvement and let government provide the facilities. We would prefer to see the volunteers take on the activities and the ongoing leadership. There are literally thousands of people involved in the entire spectrum of volunteer activities across Mississauga. We have one of the largest soccer leagues in the country. There are community festivals and social activist programs.

For example, I am thinking of the joint co-operation between the federal government and volunteers in Mississauga to help the Vietnamese refugees. There are scores of families who are receiving financial aid and some training through federal facilities. They have been settled in the community thanks to the hard work and the dedication of churches, social clubs, service clubs and individual citizens who have provided them with clothing and housing as well as information on medical treatment, schooling and all social services. Above all, they have become friends of these families. We have followed the model very successfully across Mississauga where the government has made the activities of volunteers possible.

There are many other examples in my constituency where this type of thing has happened. For example, the community saw the master plan for the Toronto airport unveiled. Quite frankly, the master plan attempts to make Toronto airport a good neighbour. This is thanks to the hard work and the pounding of pavement by volunteer and ratepayers' groups.

Over the past ten years they have attempted to get across to the officials in the Department of Transport that it not only serves aviation but it also serves the local community. Those volunteer groups have added substantially to the improvement of life in Mississauga, Etobicoke and Brampton. They made the effort; they went to the airport and demanded an improvement in facilities. They are good examples of how volunteers groups can outdo the government. They can see a lot further than the government. The end result is a direct public benefit. The people got together out of concern to help make a better community.

Also in the Malton community, a series of ratepayers' groups, social clubs and interest groups got together with the Malton Community Council to advise governments on citizenship, education, day care and a range of other very personal activities, as well as conducting their own activities in their own programs. The result is that the small town of Malton, which normally would be drowned by the surrounding urban environment, has maintained its own identity. Volunteers got together and made the place a living entity unto itself; it is a very good community. The intent in this bill is to support such people and to use government services to underline and support voluntary activity.

Many times we have seen the government moving toward taking over a voluntary cause. This is not always very successful. Fortunately, the government is not doing that as much any more. The volunteer centre for Peel directs volunteers in hundreds of activities across the region. For example, representatives of the centre went to the government and obtained a student grant which enabled them to hire a student to work on a specific project over the summer. It is automatically self-liquidating; it is a summer project. When the student leaves, the volunteer activity will still be there and the benefit will still be there. It will be an ongoing benefit, thanks to the volunteers who are continuing to work through the centre.

We use the summer employment grant a lot across Mississauga to develop such a pattern. The Credit Valley Treatment Centre and the Mississauga Children's Fund obtained students to come in and do some of the special one-time work. The volunteers were there first; the volunteers will be there after the students leave. The federal assistance is enriching a special part of those programs and leaving these projects in a better position to contribute to Mississauga.

In the Peel Multicultural Council last January someone was hired under the winter program through CEIC. A staff person took the efforts of 45 different concerned multicultural groups and pulled them all together in order to give them some focus, a newsletter and a place to telephone during the day for help and for co-ordination. The grant will end some time in January, but the Peel Multicultural Council will be much stronger because of that person's contribution. I suspect the Multicultural Council will go out into the community to find some volunteers and businessmen who will fund that person's payroll through the year 1982. It is a very small amount of money federally, but it was a huge amount of money for the Peel Multicultural Council.

We find repeatedly across Canada that the federal government makes a very small contribution relative to its total budget, but a huge contribution relative to the quality of life in local communities. There is no guarantee that the federal involvement will be welcome. For example, yesterday I was talking to Mayor Hazel McCallion. The McCallion family are deeply involved in the Bread and Honey Festival in Streetsville. This weekend, approximately 19,000 to 20,000 people will come to Streetsville for a one-day event. It has been totally operated without government assistance for ten years. The various exhibitors and participants make contributions, including myself. I do not know whether that counts as government assistance. Then, when the festival is over, it ends up with a profit which allows them to finance some work in preparation for the following year.

The same pattern is followed in Malton, Meadowvale, and Erin Mills. These volunteers get together without government assistance. The experience they contribute enriches the communities.

There was a startling example of this a couple of weeks ago. A citizen of the year dinner was held. Approximately 400 people attended, each of them representing hundreds more. Their intention was to pick one person, and by picking that person, the late Ted Glistan, they were able to celebrate volunteer activity and their own personal contributions to the city.

I think we underplay this too much here. We downplay the importance of volunteers too much in Ottawa. We do not pay attention to the impact of volunteers on the country and individual communities. People simply get together to have a good time. In doing so, they add depth and variety to their community. It does not matter if they are activist groups, such as the airport group or the Malton Information Centre, they go after a specific cause. They enrich the community by achieving their goal. It does not matter whether it is a sports group such as hockey or the track and field people who are in the Olympic class; they are adding greatly to the activities young people are able to enjoy in a huge area like Mississauga. It does not matter what role these people play in festivals, sports or activist causes, they indelibly change cities such as the ones in the riding I represent.

● (1630)

Looking at Mississauga from the outside, you might see it as just a huge suburb, but once you are there and involved in its life, you will find that what appears to be massive and anonymous is really broken down into a great deal of variety with active and intimate groups making the city much richer. A number of these people have done this with government assistance. I think they are proud to have received that assistance. I think they know that they cannot rely on it totally. They are pleased to receive it. Some of the programs which we have used in Mississauga, such as the summer student program or the winter program, have added greatly, not only to the individuals who have been hired but to the community at large.

I started off by saying I would be brief. I simply want to give recognition to the people who are doing a very good job in my riding. I also want to acknowledge the hon. member who has brought forward this bill. I think he has an idea which is worth promoting, whether today in this House or whether it is done through the government and the Secretary of State. This is an idea which should be pushed very hard. I want to congratulate the hon. member for Waterloo. I will end my speech at this point so that he has a chance to carry on.

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make six main points with relation to Bill C-233. First, we support the principles of this bill, although we are concerned that it is far too limited in the assistance it offers to charitable organizations. However, we do support the grants in aid which are mentioned int the bill.

Second, we are concerned that the bill and the establishment of a commission should not be used as delaying tactics which would slow up some of the other changes which are needed, particularly changes with regard to tax reform and the provision for support services and grants for voluntary organizations.

Third, we do not feel that another study is needed. I do not really think that is what is intended because, as has been mentioned, the "People in Action" study done by the National Advisory Council in September, 1977, is very comprehensive. The study suggested many recommendations which can be implemented and which should be implemented by the government right away.

Fourth, we support the reform of the tax credit system, which has been mentioned by other speakers. We also support the give and take tax reform which has been advocated by the Committee on National Voluntary Organizations.

Fifth, we particularly want to broaden the concept of registered charities. In our view there is not much point in having these extra services available if they will only be available to established organizations, the registered ones such as the United Way, which has a professional staff and all the advantages and expertise to help it. We urge that the concept of registered charities be expanded as part of the commission's activities in this regard.

Bill C-233 proposes that a government commission be established to issue guidelines for supplying aid in kind to registered charities. As was mentioned, the bill particularly proposes the use of government telephone lines and computer time in off-peak hours. It proposes to offer special rates on charters, excursion flights and rail travel, special postal rates for informational material and the use of unused premises—government premises, I presume—or meeting rooms.

I support these proposals as far as they go, again provided that these services are made available also to consumer groups, self-help groups and advocacy groups which may not now be considered under the title of "registered charities". Why should taxpayers not have access through recognized organizations, which are registered provincially, to facilities and equipment for which they pay out of their tax dollars? Undoubtedly, maintenance and security problems will be used as an excuse by bureaucrats who resent the intrusion of ordinary citizens into their domain. However, our experience has shown that these problems can be resolved if the responsibility to serve the public is a required expectation of all government bureaucracies and departments.

When I was an area manager for Vancouver Resources Board, all local offices of this health and welfare service were planned and administered under the direction of a locally elected board of citizens. Community facilities were designated for community use and had to be open for community groups to use on evenings, weekends and even during the daytime. As a result, people developed a much more positive attitude toward their social service centres. I think the same thing could happen with government bureaucracies. Community schools are another example of where government facilities are being opened and expanded for community use by all age groups on weekends, evenings and all summer long. Again, these facilities come under the direction of local citizens' organizations, which is as it should be. So there are precedents for these kinds of measures. From a federal point of view I would certainly support them.

If this approach works in local communities, why should federal facilities not be more accessible? The problem is, of course, that most of our federal bureaucracies are too centralized and too luxurious for many casual neighbourhood groups. They are sometimes too intimidating for poor people's organizations as places where they could hold informal gatherings. Opening the doors of public buildings could help to humanize Manpower Centres and other federal bureaucracies.

The proposal in Bill C-233 to allow registered charities to use government phones and to enjoy reduced mailing rates is a good suggestion, provided that these services are made available to low-income groups as well as to established registered societies. Non-profit societies have few funds and are cut off from communications with similar organizations across Canada. They are cut off from the government and its policies here in Ottawa. This is a particularly serious matter for organizations which happen to be located in the outlying regions of Canada, in our eastern and western provinces and, of course, in the north. From the point of view of fairness and equity across Canada, I would urge that travel arrangements and these community facilities be made available.

I would now like to move to the main concern which we have, that is to say, that this bill really does not go far enough, both in offering services and in finding a way to redefine the term "registered charities". Although we support the bill in principle, we have serious concerns about this matter. Our first concern is with the major reform of the tax credit system. The National Voluntary Organization, which is a coalition of some 120 national associations, has recommended a tax reform proposal entitled "give and take". It proposes to make two major changes to the Income Tax Act in order to increase donations to registered charities. First, it proposes to eliminate the standard $100 deduction which is now in place, and which we know does not encourage charitable donations. Its second proposal is to introduce 50 per cent tax credit so that taxpayers can deduct 50 per cent of their total charitable donations from their tax payable rather than from their taxable income, as is the case now. The research of the NVO shows that this proposal will provide more incentive for people to make charitable donations. It is a more equitable measure, since all taxpayers will receive the same benefit regardless of their income. It also creates incentives to give more for less, as is the case with tax credits with respect to political donations. The amount of money which the government forgoes under the $100 exemption is now some $550 million, so it would benefit by the acceptance of tax credits.

We support the given proposal for tax reforms, but only on condition that the definition of "registered charity" be extended to include self-help and consumer organizations and other legitimate community organizations such as welfare rights groups which may have an advocacy function as well as a service responsibility. This latter point, then, is the major area of our concern.

At the present time, most registered charities which qualify for a tax number under the Income Tax Act are established, largely middle-class organizations which have lots of Liberals and Conservatives on their boards, I am sure, who are reluctant to act in an advocacy role for changes. Those which have a long tradition of working for policies and reforms for their clients have been increasingly concerned in the last two years because the government has been taking steps to try to take away income tax benefits from organizations which have any kind of an advocacy responsibility. I understand that this matter is now before the courts. We very much hope that a broader interpretation will be the result.

I notice, under "Charitable Purpose and Objectives", an information circular of Revenue Canada put out in August of 1980 in which it states that "These courts have characterized the objects which are charitable in law within four categories, and they include organizations which are aimed at relieving poverty, the advancement of religion, the advancement of education, and other purposes beneficial to the community as a whole in a way which the law regards as charitable". That clearly indicates that welfare rights groups, tenant advocacy groups, neighbourhood groups, women's groups, native groups, and many other organizations which are working for reforms should be included and be able to apply and qualify as registered charities.

I would also like to say that the long established organizations, which now are registered charities, in their long tradition actually have been advocacy groups, but their style is more acceptable sometimes to the people in power. For example, CNIB, of course, was formed to work for people who are blind and who need services and often need changes in policies and legislation which affect them. The John Howard Society has a proud tradition of working for penal reform. Organizations of the disabled, particularly this year, but also in years past, have worked aggressively for changes in building codes and access to jobs, transportation and housing for handicapped persons. We feel that it is now time to extend the rights which are available to these groups as registered charities to other groups which are just as deserving, have fewer funds and skills, and do not have the sophisticated experience and expertise, but certainly deserve the chance to develop those if they can get more funding in the way of income tax deductions.

I would like to mention particularly that today I phoned some of the representatives of the anti-poverty movement. I am pleased to note that the Minister for National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin), who has been a great supporter of these groups, believes very strongly that in a democratic society we must enable poor people themselves to work for changes on their own behalf. In B.C., the federated anti-poverty groups and a coalition of a number of groups are working very hard with no funds to expand. They are not able to qualify as charitable organizations and have not registered, and at this time believe that they are not qualified to do this under the present federal income tax regulations. That is another example of just how important it is to expand the Income Tax Act itself.

Self-help groups were dealt with in the "People in Action" report, and were defined as follows: "Self-help activities provide an environment where people with the same problems can get together and discuss them, while at the same time providing services." Surely, that is not so revolutionary or so intimidating to the government that we could not include self-help groups as being responsible and justifying the same kind of benefits under the Income Tax Act.

My riding of Vancouver East is a working-class district with a high proportion of unemployed people, many public housing projects with a large proportion of people on welfare, and many immigrant families. It has a very long and proud tradition of self-help. Over the years, we have had many militant citizen organizations. I hope we still do. If they had not been militant, they would never have achieved the kind of community development and self-help programs for which they fought so hard. We have many self-help citizen organizations, non-profit enterprises and co-operatives which should also be included under these provisions.

Tenant organizations are fighting to control rents and to improve housing conditions, particularly during this desperate housing crisis and the high cost of housing for both tenants and home owners. Neighbourhood planning groups in the five neighbourhoods within my riding have organized and worked with city planners. They continue to press for changes in developing liveable communities and neighbourhoods. People on welfare, many of whom are mothers raising families on their own, are fighting for a better life. Once again, their energies renewed with a new generation of people, they are trying to fight for their rights, for liveable incomes and a better chance for the future for themselves and their kids.

Family centres have developed out of government sponsored employment programs. Again, they are community self-help centres employing local people when they have the funds to employ anyone. They work to help children at risk, to prevent families from breaking up, to strengthen parents with parenting groups and mutual support kind of activities.

Of course, like any other riding, we have many ad hoc people's movements starting. They are starting, perhaps, in some neighbourhoods; but they spread across cities, provinces and across our country.

Women's groups are another example. Certainly, the ad hoc women's conference held in Ottawa a few months ago is a great example of women organizing on short notice and coming together. They had no help at all. What a help it would have been had they had phone privileges, mailing privileges and some help with travel expenses to come to that very important conference.

Of course, we also have many consumer groups. The latest is a very active organization of people fighting to protect their homes from the adverse effects of urea formaldehyde foam insulation. They are organizing in cities across the country, particularly in Vancouver, and are demanding government action to compensate them for the removal of this poisonous insulation from their homes.

These are all very worth-while groups which have a very important function. They are credible organizations which could become registered societies and establish that credibility. That should be available to them so they would have the advantages of income tax deductions and tax write-offs for donations to help them organize and carry out their important roles. These groups would also welcome aid of the kind mentioned in this bill, such as phone and travel services, and certainly help with getting out regular newsletters to their members and to others to tell them about the issues which concern them, the kind of programs they are developing and the need for action at various levels of government.

Mr. Jarvis: This is an NDP filibuster! They are against volunteers.

Mrs. Mitchell: This is not an NDP filibuster.

Mr. Jarvis: It certainly is. It has been 20 minutes so far.

Mrs. Mitchell: I am certainly in support of this bill, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Jarvis: You are against the bill.

Mrs. Mitchell: I would like to say that I began some of this action, and was supported by the Conservative members during the Conservative government—

Mr. Jarvis: This is hypocrisy.

Mrs. Mitchell: —which developed a voluntarism committee which certainly supported some of the points I am raising.

Mr. Jarvis: You are not supporting this bill.

Mrs. Mitchell: Contrary to the quibbling from my colleague to my right—

Mr. Jarvis: I am not quibbling.

Mrs. Mitchell: —my party and I do support the principles of Bill C-233, Mr. Speaker. We feel it is very important that the aid in kind, which will be available if this bill is implemented, and if the commission can convince the government that this is necessary, this must be made available to low-income self-help groups, to consumer groups, to non-profit co-operatives and to other non-profit societies which are sometimes involved in non-partisan social action.

• (1650)

This requires action in addition to this bill, which perhaps the same commission could undertake to broaden and perhaps to give a more democratic interpretation of registered charities under the Income Tax Act. It also requires a reform of the income tax system itself. This was recommended through the give-take tax proposal to encourage tax donations for those organizations whose greatest need is for ongoing funds as well as for health and aid in kind.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief because of the extended speech my friend to the left has delivered. She said that this bill does not go far enough in the objectives that she would have us follow. But I say to her that it is better to have half a loaf than to spend 20 minutes trying to break a whole one.

I presume the government will talk out this bill because we have had no comment at all from the member from Mississauga directed toward this bill or the reasons why there might be some objections on the part of the government to the bill. In view of the worth-while initiative expressed by my friend from Waterloo, I thought the government side would at least have had the courtesy to address the intent of the bill so we would know how we might move in future to meet these objections of the government in trying to achieve those worth-while objectives of the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. McLean).

Canada is particularly blessed to have the strength of the volunteer sector in this country. It dates from our pioneer days when the whole tradition of self-help was developed as we rolled back the frontier. It is very difficult to maintain in the type of society that we have, as was pointed out by my friend, the hon. member for Mississauga North (Mr. Fisher), particularly in the large urban communities when so many other things are happening around us.

I want to support one element of the bill in particular which I think is very important in view of the oppressive power of government in society today, as it relates to funding, namely the financial support of charitable and volunteer organizations. What we see in the directions that have been proposed toward a change in the treatment of donations to charitable organizations is a means of withdrawing some of the financial support directly from government to support that is indirect, and in so doing to give these organizations a means whereby they can develop a greater degree of independence. If they can convince their fellow citizens of the merit of the services they wish to provide, then they are able to go ahead within their own mandate and with their own supporters to provide that service rather than to rely on governments.

Today as we see the Ontario government being forced to curtail funding of a number of these organizations, the services are contracted. Unless they are able to replace those services, to be financed by independent funding, we will see an over-all cutback in the service provided by volunteer and charitable organizations.

I think we know that it is impossible for governments to provide all the services needed or desired by people in our society today. For that reason, it is very important for a government to try to be a catalyst through the various means that have been set out in Section 6 of Bill C-233, both the aid in kind and the increased support through funding.

I view Bill C-233 as a call for action, certainly not the delaying action which my friend to the left has stated, but as a mechanism that we might move ahead to provide a focus for the government to take action on the various proposals that have been put forward.

I encourage the government to accept the principles which have been established in Bill C-233, to refer it to committee where the particular objections of the government can be addressed in order to develop a bill which will be compatible with the government's objectives as well as those of the hon. member for Waterloo.

Mr. Knowles: Question.

Mr. Jean-Guy Dubois (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, what struck me in looking at Bill C-233 in the name of my friend opposite, the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. McLean), was subclause 6(3), which says that in this section, "registered charity" has the same meaning as in the Income Tax Act. This leads me to believe, Mr. Speaker, that it is all very well to introduce such a bill which can have—my hon. colleague has certainly great ideas with regard to this bill, but when it comes to the voluntary sector, we must refer you to existing organizations, and this is the basis of my argument. We must not always depend upon the government. Charities already have available to them various mechanisms to obtain assistance. In my constituency, I had to intervene and make representations to the Department of National Revenue so that certain organizations could be recognized as charities under the terms of the Income Tax Act and be able to give out receipts for income tax purposes. As I had to take care of a few such cases myself, Mr. Speaker, my colleagues no doubt both on this side of the House and on the other side have had to check with the Department of National Revenue for the licensing of some organizations. I was thinking about two examples in my own constituency, Entraide Sainte-Victoire and Fondation Hôtel-Dieu d'Arthabaska. These are voluntary organizations, groups of people who take care of various sectors. The latter is made up of people who would use the provisions of the bill to bring financial assistance to a hospital in providing equipment not supplied by the government because of budgetary restrictions. What did we do? We asked the Quebec government to issue a charter approved by the Department of Social Affairs, and we also asked the Department of Revenue to approve this organization as a registered charity so that it could issue donation receipts for income tax purposes. This is one type of assistance provided by the government and, of course, the provincial governments do the same.

In this regard, I see that the bill would replace the voluntary organizations, which still have a role to play, and the government does not always have to help them. With regard to postal charges, I was very interested in the bill to establish a Crown corporation. In fact, it was proposed that no additional organizations could enjoy special rates.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it five o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. The hour provided for private members' business has now expired.

It being five o'clock, this House stands adjourned until Monday next at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

ISRAELI ATTACK ON NUCLEAR REACTOR IN IRAQ—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton South): Madam Speaker, the Israeli attack on a nuclear reactor in Iraq is an event of utmost importance with respect to world security. The entire world has reason to feel the deepest concern for global safety. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall):

That this House expresses its deepest concern to the government of Israel with respect to the attack and reported destruction of a nuclear reactor in Iraq, and urges all governments in the mid-East and elsewhere to moderation in any contemplated response, and to put foremost the safety of mankind in the increasingly dangerous nuclear age.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the introduction of this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: Hon. members have heard the proposed motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIANIZATION OF INDUSTRY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Madam Speaker, the reports from the Grit policy meeting on the weekend indicate that Canadianization of industry will take place in much the same way as the energy Canadianization has been carried out, namely, state ownership.

Under Standing Order 43, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That this House advise the government that any program to Canadianize industry be so designed as to encourage individual Canadians to purchase companies and shares in companies located in Canada and not to purchase industries by a government-controlled corporation such as the Canada Development Corporation or a new Crown corporation created for that purpose.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

FUNCTIONING OF SEWAGE SYSTEM IN FORT RUPERT, QUE.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Greenaway (Cariboo-Chilcotin): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The Cree village of Fort Rupert in northern Quebec is finally acquiring a new sewage system. However, the Cree are now faced with the problem of having insufficient electrical power to run the system. Several weeks ago, as a result of plugging in a four-slice toaster at the construction camp, the electrical system for the entire village was shorted out. This is particularly ironic, given the fact that Fort Rupert is in close proximity to one of the world's largest hydroelectric plants. Therefore, in light of the urgent need for a functioning sewage system and that such a system will not operate without sufficient electrical power, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor):

That this House instruct the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to provide the necessary electrical infrastructure to the village of Fort Rupert as stipulated in the James Bay and Northern Quebec agreement in order that the sewage system may operate.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

DUBIN REPORT—APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE TO DRAFT IMPLEMENTING LEGISLATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the report on aviation safety by Justice Dubin identifies areas of serious safety problems such as patterns of accidents, the role of senior staff within the department, and implementation of air safety recommendations, and whereas these factors are extremely important in terms of air safety, and whereas the committee appointed by the minister, with the exception of one person, has been touched by the criticism in the justice's report, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom):

● (1410)

That the Minister of Transport appoint an impartial committee to draft the required legislation, regulations and structural plan to implement Justice Dubin's report and, further, that the minister refer the report of Justice Dubin to the Standing Committee on Transport.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

RIOTS AT BRITISH COLUMBIA INSTITUTIONS—REFERRAL TO PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Within a period of one week, two riots have taken place in federal penal institutions in my riding of Fraser Valley East, resulting in the destruction of approximately 50 per cent of the Matsqui institution complex and the damaging of 90 cells and destruction of furniture in the Kent maximum security prison.

In view of this challenge by troublemakers, and the wanton destruction of facilities provided at taxpayers' expense, and in view of the failure of the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) to make a statement to the House on these incidents, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen):

That this matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs for study and report.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NUCLEAR ENERGY

CANADIAN ASSOCIATION CONFERENCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The second annual conference of the Canadian Nuclear Association is being held in Ottawa this week and is combined with the twenty-first annual Canadian Nuclear Society international conference. The topics of discussion will include nuclear energy as a method of energy self-sufficiency, nuclear exports, waste management, and public acceptability. The conference represents the direct and indirect involvement of 55,000 people in activities related to a high technology energy source which faces the danger of extinction by 1984 if changes are not made in our management.

Since the efforts of the conference are a valuable source of information for nuclear policy, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Reid):

That this House request that a summary of the findings be presented to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources for his consideration during the internal government review of nuclear energy.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

IMPROVEMENT OF WIDOWS' BENEFITS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 and seconded by the hon. member for Beaches (Mr. Young), I move:

That this House notes that, under various government superannuation plans, if the wife dies first the surviving widower's pension is 100 per cent, but if the husband dies first the surviving widow's pension is only 50 per cent, and this House calls on the government to bring in the necessary legislation to correct this situation on an interim basis by raising the widow's pension in all cases to 75 per cent and to declare that the eventual goal is pension equality between men and women.

AGRICULTURE

CALL FOR REMOVAL OF FINANCE MINISTER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bud Bradley (Haldimand-Norfolk): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of great importance. Last week the Ontario Federation of Agriculture held a farm economy seminar in Toronto to discuss the problems which face agriculture today, problems which are forcing many bankruptcies. The federation invited the ministers of agriculture and finance for the province of Ontario and the federal government. Premier Davis, Mr. Henderson and Mr. Miller of the province of Ontario attended, but only the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) attended for the federal government. This confirms our opinion of the importance the federal Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) places on agriculture and related problems in Canada today. He could not care less. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid):

That this House direct the Prime Minister to remove the Minister of Finance from his post and replace him with someone who understands the problems facing farmers today and who is willing to listen to them.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

PENSIONS OF RETIRED MEMBERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The government has not kept its promise to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. The Treasury Board has stolen over $100,000 from each and every RCMP member who retired between January 1 and March 31, 1981. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall):

● (1415)

That the salaries of the Treasury Board ministers be reduced to $1 a year and that the savings thus effected be put in a special fund to compensate partially those who are the retired victims of the broken promises of this morally bankrupt government. The retired RCMP and their families deserve fair treatment, and ministers who dishonestly break their promises should be the ones who suffer, not the retired RCMP members and their families.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE ECONOMY

INCREASE IN FARM BANKRUPTCIES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance who will be aware of his colleague's, the Minister of Agriculture's statement last week wherein he called the 78 per cent increase in farm bankruptcies "a significant increase", an understatement indeed from this particular Minister of Agriculture. He also referred to a number of foreclosures and forced sales of farms. Of even greater concern are the much larger number of Canadian farmers who are withdrawing voluntarily from production rather than face the stigma of bankruptcy or foreclosure. In either case the result is the same: a loss of farm production.

I ask the minister what measures he proposes to take, and when will those measures be taken to attack this national disgrace?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, as I have indicated several times in this House, I have held discussions with the Minister of Agriculture and will continue to do so with a view to determining whether any measures to assist could be taken in the present circumstances. If any such future measures are decided upon, they will be announced in the House at the appropriate time.

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION LOANS

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): My supplementary is also directed to the Minister of Finance, who said last week:

The truly sensitive person is the one who is thinking of the long-term interests of the Canadian people.

I point out to him that a farm withdrawn from production often takes years and years to regain its productive capacity. To avoid this, does the Minister of Finance agree with the Minister of Agriculture's proposal regarding the Farm Credit Corporation which was contained in that minister's letter to the Ottawa Citizen last week, and I quote:

—instituting a moratorium for three years on payments of interest and principal.

Is the minister in accord with his colleague's proposal?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, as I indicated in the House earlier, I am not undertaking as a matter of daily practice to comment on the views of every person in the country who may make comments on the economy—

An hon. Member: This is not every person.

Mr. MacEachen: —and I have already dealt with that question—

Mr. Crosbie: Who speaks for the government?

Mr. MacEachen: —last week specifically addressed to me with respect to the letter in the newspaper by the Minister of Agriculture, by saying that I was holding discussions with him on the subject of the Farm Credit Corporation and if any changes were made as a result of these discussions, then of course the Minister of Agriculture would be making an announcement. However, I assure the hon. member that the difficulties that the farming population may be facing as a result of high interest rates are a matter of deep concern and the subject matter of discussions at the present time.

Oral Questions

EXTENSION OF SMALL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BOND PROGRAM

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): Madam Speaker, no one could interpret that letter as other than a clear government proposal, or at least a proposal by the Minister of Agriculture. The Minister of Finance will know that, in addition, the Minister of Agriculture proposed in that letter an extension of the small business development bond to unincorporated farms. I want to know whether the Minister of Finance agrees in principle with that proposal, particularly because in Toronto last Thursday the Minister of Agriculture said in a speech:

So we really have a market problem, not only an interest rate roblem.

My concern is that if the Minister of Agriculture cannot convince himself of the devastation caused by interest rates, how can he ever convince the Minister of Finance, let alone the whole cabinet?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I answered that very precise question last week.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Translation]

REQUEST THAT BANKS ISSUE LOANS AT LOWER INTEREST RATES

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Strathcona): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Interest rates have just reached a record high in Canadian history because the government's economic policy only aims at artificially supporting the value of the dollar. Those hardest hit, such as farmers and small businessmen, must borrow at rates of 20 per cent or higher. Because of this, many of them will be tempted to sell their assets or to declare bankruptcy.

Under the present circumstances, is the minister ready to ask the banks, which are now making windfall profits, to grant loans at lower rates to small businessmen and farmers?

● (1420)

[English]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism and myself have a meeting slated this week with representatives of the banks, to raise the relationship of banking practices with the plight of small business at the present time.

Mr. Kilgour: Madam Speaker, it all sounds really so simple to the minister, but I submit to the House that the same policies he is practising led to 35 per cent inflation and unemployment in Jamaica at the time the Manley government was defeated in that country.

SMALL BUSINESS

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT WILL APPLY SPECIAL INTEREST RATES POLICY

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Strathcona): Madam Speaker, my supplementary is for the Right Hon. Prime Minister.

In Quebec, these interest rates have a stranglehold on hundreds of farmers. A new economic policy must be developed if we are to avoid disaster. Once again, is the government finally willing to implement a special interest rates policy for small businessmen and farmers?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I think that the hon. member will have heard the Minister of Finance state in reply to similar questions that he was discussing and had already discussed with the Minister of Agriculture certain of his suggestions concerning farmers. As for small and medium-sized businesses, Madam Speaker, the Minister of Finance has just indicated that, jointly with the minister responsible for small businesses, he would meet with banking officials this week.

SOCIAL SECURITY

MINISTER'S STANCE ON INTRODUCTION OF NEW PROGRAMS

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. During the weekend the minister made a speech to some of his fellow and sister Liberals in which he stated that it is now government policy not to initiate any new social development programs for the next three years. Apart from the fact that that is a cynical way of saying to the country, "Nothing now, but watch for the goodies just before an election in 1984", how does the minister square that statement with those made by some of his ministers who advocate improved child tax credit arrangements, help for low-income people in terms of housing, and so on? Why does the minister continue to reject assistance to people who need it, especially when in the Speech from the Throne at the start of this session the government indicated that it would remember those who need help?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I am glad the hon. member referred to the Speech from the Throne, because it was in that speech we committed ourselves to making a substantial increase in the guaranteed income supplement which, on an annual basis, represents an increased expenditure of one half a billion dollars. I believe that was very substantial testimony to the interest of the government in carrying out its pledge of helping those who need help most, because we took action to help those who really needed assistance.

With respect to my comments on Friday night, I made the statement, which in the current circumstances is justified, that it was not the intention of the government to launch major new spending programs. I do not believe that statement is in any way contradictory to some of the allegations included in the hon. member's question.

• (1425)

DELAY IN INDEXATION PAYMENTS

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, in that statement over the weekend the minister also said that although there would be no new social development programs those now in effect were to be kept at their value by regular indexation. The minister continues to tell us that these benefits are fully indexed. In view of the fact that indexation is always behind, and in view of the fact that those who will receive an increase in July will be getting what was made necessary by the increase in prices in April, and in view of the fact that those who need it most are needing it even more, will the government not do something about this issue on an emergency basis, even if it means overhauling the system of indexation?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I should draw to the attention of the hon. member that, in the very same speech, I talked about the funds which had been allocated by the government in the spending plan over the next several years, which provides for several billions of dollars of increased support in the social development envelope—not $1 billion but several billions of dollars—so that our expenditures, year by year, are not being decreased. They are not being kept stationary in the social development field, but they are increasing substantially. It seems to me that this is further evidence of the interest of the government in helping those who need help most.

With respect to the question of indexation, we have had a debate on that matter already during the question period. It is my view that there is not a substantial gain to be made by persons in the categories mentioned by the hon. member in adjusting the indexation factor because, in fact, these groups are fully protected against increases in the cost of living. I believe that studies will demonstrate this fact.

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, that is a myth which no one but the Minister of Finance believes. People who are subject to indexation are always behind.

PENSIONS PAID TO WOMEN

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Does the minister not also realize that these additional dollars which will be put into social development programs make up a total that is a declining proportion of the total expenditures of the government? Is he not also aware of the fact that 61 per cent of the women of Canada who are on pensions are below the poverty line and in a state of degradation? In view of the government's protestations all the time that its ministers are interested in people, why do they not do something now, and not three years from now—just before an election—for the women of this country, especially those between the ages of 55 and 65?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I think it is rather inappropriate for the hon. member to ask this government to do something three years down the road—

Mr. Knowles: Do it now.

Mr. MacEachen: —for those who require help, as if nothing has been done in the present session of Parliament. I remember during the last election campaign that it was the leader of this party who raised the question of increased support for recipients of the guaranteed income supplement. Up to that point it had not been mentioned by the leader of the Conservative party. It had not been mentioned up to that point by the Leader of the New Democratic Party.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: It had not been mentioned in the campaign up to that point by the Leader of the New Democratic Party. But when the Prime Minister made a commitment, the Leader of the New Democratic Party chimed in several days later and, in usual fashion, increased the ante.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ISRAELI ATTACK ON NUCLEAR REACTOR IN IRAQ

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It concerns the bombing attack on Sunday by Israeli planes on an Iraqui nuclear power plant. Can the minister give us any further details with regard to this very serious matter which could have such an important bearing on peace and security in the Middle East? As well, has the minister conveyed the position of the Canadian government to this Israeli government that we do not in any way condone this act of aggression of one country against another, and that we view the matter with grave concern?

• (1430)

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I can certainly assure the hon. member that we do not condone this attack, and, indeed, take the most serious view of it. At the moment we have only the bare bones of facts that the attack occurred. We are endeavouring to find out, from our embassy, all other relevant facts, in particular the question of whether there is a problem with nuclear radiation. If, as I believe, the motion by the hon. member for Edmonton South, which was approved under Standing Order 43 earlier, requests the government to convey our concern to the Israeli government, we will certainly follow those instructions of the House. Beyond that, we would like to have just a little more information before we take any action.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Because of the difficulty there is in eliciting information of this nature during the necessarily limited question period, would the Secretary of State for External Affairs undertake to make a statement on motions when more detail becomes available, so that we can have a much clearer picture of the state of affairs in the Middle East at this time?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I will be pleased to give consideration to at least some form of fuller information to the House and the country when further information is available.

PENITENTIARIES

IMPLEMENTATION OF PARLIAMENTARY SUBCOMMITTEE'S RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. Recommendation No. 1 of the report of the subcommittee on the penitentiary system in Canada states:

> A crisis exists in the Canadian penitentiary system. It can be met only by the immediate implementation of large-scale reforms. It is imperative that the Solicitor General act immediately on this report as a matter of the utmost urgency.

Why have the intent and recommendations of the subcommittee not been implemented in their entirety in view of the fact it was presented as a complete package and was submitted by a unanimous decision of the committee, chaired by the member from Windsor-Walkerville, the present Secretary of State for External Affairs?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, it is true that not all of the measures recommended in that joint committee report have been implemented, but that is because former solicitors general, including those of the hon. member's own party, and myself, do not agree with all of the reforms. Those with which we do agree have been implemented. I think documented evidence of that has been presented to the justice committee from time to time, and has been accepted by the justice committee.

So far as there being a crisis in the prisons is concerned, the fact that no demands were made by inmates during any of the incidents which have happened in the last few days is some evidence that they were not motivated by a lack of reform or by wanted or needed changes in any of the institutions.

REFERRAL OF SUBJECT OF RIOTS TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Recommendation 65 provided for a permanent reference during the rest of the Thirtieth Parliament, and for the Thirty-first Parliament to enable it to review the implementation of the report. As far as I can see, this was not followed. Will the Solicitor General proceed now to provide such a reference in this Parliament, including a study and report with reference to the incidents to which I have previously alluded? It would seem to me that the magnitude of the riots which have taken place would indicate that something more drastic must be done, and some greater reforms will have to be undertaken in order to bring the penitentiary system under control.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I have no present intention of recommending such a reference because I am not satisfied that the incidents which took place in the institutions have indicated any kind of fundamental weakness in the institutions. However, I would be glad to hear from the hon. member as to what sort of issues he feels could be considered by such a reference, before considering whether one should be recommended.

BANKS AND BANKING

TAXATION LEVELS APPLICABLE TO BANKS

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. In light of the fact that the profits of the chartered banks have gone up 210 per cent since 1970, and that their taxes have only gone up 14 per cent, can the minister explain to the House why he and his government have consistently rejected proposals which would close the loopholes and would bring the banks up to a level of taxation which would bear some relationship to their ability to pay, which would reduce the federal deficit by over $300 million in this year alone, which would allow the federal government to provide for the kinds of social programs that my colleague from Winnipeg North Centre was speaking about today, and which would allow the government to give help to those Canadians who need it most when the government's interest rate policies are, as I say, driving most Canadians to the wall?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I cannot answer the question because I am not aware—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: I cannot answer that question because it is based upon a false premise.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): How do you know, if you are not aware?

Mr. MacEachen: To my knowledge, there has been no consistent rejection of proposals because no such proposals have come forward in the House of Commons or elsewhere. The hon. member has made some general comments about the necessity of taking action in this field, and I have listened to his comments, but at no time have we rejected any specific proposal. I have told the hon. member and the House that the matter is obviously of considerable interest to all hon. members of the House and to the government, and is presently under study and consideration.

Mr. Rae: Madam Speaker, the minister's lips are moving, but the words are not coming out. He cannot have been in the same House of Commons or in the same finance committee that I was in, and members of my party have been in, discussing the Bank Act and asking questions. I simply say to the minister that I take the trouble to read his speeches. I suggest that he take the trouble to read some of ours on this side, because we have made some very specific proposals.

REASONS FOR LOW TAX RATES

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): My supplementary question has to do with advertisements which have been taken out by the Canadian chartered banks which have blessed us with them over the past week or two, telling us what a good job they are doing and how their profits are reasonable. I wonder if the minister would consider having the federal government take out some advertisements on our banking system, to tell Canadians exactly how much tax the chartered banks have been paying over the last ten years, why it is that their rates are so absurdly low, and how those rates of taxation compare to the rates of tax which are paid by the average Canadian.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): The hon. member's suggestion probably merits consideration, but it has been our experience that when we have taken out advertisements to explain government policy and government approaches, it has been vigorously opposed by both parties, the official opposition and—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: —the New Democratic Party as well. The hon. member is not really making very much of an impression on a Monday morning.

Some hon. Members: Monday afternoon!

Oral Questions

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ALLOCATION OF TIME TO DEBATE FOREIGN AFFAIRS

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the government House leader. Today in The Globe and Mail the hon. member for Edmonton South, the foreign affairs critic for the official opposition, is quoted as criticizing the government for not making House time available for a debate on foreign affairs. Considering the work on the part of all parties in this House on the question of North-South, and in view of the July summit in Ottawa, would the House leader ask the two opposition parties to give up one of their allotted days so that the government could also allot one as well, and thus we could have a three-day foreign affairs debate before July in this House?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, this issue is admittedly most important. The government is therefore still willing to follow the suggestion made by the hon. member. However, if three days are too much for the hon. member for Edmonton South (Mr. Roche), the Progressive Conservative party might consider using one of its many allotted days this month to debate this very important issue of the North-South dialogue or international affairs in general instead of seeking a formula for poison pills or injections to assassinate criminals in Canada.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

WASTE DISPOSAL SITES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Bud Bradley (Haldimand-Norfolk): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment. The minister is well aware of the South Cayuga waste disposal site in southern Ontario, a site which was not recommended by the MacLaren report and which was not subject to an environmental study or environmental hearing. It just happened to be land owned by the province of Ontario, dangerously situated between Lake Erie and the Grand River. In reply to my request to the minister to involve the federal environment ministry in order to protect the waterways of Canada and the health of the people of Haldimand-Norfolk, I was informed that toxic waste disposal is a provincial matter and that the federal government would not involve itself, even in this situation of national waterways, contrary to its action in the Niagara River.

● (1440)

Now, Madam Speaker, we receive a news release stating that Environment Canada is co-operating—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member please put the question.

Mr. Bradley: Madam Speaker, in view of the fact that the minister has stated that the government will co-operate with the maritime provinces in setting up a waste disposal site there, how can he turn his back on the concerned people of Ontario?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is both misdirected and misinformed. He should be issuing his beseeching request to his provincial colleagues at Queen's Park who are responsible for the selection of the waste disposal site in southern Ontario.

We have made it clear to the government of Ontario, and to other provincial governments, that we are prepared to consider turning over Crown land if the provincial government felt that would be of some assistance to it in locating waste disposal sites. That kind of question has been discussed both with provincial governments in the west and with provincial governments in the Atlantic provinces. No such request has been received from the province of Ontario.

We are not ignoring the development of the Cayuga site, as the hon. member seems to imply by his question. We have observers at the hearings to try to ensure that if there is any potential damage to the international waterways and interprovincial waterways, we will be fully aware of it and will be able to take remedial action. So far there has been no indication that this is the case.

DISPOSAL OF TOXIC WASTES FROM THE UNITED STATES

Mr. Bud Bradley (Haldimand-Norfolk): I have a supplementary question, Madam Speaker. If that is the case, the minister should be well aware that this site has not even been decided upon yet. It is not known where it will be located in South Cayuga, nor has it been stated what type of facility will be put in place.

I should like to quote briefly from "Environment Update" as follows, "The toxic chemicals problem is complex. We will need the co-operation of producers, users and governments to ensure the safety and well-being of our population and the environment, and to ensure that the public has the information on this subject to which they are entitled. I am personally determined that these objectives will be met." That was signed by the minister, "John Roberts", Madam Speaker. The minister is saying now that he will not co-operate with governments and will not ensure that the people get the information.

Has the minister received guarantees that toxic waste from the United States of America or other provinces which would make this a federal responsibility, will not be disposed of in South Cayuga? If so, will he table these guarantees and if not, how can he not involve the federal government in order to ensure the safety of its citizens as he promised in his statement?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): I cannot help but conclude, Madam Speaker, that the hon. member was so intent upon asking his next question that he did not listen to my answer to his first question. I tried to make it clear to him that we are co-operating with provincial governments in the design of waste control management systems throughout the country, but the responsibility for the location of those centres is in the hands of the provincial governments. We are co-operating with them in every area of the country, including Ontario. It is not our responsibility to select those sites. We are prepared to offer assistance and to try to find Crown land and make it available to them if that is convenient for them, but the location responsibilities are theirs.

I shall be happy to send on to the Conservative minister of Ontario the representations which the hon. member has made. At the present time, the border between the United States and Canada is closed to the transshipment of toxic waste. We are not happy with that situation. There are many occasions on which co-operation between the United States and Canada in the disposal and destruction of toxic waste would be beneficial to both sides. We are exploring that matter with the American government, at the behest of the provincial governments, I may add.

The assumptions that underlie the hon. member's question are far from the facts of the situation, and make it difficult to give the hon. member a helpful answer.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ALLOCATION OF TIME TO DEBATE FOREIGN AFFAIRS

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton South): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. A moment ago the hon. member for Davenport, in questioning the government House leader, talked about some combination of days given by the various political parties for a debate in the House on foreign affairs. I should like to ask the Prime Minister why the government does not exercise its responsibility and call a foreign affairs debate, bearing in mind that in the nine years I have been in the House there has only been one such government-sponsored debate. That was in 1977.

Of late the Prime Minister has journeyed around the world dealing with the North-South question, having discussions with world leaders. He has given no leadership to the Canadian Parliament or the people of Canada, however. The economic summit begins six weeks from today. It will be discussing the North-South question, and will be followed by two more summits within a short time. The Canadian people and members of Parliament have been given absolutely no direction by the government.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member might recall that I answered this question more than a month ago by suggesting, as I believe the hon. member for Davenport was suggesting, that since we all view this as a very important subject, each party should give up one of its days. The opposition parties have several days left before the end of June. The government has a limited number of days left before the end of June in which to pass all the necessary legislation. If the hon. member's party is so earnest about wanting to debate this subject, I make a proposal now that we would take one government day if the NDP would take one NDP day—

Mr. Nystrom: Agreed!

Mr. Trudeau: —and the Tory party would take one NDP day—

Mr. Nielsen: Agreed!

Mr. Trudeau: —take one of its opposition days so that we could have a significant and worth-while debate. I suspect that the question asked by the hon. member should not be put to this side but to his own leader in this House.

QUERY RESPECTING DEBATE

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton South): Madam Speaker, I am directing my questions to the Prime Minister because he is the Leader of the Government and has the responsibility to bring a government plan on foreign affairs and the North-South question into the House of Commons. I ask him now, specifically, if a debate on foreign affairs in the House of Commons is conditional upon the other parties giving up an opposition day?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, it is not conditional. I just want to make it evident that the hon. member is not in a party which welcomes this debate; he is in a party which, he will recall, was led by a foreign minister who was indicating her interest in sharing more with the southern countries, at the very moment that the minister of finance of that government was saying that there would not be another penny for the Third World. They cannot get their act together, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Crosbie: That is a false statement; absolutely false.

Mr. Trudeau: Until they do, I suggest it would be difficult to give the kind of leadership to the Canadian people that we on this side believe should be given.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): You are stretching the truth as usual.

THE ECONOMY

RE-EXAMINATION OF GOVERNMENT SPENDING

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Finance. When addressing the Senate Standing Committee on National Finance on May 26, 1981, the Governor of the Bank of Canada stated as follows: "I do not think it is realistic to suppose that an economy like ours will work well under conditions of rising inflation. Rising inflation", he said "is a recipe for stagnation, not for prosperity."

Since interest rates are still rising, our dollar is still falling, and failure to face up to the problem of inflation will compound our economic problems, has the minister considered requesting all ministers and deputy ministers to re-examine their departments' spending programs in the hope that cuts can be made which will help lower the deficit without hurting those who really need help?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I stated in the budget of last October that expenditure restraint is one of the key elements in the government's fiscal plan. As part of that fiscal plan we have undertaken not to increase the level of government expenditures more than the growth in the economy itself. That is a long-term effort to restrain expenditures, but obviously with respect to the current situation and in preparation for a forthcoming budget, the President of the Treasury Board and his officials, along with mine, will be examining all possibilities with respect to further restraint.

FISCAL POLICY

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): I have a supplementary question, Madam Speaker. As the minister is well aware, nothing stimulates inflation like indifference to it. History gives us many examples of countries that have tried to deal with 20 per cent, 100 per cent and even 1,000 per cent inflation. Eventually they have had to start on the long, hard road back.

Since in some cases of extreme inflation, democratic governments were the casualties in the process, at what stage in our present inflationary spiral will the government announce a new fiscal policy in order to lower this deficit?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, as was also indicated in the budget, we have projected a gradual decrease in the size of the deficit.

● (1450)

In my remarks over the weekend, to which the hon. member for Winnipeg referred—

Mr. Knowles: Took exception.

Mr. MacEachen: —I spoke at some length about the importance of reducing the deficit as part of an over-all effort to reduce inflation. The hon. member cited with some approval the comments in the Senate standing committee by the Governor of the Bank of Canada who is following an anti-inflationary monetary policy. I assume the hon. member is fully in support of that anti-inflationary monetary policy in the same way that the hon. member for St. John's West demonstrated in his interesting interview on the weekend, namely, full support.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

INQUIRY CONCERNING POSSIBILITY OF BREAKTHROUGH IN NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Raymond Dupont (Chambly): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour. Concerning the Radio-Canada conflict which has been lasting for a good many months, I would like to know if there are ongoing negotiations between management and labour and, through the good offices of the mediator, does the minister expect an early end to the negotiations in the hope of reaching a negotiated agreement as soon as possible?

[English]

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. There is considerable and widespread concern about the three work stoppages involving the CBC or Radio-Canada at the present time. The work stoppage that involves the French language journalists has been under way since last fall. As recently as three days ago the Labour Canada mediator met again with the parties and has made substantial progress, even in the past two weeks. However, there remain outstanding differences. It is proving to be a very difficult strike in which to bring the two parties together.

The dispute involving NABET, or the technicians, the two groups, also continues. It has now been under way for a month and a half or two months. Our mediators are available to meet with the striking parties and have been doing so from time to time. With regard to either of these disputes, I am not able to offer the hon. member the hope of an immediate settlement. I can tell him that progress has been made. While they are difficult disputes, we are hopeful that the parties will continue to be more realistic and come to an agreement.

IMMIGRATION

CUTBACKS IN SERVICES

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The mayor of Vancouver forecasts an increase in racism as a result of 50 per cent cutbacks in immigrant services. Inasmuch as the employment and immigration task force overwhelmingly points out the need for employment counselling, job placement, and educational services for immigrants, is the minister now prepared to restore funding for immigrant services and adaptation programs, and will he extend programs for immigrant women?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): As the hon. member knows, Madam Speaker, about a month ago we did announce a number of new initiatives we are inclined to take to assist immigrant women in particular. We have decided to pursue an integrated language training policy. My colleague, the Minister of State for Multiculturalism, and I, are presently working on the details of that program. It will be of major assistance in giving immigrant women a chance in the workplace. As far as the ISAP program is concerned, the funding reverted back to its original level as it was established in 1979 before the major movement of refugees from southeast Asia. We are presently examining and discussing whether additional resources can be put into that program.

CERTIFICATES FOR DOMESTIC WORKERS

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, we are pleased at some of the initiatives being taken on behalf of immigrant women, in particular that foreign domestic workers may become landed immigrants. Is the minister considering a requirement that domestics have a vocational certificate in order to remain in Canada? If so, would that not discriminate against Caribbean women in favour of British nannies?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I spent a good part of this morning meeting with a number of representatives of different organizations. They speak for domestic workers across Canada. They brought that problem to my attention. That certainly is not the intent of the new regulations. As the hon. member knows, we issued a series of new regulations applying to domestic workers to give more of them a chance to acquire landed status in Canada. I have taken note of their concerns. We are checking them out. I can assure the hon. member that is not the intent of the regulation, even though it may be applied in that way in some of our offices. If that is the case, we will change it.

METRIC CONVERSION

DATE OF IMPLEMENTATION

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism. In an answer in this House on April 23, the minister confirmed he had met that day with both the president of the Canadian Federation of Retail Grocers and the president of the Canadian Organization of Small Business. In his response he said:

> They simply asked that with them I look into the possibility of setting another time schedule and of finding other means of easing into conversion.

The minister has now had two months to examine that possibility with cabinet. Has he been successful in obtaining a new date to coincide more with the implementation of metric in the United States?

[Translation]

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, after a meeting with my colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, we decided to wait until the date of the publication of the new regulations in The Canada Gazette before studying the representations which might have been made to us during that period of time. The officials of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and of the Metric Commission have now undertaken that study and I have no intention at this time to propose any change to the date for implementing the metric system conversion of scales used in retail food outlets.

[English]

REQUEST THAT CONSULTATION BE EXPEDITED

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): My supplementary question stems from knowledge of the fact that there is to be a meeting with the retail grocers this Wednesday. The Metric Commission, at great expense to the Canadian taxpayers, will be flying to St. John's, Newfoundland, on June 17 to determine whether the people of Newfoundland want metric on January 1 and Canadian measurement made illegal. Will the minister speed up the process so that these businesses can function within their budgets on January 1, and advise the major chain stores whether they have to purchase American metric weigh scales for January 1.

[Translation]

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, there are several inaccuracies in the question and comments of the hon. member. First of all, I fail to understand why he should criticize the fact that officials of the Metric Commission travel to St. John's, Newfoundland. In my opinion, the established practice is that the members of the board of the Metric Commission hold hearings throughout Canada to give to all interested Canadians an opportunity to appear before the commission and make their representations. I believe he said that we ought to state clearly whether or not the conversion will take place. I think I did just that in my previous answer.

EMPLOYMENT

ADULT ACADEMIC UPGRADING AT NIAGARA COLLEGE

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, I have a short and direct question for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Why at Niagara College is one of the most basic programs, that of adult academic upgrading for people wanting to better themselves, being phased out, terminating the upgrading of some 230 students and either resulting in a discharge or transfer of some 16 college instructors?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I cannot reply to the specific question of the hon. member. I can indicate that the planning of the curriculum in each of the community colleges is done jointly with the provincial governments which really have the basic responsibility for education under their jurisdiction. We have a manpower needs committee that works with each of the provinces and tries to plan the most appropriate courses to meet the demand where the most skills are required.

● (1500)

I would be glad to look into the specific case, but I can indicate to the hon. member that this is a decision that is really based upon where the demand and the need for training are the greatest, and where the allocations will do the most good.

REASON FOR DEPARTMENTAL DECISION

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, I direct my supplementary question to the same minister. As the minister knows full well, the province of Ontario program is based on the number of seats purchased by Manpower, and the province only purchases some 20 per cent of those sponsored by Manpower. When Manpower cuts off its sponsorship and allocates funds to different programs, then there is a substantial reduction in the number of persons allowed to take part in the program. This has now resulted in a phasing out of the program at Niagara College. I would appreciate knowing why the minister is placing this kind of roadblock in the way of people who need this kind of basic training in order to find a way in life and find opportunities as a result of at least a grade 12 level of education.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I would agree with the hon. member. This is one of those cases where the federal government pays most of the bills and provincial governments take most of the credit. The fact of the matter is that we consult with provincial governments on the allocation of those funds. It is really a judgment made as a result of those consultations that determines the allocation, but it is the province of Ontario through its department of education that must make the real decision as to where the general bloc of funds we allocate to the province is directed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order relating to the business of the House which arises out of two exchanges during the question period. When the proposal was first made that the three parties might each contribute a day to a foreign affairs debate or, more specifically, to a North-South debate, we said we were willing to give a day toward that. As matters stand we have only one opposition day left in this month, which is next Tuesday, June 16, and we plan to put down a motion for that day on North-South. Even if the Conservatives will not join I invite the government to add a day so we can have at least a two-day debate on this important subject.

Point of Order—Mr. Waddell

An hon. Member: Let's have a response.

Mr. Knowles: Can't we have an answer in Hansard?

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. TAYLOR—RULING OF ACTING SPEAKER ON SECOND READING DEBATE

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I have a point of order involving Citation 712 appearing at page 220 of Beauchesne's fifth edition. In reference to second reading it states in part:

At this stage, debate is not strictly limited to the contents of a bill—

On Friday the Acting Speaker, (Mr. Ethier) was in the chair and he ruled during second reading of the elections bill we had to confine our remarks to the bill's contents. I suggest this is contrary to Beauchesne, contrary to our rules and I would appreciate your ruling.

Madam Speaker: That point of order, if it was valid, should have been raised at the time this occurred. It is very difficult for the Chair to rule on a point of order when I personally was not in the chair. The matter should have been raised on Friday if the occurrence took place on Friday.

Mr. Taylor: Madam Speaker, I endeavoured to raise it on Friday, but the Acting Speaker would not hear it.

Madam Speaker: He probably had his reasons for not hearing it. Surely at the time the hon. member had other recourse by which he might have been heard by the Chair. The matter should have been settled on Friday, not today.

Mr. Taylor: I do not want to continue the debate, Madam Speaker, but I do want to say that I endeavoured to raise it. I suggested that the ruling was wrong at the time but the Chair would not listen.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Those comments on rulings by the Chair should not be made, as the hon. member knows. The hon. member is now showing me Beauchesne. The interpretation is made by the Chair; that interpretation was made on Friday and we cannot come back to it.

MR. WADDELL—REQUEST FOR POSTPONEMENT OF COMMITTEE MEETING

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, today is an opposition day dealing with energy and the speakers include both opposition critics in the energy area. At the same time the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works is meeting to consider the very important bill, C-48. It is obviously impossible for the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson) and myself to be in both places at the same time. I wonder if through you the minister, who is also in the House—and we want to hear him speak as well—would indicate whether this committee meeting could be postponed. Apparently the government will not do that. If this were done we could at least complete three or four speeches in the debate in the House.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, this event was brought to my attention early this morning. I did have consultations with my colleague, the hon. member for Etobicoke North (Mr. MacLaren), the parliamentary secretary to the minister, and I understand either the minister or the parliamentary secretary will be at the committee, that the steering committee scheduled these meetings and the opposition knew full well that these meetings were scheduled before the motion was put down on Friday for the opposition day. So really there should be no excuse for this kind of intervention at this particular point in time.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): On the same point of order, Madam Speaker, I listened to what the parliamentary secretary has just said and I should like to make one point very clear. He may not be aware of it, but I advised the parliamentary secretary and the chairman of the committee that we did have an opposition day and that two meetings on one day was totally unrealistic. I asked at that stage that the committee hold one meeting today. I said we would be prepared to have one meeting today, but not two in view of the fact that members would be required to attend both places.

I ask you, Madam Speaker, whether you could prevail on members on the other side to bring some order into this issue. I should also let you know, and you are not aware of this, that the committee has asked for 12 meetings a week. We have many other responsibilities as members of Parliament, and that is also totally unrealistic. We have tried to impress upon the minister the desirability of moving this bill ahead in a measured way, but not in a way unrealistic to members of Parliament.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member, I am sure, must realize that I am in no position to prevail upon the chairman or the members of that committee to reschedule meetings. This is entirely the responsibility of the chairman and the committee. These circumstances occur quite often, but the Chair is in no position to change the scheduling of committee meetings.

DISPOSITION OF BILL C-48

Mr. Waddell: On another point or order, Madam Speaker, I should like to ask the President of the Privy Council to indicate to the House whether the government is preparing a debate on Bill C-48 before the session finishes, I gather around the beginning of July? Is it the minister's intention to have that bill back before the House? We have only considered ten clauses out of 80 in committee. Perhaps the minister might indicate to the House that instead it is the government's intention to deal with that bill in the fall.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I understand that the Committee on National Resources and Public Works is to sit twice today. Perhaps we will be in a better position next Thursday to answer more specifically the question raised by the member. However, may I remind him that the bill has been before the said committee for over four months. Under the circumstances, I find it is difficult, in the light of what happened during the past four months, knowing that some intensive proceedings are now taking place in committee which by the way will be sitting twice today, to answer the member more specifically at this time. Perhaps on Thursday, when the usual questions are asked about the business of the House, I will be in a position to give a more detailed answer.

GOVERNMENT LOANS TO TANZANIA

Question No. 1,418—Mr. Blenkarn:

Has the government made any loans to Tanzania and, if so (a) in what amount (b) what are the repayment terms (c) has Tanzania defaulted on any payments?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs):

(a) $ 7,251,681	$ 286,482	$2,000,000
31,383,904	1,954,501	1,065,214
424,375	2,000,000	1,879,172
1,041,133	4,798,058	1,974,431
1,322,673	14,609,364

(b) The terms of all loans were made at 0 per cent interest, ten years grace and 50 years maturity.

(c) All loans were forgiven.

PUBLIC SERVICE COMPETITIONS

Question No. 1,711—Mr. Stewart:

1. For each year 1975 to 1979, how many employment competitions were announced or publicized in the public service?

2. How many competitions were (a) universally open to the public (b) open only to public servants employed in the public service?

Order Paper Questions

3. How many (a) positions were successfully filled after boards were convened (b) applicants were found to be unqualified (c) competitions were opened to the general public when a suitable candidate was not found internally in the closed competitions?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): I am informed by the Public Service Commission as follows:

1. The Public Service Commission does not maintain records on the number of employment competitions that are announced or publicized in the public service. However, the Public Service Commission does maintain, and publishes, the number of appointments from inside and to the public service in its annual reports.

There are a number of reasons why the commission does not have records on the number of competitions. First, the commission's primary responsibility is related to appointments and its information systems are oriented to reporting on this area. Second, one competitive process can result in no appointment being made if no candidate is found qualified in a given area of competition or a number of appointments can result from one competition process. Consequently there is not a direct relationship between the number of employment competitions and the number of appointments. Third, processes other than competitions—applicant inventories, in-service inventories, and without competition processes—are often used to make appointments to and within the public service. Finally, because of the extensive delegation of appointment authority to deputy heads, a listing of employment competitions would entail a lengthy and costly examination of the personnel records of both the headquarters and the regional offices of every department and agency. The cost in manpower and time to carry out such a task would be prohibitive.

2. (a) The number of appointments from outside of the public service for the years 1975 to 1979 are as follows:

1976	29,730
1977	22,437
1978	19,225
1979	15,293

(b) The number of appointments from within the public service by competition for the years 1975 to 1979 are as follows:

1975 Figures are not available since they were not broken down by process, but there were 90,920 appointments from within the public service by all processes.

1976	40,780
1977	43,396
1978	46,431
1979	42,954

3. Because of the reasons outlined in the response to question 1, these figures are not available.

LEGAL WORK WITHIN LEEDS-GRENVILLE CONSTITUENCY

Question No. 2,360—Mr. Cossitt:

What are the names of all lawyers and/or legal firms receiving or who have received payment from the government for legal work within the constituency of Leeds-Grenville since the government took office following the 1980 general election and, in each case, what was the amount?

MINERAL SELENIUM

Question No. 2,377—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is the Department of National Health and Welfare aware of theories advanced by certain doctors, particularly in the United States, that the mineral selenium has shown evidence of (a) preventing heart attacks (b) building up body immunity to a number of forms of cancer?

2. Has the department knowledge as to whether or not there is validity to the theories that the mineral has such effects if given in dosages of 50 to 200 micrograms daily and what research was carried out in Canada?

Mr. Doug Frith (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare):

1. (a) Yes.

(b) Yes.

2. Minimum daily requirement for Canadians has not been definitely established because selenium deficiency in humans is virtually nonexistent in this country, except in extreme pathological states or very bizarre diets. Almost any balanced Canadian diet would provide selenium in the range of 50 to 200 micrograms daily. Research in Canada has mainly been done in animals which have a higher selenium requirement and can develop deficiencies. Epidemiological studies have been done, attempting to correlate varying levels of selenium in foods and water supplies in different parts of the country with disease states of the local residents, with little success.

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, for the fourth time I want to bring to the attention of the parliamentary secretary question No. 1,852, which was placed on the order paper by me six months ago as of tomorrow. That was on December 9, 1980. It is a very simple question which I have brought to the attention of the parliamentary secretary on three previous occasions. On each occasion I have received the assurance from the government that every conceivable action would be taken to get a speedy response.

In view of the fact that this question deals now with the former chairman of the Canadian Film Development Corporation, whose term in office has expired while I have been waiting for the government's answer, and in view of the fact that he is no longer in the government's employ, the government should have no cause for any further delay. Why has the parliamentary secretary been incapable of getting the Secretary of State to supply an answer to what is a very simple question?

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, every time someone in the House asks me to follow up on a question, I do try to get the answer. There are many reasons for delays. Sometimes the answers required entail a lot of work and expense.

Mr. Beatty: Not in this case.

Mr. Collenette: Perhaps certain questions are not priority questions to the particular departments concerned. However, I will look into this matter again and try to get an answer for the hon. member.

I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—CONDEMNATION OF INCREASED TAXES ON PETROLEUM PRODUCTS

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands) moved:

That this House condemns the government for again unnecessarily raising petroleum taxes and thereby burdening all consumers, but particularly consumers of heating oil, with prices far in excess of those promised without providing relief to those hardest hit and least able to adjust.

She said: Madam Speaker, last Wednesday the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) moved the adjournment of the House under the provisions of Standing Order 26 to allow an emergency debate on the unprecedented price increase and tax increase on petroleum products. Those increases had been introduced the previous day by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde). In denying that motion Madam Speaker indicated that she felt this matter would be the subject of debate on an allotted day in the very near future. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, she certainly guessed right.

Because of our deep concern about these steep price and tax increases and because we know they are creating very real difficulties for a great number of Canadians, we in the official opposition are using the first possible opportunity—our first allotted day since Madam Speaker made her ruling—to raise this issue for public debate. Of course, this is what the government should have done because, as the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) knows, and as his alter ego, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, knows, these price increases are in fact tax hikes and should be introduced for debate by the government as is regularly done with taxation measures.

Instead, rather than for once facing up to his responsibilities honestly, the Minister of Finance continues to duck, bob, weave and evade both the implementation and the consequences of his tax hikes. He has become the yo-yo at the end of the Lalonde string. The minister might think it is smart to bob up and down and ignore the financial and personal hardship his measures are creating, but meanwhile hundreds of thousands of Canadians are daily becoming more deeply mired in the slough of despond which his measures are creating for them. They are stuck; they do not have the latitude to indulge in fancy footwork and to sidestep issues as the minister does. They can only suffer and wonder what new blow he will aim at them in their already vulnerable position.

I have just arrived back in the House of Commons from another weekend in my constituency. My weekend was spent talking to people, not to politicians or pundits. I spoke with people who are staggering under the burden of record high interest rates, rampant inflation and crushing energy costs. When my telephone in Kingston rings or when I walk down the streets, I know I will hear another tale of hardship, struggle and, yes, even of ruin. People say to me: "What in the name of heaven is going on up there in Ottawa? Don't they have any idea of what they are doing to us?" Farmers, businessmen, home owners and consumers are fighting just to keep their heads above water. The situation is depressing for them and for those of us who are trying to do something to relieve the situation.

Do hon. members know what was the worst part of this past few days of speaking to these people? It was in knowing that we would return to the House of Commons on Monday and that I and my colleagues would have to face the frustration of talking to a brick wall, for the Minister of Finance listens to the problems of Canadians and reacts to the financial plight of people with the same interest and the same compassion as would a brick wall. I simply do not know what kind or degree of hardship it will take to snap the Minister of Finance out of his lethargy or to keep his eyes open to what the government's policies are doing to Canadians. If only the Minister of Finance would go out across the country and look for himself, rather than cooping himself up for the weekend at a Grit policy conference with a bunch of yes-men and yes-women who are only too willing to tell him he is doing a great job, and if only he would go back to his own riding and ask a few of his constituents how they are doing, how they are making ends meet and what kinds of problems they are facing, then maybe the minister would realize that Canadians are not happy with the government's economic and energy policies and that they are certainly not happy with the minister's cold and uncaring attitude.

The Minister of Finance has been in Ottawa too long and he has been at the trough too long to muster any compassion for the suffering of others. He no longer seems to care. He does not even acknowledge that a problem exists. As he said to me and the House on May 25, as recorded at page 9858 of Hansard:

—the increase in the number of bankruptcies compared to the very large number of Ontario farmers is not very great.

That is what he said. I am sure Canadian farmers do not see the situation through the same rose-coloured glasses as the minister. They certainly acknowledge the problem. They have to live with it. They have no other choice. I wonder what kind of blow it will take to shake the minister and his colleagues out of their complacency. The blow Canadians suffered last week certainly shook them out of any illusion they might have had that the Liberal government cared about their predicament. It was a blow which hit every Canadian and one Canadians could ill afford to absorb, in light of all the other economic burdens this government has forced on them.

I refer, of course, to the increased energy costs which were sprung on us last week by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, who has, I am sure, been taking lessons from his colleague, the Minister of Finance, on the cavalier use and abuse of the hard earned incomes of Canadians. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is intent on punishing the Canadian people for his inability and his unwillingness to reach an oil pricing agreement with the producing provinces.

Last Tuesday the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources announced another increase in the price of oil. Canadian consumers will have to shell out nine cents more per gallon for their gas and 8.19 cents more for their heating oil. This was just the latest instalment in a string of increases the Liberal government has implemented since coming to power last year and, by the minister's own admission, this is by no means the last increase.

I have no doubt that the minister will keep that promise, unlike the major promise he and his colleagues made during the election and subsequently broke. That election promise, made over and over again, can best be summed up in two headlines which depict the before and after syndrome of the Liberal party, headlines that say: We will give you this before the election; we will give you that after the election. One headline, sir, is dated January 23 from The Scotia Sun and says:

Vote Liberal, and the price will stay down!

The other one is in the Toronto Star dated June 5, 1981, and says:

Oil price: It's going to keep climbing—MacEachen.

That is what they said. The first one is what the Minister of Finance said before the election, and the second one was said after the election. That tells the story, sir, the story of deceit, hypocrisy and sham. A two-faced approach.

I know, of course, what the minister and his colleagues probably want to say at this point. They will say: Oh, well, you were going to increase the price of oil, do not forget it.

An hon. Member: That is right.

Miss MacDonald: Well, we have not forgotten. The hon. member and the NDP are right. They, of course, voted along with the Liberals to do away with the kind of proposals we were making. We were going to increase the price of oil but with two major differences, something which the members of the NDP should remember. The first difference, one that goes to the heart of our democratic system, is that we believe that if we are to have a free government, freely elected, then political parties have a responsibility to the electorate to deal with them openly and honestly. Political parties should not see election campaigns as a time to cheat, manipulate and lie. To do so is to make a mockery of the very meaning of democracy itself. Indeed, to do so is to erode and abuse the trust that must be there between people and their government, a trust which is fundamental to our political system.

The Liberal government, Mr. Speaker, has abused the trust of the voters time and again by saying one thing and doing another, but never so blatantly and dishonestly as with the issue of energy costs. The Progressive Conservative party told the people straightforwardly that there would be higher oil and gas prices in the future. We played fairly. We said the international oil market is unstable, we need more money for exploration and development and we have to organize ourselves now in order to be self-sufficient and secure in the future. However, while we were saying that, Liberal candidates all across the country were saying that they would not raise oil prices, that there was no need for it, even though they knew all along there was no truth to that. Of course, they won votes on it and there are some who would call that kind of campaigning smart politics. Well, sir, I call it just smarmy electioneering. It is that kind of posturing that turns Canadian voters into cynics.

The Minister of Finance obviously finds it easy to live with a lie. It does not seem to bother him that his credibility is shattered. After all, he has his motley crew of backbenchers to cheer him on, these backbenchers who seem no more concerned about high inflation, high interest rates and high energy costs than does the minister. You never hear a word of protest out of them.

The second difference between our proposed energy increases and those that were "unproposed" but nonetheless implemented by the Liberal government is that we did not forget or ignore those Canadians who would be hardest hit by high energy costs. We realized, sir, that many consumers needed time and help in absorbing what inevitably would be higher costs. For one thing, our excise tax was on transportation fuels only, not on home heating fuels as were the government's tax measures of last week. Not everyone drives a car, and as you move down the income scale or into the higher age brackets, you find fewer and fewer people who can afford to own their own means of transportation. They can, however, even then look to other options. However, everyone has to contend with the cold of a Canadian winter; everyone has to have heat. Unlike a car, heating a home is not an option, it is a necessity.

We knew that the inevitable higher heating costs would impose severe financial difficulties on many Canadians, and we tried to alleviate that by exempting home heating fuels from the excise tax. That, we felt, would be one means of easing the burden for the consumer. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), like the Minister of Finance, does not seem to understand, or perhaps he does not care, what these higher energy costs mean to people. Last week he flippantly remarked, as is his wont, of course, the following:

> It seems people are prepared to pay these higher prices . . . You still find some people roaring around in fast cars.

That is what he said and it seems to be the extent of his analysis of the situation. Well, if he thinks that a 63-year-old woman on a spouse's allowance of $369 a month is roaring around in a fast car and thumbing her nose at high energy prices, then he is more misguided than I believed.

Mr. Wilson: Who drives a fast car around here?

Miss MacDonald: It is the Prime Minister who drives a fast car. But it is the woman who has to exist on a spouse's allowance who is concerned about how she is going to pay her fuel bills. She has had to absorb an increase of $244 for heating oil since the Prime Minister took office some 15 months ago. Add to that the general cost of living increases that we have seen soar to new heights and you just have to know that this woman is in trouble. She is but one of the many Canadians who would have been eligible for the second measure by which the Conservative party sought to cushion the impact of higher energy costs. She would have been able to claim the energy tax credit we proposed which would have eased her burden by up to $220 a year. But no, instead she and thousands of other Canadians like her are being left to sink or swim under the Liberal's punitive energy program.

The energy tax credit, sir, was not the only means we had devised to aid Canadian consumers through the difficult transition to self-sufficiency. We took stock of those regions of the country that would be hardest hit, particularly in the Atlantic area. Much of the electricity in the maritime provinces is generated through burning oil. Consequently, higher oil prices would affect that region to a much greater extent than anywhere else in the country. If you look at electricity bills in various parts of the country to compare the cost of home heating fuels, Mr. Speaker, you find that the average residential electricity bill in Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, including heat, in 1980 was $296.33 a month. In Cape Breton, where the Minister of Finance comes from, it was $221.35 a month. Now, in Montreal that same bill would be $127.40 a month, in Ottawa, $128.39 a month, and in Calgary $119.16 a month. So those living in Atlantic Canada have to pay much higher costs for home heating fuel than those elsewhere in the country.

● (1530)

Recognizing the discrepancy, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) stated the following in his budget of 1979:

> We will be mounting a major effort to ease the burden of adjustment to higher prices in the Atlantic region. We will provide grants to compensate for the additional costs of electricity generation resulting from oil increases in excess of $2 per barrel per year.

One can find no such grant in the MacEachen budget, although the per barrel oil increases for 1981 have already exceeded the $2 limit. Indeed, one can find nothing in the budget or since to help consumers, except for an ill-fated conversion grant which has taken far too long to put into operation. Even then, there seems to be so many snags and loopholes that it may well cost the consumer even more than he saves.

What about all those people who do not live near the natural gas mains or electrical generators and must rely on only one energy source, oil? Because of the vastness of our country, many communities find themselves in relative isolation when it comes to utility conversion. These people have no relief, no substitute, no choice but to pay the ever increasing oil prices. Even then, the price to consumers would not have to be so high if the government were not determined to make a profit out of these recent tax hikes on petroleum products. This is what the government is out to do—to make a profit.

Let me explain what I mean. In March of this year the government paid out a total of $148 million to refineries and importers of offshore oil, but it collected revenues in various taxes and charges on sales of oil and gas to the Canadian consumer totalling $337 million. In other words, the government made a profit of $189 million in that month off Canadian taxpayers. "That is only one month", the minister has told us; "That is only one month", he blusters. The trend is for a higher take by the federal government, if we look back over the several months preceding it, over and above what it needs for compensation payments on imported oil.

If we look at the first few months at the beginning of this year, we find that in January the government had a deficit in its compensation account of $124 million; in February it had a surplus of $67 million; in March it had a surplus of $189 million. Those surpluses are going to reduce the government's huge deficit. Of course, it is not admitted; it is all done on the sly.

On June 30, the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson) said:

> The government is indulging in price gouging. It has claimed that the money from these new taxes is to be used to pay for the cost of subsidizing imported oil, but their own figures show that the petroleum compensation charge and the "special Lalonde levy" are already collecting much more money than is needed. In the first month of this fiscal year, the government collected $189 million more than needed.

Then the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre went on to ask:

> Why doesn't the government admit that they need the money to reduce the deficit and introduce the taxes in the proper manner?

The government can take by illicit means, but it will not even consider giving by fair means. I know the Minister of Finance said that he cannot afford an energy tax credit, given the current deficit. Of course, he can afford $1.5 billion to buy Petrofina and to send that amount of hard-earned taxpayers' money out of the country. He can afford $60 million in government advertising to try to brainwash Canadians on what a great job the government is doing. But he cannot afford to provide any relief for those who must heat their homes and run their electrical appliances, even though he is making $189 million on his energy tax hikes.

In my own riding the double whammy of high interest rates and high energy costs is forcing small businesses into bankruptcy. These people are the backbone of our economy—diligent and hardworking. They do not deserve the kind of treatment they are being accorded by the government. Let me refer to one firm which has half its business with the federal government in contracts. It has a number of five-year contracts for trucking mail throughout Ontario and Quebec. These contracts are signed on the basis of a per mile cost of haulage. The basic rate is revised only at two-year intervals. There has not been a revision for over a year, a year which has seen the price of gasoline soar. In July of last year the company's monthly bill for gasoline came to $24,700. But in May of this year, driving the same number of miles at the same basic rate of payment, its monthly bill for gasoline came to $73,000, and the June increase of 9 cents per gallon has not yet been calculated. That firm is going into debt to the tune of almost $50,000 per month on gasoline alone. This is because of the government's inept way of handling oil price increases. The company's financial difficulties are directly attributable to the government.

I should like to refer to another case, for example a person who owns a small business such as a hardware store. He has a family and owns a home. Such individuals can be found all across Canada. In the past year he has seen his grocery bill rise over 15 per cent. His mortgage rate five years ago was 9 per cent and now he must renew it at 18 per cent. On a $30,000 mortgage, this is almost $200 more per month. On top of those items, he has seen his gasoline charges rise by $158 and his home heating costs by $178. If he has a loan on his business, as do many small businessmen, he is paying over 20 per cent interest. In order to pay off the loan, he might have to let his staff go and work the store himself. He tries to conserve energy, but still the bills come in and every month they seem to get larger. He is at the end of his tether; he cannot make ends meet. He turns on the news at night and what does he hear the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance telling him? They are telling him, as the Prime Minister said the other day:

—we say that Canadians are 50 per cent better off, on average, in 1980 than they were in 1970.

That is what he turns on the television to hear. Perhaps we can find that somewhere on paper, although I rather doubt it; but in the real world it is just not so. People are having a hard time, but no one on the other side of the House wants to admit it. They want to hide behind statistics and sit tight. My constituents are not statistics; they are angry, as I am angry and the whole of Canada is becoming angry. We want something done now.

● (1540)

The Canadian people are not stupid. They know what is going on, even if the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources do not want to tell them. They can see that the oil and gas increases with which they are being hit are due in large measure to the government's bungling. They know that if the National Energy Program and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources had been a little more sensitive to Canadian reality, we could have had an agreement with the producing provinces long before this. But no, the minister was content to drift along in an oil price vacuum, which makes us ever more dependent on offshore oil—more dependent now than we were a year and a half ago. We are sending millions of additional dollars out of Canada to pay for OPEC and Mexican oil, money which should be spent at home on development and exploration of Canadian oil and natural gas.

The minister's battle with Alberta has resulted in investors refusing to place their capital in this country. Indeed, the capital which we have is leaving. We have taken a giant step backward in our drive toward self-sufficiency, and the consumers are having to pay for it. The consumer is having to pay directly at the gas pump and through his home heating fuel bills for the failure of government policies. As well, he is paying through higher costs, higher interest rates and a higher cost of living because of the depressed value of and lack of confidence in the Canadian dollar—a situation which stems directly from the lack of an energy agreement.

Some 18 months ago the Conservative government spelled out the increases which would be necessary to bring us to self-sufficiency. In doing so we were able to reach an agreement in principle with the producing provinces. As well, we had devised a program which would protect consumers hardest hit by the energy increases and the rise in prices. By contrast, the Liberal government has levied unscheduled and erratic increases which now amount to 55 cents a gallon for gasoline and over 40 cents a gallon for heating oil. There is no energy agreement with the producing provinces and there are no programs to shield the consumer.

In considering the motion before us today, will the government not abandon its policy of taking from the taxpayer more revenue than it needs to balance its compensation fund, while at the same time refusing to help those who are hardest hit? Just let the government introduce an energy tax credit to help fixed and lower income earners in this country; then they will see how quickly that measure would receive parliamentary approval.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to debate once again the question of energy. It seems to be almost a weekly event these days, one we on this side of the House certainly do not shy away from, even if it is the opposition that decides to spend one of its opposition days on this subject.

I have listened with great interest to the points raised by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald). I would like to make a number of comments on the points raised by her. She mentioned that last week we introduced a ways and means motion to, in part, collect the funds required to pay for the cutbacks imposed by the government of Alberta and, in part, to ensure that the cost of imports would not be larger on the taxpayers of Canada than had been planned in the budget. This is the way these matters are taken care of, which is a very normal way.

At the time the Chair ruled that the way the government had proceeded was in order. Far from preventing debate, such a measure will, in due time, take the form of specific legislation, which I am sure will give rise to a lengthy debate in this House. Thus, I think the hon. member was talking in the wrong way when she was complaining about the ways and means motion.

The hon. member talked about her visit to her riding over the weekend. She said she listened to her constituents there. I certainly wish that she had visited her constituents more in November and December of 1979. I think her constituents would have given her good advice concerning the proposed budget which the Conservative government was bringing in at that time. Since she has made a number of comments about colleagues of mine who are not in the House today, I might tell the hon. member while she is here that, indeed, she might have better spent her time in her riding listening to her constituents at that time rather than travelling in Europe. I would have thought that if her party's budget was that great she would have been in the House to vote for it rather than being stranded in Europe, as she was at that time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wilson: Dirty blow!

Mr. Lalonde: Indeed, there are Canadians who are concerned with the high price of energy, and justly so. They are suffering from higher prices. It is important that the situation be put in perspective and that Canadian citizens have the true story about the situation.

The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands could have told a great many things to her constituents over the weekend, but obviously she did not. I can suggest a few things which she could have said to her electors. The first thing she could have told them is that, in spite of the latest increases, Canadian consumers are much better off under the Liberal government regime and the National Energy Program than they would have been under the Conservative budget, if it had been approved.

Miss MacDonald: No one would have believed it.

Mr. Lalonde: She could have even demonstrated that fact with figures. For instance, she could have said that a family of four has saved about $370 on gasoline and heating oil since the election, compared with what they would have spent under the Conservative budget.

Mr. Wilson: Table the figures.

Mr. Lalonde: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will certainly give hon. members all the figures. It will be very easy. Last week we made preliminary calculations and I indicated to the House that savings to the consumer had been $1.9 billion. In effect, those figures, including the latest increases, represent a $2.2 billion saving to the Canadian consumer since December, 1979.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: For a family of four this represents a saving of $370. The hon. member could have mentioned that to the good voters of her riding.

She could have demonstrated this all the more if she had used the figures from the Conservative budget, since she has made some reference to the 18-cent tax. There was a great deal more in that budget than that 18-cent tax. I remind the hon. member that on December 12 that 18-cent tax represented a $6.35 increase per barrel. Then on January 1, 1980, there would have been a $1 increase. On July 1 there would have been a $2 increase. On October 1, there would have been another $1 increase. On January 1, 1981, there was to be a $2.25 increase. To these figures must be added the amount of the Syncrude levy, the petroleum compensation charge, which on April 1, 1980, would have been 15 cents. On June 12 it would have been 75 cents and in January and June of 1981 it would have been a $2.15 increase per barrel under the Conservative budget. The hon. member could have told the voters in her riding: "Even with the latest increases it is still cheaper to buy gasoline under the Liberal arrangement than it would have been under the Conservative budget". It is cheaper by a significant amount, when you take into account the Alberta cutbacks which have added to the price we have had to charge the consumer. In effect, even as it stands at the present time, the difference between the Conservative regime and our arrangement is around 2.4 cents a litre. If one multiplies by 4.5, it gives an idea of what the cost would have been under the Conservative regime at the present time.

● (1550)

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): No self-respecting person will accept that.

Mr. Lalonde: Therefore, gasoline is cheaper at the present time than it would have been under the Conservatives.

The hon. member could have used not only the actual figures in the Conservative budget, but she could have also used some headlines. She referred to headlines. I will go further than headlines. I will go to actual statements. These statements were the ones made by the Conservative minister of finance during the election campaign. She talked about it during the election campaign, and this is a statement which was made on January 15 in an exclusive interview in the Montreal Gazette. This is what the minister of finance at the time had to say after the budget increase:

> A re-elected Conservative government might have to push Alberta oil prices even higher than previously planned, because world oil prices are rising faster than expected, says Finance Minister John Crosbie.

Here is the quote:

> "I believe after the election a new budget certainly will have to take account of the fact that energy prices have moved worse even than we had thought when we were getting the budget ready in November and late December" . . . "This certainly will have to be assessed as to whether there have to be any revenue changes or what would happen to the deficit. We certainly do not want to see a deficit greater than the one that is forecast."

That was said by the then minister of finance. One sees the headline in the Toronto Star, "Crosbie sees even higher gas prices". One sees in the Citizen, "Crosbie warns of higher oil costs". One sees in The Gazette, "Tories see worse gas hike". That was January, 1980. This is the type of thing that the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands could have said to her electorate during the weekend. She could have said, "You are very lucky that the Conservatives could not go ahead with their budget and that they were defeated because, indeed, the situation would have been very much worse as far as the consumer is concerned".

An hon. Member: Shame, Marc! You are going to have to go to confession.

An hon. Member: They don't like it, Marc.

Mr. Lalonde: Another thing that the hon. member could have said to her voters is this. Indeed, she referred to the punishment of consumers. I think in all honesty she should have said to her voters that the major part of that so-called punishment arises from what many have called the Lougheed levy resulting from the cutbacks which have been imposed by the government of Alberta. These cutbacks were 60,000 barrels in April and another 60,000 barrels in June, for a total of 120,000 barrels a day. This is the type of cutbacks we have had.

I have indicated that if the government of Alberta were to decide today to eliminate those cutbacks, which are completely unnecessary, counterproductive, are not at all required in the circumstances and are really a regrettable step taken by a provincial government, tomorrow morning we could reduce the price of gasoline by seven and a quarter cents per gallon. That is the type of thing which could be done had we not had the decision taken by the Alberta government. That is another thing she could have said to her voters.

The hon. member could also have gone on to say, "Look at the Liberal commitment during the election and you will see that the Liberals have respected their commitments to the letter, and they have indicated that they will respect their commitments."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: In that election there were two basic commitments. There were a number of other commitments which we have already fulfilled, in the area of conservation, with regard to Petro-Canada—which the Conservatives were going to destroy—with regard to setting up a corporation for the conservation of energy and with regard to helping consumers convert to other forms of energy and oil. All these commitments have been respected, and these are already in place.

In addition, we said to the Canadian consumer in 1980, "We will not have an 18-cent excise tax and the price at the wellhead will be lower than it would have been under the Conservatives." What did we do? There was no 18-cent tax in 1980, and the price of oil went up by $3.80 rather than $4, as had been foreseen by the Conservative government, at the wellhead. This is what happened in 1980, and this is where a good part of the $2.2 billion savings to the consumers comes from.

Then the hon. member could also have said that the Liberals made a second commitment. The Liberals said, "Not only will Canadians have a lower price in 1980 than has been foreseen by the Conservative budget"—and specified that the 18-cent tax would not be there—but they also said, "Over four years the National Energy Program will produce a price to the consumer which will be lower than the one which had been foreseen by the Conservative budget". This is, again, a commitment. She could have said that the Liberals have kept it up until now, and they will keep it during this current mandate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: Again, does one remember that the Conservatives said in their budget that oil would cost 75 per cent of world price at the wellhead, and then 85 per cent of the world price at the wellhead in 1983 and 1984? Under the Liberal program, the National Energy Program, it is projected that the price at the wellhead will be about $40 in July, 1983, and $44 in July, 1984. What would the price be under the Conservative budget? The price would be a minimum of $43.50 in July, 1983, and up to a maximum, depending on what happens to world price, of $58.25. In 1984, while our price would be about $44, theirs would be between $55 and $70. That is what the Conservatives had proposed for this country, and that is what this country rejected during the last election; and this was where we said what the Canadian consumer could expect.

There will not be lower prices. Prices will have to increase; but they will increase on a gradual and predictable basis in order to allow the consumer to adapt better to the changes which are taking place. Therefore, even today, as I indicated, the price of gasoline in this country is cheaper than it would have been under the Conservative budget. I do not have to refer Your Honour to the example of other countries, whether it is the United States or Europe, where the difference between the Canadian price and their price is huge.

The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, who has disappeared—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Lalonde: Well, the hon. member has disappeared.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I do not want to interrupt the minister, but I want to make it clear to the minister that the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands was temporarily summoned from the chamber. That happens from time to time to the minister during debates. She will be back shortly.

Mr. Lalonde: I am glad to hear that. I am glad to hear the leader of the House on the Conservative side reassure us in that respect. I listened to her. It was a great pleasure, but I was rather sorry to see how someone could be so misguided and so misinformed about the situation and about the facts.

Again, what could the hon. member have said? She could have said that the Conservative proposal was hurting the consumer a lot more. She could have said that a good part of the increases which have taken place result from the Alberta government production cutbacks. She could have said the Liberals have kept their commitments during the election. She could also have said that, in addition, the Liberal government has brought in measures to protect the consumer. She forgot to mention these.

For instance, the people who live in Kingston have choices and can switch to heating fuels other than oil. The government is providing up to $800 per family to facilitate this conversion to products other than oil, whether they be electricity, natural gas, wood, propane, solar energy, wind energy or other forms of renewable energy that they might prefer. That grant is available to all those who want to abandon oil for heating purposes and switch to other forms of energy. As a matter of fact, the government has allocated well over $1 billion for this particular program so that Canadian consumers can be helped to adjust to other forms of energy that will be cheaper than oil.

● (1600)

We have also taken other measures. The hon. member referred to the maritimes. We have allocated up to $500 million to help in the construction of a gas pipeline to the maritimes and one to Vancouver Island in order to ensure that the people of the maritimes in particular will have access to natural gas in the same way as the other major regions of the country have at the present time. That money will ensure that the people of the maritimes will be able to count on a natural gas supply coming to them at a price that will not only be competitive with other forms of energy but will be the same, basically, as the price in Toronto. Through that policy we will help the people in the maritimes and eastern Quebec get a fair deal as a result of the National Energy Program.

Miss MacDonald: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: I see that the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) is back; I noticed her return to the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, those are some of the things the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) and other members of this House could have mentioned to their constituents.

In fact, the National Energy Program proposed and announced when the last budget was brought down protects the consumer much more adequately and even generously than did the Progressive Conservative budget that was defeated in 1979. Mr. Speaker, because of the price increases we have had to impose as a result of the cut of 120,000 barrels a day made by one provincial government in the production available to Canadians, a shortfall that has to be made up with foreign imports at a very high cost, we have had to add about 7¼ cents per gallon, that because the Alberta government decided to reduce production needlessly, doing considerable harm to Canada as a whole in the process. Despite those increases, the current price of gas is still lower than it would have been under the Progressive Conservative government. The hon. member could have pointed out once again that the Liberal party, this government, has lived up to its promises to the consumers. Last year, we saw to it that the price of gas did not go up by 18 cents. So far, we have managed to see to it, and will continue to do so until the next election, that the net result of the National Energy Program is a consumer price that is much lower than it would have been under the Progressive Conservative government.

We implemented a program of predictable and gradual increases to allow consumers to adjust. It is precisely for this reason that a few weeks ago we announced a program of grants of up to $800 to help people convert their heating system from oil to some other form of energy, either electricity, natural gas, solar energy, wood or any form of energy other than oil.

The measures we announced are efficient and they will provide an alternative to oil dependency, as petroleum prices can only rise in the years ahead. Furthermore, we added an extra $500 million for the construction of the Q & M pipeline so that it could be built at a reasonable cost for the consumer and generate sufficient revenue for producers. We also announced that the price of natural gas in eastern Canada would be the same as in Toronto so that the have-not regions would be protected by the measures we announced and that we will implement as soon as the pipeline to eastern Canada and the maritimes is completed. So these are some of the measures we announced. I think the hon. member could have mentioned other things as well.

[English]

The hon. member alleged that the government would make money from the petroleum compensation account. I think she could have said to her voters on the weekend, "Don't believe that garbage; it doesn't make sense".

What happened was that in the last budget the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) indicated, as did the previous minister of finance in the Conservative government, that there would be a maximum subsidy for imported oil. In our case it was $350 million. It has been shown that with the previous petroleum compensation charge, this would be totally inadequate to meet the cost in 1981-82. Had we continued with the previous charge only, we would have found at the end of 1981-82 that we had a deficit of some $500 million that would have had to be paid by the taxpayers of Canada. By increasing the petroleum charge, we ensured that there would be an adequate collection of funds to make sure that the total deficit would be held down to only $350 million.

The net increase in expenditures that we expected because of the value of the Canadian dollar relative to the United States dollar remained low, and the fact that we had to import a higher volume because of the Alberta cutback in particular meant that we would have had a net increase in expenditures of $595 million in the petroleum compensation account. The increase of $1.25 per barrel announced last week will bring in about $605 million, or a net total difference of about $10 million in total income and expenditures as foreseen at the present time. As I indicated earlier, the increase that has been announced has returned us to a situation where the net deficit would be about $500 million, out of which we would have to deduct another $150 million of revenues that will be collected by way of the transportation fuel compensation recovery charge. At the end of the year we should arrive at a net total deficit of $350 million in the petroleum compensation account.

I think the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands missed a great opportunity to explain to her constituents that the information, whether from press reports or statements made by members of the opposition, just did not make sense. I hope that on her next trip to her riding she will have an opportunity to put the facts straight for her voters.

The hon. member concluded by saying that she wanted something done now. The government has wanted something to be done for quite a long time. The government went into extensive negotiations last year with the government of Alberta in particular, and with the other producing provinces.

Mr. Wilson: That is a joke.

Mr. Lalonde: Unfortunately, like the Conservative government, we could not come to an agreement. The previous government which was defeated in December, 1979, tried its best, and I will give it credit for that; but it did not reach an agreement either.

I heard the hon. member say "an agreement in principle". She does not talk about an agreement any more; she says an agreement in principle. Mr. Speaker, you either have an agreement or you do not. She should admit the truth and say that they had no agreement.

● (1610)

That is confirmed in a book by Jeffrey Simpson entitled "Discipline of Power", which I commend to the hon. lady. I quote from page 204:

> On Tuesday, December 11, the day of the government's fateful budget, Joe Clark spoke to Peter Lougheed by telephone. A committee of officials led by Mickey Cohen, Deputy Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and a taxation expert, had proposed a new formula for the energy self-sufficiency tax that seemed acceptable in principle to Lougheed. But four other points remained to be clarified, Lougheed said. Maybe an agreement could be signed the following week, maybe not, Lougheed concluded. They would see at the first ministers' conference on the economy the following week.

That is the record. They had no agreement. We have tried but not have been able to get one yet. We are working hard on it. Tomorrow I will again be going to Alberta to try to reach a satisfactory compromise that will be helpful to all Canadians. I cannot promise an agreement, far from it. There are many difficult issues. I certainly cannot promise an agreement tomorrow or the day after. I believe the view held by the government of Alberta is the same.

What we must do is try, and try we did, try we do and try we will. This government has indicated over the past few months that it is willing to compromise, willing to take steps to accommodate the needs of the industry and the producing provinces. Surely we are entitled to expect the same sort of compromise from the producing provinces with which we are negotiating. I hope we will see that in the days and weeks to come.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate and to follow the minister. Before getting into my main speech, which will deal with the position of the different parties on petroleum pricing and with this motion in particular, I want to say that I take objection to the minister's comments about the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), the former external affairs minister, being away for the vote that brought down the government. I know she is very strong in defending herself, so I will not say very much except that I thought she was away on government business. That was a pretty cheap shot to take at her. Surely the minister had enough other ammunition to deal with. Maybe that is why the minister is having so much difficulty reaching agreement with the provinces. If he would stick to the facts and forget about the cheap shots, perhaps he would get further.

Mr. Lalonde: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway was in this House when I made my speech and when the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands made her speech. I did not say that she was not on government business. I said she was not here for the vote. It is on the record.

As far as cheap shots are concerned, I invite the hon. member to refer to the speeches made by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands to see what she said about some of my colleagues who were not in the House, whether it was the Minister of Finance or the Prime Minister, and the kind of cheap shots she took at them which were objectionable and completely unnecessary. We did not say a word about that. We thought we would let het get away with it, but she went back to it. The hon. member should remember that, if she wants good treatment in this House, she must show elementary courtesy.

Mr. Waddell: I thank the minister, with all his experience, for teaching me, a young member, that one cheap shot deserves another cheap shot. Maybe that is part of the difficulty this government has had in the past.

I now want to deal with some of what was said by the minister. The minister suggested that the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands talk to her constituents. I have just returned from Toronto where I made a point of visiting different gas stations and speaking with various consumers. Having talked to those consumers and listened to the speeches today, I am reminded of the poem, "Strange that these differences should be, 'twixt Tweedledum and Tweedledee". I thought of Alice in Wonderland. Tweedledum and Tweedledee talked alike, looked alike, acted alike but said they were different. The consumers are saying there is no difference between the Conservatives and the Liberals in terms of price. The consumers are paying higher energy prices. There is no agreement with Alberta and so the consumers are not getting money back in their pockets. They say progress is not being made on renewables and conservation. They want to know what is happening. It is really a Tweedledum, Tweedledee situation.

This was set out in Jennifer Lewington's article in The Globe and Mail of Monday, March 23, 1981. Under present government policies, the article states that consumers are paying less for gasoline than they would have paid under the Conservatives policy. However, they are paying more for heating oil than they would have under the Conservatives policy. That is the truth of the matter.

The minister was not intentionally misleading the Canadian public but he was nevertheless misleading in his speech a few minutes ago. He said that if Alberta settled the dispute on pricing today, he could reduce the price of gas by seven cents a gallon. The Canadian people were not born yesterday. They know that if there is a settlement with Alberta and if the government, to use the minister's words, is willing to be flexible in its negotiations and is willing to compromise, that means higher prices. Does the minister think the Canadian people believe that if there is an oil agreement with Alberta, a higher oil price agreement, then he will withdraw the seven cents a gallon? He will subtract that, but he will still increase prices. He is misleading the people by saying that.

The other matter with respect to the minister's speech concerns consumers. He said this government had taken measures to protect consumers. Well, what has the government done? It took the watchdog for consumers, Mr. Bertrand, who produced the report showing that the oil companies had ripped off Canadian consumers anywhere from $12 billion to $14 billion under both Liberal and Conservative governments, and dumped him in the Anti-dumping Tribunal. What did the government do with the report? It sent it to another tribunal for more study and action.

The minister said the government had shifted Canadians off oil to gas. That is a good idea. In part it is going to subsidize the building of a gas pipeline to the maritimes. That is a good idea, but only if those Canadians can be assured that, having converted their oil furnaces to gas, they will be able to get cheap and available Canadian gas in the future.

At the same time as the government has approved the pre-build of the Alaska pipeline to continually ship out cheap Canadian gas to the United States, there is a real chance that the consumers, those in the maritimes in particular, who have converted from oil to gas will have to pay more in the end because there will be no cheap Canadian gas available.

The minister should not pretend that this Liberal energy program is any better than the Conservative program. I want to deal with that program and the promises that were made. The Liberals were elected on the promise that their price would be less than $4 more in 1980 and less than prices would be under the Conservative program by 1984. However, we have to look at the National Energy Program, which is a detailed blueprint of what the Liberal party really wants. There is a new promise in the National Energy Program. It talks about an increase of $3 in 1980 and $4.50 in 1981, 1982 and 1983. For consumers, under this schedule the pump price so far would have increased 23 cents a gallon since the Liberals were elected. This was the promise of 1980; this was the new promise in the National Energy Program. The price was to increase by 23 cents a gallon.

What has happened, Mr. Speaker? There have been ten increases, and I will count them. On March 1, 1980 there was a $1 per barrel crude increase. I mentioned Toronto so let us take an Imperial Oil station in metropolitan Toronto for my example. At that time you would be paying 25.4 cents per litre. In 1980 there was a $1 per barrel crude increase which meant an increase of .7 cents a litre, bringing the price to 25.4 cents a litre. There was a second increase on April 22, 1980. There was a change in federal sales tax which added .5 cents per litre, making the cost 25.9 cents a litre. Third, there was a Syncrude levy increasing the price .5 cents a litre, which made the price 26.4 cents a litre. Fourth, there was a $2 per barrel crude increase plus higher company costs on September 30, 1980, adding two cents a litre, making the price 28.4 cents a litre. Fifth, there was a sales tax increase in the Syncrude levy on November 1, 1980, which added .6 cents a litre, making the price 29 cents a litre.

On January 1, 1981, there was a petroleum compensation charge of 1.9 cents a litre, which increased the price to 30.9 cents a litre. Can you not see that pump price going up and up as you fill your car? On March 1, 1981, the seventh increase took place. There was an increase in the price of crude, or a higher company cost it was called, of 1.3 cents a litre, which made the price 32.2 cents a litre. On March 3, 1981, there was a surtax because of the Alberta cutback of .5 cents a litre and the price then became 32.7 cents a litre. On May 1, 1981, the PetroCan levy occurred, which was .8 cents a litre, so the price became 33.5 cents a litre. Finally, there was a tenth increase on June 2, 1981. It was a petroleum compensation charge of .8 cents a litre, and a cutback levy of an additional .8 cents a litre. So this morning in metropolitan Toronto at that Esso station you are paying 35.1 cents a litre. It is strange that there should be these differences between Tweedledum and Tweedledee. What the consumers see is a rapid increase in the price of gasoline no matter which party, Conservatives or Liberals, they placed their trust in.

We have also seen an inability to reach a negotiated settlement with the producing provinces. The minister has said it is a tragedy that one province should cut back the export of a commodity like oil to another part of the country. That should not happen in a confederation and I agree with him, but I wonder what the minister expects. This does not make that right, but what does the minister expect when he unilaterally brings in the Petroleum Administration Act and thumps the provinces? Canadian consumers are about to say: Well, a plague on both their houses.

Mr. Lalonde: What would you have done?

Mr. Waddell: The minister asks what I would have done. I would have continued negotiations with Alberta and I would not have invoked the act. I think he invoked the act too soon. He could have continued negotiations with Alberta. Alberta indicated it was not going to take that kind of measure. The invocation of that act, coming as it did right after the budget and with the constitutional proposals, made what I would like to call an overreaction on the part of Alberta inevitable.

Let me continue by noting what the government has done in monitoring the industry's profits. There has been an ineffective, toothless monitoring of the industry and profit levels have never been higher. Imperial Oil's profits are up 70 per cent to $680 million. The government has done nothing about that. Last March the companies piggybacked a 6-cent a gallon increase, and surveys show that the consumers' price of gasoline after it was all finished went up 55 cents to 60 cents a gallon. If the federal take was 35.5 cents a gallon and provincial sales taxes accounted for five cents to eight cents a gallon, then the companies were in the trough for another 15 cents to 20 cents per gallon, representing $2.4 million a day.

What is the government prepared to do about that? Is it prepared to look at those prices and, if they are unjust, roll them back if necessary? If Mr. Bertrand's report was right, is the government prepared to take some action to give consumers a break? Is the government prepared to make these companies which had illegal profits, if they were illegal, disgorge those profits? That is not what the government is prepared to do.

My conclusion about what the Liberals have done since being elected is that we have to look at their actions and not their promises. They brought in higher prices without really doing anything, not even bringing in the energy tax credit the Conservatives suggested—and I will get to that in a moment—even though it was a weak tax credit. This government has not even brought that in but has allowed fairly substantially higher oil prices for the oil companies.

I want to spend a couple of minutes discussing what the Conservative policy has been, in view of the fact that they have brought this motion forward. One has to look very closely at what their budget tended to do. Their budget was for high prices, high prices, high prices; it was literally following Alberta hook, line and sinker. That party literally associated itself with one producing province and really bought a bill of goods, tying our price into a world price war. That was the position the Conservative party took.

As much as I personally admire the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands and her concern for low-income people and pensioners, the fact is that the Conservative budget was really going to hurt, and hurt badly. The way it was to work reminds me of a mouse trap. There was a little bit of cheese in the beginning in that there was to be a $4.50 increase in 1981-82; but in 1983 the trap would slam shut, because there would have been an increase of $25 a barrel in the one year bringing the price up to $47 a barrel, and that does not include the excise tax on gasoline. The total impact would have been just tremendous. In 1981 the increase would have been 42.5 cents per gallon, in 1982 there would have been an additional increase of 24.5 cents a gallon, and in 1983 the consumers would have faced an increase of $1.75 a gallon. Who would have been the winners? I suggest they would have been the producing provinces and the foreign-owned oil industry, the same industry which has taken $3 billion out of this country in the last five years in dividends and credits.

I put it to members of the Conservative party to my right that the tax credit they speak about in their motion today would have been meaningless next to the $1.75 per gallon increase in 1983. I do not think Canadians are fooled by this.

Second, Canadians were not only not fooled, but they were not amused by the changes the Conservatives made in their policy on Petro-Canada. The minister quoted from Jeffrey Simpson's book "Discipline of Power" so I will not quote from it except to say, Mr. Speaker, that you will see a reference to the Wilson committee on Petro-Canada and what some of the Conservative proposals were to privatize that company. I do not think Canadians believe in that or would accept it for a minute. When the Petro-Canada signs go up around these Parliament Buildings here in a few months, I predict that Canadians in this city will rejoice. They are going to say that the NDP was right in pushing the government at all times to expand Petro-Canada. They will be proud of those signs, proud that it is a Canadian government oil company and will show their pride by patronizing those stations. I predict that will happen in Ottawa in a few months.

I would like briefly to say something about the directions the NDP think should be followed. I suggest, first of all, that Canadians have difficulty paying more for gas. I suggest they are not against that in principle, but it comes at a very bad time; we have inflation, prices are going up and the economy is troublesome. What we suggest, to begin with, is that you cannot divorce the pricing issue, with increased prices for gasoline and home heating oil, from the economy as a whole. If a person in Newfoundland, St. Catharines or in my riding of Vancouver-Kingsway is not working, he cannot afford to pay higher prices. If that worker is paying increased costs because of inflation, he has difficulty paying higher prices for gasoline.

I suggest most Canadians are prepared to pay higher prices, and I have said this before in the House, but they want to make sure that the money that comes out of their pockets does not go into the pockets of the multinational oil companies, but goes back into making this country energy self-sufficient and into public ownership of these companies.

They also want to be assured that there is some cushion. To the hoots and howls of my friends next to us, I suggested in the House of Commons the other day that there should be a cost of living allowance. A component of that would be an energy tax credit, but it would be broader than the credit proposed by the Conservatives. It would be a cost of living tax credit, and I think it could be fashioned in such a way that people making $20,000 a year or less would not have to pay any more money when price increases for heating oil and gasoline are imposed. I think this could be done.

I hope in a few weeks to be able to tell the minister about this in detail. He asked for some detail about how prices can be dealt with in this way and how we can get an agreement in principle with the producing provinces. There has to be a cost of living tax credit which would cushion the people. We are talking about $1.8 billion, but this could be done if we were to reform our tax system in relation to corporations and companies. We could collect taxes in a different way and have money available to distribute to the people.

As I understood the people with whom I spoke in Toronto this past weekend, consumers are not prepared to view the Liberal government program in a different way than they viewed that of Tweedledee, the Conservatives. Consumers see the programs as being the same. They see rising energy prices with no real cost of living tax credit and with no real commitment to renewables. Consumers see a continuation of the selling out of natural resources by way of the pre-build.

Consumers hear a lot of talk about Canadianization, but in fact that is just a feathering of the bed of Canadian capitalists like Dome and others in comparison with Americans. Consumers do not see this Canadianization being tied into a whole industrial strategy for this country in such a way that if there were rising oil prices they could be sure that the proceeds would be going toward building a Canadian, publicly-owned industry. That is the position we would take, and we think the Canadian consumer will come around to that position as well.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—CONDEMNATION OF INCREASED TAXES ON PETROLEUM PRODUCTS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Miss MacDonald:

That this House condemns the government for again unnecessarily raising petroleum taxes and thereby burdening all consumers, but particularly consumers of heating oil, with prices far in excess of those promised without providing relief to those hardest hit and least able to adjust.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, before moving to the main content of my remarks today I would like to refer briefly to the blatantly cheap shot taken by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) in reference to my colleague's being absent from the House on the day of the vote of December 13, 1979. My colleague was in Europe on government business. She had paired with someone in the minister's party. That pair was broken, and my colleague was unable to be in the House for that vote. That is the fact of the matter, and that is why I say the blatantly cheap shot taken by the minister should not have been taken in this House.

Mr. Lalonde: Your leaders told her to stay in Europe.

Mr. Wilson: What we are addressing here in the House this afternoon is a problem faced by many Canadians. The problem is the price of gasoline and heating oil, which is rising drastically. That is the fundamental problem Canadians are facing.

During the last election campaign the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) advertised as follows: "Vote Liberal, and the price will stay down because Allan J. MacEachen and the Liberal party spoke up for you". The Liberal party is certainly not speaking up for the people of Canada because since then the price has increased 60 cents a gallon. The minister tries to confuse the matter by citing figures in an attempt to show that prices are lower than they would have been under the Conservative government. I want to examine those prices later on in my remarks in order to prove to the people of Canada that the minister is wrong.

Mr. Lalonde: You are wrong.

Mr. Wilson: He is playing with figures, and he knows it. We have seen all this before. We have seen the two-faced policy of saying one thing when running for election and another thing when wanting to get people's money. Back in 1974 the Liberal party ran on the platform that there would be no wage and price controls. Hon. members opposite said, "Zap, you're frozen; we will not have any of that if you elect us to govern this country". Fifteen months later we had wage and price controls.

We have the same time-frame now with respect to oil and gas prices. In 1980 hon. members opposite said we should vote

Liberal and prices would stay down. Fifteen months later price increases are hitting the magic figure of 60 cents a gallon. Canadians trusted hon. members opposite. Canadians believed they would stand by their promises. Canadians took them at their word. So much for trust; Canadians were deceived in January and February of 1980.

Canadians are speaking out today. They are asking members of my party to speak out for them in this House of Commons. At one time they believed the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). Canadians recognized that prices would have to be higher. They recognized that there would have to be some price increases, but they believed there would be some offset. They believed there would be some assistance to people who could not afford the increases which might be coming. They took a chance. They trusted, but they were let down.

We are speaking here today for Canadians who are bewildered at the reasons that this blockbuster tax increase was imposed last week. The minister sneaked that increase in. He did not have the courtesy or the courage to explain to this House why it was necessary to increase prices at this time so much more than in a similar situation just three months ago. Last week the price went up nine cents a gallon. That was about three times the increase we faced back in March of this year. We have not heard a proper explanation for this by the minister today.

On June 3 I asked the minister if he would table the internal report substantiating the need for this increase. I received a very evasive answer. The minister did not even address the question, let alone give me an answer. Throughout his speech today I waited to see whether there would be some indication, but all the minister said was that if there is not an increase now, we may experience a larger increase down the road than we had planned for. However, that is not good enough when we are talking about a price increase of nine cents a gallon. He will have to do better than that.

Since the National Energy Program was announced on October 28 of last year, there have been five increases totalling 22 cents a gallon. As I have said, since the beginning of 1980 the price has increased 60 cents a gallon. In a few minutes I will come to what part of that 60 cents has been taken by the federal government in increased taxation, not including revenue to the provinces and not including revenue to the industry for producing oil.

In the last six months we have seen probably the largest single tax grab in the history of this country. This tax grab has been sneaked in through little undebatable motions. The people of this country are coming to realize that this is a shying away from reality on the part of the minister and other members of the government.

I listened to the numbers cited by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I heard him say that in the 1980 election campaign his party had made two basic commitments. I would like to address those two basic commitments right now. The first was that in 1980—and these were the minister's words—there would be no 18-cent a gallon excise tax. That is correct; there was not. However, he said that the price at the wellhead would be lower than the $4 we projected. Well, Mr. Speaker, that price at the wellhead was not $4, it was $4.40 or $4.88 depending on where you live. So much for that promise.

● (1640)

Over the four years they said that the energy program would result in a price to consumers lower than that—

Mr. Lalonde: That is nonsense.

Mr. Wilson: —presented by the Conservative party.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That is what you said.

Mr. Wilson: Well, he knows about that promise. He cannot stand there in the House and make that promise today because he has broken it already. In his own words he said that the price of gasoline now is about the same as it would have been under the Conservatives.

Mr. Lalonde: It is cheaper.

Mr. Wilson: And that does not include the impact on heating oil, which he never talks about. He is afraid to talk about the increase in the price of heating oil.

Now let us talk about these price increases. My friend the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) summarized the increases but I would like to put it in a somewhat different way. On the wellhead price we have had three increases amounting to $4, shared between the industry, the provinces and the federal government. There have been six other categories of price increase. The petroleum compensation charge, three increases totalling $4.55 a barrel. The removal of the Sarnia-Montreal subsidy, 18 cents a barrel. Two increases in the Syncrude levy amounting to 90 cents a barrel, and a special levy amounting to $2.01 a barrel on two occasions.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That is the Lalonde levy.

Mr. Wilson: Yes, that is right. Then the Canadian ownership charge of $1.15 a barrel on April 23, 1981, as well as an ad valorem tax which allows the federal government to participate in every increase to the extent of 9 per cent. The total amount of those increases is $12.79 a barrel, of which the provinces got 14 per cent, the industry got 14 per cent, and the big, fat federal government got 72 per cent.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have tried to show that the federal government's figures do not hold water. The minister is playing with numbers and he knows it. However, I think there are two fundamental facts here, particularly the second one which we are debating today, and I want to focus on that. First, the dishonesty of the government in presenting to the Canadian people their promise in the last election, which has been broken. The deceit and dishonesty in presenting that promise and attempting to win an election on that basis—

Mr. Lalonde: Utter nonsense.

Mr. Wilson: —is something that is developing a greater degree of cynicism toward the whole electoral process in this country than we have seen in many years. Certainly before my time, Mr. Speaker, and possibly before yours as well.

The second point, implicit in the motion, is that there has been no relief for the disadvantaged people of this country as a result of the government's program of increasing energy prices. I pointed out that 72 per cent of the revenues raised as a result of these increases has gone to the federal government, yet they do not see it within their capabilities to provide anything approaching the energy tax credit or the special compensation we provided for the Atlantic provinces to compensate for the production of energy from oil in those parts of the country. That is the fundamental direction of the motion we are debating today. My friend, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, avoided that to a very large extent in his remarks but I want to focus on it now because there is a very powerful reason for it, particularly in the eastern provinces.

In St. Anthony, Newfoundland, on a comparable basis the cost of 5,000 kilowatt hours of energy is $387.58. In Summerside, Prince Edward Island, it is $296.23. That compares to Montreal, the minister's home town, at $127.40. Toronto, my home town, is at $145.35. Here in Ottawa, it costs $128.93. That is the reason we felt it was fundamental to allow some form of subsidy to those living in the Atlantic provinces who are suffering from the high cost of energy.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I also want to point out the impact of the energy tax credit in the Conservative budget of December, 1979. This again proves that the minister's figures are trying to tell a narrow story without looking at the broader picture, because he has distorted the figures. Now, on Conservative party stationery, available for every member of the House to see, there is a press release indicating that the annual impact of energy taxes under a Liberal government, including gasoline and heating oil, was $451. That is the increase to the average family. Under a Conservative government, because the impact on heating fuels was much less than under the Liberal proposals—

Mr. Lalonde: Don't you believe it.

Mr. Wilson: —the total amount is $292. So it is $451 for the Liberals, $292 for the Conservatives. However, the value of the energy tax credit is $220 for a family below the income level of $23,000, or $21,000 if I am not mistaken, and that credit would reduce the increased costs of energy to only $72, as against the $451 which applies regardless of income level.

Mr. Lalonde: You have got to be kidding.

Mr. Wilson: So the minister ignores these very real facts for the people who have to pay the bill month in and month out. As his colleague said the other day, prices are going to continue to rise but there is nothing for those people who are unable to afford these high increases.

The minister would have us put all the blame for this on the producing provinces. It is clear that he is again misleading the public. The blame rests largely on his own shoulders and those of the other ministers in the federal government, and they do not have the courage to explain the whole background. This we have tried to draw out in other debates. We have tried to understand better the government side of the negotiations with the producing provinces over the past year, but we have been very unsuccessful in getting that understanding. The consumer wants to know. He is asking us as members of Parliament, why is he being hammered this way? Why do we not have an agreement; why do we have to pay these excessive costs?

The negotiations last summer were a sham. There was no attempt on the part of the federal government to reach an agreement. The minister said just a few minutes ago that he cannot promise an agreement, but I think that at this time last summer he could have come into the House and very honestly said to us that he can promise no agreement, because the federal government went into those negotiations making no attempt to come together with the province of Alberta and the other producing provinces. That is the reason we have a deadlock, the reason we have these major projects on hold, and—

Mr. Lalonde: Nonsense.

Mr. Wilson: The minister says "nonsense". Might I ask him why it was that the energy program, when it came in, was less attractive to the producing provinces than the last deal put to them in July of last year? There was no attempt whatsoever to reach any meeting point between the two positions, and that is why we have deadlock today.

I also would like to make reference to the fact that there were two types of taxes prior to the negotiations which the producing provinces told Canadians they would find objectionable. The first was an export tax on natural gas. The government brought it in; the Alberta Court of Appeal heard a challenge by that province and upheld it; it will be heard later this month by the Supreme Court of Canada. So much for the attempt at compromise. The second one was a production tax, which essentially is a wellhead tax. It clearly impinges on the jurisdiction of producing provinces. Finally, there was the inadequate pricing when compared to prices in practically any other country in the world.

When we put all this together, is it any wonder that there will be some form of deadlock? If there is no attempt to negotiate and the terms of the final policy are unacceptable, there is bound to be a deadlock.

I am not at all happy with the response of the Alberta government in cutting back on supplies and putting major projects on hold. I would have preferred it done in another fashion, but I am hard pressed to suggest any alternative to develop any momentum in the negotiations which must take place if we are to reach an agreement.

It is the old story of trying to deal with a stubborn mule. He must be hit over the head with a sledgehammer to get his attention and make him do what one wants him to do. This is what the province of Alberta had to do with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

On March 1 there was a cutback and the increase in tax at that time was half a cent per litre. On June 1 there was another cutback and the increase in tax was almost three times that amount. Many people are asking why, because imports are down. There was a drop in imports in the first two months of this year. These are Statistics Canada figures which were given to me this morning. Year over year there has been a 16 per cent reduction in imports; consumption in February and March was down by 10 per cent. Over the weekend we saw Mexico cutting its price by $4 and the United Kingdom by $2. The financial reports of the government show that the various funds are $250 million in surplus. The world picture shows greater conservation. It is expected that we will see more spill-over into Canada, so there will be less consumption in the country.

Also the minister's department has been calling companies, advising them that demand was down and, if this trend continues, there should be no need to import to the full extent of the second Alberta cutback. So why was there this significant price increase of last week?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Money, money, money.

Mr. Wilson: Let me close by saying that the deceit and deception of the advertisement of the Minister of Finance must ring a very, very sour note for those in the country who are struggling on insufficient incomes, knowing that the government would prefer to pay off foreign shareholders and commission agents rather than provide some small subsidy for the oil price increase caused by the government's inability and inaction. The Prime Minister said that drivers seem to be willing to pay for the high price of gasoline so that they can drive their fast cars. What about persons who have never driven fast cars and never have any intention or hope of driving fast cars? The only person for whom that comment makes any sense is the Prime Minister himself with his little Mercedes sports car which he drives around when he wants to have fun. That is the difference between the outlook of the government and those of us on this side of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Judy Erola (Minister of State (Mines)): Mr. Speaker, it appears as if it is my turn to join in the debate on the usual negative motion of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) dealing with petroleum pricing. I cannot help but observe that if we could capture and produce the gas from hon. members opposite, we would be well on our way to resolving the energy problems in the country.

Although the cost is admittedly high this year, it will level off over the next three years. In 1984 our projections indicate that the made-in-Canada oil price for petroleum will be substantially less than that proposed by my colleagues opposite in their ill-fated budget of 1979.

The hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson) mentioned the word "objectionable". I suggest that Canadians will continue to remember the most objectionable tax of all, the 18 cents per gallon tax.

Miss MacDonald: It was 9 cents.

Mrs. Erola: I remind Canadians that this was to be over and above other scheduled increases. It would have clearly affected most those who could least afford it.

We on this side of the House are committed to establishing a made-in-Canada price for oil which will reflect our relative strength in the energy sector. Canadians know that the OPEC market price is an artificial one and that it has absolutely nothing to do with the cost of producing oil in Canada or, for that matter, in Saudi Arabia. It is a price arbitrarily established by a cartel which dominates the international petroleum market. The government's energy policy will ensure that future Canadians are not burdened by an insecure relationship to a foreign supplier.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Erola: The Canadian oil substitution program costs are to be outlined by my colleague, the hon. member for Etobicoke North (Mr. MacLaren). It is the first in a series of initiatives designed to assist the Canadian switchoff from oil to some other form of domestically generated energy. Average Canadians in every region of Canada will benefit.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) suggested earlier that consumers were objecting violently to oil pricing in Canada and that they were not reacting positively. If the hon. member checked with his constituents, he would know that there is a great demand by people in every sector of Canada for the Canadian oil substitution program; it is working.

The hon. member for Etobicoke Centre mentioned the reduction of oil consumption in Canada in the first quarter of 1981. I should like to repeat those figures. In that first quarter, daily consumption dropped to 530,000 barrels per day as compared to 644,000 barrels on an average in 1980.

Mr. Wilson: Those figures are not correct.

Mrs. Erola: That is conservation; that is a reduction in consumption due to our National Energy Program.

I should like to point out, particularly for the benefit of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, the number of programs initiated by the government. These programs are largely unrecognized and perhaps even unknown to hon. members opposite.

First I should like to talk a moment about coal. There is no doubt that the importance of coal in the Canadian energy economy will grow in the next decade and that by the year 2000 production will exceed its current level by three to five times. Further, it is becoming increasingly obvious that in the near future—and certainly not any later than the mid-1980s—a comprehensive international market for coal will be operating.

The Canadian situation in the field of coal is quite different from that of most other countries. Canada is a nation which has rich coal resources, very rich, but at the present time we use only a small amount of coal in our energy supply mix. We hope to change that. Currently, only about 9 per cent of our primary energy is derived from coal. This contrasts dramatically with the ratios of our western nations. Twenty per cent of the primary energy needs of the United States is supplied by coal. In the United Kingdom the figure is 36 per cent. It is 38 per cent in Australia and about 68 per cent in South Africa. In fact, South Africa leads the world in the introduction of coal into its energy supply mix, and it presently derives a significant fraction of its supply of liquid fuel directly from coal.

I am sure members opposite will want to know that Canada has estimated coal reserves of some 50 million tons of all types. In 1980 Canadian coal production rose by approximately 9 per cent, in physical terms, over that of 1979; and while our coal production in 1979 amounted to some 33 million tons, Canada remained a net importer. This situation will likely reverse itself as early as 1982 or 1983 due to the expected increase and demand for Canadian thermal coal on both the domestic and export markets.

However, Canada has been a net exporter of metallurgical coal for a number of years. It is worthy of note that Canada exports a higher percentage of its coal production than does any other country. Indeed, we exported fully 45 per cent in 1978. It is interesting that, in contrast with other energy sources, coal is relatively unregulated in Canada, and coal and coke enter and leave Canada duty-free. Importing countries have been attracted to Canada because they see us as a secure supplier. Canada is a nation whose coal production is still small in relation to its reserves and whose dependence upon its coal resources for its own needs is still not great. But we are doing much in this area.

I would like to cite some of the federal government's initiatives with regard to coal. We are, of course, actively seeking new markets but, more important, we are carrying much of the financial burden of new coal development by ensuring that the infrastructure is present to adequately handle the increase in coal traffic. We will have a new coal port built at Ridley Island. The coal terminal at Thunder Bay is expected to be expanded and upgraded. There will be major expenditures for the purchase of bulk rail cars and improvements to rail facilities on the west coast, the east coast and areas adjacent to the Seaway.

The oil sands could well be the major source of Canada's future oil supply. We are currently examining processing techniques at the tar sands, and we are convinced that under certain circumstances coal can be useful in both the extraction process and in the upgrading of these oils. Where steam is required to stimulate the production of heavy oil, coal could be used to generate that steam. Where carbon dioxide is required for enhanced recovery, this also could be provided from coal using processes such as the production of methanol. The linkage between the technologies needed for the optimum development of our oil sands resources and for the coal conversion processes is important. The Alsands group, a consortium led by Shell Oil, is planning a major oil sands mining and upgrading plant north of the existing Syncrude facility. This group of companies intends to use fluid coking as the main technology to upgrade the separated bitumen.

Another interconnection of the oil sands and the coal liquefaction process is being studied in our own laboratories here in Ottawa. For many years we have believed that in the long run it is better to treat the bitumen with hydrogen to upgrade it in order to expand the quantity of liquids which can be produced from the raw feed stock. Our scientists and engineers found that it was better to use a disposable catalyst supported by coal in conjunction with what is called a hydrocracking process. When the object of the process is to upgrade bitumen only, a small quantity of coal is used—that required to supply the necessary catalyst. However, it has become evident that coal could play a much larger role in this process and that coal might be increased to as much as 50 per cent of the feedstock weight. In this mode of operation, what we call coal processing, both bitumen and coal are significant contributors to the final liquid fuel product. These projects are all under the auspices of the federal government.

Coal liquefaction, here in our Canmet laboratories and also in Alberta—the member opposite expresses some doubt. I invite him to examine some of the work which is being carried on.

Mr. Gurbin: I was just agreeing with you.

Mrs. Erola: Coal liquefaction and gasification processes are the most exciting aspects of the current and future research and development programs in this sector. In this connection I think it is appropriate for Canada to take an outward look at the situation. The government recognizes this and has provided yet another incentive. We have offered to finance a large portion of the technical risk involved in the introduction of new technologies—indeed, up to the point of commercial use. A number of serious studies of the liquefaction of coal are currently under way. In Alberta—and, I might add, on a very amicable and co-operative basis—our department has joined the department of energy and natural resources of that province to support a study being undertaken by the Nova group into the application of liquefaction technology to sub-bituminous coals.

In another development of interest, the Fording Coal Company has been examining the possibilities for building another major electrical generating station. In this study the possibility of removing liquids from coal prior to combustion of the char is being examined. I would like to acknowledge the efforts in this field over the years of the research council of Alberta. I would also like to commend the intention of the government of Alberta significantly to expand its coal research and development efforts. Studies have also been made of the conditions under which coal can be used in place of gas as a feedstock.

In British Columbia several important studies are under way. The government of that province, in conjunction with Japanese interests, has been examining the possible application of South African liquefaction technology to the very large resource of low rank coal known to exist some 200 kilometres from Vancouver at Hat Creek. In northeastern B.C. our department is providing some measure of support to a study being undertaken by a consortium consisting of Westcoast Transmission, Petro-Canada and the British Columbia Resources Investment Corporation, together with some Japanese interests, who are looking at liquefaction processes applicable in that region of the province.

In Saskatchewan, which I am planning to visit tomorrow, a number of possibilities are currently being examined to determine how coal can be used in conjunction with the extraction and upgrading of the province's heavy oil resources.

Mr. Gurbin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the hon. member who is speaking would entertain a short question.

Mrs. Erola: Yes.

Mr. Gurbin: The hon. member has given information with regard to activities in the liquefaction of coal. Would this indicate that the government has made a decision that it would like to see Canada go into coal liquefaction in contrast to, perhaps, becoming involved with another tar sands plant?

Mrs. Erola: Mr. Speaker, it is not an either/or situation, it is both. My colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde), has already addressed this problem. I believe he announced last fall that we would support coal liquefaction studies on a case by case basis, but certainly not in preference to oil sands projects. I would have thought that was very obvious to the hon. member.

I would now like to deal with Nova Scotia for a moment. A major feasibility study is now under way in Nova Scotia entitled Scotia liquid fuels project. The five partners in the study include Gulf and Nova from the private sector, the Cape Breton Development Corporation, Petro-Canada and Nova Coal from the Crown corporations. My department is participating actively in this study which involves the processing of a coal known to be readily soluble. One option of special interest in the latter study is the possibility of processing heavy oil and coal together using hydrogen derived from natural gas. We are hopeful that a fluidized bed combustion unit will be constructed at the adjoining facility of the Nova Scotia Power Corporation. We are examining the feasibility of using the waste product from the coal liquefaction plant as a fuel to power the plant itself.

There is an existing refinery, not now in use, and should the coal processing option prove attractive at that site, we could see a number of facilities of this kind being built around the world. The important advantage of this project is that more modest quantities of coal, one to four million tons a year, could be processed into liquids without incurring the very high capital costs and the major risks involved in free standing coal liquefaction plants.

In Summerside, P.E.I., the construction of the atmospheric fluidized bed combustion heating plant has been annouced. The project will replace two obsolete heating boilers at the base with modern boilers that use a pioneer fluidized bed combustion process. In addition to providing a more efficient heating system for the base, the conversion will allow the system to burn a low-quality, high-sulphur coal while suppressing gaseous emissions of pollutants that cause acid rain.

The major advantage of fluidized bed combustion is that a wide variety of fuels can be used in an environmentally-acceptable manner. If limestone is added as a granular material, it reacts with the sulphur dioxide normally given off by coal burning, resulting in a substantial reduction of sulphur dioxide emissions which, as I mentioned a moment ago, is a major source of acid rain. Because combustion in these new boilers occurs at much lower temperatures than in conventional boilers, nitrogen oxide emissions are also reduced, and this is another major source of acid rain.

Therefore, I think it is obvious to members opposite that the government is moving ahead and that the Canadian people are aware of the fact. Canadians realize the situation that their federal government finds itself in, and the polls indicate that they support us in our movement.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Erola: To listen to the rhetoric of the official opposition is to be lost in predictions and forecasts of gloom and doom. Far from their gloomy outlook, the realities of Canada today reflect a nation both strong and prosperous.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Erola: The opposition would have Canadians believe that the economy is stagnant and that Canadians are a sorry lot. Well, I do not buy it, and the figures do not prove it. I want to take this opportunity to demonstrate that all is not gloom and doom, that on the contrary, this year is but a pause before an even greater period of growth.

In particular, I would like to share some insights as to where one of Canada's strongest industrial sectors is going. I would like to talk about an industry which gave Canada its greatest boom period in this century, an industrial sector which makes Canada the envy of the industrialized world, an industrial sector which will give Canada secure economic growth in the 1980s. I am, of course, talking about the Canadian mining industry, the minerals and metals sector.

Resources in general have proven to be Canada's strength throughout its short history and it would appear that resources will continue to be this nation's trump card in the worldwide game of international economics. By resources, in this case, I mean not only minerals and metals, but energy minerals, agricultural products, forestry, forestry products and our fisheries. World demand for all these resources is high and is expected to grow throughout the coming decade and well beyond.

The minerals and metals sector is a sector of this country's vibrant economy which is made up of more than 9,000 firms. It employs more than 400,000 people directly, from the Atlantic Ocean to the Pacific Ocean. In 1980 it produced more than $43 billion worth of goods and services. We are, I offer, a very healthy country with a very healthy economy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the minister with some interest because I thought that in the last minute or two of her comments she would get to the east coast. We welcome and, indeed, give credit for the good sense the government had in carrying on projects which had, in fact, commenced a long time ago, ideas which have come with time, probably because of the explosion in world energy prices over the last seven or eight years.

Coal development is an interim measure for Nova Scotia. We had absolutely no choice. We consider it to be a good mid-term and long-term posture and investment for Nova Scotia and for the federal government, in terms of the economy of Atlantic Canada, to get on with the coal development in Nova Scotia.

In connection with that, though, it puzzles me somewhat to read and learn over the last four or five days that Dr. Read, of the oil substitution grouping within energy, mines and resources, has advised Mr. Dave Nantes, the president of the Tidal Power Corporation, the Crown agency of the province of Nova Scotia, that the federal government is, in fact, now seriously considering withdrawing funding from current and ongoing studies which will, in fact, terminate a little bit later on this year. The federal government had been directly involved in those studies through its position as a member of the co-ordinating committee with respect to Fundy tidal development. The government had said that it would terminate any further funding for that portion of the studies which could be related to any future export of electricity.

I indicated that coal had interim and short-term benefits, with some long-term employment and other benefits, for Nova Scotia. However, the long-term and mid-term benefits of Fundy tidal power lie in the fact that these resources are renewable. They are not finite; they are renewable. Therefore, it surprises me that as we near 1982, when there has been the final and major decision to go ahead with planning, engineering and other developmental studies with perhaps as much as $.5 billion in expenditure, the federal government has threatened to withdraw funding. Up until now, the federal government has virtually carried the ball and has been given all the credit in the world. It made sense when it started some years ago, continues to make sense today, and tomorrow I suppose it will make even more sense, so it surprises me that it would threaten to withdraw funding.

I cannot understand why, at a time in the development of Fundy tidal power when it is so critical to getting on with development so that we might realize the benefits from this tremendous renewable source during the 1980s, that it would, in fact, threaten to withdraw funding. I hope this is not the view of the government but, rather, a bureaucratic reaction to what the money is being spent on. It is rather simple: the money is being spent on updating costs, identification of transmission costs and a marketing study. All these things are necessary because Fundy tidal power is, of course, an enormous project.

In order to make it economic for Atlantic Canadians and other Canadian as well, the markets must be commensurate with the size of the project. Large markets imply that we must go to the northeastern United States and, particularly, New England if we are to find the sales which will make construction of Fundy tidal power economically feasible. This would continue to make it of value not only to Atlantic Canadians but to all Canadians.

It puzzles me why the government would do this. It has never happened before. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Regan) would probably be aware of this fact, and certainly the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) would also be aware, if he were in his seat. I am sorry that he is not. I also regret that there are not maritimers in the House now.

Never before, in the history of Fundy tidal power has there ever been such a high level of interest. The United States is passing legislation which will enable it to participate in this development, its acquisition and distribution. Investors in the United States are evidencing interest almost daily. Even the briefest of conversations with Mr. Nantes, the president of the Tidal Power Corporation, would lead one to a very clear understanding of the very high level of investor interest. That is why most of us are confused when we see the government back away from its commitment to the continuing preparatory studies which are necessary to any significant development of the Fundy tidal power, and it is only a significant development that will make it economically viable.

We have been talking about energy and home heating in all this kerfuffle. I wish my opponent in the last general election were within earshot today. He went with me from meeting to meeting, telling the people that the Liberals would never, never allow the price of gasoline to rise by the 18 cents per gallon that the Conservatives were "forcing down their throats". There have been 13 increases in the 16 months since the Liberals returned to office, Mr. Speaker. They were returned on the panic they instilled in Canadians about the question of the 18-cent increase in the excise tax. Yet the total increases this year alone will probably reach $10 per barrel. What we have seen today is just the beginning, not the end. The price of home heating oil has increased by 37 cents per gallon, without cushioning.

The minister spent his allocated time discussing the Crosbie budget without uttering a word about the intentions of the government on the direction in which it is leading Canadians. I should like to read into the record two points from the Crosbie budget as follows:

Third, we will be mounting a major effort to ease the burden of adjustment to higher prices in the Atlantic region. We will provide grants to compensate for the additional costs of electricity generation resulting from oil price increases in excess of $2 per barrel per year.

By the end of 1981 the increase will amount to $10. Under the Crosbie budget we would have had a cushion, and I would remind the hon. member opposite who is from the Atlantic provinces of this fact.

The next passage from the Crosbie budget that I want to put on record is as follows:

In addition, the refundable energy tax credit I announced tonight when in full effect will return about $1 billion to lower- and middle-income Canadians. The credit will commence with the 1980 tax year. It will be phased in to reflect the fact that the full impact of energy price increases is not felt until later next year. One half of the benefit will thus be claimable in 1980, with full benefits claimable in 1981 and subsequent years. Credit benefits will be reduced for families with incomes over a threshold amount. For 1980 the threshold is $21,380. For every $100 of income in excess of this threshold, benefits will be reduced by $5.

As has been indicated by other speakers today, when the plan was in effect the full benefit would have amounted to about $220 each year per family. I suggest that would be a significant change.

Just the other day an advertisement in the newspaper invited people to convert from oil to gas. If the minister were in the House I would suggest to him that we do not have any "bananas" in Atlantic Canada yet. What are people such as my parents and thousands of other Atlantic Canadians who are on fixed incomes, or incomes that are significantly lower than the Canadian average, supposed to do, Mr. Speaker? Their incomes are lower now, have historically been in the past, and because of the absence of effort or concern on the part of this government probably will continue to be in the future.

I should like to turn now to the matter of electrical energy. Prince Edward Island is probably the lowest user of domestic electricity in the country. The average use per family is about 6,000 kilowatt hours. Before the recent increases, the cost was $292.64 per 5,000 kwh; in British Columbia it cost $85.27. Northwest Territories was less than Prince Edward Island at $261 for 5,000 kwh; Newfoundland, $245; Nova Scotia, $221; Yukon, $201; New Brunswick, $171; Ontario, $145; Quebec, $160, Manitoba, $133, Alberta, $132 and Saskatchewan, $122. These are figures obtained from Statistics Canada, Mr. Speaker. Prince Edward Island uses roughly 6,000 kwh per year; Nova Scotia, 8,500 kwh; Ontario, 10,000 kwh, and so on across the country.

There is one significant point that gives us concern about the cost of energy and the need for cushioning, Mr. Speaker. The Nova Scotia Power Corporation urged Nova Scotians to convert from oil to electricity a few years ago and thousands of people did so. Today an all-electric home uses something in the order of 30,000 kwh on an annual basis. I should like to draw a couple of conclusions from that.

The cost of operating an all-electric home ranges between $1,400 and $1,500 per year in Nova Scotia; in Ontario it costs $870; British Columbia, $510, or about one third of the cost in Prince Edward Island which is virtually totally dependent on oil for generating electricity and where the figure rises to about $1,800 per year. This is killing Atlantic Canada. Some way has to be found to cushion the cost of domestic electricity. It is not really a question of lowering demand on a volunteer basis. I suspect that Canadians everywhere, with just a slight effort, could reduce their annual demand to zero growth and with a greater effort could reduce it to minus 5 per cent or minus 6 per cent on an annual basis.

The pricing policies and energy policies of the government do not allow Atlantic Canadians to take that route voluntarily; it forces them to reduce consumption of electricity by 30 per cent, 40 per cent, or 50 per cent because they bloody well cannot afford it! They cannot pay two or three times the national rate for domestic electricity and live comfortably if they are on fixed incomes. That concept did not work yesterday and it will not work today.

There are two things that I think we must keep in mind as we debate this subject, Mr. Speaker. First of all, I should like to know when Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island will have an opportunity to harness the tremendous electrical potential of the Midas Basin. They have done so much to help that area of the country, but now the government is backing away from the idea. I put the question to the hon. member for South West Nova (Miss Campbell), who is the only maritimer opposite, why is the government backing away from this? It is the one chance for energy security in the long term. It is renewable energy and it is clean. In 15 or 20 years coal may be clean, but it is not clean today. Yet our people are forced to turn to it because they cannot afford oil. The government withdraws the subsidies and forces people in the maritimes to find savings in the involuntary restriction of the amount of energy they use! That is true for fishermen, farmers as well as householders and all sectors of the economy that rely on energy.

● (1730)

Our excise tax was aimed at transportation users. Through their income tax, the fishermen could deduct legitimate expenses, as could the farmers and those in the forest operations to a certain degree. We exempted most heating fuels because we knew from experience, and we were concerned, that older Canadians on fixed or lower incomes could not bear the burden that a rise to world prices would cause.

Because of our dependence on oil in Atlantic Canada, we are very vulnerable to an unsympathetic, though I hope not uncaring, Ottawa bureaucracy, the Liberal government policy making process. As with everything, we are hit first hardest and the impact lasts the longest. It takes us longer to recover from this form of insidious taxation.

This is worse in one respect than the Boston tea party. At least some good came out of that. Some measure of progress can be noted from that incident. However, what is there for us? The government says it will not yield in its determination to not cushion exorbitant domestic electricity production costs. Users in Alantic Canada cannot afford that. Wages in Atlantic Canada are one third of those in the Yukon, yet Prince Edward Island has the highest costs. Wages in Atlantic Canada are 30 to 40 per cent behind those in Vancouver, B.C., yet our cost of domestic electricity is over three times as much. That applies to almost everything.

What does the government want us to do? Go back to burning lamps? Is that what is expected of us? Our pensioners are being forced to buy lamps. The government can smile or laugh, but it must listen and pay attention because that is what is happening. These people cannot afford the burden being placed on their backs.

I welcome the initiatives coming forward in the alternate energy programs, but that is all they are. They are proposals and research. We must find alternate sources. I am talking about what has to be done tomorrow, next year and the year after. Some way must be found to cushion the unacceptably high prices for domestic electricity and home heating through generation of electricity by oil.

That is what is being asked for and that is what is needed. I hope this afternoon someone will respond to why the government is considering cutting off funding for ongoing studies for the tidal power corporation because of the significance of that in the development of renewable energy for those in Atlantic Canada.

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, during the course of this afternoon's debate there have been a variety of comments on certain aspects of the National Energy Program. It is my intention to follow that procedure but to offer some facts, based on an analysis of where we are in the National Energy Program some six or seven months after its introduction.

Members will recall that during the last election campaign and more recently, we on this side of the House have set forward the principles which underline the National Energy Program. From the beginning we have emphasized the need for a made-in-Canada oil pricing policy. We have rejected the idea that the OPEC countries should in concert determine the price of oil to be paid by the Canadian consumer. Canadians enjoy an advantage as a result of having within our boundaries not only large reserves of oil but enormous energy resources.

We on this side of the house prefer a predictable and gradual increase in oil prices, not the sudden and unknown shocks that would result from the acceptance of oil price increases being dictated to us by other countries. We rejected the 18-cent excise tax on gasoline in the Conservative budget. We have kept prices in Canada below those which would have resulted from that budget.

When we look at oil price increases in Canada, the real question is who benefits from them? Under the Conservative budget, there is no question who would have benefited. The beneficiaries would have been the oil companies—at that time in large measure foreign controlled—and the producing provinces. We know the split of revenue that obtained in the past was such as to channel most of the revenue to the producing provinces and to the producing companies. Under the National Energy Program we are implementing a new system that will be fair to both consuming and producing provinces. We are looking at a system that will ensure that revenue netbacks in the industry serve to increase rather than to diminish Canadian participation in our own energy future.

I would note in passing that recent price increases have been the subject of critical comment from one part of the Conservative party. The other part apparently thinks they are not enough. Part of the oil price increases arise from a levy being imposed to pay for the acquisition of a foreign-controlled oil company. In that sense when we speak of higher oil prices, we are really speaking of moving money from one pocket to the other. We are acquiring assets by that decision, a decision that brings benefit to all Canadians. I shall return to that point in a moment.

A second feature of our energy program, as elaborated during the course of the last election campaign and more recently, has been to provide Canadians with energy security through the accelerated development of our domestic supply and through assured foreign supply as long as that is required. We in Canada are in the fortunate position of being energy self-sufficient in every form of energy except oil, and in that one segment of our total energy picture, we produce almost 80 per cent of our requirements. Through enhanced supply and increased conservation, we are committed to a policy of self-sufficiency in all forms of energy, including oil by 1990. Natural gas is already in abundance along with uranium, hydroelectricity and coal. We are seeking new forms of renewable energy as well as ensuring that Canadians enjoy self-sufficiency in oil by the end of this decade.

To ensure that we utilize to our advantage our abundant energy resources and move away from our excessive dependency on oil, we have instituted under the National Energy Program an off-oil project, a conversion plan, which offers the consumer a cash grant to convert from oil to other more plentiful forms of energy in household heating. That program, announced in detail late last month, is now on the way to implementation across Canada, with some variations to take into account local requirements. Despite its very recent introduction, it is a program which has already had an enormous impact on the imagination of Canadians.

Equally, paralleling our Canada oil substitution program in the domestic use of oil is a program to encourage the conversion from oil in the industrial and commercial sector. There our goal is to reduce the use of oil to only 10 per cent of total energy requirements from the approximate 20 per cent which was in place only last year. That program, I am happy to note, is already proving highly successful through a co-operative arrangement with industry. Joint industry-government committees have identified a range of conservation measures which are not only bringing benefit in terms of restraining Canada's need for imported oil but, in addition, have already resulted in major savings for the industry sectors involved. In total, some $1.6 billion is being allocated for the oil conversion program which includes an improved distribution system for natural gas to ensure that Canadians across our country, whether they live in Quebec, the maritimes or on Vancouver Island, have the opportunity to utilize natural gas in their home heating so that we can further reduce our demand for imported oil.

Substitution of natural gas will also be encouraged by the fact that we are committed to a policy whereby natural gas will be held in price at two thirds of the oil energy equivalent. Canadians will have access to natural gas at 66⅔ per cent of the equivalent oil price, including those in eastern Canada where prices are being equalized to encourage households and businesses to switch to natural gas. As a percentage of oil prices, recent gas prices have been about 80 per cent of the oil equivalent. We are determined to bring them down to 66⅔ per cent by 1983.

Obviously producers of natural gas will benefit from this enlarged domestic market in Canada for their natural gas. They have experienced for some years, especially during 1980, the impact of a glut in natural gas. This has in turn brought about a reduction in exploration activities and in gas sales. We are eager to ensure partly through the expansion of the domestic market that their cash flow problems are further reduced.

In our energy policy the expanded role for Petro-Canada received special emphasis. Since coming to office we have taken measures to ensure that Petro-Canada, the national oil company, does play a greater role in the total energy picture. Since April, 1980, new funding of approximately $80 million has been made available to Petro-Canada, and a capital spending program of $900 million for 1981 is envisaged, compared with $435 million in 1980. That expanded program of capital spending has been approved to ensure that Petro-Canada can accelerate its resource development activities throughout our country.

Additionally, as I have already noted, Petro-Canada has acquired the assets of Petrofina to provide further service to Canadians, to provide further opportunity for our state oil company to participate in the energy future which is so promising for our country. We look to that acquisition to parallel the earlier acquisitions of the Canadian assets of Atlantic Richfield and Pacific Petroleums to provide Canadians with a national oil company that will be visible and active in all aspects of the industry.

At the same time that we have sought the further expansion of our supply, we have emphasized in our program conservation and the promotion of alternate energy. Existing programs are being expanded, with the amount of $1.2 billion being allocated for conservation and renewable energy initiatives. In particular, the Canadian Home Insulation Program, CHIP, which has now become so familiar to all Canadians, will be further increased to ensure that 70 per cent of Canadian homes are more adequately insulated by 1987.

In terms of renewable energy, in addition to the promotion of solar demonstration and biomass programs which were well under way prior to the National Energy Program, a new alternate energy agency has been established in Winnipeg under the name of Canertech to accelerate the development and use of renewable energy. Our aim is that the contribution of such forms of energy to total energy demand will be doubled to 6 per cent by 1990.

I regret that the hon. member who immediately preceded me has since left the House, because in the course of his remarks he made reference not only to renewable energy generally but specifically to the question of federal support for tidal power research in Nova Scotia. I want the hon. member opposite to understand that the information he provided the House is not in accord with the facts. We remain willing to consider supporting an update of the Fundy tidal power study to the extent that that work meets the primary objective of oil conservation and substitution. We do not look for federal funding to be expended for extensive consideration of export opportunities, if that is what the hon. member had in mind. However, the export of surplus Fundy tidal output would certainly not be discouraged, provided it meets the normal criteria for export approval by the National Energy Board. With that brief digression I hope the hon. member opposite will rest assured that his fears are unwarranted.

We estimate that conservation and oil substitution measures will enable total domestic oil demand to be reduced, so that by 1990 we should be looking at a domestic supply situation of about 1.5 million barrels a day. In that connection hon. members would want to know that in the first four months of this year domestic oil demand was significantly lower in Canada—especially in eastern Canada—than it was last year. We are in fact consuming less oil today than we were a year ago.

It is my belief that the benefits of the measures I have touched upon in terms of conservation and substitution are beginning to appear. Indeed, that demand for oil had decreased substantially more than we had originally anticipated.

With regard to another major facet of the National Energy Program, that of Canadian ownership and control, we have set a target, which I think is now familiar to most Canadians, of 50 per cent Canadian ownership by 1990. That policy has consistently been supported in all provinces. It is one of the most popular aspects of the total National Energy Program. That fundamental change of direction in our petroleum sector is reflected in newspaper articles every day. I do not need to enumerate many examples, but an obvious one is the acquisition of Petrofina, to which I have already referred. Another is the creation of Dome Canada. Those are two examples which must now be well known to those who follow developments in the industry.

In addition, I draw the attention of hon. members to the substantial acquisitions involved in recent moves, such as the the purchase by Canadians of CanDel, and of Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas. This has helped us to move forward in a dramatic way toward the achievement of our goal of Canadianization of the petroleum sector.

However, that is not the only way in which the move toward greater Canadian participation is happening. On every side we see Canadian companies reaching agreements with foreign-controlled companies which have land rights to pursue jointly exploration on those lands in new and imaginative ways. This has not been a feature of the Canadian petroleum industry in the past.

I might note in this context too that in our elaboration of the National Energy Program and in the development of requirements for the participation of Canadian-owned companies, we have modified requirements. We have done so to ensure that a maximum number of companies meet a minimum of requirements. They will become eligible for incentive grants this government is providing to ensure that Canadian companies participate in a way in which they have not in the past had an opportunity to do.

Finally, we promised to make energy part of our larger industrial and regional strategy. I do not doubt that members of this House, as well as the public generally, will increasingly see the National Energy Program acting as a catalyst in furthering our economic prospects. The program has been criticized for somehow stultifying such development. I submit that anyone who views the program fairly, taking into account all its aspects, must judge it as a major stimulus of total economic development in the years ahead.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ALLOTMENT OF TIME TO CONSIDER BILL C-57 ON REPORT STAGE AND THIRD READING

Mr. Bussières: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. the Minister of State for Finance on a point of order.

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Speaker, pursuant to standing orders, I wish to inform the House that, in spite of consultations between party spokesmen, it was impossible to agree on the application of Standing Order 75A or 75B at the report and third reading stages of Bill C-57, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas. Therefore, I have the honour to advise the House that at the next sitting of the House I will move a motion pursuant to Standing Order 75C for the purpose of allotting two sitting days for the report stage and one sitting day for third reading of Bill C-57.

[English]

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—CONDEMNATION OF INCREASED TAXES ON PETROLEUM PRODUCTS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Miss MacDonald:

That this House condemns the government for again unnecessarily raising petroleum taxes and thereby burdening all consumers, but particularly consumers of heating oil, with prices far in excess of those promised without providing relief to those hardest hit and least able to adjust.

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, prior to the dinner adjournment there were a few statements made in the House by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. MacLaren), whom I notice has taken his seat in the House, which I do not wish to allow to pass without some comment.

During the last federal election, Mr. Speaker, I do not think there was one thing that annoyed me more than to hear time after time the present Liberal government stating that what we needed in Canada was made-in-Canada energy pricing. There was nothing, it felt, that would serve the people better to keep down the costs of energy than if we had a made-in-Canada energy policy.

Some hon. Members: Right on.

Mr. Domm: The then opposition could show the people of Canada how they could get the prices down at the gas pumps, how they could supply low cost heating fuels, how the taxi drivers and the truck drivers and the people driving to and from work would save all these millions of dollars, if they could just get their clutches on some major oil company or some free enterprise business. So the people bought it, and they were misled, they were misinformed, they were poorly directed and hoodwinked by the then opposition into believing that their increase would be much less than the 18 cents a gallon increase that the Clark government was going to bring out.

What did the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), then leader of the opposition, say in January of 1980? He said that he would make sure that the people of Canada would not feel the tax of 18 cents, that he would take it upon himself to see that the price of gas would not rise by way of taxes more than 14 cents, to use his words.

What in reality has happened to gas prices since then? Well, I will tell you, Mr. Speaker, that this government fooled the people of Canada again, as it did on wage and price controls. It literally conned them into believing that it was the saviour sent to govern this country, to bring the price of gasoline down, to hold energy prices at a level that the people could afford, to create jobs, to control the growth in government, to have government live within the means at its disposal, namely its revenues.

What went wrong? The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources failed to admit in the House today that they cannot produce a tax system of revenue to feed their insatiable quest for dollars. What government in the world can continue to promise the people that it will control expenses, bring down the cost of government, and then continue to mislead, misrepresent and spend on a daily basis 25 per cent more than it takes in each year?

How has the government controlled the growth of energy cost to the consumers of Canada? It has not done it, it cannot do it, and it will not admit it. For example, the government is implementing an energy policy for one ulterior motive, that is, to seize wealth for public ownership and thus socialize the country under a strong unitary central government. It will turn the country into a republic run by the Liberal democratic party which has only one ulterior motive in mind. No matter how it is accomplished, it wishes to seize control of the free enterprise system and drive independent businessmen out of business.

When the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) was in opposition a few months ago, he said that if he were in power when interest rates rose to the level they were when the Conservatives were in power, he would resign. Where is the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce now? He did not resign; he did not hold interest rates to our 10 per cent, 10.5 per cent or 11 per cent. What are the interest rates today? How are they affecting people in the energy business across the country?

I should like to refer to a letter dated May 14, 1981, which I received from Canadian Energy Systems. It was addressed to me and reads as follows:

> As our MP, would you kindly put the following question to the finance minister of the opposition? Do you have a mortgage on your home that is due in the near future?

The author of the letter was referring to the government of the day. He was asking me to ask the present Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) whether he had a mortgage on his home which is now due.

This man from Canadian Energy Systems went on to indicate:

> Unfortunately, I am in the position of having to renew my mortgage in October of this year. Presently I am paying interest at the rate of 12 per cent. It appears that I will be faced with an increase of 6 per cent or more!

He continued:

> I'm sure that the average "blue-collar" worker will be seeking larger than ever wage settlements in order to cope with interest rates also.

As a small businessman owning Canadian Energy Systems in Peterborough, he said:

> —the only way I can afford these exorbitant interest rates is to raise the price of the goods I sell. Is this not considered by the minister to be inflationary?

Where are the priorities of the government at a time when people on low and fixed incomes are losing their businesses, homes and farms? The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) is on record as having some degree of sympathy for farmers. What is he doing about it? What is the Minister of Finance doing to hold down interest? What is the minister responsible for housing doing to fight and lobby to keep down the interest rates on homes on behalf of people who are losing their homes? What is the Minister of Finance doing for farmers in his province who are losing their farms at a rate higher than ever in the history of the country? What do they say in the government? They say that if a small business is incorporated, the government will give some relief through the government bond issue which can be lent out at a lower rate. But what is the government doing for unincorporated small businessmen? Is that privilege being extended to them? The government does not care. Is it being extended to independent farmers, the salt of the earth? They are the people who first settled in the country; they are the people who feed us and a great deal of the world today. What is the government doing for small farmers? Is it extending the bond program so that the farmers faced with high energy costs can obtain money at a low interest rate? The government does not care about the farm community. If the farm is big, or if it is a German investor or an investor from some other foreign country who comes here to buy a block of land and incorporates, the government will help. But, what does the government do for independent farmers who are losing their farms at a rate unsurpassed at any other time in history? The government does not care.

What did members of the government say during the last election campaign about the rising cost of energy under the Clark government? What would they do if they were elected? They said that they could not afford to cause prices to rise to world levels and that it was too much for Canadian industry to pay for oil and gas. What do they say today with the present facts which we have to consider? Are they prepared to lower the price of gasoline as the price drops on the world market?

They do not care about taxi drivers, truck drivers, farmers or independent businessmen. I have not seen the price of gas coming down, but this weekend in Britain a major producer of North Sea oil said:

The government reduced their oil prices by $2 per barrel and there are indications that further reductions of up to $5 per barrel are anticipated.

Has the government dropped the price of oil because Britain has been able to drop its price? They did not wish to raise the price when world prices went up. What are they doing to lower the price when world prices go down?

In Mexico, the director of Pemex, the national oil company, reduced the price of Mexican crude by $4 to $30.60 per barrel this past weekend. What has the government done, wherever it is, to lower the price of oil because it is being lowered in Mexico?

Also this past weekend in Malaysia, the state oil company, Petronas, cut its crude prices for the second month in a row. The government raises prices when world prices are going down. When they campaign for an election, they think they fool the people of Canada who gave them a mandate to hold prices down or to hold the gas tax to no more than 14 cents, according to the Prime Minister.

In his speech today, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said that they were implementing a new system, that that was their election promise. Sure, they are implementing a new system, they can tack on 9 cents overnight. The people of Canada are not being fooled; the government will not get away with it.

Also in his speech today the same parliamentary secretary said that the government would acquire oil companies for the benefit of Canadians. What is the benefit of acquiring Petrofina at $1.6 billion of taxpayers' money? It is not putting one drop of oil into the country. It is not creating any new jobs and, to add insult to injury, the government is paying for the company almost twice what it is worth. That is what happens when the country allows the liberal democratic party, the socialist party, to be in power. The only thing Liberals can envisage is everything in public ownership. What will this mean for Ontario?

If the government has no reservations or guilty feelings about public ownership and continuing to lose money, what will Canadians think when they drive up to service stations, produce their Government of Canada credit cards to buy gasoline, and pay exactly the same for that gasoline, whether it is Gulf, Shell, Imperial Oil or the Government of Canada? What did this government do with its big rip-off on that wellhead tax?

I rose in this House not four weeks ago and told the government that it was criticizing the oil companies for ripping off the public and making excessive profits on products on which they were not even entitled to make profits. At that time I asked the government how much it was going to refund the people of Canada for the illegal wellhead tax rip-off which Petrofina, and now Petro-Canada through its subsidiaries right across this country, are making. I also phoned members of the executive of Petro-Canada and asked how much they would be refunding the people of Canada out of the rip-off tax they were collecting? They said said that their prices were determined by the marketplace. That is the policy of Petro-Canada. They will get the top dollar for every gallon of gas they sell to eastern Canada. They will get the top price for oil, which has gone up 50 per cent in price since this government came into office.

I say to the people of Canada that they can look forward to a glorious day when the Government of Canada, the bureaucracy and the civil servants shove the nozzle of the gas hose into the tanks of their cars. And they will do this, not to give Canadians cheaper energy and not to hold the price of oil down, but to gouge Canadians for every cent they can get to feed the government's insatiable appetite—a government which spends 25 per cent more than it takes in every year. This is a government which has no thought about where the money will come from.

Do you know who will own Canada, Mr. Speaker? Kuwait, Venezuela, Mexico, Argentina and countries such as those will own us. If we sold every nickel's worth of stock on the Toronto Stock Exchange tomorrow, we could not pay off our national debt of $100 billion. The government cannot even afford to pay the annual interest on the debt. It budgeted for a $14 billion loss this year—and this is the government which was going to hold the deficit down. This is the government which was going to keep expenses down to within its revenue. This government betrayed and befuddled the people of Canada. It conned them into believing that it has some answers when, in reality, all it has is more problems and a $100 billion deficit.

I would like to give two examples of how little this government cares about the people of Canada today through the policies it has in place. First, there is UFFI, urea formaldehyde foam insultation. The government knew back in 1977 that this product was no good. The report concerning this product is with the Ministry of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, and the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) is also aware of it. What did the government do? It approved grants under CHIP for the installation of a dangerous substance into the homes of Canadians. What is the government doing now to solve the problem to which it contributed in large part? Absolutely nothing. It is studying the study which was just completed, which study studied the study which was done in 1978, which verified that in 1977 this was considered to be a dangerous commodity.

The members of this House have a moral obligation to the people of Canada to pay for the testing of their homes. This government does not care. It does not care about oil prices, gas prices, energy prices, insultation costs or government expenditures. All it cares about it getting elected to office. The members of the government party will do it with the aid of the socialist party to my left every time there is a division in this House. Every time there is a vote in this House they all bow down to Allah. They all hold up their hands and go marching down the aisle to a republican Canada, a socialist country.

If this government can take over the oil companies—members opposite look astounded when I say that this government is placing into public ownership private corporations. They have no reason to be surprised. I have no doubt in my mind that this government is capable of nationalizing—I call it putting into public ownership—all the nickel, gold, iron ore and uranium which we have in Ontario. If this government gets its mitts on the wealth of Alberta, Newfoundland, British Columbia and Saskatchewan with the help of the fellows to my left, by placing the wealth into public ownership and by removing the possibility for provincial royalties, it will take control of everything on which it can get its hands.

Do you realize, Mr. Speaker, that once the government has an interest in these companies they no longer pay royalties, it is illegal? This government has no intention of cutting the costs of government. Until this country elects a party which cares about living within its means, a party which has the guts to reduce the size of the bureaucracy around here, we will have a republican country. Everything will be in public ownership. There are people in this building who make $80,000 and $90,000 a year. The top paid civil servant who works for the Prime Minister makes more than he does. There is staff on this Hill working in the bureaucracy who make more than members of Parliament. There is no excuse at all for the way this government allows the bureaucracy to run our country. I will give members opposite credit for one thing, they know how to get votes. They get votes by misleading and misrepresenting the people of Canada.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, the second point I wish to make is this: on January 1 this government can find $564 million with which to purchase foreign-made metric weigh scales. That is inexcusable. The urea formaldehyde problem could be solved with that sum of money. We would be allowed to stay with our Canadian form of measurement, known as the imperial standard. This government does not care about the people, nor does it care about energy prices. This government will drive free enterprise right out of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to be able to rise on behalf of the New Democratic Party, to speak on the Conservative opposition motion. In its motion it asks that this House condemn the government for again unnecessarily raising petroleum taxes and thereby burdening all consumers, but particularly consumers of heating oil, with prices far in excess of those promised without providing relief to those hardest hit and least able to adjust. I find it strange for the Conservatives to introduce such a motion when they were not very sympathetic at the time they were in a position to do something about this problem.

Our lead-off speaker, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell), did an excellent job of showing how the increase in prices actually hurt consumers. He also did an excellent job showing that the policies of Liberals and Conservatives alike are very much the same when it comes to dealing with the energy problem, or the energy crisis, as it is referred to by some people here in Canada.

I would like to take a few minutes to address a few groups which I think are being hurt, particularly those whom I have the honour to represent. They are the people who live in remote northern communities and those involved in the agricultural sector.

Before I address these groups I would like to say a few words about Petro-Canada. During the last election campaign I was very active in supporting Petro-Canada. I thought it was a great agency. I saw it as a way for Canadians to gain some control of the petroleum industry. First, I thought we could gain some substantial control, Canadian control, of the petroleum industry through Petro-Canada. Then I thought Petro-Canada would be a different type of oil company which would sell oil through exploration development at a cost determined by the people who owned it. We could then find out what margin of profit would have to be taxed. In this way we could establish a realistic price to the consumer for a resource which he owned, not some inflated price imposed on us by the oil companies. We, as a party, and myself as an individual, thought that Petro-Canada would be able to provide us with some kind of information about the oil industry. We thought Petro-Canada could tell us how much hydrocarbons there were left in the ground, what it cost to actually develop them and what a realistic price for them would be. There would be a lot of research information that should come back into the federal government and to the people of Canada so we could be more informed and more articulate about the problems which we encounter in the oil industry, because up until now we have had a real problem, as a government and as Canadian people, in acquiring information about the oil industry.

However, I think that at this time, I am not as enthusiastic about Petro-Canada as I was during the last election campaign. The reason I am not as enthusiastic about Petro-Canada is that I am afraid this government will not do anything different with Petro-Canada. All it will try to do is to develop a larger oil company which is a little more efficient. It will still do some of the things which are distasteful to Canadian people. There is a lot of secrecy involved around Petro-Canada. Its policies go astray from time to time, for example when it spends a substantial amount of dollars, not for the benefit of Canadian people but to the benefit of people in other countries when it has its logo developed in other areas of the world instead of in Canada. It has also overlooked the rights of northern territories where some of the oil companies and Petro-Canada have been given lease rights, rights to go into exploration, before the land claims in the north are settled. Therefore, Petro-Canada is turning into something which is no different from any other large oil company, and that distresses me.

I think that if we are looking at something which will just grow larger and try to operate more efficiently, we will be caught in the same trap in which we have been for years in Canada. Petro-Canada is a corporation which should be run for the people of the country, a company they would own in terms of their own resources. Instead of changing the direction, looking at alternatives, finding better ways of delivery, we are just trying to run it more efficiently, as do some of the large multinational oil companies in the free enterprise system. That really distresses me about Petro-Canada.

I would like to go back now to addressing some of the problems I have mentioned earlier, especially as they affect those people who have had the seven or so consecutive price increases in petroleum products. I think that in the northern areas we have some very unique problems. The cost of hauling fuel to some of these areas is prohibitive. According to the figures from the 1976 census, which are the most recent, until we have the figures from the latest census, in 1976, over 40 per cent of the homes in remote areas were heated by oil, and another 20 per cent were heated by oil with possibly wood to substitute for some of the oil and heating fuel consumption.

It should be pointed out that to put in natural gas in many of these remote and northern communities is simply uneconomical and unviable. Therefore, when people have to pay the high cost of transportation to cover the cost of the fuel as well as the increases which are coming, it becomes exceedingly difficult for them to fit this into their family budgets on top of the cost of heating their homes. Also it becomes increasingly difficult for small business people to operate their businesses because of the high energy costs which are being laid upon them.

I would like to acknowledge some of the advantages of the oil compensation program of the federal government. I am very pleased to see that this has been settled between the provinces and the federal government so that people in the provinces can take advantage of the oil compensation program which has been instituted by the federal government. In many of the northern communities, about 85 per cent of the homes are heated by oil. Oil prices there, even last winter, were prohibitive. I know that in some areas in my constituency heating fuel itself was up to about $1.29 a gallon, and the cost of automobile gas or boat gas for the fishermen was even higher than that. What will all these increases come to by the end of this year? Will fuel be $2 a gallon more? Will it be $2.50 more? I do share one concern that the Conservatives have with the Liberal government, that is, when will the government come clean with us and tell us at what point those increases will stop? Are we going to meet the world price? Are we going to meet 85 per cent of the world price? Are we going to go beyond world price before this is over?

I think we are caught in a ridiculous situation of fighting over oil pricing between central Canada in the east and central Canada in the west and, at the same time, the government is not willing to meet the reduced prices of the western provinces, or, to be more accurate, the producing provinces. At the same time, we are spending large sums of money for compensating for the price of oil from other countries, for bringing in offshore oil, from Saudi Arabia and other parts of the world. I think it is a ridiculous situation in which we are caught.

I know that in Manitoba, at Red Sucker Lake last year, the cost of oil was $1.85, which is even higher than the $1.29 a gallon for heating fuel in many places in my constituency. In some places in northern Ontario, it is as high as $3 a gallon. I think that this is very, very hard on the people in the outlying, remote northern areas. This would cover the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. It would also cover most of the northern area of the provinces in Canada.

I would now like to turn to another area, one relating to the farmers whom I have mentioned. I think the farmers are hit exceedingly hard with the high energy costs. The facts show us that farmers use about 8.9 million barrels of diesel fuel every year, and another 15.1 million barrels of gasoline. Years ago a farmer used to be able to feed about 10 people on an average farm. Today in Canada, the average farm feeds about 50 people. Therefore, over the years, although the agricultural industry has started to use a lot more hydrocarbons and a lot more petroleum products, it has become much more efficient; in fact, vastly more efficient than any other sector of the economy. However, at the same time, farmers are hard hit by the high fuel costs because it is necessary for them to have that energy to be as efficient as they are; and they are very efficient.

I would like to see the government put more effort into finding energy alternatives to be used on farms. I know that right now, on a farm just outside of Unity, Saskatchewan, there are a few people who are doing some exploratory work into the use of hydrous ammonia to run vehicles. In fact, I have seen these vehicles which run on hydrous ammonia. They are presently converting diesel tractors in that area to run on hydrous ammonia, and an acetylene catalyst is used to make it sufficiently combustible and to prevent energy loss in the use of this fuel. This is just one idea that I would like to see the government pursuing more vigorously so that the farming sector can have some choices and so the agricultural sector can have a secure energy supply in the future. Farmers need fuel which is reasonably priced, because of all the sectors of our economy, they are hit the hardest because they cannot pass the cost on to the consumer.

Although, most small business people are being hit right now by high interest rates and inflation, in most cases they can at least pass on their increased costs to the consumer. I suppose they may be cutting back a bit on their inventories, and their sales might be somewhat reduced, but most of their costs are passed on. In the agricultural sector, very few of the increased costs of production can actually be passed on to the consumer. This really puts the farming population at a disadvantage. I think that if we do not do something about the increased costs of production on the farms, either by reducing their costs of production, or else by increasing the revenue for the products farmers sell, we will find ourselves in a disastrous situation in terms of producing food in Canada.

It distresses me to find that at certain times of the year we import about 90 per cent of our vegetables into this country, when we could be even more productive than we are in the food and agricultural industry in this country. As I have mentioned, the farmers and the people involved in agriculture have improved their productivity much more than has any other sector of the economy; but it could be even better if the government would help by giving direction. I thank our lucky stars that the farmers have been so devoted to the work which they do in producing food for this country. I fear that very soon we will see beef producers and grain producers going on strike and withholding their products from the market. They might do so in an effort to get some kind of reasonable return for the produce which they are turning out to feed Canadian people and to sell abroad to help reduce our trade deficit. This is one of the few sectors of the economy that is more than pulling its weight. I think the government is a bit hard on that sector of the economy with the increased prices for petroleum products and taxes it has imposed. The situation has become very sad indeed.

● (2040)

Since the Liberals came back to power there have been seven increases in the price of oil. During the election campaign they claimed their increases would be less than those proposed by the Conservatives, and I am sure that promise helped them get elected. The people of Canada relied on that promise. I think I accepted it at one time, but I have learned a great deal about the Liberals in the few months I have been a member of this House of Commons. I know that you cannot rely on the word of political parties at election time.

It is time that the federal government indicated to the people where all this is going to end or when we can expect an agreement on an energy policy in Canada. I do not know of any such agreement at the present time.

Although the National Energy Program is a good idea, it has been bogged down for quite some time. I think we should be gaining more control over the petroleum industry in Canada and, indeed, that was the intent of the National Energy Program. But the federal government's approach has turned it into a disaster. We will not reach energy self-sufficiency in the next decade; indeed, at the rate we are going, we will not reach energy self-sufficiency within the next century, unless something is done to turn things around and give an opportunity to oil companies, provincial governments and members of this House to have consultations with the government. Indeed, in the debates in this House, members have offered good advice on how we could design a more effective policy for Canada.

These problems will plague us for years to come unless this arrogant Liberal government begins to listen to the people. Unless something is done now, we will not have a realistic energy policy for self-sufficiency in the next decade or, indeed, the next century.

The government committed itself to keeping prices under control but it has not succeeded. Increase has followed increase. High interest rates are fuelling inflation and the costs being tacked on to petroleum products are aggravating the situation. I have great sympathy for people living in remote northern communities and for people engaged in agriculture who have to absorb these costs. They cannot pass them on to anyone. A member of the Conservative party who spoke previously said that the rate of bankruptcies amongst farmers is the highest it has been in the history of the country. That certainly indicates the problems that exist at the grassroots. The government should be paying attention to this and not just take whatever advice sounds palatable to it.

I realize it is confusing for the government when even the economists cannot agree. If we had ten economists in a room and asked for their professional advice, we would quite likely get seven, eight or even ten different opinions on how to solve the problems that face us. Fuel prices are not the only problem; there are many others, such as high interest rates. I do not hold the government totally at fault but I should like to see it take some new directions instead of just trying to run the old systems more efficiently. Perhaps some of the systems that are already in place could be changed, or some of the alternatives that have been recommended could be adopted.

Our committee worked long and hard through last summer and into this year on the new alternative energy report. I hope the government will seriously consider this attractive report and its recommendations for research and development so that alternatives to the hydrocarbons and nuclear power systems on which we are so dependent can be developed. I am sure we could have a wide range of alternatives. At this point we should be trying to establish the infrastructure so that we can make use of such things as hydrous ammonia in some farm machinery and in agriculture and so that we could build more solar efficient homes.

Until this comes about, we remain at the mercy of the large oil companies such as Imperial Oil, Shell, Gulf and Texaco. We have to pay homage to these companies and pamper them because we are at their mercy. We do not have anything else to fall back on. As I said, earlier, I had hoped that Petro-Canada would provide us with an alternative, but that is not happening.

I know that my time is running out, Mr. Speaker, and I will wrap up my remarks now. I had other things to say about the increasing price of petroleum products. Whether this is necessary is not the question—I think all Canadians accept that some increase in the price of oil is necessary, but we would like to know how high they will go.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is with interest that I rise to participate in the debate tonight on the opposition motion that deals with a condemnation of the government for "unnecessarily raising petroleum taxes and thereby burdening all consumers, but particularly consumers of heating oil, with prices far in excess of those promised without providing relief to those hardest hit and least able to cope."

This motion, put forward by the Conservative opposition, effectively says two things, Mr. Speaker. It is a condemnation not only of the government's policy with regard to energy, but a condemnation of the government for not protecting those who are supposedly, and in fact are, being hit by the rising price of oil and, by implication, high interest rates, and other things as well.

I should like to try to deal with those issues—the condemnation, the reasonableness of the condemnation of oil prices, the condemnation implied now, as it has been many times in the past in this House, of the other parts of the government's economic policy and the condemnation of the government for not assisting those who are being hard hit by rising prices across the board, and by high interest rates.

In the budget of October 28, the government promised essentially three things, Mr. Speaker. First, it promised to restrain spending and bring it within the trend line of the growth of the gross national product over a period of four years. Second, it promised to reorder government spending priorities toward a greater emphasis on economic development, industrial adjustment and manpower retraining. These programs have been introduced in order to try to help the people make the adjustments that all hon. members agree will be necessary in our daily working lives over the next several years. Finally, the government promised to follow a monetary policy consistent with the fight against inflation.

Let me deal first with the argument pertaining to oil prices. Today we heard members of the opposition claim that they would not have increased the price of oil nearly as fast as this government has done. This is a surprising statement because, basically, it just is not true.

In the past, as I probably will in the future, I have relied on the words of the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) when he was minister of finance. I think he understood the realities of economic policy that face any minister of finance, this country and the government. In his sombre moods, he is not swept away with the kind of rhetoric that some of the members of the opposition—and I hasten to point to the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald)—are swept away. The hon. member for St. John's West can be very rational. I have listened to what the hon. member has to say. I believe he follows me in this debate, at which time he will have something to say in response.

● (2050)

The hon. member for St. John's West appeared on the program "Question Period" yesterday. He was asked some penetrating questions and gave some honest and straightforward answers. I would like to relate some of the hon. member's responses that are very pertinent to today's debate. It says something about what the Conservative policy is, or what a responsible segment of that party believes the Conservative policy should be, and what their assessment of this government's policy is. In many cases, it is a very realistic and fair assessment.

The hon. member for St. John's West was asked what would happen to oil price increases and what the situation would have been under a Conservative government. He replied as follows:

Had we been there, we wouldn't be spending $5 billion on the oil imports subsidy. The price to the primary producer of a barrel of oil would have been higher and the oil imports subsidy considerably lower and the deficit considerably lower and then even with a mortgage interest and an energy tax credit we wouldn't have the deficit that we have today.

The implication, if I read that properly, is that if the oil import compensation payments are less, then oil prices have to be higher because the oil imports compensation payment is based on the differential between the domestic price and the foreign price. If the compensation payments are less, that means that either the world price is lower, which is not conceivable because it is outside of our control, or the domestic price would have to be higher, which is very conceivable. Not only that, but the price to the primary producer of a barrel of oil would have been much higher than under this government.

These are quotes from statements by the hon. member in "Question Period". He was asked how fast energy prices should rise in this country and whether it is necessary for energy prices to rise in this country. I think all members agree that it is necessary. The question was asked:

—how quickly do you think that we should move the price of domestic oil close to the world level? How fast should we move?

The hon. member replied:

Well, I think that we should—at least as fast as we were proposing a couple of years ago, certainly to 75 per cent over the next several years . . . I don't think we should delay too long. We're babying ourselves too long now—

The hon. member was then asked:

Do you think we should move as fast as, say, three years to get our own oil prices on to a realistic, lasting level or should we spread it out over five, six, seven years.

The hon. member replied:

I think that three or four years should be plenty.

Mr. Crosbie: Right on.

Mr. Evans: The hon. member agrees with the statement. Well, they are his statements. The point is that the hon. member is putting forward here what he considers to be a reasonable responsible policy, that is, to go to 75 per cent of the world price on oil over the next three or four years. That is a position in which he firmly believes. However, it runs right in the face of the kind of statements his colleagues have been making all day, saying that this government is following an irresponsible oil pricing policy by doing less than that.

The hon. member for St. John's West is not the most aggressive in the oil pricing debate. Yesterday the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre), I believe speaking in the west, indicated that he feels the price of Canadian domestic oil should be taken to $35 a barrel very quickly.

Mr. Taylor: You are paying Mexico more.

Mr. Evans: The hon. member says that we are paying more to Mexico. We heard today that Canadian consumers are being badly hurt by this government's energy pricing policy. If we were to raise our prices by 50 per cent to 75 per cent over what they are today, it would hurt them even more. You cannot have it both ways.

If hon. members opposite think consumers are being damaged by the way oil prices are rising under this government's policy, how can they believe the consumers would be better off if prices rose faster? That is inconsistent. We need some consistency of policy, consistency of opposition criticism of this government if the debate is going to mean anything. Members opposite ask us to listen to their criticism and respond to it. When the criticism is so contradictory, how in the world can the government respond in a way that will satisfy any reasonable faction of members opposite? It cannot.

We heard additional criticisms about the government's interest rate policy. This is an area where the hon. member for St. John's West can supply some great insights into the validity of this government's current economic policy in the area of monetary policy. I wish to quote another response given by the hon. member yesterday. With regard to questions about the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), the governor of the Bank of Canada and the interest rate policy, he said:

—I think the only way—to bring down these interest rates is you've got to convince the public that you intend to really battle inflation and that you're really going to, the government is going to restrain its own spending, that (it) is putting in a program that over the next number of years will mean government restrains itself.

That clearly means the government should not introduce additional major spending programs. That would not be restraint. When the Minister of Finance indicates that he does not intend to introduce major new spending programs for the next two to three years, members opposite condemn him for being unfeeling, for not responding to the needs of Canadians. Yet the hon. member for St. John's West indicates that is one of the prime policies this government should undertake to convince Canadians it is serious about getting inflation under control and that only by getting inflation under control will interest rates come down, which is what all members want. I agree with the hon. member for St. John's West absolutely and totally. The questioner went on:

Are you convinced that the policy of the Bank of Canada is correct? If you were in power, would you back Mr. Bouey and his policy?

The hon. member replied:

Yes, I would continue to back Mr. Bouey—

Later he was asked:

—what actions would you take to reinforce Mr. Bouey's monetary policy through an appropriate approach on the fiscal side?

The hon. member had some comments to make on that. I agree with a great many of the statements he makes. He said:

Well, I think that you'd have to be very convincing that you're tightening expenditure—

Not introducing major new programs.

—you know, that you're really getting it under control. Now on that side I don't think that you can control spending more—if you could have spending so there's no real increase, you know, because of inflation there's going to be an increase, you'd be doing mighty battle there and it would be tough to do—

The hon. member is saying they are not going to solve the problem of government expenditures by cutting spending because cutting spending is very difficult to do, regardless of the comments of the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) who would like to see spending cut dramatically and the size of government cut dramatically. The hon. member for St. John's West has taken a realistic point of view. He said that, given the nature of government spending—the nature of transfers to the provinces, transfers to people and the provision of services by the government—cutting spending is not the way to get the deficit down. Then he came out with the other statement that the way to do that would be to look for additional revenue. I agree with the hon. member for St. John's West completely, but you cannot keep spending under control or hold it in line and at the same time increase spending for other programs unless you increase taxes, and the hon. member for St. John's West has indicated we would have to increase revenues just to get the present deficit down without increasing spending and with no new programs whatsoever.

● (2100)

Finally, I think we have to come to grips with another issue on which we have been attacked, and that is that our policy is a made-in-United States interest rate policy, for example. I think on this point the hon. member for St. John's West is totally and completely in line with the government's policy. Let me quote him. He says:

But accepting things as they are, I agree that our interest rates have to keep track of those in the United States, unfortunately, until we can strengthen our own economy and strengthen the Canadian dollar.

I think that is where the hon. member will have some points to raise because he feels there are positive economic policies to strengthen our economy which should be undertaken. He thinks those policies will strengthen these things and give us some flexibility. But, given the situation we are in now, and that is what he was referring to, he says:

I think it would be too risky to allow American interest rates to go up and ours not to follow pretty closely behind because of what might happen to the Canadian dollar. Every time it goes down a cent our cost of living goes up three—point four-tenths of one per cent is a generally accepted figure—and if the slide started, who knows how far down that might go, and I think that that would be very risky for us. In that sense I defend the policy.

That policy is this government's policy, and the defence is coming from the finance critic of the opposition party. I think the hon. member was being honest in giving a fair assessment of government policy. I respect the hon. member's intelligence, I respect his analytical ability, and I respect the fact that he respects the government's policy.

With regard to policies to help those who are being hurt by current economic conditions, not only here but all over the world, we have heard condemnation that the government has no policy in place and does not care about the people, but that is not true.

An hon. Member: Who says so?

Mr. Evans: I know hon. members opposite laugh and hoot when we talk about the guaranteed income supplement, and they bring forward the energy tax credit as an alternative, but, at its best, the energy tax credit means $80 a year. The guaranteed income supplement increase for the people who are being hurt the most and are least able to help themselves, as was admitted by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, means something in the range of $480, and it is indexed so it will go up every year with the cost of living. It keeps its real protecting power.

In addition, hon. members seem to forget that this government and previous governments have brought in policies over time to ensure that Canadians who are least able to protect themselves from the ravages of inflation, are protected, and are protected in a very real way. There are indexed programs which have been brought in by governments, including our government, particularly previous Liberal governments. There is the guaranteed income supplement, old age security, veterans' allowances and pensions, family allowances, a child tax credit, Canada Pension Plan benefits, unemployment insurance benefits, federal contributions to the Canada Assistance Plan, as well as the personal income tax itself and the tax brackets within that system, all of which are indexed. It means that Canadians who receive these benefits, who happen to be the Canadians who are least able to help and protect themselves from the ravages of inflation, are protected, and they are protected as a matter of government policy. The Minister of Finance in his statement on Friday indicated there will be no pulling back from that protection which is provided to Canadians in those policies. He also said there will be no increase in government expenditure programs and no new expenditure programs. Like the hon. member for St. John's West, he believes the deficit should be brought down. He believes the only real way of protecting Canadians over the long run is to get inflation under control. This will bring interest rates down, it will put productivity back on track, it will increase savings and investment, and that is the way to get a country on track.

It seems to me that if hon. members opposite would concentrate on positive approaches to achieve those kinds of goals, helping the government by putting forward positive alternatives, rather than by putting forward a motion such as this, which really says nothing and is in fact contradictory within the policy of the party opposite, this House would be far better off and these debates would be more meaningful, not only to ourselves but to those Canadians who watch to see how their government is working. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, the difficulty with the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) is that he believes in nothing but whatever kind of subterfuge will get him and his party in power and keep them there. That is what this resolution today is about. It is about a betrayal of the Canadian people, the Canadian public. We condemn the government for unnecessarily burdening the consumer with high energy costs. Why does it do that? It does so because the high energy costs are not to help Canada's situation or help us to develop our oil and gas reserves or anything else. The high energy costs are government taxation. Of the 12 increases in the price of oil and gas since March, 1980, nine have been increases in federal taxation only. We are condemning the government, not because it is increasing the price of oil in Canada so the producers, the provinces and those who own the resources can get the cash flow to go to the frontiers, the offshore, the heavy oils and the tar sands and develop them, since it is not doing that, but because of the 12 increases, despite what it promised in the election campaign, nine have been to fill federal tax coffers. That is what we condemn the government for.

What else do we condemn it for? We condemn the government because it has forgotten the consumer, particularly with respect to home heating oil prices without any relief for those least able to pay. Every one of those 12 increases is an increase in the price of heating oil which is particularly hard on the people of eastern Canada who buy heating oil to heat their homes using an oil furnace or an oil stove. Twelve times they have been crucified by the Minister of Finance who is from Cape Breton and promised them in the election campaign "vote Liberal and the price will stay down". That is what we condemn, the brazen cynicism that makes a solemn pledge to the people of the country and the minister's own region, "vote Liberal and the price will stay down" and then raise the price 12 times, every time raising the price of heating oil which hurts the lower income people of this country most.

We compare this with our own budget on which we were defeated. It proposed an 18-cent excise tax which did not apply at all to heating oil. It applied to transportation fuels and to transportation fuels only. We look at our own budget on which the government and the NDP together defeated us, and we see there an energy tax credit to help the Canadian consumer meet these increasing energy costs. Our increases in energy costs were not just all in the form of taxation to the federal government. They also included increases to the producers. We proposed these increases in stages over the next three or four years.

We also proposed an energy tax credit that this year would give the lower income people of Canada $500 million, and $1 billion next year. This would go to every family which earned up to $21,380 a year. They would get the full energy tax credit. A family of four this year would get $110 to help meet these costs, and $220 next year, and so on ad infinitum.

In addition, we had a mortgage interest and property tax program that would have paid Canadian home owners this year $1,245 billion and next year $2,015 billion. This is what we mean by being concerned about the Canadian consumer, and that is what we would have done for them, but the hypocrites opposite and the hypocrites to our left in this House voted against that. They said that we were crucifying the Canadian people. They could not vote to support such a harsh regime as we had proposed in the budget, and then they get into office here based on those false promises, and they crucify Canadians with 12 increases, and they do not give one cent in mortgage interest or property tax support to the home owners of Canada despite the fantastic interest rates, 5 per cent higher than they were when we were in office, and they do not give one cent in assistance through an energy tax credit to lower income Canadians. That is what we condemn them for, the great betrayal.

● (2110)

The man who on January 23, 1980, said, "Vote Liberal, and the price will stay down" is back in office now. He is back in his safe cocoon. He is now the Big Minister of Finance. He is a big man, he is going to fight inflation, he will be tough, he is going to be strong and he is going to be holding out against giving anybody any assistance. He is not going to help the poor, the lower income, anyone. No, he is big, tough Allan MacEachen now for the next three years until the election gets close. he is the big, tough Cape Bretoner battling inflation. Well, what did he say now that he is safe—he has another four years in office—on page 4 of his speech of May 6, 1981?

I have earlier identified energy as a source of two thirds of the rise in consumer inflation that we have experienced in the last five months, and I have argued that higher energy prices cannot be avoided.

Did that advertisement say higher energy prices cannot be avoided? No, this lying advertisement said, "Vote Liberal, and the price will stay down". But now we hear the truth from the gentleman when he is back in office. He says in the earlier part of his speech that the cost of living has gone up 13.9 per cent in the last five months. He then says that two thirds of that is due to higher energy prices. He neglects to say that those higher energy prices are all caused by increased federal taxation—by him, in other words. He caused that increase. And what do we see when we look at what the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said before the last election? The Prime Minister said this:

Our made-in-Canada oil price will result in a lower price to consumers than the one proposed for the next four years in the Clark budget.

That is falsehood number two. Then he said at Memorial University on January 31, 1980:

Our price will not be $6 a barrel; it will be under $4 per barrel.

A $4 per barrel price of oil at the wellhead is a 12 cents to 16 cents increase at the gasoline pump each year. Well, we know what has happened, but before I get to that, the present Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) also said, and I quote now from The Globe and Mail of March 22:

—he expects to hold down gasoline-price increases at the pumps to about 16 cents a gallon annually for the next four years.

That was March 22, 1980. "We would not have increases in excess of 16 cents a gallon annually for the next four years": That is what the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said. That is what this gentleman here said. The advertisement said: "Do you believe this man?" There is not a person in the country, except perhaps for the Liberal caucus, who believes this man. No, we do not believe that man. We do not believe a word that man says.

Mr. McKenzie: I will hold it up so everyone across the country can see it. Lalonde the liar.

Mr. Crosbie: What increases have we actually had? I will give my own city of St. John's, Newfoundland. I am comparing now March, 1980, to June 4, 1981. If we take heating oil, we have heating oil, February, 1980, in St. John's, Newfoundland at 79 cents a gallon. We have heating oil today, June 4, at $1.22 a gallon, 44 cents more, an increase of 55.7 per cent to the poor people of St. John's, Newfoundland, who use oil to fuel their heating requirements, a 55 per cent increase. This is the gentleman who said: "Vote Liberal, and we will hold the price down; they will not go up". Then we have the gasoline prices in St. John's Newfoundland: regular, $1.28 a gallon but on June 4, $1.89 a gallon, up 61 cents a gallon in the last year and a half, an increase of 47 per cent.

Then we have premium unleaded, January, 1980, $1.39 a gallon. Today, $2.03 a gallon, up 63 cents a gallon, a 45 per cent increase. And on and on it goes. These are the facts. This is betrayal. These facts cannot be gainsaid.

Mr. Taylor: He should be kicked out of the country.

Mr. Crosbie: By the way, we have the minister admitting this. He did not admit it today when he was giving his speech, but to The Globe and Mail on June 4 he admitted this. He said:

However, outside the Commons, he conceded—

This was the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

—that the current oil prices Canadians are paying are "about even" with those projected in that Conservative budget.

I do not care if they are even or more for the purposes of my argument. The minister admits they are even. In fact, they are more. The tragedy is that these prices are all in federal tax increases. We have no energy agreement with Alberta that we would have had a year and a half ago had we been left in office. We have no agreement with them because they are being screwed to the wall and all the producers are because the increases are going to the federal treasury, nothing to the oil producers, nothing to the people who explore and who develop and who refine. All to the federal government.

I have impartial evidence here, the Winnipeg Free Press from an editorial of April 25, which reads:

Unlike the Conservative tax, they fall equally on users of gasoline and of home-heating fuel and they do nothing, as the Conservative proposals would have, to help people on lower incomes cope with higher fuel costs.

The same with an article in The Vancouver Sun.

So even, if Trudeau's promise was merely to keep gasoline price hikes below the Tories' 18-cent mark each year, he has already broken his word in 1981.

And so on.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): So what is new?

Mr. Crosbie: "So what is new", as my hon. friend here says. The tragedy of this is that we have a complete betrayal of the Canadian people, and we are further away from an energy price agreement than we ever were. Who would negotiate with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, whom we saw a few days ago raise gasoline prices nine cents a gallon unnecessarily and blame it on Alberta's cutback in production, when actually consumption has dropped in Canada and he does not need to do that whatsoever? I would just as soon negotiate with a greased cobra as negotiate with the Minister of Energy,

Mines and Resources, and if the Government of Canada wants an agreement with the producing provinces, it has to do away with the greased cobra who gets up in this House and gets on with that kind of nonsense and exacerbates the airways and arouses anger wherever he looks or turns.

With respect to our excise tax, by the way, there was a discount of ten cents a gallon for farmers, a discount of ten cents a gallon for fishermen and for urban transit workers. There is nothing like that for farmers or fishermen or urban transit workers in these 12 increases of the last year. There certainly is not. There is no help for the consumers whatsoever except for the senior citizens, who should have had the help anyway and should not have all those federal tax increases on them. Eighty per cent of the total amount of these increases of the last year and three months goes to federal taxation and does not go to solve our oil situation here in Canada at all.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): They do not produce another drop of oil.

Mr. Crosbie: Heavy oil development has stopped. Tar sands development has stopped. We have high interest rates and poor economic prospects, all because of this fantastic energy betrayal of the Canadian people and of the Canadian industry by gentlemen opposite. In my hand I have the supplementary estimates, and they show that this government is going to tax Canadian consumers this year $4,808,000,000 in the petroleum compensation charge alone; hon. gentlemen opposite are removing $4,808,000,000 from the pockets of the Canadian consumer to pay out to the Saudi Arabians, to pay out to the Venezuelans, to pay out to the Mexicans, to pay out to foreigners all around the world; to enrich foreigners.

They will do nothing to help develop our own oil and gas resources here in Canada except fight to the death to give them $17.75 a barrel while they pay the rest of these people $43 a barrel. The oil import subsidy will cost over $5 billion this year. The hon. gentleman talks about deficit spending; that is where the money is that could help the lower income Canadians. That could finance the mortgage interest and property tax credit. That would finance the energy tax credit, and that would still reduce the deficit very considerably if they had a sensible oil pricing policy, a price for the oil, not a price for federal taxation coffers, not a price for the Lalonde-MacEachen series of fantastic tax increases. That is where there would be more than sufficient room to pay for those and reduce the deficit as well.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Minister of Finance are crucifying Canadians on the cross of Saudi oil. They are soaking Canadians to enrich foreign oil producers. That is all they are doing. They are sinking this country because of the stupid series of callous promises they made during the election, and they are now trying to fool the Canadian people into thinking they are keeping them.

The Canadian people know they have betrayed them utterly, and what they want them to do is to adopt a sensible oil policy, reach an agreement with Alberta and the producing provinces, get this behind, get Canada on the right track to energy self-sufficiency, stop going on with this criminal subterfuge they entered into in the fall of 1979 and in the election campaign of 1980. The Canadian people know hon. gentlemen opposite betrayed them. The Canadian people want them to stop that betrayal and come on with a sensible policy. That is what we ask them to do.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Minister of Finance are the George III of Canada. They are the greatest taxation raisers in our country's history. They are doing nothing to help resolve this energy crisis. According to Mr. Slater of the Economic Council of Canada:

> The first step to a stronger Canadian economy has to be a speedy resolution of the energy pricing and revenue-sharing dispute between Ottawa and the oil-producing provinces—

He gave his evidence before the Senate and said the same. That is from February 17, 1981.

• (2120)

Mr. Bouey goes before the Senate and what does he say? Mr. Bouey's high interest rates are the government's high interest rates. You have left him dangling there without any assistance to fight the battle of inflation. He says:

> —a settlement of energy disputes probably ought to be given the highest priority in economic policy these days . . . the settlement might very well help us on the exchange rate and might improve the investment climate.

There is a plea from governor Bouey on May 26 before the Senate. The deputy minister of finance says much the same kind of thing.

An hon. Member: Years ago.

Mr. Crosbie: They have been saying it, yes, year after year. But this government goes on and has its Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources carry on last week with a scurvy attempt to score a point on Alberta, which is really only a revenue grab of 9 cents a gallon that the Canadian consumers are paying to put more revenue into the Minister of Finance's coffers. It is not going to help resolve this dispute because anybody who saw that devious, scheming minister speaking in and outside of this House, it would raise their hackles. They will say, "by God, that fellow is never going to put it over on us". That is what they will say in Alberta and the other producing provinces. We will never have an agreement while that coiled cobra is in charge of negotiations.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: I heard a member of the New Democratic Party say here tonight that he did not realize what the Liberals were like. The innocents abroad are now back in Canada. The NDP do not know what the Liberals are like. Then why are they jumping into bed with the Liberals on the Constitution? Now that they have learned what the Liberals are really like, why are they cosying up to them and assisting them in their policy to nationalize the oil and gas industry in Canada? Why are they helping the Liberals centralize power in Ottawa through their constitutional proposals? If the NDP have finally learned how devious, deficient, denatured and denaturalized the Liberal party is, then I suggest that they stop their constant support for them, support which has been constant for the last ten years at least in this House, and get on to supporting some more reasonable approaches to these matters.

That is what this resolution is about, Mr. Speaker. It is about betrayal, because all of these 12 increases are hitting the Canadian consumer who has been left to sink or float without any help from this government, all of those increases are not helping to resolve the energy situation at all; they are only helping the government's own finances. Here is the member for Burin-St. George's (Mr. Simmons) in this House on December 13, 1979—talk about hypocrisy! He said:

> How do you conserve fuel in a fishing boat? Do you go half way to the fishing grounds? It is very good to have a car pool in Montreal, Toronto or Vancouver, but can you imagine a boat pool?

He was protesting the 18-cent excise tax and his heart was bleeding, he pretended, for fishermen when they were getting a 10-cent discount over everyone else, together with the farmers. But since then that same member has put a 64-cent a gallon burden on the fishermen of Newfoundland and he is not worrying any longer about conserving fuel in a fishing boat or whether they can go only half way and cannot go any farther. If they could only go half way on 18 cents a gallon excise tax, how far are they going to go on a 64 cents increase that the hon. member for Burin-St. George's and his government have imposed on them in the last year and a half?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): They gaffed them.

Mr. Crosbie: Not very far. That is the kind of sanctimonious hyprocrisy we heard in this House on December 13, 1979, when a real attempt to deal with the problems of this country was sabotaged, stuck in the back by the very gentleman opposite who was quoting me with approval tonight from my interview on "Question Period" yesterday. Well, whether in the opposition or the government, I am going to say what I think is right and best for the government and people of Canada. Anyone who reads that interview will see a lot of good sense in it, not the selected malarkey brought up here tonight. And he is never going to find me carrying on with that kind of sanctimonious hyprocrisy, to put the best face on it, and then come right back into this House as the government and wheel around 180 degrees and impose increases on gasoline and heating oil prices not even dreamed of in December, 1979, without one cent of assistance to the ordinary people of this country, the farmers, fishermen, the small storekeeper or the ordinary man and woman in Newfoundland who believed him, who sent back five Liberal members here. They will not be sending five Liberal members next time. Not a one will be coming back from Newfoundland—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): They will not forget this one.

Mr. Crosbie: —after the betrayal they have suffered.

So, Mr. Speaker, what is to be done? This government has far worse in store for the Canadian people because at some time the government will have to start raising the price of oil at the wellhead to get an energy pricing agreement, to satisfy the industry, to give them a cash flow in order to feed the frontier exploration and the offshore. And is the government going to do that on top of all the tax increases that we have had? Nine of the 12 increases in the last year? What are they going to do then? The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources says he will reduce these taxes by 7.5 cents a gallon if Alberta resumes its production. Will he reduce his own tax? It is costing motorists in my district of St. John's West today eighty per cent of this 64 cents a gallon more than a year ago. Will he reduce that 80 per cent tax and give them a break? Will he drop the tax of about 50 cents if Alberta resumes production? He did not answer that the other day.

When is this government going to start being honest? When is this government going to get an energy agreement? When is it going to get interest rates down by doing something that will support and strengthen the Canadian dollar which is weak because of the policies of this government for the last ten years, because of the National Energy Program? It is weak because you are anti-foreign investment, it is weak because of your anti-private sector tactics. That is why the Canadian dollar is weak and interest rates are now 20 per cent. Twenty per cent, and you were so shocked and dumbfounded and amazed and horrified when they were 14 per cent in the fall of 1979.

When are you going to get the show on the road so that we can help Canada? If you do the right things, we will say you are doing the right things, although we are going to blame you still for the way that you lied to the Canadian public. We are never going to forgive you for that. But if you start doing the right things now, we will support you. We are not going to praise you for the way you got back into power. You snuck back into power on your bellies, you slithered back into power with deception; now stand on your feet and govern like men and women. If you adopt policies that help this country and solve that problem, then we will support you on that.

However, there is no sign of you doing it so far, not one sign that you are repenting or that you are prepared to do the proper thing even though you have another four safe years in power. What is the matter with you? For Heaven's sake, start acting like a government and start doing something that will help Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure to speak after the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) because he always puts on a great show with a lot of bombast and bluster and what we back on the farm call just plain bull. I hope to spend a little bit of time talking about that because he spent a lot of time talking about the great deal they had with Alberta when they were in government, and it is interesting that he talks a lot about that but nobody ever actually comes up with the piece of paper showing the deal that they actually made.

Supposedly the Conservative government from Ottawa and the Conservative government in Alberta can get together and sign a deal very easily. And of course, if we look at the circumstances at that time, the price of oil in Canada was something like $15 or $16 a barrel, and world prices were around $26 or $27 a barrel. We did not have the great disparity there is today, and naturally Alberta and the other producing provinces look at the world price and the Canadian price, and the difference between them. However, in spite of that, in spite of the political advantage they had of both governments being Conservative, they were not able to make that kind of deal. I think that if we look at where that money was going, that special excise tax which we talk about as 18 cents a gallon, which really turns out to be about $6.35 a barrel, we find that after the first year, the vast majority of that was going to pay for the mortgage interest and property tax deductibility, an important issue in the Conservative platform in 1979. Then we have to think: well, if those revenues were essentially to cover that mortgage interest and property tax deductibility, where was the money to come from for the compensation account, and so on? If we look through the figures, we see that there would have to be dramatic increases in the compensation program, the excise tax, or whatever mechanism the government employed to raise additional revenues. The 18-cent excise tax was pretty well fully committed after the first year to the mortgage interest deductibility plank which they promised. If we look at the projections in the Conservative budget, they used a figure of $32 per barrel for the world oil price by January, 1981. In actual fact, the world price was $43 per barrel. The amount of excise tax they would have to impose would have been something like $2.15 per barrel. This would have been an additional cost imposed upon consumers.

• (2130)

The hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) talked about a 10-cent per gallon reduction for farmers, fishermen and municipalities for their equipment or urban transit. He did not point out that a 15-cent per gallon excise tax would have been imposed on farmers and fishermen. For the first time in our history, a 15-cent excise tax would have been imposed on the production of food.

I think all these matters should be pointed out. An important factor which developed this year, in the absence of a signed agreement between the federal government and the government of Alberta, is that the federal government had to impose a $1.85 per barrel special levy to cover the cutback of 120,000 barrels per day.

Everyone talks glibly about a pricing agreement with Alberta. I have already pointed out that in the fall of 1979, the Premier of Alberta talked about cutbacks. He was not talking to a Liberal government in Ottawa; he was talking to a newly-elected Conservative government. So far it has taken six or eight months, and unfortunately we have not reached an agreement yet. I wish we had reached an agreement.

One of the objectives of the National Energy Program is to increase the revenues of the federal government from 10 per cent of the revenues of oil production to 24 per cent. If the federal government achieves this—and I hope it will—the revenues to producing provinces will drop from 45 per cent to 43 per cent. At the same time, the percentage of the oil companies will drop from 45 per cent to 33 per cent.

Can one imagine a more difficult scenario to achieve? Surely the oil companies, such as Exxon and the Seven Sisters, will fight day in and day out with their massive public relations departments, press releases and everything possible. Likewise, the producing provinces will fight; they want every nickel they can get.

I do not think there are many people in the House, certainly not on this side, who would deny the federal government a reasonable share of the revenues from oil production. Surely 24 per cent is reasonable. If the government achieves this, certainly the producing provinces will fight by cutting off oil. The Seven Sisters and the other multinational companies will pull out every stop with the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and every other group in the country with which they have influence in an attempt to beat the federal government's share back down to 10 per cent. It is not surprising if there is a strike of capital or Alberta cuts off its oil. When one is fighting over revenue with the strongest and fastest growing industry in the country, one will be faced with such confrontation. Oil rigs will pull out and go to the United States; producing provinces will cut off supplies. Historically, producing provinces never give up anything to the federal government. It has been a case of the federal government always giving larger and larger transfer payments and tax points in any negotiation. It is a difficult time, but it is important for the federal government to move to see its reasonable share of revenues from this vital industry coming to the federal government.

Another point the hon. member for St. John's West did not mention in talking about the rapid price increases over the past few months, aside from the cutbacks by Alberta, the increases in the world price of oil and the exchange on the value of money, was that in the December 11, 1979, budget he put in place a price regime of $4 per barrel increase in 1980 and then $4.50 in 1981, 1982 and 1983. He did not point out that on January 1, 1983, the price in Canada would move to 75 per cent of the world price. This would have given a tremendous jolt to the price of energy in 1983. Likewise, on January 1, 1984, the domestic price in Canada would have jumped to 85 per cent of the world price.

We rejected that philosophy and said that we should put in place a blended price regime, combining a fair domestic price from the traditional conventional western basin production, a reference price for the tar sands and heavy oil of $38 per barrel indexed to the CPI or the world price, whichever is less, with another price for enhanced recovery and higher prices for oil coming from the frontier, the east coast and offshore. We did not propose that it be tied to world price, because few countries in the world have 85 per cent of their production tied directly to world price.

In the Conservative pricing regime, essentially there was a pricing of oil and an excise tax. In the National Energy Program there is clearly a blended pricing regime for oil but, just as important in my view, after the dust settles from the present issue which captures all the headlines, there will be the other aspects of the National Energy Program. The Oil and Gas Act is before the Standing Committee on Natural Resources and Public Works. It will put in place a regime for the high Arctic, the Beaufort, the Mackenzie River Delta and the east coast offshore. Ultimately the regime will give Canadians a better share of their own country. Likewise, there is a regime which would see pipelines in this country extended to Quebec, the maritimes, the west coast and to the underserved areas of eastern Canada and the central part of our country. I place a very high priority on that program, especially in my own constituency. The Canadian oil substitution program, which was announced by the minister a couple of weeks ago, will be providing incentives of up to $800 per home to convert from oil to natural gas. This is an essential program. We must put in place the natural gas pipelines to the underserviced areas of our country. When we look at the program of the substitution of oil with natural gas, electricity, renewable energies and solar power, coupled with the improved insulation program, we see a program which can probably save us something in the order of 300,000 barrels of oil a day, when the program is fully implemented over the next few years. We are ensuring that natural gas distribution companies are able to improve their supply. People are being encouraged to insulate their homes and to convert from oil, thus reducing demand for that fuel. Upgrading facilities will be put in place in Sarnia, Montreal, Quebec City and other refining areas in our country to ensure that the residual oils—much of which is exported to the United States at present and used less efficiently than it could be—are upgraded to gasoline and other heating fuels, thereby saving on imports. Clearly, the potential of the western base is dropping, which is why we are putting in place a regime for the high Arctic and the Canada lands in order that we may increase production in those areas.

We see that there will be special incentives under the petroleum incentives program. For 28 cents of expenditure, any oil company will be able to make a dollar investment in those areas. For a 7-cent net expenditure, Canadian companies will be able to spend a dollar on exploration. Over the next four years it is foreseen that some $2.5 billion of incentives will be provided in this area, along with a higher pricing regime. We envision a program designed to not only reduce demand, which the Clark budget did not do, but as well one which will increase production from the Canada lands at the same time. We have a program which is a comprehensive one, one which has saved Canadians a considerable amount of money. From December, 1979, to the present time I am told the savings amount to some $2.2 billion. This works out to some $93 per capita, or $370 per family.

The National Energy Program does foresee that although there will be increases at a more moderate rate during the first half of the decade, in the last half of the decade the increase would be more rapid. At the same time, our price of oil would be a blended price, made in Canada, and not automatically tied to the world price. We see a program which would provide increased revenues to the federal government, to the producing provinces and to the oil and gas exploration companies, while at the same time reducing our demand because of the reduction in production in the traditional areas of western Canada.

These are just a few of the points I wanted to mention, Mr. Speaker. One point that has not been made is that this program of the federal government is designed to allow a greater percentage of our Canadian petroleum industry to be owned by Canadians. All we have to do is look at the period from 1975 to 1979. We see that the capital outflow from this country, from the oil and gas industry, was some $2.1 billion. That figure does not take into account dividends and interest. But the National Energy Program is designed to see a greater percentage—up to 50 per cent—of Canadian-owned industry by the end of this decade and, thus, the loss of these revenues and dividends from Canada from this vital industry would be reduced thereby giving us an industry with greater Canadian ownership.

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate tonight in the debate on the motion which asks this House to condemn the government for again unnecessarily burdening the consumer with high energy costs, particularly consumers of heating oil, without relief for those least able to adjust their incomes. The import of the motion is the high energy costs for the consumer, largely because of federally-imposed taxes. But the truth is that the motion deals more with deceit and deception—indeed, immorality—than with consumer prices per se. I say "immorality" with some caution, Mr. Speaker, but, nevertheless, with certainty. I apply the word to the party on the other side which defeated a government, the Clark government, in December of 1979 mostly because of its efforts to introduce an 18-cent per gallon increase in the price of gasoline. The party which defeated the Clark government then campaigned on a promise to keep energy prices down. Now, a little more than a year later, having won the election, it has increased both gasoline and home heating fuel prices—not just gasoline prices but also home heating fuel prices—well beyond the prices which that party attacked while in opposition. The same people have imposed energy price increases several times higher than those they promised in the election.

I look across the floor, Mr. Speaker, and I ask myself how many members over there owe their seats to this deceit. I venture to say quite a few, many of whom are the very ones who, like trained seals, applaud every inane justification for yet more energy taxes announced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde).

● (2150)

Let us make no mistake about what was promised by the Liberal party in the election of February, 1980. The present Minister of Finance, who was then one of the principal financial critics of the Clark government, said: "If you vote Liberal, the price will stay down." The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), then the leader of the opposition, speaking before Italian community leaders in Toronto, said this: "Clark has been asking of us Liberals that we make a clear statement on gasoline pricing. I believe many Canadians have been asking that. Well, let me make it. Ours will be less than 14 cents a gallon."

In my own province, in Summerside, the present Prime Minister stated, on February 9, 1980, fewer than ten days before the date of the election: "I can tell you that Liberals will do things differently from the PCs. That 18-cent tax on gasoline which is needed to pay for that Tory election promise, we won't have that tax, It's out. It's gone."

Later a full page Liberal ad appeared. It appeared in the Charlottetown Guardian on Saturday, February 16, 1980, two days before the election, but it also appeared in every other newspaper right across the country. The Liberal ad said: "This is the time for Liberal programs, not more Clark Conservative promises." In particular, it said: "Liberals flatly reject the 18-cent a gallon increase in the excise tax on gasoline and diesel fuels. Under the Tory budget, consumers would have faced a 32-cent a gallon increase in the cost of a gallon of gasoline in 1980. Under a Liberal administration, the increase will be less than 14 cents. The Liberal price will be less than half of what the Conservatives plan to impose on Canadians."

The interesting thing here is not just that the Liberals proposed never to introduce an 18-cent a gallon gasoline excise tax, nor, that if they did do so, it would be less than 18 cents; but they also said that, whereas the total of all the energy price increases that the Crosbie budget proposed would be 32 cents, if the Liberals won the election, the total of all energy price increases would be less than 14 cents. We know what the truth is.

We know what has happened since the Liberals took office, and certainly since they defeated the Crosbie budget and the Clark government on December 13, 1979. In my riding in Charlottetown, in December 1979, the price of a gallon of regular unleaded gasoline was $1.26. This is just an example, but the same situation applies right across this great land. In June of 1981, the price for a gallon of regular unleaded gasoline is now $1.95—an increase of 69 cents.

In December of 1979, when the Liberals defeated the Crosbie budget and the Clark government, the price of a gallon of home heating oil was 74.2 cents in the city of Charlottetown. Today, in June, 1981, the price for the same product in Charlottetown is $1.25, an increase of 50.8 cents.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Some promise!

Mr. McMillan: That is some promise! Indeed, it is some promise! There has been an increase of 69 cents in the price of gasoline, and 50.8 cents in the price of home heating oil. Where will it all stop? There is another increase scheduled for this coming July, next month, and there will probably be yet another increase in September. In each case the increase will be at least $1 per barrel for oil at the wellhead, which together translates into approximately six cents a gallon more at the pump for gasoline. The important thing is that such increases have not just been on gasoline, though that is odious enough, but also on home heating oil. Those increases therefore affect the senior citizen trying to cope with the ever-escalating cost of heating a home, the fisherman trying to make a living in an industry already suffering difficulties—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): The farm.

Mr. McMillan: Yes, it affects the farmer. It affects every single Canadian. The Crosbie increases, to the extent that they would have affected anyone, would have touched the person who has discretion in the use of his motor vehicle; and many Canadians would have qualified for an energy tax credit and other benefits to cushion the effects of those increases.

My speech has to be truncated tonight because of the hour; but I want to stress, as a maritimer, how appalled I am that this government, which depends on seats from central Canada, Quebec and Ontario, to keep itself in office, is trying to force upon the western provinces—at a time when they finally have a chance to pick their economies up by the bootstraps—an energy price scheme which will drive their economies into the ground. It will deny them the one opportunity they have to become to some extent economically self-sufficient, on an equal footing with other provinces.

I cannot understand for the life of me, why it is that the government insists on stubbornly sticking to those measures in the National Energy Program which will drive the oil and gas industries into the ground, which will discriminate wildly against the oil-producing provinces, which will do nothing to bring Canada closer to the goal of energy self-sufficiency. Yet it abandons the very few elements in the same National Energy Program which have anything positive to offer to the Canadian people. I am referring in particular to those provisions in the National Energy Program which were to benefit my own province of Prince Edward Island. On page 85 in the NEP, there is a most welcome proposal that reads: "In addition to expanded national renewables programs, extensions of the P.E.I. Conservation a Renewable Energy Agreement will be undertaken at a four-year cost of over $9 million." But that one proposal, among very few others which would have benefited some parts of this country, is now going to be abandoned.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has announced to his counterpart in Prince Edward Island, the hon. Barry Clark, the minister of energy in P.E.I. that this renewable energy agreement promised on page 85 in the National Energy Program is to be abandoned. That agreement has been serving Prince Edward Island very well indeed; the province of Prince Edward Island has been relying heavily on it and was looking forward to its renewal. But the agreement is going to be scrapped, despite a firm commitment to the contrary. In its place will be put absolutely nothing to help Prince Edward Island, nor any other province in the Atlantic region, to develop a degree of self-reliance in energy.

In my concluding remarks, I want to stress that there is a firm difference between the Liberal party and the Progressive Conservative party in their respective approaches to energy. When the Clark government was in power, it came clean with the Canadian people about the energy goals that it had and the price tag required to achieve those goals. In contrast, the Liberal party promised the public low energy prices and delivered exactly the opposite. It has made deceit and deception the pathway to political power in Canada. However successful such a strategy may be, Canadians will pay the price for that deceit and for that deception for a very long time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please, it being ten o'clock, it is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to Section 11 of Standing Order 58(11) proceedings on the motion have expired.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—SUPPORT FOR PARTICIPATION IN MILITIA TRAINING

Mr. Stanley Hudecki (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, on May 20 this year I directed a question to the Minister of National Defence asking if he was considering any new legislation or amendments to existing legislation that would guarantee members of the reserve force time off from their full-time employment in order that they may participate in training and educational activities provided by the Canadian Armed Forces.

The reserves are an integral and an imperative part of the Canadian Armed Forces. According to a recent publication by the Department of National Defence, the role of the reserve force is said to be twofold: first, to enhance the war deterrence capability of the Canadian Armed Forces; and second, to support the regular force in ongoing peacetime tasks and activities. Simply put, in the words of the retired Chief of the Reserve Forces, Major General Richard H. Rohmer, the role of the reserve force is to augment the regular force in times of peace, emergency or war.

Hence, the reserve force has great importance to Canada. This fact is brought to light quickly when one considers that out of the total number of personnel in the Armed Forces, which now numbers just over 100,000, the reservists comprise just over 22,000.

But the importance of the reserve force is more than just a national issue if one views this matter in a wider context. For instance, in assessing the true military strength of the NATO nations, heavy emphasis is placed upon the number of trained, properly equipped reserve personnel immediately available.

Furthermore, the importance of the reserves within the Armed Forces itself is also clear. Brigadier General Cowan, when testifying before the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, revealed the extent of their role within the Armed Forces. He stated that it is the policy of the Department of National Defence that the regular forces and the reserve forces be partners in the Canadian Armed Forces total force concept, although one component is full time and the other is part time.

With these considerations in mind, it is submitted that this government should put forth a coherent policy to ensure and encourage the continuance of a stable and strong reserve force. There are a number of ways this could be achieved. For example, by providing and committing sufficient resources and funds so that the reserves may train with the same quality of equipment as the regular force; by aiding in programs to improve their public image; and by providing salaries that are fair and equitable. All these ways would contribute to ensure the continuance and longevity of the reserves.

Another means by which this government may aid the reservists which is worthy of discussion is by negotiating a better deal with private employers to allow the reservists to take time off work in order that they may participate in training and educational activities provided by the Armed Forces.

The ability for a reservist to be relieved from his full-time employment in order to be properly trained must be assured. To guarantee a strong reserve force, there must not only be facilities available to train upon, but members of the force must be given an opportunity to train without prejudice to their full-time employment. Reservists must be given this opportunity without fear of reprisal from their employers, without sacrificing their regular vacation time and without sacrificing seniority.

It is my understanding that many employers already voluntarily reply to requests for leave for reservist training, and of course, this practice should be encouraged and the employers congratulated. However, there still seem to be some employers who do not wish to follow this practice. In my constituency of Hamilton West, where there exists a notable reserves force, a common complaint which has been voiced in the past by a number of reservists, is their inability to be relieved from work in order to participate in Armed Forces training.

It is my understanding that the time required to be off work is not long, about 14 days. At present, there is no statutory or regulatory provision commanding employers to grant leaves of absence to reservists.

It is submitted that it is about time that this was investigated formally and in some depth, considering the great importance of the reserves force and the insignificant financial cost this proposal would have on society.

Therefore, in conclusion, I would like to ask the minister if he would consider taking this problem under serious advisement with a view to establishing mechanisms to guarantee that reservists have the opportunity to train properly and without prejudice to their full-time occupations.

● (2205)

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, for some years the Department of National Defence has recognized the need to assist some of our reservists in securing time off from their regular employment to participate in reserve training activities.

In attempting to assist reservists in this way, the department has encouraged employers and employees through a voluntary approach short of the legislative process. In many cases this approach has proven itself quite productive.

In 1978, the then minister of national defence, Mr. Danson, set up a committee known as the national employers support committee, NESC, for the express purpose of assisting reservist employees in obtaining time off to meet their military training commitment without loss of job progression or vacation time. This would take the form of up to a maximum of 14 calendar days off during the summer.

This national employers support committee consists of a national chairperson and an executive officer plus a chairperson and as many members in provincial committees as deemed necessary to provide effective liaison between reserve units and employers. The chairpersons are all very prominent members of the community who have volunteered to serve on the national employers support committee. These people give willingly of their time to intercede with employers, if necessary, to allow reservists to meet their training commitments. Their dedication and effort is well appreciated by our forces. Indeed, the program is working well and many companies have included references to reserve training as part of their manuals on conditions of employment.

Naturally some employers—particularly those with small staffs—have difficulty in allowing time off for reserve training. This can be particularly difficult when seniority comes into play or when certain production requirements, such as assembly line production, creates undue hardship for the employer. There are not a large number of firms in this position and the department endeavours to provide alternate schedules of training for their reservist employees.

In conclusion, the national employers support committee has done commendable work in assisting reservists with their problems regarding time off the job and the members of this committee deserve a great deal of thanks for giving time from their busy schedules and for their devotion in support of the reserves.

It is more than passing interest, of course, that this House has approved an order of reference for one of its standing committees to study the reserves. This report is due December 15 and will, no doubt, include significant recommendations on conditions of service for the reserves.

I would like to thank the hon. member for his interest in the reserves and I would like to prevail upon him and other members of this House to provide support and encouragement to reserve units in their ridings and to employers of reservists.

I would also like to add that I would be glad to provide the hon. member with a list of the members of the national employers support committee, any one of whom, I am sure, would be happy to discuss the current situation in any area of the country.

METRIC CONVERSION—OPPOSITION BY GROCERS AND SMALL BUSINESSMEN

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, for two months I have been asking questions in the House of Commons in an endeavour to find out why this government is persisting in forcing metric in the retail food stores across Canada on January 1, 1982, making Canadian measurement illegal. I have reinforced the argument in the House of Commons on several occasions.

As late as April 23, 1981, the Canadian Federation of Retail Stores, some 4,000 strong, were 85 per cent opposed to metric at this time with the United States backing off. The Canadian Organization of Small Business sent letters to the ministers responsible for the implementation of metric in Canada, saying they do not wish to proceed with metric. The Retail Council of Canada sent a strong letter of opposition to force metric in the retail food sector to all the ministers involved. The retail food sector itself has sent a communiqué to the minister responsible indicating it does not wish to proceed with metric. I have not found anybody who supports the implementation of metric in the food sector except the Minister of State for Small Businesses (Mr. Lapointe), the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet).

I have here the communiqué which was released or sent to these ministers by the food sector of scale conversion advising them that:

> The retail food industry members of the Working Group wish to recommend strongly to the government that the scheduling of food scale conversion to metric units in Canada, which appeared in The Canada Gazette, Part I of 28 February, 1981, be delayed so that the conversion will take place at a time closer to when retail food scales will be converted in the United States.

After two and a half years, since Peterborough and Kamloops were pilot centres in 1978—and, by the way, Peterborough is totally back to imperial at this time—I have found no support, none whatsoever, for forced metric in the retail food sector. By the way, metric was supposed to be voluntary when it was first conceived by this ill-fated government.

I finally discovered the reason for this. I requested this debate tonight with the ministers or the ministers' parliamentary secretaries in order that I could document in Hansard why Canada is going metric. There are 45 voting members in the scale conversion group of the Metric Commission. Who are those 45 voters? I have them here, and I would like to advise this House and have it well documented in Hansard. This is in response to the minister's statement in the House of Commons on April 23 when he said everybody wants to go metric. Of those 45 people 13 voters are from foreign countries representing foreign manufacturers of metric weigh scales which they cannot sell in their own countries. The United States of America is represented, Japanese products are represented and other foreign manufacturers are represented.

Let me give you an example of some of these who say, "Aye, we want metric in Canada on January 1." Let me break down the 45 voters. Thirteen voters are representatives of foreign manufacturers of metric weigh scales. Why would they not want metric in Canada? They cannot sell these darn scales in the United States, Japan or in Holland. They might as well dump them here in Canada. We are the guinea pigs for the metric conversion programs of all these foreign internationals. There are 11 government votes by paid civil servants. They vote "aye, we want metric on January 1". Of those 11 government voters, six are from the Metric Commission, all drawing salaries because of their mandate to force metric on the people of Canada. Four of these 11 government voters are from the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. I could read their names into Hansard. I will turn them over to Hansard. Can you imagine, there is even a man from the Post Office who is voting us metric in the retail food sector. If you add them up, you have 13 foreign companies manufacturing weigh scales in other countries wanting to dump them here in Canada, and 11 votes by government civil servants, making a total of 24.

How many retail grocers are there who vote for metric on that special group called the working group on scales in the retail food industry? There are 21 retail grocers in that group who are not happy. How did those 21 retail grocers vote, Mr. Speaker? They sent a directive to all three of those ministers opposite telling them they do not wish to proceed with metric on January 1 in the retail food sector. I have copies of the communiqués. They have been relayed to the ministers by Mr. Boire, the executive director of the Metric Commission. He has advised the minister that the retail food sector does not want to go metric on January 1.

● (2215)

This government and all three ministries responsible, the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the Ministry of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and the Ministry of State for Small Businesses and Tourism, are forcing metric on the people of Canada. They are forcing the French Systems International metric. Bolts from Japan will not fit nuts from Germany, and here we have Systems International. There are ten forms of metric, and we picked the dog of the works. We do not want metric; the government does. Even the Metric Commission has recommended to the government that it not proceed.

I will read the following one-sentence communiqué from the "Metric Minutes" of the Metric Commission dated May 7, 1981:

> The retail food industry members of the Working Group wish to recommend strongly to the government that the scheduling of retail food scale conversion to metric units in Canada, which appeared in The Canada Gazette Part I of February 28, 1981, be delayed so that conversion will take place at a time closer to when retail food scales will be converted in the United States.

What does the government say in answer to that? What does the parliamentary secretary say? I do not want to hear the hogwash we heard on April 23 that everyone wants metric. Who wants metric? Is it the French who want metric, or is it the Canadian grocers who want metric? I defy the government to name one organization, one corporation, one independent businessman, one consumer group, one retail council or one anything which wants metric in Canada forced on it and Canadian imperial measurement made illegal on January 1.

What Canadians want fines, lockups, imprisonment or confiscation of equipment on January 1, all done by order in council or regulation? No legislation has been fully debated in this House. There has been no legislation forcing metric on the Canadian people. This is being done dictatorially by this Liberal government, which is bound and determined to force on the Canadian people a French system of metric which is only one of ten systems being used. Foreign multinationals including McDonnell Douglas, the manufacturer of the CF-18A, have given up. That firm has gone totally imperial. The CF-16 was a disaster in metric. They could not even order parts. No one supports Systems International except France. Why are we going to SI metric in the weigh scale business in Canada? Why are we buying foreign multinational weigh scales to the tune of $564 million worth of industry created in another country?

Who does this satisfy? Does it satisfy the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau)? Does it satisfy the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism, or whom? The question has never been answered. I am sick and tired of asking it. Will someone stand up in this House and say who wants metric in the retail food sector?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, on the one hand, the hon. member has just accused the Canadian government of following the French government, the Japanese government or some other foreign power which wants us to go metric, but we are doing it on our own, we are Canadians. On the other hand, the hon. member wants us to wait until the Americans have caught up with us. We do not have to catch up with or follow any other country. We are on our own. We shall remain so with respect to metric as with other things.

In the House on April 23, 1981, the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism (Mr. Lapointe) noted that the president of the Canadian Federation of Retail Grocers and the president of the Canadian Organization of Small Business simply asked that, together with them, the minister look into the possibility of setting another time schedule for scales conversion.

The government has examined the implications of further delay not only upon the scales conversion program itself but also the adverse impact it would have upon the implementation of other sector conversion programs, which are well advanced.

To delay is to prolong the period of indecision and uncertainty, for which the hon. member's government was well noted, facing these companies. It would result in the creation of unwarranted costs in terms of loss of interest on capital investment and in the postponement of the benefits to be derived from production and marketing. The longer the uncertainty—of which the Tories are past masters—lasts, the more difficult it is to implement sound business decisions.

It is for these major reasons that the government intends to proceed as planned with the retail food scale conversion which is to commence in January, 1982, and be completed by December, 1983. Here again I differ with the hon. member, as we often do, with respect to figures.

Also on April 23, 1981, the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm) commented on the structure of the food sector of scales conversion. Actually, the correct name is the working group on scales in the retail food industry. Having correctly identified the subject under discussion, I would like to point out that food industry organizations represented in the working group account for more than twice the number of any other group and more than those from all other groups combined.

● (2220)

An hon. Member: No, they do not.

Mrs. Appolloni: There are 33 food industry organizations compared to only 14 scale industry organizations represented on this metric conversion committee, Mr. Speaker.

WESTERN SEPARATISM—CALL FOR REVIEW OF CONSTITUTION AND ENERGY POLICIES

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton South): Mr. Speaker, on November 21, 1980, I urged the government to modify its Constitution and energy policies so that the flame of separatism in the west can be stamped out quickly before it becomes a roaring prairie fire. Since that time the rigidity of the government in maintaining policies detrimental to the west has been blatant. Without a doubt they are damaging national unity.

The Canada West Foundation poll, released a few days ago, shows a significant rise in western alienation. The poll, taken in March, shows that 36 per cent of westerners agree with the statement:

Western Canadians get so few benefits from being part of Canada that they might as well go it on their own.

When the same question was asked last October, 28 per cent agreed. The increased alienation is most pronounced in Alberta, particularly because of the detrimental effects of the National Energy Program. In Alberta, 49 per cent of those surveyed now agree with the statement compared with 30 per cent last October.

The fact that virtually half of Alberta is inclining toward separatism ought to galvanize the government to action—first of all to stop the policies that are producing this spirit, and secondly to institute policies clearly aimed at protecting provincial rights in both the Constitution and energy areas. It is true that hard-core separatists in Alberta amount to only 11 per cent, but this figure too is growing. And it would be irresponsible for any federal representative from Alberta to soft-pedal the seriousness of the present situation. Yet the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in his speech in Winnipeg, June 3, did not seem anxious or concerned. He preferred to talk about medicare and pension benefits to prove the large heartedness of the Liberal government—without going on to admit that that same government's energy policies have driven 139 oil rigs out of Canada, and have cut drilling activity in half. The service sector in Alberta faces a 30 per cent drop in business, and bankruptcies are up 300 per cent over last year. When these figures are set against the backdrop of federal government spending of $5.5 billion to $6 billion this year for offshore oil at world prices, the government's policies emerge as some sort of ridiculous joke.

This is a very serious matter, Mr. Speaker. Albertans have forgone some $30 billion in revenue that could have been obtained had we sold oil at even 75 per cent of world prices to our fellow Canadians. We have done that willingly in the interests of consuming provinces and the need to keep our industries competitive. But when federal intransigence—I call it the "Lalonde follies"—are continued, we must expect a rising sense of anger in the west.

Yet what does the Prime Minister do? After mentioning that the figure of 36 per cent disenchanted respondents is a matter of no concern to him, he states that it could be because he has not been able to get his side of the story across. He blames the Tories and the New Democrats for nursing the western grievances along. He persuades himself that the only reason why the westerners are concerned these days is that they have hardly any Liberals to represent them. That is not the westerners' fault. The reason why the Liberals have so little support in the west is that they have done so little to deserve it.

Westerners feel ignored in national policy matters. The new energy program, for example, has had no policy input from the west. It is seen in the west as a policy that is heavily oriented to the east. On February 25, the Alberta minister of energy and natural resources accused the federal Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) of presenting the National Energy Program in the full knowledge that not one of the producing provinces would accept it. But economic policy is one thing. It is the attitude it breeds among the people it affects which I regard as infinitely more dangerous in the long run. When the Alberta Court of Appeal ruled that the federal government cannot tax natural gas from provincially-owned wells, and when the federal government now persists in doing what has been declared illegal and asks me to stand and vote for it, there is a loss of respect for law. There is a feeling of being discriminated against, and there is growing anger in the hearts of the people.

● (2225)

Interpreting the latest poll, Doctor David Elton, the President of the Canada West Foundation said:

Such a shift in so short a period of time reflects serious dissatisfaction with national policy.

I urge the government to review its policies before it is too late. I do not want separatism to become a viable political force. But a great collision of forces is coming unless a new spirit of accommodation is injected into policies and ongoing negotiations. It is time for the government to wake up to its responsibility to all people of Canada. That is the only way the country will be held together.

Mr. Ron Irwin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Mr. Speaker, I should like to remind the hon. member that from 1960 to 1973 when we in northern Ontario were paying 25 per cent more than the world price because we had to take Alberta crude, we did not cry about it; we did not say that we would separate. If we thought about it at all, we said, "Well, that is the price of being Canadian; one region helping the other."

Also I remind the hon. member that prior to 1930, those resources were all federal. Within the last ten years multinational oil companies, most of which are foreign, made a 400 per cent increase in profits; a 50 per cent increase last year and a 50 per cent increase the year before.

When the hon. member brought this matter up on November 21, 1980, it was in support of an extension to the Joint Committee on the Constitution, and that was given. At that time he talked about the Constitution and the energy policies alienating Alberta. Now he talks about flames of separatism and roaring prairie fires.

Let us see what was in the Constitution which inflamed separatism. It was basically three things: a formula which indicated that in Canada we will amend in the future and no longer have to go to England cap in hand; a charter of rights which indicates basically that there will be human dignity which no government can change; sections 57 and 58 which give more provincial control of provincial resources.

If we have alienated the west, how have we done it? Was it by questioning the powers of the premiers, by daring to say to the oil companies, "Hey, you are making too much", by suggesting that we are one country and not ten balkanized states? If we have, that is the way a national party should act.

The truth is that at worst no Liberal during the Quebec referendum, went into Quebec and inflamed separatism. At best, what the Tories are thriving on, nourishing on and living on is western separatism.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): What a shameful accusation!

Mr. Irwin: It is true, it is true. At the worst, no Liberal went into Quebec and inflamed separatism and, at best, the Tories are living on it.

I have one consolation. History will record this in the same way as it recorded the flag debate because history has a way of sorting out truth. History will also indicate that there is a reason the Tories are in opposition and the Liberals are in power; it is that they have no national scope.

Mr. Roche: Shocking!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Just dreadful!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, the House stands adjourned until two o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

At 10.28 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

ENERGY

OIL PRICING AGREEMENT—NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN FEDERAL GOVERNMENT AND PROVINCE OF ALBERTA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Given the fact that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) will meet tomorrow with his Alberta counterpart to try to end the oil pricing impasse, and given that this impasse has crippled the Canadian oil exploration industry and shipped millions of dollars to foreign producers, leaving us ever more dependent on fragile sources of supply, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources bargain in good faith and avoid the temptation to make political points, and thereby bring sanity to the Canadian oil picture.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

RETROACTIVITY OF PAY INCREASES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Madam Speaker, whereas the Treasury Board has made the pay increases for members of the RCMP retroactive to April 1, 1981, rather than to the promised January 1, recognizing this breach of faith by the federal government and recognizing the outstanding service members of the RCMP offer to the Canadian community, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger):

That this House direct the Treasury Board to live up to its commitment to the members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police by extending the retroactivity of their pay increases to January 1, 1981.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

THREATENED DESECRATION OF BAHA'I SHRINE IN IRAN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I wish to move a motion. In light of the brutal disregard for human rights displayed by the Iranian government against the Baha'i faith in Iran, and in view of the announced intention of the government of Iran to destroy all traces of the holiest Baha'i shrine and to desecrate its site, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald):

That this House deplores the decision to desecrate the sacred shrine which three million Baha'i around the world consider the birthplace and the symbol of their faith, and that should the government of Iran continue its persecution, we urge that the United Nations Commission on Human Rights take up once again its investigation of Iranian policy toward the Baha'i community in Iran.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the presentation of this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

RETROACTIVITY OF PAY INCREASES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Madam Speaker, now that the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) is here, maybe we can obtain the agreement of hon. members opposite under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In July, 1980, members of the RCMP were promised that pay increases would begin on January 1, 1981, as they do in other Canadian police forces. Because the RCMP has no union to fight for decent wages and working conditions, last week the Treasury Board was able to double-cross and chisel the force, and announced a pay increase retroactive to April 1, rather than January 1, 1981. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose):

S.O. 43

That since this Treasury Board decision has robbed each member of the force of $750 to $1,600 each, the Solicitor General and the President of the Treasury Board immediately make the recent pay award retroactive to January 1, 1981.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

POLITICAL PARTIES

CONSERVATIVE PARTY POSITIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Essex-Kent): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas the hon. member for Edmonton South (Mr. Roche) stated yesterday in an article in The Globe and Mail, and again in this House, that he advocates a foreign affairs debate, whereas his House leader in a CP wire report today stated that the official opposition wishes to spend its allotted time on economic issues, and whereas the Conservative party has decided to debate capital punishment this Thursday instead of economic issues, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin):

That the Leader of the Opposition and his House leader get their act together and indicate to this House and the country whether they are sincere in their desire to discuss economic questions or whether this is further evidence of the duplicity, disintegrating Tory leadership, and party disloyalty expressed on the other side.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

TRADE

INCREASE IN DEFICIT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I wish to introduce a motion. Whereas new statistics show that Canada has registered an outrageous current account deficit in excess of $1 billion during the first quarter of 1981, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Thomson):

That this House condemns the Liberal government and in particular the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, who insists on importing high-priced foreign oil, and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce for his lack of any concern respecting exports, who, even more than the others, must bear the responsibility for this abysmal trading record.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

OIL PRICING AGREEMENT—NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN FEDERAL GOVERNMENT AND PROVINCE OF ALBERTA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Greenaway (Cariboo-Chilcotin): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Since the February, 1980, general election the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) has used, among other things, public confusion over metric conversion to mask an increase of some 52 cents a gallon in gasoline prices, most of it federal tax. This is a clear violation of Liberal election promises. The minister and his colleagues continue to live in a fantasy land where Canadians are paid only $17.75 a barrel for oil—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Could the hon. member do away with the props?

Mr. Greenaway: —but foreigners are gladly handed $40 plus a barrel, a ridiculous situation that is incomprehensible to anyone of reasonable intelligence. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor):

That the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources tomorrow in Banff act in a realistic, reasonable and responsible manner in negotiating a pricing agreement with his Alberta counterpart, and end this ongoing lunacy.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

RETROACTIVITY OF PAY INCREASES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the contract with the RCMP expired December 31, 1980; whereas the RCMP's wages are lagging behind those of city police, such as Vancouver's, who are not subject to transfers necessitating, for example, such items as new mortgages at high interest rates and whereas it is doubtful if any police force in Canada gives so much overtime and free work on days off as does the RCMP, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cariboo-Chilcotin (Mr. Greenaway):

That this House urges the Treasury Board and the cabinet to alter the proposed contract by honouring the January 1, 1981, date and by increasing the pay scale.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FISHERIES

EFFECTS OF RUSHED CATCH PLAN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Madam Speaker, whereas the major fish processors and offshore vessel owners on Canada's east coast have issued a direct challenge to the Department of Fisheries and Oceans 1981 fishing plan by catching their total allowable haddock catch in a compressed time-frame, and whereas this practice caused severely depressed prices to inshore fishermen leading to a three week tie up, and is bound to recur in other fisheries, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell):

That the Department of Fisheries and Oceans investigate the implications of this rushed catch plan by the major companies on fish prices to offshore and inshore fishermen, on incomes to plant workers, and on prices to consumers, with a view to developing a more rational and orderly catch scheme for 1982.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

ENERGY

OIL PRICING AGREEMENT—FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL NEGOTIATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Madam Speaker, the Alsands Energy Ltd. consortium which includes 17 per cent ownership by PetroCan has put together a management team which is ready, willing and able to proceed with their project if an oil pricing agreement is reached. Their team will be lost if such an agreement is not reached or significant progress is not made. Since 50 per cent of the major equipment and bulks will come from Ontario and Quebec, and 50 per cent of the supply-erect subcontracts will come from Ontario and Quebec, with a value of some $1.6 billion and the creation of thousands of jobs, it is imperative that both sides come to an agreement quickly. Therefore, under Standing Order 43 I move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis):

That the Government of Canada quit creating jobs in Saudi Arabia, Venezuela and Mexico and start creating jobs in Canada by coming quickly to a fair and realistic agreement on energy pricing.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ALLOCATION OF TIME TO DEBATE BILL C-57—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Madam Speaker, by invoking closure last night on Bill C-57, the Liberal government has effectively choked adequate debate in the House by members particularly from western Canada who wanted to convince the government to accept amendments, and may also inhibit the June 10 negotiations in Alberta. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Elzinga)

That the government reconsider and allow for debate on amendments of these regressive oil and gas taxes.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ENERGY

OIL PRICING AGREEMENT—INSTRUCTIONS TO FEDERAL NEGOTIATORS

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Oil prices have increased 12 times since the beginning of 1980, for a total of $12.79 per barrel; 72 per cent of this $12.79 has ended up in the federal government coffers in the form of increased taxes. The Alberta proposal of July, 1980, would have resulted in a price increase of only about half this amount, or about $6.50 per barrel. So all Canadians have today are high energy taxes and low energy development.

What instructions has the government given to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to break the deadlock with Alberta, a deadlock which has been caused directly by Liberal government greed and the broken election promises of the 1980 election?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, in so far as the latter part of the question is concerned, I repeat the figures given to the House by the Minister of Finance, to the effect that because the Clark-Crosbie budget was not applied, consumers in Canada have now saved $1.9 billion over what they would have saved.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Not even Pinard will believe that.

Mr. Andre: And the Americans have $4 billion of our money.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the facts and the figures are easy to establish. One just has to take the Crosbie budget, look at the increase—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Order!

Mr. Trudeau: —look at the specified price set in that budget, being 85 per cent of world prices, and then the hon. member would find out how we have saved that money of the consumers thus far.

In so far as the instructions given to the minister are concerned, they are quite simple. It is to seek a compromise solution with the government of Alberta. The need for increased prices has been recognized in our own national energy policy; it is still being recognized. It was indicated by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in his meeting last month with his Alberta counterpart that we would be recognizing the need for higher energy prices. The big discussion, no doubt, will be on the share of those prices which remains in Alberta and that share which is redistributed through the federal government to Canadian consumers, the taxpayers.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Which one, Pierre?

Mr. Wilson: Madam Speaker, the Crosbie budget is not the point. I am talking about what happened after the Crosbie budget, with the Alberta proposal of July, 1980, compared with what has happened since then. The government is a party of high gasoline prices, and it is a party of broken promises.

Some hon. Members: Order, order!

Mr. Wilson: It is a party of high prices, which have been gobbled up by the federal government through increased taxes, and high prices which have done nothing to keep drilling rigs in the country and to encourage energy development.

Some hon. Members: Question!

SHARING OF TAX REVENUES

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is specifically related to this compromise. Is the government prepared to share some of these exorbitant taxes with the producing provinces and the industry, or is it proposing to layer the inevitable price increases which will come from these negotiations on top of the high taxes we have already seen?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, once again the hon. member seems to misunderstand the essential difference between the policy of his party and our policy. The essential difference is not on the need for higher prices. We recognize that; we recognized that during the election.

Mr. Clark: Except in Allan's ads.

Mr. Trudeau: We are just ensuring that these higher prices will still be lower over the four-year period than those proposed by the party opposite.

But the essential difference, once again, is not on prices. It is on how the money flowing from that resource will be shared among Canadians. That is the essential difference. Essentially that is the reason why Premier Lougheed's proposal of last summer was not acceptable to the government, and is not acceptable today. It still resulted in Alberta receiving about 45 per cent of the returns from the petroleum industry—

Mr. Andre: Nonsense!

• (1420)

Mr. Trudeau: —the private sector getting about 45 per cent—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: —and the federal government getting about 10 per cent. This is not acceptable to a government whose duty it is to ensure equality of opportunity across the country.

Mr. Wilson: Madam Speaker, the point is that we must share. Some 72 per cent has been shared by the federal government since the beginning of 1980. The balance has gone to the others. I am asking whether there will be some better distribution of those funds than has been the case so far to date.

EXCISE TAX ON NATURAL GAS

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question relates to what happened last night. Alberta and British Columbia have consistently opposed the excise tax on natural gas. The legality of this particular tax is yet to be decided by the Supreme Court of Canada. Last month the Appeal Court of Alberta ruled that this tax was invalid, illegal. Since Alberta has specifically requested that this legislation relating to that tax be deferred until after the negotiations, and until after the Supreme Court decision, how can the Prime Minister justify invoking closure on this particular piece of legislation on the very day that the negotiations with Alberta were to start?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member began his question by pointing out figures which are quite fanciful. But, assuming that they were true and that 75 per cent went to the federal government—

Mr. Wilson: Seventy-two per cent.

Mr. Trudeau: —72 per cent went to the federal government, he asked if there could be a better share. I can assure the hon.

member that—and I do not accept his figures—the share we are requesting indeed will be considerably better than that.

Mr. Wilson: You want more than 72 per cent?

Mr. Trudeau: We would like the over-all result to be the federal government sharing 23 per cent or 25 per cent of the take, and the provinces and the private sector sharing the rest. Whether it be 25 per cent, 30 per cent or 22 per cent, it certainly is not 72 per cent that we are requesting. We are asking for a fair share for the government which speaks for the people of Canada, which must redistribute equality of opportunity across this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: That is your Mexico first policy.

Mr. Trudeau: It is the consumers of Canada who are paying this money to the producing provinces and—

Mr. Beatty: And to Mexico.

Mr. Trudeau: —it is the consumers of Canada who should in some way be benefiting from this resource which belongs to Canada.

The hon. member opposite has a question about Mexico. I will sit down and hear that question.

REQUEST FOR LOWERING OF TAXES

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Prime Minister who should get together with the minister of energy who, on June 3, said that he conceded that the current oil prices Canadians are paying are about even with those projected in the Conservative budget. During the election campaign the Prime Minister, on January 30, 1980, said this in St. John's Newfoundland:

> Our price will not be $6 a barrel; it would be under $4 per barrel.

That is 16 cents a gallon translated into gasoline prices at the pump.

To date the Prime Minister's government has raised prices in St. John's 64 cents a gallon for gasoline and some 44 cents a gallon for heating fuels—a 55 per cent increase. Of the 12 increases, nine have been federal tax increases. In order to reach an oil pricing agreement with the producing provinces, in order to treat the Canadian consumers fairly, and to begin to meet his promises and not continue to betray Canadians, is the Prime Minister prepared to lower the federal taxes imposed in the last 15 months by something in the order of 30-odd cents a gallon to give room to increase the price to the primary producers at the wellhead, so that this matter can be settled, and settled quickly?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, if the hon. member wants to talk about promises, the least he could do would be to quote them in their entirety. When I talked about $4 a barrel, even the hon. member should realize that it was $4 a barrel for 1980.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

• (1425)

Mr. Trudeau: I said—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): There's no tomorrow.

Mr. Trudeau: I said, specifically, Madam Speaker, that we were talking of 1980, and it could not have been $4 for the whole four-year period that the hon. member's budget had contained. It was $4 for 1980. For 1981, the minister—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, it was $4, and it did not have that extra 18-cent excise tax that the hon. member for St. John's West would have brought on. So, we did keep our promise in 1980.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: So far as the four-year period that was covered by the budget of the hon. member opposite is concerned, we undertook—and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources repeated that undertaking the other day—that we would still be underneath the figure which would have been produced as a result of the hon. member's budget, and that is still our commitment today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

INSTRUCTIONS TO MINISTER

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister has betrayed the Canadian people.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: This is what the Prime Minister said in Halifax:

> Our made-in-Canada (oil) price will result in a lower price to consumers than the one proposed for the next four years—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That's what he said.

Mr. Crosbie: He did not make any promise about one year, and he has raised the price 60 cents a gallon to date. His answer to the people of Canada is that people appear "prepared to pay these higher prices". That is how sanguine he is now. He has managed to get himself into power for another four years without going to the electorate. "Drivers are willing", he said.

Now, my supplementary question to the Prime Minister—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I have to call the hon. member to order. It seems that every time he asks a question he makes it too long, and I have to get up and call him to order. I am sure that he has noticed by now that his questions are always too long.

Mr. Crosbie: They are warring like little rabbits over there, Madam Speaker. My supplementary question is to the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister's biographer, Mr. Gwyn, says that he wants to settle this energy pricing agreement even more than the constitutional question. Will the Prime Minister therefore instruct his Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to stop twisting the truth, to stop imposing additional taxes on Canadians such as the 9-cent tax last week, or will he replace that minister with some other negotiator who can be trusted by the people of Canada and trusted by the people he has to negotiate with?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I am glad that the hon. member read that quote from my Halifax statement during the campaign. He read it quite correctly, for once. It stated that we were giving an undertaking covering the next four years.

Mr. Crosbie: You have violated it already.

Mr. Trudeau: Those are the words that he used. Madam Speaker, in the first of those four years, 1980, we were lower than the Tory prices.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Ask the Canadian consumer.

Mr. Trudeau: In the second of those four years, 1981, as the minister of energy said the other day, and the hon. member quoted him correctly again, we were about even with the Tories. Therefore, as an average over the two years we have kept our promise, and I can repeat that over the four years—

Mr. Andre: Try the truth.

Mr. Trudeau: —we will have kept it, in spades.

THE ECONOMY

INCREASE IN NUMBER OF BANKRUPTCIES

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Oshawa.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Is it going to be in Spanish?

Mr. Hees: He's going to use his best Spanish.

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): The question will not be in Spanish, Madam Speaker, but I do not think the government will like it any better because it is not.

Today 100 Canadians will declare personal bankruptcy, yesterday 100 Canadians declared bankruptcy, and tomorrow an additional 100 Canadians will declare personal bankruptcy. This record is added to the record number who lost their homes because they could not renew their mortgages, to the record number of farmers who lost their farms, and to the record number of small businessmen who lost their businesses because of the high interest rate policy pursued by the government. How long does the Government of Canada plan to inflict this high interest rate punishment on the people of Canada?

• (1430)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I know that the hon. member has been away for some time. I am delighted to see him back. I had hoped that he would improve the quality of the questioning from that corner, but there has not been any improvement. He is rehashing old questions that were asked in his absence. I suggest that he look at Hansard to get the answers.

BANKS AND BANKING

BANK OF COMMERCE—DOUBLING OF PROFITS AND REDUCTION IN TAXES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, the minister is right. I have been away for two weeks, but during those two weeks the economy has become worse, as have the minister's answers. Canadians are going into personal bankruptcies and, as the minister well knows, the banks continue to increase their profits. He also knows that during the past decade bank profits have tripled but their taxes have remained the same. I should like to ask a question with reference to one of these banks in particular. How is it possible that last year the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce managed to double its profits from $100 million to $200 million and at the same time have a drop in its taxes from $70 million to $18 million? How is that possible.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I would have to examine the situation of that particular bank in detail. One way that its taxes may have dropped occurs to me, and that is as a result of a policy that has been supported by all members of the House, namely, the use of the small business development bond. It is a fact that if banks have tax liability, those liabilities can be reduced by the use of the small business development bond. That is one of the things the hon. member might put in his briefing book for his next trip to El Salvador.

PAYMENT OF TAXES BY BANKS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, the minister may smirk when he answers, but I can assure him that all the Canadians who are going into bankruptcy do not regard this government and its policies as a laughing matter at all. The subject of bank profits is obviously of no great concern to the minister, although their taxes have remained at a constant level in spite of increasing profits. Would the minister confirm that most of the taxes paid by Canadian banks are, in fact, paid outside Canada and not to Canada? Specifically, would he confirm that most of the $228 million paid in taxes by the five major chartered banks last year went outside Canada?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, to refer back to the earlier question, the hon. member asked if I could explain why it was possible that taxes for a particular bank decreased. I said I would have to study the matter in order to know the condition of the bank but that one possible way it could decrease its tax liability would be its use of the small business development bond which extends benefits to small businessmen at about half the commercial rate. That is one possible way, and I would ask the hon. member to consider it seriously.

The hon. member asked several other academic questions about how it is that banks pay their taxes abroad. He knows the answer to that as well as I do. He has probably also had in his briefing book the old saw that you do not ask a question unless you know the answer.

WESTERN DEVELOPMENT FUND

GUIDELINES FOR SPENDING OF MONEYS

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I propose to ask the President of the Treasury Board a question to which, unfortunately, I do know the answer. It deals with a matter in the litany of broken promises made to western Canada by this government, specifically, the Western Development Fund. The minister tabled his estimates for the current fiscal year in the House on February 26. At that time he indicated that $350 million would be spent this year under the Western Development Fund and that the details of the fund were to be tabled in the supplementary estimates later this year.

In view of a report in yesterday's Winnipeg Free Press that the bureaucrats in the federal government are trying to scuttle the Western Development Fund, could the minister tell the House whether any progress has been made toward establishing guidelines for the expenditure of this money? In view of the fact that it seems the money will not be available this year because of the lack of guidelines, can he give a commitment that the moneys that were to be spent this year will accumulate and be carried over until next year?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for that question. As he knows, under the system of expenditure management the expenditure of those funds is addressed by the Economic Development Committee. I tabled the estimates and I stand behind them, but as President of the Treasury Board I am not responsible for every item in the blue book.

CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, unfortunately I cannot find any minister who is prepared to take responsibility for this fund. It is one reason why the Liberal party is becoming the laughing stock of western Canada.

Since the Minister of Employment and Immigration does not know anything about this topic, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Finance. There has been a series of broken promises to western Canada, including double tracking, the payment for the Soviet grain embargo, energy policies which are an attack on western resources, and the economic development policy for Indians. I could go on and on. The minister said that there would be consultation with the provinces of western Canada with respect to the expenditure of this fund. When will this consultation take place? When may we expect a conclusion of that consultation, and when may we expect action with respect to the Western Development Fund?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member will recall that there was an indication of consultation with western Canada. That consultation would probably be with the program ministers when any particular project is to be approved or financed.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Scandalous.

PROJECTS TO BE FUNDED

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Could he outline to the House what projects the government intends to fund with the money that is supposed to be going into the Western Development Fund? From time to time the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has stated in western Canada that the money from this fund will be available for a particular project in which he is interested. Rail lines, ports, airports and a number of things have been mentioned as possible projects. In fact the amount of money talked about politically is probably higher than the highest estimate of the size of the fund. Could the minister indicate what projects will be funded through the Western Development Fund?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I already indicated to the hon. member who asked a question earlier that particular projects would have to be put forward in any area by the program ministers. That is something that I am not able to indicate on their behalf this afternoon.

COMPOSITION OF FUND

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Somebody must be in charge of the fund, Madam Speaker. What has happened to it? It appears that it is another attempt by the Liberal government to raise the expectations of the people in western Canada, and that that is as far as it goes.

May I put another question to the minister. There has been the suggestion of a great miscalculation in the total amount of money to go into the Western Development Fund based on figures projected by officials in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. If the minister cannot tell us what projects are being considered, could he at least indicate the size of the fund? How much money will go into this Western Development Fund, and over how many years will it function? Can the minister inform the House on these points?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, both the questions asked by the hon. member were dealt with in the budget and in the National Energy Program.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

RIGHT TO COLLECTIVE BARGAINING

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General and it concerns another promise broken by the government. As the minister knows, members of the RCMP across Canada feel betrayed and double-crossed by the failure of the Liberal government to make their pay increase retroactive to January 1 this year as was promised to them last July. This breach of trust, which costs each member at least $750, has shown the minister's div-rep system to be totally inadequate.

● (1440)

In view of the fact that many members of the force are now actively supporting the right to no-strike collective bargaining, will the minister explain his recent threat to end contract policing? Will he also explain his union busting threat to cut the size of the force if there is any movement by mounties to form a union, a threat which his colleague, the Minister of Labour, will recognize as being an unfair labour if such a threat were made by anyone else?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, if a 22,000-man police force, working from one coast of Canada to the other, were ever to have the right to strike, or to move in the direction of having the right to strike, the possibility of such a strike and the damage it might do to the security and order of Canada would have to be taken into account by the government. The mandate of the RCMP can remain as broad as it is, it can serve the Canadian people at three levels of government, in every province and territory, precisely because the force does not have the right to strike, and the Canadian people know they can fall back on it.

In so far as the preamble to the hon. member's question is concerned, I think the force has been served very well by the div-rep system. When the recent pay raise went before Treasury Board, account was taken of the fact that the RCMP does not have the right to collective bargaining or the right to strike. It was taken into consideration that a group within the public service which does not have that right should be compensated for its forbearance, and that was taken account of when the pay raise was settled.

I have reviewed the record very carefully, and there have been deep misunderstandings. I think these misunderstandings, well intentioned, have been on both sides, on the side of the RCMP and on the side of the Treasury Board. Since then I have had several meetings with the President of the Treasury Board, and I expect to have good news for the force very soon.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, no one has ever suggested the right to strike. We are talking about the right to collective bargaining. It is the government's betrayal of its promises that will lead to the action which the minister is suggesting should not take place. His blackmail is resulting in the growth of the association of 17 divisions.

COMMITMENT TO MAKE PAY INCREASES RETROACTIVE TO JANUARY 1, 1981

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. He knows that the Treasury Board minute dated July 23 confirms that the 1981 contracts were supposed to start on January 1 this year. That was the promise that was made. Will the President of the Treasury Board confirm this commitment and explain to the House why he betrayed this commitment to the RCMP, and explain it also to members of the force? Will he explain why this incredible decision, a decision which really represents a shameful double-cross of members of the force, will not be reversed, and reversed very quickly?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. I believe the situation requires a certain amount of clarification for members of the House. First, in the year commencing April 1, 1980, the RCMP received an increase of 12.9 per cent on payroll. That translated to between 13 per cent and 14 per cent altogether in cost. That was set forth in the estimates for 1980-1981 for the year terminating March, 1981.

Last year there was an agreement in principle with respect to a change in the year to a calendar year. Treasury Board ministers felt that with the entire package of items put before them, the RCMP was very generously treated, and that particular change was one which was not in the best interests of the government or the taxpayers of Canada.

I would point out that, for the year ended March 31, the force had received a 12.9 per cent increase in that period. In addition, Treasury board ministers had agreed to a 12.2 per cent increase for the year April 1, 1981, to March 31, 1982, which translates into more than 13 per cent. In addition to that, other measures were taken, for example, reducing by one year the period of time it takes a first class constable to reach maximum pay.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Johnston: There were overtime provisions. In all, and if hon. members will hear me out, since the question has been asked, it was considered to be a very generous package.

As it turns out, a number of members of the force felt they were personally prejudiced by the failure of Treasury Board to make this provision commence on January 1, 1981. This was for a number of reasons—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

AID TO CARIBBEAN COUNTRIES

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. At a subcommittee meeting of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence last night, the minister indicated that Canada would be willing to take part in a joint U.S.-Mexican economic assistance program to help Caribbean nations. Can the minister say whether details of such assistance have been drawn up by his officials, toward that end?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, Canada has a full and, I believe, effective development program for the Caribbean area. We would certainly be prepared to share objectives with other countries that have the same ends in mind.

We have had no advance notice of the proposal which was made yesterday by the United States and apparently agreed to by Mexico, but we have an open mind on it. The Prime Minister has agreed in principle to meet at some time with the President of Mexico and the President of the United States. This is a matter which could be on the agenda and on which policy could be developed, both before and after.

At the moment, there are no further details nor have we given our assent to the proposal. As far as we know, there is really no exact proposal.

RETROACTIVITY OF PAY INCREASES

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the President of the Treasury Board. It is a brief question which will permit him a brief answer. Can the President of the Treasury Board tell us whether the government will make the RCMP pay increase effective January 1, 1981?

Mr. Lawrence: A simple yes or no will do.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I have met and I am meeting with my colleague, the Solicitor General, to discuss this problem. There are some misunderstandings, as I indicated in an earlier answer. I want to ensure that members of the force are not prejudiced, but I will obviously have to take the matter before my colleagues in Treasury Board, who arrived at the decision collectively, to grant the RCMP an increase as of April 1, 1981.

REQUEST FOR EARLY DECISION

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, is the minister in a position to give a firm undertaking since a promise was made last week by his colleague that the matter would be studied? He is promising to study it again. Will the President of the Treasury Board tell us whether the government will make a final decision, by which it will abide, this week?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Yes, Madam Speaker, the government will make a firm decision on this issue this week.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

AID TO CARIBBEAN COUNTRIES—QUERY CONCERNING CUBA

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is a supplementary one and it is addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It concerns the proposals that have been discussed in the last two days by the President of the United States and the President of Mexico.

I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs, although he has not been involved in the discussions, whether or not there have been any discussions with any other members of the government or any officials within his department, with Mr. Tom Enders, former U.S. ambassador to Canada, about this matter? Could he also advise whether such discussions also included any kind of an aid program to Cuba?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, to the best of my knowledge there have been no discussions of any kind at any level with the U.S. government or its officials concerning this subject. I might say that, as of some years ago, we cut off our aid program to Cuba entirely and more recently even in indirect forms through NGOs, and we have no intention of reinstating them to Cuba.

Oral Questions

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CANADA'S PEACEKEEPING ROLE IN MIDDLE EAST

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. He will remember that last week he said that he thought the question of Canada participating in a peacekeeping force in the Sinai was under very serious consideration by Department of External Affairs. Referring to it, he said:

> We will look with sympathy because I do not think Canada wants to refuse to keep the peace in any way we can in any part of the world.

Can the minister tell us whether he has now discussed this with the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and whether his remark of last week represented government policy?

● (1450)

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I think it is very clear that we have continuous dialogue between External Affairs and Defence on matters like this. I said at the time that we looked very closely at the whole situation in the Middle East, and that it was also the responsibility of the Secretary of State for External Affairs to continue the dialogue and see what decision we will take eventually.

SINAI PEACEKEEPING OPERATION

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, the minister seems now to be disavowing some of his remarks of last week. I would like to direct my supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. He told the press that there were several facets of the Sinai peacekeeping operation that were giving him concern, one that it was not under United Nations auspices, and the other that he did not want to become involved in a process over which we have no control and which may not be going anywhere. Obviously there is quite a difference between those remarks and the remarks of the Minister of National Defence last week. I wonder whether the Secretary of State could tell us who is speaking for the government when they diverge like this.

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I think the minister and I are both clearly saying the same thing, that no decision has as yet been made by the government on the matter. In fact no request has been made, but what we might call informal soundings have been taken and suggestions have been made that this is a force in which we might participate. The dialogue is going on within the government, and when we make a decision we will be pleased to let the hon. member and other colleagues in the House know.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

CREATION OF TWO SEPARATE JURISDICTIONAL ENTITIES

Mr. Keith Penner (Cochrane-Superior): Madam Speaker, as the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development knows, the Legislative Assembly of the Northwest Territories has decided to hold a plebiscite on the question of whether or not to divide the territories. It is to take place on December 14 of this year. Will the minister tell the House, and assure the citizens of the Northwest Territories and their elected representatives, that if the decision is a favourable one, that is, if they vote yes, he will do all he can as quickly as possible to have enabling legislation before this House? Will he also work expeditiously on the important question of where the boundary between the new territories would come, again if that is the decision of the citizens of the NWT?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): —I would advise the hon. member that we are studying the boundary question. As far as the plebiscite is concerned, of course the territorial government has the right to hold a plebiscite if it wishes. If it does so I am sure the decision will be taken into account by the government when it studies this fundamental question.

AIR SAFETY

APPOINTEE TO DUBIN REPORT ADVISORY COMMITTEE

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, I have a question I would normally have directed to the Minister of Transport, but the Prime Minister may want to respond or refer it to the acting minister.

Yesterday the Air Transport Association of Canada joined a long list of significant and serious objectors to the naming of Walter McLeish, the air administrator, to the special committee set up to review the work of Mr. Justice Dubin. I wonder if the Prime Minister, in responding to the essence of the principle raised by Mr. Justice Dubin in his first report, that of the independence of the investigative aspect of air incidents and the separation of the regulatory agency from the investigative body, will indicate whether his government would in effect accept the principle in essence of Mr. Justice Dubin's first report so that the report and the study of it will not be lost in a maze of doubts and confusion arising out of Mr. McLeish's continued presence on that committee?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I should like to remind the House that last week, within hours of receiving the Dubin report in both languages, the minister very quickly tabled it so that the opposition could not say he was holding it back. He also acted very quickly in establishing an advisory committee to act immediately on the recommendations of the Dubin report, and the practicality of having Mr. McLeish and Mr. Wilkins of the Ministry of Transport is to put the recommendations of that advisory board into immediate, practical adaptation and implementation. The minister is also in favour of an independent aviation safety council. It will take time to set that up. It will require terms of reference and the determination of its authority. This will take time, but it will be done. In the interim, this advisory committee will do it.

POSSIBLE CONFLICT OF INTEREST

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, I directed my question to the Prime Minister in part because the Minister of Transport has had this report in his hands since March 17, 1981, almost three months ago. To this day he has not responded to the principle enunciated by Mr. Justice Dubin, that is to say, that conflict of interest and the appearance of conflict of interest in the investigative process within transport in this country should come to an end. I would repeat my question to the Prime Minister, and I wish he were even remotely interested.

The principle of separation of these two processes, investigative and regulatory, is important to the safety of air travellers. Will the Prime Minister indicate whether it is government policy to accept the essence of the principle enunciated by Mr. Justice Dubin in that report, a principle that should be clear to him because the report has been in the hands of at least the minister since March 17?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I regret to say I have not read the report, but the Minister of Transport has not only read it and tabled it, but is acting on it in the way his able parliamentary secretary just indicated.

COMMUNICATIONS

SATELLITE TELEVISION RECEIVING STATIONS IN NORTHERN COMMUNITIES

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, my question to the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications concerns remote northern communities throughout the Yukon and the Northwest Territories and many of the northern parts of the provinces. It concerns the media service they had been getting up until the early 1970s. There was no media service at all available to these communities. Then it improved somewhat with the Anik satellite and CBC North. Then, when the earth satellites, or the receiving stations came along, many of these communities, such as Uranium City, for example, in the northern part of Saskatchewan, built receiving stations and transmitted a ray of programming out to these communities.

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Anguish: I would like to hear from the minister what the policy is now, and have his assurance that these satellite receiving stations will not be closed down in remote northern communities until there is full consultation with these communities and there is some alternative available to them. Can the minister give us that assurance?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the CRTC has held some very extensive hearings over the past few months and has licensed a new Canadian cable operation known as CanCom, which basically will bring a number of television broadcast signals into the remote and underserviced parts of Canada, including CHAN-TV from Vancouver, CITV from Edmonton, and CHCH from Hamilton. It is my hope that, with these services, plus the six radio channels which have also been authorized for delivery by satellite, many of the problems in providing service to these communities will have been resolved.

NECESSITY FOR CONSULTATIONS

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, I am wondering what consultation has taken place with these northern communities. Will they be kept posted and informed? Will there be meetings held with these northern communities so they understand what is going on, because many of them fear now that their receiving stations will be closed down and there will not be anything to replace them?

• (1500)

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, my department has embarked on a rather extensive campaign to make these communities aware of the new services which have been licensed by the CRTC, and we are encouraging all the communities to apply for licences through the CRTC. I have also indicated to my officials that I want them to make themselves widely available and to be helpful in assisting these communities process applications so that they can obtain licences and receive the types of signals the CRTC has authorized, which will give them a good package of signals originating from Canadian stations.

ENERGY

SUPPLY AND SERVICE INDUSTRY IN SOUTHERN SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. Len Gustafson (Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister relating to the very serious economic situation which exists in the oil industry in southern Saskatchewan in particular. Again and again the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has disregarded requests from service and supply people. I understand that there are petitions from some 10,000 people in that area with respect to the very serious economic situation. Will the Prime Minister look into this situation and give it his personal attention?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the minister is obviously concerned about the various sectors of the oil industry. I can only repeat that over the past many years in Canada the oil industry has been getting 45 per cent of the benefits of the oil and gas produced in Canada.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: These are Canadian companies.

Mr. Trudeau: We feel that share is too high, and we are trying to reduce it. I hope some of the elements of that industry particularly—as the former minister of energy, mines and resources points out—the Canadian companies—

Mr. Clark: The ones which are leaving.

Mr. Trudeau: —will benefit from the energy policy, which is quite clearly slanted toward benefiting Canadians, as the former minister would know.

Mr. Clark: If they want to work in the United States.

SITUATION IN ESTEVAN, SASK.

Mr. Len Gustafson (Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, is the Prime Minister aware that in the Estevan-Weyburn-southern Saskatchewan region we are receiving $17.75 a barrel and that the increase in the price of gasoline at the pump has been 68 cents? There is no energy policy. Economic activity in that area is flat on its back. Our people are desperate.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I understand the hon. member is making a representation.

THE ECONOMY

SMALL BUSINESS AND FARMING BANKRUPTCIES

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Finance. The minister was asked questions today by the Leader of the New Democratic Party. I was here in the House during the time the NDP leader was absent, and it seems to me that in answering questions about bankruptcies and about the financial situation, the minister does not address or will not recognize the crisis nature of the economic situation. I say this particularly in reference to small businesses and farmers. According to the Canadian Federation of Independent Business—John Bulloch—and the Ontario Federation of Agriculture—Ralph Barrie—if there is not a change by the fall the present numbers will be quadrupled. Does the minister recognize the crisis nature of the problem?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I have indicated to the House already that I have had and will continue to conduct discussions with the relevant ministers with respect to whatever difficulties are being faced by certain groups in the economy. I am aware of the situation. I am attempting to see whether there is any way this situation can be relieved without adding to the inflationary difficulty we have at the present time. I assure the hon. member that I am fully aware of the situation he is raising.

EXTENSION OF SMALL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BOND PROGRAM

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is also directed to the Minister of Finance. It is on just one small point in relation to the small business development bond. Just to refresh the minister's memory, the fact is that if bank profits are up there is no way that bond can be used as an excuse for the banks not to pay taxes. I think the minister will admit that that is the mechanism of the bond.

In any event, the minister has received an offer from this side of the House of one day of extended debate. I understand that the minister and the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism are meeting with bankers tomorrow. I know it will take time for deliberations and an understanding of the implications of extending the bond, respecting operating and inventory purposes, to unincorporated businesses and farmers, but when can we expect a decision from the government? Will it be in the next week or in the next month? What time frame does the minister have in terms of giving us a decision on that measure?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the question has been asked several times as to whether the very effective instrument called the small business development bond can be extended to other groups. I have stated that when and if a decision is taken in that respect, it will be announced of course, but there are real difficulties in extending this bond to unincorporated businesses. There are major administrative difficulties, and there are very important cost implications. Undoubtedly, these were some of the considerations which originally influenced the former minister of finance in confining the application of the bond to the present area of the economy.

PRIVILEGE

MR. WADDELL—ALLEGED MISLEADING STATEMENT BY MR. MacEACHEN

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege respecting the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). On March 2, 1981 I asked a question in this House of the Minister of Finance. I suggested to him that he might obtain an agreement with Alberta if he were prepared to be flexible in relation to the 8 per cent wellhead tax on oil and on the natural gas tax. I said the following to him at the time:

> Is the minister prepared to be flexible in dealing with Alberta so that Alberta can be flexible, in order to get away from and resolve this incredible confrontation which we have in Canada at the moment?

The minister replied that obviously he would be flexible. He promised to be flexible, and he used the world "flexible" on four occasions. He gave me his word that he would be flexible. We find now that the minister and his colleagues are bringing in time allocation on Bill C-57.

My question of privilege is that I was misled in the House. The minister never intended to be flexible at all.

Madam Speaker: Order. I am sure the hon. member is quite conscious of the fact that he is debating and that this is not a question of privilege.

MR. MacLAREN—USE OF UNPARLIAMENTARY LANGUAGE BY MR. McKENZIE

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, during the latter part of our proceedings yesterday evening some of us on this side of the House understood the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie) to call the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) a liar.

Mr. Cousineau: Shame.

Mr. Clark: Maybe he promised cheap gas.

Mr. MacLaren: We had hoped we had misunderstood what was said, but today we find in Hansard at page 10382 that indeed the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine is quoted as calling the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources a liar. I would be glad if, in the circumstances, Your Honour were to invite the hon. member to withdraw his remark.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, I will tell you what prompted my remark. It was this—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I thought the hon. member was rising to withdraw the expression. I am sure he is aware that this expression is considered unparliamentary and cannot be tolerated in this House. I am sure he would want to withdraw the word even though he was quoting. Hon. Members cannot say indirectly what they are not allowed to say directly, and I invite the hon. member to respond to the rules of our House and to withdraw that word.

Mr. McKenzie: Madam Speaker, that is exactly what I was going to do when you cut me off. I will just remove the word "liar" and say that it is impossible to believe this man.

Tabling of Documents

MR. FORRESTALL—REFERENCE OF DUBIN REPORT ON AIR SAFETY TO COMMITTEE

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, I regret that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Bockstael) has left the chamber. I will be very brief. In response to questions asked just a few moments ago, the parliamentary secretary left the very clear impression in this chamber that the minister had received the report involved and immediately referred it to a committee of his designation. Incidentally, that committee is meeting with some significant opposition from the air industry of Canada.

I am sure the parliamentary secretary would not want an erroneous fact left on the record; nor would the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), who continued the impression. The impression was that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) had within the last week or ten days received this report when in fact his Lordship, Mr. Justice Charles L. Dubin, submitted his report to the Minister of Transport on March 17 of this year, just nine days short of three months ago. It leaves the impression, Madam Speaker, that the minister had in fact acted swiftly to refer the report to committee for further study when in fact he had three months to consider carefully the principle of the separation of the investigative body from the regulatory body within the Department of Transport, which in fact lies at the root of the difficulty with respect to this question.

Madam Speaker: This is not a question of privilege. There might be an interpretation as to what "swiftly" really means and what delays that implies; but it is argument and differences of opinion, not a question of privilege.

THE MINISTRY

REQUEST TO TABLE STATEMENT OF ABJECT APOLOGY AND WITHDRAWAL OF FALSE AND MALICIOUS ALLEGATIONS

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, in view of some references made in this House by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and others, I thought they might have taken this occasion today to make some reference to the matter. Inasmuch as they have not, pursuant to Standing Order 41(2) I am tabling a copy of the statement of abject apology and withdrawal of false and malicious allegations intended to impair my ability to perform my duties as a member of this House and as a minister.

This statement was published in this morning's Toronto Sun, and if hon. members wish for the record that this piece be published as an appendix to today's Hansard, I would have no objection.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: No.

Madam Speaker: The hon. minister has taken me a bit by surprise. I am looking at rule 41(2) now, which says that a minister may propose to lay upon the Table:

—any report or other paper dealing with a matter coming within the administrative responsibilities of the government, and, thereupon, the same shall be deemed for all purposes to have been laid before the House.

It seems to me that the document, which I have not seen, does not relate to the administrative responsibilities of a minister of the government. If the House gives its consent, I suppose that this can be done. Does the House agree to have these documents tabled?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) called it garbage.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MOTION RESPECTING ALLOCATION OF TIME FOR REPORT STAGE AND THIRD READING OF BILL C-57

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)) moved:

That, in relation to Bill C-57, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas, two sitting days shall be allotted to the consideration of the report stage and one sitting day shall be allotted to the third reading stage of the bill; and that 15 minutes before the expiry of the time provided for government business on the second day allotted for consideration of the report stage and on the day allotted for consideration of the third reading stage, any proceedings before the House shall be interrupted, if required, for the purpose of this order and, in turn, every question then necessary in order to dispose of the stage of the bill then under consideration shall be put forthwith and successively, without further debate or amendment.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Edmonton West.

[English]

Mr. Lambert: Madam Speaker—

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker—

Madam Speaker: The hon. President of the Privy Council.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I apologize for interrupting the hon. member, but I had the impression, and perhaps you inadvertently failed to notice, that the mover wanted to exercise his right to speak to the motion.

Madam Speaker: I am sorry, but indeed I was looking at the hon. minister. He did not rise, so the hon. member for Edmonton West sought the floor. If it is the wish of the House, I can revert to the moment when I put the motion. I could recognize the minister only if the House agrees that we revert back to that stage of our proceedings. But the reason why I did not recognize the minister is this: I did look at him because I know it is normal that the minister speak first, but he had not given any such indication at that moment. He was probably distracted; I can understand that, I do have distractions myself.

Is it the pleasure of the House that we revert to that stage of our proceedings?

Some hon. Members: No.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Edmonton West.

[English]

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Madam Speaker, I have to laugh at that little knot of people sitting behind the government House leader trying to justify the jackboot philosophy of this government. This motion represents precisely that type of thinking. The minister has yet to speak on this bill; he has yet to speak at the report stage. Why? Because the position of the government has been indefensible. It is not the government that has the right to ride roughshod over this House. This minister has the responsibility, which he has not discharged, with regard to this very complex bill. This bill represents the heart and core of the budget of last October with regard to the national energy policy and the imposition of additional taxes, yet this minister, who has inherited the job from a Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) who does not have the guts to face this House—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: He does not have the guts of a gnat.

Mr. Lambert: I will say that all the way through. We had a very shortened second reading, and I caught blazes from my colleagues on this, as did the opposition House leader, so that on the basis of the government's proposals we could hear from the public. The public did come in universally condemning the bill, and I recall all sorts of government backbenchers asking questions of a critical nature. Where are they so far? They have been conspicuous by their absence. The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Mackasey) was going to raise blazes with regard to indexation of the excise tax on liquor and the alcohol subgroup. There are other members who were going to raise hell because this measure was picking on the rural press in the province of Quebec. Where are they? They have been conspicuous by their absence. Talk about paper tigers! We have not seen such a bunch in years.

• (1520)

I have made arrangements with the minister. I told him what was happening, that we were into clause by clause consideration, and that there were two main points to consider. The first was indexing the excise tax. I do not care what formula is used, it robs the Canadian public without reference to Parliament. It is the cutest highway robbery there is. Then we would consider Part IV of the bill with regard to the petroleum and natural gas revenue tax. But along the way, I wanted to talk with various hon. members about the tax respecting university equipment, equipment designed for teaching, for flying training, and about a number of other points. After all, my colleagues on the far left have put down some amendments, and the government has put down approximately ten amendments, if not more.

Now the government has the ultimate gall to say that further deliberations at report stage shall be limited to two days and that third reading stage shall be limited to one day. They are perfidious liars, jackbooting their way through Parliament. If the government were serious about its amendments, would it not think that its ten amendments require some intelligent interpretation? Do they take it, as is customary, that because they come from the government they are divinely inspired and that the lackeys shall line up behind and support the government wordlessly, without giving matters any consideration? I know the minister will be the fall guy in this operation. The minister responsible for financial institutions has no responsibility with regard to this bill. It is a concoction of the Minister of Finance and the government House leader.

When the government House leader first came to Parliament, he joined the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization. I remember he was the one who said, "Oh, it is quite easy; the government should propose that there be a speaker from each party in the opposition, and then we vote on every proposition; that is the way business should be conducted in Parliament". Those were the comments of the present government House leader; he has not changed his philosophy one iota.

The minister, who is strictly a fall guy, does not even understand the bill. When we questioned his desire to put in an amendment, he insisted that the ways and means motion must be changed, simply because the rates were being lowered from quarterly indexing to one year. Also he insisted that there was nothing else. But surely he saw under what shell the bean had gone. The base period was being changed. I showed him ultimately where $18 million of additional revenue was being exacted by the government as a result of its change. The minister does not know his bill. Now he is being made the fall guy. What a predicament this is to me!

Will the minister tell me when he thinks the ten government amendments will be discussed? Will it be during the two remaining days? What about the opposition point of view? There were 135 amendments put forward. Considering the groupings and the duplications, my research shows that there was a potential 49 votes, with a realistic 35 votes if they went a certain way. I can tell the hon. minister, aside from one which I consider to be on division the other night, there will be 35 votes. It will take all blessed night; this is what it will take. If he thinks he can ride with jackboots, he will get jackboot answers.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's time has expired.

Time Allocation

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, this is a performance we have witnessed before; I am very disturbed that Standing Order 75C is being used again, particularly on report stage of a bill with a large number of amendments before the House which have had hardly any discussion at all. I suppose I feel as warm under the collar about this motion as the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert); and even if I speak in a somewhat lower tone of voice, I regard this action today as utterly absurd, thoroughly undemocratic and anti-parliamentary.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles: As the hon. member for Edmonton West just pointed out, at report stage there are 135 amendments. Two of them have been debated and the votes thereon deferred. One had a short debate and was defeated on division. Two more are under debate. That leaves 130 amendments which have not been touched at all. Those 130 amendments include a few government amendments. Of course, it will want to get them through, so I suppose that is why we are getting two more days on report stage as well as one at third reading.

Before this two-hour debate is over, I am sure we shall be told, as we always are in these debates, that this is not closure, it is only time allocation. I do not know how one can avoid the use of the word "closure" when the effect of the motion is to close off debate. Also we shall be told, judging by former debates, that the government is only exercising a right found in the rule book. In other words, we will be reminded that Standing Order 75C is in the book.

I remind the House that when it was passed some 12 or 13 years ago, it was passed under closure. It is hardly a rule which represents the will of the Parliament. But granted that it is there now as a rule to which the government can resort, may I also say that there is another rule in the book which gives hon. members the right to put down motions at report stage. I believe this right was established in 1968 when we did away with the old practice of having every bill go into committee of the whole, whether or not it had been sent to a standing committee. It was felt that the committee of the whole process, especially on bills which had had standing committee treatment, was taking too long and that there should be some shortening of the total process. So we established the right to make amendments at the report stage.

In view of the fact that members might put down the same amendments, and in view of the fact that some amendments might overlap others or be out of order, we provided that the Chair was to assess the amendments put down, group them where necessary, rule them out of order if she had to, and so on. But with those conditions it was established as a rule, as a right, that members could put down report stage amendments. Members of this House have done that to the tune of 135 amendments. That is their right. Madam Speaker has assessed the amendments and she has reduced the number of possible debates to something in the order of 50. It is a little difficult to assess her treatment exactly since in some cases whether there is to be a debate or a vote on another amendment depends on what happens to the first one. At any rate, something in the order of 40 or 50 amendments can be debated, and there can be that number of votes. Madam Speaker did a particularly Herculean job when she reduced the last 76 amendments to one, leaving 59 to be debated.

The Speaker did her duty with respect to the matter and yet this democratic right of the members of this House to debate these report stage amendments is just brushed aside, when we have dealt with only five of them, by the government using another rule which says that, so far as the 130 are concerned, boys and girls, forget it.

In my view, Mr. Speaker, Standing Order 75C is no way to run Parliament at all. Standing Order 75C applied to 130 other amendments which have not even been discussed is certainly about the most absurd thing I have seen in this House for a long time. I remind hon. members that these amendments relate to taxation, which is supposed to be a fairly important function of Parliament. I also remind hon. members that there seems to be a new principle in this bill which is before us which has not been around here before, namely, that of indexing taxation. This means that taxes can be increased without a reference back to Parliament itself. It is a pretty significant piece of legislation and yet here we have this proposal that the right accorded to us of a report stage debate, so that we can get at these various clauses and reject them or amend them as we may, is completely taken away.

The only thing the government sees is that the debate is lasting too long, as far as it is concerned, and so it falls back on 75C. To me, this is grossly unfair. It is wrong. It is an insult to Parliament and, as I have said on other occasions, every time the government uses this form of closure it simply puts off the day when we will have some sensible allocation of the time of the whole session and do our business in an orderly fashion instead of doing it at the whim of the government. This is not Parliament, to be dictated to in this way by the government. When the vote comes on this motion after this two-hour debate, we in this party will be voting unanimously and vigorously against it.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately, I cannot agree with the comments of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) even though he is a well-known authority in interpreting our Standing Orders. I maintain that the procedure which we are using, that is, the limitation of debate on this important bill, is justified. The bill which was referred from the committee with a great number of amendments has been discussed at length, and to plan the business of the House, it became necessary to use the provisions of Standing Order 75C to limit the debate. It might be useful to remind the House that there are two paragraphs in our Standing Orders, paragraphs 75A and 75B, which provide a means to avoid the situation in which we find ourselves when using Standing Order 75C.

The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) referred to some of the discussions which we have had. However, he knows quite well that these discussions provided no indication as to when we could have third reading of this bill. If we want to plan the business of the House, we must refer to paragraph A and try to come to an agreement to allot time. When that is not possible, we can use paragraph B, which provides for situations where one group of parliamentarians disagrees, and which allows such groups two hours after the motion is tabled to discuss it. Finally, when there is complete disagreement, we follow the procedure outlined in paragraph C, which we are now doing, because it is the responsibility of the government to plan the business of the House.

Are we justified in limiting debates on Bill C-57? Yes, we are, because this bill was studied at length in the standing committee following an agreement which was admittedly contrary to custom, since this review would normally have occurred in a committee of the whole, and every party in the House has found it useful, because of the nature and the complexity of the bill and the diversity of the subjects which it covers, to have it studied in a standing committee rather than in a committee of the whole. The standing committee took 23 sittings to review the bill. Many witnesses were heard, others who could not attend the sittings submitted briefs, and the Minister of Finance himself, contrary to the allegations of the hon. member for Edmonton West, appeared before the committee and explained the principles underlying the various provisions of the bill.

These discussions and this examination must be taken into account when we talk of limiting the debate since the work of a parliamentary committee is in a way an extension of the work of the House itself. At the report stage, during the first three days of debate, 37 members were recognized, namely 29 conservatives and eight New Democrats, and the hon. member for Edmonton West himself criticized the Liberals for not rising to speak. We did it precisely so that more views could be heard. Even if we were dealing specifically with amendments Nos. 1 and 3, the debate covered all the provisions in the legislation so that views divergent from those of the government were extensively stated during the debate on the first and third amendments.

On the fourth day spent on the consideration of motions we were only able to dispose of motions Nos. 1, 2 and 3 and as the two previous speakers pointed out, the bill contains 135 amendments. I agree with him that by grouping them the Chair has reduced their number to about 50. However, considering our rate of progress since the beginning of the report stage of the bill, we could easily be nearing the next budget and still be discussing the provisions or amendments to the bill under consideration.

Under the circumstances, the government decided to use the provisions of our Standing Orders, these well-known provisions of last resort I will admit, which could have been avoided had all the parties in the House agreed on a reasonable time limit for the debate at the report stage and in third reading. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is fair to say that this procedure is unparliamentary since it is provided for in the Standing Orders of this House. Indeed, if compliance and use of these rules are considered unparliamentary, that means that the Standing Orders themselves which govern Parliament are unparliamentary. It would be undemocratic if the official opposition had not had the opportunity to express its views on this bill. As I mentioned also, this bill has been under consideration for quite some time and not only has the official opposition been able to express its views but because of the procedure to which all parties in the House agreed, many citizens' groups were able to voice their opinion on this piece of legislation, precisely because members of this House agreed to refer this bill to a standing committee rather than to the committee of the whole.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, in the three days of debate that will follow, I will have the opportunity to explain the seven amendments proposed by the government, three of which, as members will recall, being of a purely technical nature. I will also be able to explain why indexing as used with regard to excise tax on tobacco and alcohol is justified. It is a means of taxation which is directly related to the ad valorem tax, for example, the 9 per cent tax. This tax does not come under consideration in the House every time the item or goods changes value. The revenues generated by this 9 per cent tax being directly related to the value of the item, the tax increases also. The approach used for tobacco and alcohol therefore resembles the ad valorem tax and allows the percentage of revenues derived from the excise tax on tobacco and alcohol to remain constant. As I said, Mr. Speaker, I will again have the opportunity to explain all the principles underlying the various provisions of Bill C-57 during the two-day debate at the report stage and the one day debate on third reading.

[English]

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, this is a continuation of the philosophy of the government. For example, first, the English Parliament must adopt any dog's breakfast the government sends over to them as a Constitution, and must hold its nose and pass it. Another illustration of that attitude is that we have to hold our noses and pass whatever this government brings to the House, and pass it quickly. This comes from a closure-crazed government, a government which suffers from the crime of parliamentary bestiality. It cannot wait to force these kinds of things through the House.

It is a betrayal of the parliamentary system to add to the betrayal of the people of Canada, who have been betrayed in gasoline prices. They have been betrayed in heating oil prices. They have been betrayed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). They have been betrayed by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde). Now they have been betrayed by the House leader of the government. The same little group comes in here on every closure motion. The same little group of parliamentary eunuchs, the same group of parliamentary assassins—the House leader, the assistant House leader, the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans), the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières)—are in here all the time, assassinating this House and removing the good from the House. That is why I call them the parliamentary eunuchs. The good has already been removed from them. This is how they have used closure since we came back here about 15 months ago. They have used closure on the Constitution. Then they used closure on Bill C-30, the borrowing authority bill; Standing Order 75C was used on borrowing.

Should the people of Canada require this House to discuss whether the government should borrow $14 billion? Not at all. The government wants to rush that authority through and use closure. Then the government used it again, twice, in the borrowing contained in Bill C-59. It has used closure once already on Bill C-48, which has now gone to the parliamentary committee. Then it euchred this bill through second reading in the House in only two or three hours of debate. We thought it would have a thorough and complete ventilation in the parliamentary committee and that amendments would be discussed here in plenty of time for debate on third reading and at the report stage. We have 130 amendments left and the government is giving us two days to discuss and vote on these 130 amendments. That is five minutes per amendment.

This is an illustration of what has happened to Canada. Today we have a parliamentary system of government without any checks and balances and without the separation of powers. The Prime Minister has a group of docile sheep in his caucus who keep him in power, no matter what he is doing. They just say, "Baaa, sir, baaa, sir, pass it through the House, sir". As long as they do that, he has absolute power. This Prime Minister has absolute power as long as the majority in his caucus give him that unlimited power. They are so busy with their noses in the patronage trough and the power trough that they neither know nor care what happens to this Parliament, and we can expect nothing from them.

All that we on this side of the House can do is speak. The only right we have left is to speak and to raise our voices. We are going to do that because the parliamentary bullies on the other side of the house are deafened from the snorts that come from the trough that they have their noses in. They cannot hear what is happening in this House. The parliamentary assistant from Ottawa Centre is one of the worst of them, and he is here again, doing this little piece of dirty business.

What does this bill contain? This bill contains an 8 per cent tax on petroleum and gas revenues which the Supreme Court of Alberta, on appeal, has found to be ultra vires, outside the powers of the Government of Canada. Does that stop the government from imposing closure? It does not for one minute. The government whips it through this House, even though the highest court in Alberta has ruled it to be unconstitutional and beyond the powers of this House.

Does the government hesitate to whip it through when it will affect all the fishermen in the Atlantic provinces? Where is the hon. member for Burin-St. George's (Mr. Simmons)? Where is that heroic defender of the fishermen? He will be in here like a tame tabby, voting closure. There will be a 9 per cent federal sales tax on fishing equipment in the province of Newfoundland. Hundreds of fishermen will pay more for commercial fishing equipment this year because hon. members opposite did not protect them.

Where is the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Rompkey)? He is busy imposing the personal income tax, dragooning and attaching the earnings of fishermen today in his job as Minister of National Revenue. He is not worried about defending fishermen from a 9 per cent federal sales tax that this bill will impose. Where are the hon. members on the other side who represent manufacturing districts? They will be here, ready to put the tax on the marginal manufacturers to crush them. Where are the Québécois who are so worried about the manufacturing industry in Quebec? They will be here today to do their dirty work. Yes, the Prime Minister wants to rush this bill through the House, and they will be there saying, "Oui, oui." It will not be "Non, non" from those Québécois even though it affects all the manufacturing industries in Quebec. They will not be around.

Where are the people with the grapes in their district? Where are the Liberal members from the Niagara Peninsula? They will be there saying, "Yes, yes". They do not care what happens to the grape industry as a result of the indexing of the 9 per cent federal sales tax on the price of wines, beer and liquor. They will not be here defending the grape growers and wine producers. They will be saying, blindly, "Oui, oui—yes, yes."

I have a letter in my hand. I do not have time to deal with it in this speech but I will deal with it later. It states what the government's amendment relating to beer will do. It is a letter from the Brewers Association of Canada. There is a further increase contained in the amendment which the minister moved to this bill. The letter says, in part:

> —on top of the original indexing increase, on top of the 29 per cent increase in the basic federal excise rates . . . on top of the recent change in Ontario—

And so on. It says that the working man will no longer be able to afford to have a beer. Where are the protectors of the working men in the ranks opposite? They will be here burping out, "Yes, yes, aye, aye". They will burp it out, those defenders of the beer drinkers over in the government benches.

What else is here? Where are the defenders of the universities and educational institutions? Where is the Secretary of State (Mr. Fox), who says he will now give more money for research to the universities? He will be here saying "Aye, aye", even though this bill will remove the exemption from the 9 per cent sales tax which universities have enjoyed for the last number of years when they buy equipment for research and teaching purposes. As this bill is worded, they will get very few exemptions in future. It is going to cost the universities and the post-secondary institutions millions and millions of dollars, yet the government says that it is concerned and worried about scientific research and will grant more money.

Where are the great defenders of the press? Do we see defenders of the free press on the other side of the House? All those worthy members who have small town newspapers in their constituency should be concerned because this bill contains a tax on advertising inserts in newspapers. It imposes a tax on the advertising inserts for the small weekly and monthly newspapers in the country. Surely that is an important matter. Surely it should be debated and ventilated in this House and the amendments that we have put forward should be considered.

Where are all the defenders of the people on the other side of the House? They are going to come out of their trough in a few minutes. They will hear the bell and will have to break away from whatever trough they have their noses in at the moment. They will have to come into this House and say "Oink, oink". They will have to say "Aye, aye". They will have to say "Yes" to the stampeding of Parliament, to rushing this bill through the House. They will have to say "Yes" to the gutting of Parliament. They will have to do the dirty work that the parliamentary assistants, assassins and eunuchs have asked them to do.

This is the sixth occasion so far that closure has been crammed down our throats in the House on bills of fantastic importance, such as the borrowing of something in excess of $20 billion. We have already had it once on the national gas tax legislation which is now before committee. We have had closure on the Constitution. We now have closure on this bill which is going to change the system of taxation for the cosmetic industry, which is going to change the system of taxation for the whole manufacturing industry, which is going to index taxation so that from now on taxes will automatically increase every year on beer, on alcohol and on tobacco. All that is contained in this bill, Mr. Speaker. It is an important principle: taxation without representation. That is what the people of Canada are getting from this government; they are getting taxation without representation. How can we represent the people of Canada when the government does not want the amendments that we suggested in committee to come before the House? This is an important principle. Revolutions and riots have been fought on the principle of taxation.

This is the most reprehensible incident since the Boston Tea Party. This government joined King George III, Genghis Khan and Barbarossa in the foul tactics it uses to pass taxation legislation without proper discussion or consideration.

I believe I am coming close to the end of my time as you nod in your inscrutable way, Mr. Speaker. I say to the fishermen of Newfoundland and to the Canadian people that I hope they are watching the performance today to see how the stalwart heroes they elected to form a majority government are treating them again. The government has already taxed the people 12 times. There have been 12 increases in the price of oil and gas and nine of them have been federal tax increases. There will be another tax as a result of this bill. There will also be an automatic indexing of what people pay for their beer, their glass of wine, their little drink of scotch, if they dare to have a drink of scotch. We can hardly afford scotch any longer so it may be rye or rum or something else. That is the dirty business the government is up to today. There is an 8 per cent tax on—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for recognizing me and for cutting off the bombast we have just listened to. If that is the best example of the leadership material of the Tory party, it is in great trouble.

Mr. Crosbie: Baaa, baaa!

Mr. Andre: Baaa, baaa!

Mr. Evans: The government has introduced a motion under Standing Order 75C for time allocation at this stage of the bill because there was no agreement among the parties on the limitation of time in a reasonable and responsible way that would bring this debate to a close.

Mr. Andre: We agreed on second reading and at committee stage so do not distort the truth.

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, Bill C-57 includes amendments to the Excise Act and the Excise Tax Act which date back to 1978. It also includes measures introduced in the budget brought forward in 1979 by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) who just sat down after his bombastic attack on the government. It includes measures that were brought forward in the April, 1980, financial statement and it includes measures from the October 1980, budget. Many of these measures have been before the House in one way or another for literally years.

I hope you will correct me if I am wrong, Mr. Speaker, but to my knowledge this is the first measure of supply in the form of a taxation bill that has ever been sent to a standing committee of the House.

Mr. Lambert: No.

Mr. Evans: Normally taxation bills go before the Committee of the Whole, but this bill was sent to a standing committee where representations from different groups were heard on specific issues.

Mr. Rae: What did you change?

Mr. Evans: The minister presented amendments to the committee. He went before the committee to answer questions on those amendments and on others proposed by members of the opposition.

The hon. member for Edmonton West said that the minister has not spoken on the bill in the House. He appeared before the committee and responded to the hon. member for Edmonton West for literally hours.

Mr. Lambert: Here. The amendments are here.

Mr. Evans: We now hear the total and complete misrepresentation of the facts relating to this bill by hon. members opposite with regard to indexation. They say it is a new concept. The tax on liquor and tobacco is a dollar tax, Mr. Speaker. It is in dollar terms. If the price of those products goes up, that dollar amount does not change. This proposal puts that tax on exactly the same basis as the 9 per cent federal excise tax and the sales tax levied by the provinces. It brings it to a percentage rate so that the dollar amount of the tax remains a constant percentage of the tax base.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) on a point of order.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the hon. member is misleading the House by saying that. There is a reference in the CPI annually.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. parliamentary secretary has the floor.

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, that is a total misrepresentation by the hon. member for Edmonton West. If a product costs a dollar and there is 10 cents tax on it, and then the price goes from $1 to $2 but the tax remains at 10 cents, the tax has been reduced from 10 per cent to 5 per cent. The indexation proposal would provide that the tax should go from 10 cents to 20 cents as the price of the product went from $1 to $2. This would mean that the tax would remain at 10 per cent. It is precisely the same as the manufacturers' excise tax of 9 per cent; there is no difference. The hon. member obviously needs a lesson in basic arithmetic.

Mr. Speaker, 135 amendments have been proposed. Some of them have been put forward not because they might be better or more equitable measures of taxation, but because they feather somebody's nest. That is an honest assessment of a good many of them.

There have been four days of debate at report stage of this bill. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) indicated, we have dealt with three amendments out of the 135 and two others are still under debate. That means that in four days we have essentially completed debate on four amendments. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre pointed out that if some of them were combined there would still be 40 or 50 amendments. Imagine, one day per amendment, Mr. Speaker! Are members of the House saying we should spend another 40 or 50 House days of debate on this bill, to the exclusion of all other legislation? That would be intolerable, Mr. Speaker, and the people know it. The government was elected to govern and at some point, if agreement cannot be reached through discussion, negotiation or consensus, then it has to take its responsibility and lead. That is what the government has done and I support the motion before the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1600)

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Mr. Speaker, I want to reiterate that in no way do we support this automatic indexing of taxes. Indexing of taxes is like a licence to steal. It is not a simplistic little matter of a few pennies that we are talking about. If we continue with legislation like this, it will just destroy the parliamentary system.

I want to talk about a section of the bill. I do not think the majority of Liberal members understand the bill, nor do they understand the implications of the National Energy Program. I want to refer to Clause 4 which deals with the petroleum and gas revenue energy tax. Liberals have fooled very few people about this because the message is getting out across the country. I refer to a full page advertisement which appeared in a Saturday edition of The Globe and Mail. It refers to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde). The headline reads "Do you believe this man?" In part the article reads:

> Marc Lalonde is very busy these days trying to soft-sell the national energy policy being foisted on Canada. He has an unenviable job because his NEP is one of the greatest disaster scenarios of our time.

That is why we cannot rubber stamp Bill C-57. It is tied in with a disastrous National Energy Program. Hon. members on the other side do not understand what they are doing. Many Ontario Liberals should start doing some research because they are the ones who will be walloped the hardest, much worse than Albertans will be.

I have another article in my hand. Its headline reads "Fed oil policy 'will cost us 60,000 jobs' ". What on earth is the government doing, wanting to proceed with programs such as outlined in Bill C-57 and in its National Energy Program which will cost 60,000 jobs? Yet the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is going around the country telling Canadians what a wonderful bill it is. What is wonderful about losing 60,000 jobs? This article reads, in part:

> More than 60,000 jobs may be lost by mid-summer due to the increasing number of oil and gas rigs leaving Canada, the Canadian Association of Oilwell Drilling Contractors warned yesterday.
> Stan Jones, executive director of the association, said the 50 per cent decline in the number of rigs drilling for oil and gas during the past year has surpassed their worst predictions.

And yet we have a government with a policy that wants to pay world prices for imported oil. Why does the government want to pay world prices for oil from countries such as Venezuela, Mexico and OPEC nations when it can get oil for about half the price in Canada? Phased in over a three-year period, the Canadian price will rise to about 75 per cent of the world price. Paying Canadians would make sense; all the money would stay in Canada. Why are hon. members opposite so concerned about OPEC, Mexico and Venezuela? What is it the Liberals have against Canada?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKenzie: Do they know that $500,000 an hour is leaving this country to buy imported oil? We have oil in every province in Canada.

I want to tell hon. members what this disastrous policy in Bill C-57 and in the National Energy Program is doing to my province. As a result of this 8 per cent tax in Bill C-57, all oil exploration is being closed down in the province of Manitoba, just at a time when we could have had a great economic boom. A number of new discoveries have been made in Manitoba, in the Virden area and in other parts of the province. There is no way anyone will go into oil exploration or bring in rigs when the oil is sold at $17 a barrel. It is impossible to make a profit selling oil at that price. These people have to have a proper cash flow. On the other hand, there is no concern about spending $40 or $50 a barrel on oil from some Arab country, Mexico or Venezuela. It is to heck with Manitoba; do not give that province anything.

The maritimes are being affected too by Bill C-57 and the ridiculous National Energy Program. A headline in the Chronicle-Herald for May 29, 1981, reads: "Europeans cancel out on visit to Nova Scotia." the article commences:

> British and European industrialists have cancelled a week-long, oil-related mission to Nova Scotia next month because of Ottawa's national energy policy.
> The industrialists say the policy discriminates against foreign companies and artificially forces wellhead oil prices down to unrealistic and uneconomic levels.
> The same mission has also cancelled a proposed visit to Alberta.

Here was another opportunity for more production in Canada and for working toward making the nation self-sufficient. But this government is on a program that for the next ten years will spend an additional $182 billion a year to import oil and will see us only about 55 per cent self-sufficient.

I have a document from the Wetaskiwin riding of Alberta. It is a report prepared for the Nisku Businessmen's Association. It contains statistics and names of firms that will be affected by Bill C-57 and this ridiculous National Energy Program. In Alberta, 77 industries are cutting back on any expansion and are laying people off. And I tell members from Ontario, that 55 eastern Canadian industries are named. I suggest that members on the other side get a copy of this document, and if they cannot get a copy they can contact me and I will see that one is sent to them. Companies in Alberta and in eastern Canada are listed. There are probably some companies from ridings of members opposite. Hon. members should look them over and see how their ridings are being affected.

In this excellent document on page 20 we read:

> It is an economic principle that when one section of Canada's economy is affected by some event, other areas are also directly affected. This can be seen in the cutbacks in orders to suppliers from the oil and oil related firms in the Nisku Industrial Park. The Federal Budget and NEP have caused slowdowns and loss of sales in these firms, which in turn decreases their expenditures on supplies and inventories.
>
> Through our survey we obtained a list of suppliers in Alberta and Eastern Canada who have been affected by the decrease in spending.

This means more layoffs and cutbacks. Why do we need a program like that? We certainly hope that the two energy ministers reach a conclusion tomorrow. I hope the federal minister will see the light when he meets with the Alberta energy minister tomorrow and that an agreement is reached so as to get production going in Canada. The government should get its mind off OPEC, Venezuela and Mexico. We should be concentrating on the Canadian oil industry and jobs here, never mind worrying about all these other countries and sending billions of dollars to them.

On page 22 of this report prepared for the Nisku Businessmen's Association, we read:

> As a result of cutbacks or cancellations of purchases by the 41 companies responding to our survey, $1,470,000 in revenues was lost by Eastern suppliers in the last quarter of 1980.

The article continues, but I see that my time is up. I hope Ontario members will open their eyes and for starters get hold of this document.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am an Ontario member and I have certainly had my eyes opened this afternoon. I have seen the conduct of members opposite and I have listened to their ridiculous comments. As a member who comes from the province of Ontario, I have no hesitation or compunction in supporting Bill C-57; nor do I have any hesitation or compunction in supporting this motion to allocate time for further stages of debate and third reading.

As pointed out by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), we have used this quite legitimate device to end debate, a device called for in the rules of the House of Commons, a number of times this session. I think the public of Canada wants an efficient government and they want an efficient Parliament. They do not want to see an opposition, which has had its full opportunities to make its views known on a particular measure, continue debate and essentially prevent the government from getting on with the affairs of governing the nation.

Some members opposite have talked about closure. We are not talking about closure this afternoon, we are talking about time allocation. The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) when he was House leader in 1979 used this very rule on Bill C-20, the mortgage tax bill. He referred to it as a fair and gentle measure. Any responsible government that wants to get its legislation program through in the face of hostility and filibustering on the part of the opposition must have some means at its disposal to get on with legislation and the governing of the nation. That is what we are engaged in this afternoon.

• (1610)

Time allocation is a legitimate rule. It is used at Westminster. In fact, I was just reading some of the debate which took place previously during this session on this very point. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has made a couple of good speeches on the matter, one of which I think was on January 13 of this year. He made eminent sense when he said—I am paraphrasing him so I hope I am not too inaccurate—he would like to sit down with the government at the beginning of each session and map out a parliamentary timetable. The government wants to change the rules of the House of Commons to make it more efficient, but there is no way we can get our friends on the Conservative benches to ever come to some agreement so we can have organization of the business of this nation.

An hon. Member: You have no friends over here.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Collenette: I have a few friends over there.

An hon. Member: No, you haven't.

Mr. Collenette: Obviously the hon. member does not know his colleagues. That is another example of the wild generalizations we get from the other side. They make allegations unsubstantiated by fact.

In any event, on the whole question of parliamentary reform, I am sure the government would welcome means by which we could legitimately organize the legislative time in the House of Commons as is done in Great Britain, where second reading debates very rarely go beyond two days, with some routine bills being sent to a second reading committee. I am sure the government would be amenable to discussions, but certainly with the attitude we have had expressed by the Conservative party in the official opposition, that will be difficult. Members of the official opposition really want to complain at every turn and are not interested in seeing that this country is governed properly or that good legislation comes forward. So what can we do but use the legitimate rules at our disposal?

The House leader of the official opposition, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), was quoted in a CP wire story yesterday, when talking in terms of the proposed foreign affairs debate—I am sure you will remember this during question period yesterday, Mr. Speaker—as saying that there seems to be a two-day debate on foreign affairs anyway and the Conservatives would rather spend their opposition days debating economic problems. So here we have it with the official opposition wanting an economic debate, yet what are they going to do this coming Thursday when they have an opportunity through an opposition motion to debate economic issues? That party will be bringing forward a mischievous motion dealing with capital punishment, a motion that is going to embarrass their leader and party members more than it will embarrass anybody on this side of the House. This is a party that wants to talk about economic issues, but when it has the opportunity to do so it does not.

I think we are quite justified in using 75C on this bill because the official opposition has shown in the days this bill was under discussion in the House that hon. members opposite are not really interested in talking about the 135 motions on the order paper. What did we have? For two straight days we had a whole litany of grievances and allegations against the government. We did not have a good, specific debate on the amendments before us. Without being too gratuitous, Mr. Speaker, it was you and your colleagues in the Speaker's chair who rightly called the debate to order and said: "Just a minute, this is the report stage debate on certain amendments and remarks must be directed to those amendments". That is called for in our rules and it is backed up by precedents in Erskine May's and Beauchesne's. We have an official opposition that really is not interested in discussing specifics.

This afternoon the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) did not really talk about the specific amendments. Did he talk about specific clauses during the debate in the House? Perhaps he has not participated in the debate, but all the interventions he has made on general economic subjects, whether during opposition days or during question period, have been very short on specifics but very long on innuendo, throwing charges across the floor and making political gain. He and his colleagues are not interested in a legitimate economic debate.

We have before us an official opposition that does not really know what it wants from this Parliament. It is an opposition that has not really decided its own position on many economic questions facing our time, whether they be energy or taxation questions. We have heard two, three or four different versions of party policy. Each time a member makes a speech it seems he says things which are at odds with official opposition party policy. We have seen this during the question period and we have seen it during this debate. The official opposition falls back to making generalized, second reading type speeches at report stage, forcing the Speaker to direct hon. members on that side to speak specifically to the clauses of the bill.

I hope at some point in the next year we can discuss parliamentary reform and, as has been suggested by members on both sides of the House, organize our parliamentary timetable so we can have meaningful debate and this place can become efficient. Until that time and until we streamline Parliament—and we must streamline Parliament or become increasingly irrelevant to the Canadian public—the government has every right and obligation, and would really not be discharging its duty otherwise, to use the legitimate rules in the Standing Orders of the House of Commons to move debate forward.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, in listening to the comments by members on the other side, I think you should perhaps question whether they are really interested in talking about economic matters, whether they are really interested in legislation going through, or whether the official opposition understands its role in Parliament, which is to criticize and propose alternatives, but not to filibuster and prolong debate, and not to force governments into using these rules.

We would like to deal with the business of the House in a more co-operative and conciliatory manner. I think we have shown during the whole debate on the Constitution how parties can come together when there is a real desire. I implore members of the official opposition to stop this continual barracking, this continual blocking of Parliament, and to work with the government in trying to address the affairs of Canada in order to improve economic policy in this country; and, yes, to criticize where justified rather than continually criticizing and blocking every legitimate attempt to try to give good government to this country.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): As hon. members know, Mr. Speaker, we are under a very strict time limit here with a closure motion involving, in effect, a two-hour debate and members having to contribute what they have to contribute in a period of ten minutes. We will then have the vote. Therefore, it is not really possible for members to reply to all points or really to discuss all the matters for debate in Bill C-57, when debate is being cut off at the pass.

I am not going to get into a personality debate here, but I have sat and listened to the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Evans), and to the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Collenette) particularly, speak so piously about the business of the House, suggesting we should reform procedures and adopt rules that will make this business of Parliament efficient so the Canadian public will get its dollars' worth. Yet the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council did not have the guts to say, as he knows full well, that he as the parliamentary secretary having something to do with the order of the business of this House, has not yet even structured the Committee on Procedure and Organization to review the archaic procedures of this House and decide what rules should be changed. He has an incredulous look on his face. We have not yet structured a basic committee. I have been waiting since this Parliament was convened to see changes in some of the rules in this House. There have not even been meetings, and the hon. member talks about reform of the House!

● (1620)

I have been here along enough to know that, regardless of what rules there are in the rule book, without good faith and respect among members of Parliament on both sides, being human as we are, hon. members can pervert or prostitute any rule. There must be good faith and respect. We cannot build good faith with misleading statements. Perhaps the statements to which I refer were not deliberately intended to mislead the audience which looks into this chamber from time to time and tries to figure out what goes on. There is a duty on officials of this House, and on parliamentary secretaries especially, to make sure that when they speak, they state the truth. They should not keep talking inside out when they talk about the truth. The Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council talks about this opposition not being concerned about the business of this country.

Mr. Collenette: That is true.

Mr. Nowlan: Did the hon. member read the motion put forward by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) yesterday? That motion was seconded by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), my House leader, and it reads as follows:

That this House condemns the government for again unnecessarily raising petroleum taxes and thereby burdening all consumers, but particularly consumers of heating oil, with prices far in excess of those promised without providing relief to those hardest hit and least able to adjust.

What did we do with that motion yesterday? We debated it all day, as the parliamentary secretary knows. But then he did a very dishonest thing. He told the truth inside out, and that is what gets my Irish dander up. Hon. members talk about a filibuster. We are not arguing about the rules of the House just now. There is a motion allocating time, but the government in effect is using the bludgeon of closure, and that determines the atmosphere and the level of respect in this institution.

In the few minutes I have left, and without getting into the guts of this bill, I will come to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance, who was not quite so extreme with his misinformation. However, how can the opposition be blamed for the incompetence of the government House leader in arranging government business? Hon. members opposite cannot have it both ways. They have brought forward an omnibus bill to which there are 135 amendments. If we reduce it to a structure on which the House can vote, there are, in effect, 35 amendments. It will take eight hours if we vote on all of them, and we certainly could. Hon. members opposite cannot have it both ways. Either they have a bill or they have several bills.

I agree with the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance that Bill C-57 is fantastic in scope. It is one of the two legs of the whole National Energy Program, considering the excise taxes which are involved. The government should be precise with its bills. If it was precise, this House could have definable debates on specific issues. We could have votes without getting into crazy, self-serving, Catch-22 situations in which the government blames us for protesting when it brings in closure.

Let us talk about closure. This bill is fundamentally a tax bill. To the radio audience, the television audience and the public taxpayer, this bill establishes a precedent. I do not want to get into an argument with the hon. member for Ottawa Centre, but this bill establishes a precedent. If we index excise taxes to the cost of living, the amount compounds and keeps increasing as the cost of living increases. The government has an interest in seeing the cost of living go up because taxes will then go up. If we index excise taxes, why not index the personal income tax? We have indexing at the bottom end to help those caught in the inflationary squeeze. They can deduct the index factor from their taxes. Shall we apply this principle at the top? If we have this principle for the excise tax, should it be applied to the income tax or the corporate tax?

Many years ago the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) uttered the sentiment that members of Parliament are nobodies. Perhaps that sentiment will be borne out. Through modern technology tax increases might be directly defined by the cost of living, and members of Parliament and 23 million or 24 million Canadians—whatever number is determined after the census—can all sit in their homes and push little computer buttons so that the House of Commons will not even have to meet.

You know the history, Mr. Speaker. I am afraid some of our parliamentary secretaries do not know the history of Parliament. The purpose of Parliament is to control the public purse. That is the reason the first Parliament met 1,000 years ago, but that matter could involve a whole speech.

Let me deal with the alleged filibuster about which the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council speaks. No one has yet mentioned that this whole matter was referred to a committee because of an agreement among members of this House. On Thursday, February 12, there was an order of the House that on Friday, February 13, 1981, all questions respecting the second reading stage would be put at the end of the day and the matter referred directly to the committee. At second reading of a bill there is usually an opportunity for hon. members to ventilate some of the principles of the bill. That right in this case was removed by agreement. The agreement was made on the expectation that the bill would go to committee and that important people would come before the committee, as they did, to submit their briefs. That was done and most of the briefs expressed protest. Out of that committee came 135 amendments. Now we do not have a chance to have a real debate at this stage. That opportunity is being taken away from us.

It will be a month of Sundays or perhaps four years down the road before I will again agree to such a proposition, because we were hoodwinked. What has been demonstrated today by the government House leader is a type of parliamentary larceny. We spent one day at second reading. Perhaps we were too amenable when we entered into the agreement. This important bill went to committee. The government was urging us to get on with it, but the committee was not called until March 19. It was referred at second reading on February 13. The committee was not called until March 19 and, under the terms of the House order, the committee reported on April 16. The last committee hearing was on April 14. There were committee hearings in that month. However, if this is such an urgent, high priority item and the subject of closure today, why did the government wait since April 14, the date of the last sitting of the committee, until this stage?

We all know that at this report stage we have debated the bill on May 26, May 28, June 2 and June 4. There have been four days of debate at the report stage. We can consider a day to be four hours, or stretch it to five hours. We have had either 16 hours or 20 hours of debate at this stage.

We are talking about a tax bill which contains one of the fundamental cornerstones of the National Energy Program. We are also talking about closure. I find it absolutely incredible that on the day before the government tries to settle the energy tax problem it imposes closure on a tax bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak in this debate. I say to the hon. member who preceded me that the reason the committee which I have the honour to chair did not meet for that period of time is that we were embarking on new ground, and the people who wanted to make representations indicated to us that they wanted more time so that they could submit better and proper briefs. That was agreed to by the members of the steering committee, and I think the members who served on that committee will agree. We heard some 25 witnesses. I cannot remember the number of briefs which were presented to members of the committee. The matter was aired fully at that stage.

An hon. Member: Democracy in action.

Mr. Cullen: I heard the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) indicate—and I wish he had led his party in this particular way—that his party was specifically concerned about two items and part IV of the bill. If hon. members opposite had concentrated on that, I think we could have had a full, honest, serious and constructive debate on that particular subject. The House would have had an excellent debate limited to areas which are very important.

• (1630)

But what do we have? We have the opposition coming down with something in excess of 100 amendments to this bill. And I suggest, with respect, even breaking it down into 30 or 38 votes, whatever it is, that this is going to dilute the power of the debate rather than making it stronger. So if there is an abuse here, Mr. Speaker, it is the abuse of overdoing the amendments to make a point. I am not sure what all the reasons were, but it dilutes the debate. People are confused when they look at all the amendments and wonder why they are there, why they are being grouped together and why two members propose the same amendment. Why was there not agreement among the opposition? If they had things they wanted to concentrate on, why did we not hear from them on those particular subjects and not have all these amendments to the bill?

Now, Mr. Speaker, one area where I do agree with the previous speaker is that the House, in the final analysis, will only operate by agreement on all sides. The House leader and I suspect his parliamentary secretary, the House leaders of the opposition and the NDP, got together in all probability and tried to work out some method whereby we could have a full debate on this subject, where we could use Standing Order 75A and have a time allocation that all parties could agree to. But that did not take place, so 75A could not be used. Obviously Standing Order 75B could not be used because we had to go through that particular procedure in order to get to Standing Order 75C.

Mr. Speaker, 75C is a legitimate rule of Parliament and is meant to be used. And I say, with respect, that there is failure on all sides when we cannot reach agreement. But surely there comes a time when the government has to take its responsibility and move under rule 75C in order to get the business of the House through.

Now, Mr. Speaker, maybe it was not prophetic but some 11 or 12 years ago, in July of 1969, an article in the Sarnia Observer entitled "Weaker by the Week" said this:

> The real threat to Parliament isn't the possible danger of cutting off productive and informative debate on a measure, but the steady erosion of prestige by tiresome speeches, lack of decorum, obstructionism and poor attendance in the House. The House of Commons is it own worst enemy and every time it aids its own weaknesses it chips away a little more of its own fabric.

The tragedy of the House of Commons, and why the press and people in the gallery leave this place, is that we bore them with long and tiresome speeches. We do not give them constructive and solid debate so that they can see there are two or three sides to an issue. With 130-odd amendments there is no question; we bore ourselves to death. So if we are doing that to ourselves, what must we be doing to the people out there? It seems to me that that editorial was bang on. When we chip away in this way, we chip away at Parliament itself.

I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, that this kind of procedure will result in the same thing that I see happening to rule 43. When I first came here some 13 years ago, rule 43 was not used the way it is today. When you rose on a matter of pressing and urgent necessity, it in fact was just that.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I hate to interrupt my friend, but I am sure he will understand that, having a long history in the House of Commons, it is highly improper to question the judgment and decisions of the Speaker, which is precisely what he is doing now in saying that motions under Standing Order 43 are being improperly put. It is clear to me, Mr. Speaker, that that is a clear attack on Madam Speaker, who has the role of adjudicating—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member has raised a point which I believe should not be resolved at this time. The hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton has the floor.

Mr. Cullen: I always appreciate the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) interjecting. At least I know he is paying attention to what I have to say. Unfortunately, in many of the debates in this House we actually tune ourselves out, so it is nice to know that my friend was at least listening. I was certainly not being critical of the Chair because the Chair on many occasions rises to say that a certain motion is not a proper motion under Standing Order 43. I am saying that, in my view, members of Parliament are ruining that particular rule by trying to use it to fill up the time that is available.

Another area is questions on the Order Paper. I think here again there is an abuse by members, where we have some members putting 120 questions on the Order Paper.

An hon. Member: Speak to the motion.

Mr. Cullen: I am commenting on the fact that we are using a rule here. But when we abuse the rules, then we chip away at Parliament and what it was meant to do. I think questions on the Order Paper is a good case in point, Mr. Speaker.

I was surprised to hear my friend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) suggest that what we are doing is undemocratic. Here is the man who is probably the greatest and most renowned expert on the rules of this House recognizing that we are moving quite legitimately under 75C. I say, with respect, that it is probably a more legitimate move than the kind of filibuster we have heard from the other side, yet we recognize that filibusters are a legitimate parliamentary tool, if you will, to halt legislation, slow it down or filibuster one bill so that you are unable to get on to the next one. However, when the government, in the interest of moving legislation forward, uses a rule passed by this Parliament, I say that is democratic. I think we are operating properly and I commend the government for taking this action on this particular bill, given the fact it could not reach an agreement with the opposition parties and we have this filibuster of in excess of 100 amendments moved by opposition members.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MOTION RESPECTING ALLOCATION OF TIME FOR REPORT STAGE AND THIRD READING OF BILL C-57

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Bussières:

That in relation to Bill C-57, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas, two additional sitting days shall be allotted to the report stage and one additional day shall be allotted to the third reading stage of the bill; and that at fifteen minutes before the expiry of the time provided for government business on the second day allotted to the report stage and on the day allotted to the third reading stage of the bill, any proceedings before the House shall be interrupted if required, for the purpose of this order, and, in turn, every question then necessary in order to dispose of the stage then under study shall be put forthwith and successively, without further debate or amendment.

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen) put his finger on the problem when he said there was no agreement among the parties to restrict debate. Why was there no agreement? I will tell the hon. member and the minister why. It is because there was no move from the government on any one of a number of areas discussed in committee where we had evidence from people affected by the tax changes proposed, and we have not had one single move of substance from the government with respect to the amendments.

Mr. Peterson: That is nonsense.

Mr. Rae: The hon. member for Willowdale (Mr. Peterson), who speaks more often from his seat than anywhere else, says that is nonsense. I say to him it is not, because if you look at the areas of substance, on indexation they shifted from quarterly to annual. Big deal! And the fact that they changed the base date means the increase is going to be even more substantial.

However, look at the other proposals that have been put forward, such as the suggestion by my colleague the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis) that we give compensation to small businessmen who perform a valuable service for the government with respect to collection of taxes. The government has refused even to discuss that. When it comes to the simple, fundamental distinction between an original print and a mechanical reproduction, the government persists in the point of view that says there is no distinction. So we are going to start taxing artists who up until now have not been taxed. The government has refused to engage in a discussion about this and it is simply the point of view of civil servants that the minister has passively adopted this proposal without ever questioning whether or not that is the position that should be taken. Then he carries that to its logical extension by saying: "We do not have to change, we do not fear what the artistic community thinks, because when election time comes around we will come up with some goodies for them which will outdo all the things we have done during our government".

Then there is the problem of taxation of small community newspapers where the government has shifted scarcely at all.

An hon. Member: That is not true at all.

Mr. Rae: On the question of advertising supplements the government has not moved. On the question of a definition of a newspaper the government has changed the tax by 5 per cent. That is the sum total of the government's move.

● (1640)

On the question of tax exemptions for the handicapped, again the government refused to move. On an exemption for prosthetic and other devices, the government has failed to move. On marginal manufacturing, the government has failed to move. On the concerns expressed by universities with respect to instruments used for scientific research, the government has failed to move. These are all the areas in which the government has failed to move to any degree or in any manner of significance.

The hon. member for Sarnia is the chairman of the finance committee. I have a considerable amount of respect for the way in which he has handled that committee. He said that there was no agreement to restrict time. Of course there was no agreement to restrict time. The reason was because the government acted in bad faith. The government restricted debate by an agreement on second reading to send this matter to committee, but on the assumption that it would be discussed in committee and that the reasonable proposals put forward would be considered favourably by the government.

The actions of the government have run completely counter to that. I am not asking the government to abandon its points of principle. We have seen many people who have genuine complaints and problems. The government simply dismisses them by saying, "This is a special interest group". The attitude expressed by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. Evans) is typical of the hard, bureaucratic attitude of the department. The only amendments which are coming up here are from people who have nests to feather. That is the attitude of the hon. member for Ottawa Centre toward the average Canadian taxpayer—it is just somebody who has a special beef. I think it is a disgraceful attitude for someone in politics. He should be sensitive to the concerns and the realities of business.

Mr. Evans: I said "some".

Mr. Rae: No, you did not. You said "most". We will look at what you said.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member should address his remarks to the Chair.

Mr. Rae: I know perfectly well what the hon. member said. That would have been bad enough, were it not for the final straw. Tomorrow the government will enter into discussions with the government of Alberta with respect to the national energy policy, trying to get an agreement on the questions of oil pricing and revenue sharing, and with respect to the position of the federal government vis-à-vis taxation. I find it extraordinary that, on the eve of this discussion and the discussions with Saskatchewan and British Columbia which will follow, the Liberal government would invoke closure on the petroleum and gas revenue tax.

The federal government is enacting a form of taxation which amounts to a royalty. Whether or not one agrees, one could hardly argue that it is not a direct invasion of a field of taxation which up until now has been the exclusive reserve of the provinces.

Mr. Peterson: What law school did you go to—"exclusive reserve"?

Mr. Rae: The government said that it is entering into these discussions in good faith and with some flexibility. The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) said in committee that everything is negotiable and that they were prepared to negotiate as long as Alberta was prepared to negotiate. If the federal government is prepared to negotiate, why is it insisting that Parliament pass a bill by Friday which it will have to amend, if the government is in fact to reach an agreement with the province of Alberta this month or next month?

The only conclusion we can draw from the government's determination to ram through the bill is that it is not really interested in being flexible and in reaching an agreement. This is the fundamental contradiction in the position of the government. It is not simply that members of the government are not prepared to listen to those people who have come to them in good faith; they dismiss them all as special pleaders or special interest groups. It does not matter from where they come or about what they talk; they just have their nests to feather. Those are the words of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance. When it comes to a question which strikes at the very heart of the economics of confederation and the fiscal relationship between the federal government and the provinces, the government says it is prepared to be flexible. Yet on the very eve of negotiations, it insists upon forcing through this bill. Those are the two fundamental contradictions in what the government is doing.

The reason the government is closing off debate is that it is afraid to listen to the concerns of Canadians with respect to the effect of this piece of legislation. The government is afraid to enter into negotiations when it must be flexible and demonstrate its good faith. That is why the government is forcing through this legislation. It is for that reason and no other.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I think it would be appropriate to refer again very briefly to the provisions of Standing Orders 75A, 75B and 75C to understand what is going on now from a procedural point of view. Many members have pointed out that there were abuses of the Standing Orders in several instances; I would not want to dwell on it, everybody agrees. However, perhaps there is one Standing Order which is not unduly abused, and I refer to Standing Order 75A which provides for consultations among the representatives of each party, and for agreement to set the length of a debate on a specific bill. And if there is something which is regrettable at this time in a debate of this nature it is indeed the bad use or the non-use made of Standing Order 75A. It is available to Parliament and it was put there so that this institution can have full debates but also make a minimum of progress.

Now then, we must admit that what has happened in this instance is that a great number of days have already been allotted to the debate on Bill C-57. It is a bill to amend the Excise Act; it has to do with taxes or a form of levy which results from the budget. Everybody knows that when the budget was read in the House last fall, it was followed by a six-day debate during which we dealt with most of the questions that are the subject matter of the bill under study. To begin with, therefore, it can be said that many members had an opportunity to comment on this bill during the budget debate which lasted six days. If we add to those six days the second reading stage, when it was agreed to refer the bill to a standing committee rather than to a committee of the whole, with that day required for second reading we have a total of seven days. Then there was the important committee stage where the clause by clause study took up another seven days. Those seven days are added to the seven others I have just mentioned so that we have had 14 days of debate on this one and only piece of legislation, Bill C-57. Let us add to those 14 days—and this is nothing more than a fact—the four days we have used up so far at the report stage and we get 18 days all told. On top of those 18 days, there will be three more which we are prepared to set aside under the terms of the motion which will be voted on later today—because the debate will not end in a few minutes, after the vote on the motion of the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières)—therefore three more days of debate on this bill plus the other 18 make a total of 21 days of debate on one single bill, not to mention the rest of the day today which will be fully allotted to the study of Bill C-57, that is this evening from 8 p.m. to 10.30 p.m. So we are indeed at 21 and a half days, that is more than 21 days of debate on one single bill. I have therefore no difficulty justifying the use of Standing Order 75C whose provisions enable the government to limit the debate when the parliamentary leaders or the party representatives fail to reach an agreement. So, to get back to the point I raised at the beginning of my remarks—

[English]

I insist this is not a misuse or non-use of Standing Order 75A. We should take more opportunities to apply Standing Order 75A in order to allow more bills to be debated in the House. On the one hand I recognized the necessity of having a full and complete debate. I just summarized in French that over 21 days will have been allowed for discussion of this bill in the House of Commons.

• (1650)

On the other hand, I think it would be fair and reasonable that sometimes representatives of each party come to an agreement under 75A to limit the period of time for the conclusion of debate on a specific issue. To my knowledge, this has not happened often in the past. In fact, I do not believe it has ever happened, since I became a member of Parliament in 1974, that representatives of parties in this House have come to an agreement under 75A. With the very heavy agenda which we face, I think it is about time that representatives of the parties consider this tool which is available to us, in the Standing Orders so that we can complete some business in this Parliament and can ask for the respect of the population of Canada.

Mr. Knowles: We did it on "O Canada".

Mr. Pinard: Yes, that is the only time that we did it. That was an important time. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) reminds me that we did this with regard to "O Canada". I remember that occasion. We had no other choice but to do that, and we did it. We should repeat the experience; it was a useful one for this country. Why not repeat it?

May I remind you, Mr. Speaker, that on the Order Paper at this time there are still at least 35 items of legislation which must be dealt with. From now until the end of June, when this House normally breaks for the summer recess, there are only 12 government days left, including today. The rest of the days until that time are allotted to the opposition. Since we have returned from the Easter recess not one bill has been adopted by this House—not a single bill. Only the second reading stage of one bill was adopted in this House, which was the young offenders bill, after two or three days of debate. We have tried to bring forward pieces of legislation on Friday afternoons, when it is normally easier to get legislation through. We have tried to pass non-controversial legislation, yet nothing has been adopted. The opposition has seen fit to delay, to obstruct and to prevent the government from even adopting the second reading stage of bills, except for the young offenders legislation. What I am saying today, Mr. Speaker, is that the opposition should not complain too much about this government sometimes trying to place reasonable time limits on debate on some pieces of legislation.

I think the opposition also has a role to play in this House, a role to collaborate, to allow this Parliament to work. But it is not assuming its role properly. I cannot accept those who are saying that we are trying to force legislation through this institution, taking this bill as an example. On the contrary, this bill will have received more than 21 days of debate either in this House or in committee. This is only one of many bills resulting from the budget. We have tried to come to an agreement as to a reasonable additional length of time, but without success because the opposition is stunned and does not want this House to work.

We have no other choice, if we want to be responsible, but to use a means which is legally at our disposal, a means which is a Standing Order in existence in our Standing Orders under 75C. We cannot use 75C, which is limitation of time for debate, unless we have tried and unless we have given the opposition a chance to make its proposal as to an additional reasonable length of time. They have refused to negotiate properly. They have refused to agree to a reasonable length of time, which is why we have no other choice but to propose the three additional days about which I have been speaking.

[Translation]

Under these circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I suggest this responsible government would be remiss if it allowed the opposition to keep on abusing the time of the House. As I said, I regret that since the Easter recess, the House has been unable to adopt a single piece of legislation. All the opposition would permit the House to do, after two days of a painful and arduous debate, was to give second reading to the bill dealing with—

[English]

Mr. Wright: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I have been listening to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) and I was wondering if he can answer why—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. If the hon. member wishes to interrupt the hon. minister to ask his permission to put a question, we should ask him if he is prepared to answer a question.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Gladly, but only after I am finished with my remarks. Since the time allotted to me is about to expire, I will conclude my remarks. Afterwards, if the hon. member wants to ask me a question, I will answer him gladly. As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that the House has been unable to pass a single piece of legislation since the Easter recess, and the government has never intervened up to now to limit any debate. We have had to wait until today, and I feel the opposition is ill-advised to criticize us and deplore this situation. On the contrary, we have every reason to blame them for their irresponsibility, their lack of co-operation and their tendency to filibuster, which is due evidence of their weakness, Mr. Speaker. It seems to me that if they had anything to contribute to a debate, they would come to an agreement and allow debates on several items instead of unduly wasting the time of the House on a single one, thus creating an impression of inefficiency which affects each and every member of this House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please! I regret to interrupt the hon. minister. The hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) has the floor.

[English]

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, the government House leader is again playing fast and loose with the truth and with facts. He talks about a 21-day debate on this bill knowing that is an absolute absurdity. He says that there was a six-day budget debate on this bill. It was not, it was on the budget, the projections with regard to unemployment, to inflation, to future growth and energy pricing.

Mr. Evans: Nonsense!

Mr. Andre: Only partially, and in a very minor way, was it on Bill C-57 in terms of detail. He says that the bill was seven days in committee. He knows full well that committee sessions last an hour and a half each. There were seven separate committee meetings with regard to this legislation, which is a long way from seven days of debate. It is absurd to say that there have been 21 days of debate on this bill.

The minister says there has been no agreement. He asks why we could not negotiate. He neglected to mention that there was agreement for a limited second reading debate on this bill and agreement that the committee would return it in two weeks—another form of closure. He is playing fast and loose with the truth again. He talks about using a legitimate rule, Standing Order 75C. Standing Order 75C was brought in by closure. It will never be legitimate. Anything brought in by closure is not legitimate.

Mr. Evans: It is legal.

Mr. Andre: It may be legal and perhaps the hon. member, like his leader, believes that anything legal is legitimate and that anything legal is moral. But it is not legitimate.

Mr. Evans: Why did your House leader use it?

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, the fact of the matter is we are not a parliamentary democracy here in any real sense of the word. What we have here is a five-year dictatorship.

As the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) pointed out, a number of very valid and legitimate recommendations by way of amendments to this bill were brought forward at committee stage. There was no movement from the government on those points. It seems to me that the rule is that once something comes out of cabinet then that is it. Once bureaucrats have placed something on the cabinet table and once cabinet has said that is it, Parliament has no right to expect any changes. It is as if we have no right to expect any modifications. We are not here to legislate, we are here to rubber stamp what the geniuses in the Privy Council office have put forward. That is our role.

The one power which we have had is the power to give speeches and try to affect public opinion, to perhaps influence public opinion in such a way that the bureaucrats will hear about it and suggest changes to the ministers in order that we might see some changes. But even that seems to be too much for this government, which suggests that it is intolerable to have members of Parliament giving speeches here trying to influence the public. The government suggests that we must have efficiency, and what efficiency means is to get in line with the rest of the sheep and rubber stamp everything which comes out of the cabinet. Parliamentary reform coming from any member of this government means to eliminate the minuscule power which we now have to give speeches in the House.

It used to be that if a minister acted arrogantly, would not negotiate, or lacked concern about representations from the opposition, you could hold up supply by holding up the estimates. That was the traditional power of Parliaments; but that was done away by closure, by the Trudeau administration.

● (1700)

The basic view of this group is that, once the election is over, the seats are counted and the leader of the party with the most seats selects his cabinet, that is the end of the matter. Members of Parliament have no authority, no power and no ability to legislate in a way which is in keeping with the traditions of a parliamentary system. Indeed, it is perhaps embarrassing to have to admit it, but I wonder what the heck we are doing here. It perhaps says something about our collective intelligence that we are even here, because we are not legislators and we cannot do anything.

The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) says he wants to negotiate, that he wants to work things out. If that is the case, why not let committees set their own references? Why not, in fact, have ministers negotiate with the House and let us participate in the legislative process? If there is insistence upon the finality of a cabinet decision, and that the ultimate end of any process must be a rubber stamping of what comes from cabinet, then the government has relegated us to a position where our only role is to make speeches and try to influence public opinion. But the government wants to cut that off, too. Incidentally, that is why the premiers and the provinces are as strong as they are. The people know that we cannot do anything to influence government and that we cannot be a check. Therefore, they look to the provincial governments to be a check. If hon. members are interested in making this country work, they should make this Parliament work. Then this country would work.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andre: The hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood accurately pointed out the absurdity of talking about flexibility in energy policy negotiations while imposing the PGRT through closure. The petroleum and gas revenue tax has been responsible for the loss of 50,000 jobs. These are jobs in Weyburn, Saskatchewan, Brooks, Alberta, and St. John's. They are not jobs in Windsor so maybe they do not count. However, people have been put out of work. Have we had any real discussion of the PGRT here? No. It just affects western Canadians and they do not matter. The loss of 50,000 jobs does not matter.

The excise tax on natural gas has been ruled to be ultra vires by the appellate court of the province of Alberta. We are being asked to vote, through closure, on provisions which have been declared illegal by a superior court of this land. The Supreme Court will be hearing the appeal of the federal government on June 16, I understand. It may change the decision and it may not. However, as matters now stand, the provisions of Bill C-57 are illegal, and yet, through closure, we will be forced to divide on that issue and on those questions. How arrogant and how absurd—

Mr. Malone: Despicable.

Mr. Andre: —it is to have that kind of behaviour! One wonders why the national government is held in such contempt by the thousands of people who are attending separatist meetings in western Canada, for example. One wonders why the opposition, in anger, shouts out in this House, delays legislation and so on. This is done in frustration over our inability to perform what we were elected to do, namely, to legislate and to help govern this country. However, that is not the way things are run under this regime. The wisdom comes from the cabinet table and the Privy Council office. Once it arises from that sophisticated process in the Privy Council, and the cabinet decides, that is the end of the matter. We who are nobodies in this institution should know better than to try to hope for change and attempt to negotiate change. If we try to talk too long to influence public opinion, the government will use closure to cut us off.

It has been called the five-year dictatorship, and that is what it is. However, in our society, one can only get away with that kind of behaviour for so long. Unless that is recognized soon and some real parliamentary reform changes are brought in to give Parliament some authority, when this group eventually departs it will leave a legacy of a greatly weakened country, weakened national government and weakened institution. If they are honest, they will be able to tell their children and grandchildren that they contributed to the demise of a strong central government in this country. Because that will be the exact consequence of this kind of irresponsible behaviour on the part of the government.

In conclusion, I would simply like to say that what the government has done by this action is to guarantee that a National Energy Program reached by agreement with the negotiating provinces will be that much further delayed. More Canadian money, equipment and people will leave the country, and our likelihood of achieving self-sufficiency will be that much more remote.

[Translation]

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, today and last week, I listened with a lot of interest to the comments and interventions of members of the opposition from the New Democratic Party, and I would like to recall a few of them because it is very important for the House to understand the problems that they see in our bill. I shall start with the intervention of the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans). He said:

> For some time, the government has had a tendency to introduce legislation which would allow it to benefit directly from inflation.

He was talking about the indexing of taxes on alcoholic beverages. However, Mr. Speaker, he completely forgot what we are doing to help individual Canadians. We have indexed personal income tax to make it more equitable and have an income tax system under which all Canadians are treated fairly. The hon. member said nothing about this.

I shall now refer to the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby). He told us that we have a problem because we need money, and he said the following:

> —I have sympathy . . . for the philosophy espoused by Premier Lougheed in Halifax, Nova Scotia, the other night . . . The government is not willing to let the economy take its course, and transmit wealth.

And in his speech, he disagreed completely with what we are now doing to share revenue in Canada.

[English]

I now turn to what the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) was just saying. He mentioned that this government will be criticized for having done nothing to help create a strong central government. This is fundamental to what we are attempting to do at this time. We are attempting to reduce the deficit in a measured and even way. We have undertaken measures by which we will begin to bring about a more reasonable sharing of revenues and a more reasonable sharing of equalization throughout all of Canada.

One of the major problems we face deals directly with revenue. The present equalization formula makes no mention of the revenues derived from natural resources; it mentions them only to the extent of 50 per cent. Resource revenues are included in our equalization formula only to the extent of half.

Mr. Rae: It was John Turner's idea.

Mr. Peterson: Only one third of the revenue from any one province can be taken from resources. That is creating an incredible imbalance in our country. This is one of the major problems we are trying to address in order to attain—

Mr. Rae: Who devised the formula? I thought you guys were in power then.

Mr. Peterson: The hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) has made an intervention. He usually speaks from his chair.

Mr. Rae: Not true.

Mr. Peterson: Is the hon. member denying that he does not usually speak from his chair? I do not know. I listened to the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood, and the hon. member for Calgary Centre. They told us that we did not give this House the opportunity to fully and freely debate this measure, but have muzzled it. As the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) pointed out, there have already been 21 days of debate.

• (1710)

Hon. members opposite claim that they did not know about the 8 per cent tax and that it is unfair to impose it at this time when we are engaged in negotiations with Alberta. When would be the right time to act on this matter, Mr. Speaker? Would it be after we have an agreement? If we do not reach an agreement that is fair to all Canadians by June 16, should we wait until September or until next year?

We have followed a fair and reasonable course of action by bringing in the bill after it has had full debate in committee. If we arrive at another agreement with the province of Alberta, then we can accede to the wishes of the opposition.

The hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood made much of the fact that the government has not listened to the wishes of members, has not listened to the wishes of the public and has not made the changes in the measure that he wanted. I should like to turn to the substance of many of the changes that the government introduced, Mr. Speaker. For beauticians the 9 per cent tax was changed so that it will apply to the acquisition cost to the distributor rather than to the selling price in the salon. In this way we have done something to help control inflation and help small business. We need the co-operation of the private sector for this measure in order to ensure that the tax saving will be passed on to the beauty salon and the consumer. This is the only way this type of reduction will come to the assistance of those for whom it is intended.

We have helped small business by clearing up the paper burden and allowing businesses to adjust the time at which they filed their returns. We got rid of the tax on goods supplied under warranty. This is fair. We listened to the representations made on the indexation of the tax on alcoholic beverages, wine and beer and have made concession there.

We have made significant changes for advertising publications designed to help the small daily newspapers which need help most. As the minister said, if that does not work he will make other changes. I call that a fair and responsible attitude on the part of the minister.

When hon. members opposite are aware that their position on a bill is weak, when they have shouted their voices dry, they start to attack the process by which legislation is introduced.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peterson: I need not gainsay what the President of the Privy Council said, but I should like to add some points. We have taken a unique step to ensure that this bill has the most complete hearing that a tax bill has ever had. It is the only tax bill to be presented to standing committee rather than to committee of the whole. Hon. members had an opportunity to present amendments, and they did—131 amendments. That is not the way to respond to the responsibility shown by the government to the House nor to the evidence that the government is willing to listen to what hon. members opposite want to say.

The hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood is getting exercised, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Rae: Excised, not exercised. You are the one who is getting exercised.

Mr. Peterson: I must say that I believe I have as high esteem for the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood as does any other member of this House, but I must confess that right now my esteem is quite mediocre.

Mr. Malone: Like your speech.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, nothing could condemn the government more than the necessity for the opposition parties and the government combined to introduce 135 amendments to a faulty bill.

I was brought up in a democratic system where things were caucused and bills were discussed by the backbencher as well as by cabinet. Mr. Speaker, can you tell me whether every member of the backbench on your right knew the condemnatory, punitive nature of this bill and supported it from the beginning, or were they ordered by the caucus whip to come and vote or they would suffer?

This is an illusory situation, Mr. Speaker. The illusion that the public has after listening to the speeches of members to your right is that the opposition is irresponsible. The illusion is that there is no longer a democratic system in which compromise and discussion, debate—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It being 5.17 p.m., the two hours provided for the consideration of the motion now before the House under the provisions of Standing Order 75C have expired. Accordingly, under the terms of the Standing Order, it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put every question necessary to dispose of the motion.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): All those opposed to the motion will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): In my opinion, the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Bussières), which was agreed to on the following division:

HOUSE OF COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

Question No. 2,576—Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton):

1. Is an expansion of the membership of the House of Commons scheduled to take place after the population statistics from the 1981 census are compiled?

2. Did the government prepare an estimate of all the direct and indirect costs involved in adding each new member of Parliament, such as salary and pension benefits for the member and staff, office accommodation and facilities, and ancillary services and (a) if so, what is the estimated cost per member (b) if not, will such a study be undertaken before the expansion?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1. Until the census is completed and calculations are made pursuant to Section 51 of the British North America Act, any answer to this question would be speculative.

2. A complete and comprehensive review of all aspects of the representation of the people will be undertaken in the near future.

Question No. 2,577—Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton):

1. Do census projections show that approximately thirty new members of Parliament will be added to the House after the 1981 census and, if so, will the government need to acquire another building to add to the Parliament Hill complex?

2. Are certain buildings being considered and, if so (a) which buildings (b) is the present Justice Building, adjacent to the Confederation Building, under consideration?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1. See question 2,576, answered this day.

2. (a) The government is considering the recommendations of the Committee on Parliamentary Accommodation, chaired by the hon. Douglas Abbott and has taken steps to acquire all of the property in the area bounded by Elgin Street, Sparks Street, Bank Street and Wellington Street. Some of the buildings in that area are now being used, at least partially, for parliamentary purposes.

(b) Not at the present time.

Question No. 2,578—Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton):

1. Have any government plans been made to accommodate an additional 30 Members of Parliament in the chamber?

2. Is consideration being given to removing the desks and replacing them with benches?

3. Is consideration being given to knocking out walls and expanding the chamber into the lobbies?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1. See questions 2,576 and 2,577, answered this day.

2. This suggestion had been made, but extensive consideration has not been given.

3. No.

Question No. 2,579—Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton):

1. Does the government propose to table a position paper on parliamentary reform and, if so, on what date?

2. Will the paper deal with the problems created for members of Parliament attempting to participate in House business by an increase in the membership of the chamber of more than 10 per cent?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1 and 2. This matter is being considered.

Question No. 2,580—Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton):

Will the government consult members of Parliament before alterations are made to the House of Commons chamber in order to accommodate any new members?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Yes.

[Translation]

Mr. Collenette: I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty) on a point of order.

[English]

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, if I heard the parliamentary secretary correctly, yet another day has gone by without an answer to question No. 1,852. It is now six months to the day since I put the question on the Order Paper, and the Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox) should have been able to give me an answer to it by now. The chairman of the Canadian Film Development Corporation indicated that he gave the information to the minister some months ago, yet we still do not have an answer. I am wondering whether I can have one.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Secretary of State.

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is taking my name in vain. The estimates of my department have been considered. I was expecting him at the committee to answer his questions, but the hon. member saw fit not to attend that sitting. I have been expecting a question in the House for the past two or three weeks.

Madam Speaker: Order. I think the question was put to the parliamentary secretary and the minister is pursuing the discussion.

[English]

Mr. Collenette: This question was asked yesterday and I gave an answer yesterday, and I am looking into that.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

EXCISE TAX ACT AND EXCISE ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed, from Thursday, June 4, consideration of Bill C-57, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, and motions Nos. 4 (Mr. Blenkarn) and 5 (Mr. Riis).

Madam Speaker: It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

[English]

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is on motion No. 4, and a vote on motion No. 4 will dispose of motion No. 5. All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: According to an agreement reached earlier, the vote stands deferred.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap) moved:

Motion No. 6.

That Bill C-57, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas, be amended by deleting clause 7.

Excise Tax

Hon. Marcel Lambert (for Mr. Blenkarn) moved:

Motion No. 7.

That Bill C-57, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas, be amended in clause 7 by striking out lines 11 to 40 at page 9.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Unless I have missed something, I do not believe the Chair put motion No. 5. The vote will be on motion No. 4. If it is defeated, it defeats motion No. 5.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am informed by the Clerk—

Mr. Lambert: My point is that the Chair has not put the motion.

● (2010)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Clerk informs me that the vote on motion No. 4 will dispose of motion No. 5. since they are indentical motions.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, essentially motion No. 6 is a continuation of a great deal of what we have heard in the last number of days with reference to the pricing of wines in an absolute way, the whole matter of indexing, and then the excise tax being placed on wine. In essence, the motion before us does away with the concept of indexing in terms of the excise tax as it applies to wines, and at this point suggests that an increase in the price of Canadian wines is not the appropriate step to take.

Before I discuss some of the details of this motion, I wish to talk about why this particular motion is before us with so many others. Over the last number of days there have been many references to the fact that we were debating 135 different amendments to this particular bill. Members opposite were criticizing us for putting forward so many amendments for discussion. They were asking us why on earth we had not brought in a fewer number of amendments and dealt with more of the specifics and, perhaps, some of the larger issues in this bill.

I want to make it perfectly clear that that is exactly what we had in mind when we deliberately went through second reading stage very quickly in order to get the bill before the committee. I would like to commend the chairman of the finance committee for calling a number of witnesses and for requesting and receiving a number of written briefs. But there was one very important aspect of that deliberation which was eliminated, and that was the opportunity for members of the Conservative party, the Liberal party and the New Democratic Party to come together to discuss what the 23 groups of witnesses presented to us as members of that committee, not to mention countless written breifs which were also presented to us. We eliminated this very crucial step. I suspect that had the government taken that initiative, had it shown that interest, in the next number of days we would not be discussing the vast array of amendments which we are discussing because the matter would have been resolved in committee. Saner heads would have prevailed, in that surely we would have agreed that the points raised by so many of these delegations and witnesses before the committee were, in fact, legitimate. They expressed legitimate concerns. These were not people trying to avoid paying legitimate taxes to the Government of Canada.

Both opposition parties and members opposite indicated their willingness to ask questions of the witnesses, in terms of finding out what concerns were on their minds. A great many legitimate concerns and criticisms were articulated by the witnesses. Unfortunately, by and large, they were ignored by the government, with the exception of a few cosmetic changes being produced. But the substantive concerns were virtually ignored. That is why members of the Conservative party and ourselves, with a great deal of reluctance, brought in 135 amendments.

We felt the concerns raised by the witnesses were legitimate ones which needed to be addressed. More than ever before I was convinced that this bill is an ad hoc approach to taxation. Attempting to glean a few dollars here and a few dollars there is not the way to approach taxation in Canada in the 1980s. Surely, a reflection of the poor taste and lack of consideration of the government was the document which went to all members of the committee, which attempted to summarize the concerns of the witnesses. Again, as far as the principle is concerned, I commend the chairman of the finance committee for directing his officials to take the time to go through the various briefs, summarize them for us and then provide an appraisal.

Those members who have taken the time to read the appraisal will see that contained therein are comments of the most cynical nature. These were not constructive criticisms, but criticisms designed to make the witnesses appear foolish. These were criticisms designed to make the concerns of the witnesses appear simplistic and almost childish. That is hardly the way to treat serious briefs and presentations in this day and age, particularly when we hear a great deal about the alienation found in certain parts of our country.

When one looks at the various witnesses who appeared before the finance committee, such as representatives of the city of Medicine Hat, representatives of the Hobbema Indian Reserve, the Independent Petroleum Association, the Canadian Petroleum Association, the Federation of Alberta Gas Co-ops, the Energy Services Association of Alberta, and many others, one sees that they were essentially ignored. I do not think there is any question, even from members opposite, about the concerns and points of view which were expressed before the committee being ignored by the government. If that is not a slap in the face to those groups which I have mentioned, in this case westerners, it is little wonder that there exists in our country a cynicism toward the government, an attitude that this government simply does not care. This is why we are being forced to address 135 amendments. The government was not prepared to sit down and discuss ways and means of looking at a few changes to this bill. The government was prepared to simply ignore that process and force the opposition parties into the position of spokesmen for the various witnesses which appeared before the committee.

The particular motion before us identifies the problem associated with indexation. I do not feel that it is necessary to go through an elaborate and precise description of the hazards associated with indexing the tax on tobacco and alcohol in Canada. The point has been made by many members already that, in fact, this will be a factor which fuels inflation in our country, as opposed to combating it. This measure will give the government a vested interest in inflation, since it is one small step toward providing more revenues for the government as a reflection of inflationary practices. I am concerned about the effect of tying the excise tax to the CPI and what that means as a true reflection of inflation in the country and, therefore, the resultant increase in taxation. For example, if one province decides to increase significantly the price of wine, beer, tobacco or distilled spirits, then that will result in an increase in price across Canada. In other words, one province could dictate a significant increase in the CPI for that subgroup which would then reflect an across-the-board increase for that particular commodity.

If there is a significant increase in the price of a foreign wine or an imported spirit, for example, then it would fuel the CPI for that subgroup, which would result in a rise in prices across Canada. If the value of the Canadian dollar vis-à-vis the franc, or some other currency, drops, the price, if you like, of that imported commodity will increase. It will increase the CPI in that particular subgroup, which will then result in an increase in the price of alcohol and tobacco across the board for all Canadians.

What is happening in this country is that we are tying our increases in the price of alcohol and tobacco to what is happening in foreign countries and to what may be happening in one province of Canada. Surely this is not the intent of this particular piece of legislation. It is with that in mind that we in the New Democratic Party feel that this is simply not the appropriate step to take at all. If it is true, as the hon. member from Ottawa indicated this afternoon, that the need for this is to combat inflation, surely to goodness there is a better way to combat inflation than to index the prices of alcohol and tobacco.

We suggest, when we start looking at the increase in the prices of wine, beer and distilled spirits, that there is a great deal of discrepancy in the pricing of those commodities in Canada today. That is why we have mentioned in our motion that this would appear to be an inappropriate time to add another increase to the price of wine in Canada. We are not against increasing the price of wine; we are against increasing it in this willy-nilly way of adding a few cents to a gallon of wine or a few cents to beer or a few cents to distilled spirits. Surely the reason we are in this disastrous situation today is the kind of ad hoc approach to obtaining federal government revenues.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Nickel and diming.

Mr. Riis: Nickel and diming, as the hon. member says. Indeed, it is. What is required, to our way of thinking, is a comprehensive commodity tax review. I realize that was introduced in 1977—actually, it was 1975. It was abandoned or suspended in 1977 at a time when the interest rates and cost of living were not as high as they are today.

We suggest that we are well overdue for a comprehensive commodity tax review in Canada. We should take a look at the taxes we presently place on wines, for example. We should ask ourselves the question: should we be encouraging Canadian wine producers? Should we be using the taxation system to encourage more participation in the vineyard industry, more participation in the Canadian domestic wine industry? Should we be lifting the prices of those Canadian wines to achieve some social benefit? Should we perhaps decrease prices to encourage more people in the agriculture sector? We should ask the same questions in relation to the breweries and the distilled spirits industry?

Another question we should be asking ourselves is: should we be using our taxation system in a more creative way to accomplish certain economic and social ends? We in this party feel, of course, that we should. We should not simply tack on nickels and dimes during these times when our farmers could perhaps use some encouragement and when domestic producers of wine in Canada could also use some encouragement.

It is for that reason that we feel very strongly that this is not the time to increase across the board the tax on spirits, wines and beer, and it is certainly not the time to index these commodities.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, one of the reasons I think the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis) found difficulty with the fact that we were not able to consider the representations which had been made was the insistence by the government House leader that the bill be returned to the House by April 15 or April 16, and also the fact that we heard briefs until almost the eve of those dates. That left only the appearance of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) himself, who tried to emulate the Great Sphinx of Egypt by saying absolutely nothing, and then saying that the government would take into consideration the representations which had been made and would declare itself at that time, if at all.

That is why I would say neither the representatives of the New Democratic Party nor myself, when I led our party in this particular consideration, were disposed to put any amendments before the committee. What would be the point? If one amendment were proposed, the government backbenchers would simply chew that amendment away and use up the time. They would have filibustered the one amendment which would have been put forward by either the New Democrats or ourselves, and it would have been a total loss.

I therefore stated quite clearly that it was not my intention to put any amendments in the committee, as we had done under the Bank Act, and we would put them in at the report stage. Neither our party nor Your Honour's is under any obligation whatsoever to consult with one another as to the nature of the amendments which will be proposed. For instance, in part IV of the bill, which is that tax on petroleum and natural gas revenue, every clause is marked for amendment by the New Democrats, and the same amendments appear under the name of my colleague, the hon. member for Mississauga Centre.

Mr. Knowles: Etobicoke Centre.

Mr. Lambert: It was the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson). That is why we had that many amendments. There are, in effect, many duplications; but that was the result of what one could call the nature of the beast under that type of restriction on the committee.

So far as the amendments put forward by the hon. member for Kootenay-Shuswap and—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Kamloops-Shuswap.

Mr. Lambert: I will get those two ridings straightened out yet. There were also amendments put forward by my colleague, the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn).

First of all, we are against the increase in the tax on one. I referred to that the other night. We are also against the indexation of tax. Strangely enough, the formula which we wish to eliminate is the quarterly index.

In amendment No. 8, as it appears on the order paper, the government had advanced to six months. It had taken one step. The other night the minister replaced that motion, that amendment, in effect, by an amendment which calls for annual indexing. As I indicated the other night, it is not the question of merely placing a percentage tax, as the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Evans) suggested. That is nothing. What it is, is a clear indication that there shall be an annual rest and that the tax shall be compounded by the factor of the annual CPI. That is the nature of the increase. This particular subgroup of alcohol and tobacco will pick up influences from all sorts of areas. Of course, the net result is that the excise tax in this particular area will snowball.

It is the snowballing of the excise tax without the consent of Parliament to which I object, and to which my colleagues say, "No, no, a thousand times, no!" That is what is wrong with this principle. In relation to taxation, it is a first attempt to impose the cost of living index on the formula of determination of tax with an annual rest. It will be applied on the alcohol and tobacco subgroup at this time. I suppose that is a popular target for taxation. The next one could be the tax on gasoline and diesel fuel. There are many other areas of tax where, by simply changing the formula of calculation, an indexation based on CPI could be imposed and the government would be the chief beneficiary.

I am almost repeating what I said the other day when I said that the government would be very interested in inflation at 100 per cent. The principle is wrong, Mr. Speaker.

I do not want to put on the record all the evidence given by the commissioners of the Liquor Control Board of Canada, the Distillers Association of Canada, the Brewers Association and the wine growers. I think this is a despicable move as it pertains to wine. Wine should be considered part of the agricultural industry. There is no reason why domestic wines should be taxed any more than milk is taxed.

The minister should take into account where the grapes are grown and what the revenues of the growers amount to. They are agriculturalists. No other country treats them as a source for the taxation of alcohol or puts them in the same category as those who distil alcohol for whisky.

Be that as it may, Mr. Speaker, there is a substantial increase in tax, by formula, from 25 cents to 60 cents. Indexation of the tax will greatly increase the price of domestic wines. Next we will see an excise tax imposed on foreign produced wines. We will experience all the difficulties arising out of the CPI or influences abroad, with regard to the cost of these beverages.

The same thing applies to the price of British tobacco. It will go out of sight. It is high enough as it is but it is a vastly superior product. This does not in any way try to protect the Canadian product which is a hot tongue burner at all times. I have smoked a pipe for over 40 years so I have considerable experience in judging quality and I am not overly impressed with our domestic product. In any event, I think the principle is quite wrong.

I should like to name some hon. members opposite who regularly attended the finance committee and were critical of the government's actions. They thought this was a pernicious principle. I see that the muzzles are on now, however, and they are not going to speak. You might say that they are——all puffed out ready to speak because their mouths are full.

[Translation]

Right you are, hon. member for Burin-St. George's (Mr. Simmons). You know, we can speak French as much as you can.

[English]

Mr. Simmons: French or English, it doesn't matter.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert: Right. Their mouths are full, whether it be in English or in French.

[English]

I am not suggesting what their mouths are full of, either!

I would hope that these two amendments commend themselves to members of the House and that we could return to a beginning of sanity by adopting motions No. 7 and No. 8.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I simply want to urge hon. members to reject the amendments. They would cancel outright the provision under which the tax on wines would be adjusted regularly and, as I explained this afternoon, there is no difference between that adjustment and an ad valorem tax. If the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis) objects to that process, then he must be against any ad valorem commodity tax, because just as an ad valorem tax goes up when, for instance, the currency fluctuates, so will this process enable the central government to maintain the same income tax margin as the revenue it derived before the commodity increase.

[English]

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I am definitely and violently opposed to this type of taxation. It is a sneaky way to impose a tax.

An hon. Member: What else do you know?

Mr. Taylor: You know all the sneaky ways. We are learning them but we do not like them.

If you want to put a tax on, why do you not bring it in to the House of Commons and have it debated? When this passes, it need never come to the House again. That is taxation without representation.

A moment or so ago the minister said that it is going to be a definite ratio. If that is so, why does the bill say that it can be adjusted or altered in such a manner as the governor in council may prescribe? You can do it any way you like. You can double it or triple it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. With all due respect, hon. members must address their remarks to the Chair.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I am addressing the Chair. I have to look over to them once in a while to see what reaction I am getting. I might as well be talking to a stone wall, so I will not bother looking at them.

This is not going to be done by a definite ratio or the bill would have said so. It is open to any adjustment or alteration in any manner the governor in council will want to prescribe. That is an unsound principle. It is taxation without representation. If we can do it with wine and beer today, the next time it will be put on bread and meat. Grapes are an agricultural product, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert).

The people of Canada do not know what to expect from a government that introduces this type of indexation of taxation. It is completely unsound and hon. members know it. They have been hoodwinked into voting whatever way Pierre tells them to vote!

Excise Tax

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, since the government has not really answered the points that have been made with respect to this proposal but has relied upon its majority to put it through, I want to refer to the so-called executive summary and responses. This document was prepared by the minister's department and it refers to some of the criticisms of the government's scheme of indexing ad valorem taxes.

This document tells a great deal about the state of the bureaucratic mind, which is obviously the dominant mind on the other side and the one which controls government policies.

The Brewers Association of Canada points out that taxes on beer now represent 45 per cent of the retail price. It is one of the highest proportions of tax on beer in the world. The answer of the bureaucracy to that criticism was, that what the rest of the world does is not particularly relevant to Canada's social tax policies. That is a good, logical, thorough, well-thought-out, in-depth kind of answer. What the rest of the world does with respect to taxation of any product is of no concern to this government. We will just put our heads in the sand and say that how beer is taxed in the United States, the United Kingdom, Germany or in any other country is really of no concern to us. We do not have anything to learn from any other country in the world. We know all the answers here in Ottawa. We have the answers to everybody's problems, and we do not have to rely on what may or may not happen in other countries in order to make up our minds. The government demonstrates that kind of ignorance of systematically putting on the blinkers, of carrying on with the policy regardless of what associations, producers or consumers say and regardless of the effect on them. All we hear is that we will carry on.

● (2040)

Mr. Mayer: That is not what they say when it comes to interest rates.

Mr. Rae: The hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer) points out correctly that this is not what they say when it comes to interest rates. When it comes to interest rates, those of us who call for a different policy for Canada are regarded as those who want to walk off the end of the world. It is the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) whose department is walking off the end of the world with respect to this proposal. They just say that it does not matter. The Minister of State for Finance is shaking his head. But in the reply we find:

> What the rest of the world does is not particularly relevant to Canada's social tax policies.

Elsewhere we can read:

> —the burden of tax on beer is extraordinarily heavy in Canada and higher than in most other countries.

But they say the reference to other countries is inappropriate. Why is it inappropriate? It is inappropriate because it is embarrassing to the government to have to recognize that our taxes on alcohol are very high in Canada compared to the rest of the world.

Here is another example of the concerns expressed by the Brewers Association:

> Adverse social and health costs are more directly related to the misuse of spirits; control measures including taxation should deal more stringently with spirits.

The following is a scientific statement of fact put forward by the Department of Finance, I am sure after a great deal of intensive research, which reads:

> Alcohol in any form, be it beer or wine or spirits, is equally intoxicating.

That is a statement of fact for which I do not see any proof, if you will pardon the pun, Mr. Speaker.

There is another statement of fact offered by the Department of Finance as firm proof for which there can be no question at all. The minister gets statements and briefs. Just today the Minister of Finance was talking about briefing books. This briefing book is the bible for the Minister of State for Finance. The Minister of State for Finance may have forgotten to read the briefing book today, so I will read from it again for him, as follows:

> There are probably as many drunks whose libations are beer or wine as there are drunks whose favourite beverage is spirits.

Is that the scientific factual basis upon which the government will decide the relative burden of taxation? Is that the basis upon which the government is now fixing this year to be the base year on which all rates from now on, forever and ever, will be decided because of the indexation policy? There are probably as many drunks whose libations are beer and wine. Doesn't the minister know? Does he not have a chart which tells us how many drunks are drunk because of beer; how many drunks are drunk because of wine, and how many drunks are drunk because of spirits? I ask that because the government has just put this forward as if it were a solid fact. This is the theory: there is an equal number of beer, wine and spirit drinkers who are drunk. That is the first theoretical base. The second factual basis is that what the rest of the world does is not important to the Department of Finance. That is the way in which our tax policy with respect to indexation is being made, and it is absurd.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is on motion No. 6. All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Following the procedure previously outlined, the division on motion No. 6 stands deferred.

Is the House ready for the question on motion No. 7?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is on motion No. 7. All those in favour of the motion please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Following the procedure previously outlined, the division stands deferred on motion No. 7.

Motion No. 8; shall I dispense?

Mr. Lambert: No, please read it. I want to be sure this is the last version put in by the minister. There were three versions, and I want to hear which one it is.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member has made his point.

Hon. Pierre Bussières (for Mr. MacEachen) moved:

Motion No. 8.

That Bill C-57, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas, be amended in clause 7 by striking out lines 11 to 40 at page 9 and substituting the following therefor:

"(2) The excise taxes imposed by subsection (1) shall be adjusted

(a) on the first day of April, 1981, so that the taxes imposed in the five month period commencing on that day are equal to the amount obtained

(i) by multiplying

(A) the taxes set out in subsection (1)

by

(B) the ratio, adjusted or altered in such manner as the governor in council may, by regulation, prescribe and rounded to the nearest one-thousandth or, where the ratio is equidistant from two one-thousandths, to the greater thereof, that the Alcoholic Beverages Subgroup of the Consumer Price Index for the twelve-month period ending on December 31, 1980, bears to the Alcoholic Beverages Subgroup of the Consumer Price Index for the twelve-month period ending on September 30, 1980, and

(ii) by rounding the product obtained under subparagraph (i) to the nearest one-hundredth of a cent or, if the product is equidistant from two one-hundredths of a cent, to the greater thereof; and

(b) on the first day of September each year, commencing on September 1, 1981, so that the taxes imposed in the twelve-month period commencing on the day the taxes are adjusted are equal to the amount obtained

(i) by multiplying

(A) the taxes set out in subsection (1)

by

(ii) by rounding the product obtained under subparagraph (i) to the nearest one-hundredth of a cent or, if the product is equidistant from two one-hundredths of a cent, to the greater thereof."

[Translation]

He said: Very briefly, Mr. Speaker, I would say that the purpose of this amendment, as it has already been explained, is to make an annual rather than a quarterly adjustment on wines, and also to change the basic period of that adjustment so that it will now end on June 30, 1981. The first quarterly period which had already been established and came into force on April 1 of this year will be maintained until the next basic period comes into effect. As the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) so aptly put it, that will fulfil the expectations of the industry, while at the same time changing the revenue of the government in that field, since the basic period has been changed.

● (2050)

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): No, the House should never be ready for the question on this nefarious amendment because it not only defeats the Chair in its reading ability, which is not inconsiderable, it is so complicated that even Mr. Speaker was stumbling through the reading of it.

Some hon. Members: Shame, shame!

Mr. Lambert: That is no reflection on the Chair, Mr. Speaker; it is illustrative to those hon. gentlemen who have never even looked at the blessed document that they are into the most bureaucratic jargon that could possibly be devised. Even hon. members who sat in at the finance committee from time to time were never exposed to that type of formula, because that which was in the bill was relatively simple. This was changed in order to arrive at this different revenue base, as I pointed out the other night, which creates an increase of $18 million in tax on wine and spirits over and above the $42 million which is proposed in the numerical increase of what shall be paid by measure on either wine or distilled alcohol.

An hon. Member: So?

Mr. Lambert: In response to the hon. member from Quebec City who thinks this is so funny, perhaps if he came around to these committees and displayed some of the intelligence accredited to him, he might find that this is one of the most pernicious bills that has ever been brought forward by any administration. I hope he is able to explain to his constituents, when the price increases go into place, what happened. He will not even be able to do that. He will just simply say that the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) said he needed more money, so, therefore, you my little citizen—

[Translation]

You, my little friend from Quebec, are going to pay ever more for your beer. I hope he will drink his glass of beer and throw the rest in the face of the hon. member. I am not criticizing anything, but I do take my colleagues opposite to task for finding fault in private and even in public before the representatives, saying that the bill was unacceptable and unjustifiable. But when the bill comes back before the House, they cannot even open their mouth. They are behaving like a bunch of sheep. It is very simple, a bunch of sheep knocked down—

Mr. Duquet: They do not stand still to get fleeced!

Mr. Lambert: The hon. member says they do not stand still to get fleeced. I can assure you that the people they represent are being fleeced. My God, Mr. Speaker, if only they knew!

Because if you increase the tax only on imported alcoholic beverages and wine, the Quebec Liquor Board will naturally be affected by this tax and by the increase, and every year from now on, the cost of living index in this subgroup will be added to the 9 per cent tax, which means that it is not simply an ad valorem conversion that we have here, but that the cost of living index must be added also. This is—

An hon. Member: Not true!

Mr. Lambert: You say: Hear, hear! Mr. Speaker, did the hon. member say "hear, hear", or is this a problem for him? For our part, since we have seen that the example of the federal government will soon be followed by a provincial administration, we shall have this problem and add cost of living increases to everything. I wonder whether the results will be satisfactory, but there will be an increase since the price of beer will now be affected by the cost of living index. This increase will affect senior citizens, that is pensioners 65 and over. There will be one for veterans, and the same will apply for taxes on beer. The hon. member should be able to explain that to his constituents.

Mr. Duquet: Mr. Speaker, people over 65 are not drinkers.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is not at his seat.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) has the floor.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will have other opportunities. I would like him to go to his seat and take part in the debate to show how well he understands this bill.

An hon. Member: You would see—

Mr. Lambert: Yes, because it is by remaining silent that you keep your constituency when you sit on the government side.

Mr. Speaker, we object to this bill, and I ask my colleagues to support the motion I moved following the example of my colleague for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn).

I object to the formula proposed by the Minister of State, who has himself a lot of trouble understanding what will happen with this bill and especially with this formula.

[English]

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, with the government's amendment to change indexation from a quarterly to an annual basis, I suppose members opposite expect us to get down on our knees with gratitude; that is, having imposed a quarterly system of taxation, the government has now decided to simply do it on an annual basis. I want to tell the minister that once he has accepted the principle that adjustments should only be made on an annual basis, he has eliminated the need for indexation. All the minister has to do is to simply produce the bill in each and every budget, which, one would hope, would be on an annual basis, in order to provide for the increases in taxation which the minister thinks are justified. I find it typical of a government which has made a kind of ideological decision to go for indexation on a quarterly basis, every three months, and wants to increase the taxes which the average Canadian would pay in order to have his pint of beer, glass of wine or, indeed, glass of hard liquor, but which now is only going to index on an annual basis, and expects us to be grateful. In fact, the logic that would lead to quarterly adjustments does not apply to the annual adjustments because we have budgets every year so we do not need the indexation.

The second point that has to be made is that the government is kicking Gerald Bouey in the teeth with this proposal, and I think that is a shame. I know the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) thinks it is a shame too because he is behind Governor Bouey 500 per cent. He is "Mr. High Interest" when it comes to bum to bum, toe to toe, cheek to cheek with old Gerry Bouey XVI.

● (2100)

Let us hear what Governor Bouey had to say in his annual report to the Minister of Finance in 1980. What did he have to say about learning to live with inflation? What did he have to say about the principle of indexation? What did he have to say about the principle of providing a free ride to the government and a free ride to the Canadian public? He said, and I am quoting from his annual report:

> It is not at all clear what people have in mind when they talk about "learning to live with inflation".

He went on, and I am quoting from pages 5 and 6 of his annual report:

> Is it possible that they think that society could develop some way of indexing all money payments so completely that changes in the purchasing power of money would be neutralized and could therefore be ignored in the formation of public policy? The fatal weakness of this idea—

It is fatal. It could kill the government if it adopted this idea. Upon adopting it, the government could die. That is the wording of Governor Bouey.

> The fatal weakness of this idea is that the more vigorously a country applied it the more rapidly would any inflationary impetus cause prices to accelerate. That system would be much too unstable to be workable. As a practical matter proposals to find ways of ignoring the rate of inflation cannot be taken seriously.

That is the view of the Governor of the Bank of Canada about this proposal to index taxation, and I think it is time the government knew it has now broken its commitment to support the Governor of the Bank of Canada in his single-minded policy to fight inflation in Canada. This government is fuelling the fires of inflation. It has broken faith with Gerald Bouey, and I think that is a disgrace.

Mr. Peterson: Who do you think you are, Ian Deans?

Mr. Rae: The second point—

Mr. Cullen: Whoops.

Mr. Rae: I want to look at what goes into making a bottle of beer so that we will see that we are not taxing just beer, we are not taxing just the beer industry alone, we are taxing every single worker who produces a component of a bottle of beer. That is what happens when the government increases inflation by indexing taxation on a bottle of beer.

Cereal grain growers on the prairies are weeping because the government is taxing their product. Carbohydrate matter, yeast, hop oil, hop extract, stabilizing agents—

Mr. Cullen: Not stabilizing agents.

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, I think you get the point, but I want to add just a couple of other points. Did Your Honour know that wood shavings derived from oak, beech, hazelnut or cherrywood are also components of a bottle of beer?

Mr. Cullen: That does it; I quit.

Mr. Rae: There are many woodworkers across Canada from Newfoundland to British Columbia. Do hon. members realize that the tax on wood shavings which are put into a bottle of beer will now be indexed? That is to say nothing of ammonium persulphate and Nylon 66. How many Nylon 66 workers are there in Canada? A large number.

If I could be serious for just a moment, the point of what the government is doing is that it is on a slippery slope. The government is on the slippery slope of telling itself that it is possible and permissible for the government to take its cut out of inflation.

What the government is doing is significantly different from indexing deductions because the principle behind indexing deductions is that the government does not reap the benefit of inflation but in fact has to cut down its spending as a result of inflation. This provision provides for exactly the opposite because it means that the government takes advantage of inflation. It means that government income will be guaranteed to go up in accordance with inflation, and it means that an inflationary psychology is being built into an inflationary tax system. That is precisely what is wrong with indexation at this time. I hope the minister will attempt to reply in a serious manner to the very real problem which is being created by building inflation into a tax system at a time when all the authorities, including the Governor of the Bank of Canada, for whom the minister has an almost perverse affection when it comes to public policy—

Mr. Skelly: Details?

Mr. Rae: —at a time when all the authorities are saying that indexation and the notion of indexing everyone against inflation is a dangerous policy. That is precisely what the government is doing in this instance, and I think the government should give us an explanation.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Cullen: It would be nice to have a nice quiet speaker for a change.

Mr. Crosbie: —I know we can hardly expect members of the majority in this House to take seriously the problems this particular amendment is going to cause, for example, for the brewing industry in Canada. I have a brief here from the Brewers Association of Canada representing seven Canadian breweries. They produce and sell 99 per cent of the beer consumed in Canada. We are talking about an industry that is already Canadianized. We do not need any pseudo-Canadianization from the government. We do not need any nationalization in the vein of Petro-Canada. We do not need a "Petro-Beera". We already have a Canadianized—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: How about "Beer-Can"?

Mr. Crosbie: We already have a Canadianized industry. Here we have an industry that is totally Canadian-owned. In fact, it is doing very well down in the United States. The beer from Oland's, I think it is, in New Brunswick, Moosehead or Moose Jaw or some kind of beer like that, is selling ferociously down in the United States of America, and I am delighted that we are able to export that stuff and licence it down there.

In any event, the point I am making is that here is an industry. It is Canadian-owned. It is producing a Canadian brew made from Canadian water with Canadian hops and Canadian constituents. It buys 95 per cent of all its materials and supplies in Canada. Its 41 breweries are found in nine provinces. Let me say this: two of those breweries are in my district, and that gives me a statesmanlike interest in this subject.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: The production, distribution and sale of beer give employment directly and indirectly in Canada to 180,000 people. There are 180,000 people working in this brewing industry in Canada. It generates $1.2 billion in tax revenue, so we are dealing with a serious subject. We are dealing with one of the big Canadian industries. We are dealing with 180,000 people working in that industry, and this industry is bitterly shocked and disappointed in the proposals contained in this legislation.

I have to admit they were bitterly disappointed and shocked with the proposals contained in the budget I introduced in December of 1979, but I say this: I would have had enough sense to listen to their points, their proposals and their submissions. Had I remained as minister of finance I would have fixed up some of the main objections to the legislation they brought forward. Let me also say that even in my deepest and darkest days as minister of finance in those short few months I had, never in the darkest, deepest, most depressed and most vicious days of my tenure as minister of finance did I think of indexing the tax on beer, wine, liquor and tobacco. Only a labyrinthine mind, only a Calvinist mind, only a mind with the deepest subtlety, only the mind of a bachelor from Cape Breton, could come up with such a concept that these taxes be indexed. That gentleman is not even here in this chamber tonight to defend his own proposals to the 180,000 people that work in our Canadian brewing industry.

Let us look at some of the things that are wrong with this. The minister is proposing an amendment. He is going to change the legislation. Imagine—I think you are the Speaker, not the Chairman.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Yes.

Mr. Crosbie: Good. I am glad to be in the right forum. Mr. Chairman, just look at this, Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker—if you are going to be sticky about it—Mr. Speaker, look at this: the minister actually proposed originally that he was going to index these taxes, the federal taxes on beer, wine, spirits and tobacco, every quarter. Every three months the tax would go up as the cost of living goes up. The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) is responsible for the general Canadian economy. He is the gentleman who has to accept the responsibility for the inflation rate. The inflation rate in recent months has been at the rate of 13.9 per cent. For the Minister of Finance to attempt to bring inflation down, if this legislation passes, is to be in a conflict of interest with his own legislation because he gets more revenue if inflation continues to go up under these proposals. Every three months he is going to index and increase the rate of taxes on these products. The Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières)—I wish I had had someone like him when I was minister. I was like a slave to this chamber, Mr. Speaker, when I was the minister. I had to come in here every time there was a finance bill, and every day there was a finance bill. I had to be in this chamber. I will not tell you what I think of it because my thoughts and views on this chamber are too lofty. I did not have a minister of state for finance. I wish I had had a gentleman able to absorb the punishment that the Minister of Finance now has in the hon. member for Charlesbourg. I tell you this, he is the man who is going to make his mark. He is going to be just as quick going down as he was coming up, if he continues to be the stooge for this Minister of Finance.

• (2110)

Now, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of State for Finance has made an amendment—he is only going to index taxes on tobacco, beer, wine and spirits every year. A fantastic concession. He is never going to come back to this House. Forever and a day, Canadians who live in the rest of the twentieth century, Canadians who live in the twenty-first and the twenty-second century are going to be paying increased amounts every year for beer, liquor, wine and tobacco because of the legislation the government is forcing through here this week. There is going to be an increase annually based on the cost of living according to the formula in this bill. And this is supposed to be a great concession. Well, I have a letter here from the Brewers Association of Canada. What is the result of this minister's amendment? We all thought there was going to be some relief for the poor devils, that instead of having an increase every three months, it is going to be yearly. This is what their letter, dated June 3, 1981, says:

> We have followed the debate in the House on Bill C-57 and noted that unanimous consent was given with respect to an amendment to change indexing the excise levies on alcoholic beverages to annual rather than quarterly adjustments as proposed in the October, 1980, budget.
> This will result in an increase in excise levies from those contemplated in the budget—
> The annual increase in excise levies on beer will increase a further $1.6 million—

Are you listening, Minister of State for Finance? He has no idea this is the result. Are you listening, sir? I know that the hon. member for Willowdale (Mr. Peterson) has important communications to give you—he is begging for some kind of concession for somebody in his district but just listen to me for a moment and find out what the bill is all about. This is the result:

> The annual increase in excise levies on beer will increase a further $1.6 million, an increase of 10 per cent from the $16.5 million originally proposed by the indexing provisions contained in the October, 1980, budget.

With your change, you have taxed the brewing industry $1.6 million more this year. Then it goes on to say that:

> The increase in excise levies on distilled spirtis will be approximately $6.0 million, an increase of 17 per cent over the original increase of $36 million, proposed in the budget.

With this amendment, you are raising your taxes on the distilled spirits industry $6 million. The letter goes on:

> These increases arise not because of the change from quarterly to annual indexing which would have resulted in a decrease in revenue, not an increase, but because of a change in the timing of the changes and the base for calculating the increases. Further details may be found in exhibits A and B attached.

I am not going to read exhibits A and B but I will tell the minister that his civil servants, in making that change from quarterly to annual indexing, have so arranged it that they have bludgeoned these two industries for more money than proposed in the original bill. That is not good enough. If this is an amendment that is supposed to ameliorate this bill for these industries, you are actually costing them more money this year. I presume a copy of this letter went to the Minister of Finance, and if not, I will supply him with a copy. The letter goes on:

> Had the point of indexing on an annual basis been set at October 1, rather than September 1—

And it goes on with all kinds of technicalities:

> —the inequity caused by the method chosen as outlined in the most recent amendment would not have been as great.

And so on. I am not going to give all the details, it is the principle I am interested in. On the last page of the letter they say:

> This proposed increase, resulting from the most recent amendment, on top of the original indexing increase, on top of the 29 per cent increase in the basic federal excise rates stemming from the April 21, 1980 announcement of Mr. MacEachen, on top of the recent change in Ontario from a specific or volume tax to a 20 per cent ad valorem tax, will increase the price of beer to the consumer in Ontario to such an extent that the traditional consumer, the working man, may no longer be able to afford it.

Now I do not need any member of this House to say to me that the Ontario government has just indexed their taxation in this area. I know they have. Encouraged by the example set by this Minister of Finance, Ontario has done the same thing and the government in Newfoundland has done the same thing. I tell you now that ministers of finance will always take that attitude if they think they can get away with it. Naturally, the poor devils are looking for more revenue and they care not where they get it from.

So this Minister of Finance introduces this inequity into the tax law, this horror, and when the ministers of finance for Ontario and Newfoundland see that he is getting away with it, that he is still alive, that he is not drummed out, that the public have not erupted and got the rope and noose outside the Parliament Buildings to give him a fit reception for such a suggestion, they go ahead and do it themselves. If this House passes these provisions, Mr. Speaker, we will see the eight other provincial finance ministers do the same thing. Believe me, I have some experience. I was minister of finance in Newfoundland and I was minister of finance here for a few brief months, and I know what ministers of finance are like; they have to be watched every minute of the night and day, believe me. So if we do not want this to go through our own House and if we do not want this to become the law in the ten provinces, we have to stop it now before the rot spreads. The MacEachen rot is infecting ministers of finance all across this great dominion.

Now, let us have another look at this indexing provision. The argument has been made that this is fantastic, this is comparable to indexing the personal income tax. That is one of the arguments of some of the Liberal members. Well, Mr. Speaker, one despairs. We have to remember, of course, that the Minister of Finance plans to de-index the personal income tax. He is going to de-index it if he thinks he can get away with it. But I want to tell him now that when he attempts to de-index personal income tax, that is when he is going to be defenestrated, that is when he is no longer going to get away with any tax measures because the unpopularity of that measure is just fantastic. Recent polls to which I have access show that the most unpopular move you can make in the taxation field today in Canada is to de-index the personal income tax. I am giving you a tip, members of the Liberal caucus: stop the Minister of Finance before he attempts to de-index the personal income tax this fall.

An hon. Member: There is no tax on the water.

Mr. Crosbie: It is a wonder they are not going to index the glass of water I have in my hand tonight to get some revenue for the government.

The indexing of the excise tax is the exact opposite of the automatic indexing of personal income taxes. Indexing of personal income tax protects the taxpayer from undue increases in taxation caused by inflation as compared to real increases in income. As the then minister of finance, Mr. Turner, said, the taxpayer should not be taxed on theoretical, unreal increases in his income caused by inflation. The whole principle of indexing is to make sure that you only pay more income tax if you have more real income, not income caused by inflation. It is to protect the taxpayers. I am hoping that the hon. member for Willowdale will lead a revolt in the caucus.

An hon. Member: Good luck.

Mr. Crosbie: He is a man who has all the revolting attributes that one could imagine, and I am hoping that he is going to lead this revolt in the Liberal caucus.

Now, Mr. Speaker, indexing the excise tax on alcohol, beer and wine imposes a greater burden on the taxpayer, together with rising inflation. It is not to help the taxpayer; there is greater inflation. The taxpayer is suffering from inflation anyway and the government goes and indexes the beer, wine and spirits which he is going to drink, and impose a greater burden on him. So it is exactly contrary to the whole principle behind the indexing of our personal income tax system and the exemptions and the like that have been in effect now since 1974-1975 when Mr. Turner was the minister of finance until he could stand it no longer, he could no longer hold his nose and stay in the Liberal ranks here in Ottawa. He got out before holding one's nose became popular advice to give to the government of the United Kingdom and others who did not like what the government was doing. The rest of the Liberals here tonight are used to holding their noses and breathing at the same time. One must be an expert at both to be in the Liberal caucus.

• (2120)

The critics are quite right in their claims concerning the index in the income tax. I will not elaborate on this because the hon. member for Greenview-Broadbent, the hon. member for Broadview-Greenbent, the hon. member for Broadview-Green-behind-the-ears, or whatever is his district is—

Mr. Rae: Perhaps green behind the ears, but not over the hill.

Mr. Crosbie: I think it is Broadview-Greenwood. The hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) has spoken and spoken well. We admire the young man. He has not yet had much experience in life, but after he has had 20 or 30 years of roughing it around in Canada in his frilled shirts and all the rest of it—

Mr. Rae: Like you have.

Mr. Crosbie: —in academic circles and comes back here, he will have a lot to contribute. We will still have this little corner down here for him to sit in with the rest of the rump of the Liberal party.

I do not want to stray from this clause. Might I just say that the liquor industry has already presented—I do not want to be taken as just speaking for the brewery industry alone.

Mr. Peterson: Oh!

Mr. Crosbie: The brewery industry has no friends on the Liberal side of the House; the wine institute has no friends on the government side of the House. Where are the members from the Niagara peninsula who flexed their muscles so mightily during the election campaign of January and February 1980? By golly, I remember how they made the welkin ring down there with their bawls, shouts and screeches about the Labrusca grapes, the grapes on the Niagara peninsula, and how the grapes were being stomped underfoot by me when I was minister of finance and the tax changes I suggested. Where are they now when their own minister suggested a yearly tax increase for the wines produced in Canada? Where are they now? Where is the hon. member for Mackasey—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Crosbie: —or whatever is his district? Where is the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Mackasey)? We do not hear him making the welkin ring in here. Where is the member from—are there any others?

Mr. Rae: The hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. MacBain).

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): The hon. member for Welland (Mr. Parent).

Mr. Crosbie: Yes, the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. MacBain). He has fallen by the wellside. The hon. member for Welland (Mr. Parent) has fallen down the well. They are not here to protect the Labrusca grape growers or the wine growers of Canada or Inniskillin. Where are they now when they are needed?

An hon. Member: In the "killin".

Mr. Crosbie: They are not even around. Now, that is the wine crowd. Where is the tobacco crowd? Well, here is the champion of the wine undustry coming into the chamber! We will see the hon. member for Lincoln cross the floor. I hear the hon. member for Lincoln is going to cross tonight.

Mr. Mackasey: There is a big party going on.

Mr. Crosbie: We are waiting to hear the hon. member for Lincoln speak on behalf of the Labrusca grape growers before this whole debate is over. Where are the members from the tobacco growing areas of Canada? They are getting the gears here tonight too; annually the tax on tobacco will go up now. Where are they? I remember where they were during the election. All those Liberal members and Liberal candidates were all-out furious. They were going to battle the world. They were against these increases; they were dead against them. They were going to make sure that it did not go through at all, if they got in power.

Here they are in power, and what has happened? A worse concoction than I could ever dreamed of is being served up to them by the Minister of Finance from Cape Breton. There are no grapes growing in Cape Breton, believe me; there is not one grape. There is some pretty ripe fruit down there, but there are no grapes.

Mr. Knowles: The "Grapes of Wrath".

An hon. Member: What about Newfoundland?

Mr. Crosbie: We do not have too much fruit down in Newfoundland. We have some blueberries. The blueberry wine growers of Newfoundland are protesting against this. Well, they only sell about two or three dozen bottles of blueberry wine a year. We have crab apples and crab apple wine. I recommend that to you, if your stomach is ready to drop. But we do have breweries; that is why I am speaking particularly about breweries tonight.

Now, the view of the Minister of Finance is that the demand for beer and alcohol is inelastic. Anyone who is a true drinker knows that the demand for beer and wine is not inelastic; there is always some point at which you have too much. As a matter of fact, I have the figures of the alcohol institute somewhere. Well, it is not the alcohol institute; I will get the right name. The Association of Canadian Distillers produced figures showing that in 1980 the growth in sales of spirits actually declined. It is no longer increasing.

That is also the fear of the Canadian Tobacco Manufacturers Council. I must say that tobacco is a more controverisal area with respect to health and the rest of it. Nevertheless, there are a lot of people working in that industry in Canada. The Brewers Association of Canada has 180,000 working in Canada I do not have the figures here for the Canadian Wine Institute as to how many are employed in the industry, how many are growing grapes for them and are associated with them.

The Association of Canadian Distillers, a lot of people work with those companies. Then there is the Canadian Association of Provincial Liquor—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired. Nevertheless, he may continue if there is unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I will conclude because I know there are other hon. members who have contributions to make, particularly the hon. member for Lincoln. There may be others aside from the hon. member for Lincoln over there.

I will conclude by saying that we are treating this matter in a somewhat lighthearted spirit because liquor, beer, wine and tobacco seem to be a subject one can treat with some amount of levity, particularly if one has been tasting the product. By the way, this is water, Mr. Speaker; I have not been tasting the product. Although it sometimes engenders some levity, the brewing industry in particular is totally Canadian-owned. I do not know where it stands in the number of industries in Canada in terms of employment, but 180,000 are employed there.

It is an industry which is now exporting successfully to the United States. I would say to hon. members of the government and to the hon. Minister of State for Finance that the government should consider this. They are going to push this through in any event; it looks like they are. They have the numbers and we cannot stop them in the final analysis. If they do, I think they should have a very serious look at this, particularly with respect to the effect of these proposals on the brewing industry which is wholly and solely Canadian-owned and a tremendous employer of labour in Canada. They should have a look at its impact also on the wine sector of this whole business, because of the Canadian content in agriculture and in the new Canadian industry which is now growing up. There are some very fine wines. I have mentioned Inniskillin. There is another very fine wine in British Columbia. It is not that I drink all that many wines, but there is Colona, C-o-l-o-n-a, which is a very fine wine. There are others, of course, but I cannot remember them all.

Mr. Rae: C-o-l-o-g-n-e.

Mr. Crosbie: C-o-l-o-n-a, Colona. B-o-l-o-g-n-a, that is the hon. member who just interjected, baloney.

Mr. Rae: It is l'eau de cologne, John.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I am trying to make a serious point. I do not mind the young member from Toronto-Broadbent-Greenview interrupting me occasionally, but I do not want him interrupting me now.

Mr. Rae: I interrupted you once too often.

Mr. Crosbie: I ask the minister to take a look at its impact on the Canadian brewing industry, because the price of beer through these measures has been made more and more expensive. It will affect the sales of wine and spirits. If we are to impose very heavy taxation in this area, let us favour our own. Everyone always does it because they say that beer, wine and liquor is not an essential, and I suppose it is not. Let us favour an industry which is already 100 per cent Canadian-owned. Let us have a very careful look at the Canadian-owned wine industry as well. The spirits industry is not as much in the spirit of this thing from the point of view of Canadian ownership and employment.

I ask the minister now to have a look at this before the bill passes. If not, he should carefully review this during the year to see what effects it is having on the brewing industry, which we should be helping, not putting the boots to in the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The question is on motion No. 8. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): All those in favour of the said motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Pursuant to section 11 of Standing Order 75, the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

According to a decision of Madam Speaker, motions Nos. 11, 12, 13, 56, 57, 58 and 59 are grouped together for debate.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (for Mr. Blenkarn) moved:

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap) moved:

Motion No. 12.

That Bill C-57, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas, be amended in Clause 27 by striking out lines 24 to 46 at page 33 and lines 1 to 20 at page 34.

Hon. Pierre Bussières (for Mr. MacEachen) moved:

Motion No. 13. (New)

That Bill C-57, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas, be amended in Clause 27 by striking out lines 27 to 46 at page 33 and lines 1 to 20 at page 34 and substituting the following therefor:

Motion No. 59.

That Bill C-57, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas, be amended in Clause 77 by striking out lines 17 to 39 at page 79.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, are you calling the vote on the whole group of motions? If we examine the rulings of the Chair, we find that motion No. 11 will be voted on and that an affirmative vote on this motion will dispose of motions Nos. 12 and 13. A negative vote on motion No. 11 would also dispose of motions Nos. 12 and 13. I therefore believe that you should call the vote on motion No. 11, and then proceed differently.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The Minister of State for Finance is right. These motions have been grouped for debate and may be voted on as the hon. minister has said.

[English]

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, motion No. 11 forms part of clause 27 at page 33 of the bill. First, it removes paragraph 1(b) of Schedule II and substitutes therefor manufactured tobacco, including snuff.

[Translation]

Even tobacco-chewers will not be exempt. But I would like to find the specific section in which I am interested, and then we shall—

[English]

Our friends who are in love with the metric system will note that the change in clause 27 is with regard to the unit of tobacco, It says:

Manufactured tobacco, including snuff, but not including cigars and cigarettes . . . one dollar and ninety-eight cents per kilogram.

That used to be 90 cents per pound. On a quick run-through, that is about the same amount of tax; there is no increase. But then we come to clause 27(2) of the bill which reads:

Schedule II to the said Act is further amended by adding thereto the following section:

This is where the indexation comes in. I see that the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Mackasey) is now in the chamber. I was hoping he would make an appearance at this time in the debate when we are dealing with the indexation of the excise tax on wine, spirits and tobacco, because, as I recall, he was one of the most vocal critics of this measure in the committee.

The minister will be the first to acknowledge that we had little opportunity to discuss this matter. I remember that the hon. member for Lincoln had an exchange of views with the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) on this particular point. I do not think he received any more satisfaction from the minister than I did, yet I think the hon. member has the same sort of gut reaction to this type of amendment as I have.

Hon. members may feel that I am going to the well rather frequently on this point, but it is an absolutely pernicious principle. Not only shall the tax be increased but it shall be increased annually by the cost of living. When we were considering this measure, it was to be increased quarterly. This is a measure which will impose a fantastic burden upon those who are having to compile the tax and collect it. They will have to satisfy their customers that there was this quarterly increase in the price due to the indexation. Now it would only be annually, but the principle is still the same. The event is taking place—not four times a year—but once a year. I can go through all sorts of events which instead of happening four times a year, happen once but with the same result. I would like to see just what the government backbenchers are prepared to say about this particular matter. As I said before, they are very vocal on this subject. I want to smoke some of them out so that they will take a position. I will not ask the chairman of the committee to do anything about this, since in my view he is not the person to explain the government's position. He is not the government's hatchet man on any committee. Woe betide any member who is that person on any committee on which I serve. I must say that I prefer working with a chairman like the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen) who does not become too involved. There were times when he became a little curious, but still, it is better that way. We saw a great many floaters on this particular issue. Had the representations from the public not been so uniformly condemnatory, one might say that it was good. But there was absolute unanimity in this case. The only person who was in favour of this cost of living index formula was the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), and I can understand why. As my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) has said, this proposition has regularly been placed before him by the minions down in the Department of Finance. Some of the worst inspirations in the world come out of the department at that level. I have seen a great number of them. How they could con a minister is remarkable. There is no doubt about the fact that in many instances the ministers are conned into it simply by the pressure of business. My colleague, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), has clearly indicated how ministers can be conned by skilled and senior public servants. I am sure that in their own hearts, those ministers who are in the House will agree with me. They get caught at the most inopportune or pressing moments. An idea slips by them, an idea is slid under their noses; and the first thing they know, they are nodding, and then they are really in trouble. This is one of the areas.

• (2140)

The hon. member for Willowdale (Mr. Peterson) will know that there were some very unministerial changes to the Bank Act. These were not changes which had emanated from the ministry or from the committee. They were views and deliberate decisions arrived at after long discussion, negotiation and acceptance of recommendations by the committee; but at the bureaucratic level, the changes remained and then slid under the nose of a busy minister. It is surprising, when he went on to talk to the ministers afterwards, how startled they were that the change had, indeed, been made. They were not aware of it.

We legislators who must determine and set the policy and legislation must be watchful for this. I must say that I come back to this point, that it is not the administration.

[Translation]

We are not in a state-controlled country.

[English]

—where the administration not only set the formula, but set the policy that determines the formula. This I fight. Tomorrow, Mr. Speaker, I will have been an hon. member of this House for 24 years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert: My colleague from South Shore over there is also one of us—

Mr. Rae: Happy birthday to you.

Mr. Lambert: —and my colleague from Colchester Hants. There are others. However, to illustrate the reactions of a young parliamentarian coming in, when one comes in, one does not know the first damn thing about what goes on here at all. As a matter of fact, one must usually ask one's way as to where the conveniences are for the first several weeks. One must also ask where to put a hat. At the door, one addresses the constables with "sir".

Mr. Knowles: It's still a good idea.

Mr. Lambert: However, when one knows this operation and how it goes on, one is more and more convinced that the government backbenchers are totally impotent so far as legislation is concerned. It is as though they comprised a whole race of eunuchs. They will not even avail themselves of the privilege of criticizing. This is something which can be done over on the opposition side. Through criticism, one is often able to effect certain changes.

This is why hon. members will always find me on the attack, trying to make changes because we are trying to improve legislation. I do not believe in the principle of those who say, "Oh, well, the government toppled the legislation. Let the public stew in the mess which has arisen." That is not the conception I have of my job. Where I have the talent to spot holes and see poor legislation I have the duty to improve it. This is why hon. members find that I am sometimes rather persistent. I really hang on in there and try to get these particular changes made. I think that over the years we have been able to effect changes.

As hon. members gain experience in this House, they get into the position and the frame of mind where they say, "Look, we are the ones who determine what policy is. We shall determine what is good for the public because we are responsible to the public. They are the ones with whom we have our interface." Nameless and faceless administrators have no contact or responsibility to the public. It makes a nonsense out of representative parliament if we do not have that control. There has been more and more of a tendency, from both the administration and cabinet, to try to remove the determination and opportunity for change in legislation from the influence of the elected representative. It seems to me that that is one of the worst characteristics that we have. It is unfortunate. We do get an opportunity, on some bills, to make many changes. No party has a monopoly on good ideas. This bill could be made much better without carving the guts out of it if hon. members would get on with it instead of just riding on the coattails of ministers and parliamentary secretaries. Members of the opposition work a lot harder on legislation than do members of the government. That is because they want to effect change so they try to understand the bill.

• (2150)

I venture to say that there are more members on this side of the House who know more about the bill than all the members opposite put together who have not looked at it. They do not look at bills as a rule but just vote blindly.

Mr. Laniel: We are consulted.

Mr. Lambert: There is no consultation, and the parliamentary secretary knows it. They see the bill and that is all. The bill is not gone over clause by clause and explained to them so that they can approve it beforehand. The government backbencher of today is no different than the government backbencher in years past. The first time they really see the legislation is when it is printed in the agenda book.

Mr. Laniel: Oh, no.

Mr. Lambert: They see the detail. It may be that some of the general principles and intentions of the legislation have been discussed with a number of people, but not the detail.

In the legislature of the province that I come from, every bill that comes forward has been gone over clause by clause by the caucus. Many a minister who has been sloppy in his work has come a cropper because of that. But the members feel that they can support a bill if they know what is in it and have contributed to it.

I know very well that with this particular bill, nothing like that was done, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Finance did not discuss the nature of his budget with any member of the government caucus. I know I am on safe ground with regard to these particular bills, although the situation may be different with some other legislation. No one was consulted about the taxation bills, however. Hon. members opposite do not know what is in a particular bill.

Mr. Laniel: You are talking about the last Conservative budget.

Mr. Lambert: I am going to ask hon. members to support the amendment which I put forward in conjunction with my colleague, the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn). We did not have an opportunity to discuss the bill fully in committee because there was a guillotine there as well. The hon. member opposite need not express any astonishment. There was a guillotine in committee, a deadline by which we had to report.

I want to give my friend, the hon. member for Lincoln an opportunity to address himself to the bill and tell us what he thinks about an indexed tax, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, I must confess that when I entered the chamber this evening, I had little inclination to participate in the debate. The persuasive eloquence of the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) left me little choice, however. I would not want anything to spoil his twenty-fourth anniversary tomorrow!

This evening the hon. member discussed, quite profoundly, the whole concept of an excise tax linked to indexing. I wish he had as much influence with the Ontario government as he has in this place. Very recently that Tory government introduced the concept of indexing, not only as applied to wines and tobacco and not only annually but quarterly. If that were not bad enough, it introduced a tax on gasoline which was linked to percentages, not dollars.

I suspect that we will have a little more opportunity tomorrow to compare the enlightened, refreshing, openminded attitude of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) with the attitude which is prevalent in Ontario and which was also the attitude of the former minister of finance. In his nine months in office with his budget and his tax on the wine industry, he did more to destroy that party for the next 25 years than any other single member.

I welcome the prodding of the hon. member for Edmonton West, Mr. Speaker, and the opportunity to speak about the wine industry of Ontario, of Canada, and particularly of Lincoln. This is one of the most important industries in the country. Because of its importance the government, and particularly the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), has done more for it in recent years than has any other minister of agriculture in the last 50 years. That is not my appraisal made of the contribution by the Liberal party to the wine industry; that is the objective assessment of the farmer of Lincoln who recognizes what the government has done.

In a few minutes I will call it ten o'clock Mr. Speaker, and I will get down to the specifics of the tax tomorrow. I do not like the principle of indexing, and I stated that clearly in committee. It would be rather immoral on my part to come to the House now and say that I like the principle.

Mr. Rae: Are you going to vote for it?

Mr. Mackasey: I will vote for it because, unlike the previous minister, today's Minister of Finance listened to the representations of members of the committee.

I am surprised that the hon. member for Edmonton West and the official finance critic of the New Democratic Party underestimate their contribution at that committee. The real victory was not a Liberal victory, not a Tory victory, not an NDP victory. The victory of the committee was that it convinced the minister that the advice he was getting from the bureaucrats was bad advice and that imposing an indexed tax every three months would create chaos and confusion, not only in the wine industry but in the tobacco industry. Members of all parties pointed out to the minister the problem of changing prices in the liquor commission every three months. If the tax automatically increased, so would the retail price.

If the minister had remained insensitive to our argument, tonight we would be fighting desperately against indexing every three months. The real representations by the industry were not so much against indexing as against the automatic application of that indexing every three months. The Minister of Finance accepted the recommendations.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

HUMAN RIGHTS—AIR CANADA POLICY ON EARLY RETIREMENT OF AIRPLANE PILOTS

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Mr. Speaker, although I have spoken several times on this particular concern of mandatory retirement, that is, discriminating against and replacing thousands of Canadian "on the shelf" so to speak, I will again ask the government and members of this House to take all possible action to eliminate these policies that are denying our people their right to work and to preserve their healthy self-image.

● (2200)

This discussion today has been stimulated by a question I posed in the House on May 20, 1981, to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) regarding the "dictating" manner in which an airline pilot, Captain Ross Stevenson, is being forced to retire by Air Canada on September 1, 1981.

The Canadian Human Rights Act clearly states in Section 7, that it is a discriminatory practice to directly or indirectly refuse to employ or continue to employ any individual or, in the course of employment, to differentiate adversely in relation to an employee on a prohibited ground of discrimination. Why is Air Canada permitted to use age as a form of discrimination? Is this bureaucratic and mandatory policy not contrary to the principles of the Canadian Human Rights Act?

To further illustrate the point, I draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the double standards that Air Canada is inflicting. Did you know that numerous Canadian airlines operate with pilots who are over 60 years of age, including Nordair, which is owned by Air Canada? Did you know that Air Jamaica operates with pilots over 60 years of age, all the while being managed and operated by Air Canada?

If this is not discriminatory and a policy that goes directly against the grain of our democratic, free and so-called just society, then I do not know what is. Fortunately, I am not alone in this battle to preserve the rights of Canadians by giving them the power to maintain a healthy self-image that many receive from being actively involved in the work force.

As the chairman of the Special Senate Committee stated in the report on retirement age policy entitled "Retirement Without Tears", Senator David Croll emphasized the following:

1. Progressive abolition of mandatory retirement based on age should become a general policy of the government.

2. That there should be an increase in the mandatory age of retirement of one year at a time for five years by amending pension plans for retirement rules and conventions. At the end of five years, the concept of compulsory retirement at a particular age would be dropped.

3. That there should be a review of all human rights legislation because of employee benefits and similar plans.

4. That there should be created a policy of flexible retirement as the standard for both public and private enterprise.

5. That there should be amendments to the rules governing public servants and employees of companies under federal jurisdiction, as well as provincial and municipal public servants.

It is here that I would also like to put an abrupt end to the misconception that compulsory retirement is necessary on medical grounds.

Dr. Stanley Mohler, Chief of Flight Applications for the American Federal Aviation Agency, and the Director of Aerospace Medicine at Wright State University in Dayton, Ohio, in the Journal of Aging and Work, states:

> The old concepts of pilot aging as a risk factor in flight no longer can be supported, as demonstrated by hard data. The larger, more densely loaded passenger aircraft are flown by the older, more experienced and capable captains, the major factor in today's low accident rate. The rates show that the present age 60 rule is prematurely removing the safest pilots from the air space. Deleting the age 60 rule would, by extrapolation of the accident rate data, further enhance the level of airline flight safety.

Referring back to the reply of the Minister of Transport to my question of May 20, 1981, he stated that these discriminating policies of Air Canada are based on agreements between Air Canada and the Canadian Air Line Pilots Association, CALPA. This is probably correct. However, I do point out that CALPA has at no time conducted a poll or survey of the Air Canada pilots membership to deal specifically with this issue and to determine the wishes of the Air Canada pilots. It is also interesting to note that CALPA has negotiated age 65 retirement for Nordair pilots.

I am not suggesting, as implied by the minister, that government or the Department of Transport go against an agreement reached between an airline and its employees. However, I am advocating that the government, elected by the people, establish the guidelines and laws of this country to eliminate any and all discriminatory practices of mandatory retirement.

● (2205)

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I want to preface my remarks on this subject by saying that I understand the Canadian Human Rights Commission will be investigating the case referred to by the hon. member. I would not want anything I say to prejudice that investigation, so I will simply state the facts.

As the minister has declared in the House and in correspondence with the hon. member, Transport Canada rules do not require pilots to retire at a specific age. Pilot licences are revalidated after age 60 if the individual successfully meets medical standards. So departmental rules are not at issue here.

The retirement age for Air Canada pilots is 60 as a result of an agreement between Air Canada and the Canadian Air Line Pilots Association, referred to as CALPA, the certified bargaining unit for airline pilots.

The hon. member points out that this agreement was reached quite recently, whereas his constituent has been objecting to retirement at age 60 for several years. This may be true, but common labour practice dictates that the agreement should apply to all members of the union indiscriminately. In addition, if the hon. member asks CALPA what its position is, he will find that it has understood retirement at 60 to have been a negotiated feature with the airline since the early 1950s.

It has been suggested that the retirement age at other airlines is 65. This is not exactly the case. The international organization, ICAO, recommends retirement at age 60. For Canadian airlines, the age tends to be 60 as well. There is a small exception for a few Nordair pilots who constitute a very special case. It is my understanding that CALPA would like to standardize age 60 as the requirement age for all airlines for which its member pilots fly.

In these circumstances I think it is clear that it would be quite inappropriate for the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) to intervene in this matter.

VETERANS AFFAIRS
(A) DELAY IN PROCESSING PENSION APPLICATIONS; (B) REQUEST FOR CHANGE IN LEGISLATION

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Mr. Speaker, on June 4 I directed a question to the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs. I pointed out to him:

> Veterans pension applications, new and appealed, are still not processed and finalized for as long as 62 months, as verified by the Legion. The United States department of veterans affairs takes from 60 to 90 days to finalize an application.

I asked the minister:

> What measures is the minister taking to correct this disgraceful situation in his department?

I also had a supplementary question which was:

> The chairman of the pension commission told us that he is hamstrung. He cannot correct a situation that is going from bad to worse because of the legislation with which he has to work. I should like to ask the minister if he will give a firm commitment to the House that he will bring in corrective legislation so that these applications can be processed within 90 days, instead of from one to five years.

The minister answered:

> —if any correction can be made in order to improve the disposal of these claims, it will be made. We will do our utmost to improve the system, if it is possible at all, according to the law.

I hope the parliamentary secretary tonight will be informing us that they will be bringing in corrective legislation or, if that is going to cause delays, will bring in an immediate order in council to correct this disgraceful situation that has been taking place in Veterans Affairs.

I should like to put on record tonight the excellent manner in which the United States veterans affairs handles its pension applications.

The aim of the United States department of veterans affairs is to process claims in all stages within 90 days. This would include first-time claims as well as claims for increased benefits. Less than 2 per cent of the claims currently before the U.S. department are six months old. The biggest delay is in obtaining service records and booking medical examination or re-examinations. In spite of this problem, they still process claims in these time frames.

The following is a description of the four basic types of pension claims in the United States. There were over 63,000 applications for compensation for injuries incurred in service, and the average number of days for processing was 137. There were over 25,000 applications for death benefits when death was due to service. These applications took an average of 81 days to process. There were over 87,000 applications based on need. These applications took only 97 days. There were over 107,000 veterans' survivors' pension applications. These took only 65 days to process. In Canada it takes from one to five years. That is a national disgrace.

I have statistics here respecting the death rate among veterans in Canada waiting for their pension applications to be processed. There is no reason for such statistics in the United States.

In the May edition of the Legion magazine there is an editorial about this problem. The editorial points out the following:

> In November, 1978, the chairman of the pension commission told a meeting of the standing committee on veterans affairs that the average length of time for a first application to reach a decision was six months, an improvement on the 7.8 months taken earlier. It was, said Allan Solomon, "almost back to normal."

We are nowhere near normal today. There is a continuing controversy over the length of time taken to process applications and the number of applications on hand. This Legion editorial also points out the following:

> The number of appeals awaiting consideration by the pension review board hovers around 2,000. Now being heard are applications made two years ago. And the number of new appeals is increasing.

The editorial also says:

> By June, 1980, the number of cases awaiting decision had risen from about 2,700 in 1978 to about 4,200. A saving feature, said Mr. Solomon, was a reduction in the number of applications received and ". . . I think it is a fair assumption to say that in a year's time we should be back to normal."

However, Mr. Solomon admitted in the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs just ten days ago that he is hamstrung by the present legislation and that he cannot process applications any faster. Along with the other two groups which process applications it takes from one to five years. The Auditor General has done an extensive audit of the Department of Veterans Affairs and the time it has taken to process applications. He came up with a figure of 46 months, which is also an absolute disgrace.

When dealing with veterans and their pension applications, the Ontario Command of the Royal Canadian Legion writes to veterans and tells them not to expect any action for at least two years. That is an absolute disgrace.

I hope the parliamentary secretary will give us some information tonight, and I hope the government will bring forward new legislation or bring forward an order in council so that the chairman of the pension commission will no longer be hamstrung in dealing with these pension applications and so that we can work toward having a time period similar in length to that in the United States.

Mr. Jack Masters (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Mines)): Mr. Speaker, in recent days the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie) has been pressing for a change in the system of processing applications for pensions from veterans and their dependants. I understand his concern about the length of time sometimes taken to adjudicate the applications and, like all of us, I would like to see the adjudication time reduced. However, I would not like to see it reduced at the expense of the veteran. Steps have to be taken to improve the pension system and to curtail the delays in adjudication.

The hon. member has pointed to other countries which provide decisions in less time than is taken by the Canadian system. What he forgets is that the Canadian system was very fully and carefully studied by a commission of inquiry under the chairmanship of Mr. Justice Woods of Saskatchewan, whose report was then fully considered by the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs, which made many recommendations to the government. As a result, the legislation which was then introduced and passed by Parliament was more concerned with safeguarding the claimant and ensuring fair and careful consideration than it was with speed, regardless of outcome.

As an example, hearings before the pension commission or the pension review board are non-adversarial—no one appears to suggest an award should not be made: The only advocates present at a hearing represent the claimants. The speed with which a decision is made is not a measure of its quality.

The veterans organizations have consistently supported the commission in its view that speed was secondary to good and beneficial decisions. The proof of the wisdom of this attitude is that prior to the Woods committee report upon which much of the current legislation is based, only 20 per cent of all applications were granted at the first level. In the last ten years it has averaged 41 per cent, this despite the fact that the simple claims of gunshot wounds and the like were long since granted and that today's claims, which in the main deal with problems of aging, are much more difficult to relate to a period of military service. If careful research into the background and facts of the claims were not undertaken, there would be many more negative decisions.

In some other countries pension claims are handled with greater speed, but our system is different in both essence and approach. Our legislation instructs the commission to collect relevant material and to make inquiries into the facts. The thoroughness with which this is done accounts for some of the delay factors. The Auditor General's recent report indicated that in some cases it can take up to 46 months from the time of an original application until a claim is considered at final appeal. The report, however, does acknowledge that much of this delay is outside the control of the pension commission or the pension review board in that there are periods when they may not proceed until such time as they receive agreement of the applicant, which in some cases may take weeks or months or even years.

The pension commission and the pension review board are doing their utmost to reduce the time taken for decisions to be rendered. Although it is easy to give a negative decision, they will not do so for the sake of speed to the detriment of the veterans and their dependants.

Mr. McKenzie: Let them die!

GRAIN—COMPENSATION TO FARMERS FOR EMBARGO ON SHIPMENTS TO RUSSIA

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I rise this evening to participate in the adjournment debate and refer to a question that I had the opportunity to put to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on June 2, concerning the long overdue grain compensation payments to Canadian producers as a result of the embargo imposed upon the shipment of grain to Russia after it raided Afghanistan. I do not want to get into why there should or should not be payments forthcoming to grain producers in Canada; I think the principle is well established and well accepted. It was accepted by the Clark government right after the invasion in January of 1980. Subsequent to that, during the election campaign and right after it the Prime Minister promised to abide by the decision of the Clark government to see that grain producers were not left to bear the full burden of foreign policy as it was pursued by the whole country. That was a promise made by this government some 15 or 16 months ago.

There was some concern at that time as to how the level of compensation was to be arrived at. Since that time a study was done by the Parliamentary Library that came up with a figure. As far back as July 22, the University of Saskatchewan released a study, and I quote from the Brandon Sun which says:

> Prairie farmers have lost $62.5 million because of Canada's support of the U.S.-led grain embargo against the Soviet Union, agricultural economists at the University of Saskatchewan estimate.

That is July 22, 1980, which is some 11 months ago. Subsequent to that, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) said that there would be a statement by August 1, 1980, as to what the level of compensation payments would be. Prior to that there were statements made that an amount should be determined before the end of the crop year. Anyone connected with western agriculture knows that the crop year in this country runs from August 1 to July 31. So if we took the Minister of Agriculture at his word when he said it was going to be by August 1, or by the end of the crop year in 1980, it meant that ten months has gone by since that commitment was made.

● (2220)

Subsequently, the Minister of Agriculture said that payments would be made in November, 1980. Obviously the government is delaying its decision.

The Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) also promised that payments would be made in November, 1980. As far back as October, 1980, the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board, Senator Argue, who does not sit in this place and cannot answer our questions during Question Period, said that payments would be made in January, 1981. Senator Argue cannot really be accountable to those of us who are elected by grain producers in the country. In December 1980, the Minister of Agriculture said that the final report on payments had yet to be submitted to cabinet for a decision but that he hoped this would take place within a few days. Again this was five months ago.

In January, 1981, Senator Argue said that payments would be made in January, 1981. Again the government procrastinated. In February, 1981, the Prime Minister said that officials from various government departments were establishing the damages and would finish their work very soon. In March, 1981, the Minister of Agriculture said he would soon know the amount. Two months ago, in April, 1981, the Minister of Agriculture told Parliament that the payments would be announced in a few days.

I could go on, but the process I think, is becoming rather sickening for those of us who represent agricultural communities and agricultural constituencies. It is rather sickening to see how the government has delayed in making this announcement. It has been well over a year—and perhaps closer to 15 months—since the original commitment was made by the government. Since then nothing has happened.

I should like to suggest two things. First, there is no doubt that the principle has been accepted by the government. This was confirmed by the Prime Minister on June 2. If the problem in so far as the government is concerned is the amount, I suggest that it make an initial payment on the compensation so that producers, who are very much in need of funds because of high interest rates and other expenses incurred in putting their crops in the ground, could at least have access to the payment and know that the government was talking in good faith when it said that it would honour the commitment of the Clark government. The government should make an interim payment and then determine what the full amount should be.

Second, the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) castigates the opposition for asking for increased government expenditures and at the same time saying that we want to reduce the deficit. If they have any decency, presumably they would have allowed for some expenditures to make payments to farmers as a result of the embargo. They would have allowed for that in the estimates and that money would have been forthcoming. This would have been one way to alleviate some of the problems associated with high interest rates without adding to the government deficit.

I should like to close by reading part of an editorial which appeared in the Brandon Sun on June 4, 1981. The last paragraph of the article sums up the attitude of many westerners toward the government. It reads:

> The Trudeau government has dawdled long enough on the embargo payments. Westerners are not going to forget the debt. More delays will only confirm what many westerners already believe: with the Trudeau government, the needs of the west come last.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Ostiguy) is here tonight. I hope he can make some meaningful announcement after 15 months of intolerable delay. It is a very shameful treatment of a very important sector of the Canadian economy. I hope the parliamentary secretary can do something by making an announcement which would give us some faith in the government keeping its word to Canadian grain producers.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Ostiguy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer) mentioned a few moments ago, it was after the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan that the United States announced that they were taking sanctions against the Soviet Union. The American government contacted other exporting countries and it was at that time that Canada agreed to restrict its grain exports to the U.S.S.R. The Canadian government of the day, under Mr. Clark, as the hon. member for Portage-Marquette indicated, agreed to subsidize grain farmers and promised to compensate them for the losses sustained because of the embargo. The present government agreed to live up to those commitments and to compensate grain producers for their losses related to the government's decision to restrict grain shipments to the U.S.S.R. But precisely as a result of this embargo, surpluses have accumulated both in Canada and in the U.S. as well as in other countries, and as a result, prices have dropped. However, this was partly offset by the American government's decision to withdraw from the market part of the grain by instructing the Commodity Credit Corporation to buy grain and by stocking more grain than provided for under the agricultural reserves program. Pursuant to its commitment to grain producers, the Canadian government had instructed an interdepartmental committee to look into the matter and come up with a compensation system and to determine how much was to be paid and how the payments were to be made.

At the same time, a number of organizations and institutions have assessed the losses suffered by our grain producers. The board has taken more time than expected to look into the estimations, and most of the data needed for the analysis were not available. It is a fact that when the prices dropped and the embargo was imposed on Russia, it made quite a difference. Then, there was the increase in interest rates.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

At 10.27 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

ENERGY

INCREASES IN TAXATION ON GASOLINE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Since the last election there have been no less than 12 increases in the price of gasoline, despite the Liberal party's rather empty commitments to the people of Canada. In view of the fact that Canadians are now contributing a total of 56 cents to federal coffers on every gallon of gas consumed, or 33.7 per cent of the $1.66 per gallon now being charged in Ontario, and because the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) misled this House yesterday by stating that the federal government received only 10 per cent from petroleum revenues, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Jarvis):

That this House instruct the Prime Minister to tell the whole truth about energy revenues, and further that the government be instructed to redirect these excessive tax revenues into a much needed energy tax rebate program for low and middle-income families.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HOUSING

INCREASED MORTGAGE RATES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. When a home owner is forced to give up his or her house because he or she cannot afford the mortgage payments, CMHC simply takes over the house and sells it. When an apartment building owner runs into the same problem the federal government bails out the investor through the assisted rental program. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer):

That the government provide an intelligent explanation for the lack of assistance to the 500,000 Canadians renewing their mortgages this year if they can afford the Liberal interest rates.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

POLITICAL PARTIES

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT AS PC SUBJECT FOR VOTE OF CONFIDENCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (York South-Weston): Madam Speaker, the following motion under Standing Order 43 will, I am sure, gain the unanimous consent of all members. In view of the deliberate attempt by fifth columnists within the Tory caucus who are seeking to embarrass the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) by tying tomorrow's confidence vote to the subject of capital punishment, and in view of the fact that the Leader of the Opposition needs no further embarrassment other than that caused by his very presence in the House each day, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Cousineau):

That this House condemn all those in the Conservative party who by their actions are advocating euthanasia for their leader, when it is apparent that he should be allowed to continue his effective stewardship of the official opposition.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

RESOLUTIONS ON CONSTITUTION FOR NDP CONVENTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In light of the fact that the Regina West NDP Association condemned the federal NDP for departing from their 1961 policy which calls for provincial agreement on any constitutional change, and the Saskatoon East NDP Riding Association's opposition to the way the federal NDP has conducted itself in the constitutional debate, coupled with the Prince Albert NDP Riding Association's condemnation of the federal NDP for supporting the Liberal government, and the Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain NDP Riding Association's resolution, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn):

That this House urge that delegates at next month's NDP national convention support the resolutions presented by these four federal Saskatchewan NDP constituency associations.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

IMPACT OF GOVERNMENT INTEREST RATE POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Since record high interest rates are having a devastating effect on home owners, and on small business generally, and since many operators of small group homes which provide invaluable community support services to the disabled and handicapped, senior citizens, disturbed children, adolescents and others, are finding it virtually impossible to continue with this work because they do not have the funds at their disposal to meet the interest rates being demanded on renewed mortgages, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House instruct the Minister of Finance to re-examine the government's interest rate policy, and that he immediately bring forward legislation that will place a moratorium on all mortgage foreclosures and bankruptcies on group homes until interest rates are returned to an acceptable and humane level.

THE ADMINISTRATION

SUGGESTED CLOSURE OF SERVICE BUREAU OFFICES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Madam Speaker, in view of the fact that the Liberal government is spending some $2.2 million establishing Government of Canada service bureau offices throughout Canada simply for Liberal propaganda purposes, offices which do nothing more than duplicate the constituency offices of members of Parliament, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers):

That the federal government indicate its seriousness in controlling government spending by immediately stopping this waste of Canadian taxpayers' dollars by closing these offices.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

PETRO-CANADA

ACQUISITION OF PETROFINA—STATEMENTS MADE BY LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) made inexcusable attacks last week on the integrity of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) based on a slanderous report in The Toronto Sun—

Some hon. Members: Oh, come on.

Mr. Crosbie: Read Hansard.

Mr. Flis: —which has since been retracted, I move, seconded by the hon. member for London West (Mr. Burghardt) and the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier):

That the House insists that the Leader of the Official Opposition rise on a point of order this day to apologize for his callous and injurious attacks on the minister.

DEMAND FOR RESIGNATION OF MINISTER OF FINANCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Vince Dantzer (Okanagan North): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) recently stated publicly that there would be no major expenditures for social programs over the next three years. Recognizing that this is the same minister who recently approved the spending of $1.46 billion for the purchase of some gasoline stations in eastern and central Canada, while three quarters of all elderly women in the country are forced to live in desperate poverty, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bruce-Grey (Mr. Gurbin):

That this House directs the Prime Minister to demand the immediate resignation of the Minister of Finance and to appoint someone to the post who can get his or her priorities straight.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

STATEMENTS MADE BY MR. LAWRENCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence), a former Solicitor General, alleged that four former Canadian ambassadors were security risks, but only found the courage to name two persons who are now dead, and produced absolutely no proof to substantiate allegations against any Canadian, living or dead, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans):

That the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland find the courage of his innuendoes and make a public statement outside the House as to which specific individuals serving Canada abroad were a risk to the security of Canada and in what specific circumstances these threats to Canadian security took place, with the necessary names, dates and places.

And that this House further deplores the practice of blanket smears by a former minister of the Crown, which smears compromise the reputation not simply of individuals who cannot defend themselves, but of an entire generation of Canadian public servants.

FUNDY—DELETION FROM TOURIST ADVERTISEMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Madam Speaker, in advertising its national parks the government placed New Brunswick's Fundy National Park in Nova Scotia some time ago. Apparently the problem of where Fundy is has plagued hon. members since, and they have finally come up with a solution. In a recent advertisement for national parks in the Reader's Digest, they simply have deleted Fundy. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall):

S.O. 43

That the House instruct the minister responsible for parks to establish a separate desk in his department entitled "The Fundy Park Desk", and require that all his officials be re-educated as to the geography of Atlantic Canada and the fact that Fundy is one of the most beautiful parks in Canada deserving as much attention as Banff or Point Pelee.

In view of the fact that the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) seized upon these unsubstantiated allegations to raise spurious questions on the conduct of the government's ministry, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Guelph (Mr. Schroder):

That the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition put the lid on his garbage can of unsubstantiated allegations, and do the honourable thing and withdraw his unfounded insinuations against Her Majesty's ministry.

FINANCE

TAX ON EDUCATIONAL MATERIALS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that in its last budget the government removed the tax exemption on a wide range of educational items by employing a very strict interpretation of what constitutes a teaching aid, and in view of the fact that this change will affect the cost of an estimated 95 per cent of all items previously purchased tax-exempt, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hastings-Frontenac-Lennox and Addington (Mr. Vankoughnet):

That the Minister of Finance act immediately to have his officials review the interpretation of this change so that school budgets, which are already strained, are not cut back to the point where the quality of education is affected.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

FINANCE

PETROLEUM COMPENSATION CHARGE—EFFECT ON LOW-INCOME FAMILIES

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Given the fact that ten days ago when his colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, smuggled into this House tax increases without debate under the guise of the petroleum compensation charge, and given the fact that these increases will lean most heavily on the working poor and the unemployed of the country—for example the minister should be aware that low-income families have to spend twice as much of their income on home heating oil as others in this country must spend, and the price of home heating oil will be increased by 6 cents a gallon—

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. McGrath: The minister has refused to give any consideration to a petroleum tax energy credit. What does the minister propose to do to ease the burden on the working poor and the unemployed of this country who are being hardest hit by these tax increases?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows perfectly well that it will be possible for members of the House of Commons to debate these changes since they are amendments to an act. There is no question of smuggling, or not allowing members of the House of Commons the opportunity to debate, at the appropriate time, the particular changes which have been introduced.

As I have stated in reply to questions in the past, all social programs are fully indexed against increases in the cost of living and, undoubtedly, energy price increases will be reflected in the CPI, but these are fully indexed. As I have indicated so frequently in the House, that indexation provides, all together, billions of dollars of additional protection to these groups in the Canadian community.

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker, the indexing the minister talks about in terms of social programs is, as he knows, an annual indexation which will not do anything to offset the extra charges which will have to be paid out for home heating oil this coming year.

GOVERNMENT PLANS TO ASSIST LOW-INCOME EARNERS

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, in June of last year the minister said this:

—whatever tax changes were introduced . . . that they would be equitable and would not attempt to solve the economic problems of the country or the fiscal requirements of the government on the backs of the low-income people of this country.

I am asking the minister to discharge the commitment which he made a year ago, since what he is attempting to do now is nothing short of a massive tax rip-off.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: It is a massive tax rip-off on the backs of low-income earners in this country who are growing by leaps and bounds under the mismanagement of this government—and the minister knows this. What does the minister intend to do to provide compensation to these low-income earners?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member misunderstands almost completely the nature of the increased charges which were brought before the House by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The hon. member knows that there is a blended pricing system in operation in Canada by which the Government of Canada is averaging the price of domestic and imported oil in order to maintain a lower general price for the Canadian consumer. He knows that in order to operate that particular pricing regime it is necessary for the treasury of Canada to subsidize the importation of oil. He knows that perfectly well.

All that was done by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources was to ensure that these increased costs, for example, occasioned by the production cutbacks by the province of Alberta, would not be reflected in an increased deficit but would maintain the fiscal plan put forward in the budget, namely, that about $360 million would be assigned to this import subsidy program in the current fiscal year.

● (1420)

If we fail to take the action which the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources took, then of course we would be doing what the hon. member for St. John's West is always asking us not to do, namely, add to the deficit. There is no simple way. The two hon. members from St. John's ought to get together sometime and talk about what economic policy they follow.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker, I know the Minister of Finance would not want to mislead the House or the country because he knows that 72 per cent of what was brought in here under the guise of petroleum compensation is direct tax revenue to the government. He knows that to be a fact. Speaking of understanding, the low-income earners of this country understand one thing, and one thing only. The minister reneged on his promise to hold the line.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. McGrath: All they know is that the price of home heating oil has increased under his administration by 60 cents a gallon.

Madam Speaker: Order!

Mr. McGrath: I asked the minister, Madam Speaker—

Madam Speaker: Order. That applause ought to have been the cue for the question.

Mr. McGrath: I ask that if there are going to be Oscars handed out, one should go to the Minister of Finance for the act he put on in the last election.

Mr. Clark: A great deceit.

Mr. McGrath: I want to ask the minister what does he propose to do? He has denied an energy tax credit and he has imposed this unjust tax on the poor of this country.

Madam Speaker: Order! Order! Order!

Mr. McGrath: Home heating oil has gone up by 60 cents a gallon. I ask the Minister of Finance what does he propose to do to offset this unjust tax on the working poor of the country?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: I would appreciate it if hon. members did not force the Speaker to yell "order" out loud. It is extremely vulgar, and I do not like to do it. When I get up it means that the question has been long enough.

Mr. Nielsen: Turn to your right.

Madam Speaker: I would appreciate it if hon. members would not force me to yell. I will not yell. However, I would like hon. members to resume their seats when I stand.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

Mr. Clark: No answer to the last question.

EFFECT OF HIGHER MORTGAGE RATES ON SINGLE MOTHERS

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance who only seems to be able to smile through the increasing number of hardship cases in the country. I would ask the minister if he has considered the case of a single mother who is trying to keep her children together, who has two part-time jobs which are only of a temporary nature, and who is suddenly faced with an increase in mortgage payments from $250 to $375 a month, so that she is being forced out of her home by the high mortgage rate policy of this government and the increased home heating costs.

I want to ask, just how many more such women is that minister going to force out of their homes before he takes some action to relieve this situation?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, obviously it would be a matter of deep concern to the hon. member and to myself, if any particular citizen were forced out of his or her home—

Miss MacDonald: That's happening!

Mr. MacEachen: —or any family, in present circumstances. That would be a matter of deep concern and ought to be avoided if at all possible.

Yesterday I had an opportunity to meet with representatives of The Canadian Bankers' Association. I received assurances from that particular association that the banking community would bend over backwards to take every possible step in these difficult circumstances to avoid foreclosures such as are indicated by the hon. member, affecting home owners or, indeed, affecting farmers. I believe that that is a very important assurance that we ought to attempt to realize in the case of any citizen in the country.

If the hon. member has a particular person in mind upon whom the question has been based, I should like to have the facts in order to see whether the particular institution would take steps to avoid what the hon. member has described as being forced out of her home. I should like to help and have that avoided if at all possible.

Miss MacDonald: Madam Speaker, I will give that case to the minister and I would invite everybody in the country who is in the same position to do the same thing.

SOCIAL SECURITY

CHILD TAX CREDIT PROGRAM

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): It is not the banks that have initiated the high interest policy; it is the Minister of Finance. The minister talks about conflicts. I want to ask him about this headline that appeared in the Montreal Gazette on May 21, "Health Minister Proposes Higher Child Tax Credit". She was reported to have wanted to boost the child tax credit in order to help counter the impact of inflation upon the poor. Who speaks for the government in this respect?

Is even that limited means of relief now going down the drain as a result of the actions of the Minister of Finance?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I am sure that the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who is deeply concerned about the plight of Canadian families and the Canadian elderly, will be as sensitive as is the hon. member to the situation. If there are questions to be asked about the statement made by the hon. minister, then I think they can be directed to her.

The hon. member has frequently raised in the House the matter of the virtues of the energy tax credit. If it were in effect at the present time it would have provided for the type of person mentioned by the hon. member, for example recipients of the Guaranteed Income Supplement, in the amount of about $40 or $80 per year. We have provided $420, indexed, this year. That is the type of difference between our performance and the hon. member's rhetoric.

FISHERIES

CANADA-UNITED STATES SALMON FISHING AGREEMENT

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. Very important international negotiations are going on concerning the west coast. On May 26 a tuna agreement was signed between the U.S. and Canada without any opportunity for this House to debate it, or any opportunity for the fisheries and forestry committee to investigate it.

In view of the fact that we are constantly and regularly carrying on salmon negotiations which will be very important to the fishing industry and to the public in British Columbia, I should like to ask the minister what assurances we might have in this House that the salmon agreement will come to the House for debate before it is passed?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I do not know if it is the tradition of this House to have a debate and a vote of the type that the U.S. Senate seem to have in their constitution. I am not an expert on these matters. Certainly the issue of international negotiations was the subject of considerable discussion at the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry. The tuna agreement was interpreted as giving Canadians a number of advantages, including port privileges that fishermen had been seeking for a number of years. It looked as if it was a very good treaty for both sides and we agreed, and signed it. It certainly was open for discussion and for questions from the hon. member, who knew that these negotiations had been going on at the fisheries and forestry committee.

• (1430)

OPPORTUNITY FOR DEBATE

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question. If there were not so many other crises in the fishing industry as a result of this minister's inaction, we might have been able to deal with the tuna fishery. I want to pursue this.

The minister has now split the advisory committee which is dealing with the salmon negotiations into a north advisory committee and a south advisory committee. This will further increase the secrecy of those negotiations within the fishing industry. In view of the fact that the United States is upping the ante constantly during those negotiations, would the minister give us his assurance, assurance that the Secretary of State for External Affairs indicated last year, that indeed there could be parliamentary debate before any ratification of this treaty?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, the hon. member speaks about dealing with the tuna issue. We have dealt with it. We have come to an agreement and we have signed it.

As to the question of dividing the committees, it is obvious that those areas in the northern or the southern parts of British Columbia have different points of view. They felt they wanted to be heard in their particular forum and I see nothing secret about that. As the hon. member knows, the negotiations are obviously confidential until such time as proposals are put on the table. I would not want to comment further while negotiations are going on.

Mr. Miller: Madam Speaker, with regard to the past history of negotiations, at one time the east coast and the west coast negotiations were linked together. We have seen the result of what has happened on the east coast. I am tempted to get some commitment from the government that we will not have the same situation occurring with the salmon treaty on the west coast, which may be signed this summer.

MECHANISM TO DELAY APPROVAL OF SALMON TREATY

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): My supplementary question is addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. On October 24, 1980, I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether the government was considering some mechanism by which we could have a look at these treaties, in the same way the U.S. Senate foreign relations committee does. At that time the minister indicated that the government had not gone far enough to determine that mechanism.

Could we have some idea today if we have a mechanism, or whether his department has suggested a mechanism by which we can delay the government's approval of a salmon treaty at least until the U.S. Senate foreign relations committee has ratified it at that level?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I think it is important to state to the House that at no time, at least not since I have been Secretary of State for External Affairs, have we made any link between east coast and west coast issues of the kind implied by the hon. member.

With respect to the other question which the hon. member raised about consideration before ratification, we can ratify in any way we see fit. It is not the tradition here to have consideration by the House before ratification. We have no proposal of that kind to advance at this time, nor are we bound to act in any certain time frame with reference to the action of the United States Senate.

INVESTIGATION OF URANIUM INDUSTRY—ACCESS TO CABINET DOCUMENTS

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. It touches on the uranium cartel. You will recall that last Thursday in response to a question I put to the Prime Minister, he stated:

> I will have to take that question as notice.

That response was given in reply to the following question:

> Would the Prime Minister indicate whether all cabinet documents including minutes and memoranda of cabinet were shown to the director—

The director referred to is the director of investigation under the Combines Investigation Act.

In view of the fact that Canadian Press now reports that the director has said that he did not have access to those cabinet documents, would the Prime Minister confirm if that was so, and if it was so, would the Prime Minister try to explain to the House why that information was withheld but similar information was given to the McDonald commission?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I am informed that the director of combines investigation had access to all cabinet documents he requested, except cabinet minutes.

I am informed that the combines director reported that he did not have to have access to those minutes, and that he was able to make his report without them. If that is the case, Madam Speaker, I fail to see how the hon. member opposite can allege that the investigation was not complete and was not based on all the documents required.

Mr. Nielsen: Make it public.

INFORMATION GIVEN TO DIRECTOR

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, in his briefing session, was the Prime Minister also informed that the director was perhaps told that he could have access to such cabinet minutes only if he could link possible evidence in those minutes with some implication involving cabinet ministers themselves?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I cannot say if he was told that. I can indicate what the government policy is on cabinet minutes. They are one of the most privileged kinds of documents that exist in government. Minutes have been taken only in the past few decades. It is a procedure followed by cabinet forms of government. The secrecy of discussions between ministers and the frankness of discussions are essential to the very notion and existence of cabinet government.

There was, to my knowledge, one exception, when minutes were shown to a royal commission. It occurred when Commissioner McDonald suggested there might be some reasonable and probable cause to believe that maybe some infringement of the law had taken place. In that instance our government consented to show the McDonald commission that particular minute.

I think that outside of such very exceptional circumstances the convention of secrecy of discussion between ministers, secrecy under the Privy Council oath, which has been established for centuries in parliamentary systems of government, should be preserved.

Mr. Stevens: Even if they are implicated?

ENERGY

OIL PRICING AGREEMENT—INSTRUCTIONS GIVEN TO MINISTER

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister knows we have historic high interest rates in Canada today. They are in excess of 20 per cent. The Minister of Finance has said this is primarily due to the weak state of the Canadian dollar and that we have to worry about our Canadian dollar and to keep our interest rates in line with U.S. interest rates so as to protect it.

The Prime Minister will also know that most economists say that the only way to change this situation and to bring interest rates down is to have a quick solution to the energy pricing agreement. I can refer him to his own adviser, Doctor Slater, who said:

> The first step to a stronger Canadian economy must be a speedy resolution of the energy pricing dispute.

In view of this, has the Prime Minister instructed the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to make major changes in the new energy policy in order to get an agreement with the oil producing provinces under discussion today? Has the Prime Minister done that and can we expect serious progress? Or is it that today's meeting will be one of just play acting with no serious changes being contemplated by the government? If the minister is not successful today, will the Prime Minister consider changing his chief negotiator to try to get a settlement?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I told the House yesterday that the minister was instructed by the government to seek an agreement, and we hope he will achieve one. I do not think the fault is with our negotiator or, for that matter, with the Alberta negotiator. There are two different points of view about the nature of our country. One is that it is a community of communities, and the other is that it is a united nation which must share. We feel that our view of Canada would not change whether we change one negotiator or another. I hope a compromise will be found between these two views of Canada, perhaps a rapprochement of views.

Mr. Andre: It is hard to share power.

Mr. Trudeau: I believe the hon. member, the former minister of finance, is correct in stating that a solution to the energy problem would be beneficial, not only to the Canadian dollar and the Canadian economy, but to Canadians generally, and we ardently hope for that.

I think perhaps he shows his ignorance of the real situation when he seems to say that is the only cause. He knows, or he should know, that countries such as Germany, France, Italy and Japan—

Mr. Andre: What about Switzerland?

Mr. Trudeau: —are complaining very bitterly about the monetary policy of high interest rates followed in the United States, which has impacted on their own countries, and caused devaluations of their currencies which have been even more severe in relative terms than the Canadian dollar has experienced in recent months. He should know that this problem is not caused in Canada by one effect. It has worldwide effect, regardless of the energy policies of these various countries I have just mentioned.

Mr. Clark: Blame Burma.

POSSIBLE CHANGES IN GOVERNMENT POLICIES

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is also for the Prime Minister. There is another point of view that this country should be treated as France is, with one central government and ten prefects appointed by the central power to govern the country. That is the view the Prime Minister seems to believe in.

The Prime Minister says that he hopes his negotiator will get an agreement. Have the Prime Minister and his government told the negotiator to make some serious changes in the government's posture so that an agreement is attainable? Obviously if the government continues with the policies it has enunciated to date, taking all of the increases in oil and gas prices through federal taxation, leaving nothing for the producer, there will be no agreement. Has the government given the negotiator room to negotiate properly, reasonably and responsibly, or is the government going to continue to be great deceiver it has been ever since January, 1980?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I fail to understand why the hon. member chooses France as an example of a unified state. The United Kingdom is also a unified state. It does not even have ten prefects. I am not quite sure what the hon. member is implying by choosing France as a unified country that we should imitate.

Mr. Crosbie: What have you got against France?

Mr. Trudeau: With regard to his instruction to the minister to make serious changes to his posture, the minister told the House that when he met with his counterpart in Alberta last month he made very considerable and serious changes in many areas, including pricing policy. The meeting held this week was essentially to see if the Alberta government would be equally as flexible and make some changes to its posture.

THE CENSUS

REMOVAL AND OPENING OF COMPLETED FORMS

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Supply and Services in his role as minister responsible for Statistics Canada, an agency which apparently made a commitment to Canadians to protect confidentiality in the taking of the census. In my constituency the census forms were placed by individuals in the mail and addressed to Ottawa. They were removed from the local post office and examined by the census managers and census takers. Individuals in the community were then telephoned and challenged on the veracity of their returns. Will the minister explain under what authority census forms are being removed from the post office, and by what authority local census managers and census takers inspect the forms of their neighbours and challenge their veracity?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, the process which is followed is that the forms are mailed in the region where the data is collected. In terms of the specific items the hon. members has alleged, I will be pleased to receive particulars, have them checked out, and provide him with a full report.

CONFIDENTIALITY OF RETURNS

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, the incidents of—I would hesitate to use the term violations of confidence—are so numerous it would require an enormous list to detail them for the minister. The census manager in the area has acknowledged that these were removed from the post office and screened. I will cite two cases briefly. One person, a foreign guest on a farm, was challenged. The examples are numerous. Will the minister acknowledge that the filling out of those forms is not a confidential undertaking and there are many examples of neighbours and others employed as census takers being privy to the information in those so-called confidential forms?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, I want to advise the hon. member and offer him every guarantee that there is complete confidentiality with regard to all information contained in the census form.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Blais: After the forms are completed and submitted, they are reviewed by people within Statistics Canada who are sworn to secrecy under the Statistics Act. It is reasonable to expect that the information has to be reviewed in terms of its accuracy in the sense that those who have completed the forms have done so properly and have provided accurate information. Some checks are performed by people who are charged under the Statistics Act with verification of the information contained in them. There is no doubt that the Statistics Act provides that every individual who deals with the census forms must swear that none of the information is to be revealed except in accordance with the process that is followed under the Statistics Act.

DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF NEW POLICY CONCERNING TEXTILES, CLOTHING AND FOOTWEAR

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Sherbrooke): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The workers in the textile, clothing and footwear industries are increasingly concerned. I would like the minister to say whether he intends to make an early announcement concerning the new Canadian textile, clothing and footwear policies, and when those policies will be made public?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, as a government our priority is to concentrate our efforts on drafting a new policy for the textile and clothing industry. I hope it will be possible for the government to complete that task and make a policy statement within the next few weeks. We are now actively working on our new policy for the footwear industry, and I am confident that it will be possible to take certain decisions well before the expiry date of the current quota system.

GRAIN

QUERY CONCERNING INITIAL PRICE FOR WHEAT

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): My question is directed to the Minister of Transport who answers in this House on matters pertaining to the Canadian Wheat Board. Since 1971 it has been the policy of the government to announce initial prices to be paid by the Wheat Board prior to that crop being put in the ground. This year Senator Argue stated that the initial price would not be announced until the crop was in the ground. I have two questions for the minister. First, why has this policy, which has been in effect for ten years, been changed? Second, if we are to believe Senator Argue, when will the announcement be made as to initial prices, because the prairie crop has virtually been completed as far as seeding is concerned?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the Senator has said in public a number of times that he expects to make the announcement about initial payments before the beginning of the new crop year, that is, before August 1. The reason he has given is that in view of the volatility of prices at this time, he prefers to come up late with a firm commitment rather than earlier with a vague one.

CALL FOR HIGHER INITIAL PRICES

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Can the minister indicate now what he thinks the initial prices will be when they are announced—whether they will be up or down compared to the prices now being paid? I encourage the minister to set the prices as high as possible because the Canadian Wheat Board is able to borrow money at prime minus one quarter. The Minister of Finance continually berates the opposition for, on one hand, calling for increased government expenditures and, on the other, screaming about increased deficits. This is one way of putting money into circulation without increasing the deficit. As I said, the Canadian Wheat Board is in a position to borrow money at a considerably lower rate than the farmers.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, if I were to indicate the level today, I would be announcing the initial price. I will advise the minister responsible for the Wheat Board of the hon. member's views.

ENERGY

INTRODUCTION OF TAX CREDIT PROGRAM—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: Quiet, please.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: The price of gasoline has risen by 60 cents a gallon since the election in which the Prime Minister and his party ridiculed the government of the day for increasing the price of gasoline by a mere 18 cents. As contact with the people has told every member of this House that low-income Canadians desperately need an energy tax credit today to help them meet these steadily rising prices, prices that are going to continue to rise as the weeks and months go by, would the Prime Minister not confer with his cabinet again with the point in mind of introducing an energy tax credit as soon as possible, so that the people who really need the extra money to meet these high energy prices will be able to do so?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I am surprised that such an experienced politician would say that his government was defeated because of us. Surely it was defeated because of the hon. member and his colleagues, who promised an energy tax credit, which would have been $40 a year in the year succeeding the election and then $80 a year to countervail price increases which were devastating to the Canadian consumer. That was why. It was not because of the high prices proposed by the hon. member's party alone. It was because of the unfairness in the way their 18-cent excise tax and their price increases would have hit the Canadian people. It was just a countervail of $80 a year. That was why, within months of our election, we brought in the increased guaranteed income supplement, which would give the most needy of Canadians something like $420 a year to begin with and, of course, that has escalated, as the hon. member knows.

Mr. Hees: Madam Speaker, as usual the Prime Minister's was no answer at all because he knows perfectly well that the vast numbers of people who need this extra money to meet this extra energy cost are not all old age pensioners who are receiving the supplement. There are a great many other people of a far younger age who need this money, and the Prime Minister knows it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

POSSIBLE CONSEQUENCE OF GOVERNMENT ACTIONS

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, does the Prime Minister not honestly think that this business of ridiculing a policy during an election and then, immediately the election is over, introducing that same policy and adding two or three times to it, is liable to backfire on the Prime Minister and his government one of these days, just as the introduction of wage and price controls did when the election of 1979 rolled around?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is looking into the future a few years down the road. I am suggesting that he look at what happened at his own policy convention just two months ago when it supported an increase to 75 per cent of world prices forthwith.

Some hon. Members: Over four years.

Mr. Trudeau: The resolution was to move quickly to that. I think that kind of mistake would not have been made at the convention—nor, indeed, would the budget of the hon. member for St. John's West have been the way it was—if the hon. member himself had been in the cabinet to show his wise ways as an experienced politician.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: That is a very unfair reply.

CORPORATE AFFAIRS

INQUIRY INTO URANIUM INDUSTRY—OBTAINING OF LEGAL ADVICE

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice and it has to do with the uranium cartel. That is a cartel which may involve activities by members of the government which could be subject to charge.

I assume that to avoid any conflict of interest in the conduct of that inquiry some official of the government, either the combines investigation director or someone else, may have sought independent legal advice on matters relating to the cartel. I wonder if the Minister of Justice can tell the House of Commons whether the director of combines investigation, or anyone else on behalf of the government, did seek independent legal advice and, if so, whether a copy of that advice was communicated to the minister and is in the minister's hands now.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, at the beginning of the inquiry it was recommended to the director that he hire some legal advisers from outside, and so he did. These legal advisers worked on this inquiry for many years. They reported to the director, Mr. Bertrand, who in turn transmitted their findings and their recommendations to me. That is the problem I am studying at this time.

NATURE OF LEGAL OPINION

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, can the Minister of Justice tell the House of Commons whether that independent legal opinion suggests that there is sufficient evidence for any charge to be laid against anyone?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I have the report which was transmitted by Mr. Bertrand when he was the director, in front of me, and I am looking into the report. I have to decide if, yes or no, there is evidence against corporations or individuals and decide whether to take action against them. It is a very voluminous file. We are studying it at this time and, of course, when we have reached our conclusion, we will follow the normal course every attorney general of Canada has to take in such circumstances.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, it may be that the minister did not understand my question. We would like to see, naturally, the full report of the Bertrand inquiry, and we would like to know whether the director of combines investigation recommended any kind of legal action. We would like to know that.

My question had to do with the independent legal advice which was sought and secured by the government and is now in the hands of the Minister of Justice. Does that independent legal opinion indicate that there is enough evidence to warrant charges against any individual?

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, the legal opinion to which I referred is part and parcel of the report of the director which has been transmitted to me for decision.

HUMAN RIGHTS

ACTIVITIES OF KU KLUX KLAN—GOVERNMENT PROGRAM TO COMBAT RACISM

Mr. Roland de Corneille (Eglinton-Lawrence): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Multiculturalism. The minister will know that twice recently this House has unanimously condemned the activities of the Ku Klux Klan. In light of the concern among all hon. members about this extremist group, can the minister confirm and clarify press reports of this morning that the government is implementing a comprehensive national program to combat racism?

Hon. Jim Fleming (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Madam Speaker, as expressed by all hon. members of this House, I think twice earlier this year, in motions under Standing Order 43, I also am very concerned about and repulsed by racist activity in Canada. I think at least one of those motions indicated the feeling that there is an increase in this activity.

All members of Parliament will be receiving today notice of a three-pronged program which will be an effort to reconsider the criminal law and whether it in any way aids and abets racist activity in its desire to have free speech; to try to provide the government with the capacity to get at the roots of racism; and finally, to provide a public education program to work with the policy and educators.

An hon. Member: Okay, that's enough.

Mr. Fleming: I hear some protests from the other side. I do not think I have hogged the Question Period lately.

INDUSTRY

EXAMINATION OF FIRMS RECEIVING GRANTS UNDER DEFENCE INDUSTRY PRODUCTION PROGRAM

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce regarding defence industry production program grants. Does the ministry investigate the managerial practices of the companies which are to be given grants prior to the grants being approved? In particular, is there an investigation to determine whether a company given a grant pays the wage rates which are applicable and prevailing in the area in which the company is located and, second, to determine that the jobs which are created are jobs for which Canadians are given first priority and for which Canadians are trained rather than the company's seeking employees outside the country?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, the purpose of the program, for which the federal government has recently increased the base funding by 50 per cent, is to provide support and encouragement for key industries in Canada such as the aerospace industry, the electronics industry, and the telecommunications industry. The aerospace industry, because of this support, has grown so that it now employs some 42,000 people across Canada.

It is expected that companies receiving this support meet requirements relevant to provincial and federal law regarding wage rates and place of origin of employees. I would be happy to check further into any specific case my hon. friend wants to bring to my attention, if he is suggesting this is not the situation.

GRANT TO EBCO INDUSTRIES LTD., VANCOUVER

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I am pleased the minister has given me this thumbnail sketch of the program, but that was not what I was seeking. I want to know whether there is an investigation conducted to determine whether the company pays the wage rates which prevail in the area in which it is located, and whether the company provides job opportunities for Canadians rather than seeking persons outside the country for skilled labour jobs.

I would also like to ask the minister if he would investigate the $6.7 million grant given to EBCO Industries Limited of the greater Vancouver area to determine whether the company is in violation of these two very basic principles.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, wage rates are generally matters of provincial law, and questions of whether Canadians are employed are matters of our immigration law enforced by the Department of Employment and Immigration. I would be happy to check with my colleagues in the relevant provincial and federal departments to see that the rules are being followed.

Basically the purpose of DIPP grants is to help companies buy often very expensive capital equipment to engage in advanced technological activity in aerospace and related fields, and to carry out innovative and high technology activities in them. I would be happy to get further information about the points my friend raised.

THE MONARCHY

MARRIAGE OF PRINCE CHARLES

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. May I ask the Prime Minister what plans his government has made to celebrate in Canada the marriage on July 29 of Prince Charles, heir to the throne of Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I do not know if any plans are being made in any of the government departments. I will inquire.

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, I can tell the Prime Minister that I have already made inquiries with the Secretary of State's office who informs me that no plans for celebrations have been made. It is interesting to note the applause opposite, from a minister of the Crown, Madam Speaker.

DECISION RESPECTING COMMEMORATIVE STAMP

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): In the absence of the Postmaster General I direct a question to the Acting Postmaster General. On July 29 the government of Australia will be issuing two commemorative stamps to commemorate the royal wedding. The suggestion had also been made to the Canadian Postmaster General. Why was the decision made not to issue a commemorative stamp in Canada?

Mr. Gary F. McCauley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I am not aware that any decision has been made one way or the other—

Mr. Clark: About anything.

Mr. McCauley: —but I will take note of the hon. member's representation and find out for him.

EXTERNAL AID

CONSTRUCTION OF GRAIN STORAGE IN ALGERIA

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Madam Speaker, I have a very brief question for the Prime Minister. Prior to his recent trip to Algeria I asked him to look into a grain storage project in that country which is to be constructed by an Italian consortium, but a major portion is being financed by CIDA, which portion has been temporarily allotted to a Swiss firm. Would the Prime Minister indicate whether or not he had any success in having this important contract awarded, as it properly should be, to a Canadian firm?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member, who gave me notice of this question a few weeks ago. I am not sure I recollect every detail of the answer, but I do recollect while I was in Algiers discussing this matter with the Canadian businessman who is at the head of the company building the facility. I ascertained that in every CIDA project we have with Algeria and other countries there is a large measure of Canadian content. I cannot give the exact percentages from memory, but I can assure the hon. member that every time there is a CIDA project and that work can be done in Canada, we ensure that the maximum amount possible is done in Canada.

REQUEST THAT CONTRACT BE AWARDED TO CANADIAN FIRM

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Madam Speaker, I have a very brief supplementary. I have been trying for two weeks to get the question asked so I can appreciate it is difficult for the Prime Minister to remember. Would he give me the assurance of his office that he will put every pressure on to have this particular contract awarded to a Canadian firm as it should be when it is financed by CIDA?

Mr. Crosbie: Canadianization.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member realizes, I am sure, that many of our efforts in aid to Third World countries are channelled through tripartite or multipartite agreements, and very frequently it helps Canadian business and workers to get a project if they are combined with funders from other lands. That is why frequently you will see in a particular CIDA project it is a matter of co-operation between Canada and one or two other countries. I cannot give the hon. member the assurance that this will discontinue. If it did, it might result in Canada not getting any of these aid projects under way at all.

PRIVILEGE

MR. PEPIN—CORRECTION RESPECTING DUBIN REPORT

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I shall be brief. I think that everyone knows that I do not take offence easily. In fact, this is only the second time in 12 years as a parliamentarian that I have risen on a question of privilege. However, if I did not object today to what was said yesterday in the House by another member, my colleagues and the public might accept his version of the facts.

Citation 316 of Beauchesne clearly states that, and I quote:

—a Member, while speaking, must not:

e) impute bad motives to another Member—

Yes, this is what happened yesterday, Madam Speaker. The hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) stated that I have had in my possession since March 17, which was three months ago, the report known as the Dubin report. If this were true, the House and the public would have very good reasons to believe that I neglected my duty in not drawing this report to the attention of the public and the House as soon as possible and in not taking action to follow up on it. However, such is not the case, Madam Speaker. I wish to emphasize very strongly that while the letter addressed to me by the judge is indeed dated March 17, the report had to be translated, corrected and printed, and I only received it on May 25. I tabled it in the House as soon as possible.

Madam Speaker: Order, please! The question of privilege raised by the hon. minister is based on a difference of opinion concerning the date on which the report was received. This is not a matter of privilege. The hon. minister has set the record straight. I suppose that the House will accept his statement in that spirit.

[English]

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, the minister has accused me of imputing motives to him and I have not done that.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member quoted Beauchesne to the effect that a member should not impute motives. That was exactly the substance of what the minister said. He did not accuse the hon. member of imputing motives, he said that hon. members should not impute motives.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Forrestall: On a point of order, Madam Speaker, the matter is not going to be discharged that lightly.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Forrestall: The minister has seriously misled this House, or his parliamentary secretary has seriously misled this House, and I am quite prepared to put a motion in this connection.

Madam Speaker: Order. If the hon. member has that feeling, he has his recourse and he can use it. I do not remember whether the hon. member raised this the other day as a point of order or a question of privilege, but I believe I ruled in his case that he did not have either a point of order or a question of privilege. I have now ruled that the minister does not have a question of privilege and those two matters are closed. If there are other matters that hon. members wish to bring to the attention of the House, they are perfectly free to do so under the proper procedure.

ANTI-SEMITIC LITERATURE

Question No. 1,945—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is the government aware of anti-semitic literature being mailed from somewhere in the Toronto area to various persons through a post office bearing the postal code M4L 3T0 and, if so, what is the location of the post office?

2. Has the matter been investigated by the RCMP for possible action under the Criminal Code?

3. Is the government aware that the material appears to be printed in the United States, mailed in Canada and contains a slander of the most extreme nature to the Jewish people?

4. Is the government aware that readers are urged to write "Common Sense", Union, New Jersey, to a publication firm known as LIBERTY BELL or to another firm known as WESTERN FRONT, Box 27854, Hollywood, California, for further information and material?

5. Will the government take steps to put an end to such material being circulated through the Canadian postal service and to lay possible charges under the Criminal Code against those involved?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): 1. The Solicitor General has received complaints that literature of this nature was being mailed from Toronto. The Solicitor General informed the RCMP, who subsequently notified the police authority having jurisdiction, the Metropolitan Toronto Police Force. Postal code M4L 3T0 is assigned to the Toronto South Mail Processing Plant, 969 Eastern Avenue, Toronto.

2. No. This matter is within the jurisdiction of the Metropolitan Toronto Police Force. The laying of charges for publishing hate literature requires the approval of a provincial attorney general.

3. Yes.

4. Yes.

5. A determination whether or not such literature constitutes hate propaganda as described by section 281.1 of the Criminal Code is the responsibility of the police force and provincial attorney general having jurisdiction. The Post Office Act provides discretionary power to the Postmaster General to issue a prohibitory order if he believes, on reasonable grounds, that the transmission of such literature through the mails involves the commission or attempted commission of an offence. Literature of a very similar nature has been referred to the Postmaster General for such a determination.

Order Paper Questions

MEDICAL RESEARCH COUNCIL—USE OF ANIMALS

Question No. 2,330—Mr. Young:

1. Are government funds used by the Medical Research Council to look into alternative methods of conducting research that do not involve large-scale use of animals?

2. Is the use of such funds monitored and, if so, by what method?

3. Are steps taken to alleviate the pain involved in these experiments and, if so, what are they?

Mr. Doug Frith (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. The Medical Research Council itself is not carrying out any study of methods of conducting research that do not involve the use of animals.

2. Any investigator seeking Medical Research Council funds for research must indicate whether or not he proposes to use animals and, if so, he must undertake to follow the guidelines for the care and treatment of experimental animals laid down by the Canadian Council on Animal Care. The use of animals in the laboratory is monitored locally by animal care committees in the universities where the research is carried out, and is subject to on-site inspection by the Canadian Council on Animal Care.

3. Proposals involving the use of animals submitted to the Medical Research Council are carefully scrutinized by its review committees to ensure that animals will not be subjected to unnecessary pain. Proposals which appear to involve any inhumane or unethical treatment of animals are not funded.

PUBLIC DEBT 1981-82

Question No. 2,456—Mr. Cossitt:

What is the government's estimate of what the size of the (a) gross (b) net public debt will be at the end of the fiscal year 1981-82?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): The forecasts for gross and net public debt consistent with the October 28, 1980 budget are $137 billion and $96 billion at the end of the fiscal year 1981-82.

PRESENT PUBLIC DEBT AND INTEREST COST

Question No. 2,476—Mr. Herbert:

1. What is the present public debt of the government and what is the average percentage interest cost payable on the debt?

2. To the knowledge of the government, what are the comparable figures for the provinces?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): 1. A preliminary estimate of the gross public debt as of March 31, 1981, is $122 billion. For the fiscal year 1980-81 the average interest cost payable on the debt was roughly 9.1 per cent. The average rate on the interest-bearing portion of debt was about 10.5 per cent.

2. The present debt of the provincial-local-hospital sector is estimated to be about $64 billion. The average interest cost for 1980-81 was roughly 10.2 per cent.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, if question No. 2,369 could be made an order for return, this return would be tabled immediately.

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Is it the pleasure of the House that question No. 2,369 be deemed to have been made an order for return?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CANADIAN SALES OR AID TO U.S.S.R.

Question No. 2,369—Mr. Cook:

1. Are goods and services currently being provided by Canadian companies to the Soviet Union and, if so (a) which goods and services (b) what is the dollar value?

2. In the past five fiscal years, did Canada provide foreign aid to the Soviet Union and, if so, in what amount and in what form?

3. Which Canadian company sells the most goods and/or services to the Soviet Union and what is the dollar value?

Return tabled.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Towers: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am wondering if the parliamentary secretary would be in a position to answer question No. 1,891 which was put on the Order Paper on December 17. These are questions relating to the conditions which exist in the Post Office; they are very pertinent at the present time. Possibly it would be advantageous to all of us if we could have answers to those questions prior to the proclamation of the new Post Office Act.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, I will take this matter up with the Postmaster General.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

EXCISE TAX ACT AND EXCISE ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed, from Tuesday, June 9, consideration of Bill C-57, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, and motions Nos. 11, 12, 13, 56, 57, 58 and 59.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Lincoln): Madam Speaker, last evening when we adjourned debate on Bill C-57, I accepted the invitation of the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) to comment on the proposed taxes as they affect the Canadian wine industry. This invitation was also extended by my good friend, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), who is celebrating his twenty-fourth anniversary today as a member of the House of Commons and, I might say, a very valuable member.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: As one who has spoken out on innumerable occasions in the House and across the country on the wine industry, my feeling at this moment is one of relief in terms of the taxes proposed by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). Although no one welcomes taxes, even those imposed upon such traditional areas as wine, spirits, beer and tobacco, my relief stems from my ability to compare the proposals of the Minister of Finance and those of the former minister of finance who invited me to participate.

The plea of the hon. member for St. John's West last night for the workers in the beer and wine industry was strange. It was a very eloquent plea, I might add. One would be hard-pressed to come to the conclusion that he was referring to the same people in the wine and beer industries against which he brought in some Draconian measures.

What were the two main features of the Crosbie budget? I suppose insensitivity was the main one. There was an excise tax on gasoline of 18 cents and, in some cases, 25 cents. I am thinking of the farmers of Lincoln, fruit farmers, grape growers and farmers in general. Also I am thinking of fishermen and the effect of this tax on the transportation of handicapped people. When one couples the tax on the wine industry specifically with the proposals included in the Tory budget, one can understand the anger, frustration and disappointment of the grape growers and fruit farmers of the Niagara peninsula.

Mr. Lambert: You are misleading the House, do not forget the rebate.

Mr. Mackasey: The Minister of Finance is proposing that once a year the tax on wine, beer and spirits be indexed to the cost of living in such a manner that the relationship between the tax and the retail price will be constant. This is nothing unusual. It is precisely the philosophy of the ad valorem tax. It is the reverse of the indexing which is part of our tax system when incomes are calculated for tax purposes and when the cost of living index is used to increase the guaranteed income supplement every three months.

I should like to return to the proposals of the hon. member for St. John's West and why I am relieved our Minister of Finance had an open mind and was sympathetic to the representations which I and others made to him. More important, he agreed that it would be wrong to implement the recommendations of his predecessor, the hon. member for St. John's West.

What did the former minister propose to do? He is the same person who rose last night to castigate my party, particularly myself and others, for not caring about the wine industry. What did he propose in his 1979 budget which defeated the Tory government just in time to give the country a second chance?

Mr. Lambert: Tell the whole story.

Mr. Mackasey: The "hon. chorus" has begun already and I have hardly started. Traditionally the wine and beer industry has been considered an extension of the agricultural sector. The hon. member opposite knows that. After all, corn, wheat, grapes, rye, apples and barley are all important to those industries. Without those industries, there is no outlet or very little outlet for our grapes. Thus, it is in the interests of everyone to foster and encourage the growth of those industries.

Thanks to the enlightened approach to the whole problem of the grape growing industry of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) in recent years, there has been a transitional period during which some grape growers have been able to convert to different types of vines, fruit and grapes. This has permitted the Canadian industry a greater latitude. Now they are able to produce table wines similar to German wines. This takes time, approximately five, six or seven years.

The former minister of finance decided that wine and beer would no longer be considered an extension of the agricultural industry. He decided that it was to be another source of income. He was totally insensitive to the representations of the farmers of Lincoln and the Niagara Peninsula. It was efficient and effective; it was drawn up by faithful public servants in his department. The basis of the tax on wine and beer henceforth was not to be related to the fact that they were an extension of the agricultural industry; it was to be linked to alcoholic content. These public servants recognized that there are variations in the alcoholic content of wine. So in order to receive every cent in taxation, or to tax it to its ultimate, they categorized wine. They put into one category what is known as fortified wine with an alcoholic content of over 14 per cent.

Of course, the danger was obvious. The grapes which are traditionally used for that category of wine are grown in the Niagara Peninsula. They are known as the Labrusca grapes. To come along and impose a Draconian tax—and I will mention the figures in a few minutes—on that industry, at a time when Canadian tastes were changing from fortified wines with high alcoholic content to table wines, was the straw which broke the camel's back.

This is a serious point; I am not trying to make political hay. Canadians had an opportunity to assess the Crosbie budget and to put that party out of office. I am sure they would do it all over again, because the last election was fought on the commitment of the Conservative party to reintroduce precisely the same budget with all its flaws which I am pointing out.

The impact of the Crosbie budget, as opposed to the budget of the present Minister of Finance, would have been to increase the tax on wines with over a 14 per cent alcoholic content by $2.45. But the budget proposal of the minister of finance of the Conservative government was to raise the excise rate on wine in which the alcoholic content was over 14 per cent from 55 cents to $3, an increase of $2.45—a percentage increase of 445 per cent.

The ex-minister spoke eloquently last night about the beer industry. He said that the workers of Canada traditionally love their beer. He spoke eloquently about their ability to export their product. But how did he treat them when he had the opportunity to put into practice his concerns for the same people? We are talking today about a matter which occurred less than two years ago. He was prepared to raise the excise tax on beer by 29 per cent, which again would have a detrimental effect on the farmers of Canada. At the same time he was limiting the tax on alcoholic spirits to 5 per cent—a 90-cent increase from $16.25 to $17.15.

It is obvious that the ex-minister, who was castigating civil servants last night, was quite prepared to accept their insensitive advice, which was to base taxes on alcoholic content, thereby showing no concern, no recognition or appreciation of the fact that the beer industry and the wine industry of this country are extensions of the agricultural community. He did not recognize that an expanding wine industry is important to the agricultural growers in the Niagara Peninsula, if you do not want them to give up in despair and hand their properties over to developers, or allow cities such as St. Catharines to expand and become more urban than rural.

Mr. McDermid: Tell us about the wine at Air Canada.

Mr. Mackasey: The hon. gentleman knows more about Air Canada than I do—

Mr. McDermid: We all do; the whole House does.

Mr. Mackasey: We won't get into that, because my chance will come. You guys were very happy about what you did to me in Air Canada! I can talk about that another day, about the jackals surrounding a wolf.

The point I want to talk about is the impact the proposals of the former minister of finance would have had if the present Minister of Finance had adopted them. For all intents and purposes, if we were voting on the proposals tonight, and they passed, then the possibility of the grape growers continuing in business would be limited. A 300 per cent tax on fortified wine at the very time when there was a movement away from heavy wines would have a devastating effect. It would be the end of the industry. That was the proposal of the ex-minister of finance who last night was indignant because the present minister has suggested that once a year we increase tax according to a formula simply to maintain the real value of that tax, which has fallen significantly over the last ten years.

I am aware of the time, Mr. Speaker. I realize my allotted time is almost up. I would love to go on and talk about the other impacts the ex-minister's budget proposals would have had on the wine industry. I would like to deal with the excise tax on gasoline, something which we said we would never impose and which we have not imposed. That tax, coupled with the tax on wine, caused real concern in the industry. We voiced that concern to the present Minister of Finance. We met daily, weekly in caucus and in private meetings, with farm groups, with the wine institute and with the marketing board. We pleaded with the minister and his officials, telling them that such a tax proposed by the ex-minister of finance, and adopted for a short period of time by the present minister, was not only detrimental but discriminatory to the wine industry and the beer industry.

What was the result of our representations? I have been teased in this House by members opposite—and I should not blow my cool, it is not normal for me—for having made representations at every opportunity, which is why I was called upon last night to participate in this debate. I am glad that I am recognized in this House as the voice of the wine industry. I am pleased that I represent that industry so well and so effectively, the 900 farm families who are involved in the wine industry. I am pleased and proud that I have made that impact on the member for St. John's West. I am pleased that I have had enough influence with the present Minister of Finance and his very able colleague, the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières).

In conclusion, I want to point out what we succeeded in doing. We succeeded in having the Minister of Finance depart from that insensitive policy of his predecessor, to restore the traditional relationship between wine, beer and alcohol and to introduce a nominal tax which was more than accepted with good grace by the wine community of this country. If indexing proves to be a problem, I am sure the Minister of Finance will have no hesitation to rescind that policy after he has had an opportunity to test it.

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Mr. Speaker, we are dealing with motion Nos. 11, 12 and 13 with reference to proposed amendments to Bill C-57. These motions relate to the ad valorem tax with respect to alcohol and tobacco. I would not have taken this opportunity to rise to speak on this issue had I not had the benefit of hearing the very enlightened discussion which preceded me. The hon. member began his remarks today, adding to the remarks he made yesterday, by saying that he had a feeling of relief when he dealt with this tax problem. His feeling of relief is not to be confused with relief from taxation, because clearly that is not what we have. We have the imposition of taxation in a form which is offensive in a number of ways. I shall come to that in a moment.

First, I would like to refer to some of the comments made by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Mackasey) both yesterday and today. He began his address by indicating that he had, when confronted with this ad valorem tax in committee, spoken in opposition to it, and he found it offensive. Yet he has also indicated to the House that it is his intention to vote for the measure. Mr. Speaker, I have often wondered what the purpose of a speech in this House is. Is it in any way to be an indication of the way a member feels? Is it a written communiqué, printed in Hansard, which may be dispatched to one's constituents without regard to the fact that a vote, which may be taken days later, will show that there is absolutely no connection between what a member says and how he votes? I have found it startling that this practice has occurred with regularity in the past. I find it startling that the hon. member for Lincoln, who is now leaving the chamber, has recently indicated that that is the way in which he intends to behave. He has indicated that he is a great spokesman for the wine industry.

The hon. member for Lincoln was recently the chairman of the board of Air Canada, an airline which, while the hon. member held that post, never carried a bottle of Canadian wine. Either the hon. member is the representative of the wine industry looking after that industry in Canada, or he does not care for the industry. What he says in the House for the purpose of recording a speech can be sent home, should be dissociated entirely from the way in which he votes on an issue in this House.

He spoke of fostering and encouraging the growth of the farm industry in Canada. He spoke of the relationship between the wine industry and the farming industry. Well, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Lincoln shall be best remembered for fostering and encouraging growth in the unemployment insurance fund when he was in charge of that fund as a minister of the Crown. Indeed, that is the closest the hon. member has come to fostering and encouraging growth.

• (1530)

Most assuredly, the difficulty with respect to the imposition of this form of taxation is that it is doubly offensive, because not only is it an increase in tax, but it is an increase in tax which builds with the passage of time and raises the expectation of the government with regard to inflation. Tax increases alone, regardless of what form they may take, ought to be repugnant to hon. members of this House.

An hon. Member: Just like the provincial sales tax.

Mr. Gamble: Hon. members of this House have a responsibility to safeguard the welfare of the public. As best we can, regardless what side of the House we may come from, we must preserve the revenues of our constituencies. We should be concerned about the fact that every time we reach into a taxpayer's pocket, be it a corporation or an individual, we are depriving that taxpayer of an opportunity to use those funds for the purpose of expanding business operations or for necessary expenditures, from the standpoint of consumer spending. That should be our prime purpose.

Historically, Parliament has, indeed, been a place which has preserved and protected the citizenry against the rapacious appetites of government. As the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) honestly disclosed in the House, we know that ministers of finance have been led around by the nose by their deputy ministers and others in the bureaucracy seeking endless ways to dip into the public purse and into the pockets of the citizens of the country. We should be on our guard to protect the public from the appetite of government.

This particular measure has a built-in inflationary advantage. An ad valorem tax will produce either more revenue or less revenue for the treasury, depending upon the price of the item. There has not been a minister of finance known to man who has ever desired to collect less taxes. Therefore, it must be assumed that when a finance minister imposes an ad valorem tax, he intends to get more and not less. Since the tax is raised as a direct consequence of the fixing of the price of the item, we must know that the government expects the price of commodities to increase. If the government telegraphs to the public in Canada that it expects that the price of every item which is subject to tax under this bill will increase, then, in order that the public may, in fact, maintain a level of income which is equivalent to the level of increases in prices, the public should expect that the price of public services and the price of the public's disposition of commodities should increase.

By this measure, the government is therefore inducing the public to expect inflation to continue. It is asking the public to increase the price of goods and services. It is inviting the public to disregard the pleas of the government for restraint and to follow its lead in psychologically anticipating inflationary growth.

We have heard a great deal about the comparison between this measure and one which may have been contained in the budget of December, 1979.

An hon. Member: It was contained.

Mr. Gamble: The issue is not how to compare measures which were found to be unacceptable to the public in 1980, but, rather, whether this measure is acceptable to the public today. We know what happened to that budget. We know how the public responded. Hon. members on the government benches should consider how the public will respond to these offensive measures. Because that is what they are.

It is strange that generally government members and hon. members of the House cannot direct their attention to the simple matter before the House. Is it appropriate that we, as members of Parliament and guardians of the interests of the citizens of this country, should blithely follow the bureaucrats who recommend to the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) that this is the best way to reach deeper into the wallets and purses of Canadians? Our answer with respect to that very simple issue, the ad valorem tax, should be that we do not accept it.

The concept of ad valorem taxes spreads. The government of the province of Ontario, following the vicious lead of this government and followed, I understand, by the government of Newfoundland, are all anxious to participate in an ever-increasing reach into the pockets of Canadians.

It is a curious thing that at the very time this piece of legislation is before the House in its present form, the Minister of Finance should stand in his place during Question Period and, when asked whether it is the intention of the government to remove the indexing under the Income Tax Act, designed to save Canadians from inflationary pressures resulting in the extraction of more revenue without any greater genuine income, that the minister should reply that it is one of the matters which might be considered but that he has not made up his mind and this House will know whenever he is prepared to bring in his budget.

The deputy minister of finance, Ian Stewart, appeared last month before a committee of the Senate dealing with the indexing provisions of the Income Tax Act as they relate to rates and deductions. In answer to some of the questions posed to him, he indicated that the question is whether, by indexing as fully as it does, the government appears to be ratifying the people's right to protection from inflation. It was Mr. Stewart's view that what we had done as a consequence of indexing under the Income Tax Act was to create the false image in the minds of the public that it could be protected from inflation; and that was an error.

This measure is the reverse of the indexing under the Income Tax Act, as far as the taxpayers of Canada are concerned. If we approve this measure, we will catapult the government into a position where it believes that it can benefit from the imposition of inflation. Inflation itself is primarily caused—

Mr. Evans: That is totally false.

Mr. Gamble: —by the actions which are taken by government, either in the wasteful expenditure of government funds or through the amassing of giant deficits which have a direct effect upon the value of the Canadian dollar, which then has an effect upon increasing interest rates in Canada, which in turn pass through the entire economy, as an additional cost paid for by all Canadians.

It is clearly time that the members of this House sit and examine the legislation, in the discharge of their duties as members of Parliament as opposed to the discharge of their responsibilities to political parties, to determine whether they believe that it is appropriate for the government to take measures of this nature which are not in the best interests of Canadians under the present circumstances.

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say only a few words on this particular amendment, primarily to clarify some of the misstatements and misunderstandings which have been put forward by the hon. members opposite.

● (1540)

This particular provision indexes a fixed dollar amount tax, which converts it to exactly the same form as the retail sales tax that has been with us for years, the manufacturers' excise tax or value added taxes or ad valorem taxes. It does not in any way, shape or form allow the federal government to increase the real value of the tax that has been received. Indeed, it does just the opposite; it prevents the erosion of the tax base so that the real value of the tax received stays the same. It prevents the situation where every several years the government must recapture lost ground with a new tax.

As the hon. member for York North (Mr. Gamble) indicated, provincial governments have seen fit to do exactly the same thing and it makes a great deal of sense. Once a logical taxation structure is established for a certain commodity, in this case alcohol and tobacco, then it remains in place. We do not want to alter it and then, at a later date, bring in new legislation to modify it. By taking the steps we have, we ensure that the structure stays the same; the real value of the tax stays the same. It does not increase over time and it does not add real value to the tax base of the federal government, as it has not done to the tax base of provincial governments in the case of the retail sales tax or manufacturers' excise tax.

When talking about a bill as serious as C-57, it is unfortunate that hon. members opposite cannot keep to fair and honest debate regarding the facts, the merits and demerits of the case, instead of creating illusions for the public and accusing the government of motivations that do not exist or of doing things which are not in the public interest. That is not true, Mr. Speaker. The facts are there, the explanation is simple and I have tried to provide it to hon. members.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I am encouraged to rise and say a few words in response to the comments of the hon. member who just spoke. Of course, what he sees as facts are not necessarily so. As a matter of fact, facts are simply an interpretation of information.

When the hon. member says that this approach is a totally logical one, then one has to assume that the base for this indexation is logical. I recall very vividly that when the various spokespersons for the wine industry, the distilling industry and the breweries met with the finance committee, they made it perfectly clear that they were not convinced that the base of taxation was equitable or realistic or that it was based on any particular strategy, policy or plan but, as so many other members have indicated, that it was rather a willy-nilly or ad hoc tax and added dollars for revenue purposes.

As the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Mackasey) so aptly put it, the previous minister had an equally ad hoc policy to add to the base rate a few dollars per gallon here or a few cents per litre there.

It is the position of this party that, when it comes to taxing tobacco and alcohol, the matter should be investigated very thoroughly. The hon. member for Lincoln made it clear that we are not only talking about the alcohol and tobacco industry but also the agricultural industry. We are talking about the many hundreds of family-operated businesses, farms and vineyards directly related to the alcohol and tobacco industry. This is the sector that we are concerned with. When the parliamentary secretary indicates that this is a logical approach, that opinion comes as a surprise to many of us on this side of the House.

As a new member of Parliament, I came here with the idea that in debate some members would speak and make points and then members on the opposite side would counter those points. A variety of speakers in this debate have clearly articulated their concerns about indexation. We also heard from spokespersons in the financial community who condemned this approach and we heard from taxation people within and beyond government who questioned this approach as being logical or realistic.

Who are the financial advisers, the tax experts, the economists who claim that this is the correct approach for the government to use in collecting additional revenue? On whose behalf do they speak when suggesting the concept of indexing as set out in this bill? The concept of indexing is insidious in that it puts Canadian consumers at the mercy of foreign exchange differences. As inflation increases in a particular country and the value of that currency relative to ours changes, that fact may have a significant effect on the consumer price subgroup on which this particular index will be based.

If the cost of hops was to increase significantly in one year because of crop failures or the introduction of new equipment or machinery to the industry, for example—and I identify hops as one of the components of the particular consumer index subgroup—that would mean that the price of wines would also increase, the price of tobacco would increase and the price of distilled spirits would increase in this country. Is this what we want to see? Yet it is the situation which hon. members opposite consider to be logical.

When all of us are concerned, to quote the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), with "wrestling inflation to the ground", it is important that we realize that indexation is a confirmation of the mind set that inflation is with us for some time to come.

I notice the minister is shaking his head. Then, I would ask him, why bring it in? Why is it necessary? If inflation is not going to be a problem, why are we concerned about it to the extent that we are building it into the revenue collection function of the government? It sends a clear signal to everyone that inflation is a reality and that we will likely face an increase in inflation in the near and distant future. The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) reminds us on a daily basis that this is precisely what he is attempting to eliminate, but by this very policy he is fuelling the fires of inflation.

I want to close my comments on this set of amendments by asking the backbenchers opposite, those who have not spoken in this debate, how they can justify the concept of indexation that is now before us. What information do they have that indicates it is a good idea? Who has recommended this as an appropriate route to take? We on this side would like to know.

• (1550)

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I did not plan to speak again on this point today, but the remarks of the parliamentary secretary lead me to do so. As per usual, the hon. member has given only part of the story. Half-truths have become so prevalent—

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member. Maybe he did not mean to mislead the House but he said that he did not want to speak again on this motion. If the hon. member has spoken on this motion, he cannot speak again on it. It may be that he meant to say that he did not wish to speak again, that he had spoken earlier on another amendment. However, if he has spoken on the motion, it is my understanding that he cannot speak again on it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen) is quite correct. The chair has been visually checking with the principal clerk assistant in order to determine whether or not the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) has spoken on this group of motions. I take it he has not. Am I correct?

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, it is a very elementary point. Of course I have not spoken on this motion, otherwise I would not be standing up. I spoke on indexing, not on this motion, and the hon. member knows that.

As per usual, the government side gives part of the story. They give half-truths. When the hon. member stands up and tells us this is a very simple ad valorem tax, he is only telling part of the story. It is more than an ad valorem tax, and the hon. members knows it. This tax is tied in with the cost of living index.

If he has not read the first section of the bill, I suggest that he do so. Specifically it is subsection (6) on page 4, and it makes a big difference. Every item that goes into the consumer price index becomes an item for an increase in taxation. It is every item, and it goes even beyond that. If there is an increase in wages, an increase in freight or an increase in the price of the product, all of these are added into the consumer price index.

But the government is not even satisfied with that. On page 4, this subgroup may be:

—as the case may be, as published by Statistics Canada under the authority of the Statistics Act, adjusted or altered in such manner as the Governor in Council may, by regulation, prescribe—

Why is the hon. parliamentary secretary trying to kid the troops? It is not an ad valorem tax. It has some ad valorem aspects, that is all. At the very least there might be a slight resemblance. This is a simple and devious tax in order to tax the people more without coming to the House of Commons to get the approval of the House of Commons. Consequently, it is taxation without representation.

It might as well be put simply and truthfully. It will be taxation without representation every time the government raises this tax. If the government does that with every tax, we will not need a budget. We will not even need a House of Commons. We will just go back to the old days of fuedalism when King John levied what he wanted.

Why is the government introducing this tax if it does not have some devious scheme in mind? The government objects to these debates, the press carries the story, the people get concerned. The government thought this bill would go through very quickly, smoothly and easily so that people would not know what was going on. Well, we hope by what we are doing that they will know what is going on. This is devious taxation. It is a tax which the government wants to raise and raise, based on a number of factors, without coming to the people's representatives. It is a devious and iniquitous tax.

I hope that some members on the other side will see the light and oppose this bill. I do not know why it is, but if the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) says yea, everyone says yea.

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am afraid that the hon. member has unintentionally misled the House in some of his statements.

Mr. Taylor: Look who is talking.

Mr. Evans: This tax is not tied to the consumer price index; it is tied to the alcoholic beverages subgroup. In other words, the increase in the price of those products to which the tax applies is not tied to the consumer price index. That is where the hon. member has misled the House, and I am sure what he did was unintentional.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, I would also ask the parliamentary secretary, when he talks about the ad valorem tax and so on, to look at page 10 of the bill. There he will see an increase from 25 cents per gallon to 60 cents per gallon on wine. That is not an ad valorem increase.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. It is getting difficult for the Chair to follow whether there is a point of order. Perhaps we might return to the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor).

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I just want to deal with that particular point. I shall read what is found on page 4 so that we will not mislead anyone. I need to read this part into the record because I do not think hon. members opposite have read it themselves. On page 4 we find:

(a) aggregating the Alcoholic Beverages Subgroup or the Tobacco Products and Smokers' Supplies Subgroup of the Consumer Price Index—

Every item in the consumer price index is applicable. If you raise the price of coal, that does not affect the price of liquor.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. The parliamentary secretary rises on a point of order. I hope he will make it clear that it is not debate, that he has a point or order.

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is trying to say that the tax is increased by the increase in the consumer price index. That is not the case, and he has just read the section.

Mr. Rae: He has not said anything yet. Sit down. You are not in a classroom any more. It is a democracy here.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. The parliamentary secretary is referring to an argument in law or fact, or both. It is debate and not point of order.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary secretary does not understand how the consumer price indices are compiled.

Mr. Rae: Tell him how it works, Gordon.

Mr. Taylor: You do not take the price of coal, or the price of fish in the Arctic, when you are working in the alcohol subgroup. You do not do that either when you are working on the price of tobacco. You use all of the items in that subgroup. Surely the parliamentary secretary knows that. That becomes a consumer price index of that subgroup. That is exactly what I said before.

If the hon. member is having difficulty, I would draw a picture for him. If I had a blackboard, I could draw a picture which would make it clear. But the point is that the subgroup of tobacco and the subgroup of beverages is the consumer price index in which this increase will be levied. All factors which go into that group will result in an increase. Upon that increase, the tax will be based. This will be done without representation. The government does not want the people to understand it. The government wants to have an increase in the tax every time there is an increase in that subgroup. It may be altered somewhat by the governor in council in any way the governor in council sees fit. They could add a bit more if they do not think it is enough. But it is an iniquitous tax. Whatever way government members try to rationalize this tax to ease their own consciences, it is still an iniquitous tax and any increase in tax will be a tax without representation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Pursuant to the Speaker's order made earlier, we will group the motions beginning with motion No. 11. That will affect how the House wishes to deal with motions Nos. 12 and 13. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt motion No. 11?

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The question is on motion No. 11. All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): In my opinion, the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Pursuant to Standing Order 75(11), the recorded division on motion No. 11 stands deferred.

● (1600)

Pursuant to order made earlier with reference to the grouping of motions, I will now put motion No. 56 to the House.

Mr. Rae: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I do not see how the disposition of motion No. 11 disposes of motion No. 13, since motion No. 13 is a motion of the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): As I understand it, the Speaker earlier ruled that motions Nos. 6, 7, 8, 11, 12, 13 and so forth and so on, would be grouped. Having been grouped, if the question is put on motion No. 11, an affirmative vote on that motion would dispose of motions Nos. 12 and 13. A negative vote on motion No. 11 would dispose of motion No. 12, with the question having to be put on motion No. 13. Since we have deferred the vote on motion No. 11, the impression I have is that I cannot put motions Nos. 12 and 13 to the House until motion No. 11 is first disposed of.

Did I see the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) rise?

Mr. Knowles: No, but I agree.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): If that satisfies hon. members, we will proceed. We will now move to motion No. 56. That will have an effect on motions Nos. 57, 58 and 59.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): In my opinion, the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Pursuant to section 11 of Standing Order 75, the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred. As I indicated earlier, that means motions Nos. 57, 58 and 59 will also stand deferred.

The House will now consider motions Nos. 9 and 34.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West) moved:

Motion No. 9.

That Bill C-57, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas, be amended in clause 16 by adding immediately after line 26 at page 24 the following:

"(H) flying training."

Motion No. 34.

That Bill C-57, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas, be amended in clause 40 by adding immediately after line 7 at page 47 the following:

"(viii) flying training." "

He said: Mr. Speaker, this motion has to do with an exemption which interests my colleague from Belleville in particular. He is attending the members' services committee at the present time; therefore, I will discuss the matter without his knowledge. The purport of clause 16(1) and (2) is to repeal Section 47(1) and (2) of the act. The act presently reads:

47. (1) Where gasoline has been purchased by

(a) Her Majesty in right of Canada or a province or any agent of Her Majesty in right of Canada or a province,

(b) a municipality,

(c) a person for commercial or business purposes,

(d) a farmer for farming purposes,

(e) a fisherman, hunter or trapper for commercial fishing, hunting or trapping,

(f) a person under conditions for which relief from the consumption or sales tax is provided by virtue of any provision of this act other than subsection 27(2), or

(g) a person of such other class of persons as the Governor in Council may by regulation prescribe—

In our amendment we have added "(H) flying training". The following are provided for in the middle of page 24 of the bill:

(A) the exploration and development of natural resources,

(B) aerial spraying, seeding and pest control,

(C) forestry,

(D) fish cultivation,

(E) aerial construction operations using rotating wing aircraft,

(F) aerial fire control, fire protection and fire fighting, or

(G) map making operations, or

(iii) engaged in the business of testing aircraft engines.

We have added a paragraph (H) for flying training to provide that exemption. It existed before but has been removed. I want to know why it is being removed. Why should flying training be picked out to be hit by this tax? The operations are much like many of the others, so why is it being singled out? We have received representations from flying clubs across the country and various members have made representations. This is one of the small items, but I would like an answer from the minister. None was provided during the committee hearings.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat surprised that the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) cannot see the difference between a farmer and a trainee pilot. I feel we are quite justified in exempting farmers from the excise tax on gasoline, while the need to exempt trainee pilots is much less urgent. I wonder why the hon. member for Edmonton West, for instance, does not realize instinctively the difference between trainee pilots and professional fishermen. It is obvious that there is a basic difference between the general group of trainee pilots who are asking to be totally exempted from the tax on gasoline and farmers or fishermen. I believe that most Canadians can see the difference, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lambert: I would also like to ask the minister—I refer to page 24, and if one looks at the list, one can see that it does not apply to fishermen and farmers. I respectfully submit that this concerns aviation, aviation fuel used for public air transportation and air services for certain activities including fish cultivation—it is simply fish cultivation—and for fire fighting. There are other things. This list should be read carefully. I therefore wonder if I am not—

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Speaker, I did not tell the hon. member that he was out of order. I would like to remind him with all due respect that clause 16 of the bill, which amends section 47 of the Excise Act, states that a refund will be made when the gasoline was purchased by a municipality, a person for commercial or business purposes, a farmer for farming purposes, a fisherman, a hunter, and so on, and the group to which he referred is mentioned on the next page. Therefore, he is not right and I am not wrong.

• (1610)

[English]

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister does not think there is a contradiction in the fact that the government is allowing an exemption for flying for certain purposes which are outlined in the bill but does not also allow an exemption for those people who are training to carry out those same purposes. I wonder if that does not strike the minister as something of a contradiction. We are saying that there is to be an exemption for those people who provide services for forestry, for fish cultivation, for aerial spraying, for fire control and so forth, but when it comes to training people who are to be providing those same services, the government does not provide a similar exemption. Does the minister not think that a little strange? Let us say one is training for the purpose of—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I wonder if the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) wants to make clear the purpose of his rising. I think he is on his feet on a point of order and not to debate.

Mr. Rae: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): In order to get an answer from the minister, the only way I can allow the minister to answer is if the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood is raising a point of order. If he wants an answer, it would be in his interest to say yes, he is on a point of order, in which case I think he has made his point and I would recognize the minister.

Mr. Rae: All right.

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae), I believe that there is a basic difference between someone who trains to earn his living, in whatever profession, whether as aircraft pilot, train conductor or engineer. The taxes are refunded in certain specific cases so as to reduce the cost to society, and the pilot's salary is not considered in this case, but rather the use made of the fuel, which certainly makes a basic difference in my opinion.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The question is on motions Nos. 9 and 34, both standing in the name of the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): All those in favour of the motions will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): In my opinion, the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Pursuant to Standing Order 75(11), the recorded division on the proposed motions stands deferred.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I was hoping we would have an opportunity to debate motion No. 10, and if I have the permission of the Chair, I would like to elaborate the point behind that motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Perhaps I can save the hon. member some thought on the subject. I understand motion No. 10 was found to be out of order by the Speaker earlier this week.

Mr. Riis: Indeed, Mr. Speaker, that was the original declaration. However, I think it is clear that that is open to some interpretation and challenge in that there is another route one can take, and that is to request that the government consider the principle of this amendment and bring it in at the appropriate time itself. It was in that spirit that I felt it appropriate that at least some words be said respecting motion No. 10. If I may, Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I do not think the hon. member can do that. In an effort to reach a compromise with the hon. member, I will stand this matter in abeyance for a few minutes so that the matter can perhaps be raised again later. However, it seems to me that once a motion has been ruled out of order by the Speaker, there is no motion on the floor to debate. I do not see how that can be done, but out of courtesy to the hon. member I suggest the Chair take it upon itself to defer this point of order for consideration later on. Is that agreeable?

Mr. Riis: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap) moved:

Motion No. 14.

That Bill C-57, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas, be amended in clause 29 by striking out lines 32 and 33 at page 35 and substituting the following therefor:

That Bill C-57, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas, be amended in clause 29 by striking out lines 16 to 18 at page 38.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, as far as we are concerned, this set of motions incorporates some very important principles. While the motions themselves articulate wording required to alter some of the principles presented in this particular bill, I want to comment first on the general nature of what is incorporated in each of the motions we are debating.

Because closure is upon us, it appears we will not have an opportunity to discuss in the necessary depth all of the assembled motions the Speaker has considered. I suppose in that respect one would want to keep one's comments relatively short so that at least we can have an opportunity to deal as best we are able with all the various motions and have some deliberation in the House on the problems associated with the position of the government.

When we are talking about the small newspapers in Canada, including independent weeklies, community newspapers, the ethnic press and so forth, we are talking about something which touches the very soul of Canada and about a reflection of the real views, attitudes, aspirations and concerns of Canadian citizens. I do not suppose there are many in this House who feel that some of the major newspaper chains really reflect the concerns of the regions, various municipalities, small villages and rural areas of Canada in any real way. Because the major newspaper chains are in fact chains, they reflect only the policies of those corporate entities.

What we are concerned about here are the voices of Canadian citizens. I suppose our free speech is threatened today in a number of ways. The opportunity for individual Canadians, groups and communities to speak out is being hampered. The government should be going a long way to preserving that independent voice for Canadian citizens and communities.

One of the countries I have had an opportunity to study at some length in terms of newspapers is Sweden. Here is a country that a number of years ago found there was general acceptance among all parties that the ability of individual citizens to speak out was being limited and hampered. So the government took it upon itself to introduce a number of measures which encouraged the small weekly, biweekly, triweekly newspapers, the various ethnic papers and trade journals and so on. They felt it was important that each individual citizen, agency and organization had before it a vehicle whereby its point of view and concerns could be expressed in a clear and articulate way.

The government of Sweden saw that this ability was being eroded, that in fact the growing concentration in the newspaper industry was making it more difficult for individuals to speak out, was making it more difficult for the various regions to be reflected in the media, particularly the newspaper media. So they took a number of steps to encourage the introduction of new and small newspapers. They were prepared to give a certain amount of government advertising to the smallest of newspapers, quite contrary to this government's policy where in fact its advertising goes through their media agencies to the large metropolitan dailies, essentially laundered through the national newspaper chains. However, Sweden took a different approach. They felt it was in their vested interests, as a government reflecting the views of its citizens, to ensure that the small independent newspapers were not only revitalized, but that those already in existence were preserved.

What we see there, Mr. Speaker, in this collection of motions is an attempt by the government essentially to undermine the small newspapers of Canada. I do not think for a moment that is a result of some devious mind across the way making an attempt to reduce the number of small independent voices across this country. But I suspect, like so many other aspects of this bill, a bureaucratic oversight, a notion that some bureaucrat in the finance area had which would result in more revenue accruing to the government, without thinking through the social consequences. It is, if you like, beyond the mind set or the terms of reference of the advisers within the finance committee.

Well, I might say, Mr. Speaker, that we have gone to some lengths to determine what this particular bill will do to the small newspapers of Canada. Quite frankly, I doubt if there is a member of this House who has not been approached by newspapermen from within their own ridings, small newspaper publishers and printers concerned about what this measure is going to do to their ability to continue in operation, particularly to continue competing with the large national newspaper chains. They are hanging on with some difficulty, and I know that in my own riding of Kamloops-Shuswap I made a point of approaching each of the weekly and biweekly newspapers to ask how this particular legislation was going to influence them. I must say there were not many pleased publishers in my particular riding and beyond, that I contacted. They see this again as one more hurdle to be overcome to enable them to compete in this extremely competitive area, particularly when the competition is unequal. It is difficult for a small newspaper in Clearwater, British Columbia, to compete with the large metropolitan dailies flooding into the area every day. But it is important that the people of that community have the opportunity to voice their concerns over their community's welfare through letters to the editor in their own independent newspaper.

This is a bill that is going to levy a tax on newspaper inserts. Now, we feel that it is important that the consumer is made well aware of price changes, of opportunities that entrepreneurs take to provide a product at lesser cost to the consumer. We feel that the more informed people can be in our communities, particularly during these times, the better it is. Here is a situation where a firm decides to take out a page in a newspaper and advertise a commodity and there will be no tax on that; but if it decides to enclose an insert in that newspaper with perhaps a different colour to make it more attractive, it will be paying a tax on that. We on this side of the House feel that somehow that is not just, that it is not treating everyone equally, and it is encouraging people to reduce perhaps the amount of advertising they do which is going to reflect directly on the income of the small newspaper and their cash flow.

We are also very concerned about the government's decision to attempt to redefine what is a newspaper, to suggest there has to be a certain percentage of editorial comment or news and a certain percentage of advertising. We feel that is something that should be left to the independent newspapers to determine for themselves. If they feel for some weeks it is just as well to go with 90 per cent advertising and 10 per cent news and editorial comment, that would be fine. Other weeks it may perhaps be 50-50. But I think it is very important that we recognize that that decision should be made at the local level, not here in Ottawa by this particular piece of legislation. Let us do what we can to encourage the newspapers of Canada, especially the small, independent community newspapers which reflect the differences in view of the citizens and regions of Canada.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, there are many amendments dealing with newspaper advertising, one from the minister which shows that instead of 75 per cent, the figure has now become 80 per cent. Well, that makes little difference because what we are concerned with here is a matter of principle, of determining what is a newspaper by the amount of advertising. There are a number of categories in the act.

Now, the section as it originally reads refers to college and school annuals, magazines and literary papers, unbound, regularly issued at stated intervals, not less frequently than four times yearly; newspapers, sheet music, materials used exclusively in the manufacture thereof. What has been done here is to blow up that word "newspapers".

As far as the act is concerned, the sections at pages 35, 36 and 37, there is a great deal to do. We did hear extensive representations.

● (1630)

[Translation]

I am quite staggered by the utter silence of members from the province of Quebec who told me at the outset that they were impressed by the representations of Quebec weekly newspapers. When looking at the list of Quebec newspapers that have made representations, especially the weeklies in all the rural ridings, I wonder why all hon. members are not in the House trying to block this bill, because we all received the same representations, from the regional weeklies, Metropolitan Weeklies Ltd., the Select Newspapers of Quebec, the Quebecor group, the South Shore weeklies, Michael Publishing Incorporated and Suburban Newspapers.

When they appeared before us, and here I am referring to Issue No. 46 of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs for Thursday, March 26, at page 6, Mr. Jean-Paul Cloutier was acting as spokesman for the majority of newspaper owners who made their representations on that day. I want to quote what he said:

> Mr. Chairman, I would now like to outline the contents of this particular intervention. If we have made so many presentations concerning Bill C-57, it is because to us it is extremely important. In our opinion, it is the first time that the government, through tax legislation, has gone so far to affect directly our sector, the regional newspapers. We are affected directly by the law in two ways. First, any advertising which is over 75 per cent of the newspaper content—

Let us say in passing that we will change that to 80 per cent.

> —is taxable at a rate of 9 per cent. Secondly, the bill provides for a 9 per cent tax on all advertising supplements or inserts in newspapers. Those are the two main features of the bill which affect us somewhat. Mr. Chairman, this morning we would like to tell you how this affects us and offer a few suggestions. We have already made some suggestions. Before the Senate committee particularly—

On that point I would ask the minister to tell us what the Senate committee had to say about that. The senators also made their recommendation, but the Liberal senators were in a majority and I do know that the report did not endorse the measure proposed by the Minister of Finance.

> We have realized from the minister's presentation that he does not intend or wish to tax newspapers.

No, he does not want to tax newspapers. However, he wants to eliminate certain abuses, or so he says, so he grabs his sledgehammer to crush a bug. It is very simple. By striking, by using that kind of formula, he is trying to eliminate certain abuses. There may very well be some, but it is not by taxing or by forcing the newspapers, particularly the small weeklies, to measure every inch of their columns on a monthly, or a single, or a quarterly basis.

Mr. Cloutier goes on to say:

> Also, in our conversations with politicians and officials, we have noted that the aim of the bill was to correct a certain abuse. However, we cannot agree with the means that the minister and the government have taken in order to reach these objectives, since it affects us quite directly. We are quite aware of, Mr. Chairman, how difficult it is for the government to intervene in the media sector, particularly the written press. We know how touchy is public opinion in this respect. it is evident in that governments, both at the federal and provincial levels, have created commissions of enquiry. The Kent commission is a case in point since it is now receiving briefs and holding hearings. We, indeed, presented a brief to the Kent commission, in which we mention Bill C-57 and the problems it would create for the weekly newspapers. I think the Kent commission is now well aware of this problem.

So as we can see, the culprits are not weeklies from the rural areas and small towns or even the small dailies with a modest circulation; yet this will cost a pretty penny. So, they will have to measure because that is what it is based on; 80 per cent of the newspaper content can be advertising. If it is a little over, bang! The newspaper is taxed. Especially if they include inserts which are not catalogues but advertising supplements prepared by firms like Beaver Lumber, Canadian Tire, Radio Shack and even the large department stores like The Bay, Simpsons-Sears, Eaton and Woodward out west, and many others that include those inserts in the newspapers. That is the way they distribute theirs, and it is certainly the best way.

The post office is not very reliable and in rural communities and small towns, newspapers enjoy the best distribution system. So if this service is provided to the public, then why—I do not know what is considered improper in this matter, what rubs the minister the wrong way. Is it because these are the same type of flyers that are distributed in shopping centres? Is that the problem? What is the problem? What is improper? It seems that we have to tax and to determine what is a newspaper. The papers said that they were newspapers, period.

● (1640)

[English]

They have been called newspapers, unless the advertising content shall exceed a certain amount over a stated period. Then they are no longer newspapers within the true meaning of the term, and they are subject to this special tax on the entire publication.

It is very easy for the big city metropolitan daily, which runs 140 pages to 150 pages in perhaps a couple of editions per week, to have the base from which to spread their excesses from day to day. If they come up to 79.9 per cent over a four-month period, they will be within the law; but they will be able to get away with a great deal more than the small newspapers. I am surprised by the absolute silence—

[Translation]

—the stubborn silence of the Quebec members. I remember quite well that when the committee was dealing with that point they were incensed. Were they putting on an act for the benefit of the Quebec organizations' representatives? You could see them beating their wings. That is what they were doing. But when the time comes now to make representations or state openly that the proposed legislation is unfair, they are mute. What sort of people are they? Have they been ordered to keep their trap shut? That is not what they said when their constituents were here. No, sir! They were certainly going to speak up and make strong representations! Representations? Do we hear any? Not a word! You should have heard what they said to the people, in committee and outside the House, but now that the time has come for them to stand up in the House and be counted, it is quite a different story! What is more, they are speechless. They cannot utter a word. How are they going to explain that back home? Could the hon. lady tell us how she is going to get away with it? Personally, I always speak through the Chair. The parliamentary secretary should be the last one to make gestures and try to teach me a lesson.

Mr. Speaker, I still wonder how they are going to explain the situation. Were these newspapers abusing the law? In what way? And if they were not abusing the law, why are they threatened with a 9 per cent tax, as provided under this bill? Precisely. The hon. member for Bourassa (Mr. Rossi), who is sitting next to the minister—that is quite surprising; we must have a word with the representatives who appeared before the committee. Have a word with Mr. Cloutier. Have you had a word with Mr. Cloutier? Have you had a word with Mr. Cyrenne and the others who were there? We are going to say: we oppose at this time the implementation of these provisions as worded. The minister can indicate exactly what abuses had to be corrected. Then we will be able to determine, as I said earlier, whether he used a sledgehammer to kill a bug or, in a different context, a gun powerful enough to kill an elephant to shoot a mere mouse. That is why I support the motion moved by my colleague the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis). I hope, in turn, that they will support our amendments, and there are a whole lot of them. Those are the remarks I wanted to make about the whole thing.

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): I thank you, Mr. Speaker. I must say that I have never heard such a deluge of words so barren of ideas. If, in the eyes of the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), the Quebec members do not have the strength to speak up. I must say that his own rhetoric is pretty weak.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Edmonton West wonders why the Quebec members are not here: in fact, the members from Quebec and from Canada are here: to wit, the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen), the hon. member for Bourassa (Mr. Rossi), the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Veillette), the hon. member for Roberval (Mrs. Beauchamp-Niquet), the hon. member for Verdun-Saint-Paul (Mr. Savard); all those hon. members—

[English]

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. If the minister is so lacking in anything to say that he must stand up and name members of his party who are in the House, why does he not just—

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Yes, the hon. member can be asked to resume his seat if he has nothing else to say.

All those hon. members, Mr. Speaker, before the hon. member for Edmonton West and the other opposition members were even aware of the problem of Quebec weeklies, had already met the Association des hebdos du Québec and the Canadian Publishers' Association and expressed their concern about the provisions of the bill now before the House. The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) received representations from the caucus, after which, having recognized the fairness of the point made with regard to the percentage of paid advertising in weeklies, and representations having been made to him by the weeklies, he decided to increase the percentage from 75 to 80 per cent, which gives weekly owners quite a lot of leeway.

I should also like to point out to the hon. member for Edmonton West that that 80 per cent is based on 50 per cent of the quarterly publications. So, let him go to Mr. Cloutier, let him go back to him and ask him if that threatens the operations of more than all the weeklies across Canada which are located in Quebec. Mr. Cloutier will tell him that this provides enough room to manoeuvre because he has enough sense to know the difference between an advertisement bulletin and a news bulletin, which is what a weekly is. Quebec weeklies, like Canadian weeklies, endeavour to convey information and not advertisement; that distinction is elementary.

Mr. Speaker, that is the first point dealt with in the tax provisions, that is, the advertising content of a newspaper. Obviously, when the advertising content is so great as to leave no room for information, the paper is no longer a newspaper but a vehicle for advertisement. Some will ask, why 80 per cent, why not 90 or 99.9 per cent? Because, naturally, there comes a time when one must draw the line, and that line is set at some percentage or other. Some may claim that to be arbitrary. When a decision is to be made, one has to assume the responsibility for whatever judgment has been made. A first decision was made setting a certain percentage; then, as a result of the representations made by the industry and hon. members, the Minister of Finance adjusted his decision to take into account the representations made to him. I think that publishers of weeklies now recognize that this gives them sufficient latitude.

The other point is advertising. The member for Edmonton West explained very well why advertising inserts should be taxed. He stated that in such cases, weeklies are only a distribution network. Now if weeklies become a distribution network why should it not be taxed like any other such as postal delivery, private courier or door-to-door delivery which are taxed? We are trying to restore equity. You used the term "distribution network" and stated that postal delivery or delivery by messenger are not taxable. I believe they are taxable and I would like you to check that fact.

Now if we consider the argument, it should be acknowledged that there is some consistency in that tax levy. It is quite obvious that any taxpayer will always find an excellent argument against taxes and some lawyers to defend him. Now those lawyers should begin by looking into the arguments and weighing their validity. I am rather surprised to note how we have been expressing our social concern over the past few days especially with regards to taxation in Canada. Visibly the socialists are more interested in the taxation level on alcohol and tobacco and in the freedom of the press than in saying: "Look, it is no use arguing about the difference between a vehicle of information and a vehicle of advertising". I think that the basis of the argument should be looked into and that common sense rather than partisanship should prevail when a decision is made.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, after that minister getting exercised, and we are getting excised by the minister's activities—

An hon. Member: You are not getting "Ian Deansed".

Mr. Rae: The hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen) said that I am not getting "Ian Deansed". He has not seen me get wound up yet. I am just getting warmed up.

The minister has said that he cannot understand how it is that members of our party are becoming worked up about taxes on alcohol. He cannot understand what our social philosophy is or why we are concerned about the effect of these taxes on the community newspapers. He does not understand what the social philosophy of a party is which is concerned about the effect of these kinds of provisions on the freedom of speech. I will say to the minister that the social philosophy is quite simple. I think we expressed it at some length yesterday with respect to the indexation of taxes on beer, wine and distilled spirits. The fundamental principle, first of all, is that we do not want to see the cost of living and the cost of pleasure of the average Canadian go up without any form of control. In our view, the policies of the federal government are at least partly responsible for the inflationary situation in which we are at the present time. We do not want to see the government becoming the beneficiary of that very inflation.

With respect to the inflation principle, I think the minister is perhaps a little abstract, if not fuzzy-headed, if he is unable to see the philosophy—not a word that I use too often—or the basis of our concerns.

With respect to the amendments which have been put forward today by my colleague, the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis), and with respect to the similar amendments which have been put forward by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) who is in the Conservative party, I will say to the minister that I think there is a very clear difference between his approach to this problem and ours. The government's approach to this problem is one, if you like, of Cartesian rationality with respect to proposals which come to it. It says, "Ah ha! There is a problem here", when someone has brought to its attention an inequity in the tax system, which tax system is just chock full of absurdities, anomalies and inequities. The government moves back and forth in trying to slap a tax on here, or slap a tax on there. The minister's department has created more loopholes and anomalies than we will ever be able to talk about or discuss in the time which has been so kindly and gracefully allocated to us over the next day and one-half by the government.

However, I do want to say to the minister that our approach is to look at what is really happening in the country and in the communities of this country; it is not to look out from the fifteenth floor of the Bell Canada building down on Elgin Street to determine, from some kind of abstract rational assessment, what the answer to this particular problem will be. Our approach is to see what is actually happening in the community newspapers and in the human economy of this country represented by people in all parts of this House. We will ask what the effect of that tax will be on the lives of those communities. The minister might say that we are just special pleaders and are only pleading for whatever interest comes before this House. I will use the exact words of the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans) when he said that in a good many of the amendments which we are putting forward we are just trying to feather the nest of some particular interest group which has come before us.

I want to tell the minister that we have been very particular. We have responded not simply to whatever pressure group has happened to put on an effective lobby, but to what we have actually seen happening in communities.

This last Easter I happened to be visiting the south shore of Nova Scotia where I was doing some politicking and some resting. I happened to go into the offices of a community newspaper in the town of Liverpool. This newspaper is owned by one individual. It is not part of any kind of chain, it is not part of some multinational enterprise, nor is it a part of an association of chains in one province or one region of Canada. It is a newspaper which is owned locally and which services an entire area. It provides community news for the entire community of Liverpool and the surrounding area.

As I walked in to say hello to the publisher of that newspaper, the very first questions he asked me were, "What is going on with the excise tax, and what is going on with the taxation of our advertising? Why is the government picking on us?" We went through his costs, we went through his problems, we went through the cost of material which has gone up, we went through the whole range of problems which that newspaper was facing. We looked at what the potential effect would be if the government, willy-nilly, decided to go after all insert and supplementary advertising and taxed them as they have never been taxed in North America since the time of the Stamp Act in the 70s.

Mr. Crosby: That's what socialists are like.

Mr. Rae: It has nothing to do with socialism. The hon. member for Halifax West would not know what socialism was if he ran into it with a truck.

However, I want to say to the minister that socialism has to do with looking at what is actually going on in the human economy and dealing with the problems of people as they really exist. I want to say to the minister that it is when one talks to people in this kind of a situation that the policies of the government make no sense because the definitions are, by their very nature, arbitrary. When it is 75 per cent, people start complaining and want to make it 80 per cent. One could just as well have said 85 per cent, 95 per cent, 50 per cent or 25 per cent. There is no law that the minister has been following; it is just a rule chosen by a civil servant after pressure here or a knuckle here from a minister, saying, "We are getting a lot of heat on 75. Could you put it up to 80?"

What we have attempted to do with our amendments, and what the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap has attempted to do with our amendments, is to say, "All right. There is a problem." There is a problem, because many of the large commercial chains have used the circulation of newspapers as a cover for the distribution of their catalogues in order to avoid the excise tax that falls on all commercial advertising done outside the context of the newspaper.

We have defined catalogues, Mr. Speaker. We do not think that our definition is necessarily the source of all truth but we think that it is at least an attempt to make this point clear. If the minister is concerned with dealing with an abuse, he should do so and not offer legislation that will have a detrimental effect on the cost, the integrity and, indeed, the very life of hundreds of community newspapers in the country.

The government has never learned the importance of following the politics of experience rather than simply the politics of abstract rationality. If it looked at the politics of experience, which is what our social philosophy is about, and if it looked at the effect of this legislation on the viability of the community newspaper, it would learn something. I see the minister shaking his head. Mr. Speaker, I have never seen a study of the community in newspaper industry issued by the Department of Finance which would indicate what the effect of this will be on that industry. We have not been provided with any indication of the effect that this will have on their revenues or on the behaviour of advertisers. The government needs to consider the policies of experience, the politics of fact, the politics of looking at what the actual effect will be.

Yesterday the government was prepared to say that beer and wine have just as deleterious an effect on the health of the consumer as have distilled spirits. Mr. Speaker, one's normal experience does not usually show that a glass of scotch has the same effect on someone as a glass of beer. The experience of the average consumer would show that to be nonsense. The same thing applies to the experience, not of the powerful lobbies or of those seeking to avoid any kind of taxation—and I agree with the minister that we have to be firm when dealing with those people—but to the experience of institutions and people and the effect this legislation could have on them.

The minister asks what our social philosophy is based on. Mr. Speaker, it is based on experience, on what the life of these communities is and on the importance of recognizing the contribution that these newspapers make to the life of a community, and not simply to the profitability of a chain or the growth of a monopoly. The communities are important to us and I am sure the maintenance of life in the community is what has driven many of us into public life.

In effect, the government says "If you are opposed to this tax, then you have to show us why we should not impose it." That is the burden that the minister puts on us. It shows how far this government has gone when it says that we, somehow, have to prove to it why a tax should not be imposed. It has the wrong notion of where the burden lies. If the government wants to change the system of taxation on community newspapers, if it wants to establish a definition of what is a newspaper and what is not, if it wants to tax all supplements produced for two or more newspapers, then it has an obligation to tell us why it wants to do this and the precise effect it will have on the economy and the life of community newspapers.

It is incredible that the minister should suggest to the House that every time that the government imposes a tax, those opposed to it or affected by it have to give the government an explanation of why it should not be imposed.

I should like hon. members opposite to suggest that in the next election campaign. I should like to see them put in their leaflets, "Vote Liberal and tell us why you should not be taxed". I wonder how far the average Canadian would let them go on a platform like that, yet that is the attitude the Liberal government brings to this House.

The reason we are opposed to this particular suggestion is that the definition of a newspaper is arbitrary.

Mr. Evans: And your definition of a catalogue is not?

Mr. Rae: The problem is that the government is using a sledgehammer to attack the fly. If it wants to deal with the issue of supplements and catalogues, I suggest it do so by dealing specifically with the question of catalogue and not by issuing a blanket ukase which will increase the cost of living, the cost of production and, in many cases, will threaten the existence of newspapers which provide an important service.

What will the ultimate effect of this legislation be? It may increase concentration. If the newspapers of Liverpool, the South Shore of Nova Scotia, northern Ontario, the towns and villages of southern Ontario, the towns and villages of Quebec, of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, British Columbia or any province have difficulties, then the chains will come in and take them up. They will say, "We will solve your problems. We will cover the cost. We have the tax accountants and lawyers who can get around the problem. We will buy you out." The effect of the legislation will be to punish the small businessman, the small newspapers and the community newspapers. The tendency will not be to hit the Toronto Star, or the Trudeau Star as some circles call it—

Mr. Cullen: You have to be kidding!

Mr. Blais: Oh, come on!

Mr. Rae: —or the largest newspaper chains in Canada. I touched a chord there, Mr. Speaker. The effect will be to hurt the small community newspapers that are truly independent and are providing the social basis for the freedom of speech which we as social democrats are concerned about and which all Canadians should be concerned about.

That is why we are opposed to this particular piece of legislation, Mr. Speaker, and that is why we have put forward these amendments today.

• (1710)

Hon. Bud Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, after hearing the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) yesterday, it is hard to get the riding straight for the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) because the hon. member for St. John's West fiddled around with it yesterday. It is always interesting to hear from the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood. He now seems to be suggesting what we should put in our pamphlets next time. But after listening to what the NDP has suggested on more than one occasion, I wonder whether they would put this slogan in their pamphlets: "Vote for us and we will double the deficit" because that is really what it would amount to.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cullen: This is a serious subject and one which has received extensive and comprehensive coverage. Certainly anyone who has a newspaper or a weekly newspaper published in his riding, has been a recipient of lobbies and representations. I use the word lobby in the good sense. Personally I do not think there is anything wrong with that kind of representation. Surely having the opportunity to hear from people who are knowledgeable in the field gives us an opportunity to learn. How we sort it out and how we apply it is something we have to bring to the House to discuss.

In my riding, I have a Thomson newspaper, the Sarnia Observer, which is a daily newspaper. Also there is an independent weekly paper called the Sarnia Gazette. Representatives from both papers made representations to me on this subject. As a result of that, I did a fair amount of studying of the subject matter to determine whether what was being suggested in this legislation was unfair and whether changes should be made or, for that matter, if the provision in this bill should be dropped altogether.

I was surprised to find—maybe I should not have been surprised—that no other advertising appearing in newspapers is in fact taxed. In other words, if a person places an ad in a newspaper, the person is not taxed for that ad. What we have in dispute, however, is not the advertising in the newspaper but the inserts. If an insert goes into a newspaper, whether it is published by that newspaper or whether it is published elsewhere and brought to the newspaper for distribution, that insert at the present time is not taxed.

In endeavouring to get all the information we could bring before the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, we had no fewer than three groups from the newspaper industry making representations, the Hebdos from the province of Quebec, the daily newspaper association and the weekly newspaper association outside of Quebec. Having heard all of their representations and having heard the representation of the publisher of the Sarnia Observer, I wanted to determine if what is taking place in this particular instance would be unfair, particularly to weekly papers, and particularly to the smaller papers. It has been my experience in dealing with the larger industries, be they newspapers, petrochemical companies or whatever, that they can usually cope with increases or deal with issues as they see them because they do have, as the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood mentioned, the expertise of the lawyers or the know-how to either get around the problem or to find a way to at least lessen the impact of a particular tax.

When you look at the provision as it is presently constituted, it says that if more than 90 per cent of the space in any single issue of a newspaper is devoted to advertising, it is going to be subject to the tax. I point out, it says more than 90 per cent. It seems to me that any newspaper worth being called by that name will have no difficulty with that particular section.

Looking at the second part—and in this connection the minister's department has moved an amendment—we find that it says that all issues of a newspaper in any calendar quarter will be subject to the tax if more than 75 per cent—that is going to be changed to 80 per cent—of the space per issue in more than 50 per cent of the issues of the newspaper in that calendar quarter is devoted to advertising.

Here again, I do not see that as having a significant impact or causing difficulty for the legitimate newspapers to cope with. It will prevent people who would like to be classified as newspapers but are really nothing more than advertising circulars from abusing the regulation. In other words, people who are trying to classify themselves as newspapers and are not will be subject to this tax.

I have mentioned to the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) and to the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) that I intend to watch what impact this will have. I will be following it up with my local daily and with local newspapers to determine whether this tax will have a detrimental impact on them, not only from the standpoint of business, as mentioned by the previous speaker, but also as to how they put their newspapers together.

It has been suggested to me by the publisher of the Sarnia Observer that these changes will have an impact on the way he puts his newspaper together, for instance, what he puts on the front page or how much editorial content he can have. When I read these clauses, however, I am not sure that the point has been made. I am prepared to listen, however. Nor will I let this subject drop if I see that it is having the kind of impact which the publisher of the Sarnia Observer suggests. The publisher of the Observer wrote to me on May 1, 1981. In part, his letter reads:

> To say I am quite upset over this would be an understatement, as I feel the effects of this will be a definite threat to the continuing financial success of this newspaper.

That is a bit of hyperbole. I do not think the Sarnia Observer, which serves an area of some 150,000 people and is a member of the Thomson newspaper chain, will be put out of business or will suffer that significantly. What does concern me is how he feels, and I shall quote again from his letter as follows:

> How Mr. MacEachen can say that the tax on inserts is not an interference or infringement on the freedom of the press is beyond me.

What he is suggesting is that these taxes will dictate to him the manner in which he will have to put his newspaper together. Personally I do not see that at this time, given the 90 per cent figure and given the 80 per cent figure per issue in more than 50 per cent of the issues, how it will have that kind of impact.

One of the greater disappointments to me as chairman of the finance committee was the representation made by the Canadian Daily Newspaper Publishers Association by Mr. O'Callaghan, I believe with some reputation with the Edmonton Journal. During a committee hearing when questioning Mr. O'Callaghan to find out what his real feelings were on the subject, we asked him whether, if he had a four-page weekly, which is not an unusual thing with newspapers that are starting out, and a Sears catalogue of some 200 pages placed in that four-page weekly, he would still consider that part of the newspaper? Mr. O'Callaghan answered yes. He then wondered why members of the committee were aghast that he would make that kind of representation. Surely if you are making a representation to a committee, you should be honest enough to make a presentation so that members can have some kind of a dialogue. That was an area that concerned me because Mr. O'Callaghan who was representing the daily newspapers association, did not seem to be prepared to compromise. He made the point that he was responsible as a newspaper publisher for what was contained in the ads in the catalogue and, therefore, that was "part of the newspaper". I could not buy that argument.

Another area of concern to me came about as a result of a circular sent out by the Department of National Revenue, and it concerns interpretation. It seems to me, and I think the point was in part being made by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood, that some other newspapers will be able to get around this definition of an insert. It will not be an insert. Instead, the document will be preprinted and those inserts will contain some editorial comments or comments about travel, perhaps a description of the local community, as well as some editorial comment or newspaper comment. It will be open to them not to call that an insert. They will use numbered pages so that it will look as though it were part of the newspaper. Larger newspapers will be able to do that. I am not so sure that the weeklies will because most of them, I suspect, do not print the matter in their own shops. It is something brought in by the kinds of groups which the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) was suggesting. Therefore, they will not be in a position to number pages or to put anything on those pages which comes from Canadian Tire or whatever is brought to them. If that works to the disadvantage of the weeklies, it is something we should be looking out for.

As the bill is now drafted, with the amendment from the 75 per cent to the 80 per cent, I do not think it will have the dire consequences suggested to me by the publisher of the Sarnia Observer. It will probably make him a little more conscious of the amount of editorial content that goes into his newspaper. But given these large figures of 90 per cent and 80 per cent, I do not see a restriction being put on him in the way he puts his newspaper together. After he has seen the legislation and heard the debate in the House maybe he will be prepared to agree that it will not have the detrimental effect he suggests.

At one time newspapers had no advertising in them whatsoever. They relied solely on the charge for the newspaper. Moving away from that, and in the interest of supporting newspapers, advertising was allowed to be put into a newspaper without any tax. I do not think anybody objected to that. Some of these inserts now going into the newspapers are a further evolution of the advertising being done in that newspaper. We all agree with Mr. O'Callaghan that some of the inserts might contain editorial comment, and the publisher and editor of that newspaper might very well be held responsible for it.

If this is one more evolution of advertising in the newspaper, maybe we will need to look at this. The Minister of Finance indicated that he is going to bring down a budget in the fall—I believe he said October. If that is the case, this may be another area he will have to look at to see if it is having a detrimental effect or if changes should be made so we do not prevent what I might call legitimate inserts from appearing. I have not defined them by moving an amendment to this clause. If this is something that will hurt newspapers and put weeklies out of business and concentrate newspapers in the hands of too few people, it deserves a second look.

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, the debate today should indicate to the government that this tax is not necessary, that it will interfere with freedom of the press and will put a number of newspapers out of business. The minister said he had to choose a figure; 75, 80, 85 or 90 per cent. Why did he have to choose a figure? As far as I can determine, this tax has never been levied before in North America; it is a new tax.

I wish to state some reasons why the government is making another error by imposing this type of tax on newspapers. It may think it will just be applied to newspapers, but the tax will be paid by the people of this country, something the government seems to forget. The fact that the figure is raised from 75 to 80 per cent indicates that the members of the committee who raised Cain about it being 75 per cent were bought off by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) or the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) for 5 per cent. The principle has not changed. The government simply raised it 5 per cent to keep its members quiet. It may have bought off its own members for 5 per cent, but it will not buy off the people of Canada for 5 per cent. Canadians will resent this tax.

We heard a considerable amount from the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis), the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) and others with regard to the effect on the dailies. I have the highest regard for the editor of the Edmonton Journal, Mr. O'Callaghan who was referred to a few moments ago. The statement was attributed to him that if someone wanted to have a catalogue included with a newspaper, it would be considered part of that press.

If it is only a case of trying to stop catalogues from being included as newspaper inserts, why not say that cannot be done? Why not do away with the catalogues? Why penalize everyone?

There are 18 or 20 weeklies in my constituency, some small some big. It is necessary for them to carry advertising. It is their only means of staying in business. Some are so small they are referred to as an advertising sheet. Many newspapers started out as an advertising sheet. I know of one that started as a one page advertising sheet with the odd bit of news. It was welcomed by the people. I have even seen sheets in restaurants which contain some news and very important advertising. It is a service to the people.

If the government is going to put these small weeklies out of business, there will be more bankruptcies.I do not know why the government is so intent on hurting small business. These weeklies carry the advertising for a week, in particular Saturday sales.

If we are not going to allow these inserts, the tax the newspapers will have to pay will be more than they are earning, or they will have to say to some people that they cannot accept their advertising. In what kind of position will that put our newspapers? They will be able to accept the advertising from one store but not another. The government is putting on a limit. The editor will be the scapegoat. He will have to decide what to accept and what not to accept. That is a questionable way of asking the newspapers to do business.

If this part of the bill passes, I hope that at the time of the next election the editors of these newspapers will not accept inserts from Liberal candidates because they voted in favour of this provision. That might teach them a lesson. The only way they learn is if it affects their pocketbook.

I have had newspaper inserts during an election. I felt they were valuable. Whether the people voted for or against me, they found out what I stood for and did not stand for. They were valuable to the newspapers because they were paid for them. Maybe I lost some votes, maybe I gained some, that is immaterial. The newspaper carried that information into every home in the area. It was a service to the community. Other candidates did the same. Often in the week or so before an election, inserts will be placed by three or four candidates.

The editor will be placed in the position of having to choose what to accept and what to reject. The reason is the newspapers will be taxed if it goes beyond the figure the minister pulled out of a hat, the figure that was increased to 80 per cent to buy off the Liberal members. The Liberals would not go for 75 per cent but they are quiet at 80 per cent.

Many of our newspapers are struggling. For many years the Canmore Miner was printed by a man who worked in the bosom of the earth. He printed the paper in his spare time.

The mine is now closed and he is trying to make his living from printing the paper. It is a small paper and he needs the advertising and the inserts. The government wants to limit his advertising. It is a good paper and I hope he can stay in business, but that is questionable. Why hurt a small business which provides a service to the community only to provide another pound of flesh for the government? This is the first time such a tax has been levied on the newspapers of this country.

• (1730)

The Drumheller Mail is an excellent weekly. Sometimes it is very thick because there are so many advertising inserts. There are several stores in Drumheller. It is a large business area. The Mail is the only newspaper in that area. Everyone wants to advertise bargains for people shopping on Fridays and Saturdays. If the government proceeds in this way, these inserts will cost a lot of money. Every newspaper is going to experience the same difficulty. There are other newer newspapers, such as the Five Village Weekly at Irricana, which has just started up in the last two or three years. I believe it is doing all right. I do not know how it is doing financially, but I think it is keeping its head above water. Now we are going to make it difficult. That small paper will not be able to carry inserts. The same will be the case with the Nanton News, the Claresholm Local Press and several others I could mention. The percentage they will be taxed is an injustice to consumers as well because consumers have to know what the bargains are, and the newspapers will have to say they cannot carry this advertising because it will cost too much because of increased taxation. They may be put out of business, and consumers will be losers as well. The country will be the loser. When any business goes bankrupt, this country loses. It is a tragedy. This country loses whenever business goes bankrupt, and here we are laying out the cards for a number of our newspapers across the country to join the bankruptcy file which is building up. Consumers will lose because they will lose their opportunity of knowing what all the bargains are. They will not be able to go to the places where they can make their dollars go furthest.

When the minister spoke about taxes on liquor and tobacco, I did not hear one member on this side of the House say we are against taxes on liquor and tobacco. As a matter of fact, I have always said that those taxes are some of the better ones because people have a choice. They do not have to smoke, they do not have to chew and they do not have to drink. What we are saying is that we oppose the indexing of that tax. It is completely unfair. In addition, the government should remember that even in the tobacco business many people make their living by growing tobacco, packaging it and so forth.

Many farmers are earning good money from the malting of barley for beer. The same is the case with grapes used to make wine. These are Canadian industries, and we do not seem to look beyond our noses in relation to what this tax will do to the country, as the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) said a few moments ago.

This taxation will not stop the large dailies of Canada from publishing, but it may very well stop many of our small weeklies from going on. In order to stay in business they have to make profits, and this is just another expense which might well put a number of newspapers into bankruptcy. I wish government members would look at their own weekly newspapers and see what is happening before they are bought off for 5 per cent.

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I was very interested in what the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) was just saying because it again indicates that he has not read the provision. I do not think he really understands the nature of the amendment brought forward by the government to modify this provision.

As the minister indicated earlier, there are two different and separate provisions with respect to this tax. First, there is the tax as it would apply to newspapers. If, as the hon. member for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen) so correctly pointed out, a newspaper—let us call it a publication—is more than 90 per cent advertising, then it would be in a taxable category. If more than 50 per cent of the issues in any quarter are more than 80 per cent advertising, it would fall into a taxable category. When this was before the committee and then before the Senate committee, Les Hebdos du Québec came before the Senate committee with the concern that their publications would be taxable, and the Senate committee looked at all the publications which were brought forward. I think ten different newspapers were brought forward. They were selected by Les Hebdos, and none of them would have been taxable under the previous 75 per cent rule, let alone the 80 per cent rule or 90 per cent rule we now propose. It is a red herring. It is highly unlikely that any of those small weekly newspapers will ever fall into a taxable category under this particular provision.

The other part of the tax deals with inserts. There is an important distinction to be made here because the creation of advertising—the printing of advertising—has always been taxable under the manufacturers' excise tax, which is what we are talking about here. It has always been taxable unless it has been distributed by newspapers.

One of the reasons this particular provision was brought forward—and the reason the tax change was considered in the first place—was that a number of independent distributors of advertising brochures are small companies. I heard the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) say he was in favour of small business and that we should look at the effects on small business. This tax change was considered in the first place precisely for that reason.

There were small businesses whose job it was and whose business it was to distribute house to house advertising flyers for other business firms. These business firms were being put into an unfair competitive position vis-à-vis newspapers because if anyone printed material and it was distributed by one of these small, independent distributors, the cost of printing and producing the advertising material was taxable under the manufacturers' excise tax. However, if the company doing the advertising were to take that same thing down the street to a newspaper and have it included in the newspaper for distribution, it was not taxable.

If we are talking about tax equity, it seems to me that surely, if we are going to tax this material when it is distributed by one group of people, then either we should tax it when it is distributed by all groups of people or we should not tax it at all. That is a totally different argument, but what we said was that the tax as it was being applied was putting small business at a competitive disadvantage compared with large newspaper chains as well as with weekly newspapers, and that that should be rectified as there should be equity. So the correction was made. The fact of the matter was that many of the small companies which contacted us with regard to this inequity which was facing them as door to door distributors of material were forced out of business before this change could be made. There are still such companies in existence, but they will not be in existence much longer unless this change is brought forward. So we are talking about equity in the tax system.

The hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood said the 80 per cent figure and the 90 per cent are arbitrary figures picked out of a hat, that they have no meaning but that the New Democratic Party has put forward a rational way of responding to this problem. "We are going to define a catalogue". What is a catalogue? Is it 20 pages, is it 10 pages, is it 8½ by 11, is it 7 by 14 or is it 12 by 20? What is a catalogue? If the definition of a catalogue can be so objectively determined, then why does the hon. member accuse the government of being subjective in the definition of 80 per cent or 90 per cent, or in the definition of what shall, for the purposes of this tax, be a newspaper? That kind of inconsistency is typical of the New Democratic Party. Its definitions are objective; everyone else's are subjective. The concern of members of the New Democratic Party for a certain class of small business is fair and equitable, but our concern for small business is inequitable because we are not looking after the same class they happen to be looking after or at the same time.

The problem is, of course, they did not understand the rationale or logic for the change in the tax in the first place. We tried to explain it in committee but apparently we did not get across. The point is that this tax has been in place for a very long time. It is the manufacturers' excise tax, a tax which applies to printed material, and the question that was put to us was: if a newspaper expands into another field using its tax free status to make additional profits through the distribution system where it can be non-taxable, is that equitable to other non-newspaper firms which compete in the same field? We say, no. That is why we have brought forward the change, to retain equity in the tax system. The overwhelming evidence, Mr. Speaker, is that the weeklies will not be affected by this as a result of the 80-90 per cent definition. The inserts are taxable now in all places except when they are distributed by a newspaper, and we believe they should be taxed.

If the hon. members want to say all advertising should be tax free, that would be a proposal they could put forward. However, unless they are willing to do that, we say advertising that is printed and taxable in the hands of anybody should be taxable in the hands of everybody. That is equity, that is equality. That is what this party stands for, and that is what is in this particular amendment.

That automatically defers motions Nos. 25 and 26.

I would ordinarily move next to motions Nos. 27 and 28, but I have had the opportunity, as I promised the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis) to examine the Speaker's ruling with respect to motion No. 10 and I find that he is quite correct. Madam Speaker seems to have indicated in her ruling that he should be encouraged, if he sees fit, to make procedural arguments on his motion. It might be more convenient for everyone if the hon. member would give that argument now, if he is prepared to do so, and then, on the next day Bill C-57 is debated, the Chair would be prepared to give a ruling immediately.

The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) rises on a point of order?

Mr. Lambert: Just a question of timing, Mr. Speaker. Even if the hon. member finishes his argument, you would not call motions Nos. 27 or 28 tonight? The reason I ask is that I am 45 minutes late on a very pressing engagement and if I have to wait 15 minutes until six o'clock, it just makes it worse. I am just asking whether we are going to get to motion No. 27. If not, then will we defer it until the following day?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Well, as the House knows, the Speaker has invited all hon. members to attend a party this evening. I cannot make a ruling as to when it is six o'clock, but if hon. members want to accommodate the hon. member for Edmonton West, what we can do is to hear the point of order on motion No. 10 and then perhaps the Chair can seek consent of the House to call it six o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat confused because as I understand it, Madam Speaker was talking about the grouping of these amendments and she said that motion No. 10 standing in the name of the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis) seeks to import a new proposition and offends the royal recommendation attached to the bill. Then she went on to quote citations 437(1), 773(7) and 516(2) of Beauchesne's fifth edition, and then she went on to say that the hon. member may wish to offer arguments on the acceptability of his motion, and if so, he can do that the next time the bill is before the House.

● (1750)

I seek guidance from the Chair. Is this a ruling? If so, one should not argue about it and the motion should be stricken. Or, is this a suggestion that there are doubts? Certainly the language used seeks to import a new proposition and offends the royal recommendation; that is very clear.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I have interpreted Madam Speaker's ruling in favour of the wider rights of the hon. member. If I were to disregard the words, "the hon. member may wish to offer argument on the procedural acceptability", then in effect I would make those words useless and deny the hon. member any right he may have had under Madam Speaker's ruling. The fact that these words exist leads me to believe that the hon. member now has a right to make procedural argument.

Mr. Riis: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity. I recall clearly that the intent of Madam Speaker's ruling was that one would have an opportunity to raise the issue at the appropriate time in the proceedings. In an effort to convince the Chair that in fact it is procedurally appropriate, I will begin by referring to the background which led me to bring forward this motion at the encouragement of my colleagues.

If one were to look at the manner in which the government has supported the Canadian small business sector, it would be anything but impressive.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I ask the hon. member to restrict himself as narrowly as possible to the point of order on the acceptability of the motion.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate your point. A number of delegations brought this point to our attention in the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, that is, that we were asking the business community to collect taxes on behalf of the federal government. We felt we would bring the matter forward on their behalf at this particular time because they raised it when they appeared before the committee.

If raising this matter as a member of the opposition were inappropriate, surely there would be an opportunity for the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) to bring forward an amendment worded in a similar manner to reflect the intent of motion No. 10 which is being proposed by our party. Of course the intent was to recognize the work being done by individual entrepreneurs in collecting taxes for the federal government and to recognize the approach of provincial governments, with the exception of the province of Alberta which does not collect a provincial sales tax.

Therefore, I ask the minister to consider the principle behind this particular motion and to bring it forward as a gesture to the small business community of Canada that the government in fact appreciates their valuable service.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. member has used a considerable amount of his time to make a suggestion as to how to reorganize his motion so that it will be in order. In any event, the Chair appreciates his comments. On the next day Bill C-57 is debated, the Chair will be prepared to give a ruling on it.

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis), I would like to point out to him that he is sending the ball back to the government side. His colleague for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) raised a number of points concerning current distortions in the tax system. What I would like to stress is that he is indeed creating a new disparity, a new inequity, a new distortion by giving someone a tax break or rewarding someone who has to pay tax. Why not reward also the individual who has to file his income tax return? I submit that what he proposes to introduce in the tax system is basically wrong, because while supporting a proposal to create a tax burden, he says in the same breath: on the other hand, I will reward you for being a good Canadian citizen and paying your taxes. I submit his proposal is basically inconsistent. Second, it would introduce inequity and perversion into the tax system. I therefore suggest he did not fully consider the repercussions of his amendment, because instead of helping one group of individuals or businesses, he would firstly introduce a flaw in our tax system and second he would thwart his colleague from Broadview-Greenwood who expressed the desire to see a tax system without distortion, inequity or inconsistencies.

Therefore, I prefer to support the views of his colleague from Broadview-Greenwood, of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and of members on this side of the House and reject such a proposal in order to maintain greater consistency within our tax system.

[English]

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, as I heard the argument of the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis), he seemed to admit that the motion was out of order by making a representation and beseeching the government to bring in the motion. Therefore, notwithstanding the fact that Madam Speaker outlined the case rather clearly and, with all due respect, the Chair should find it completely out of order on procedural grounds.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): No, I will not do that. The arguments of the hon. member in this case were virtually an admission that the motion might be out of order, and he asked the government to take responsibility for the motion. Once an individual member has acquired for some reason the right to raise a point of order, I still think it is the duty of the Chair to protect the individual member's right.

Certainly I can indicate that my impression right now is that I will probably find it out of order, but I will protect that member's right until such time as I or others have done our homework to ensure that the motion is, in fact, out of order.

There were earlier indications that hon. members might want to call it six o'clock. May I call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

At 6 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

PIPELINES

NORMAN WELLS-ZAMA LAKE—GOVERNMENTAL DELAY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43 I wish to introduce the following motion. Whereas the National Energy Board report dated March, 1981, publicly released in April, recommended the construction of the Norman Wells-Zama Lake oil pipeline, finding it to be in the public interest of Canadians, and whereas the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) some time ago completed his consultations, which were his previous excuse for inaction, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen):

That this House deplores the continuing foot-dragging of the Liberal government on this and other energy issues, and reminds the government that, if it is incapable of making decisions, there are 101 Conservative members of the House who are ready, willing and able to take over at a moment's notice.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXTENSION OF DREE ZONE TO INCLUDE THORHILD COUNTY, ALTA.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, whereas the Chamber of Commerce of Newbrook, Alberta, has made representations to government and various members of Parliament that the municipal district of Thorhild is very much in need of economic development assistance, and whereas this district already borders on an area designated for assistance by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Elzinga):

That the government give immediate consideration to extending the DREE zone in northeastern Alberta to include the county of Thorhild which has demonstrated a significant need for economic stimulus.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

QUESTION OF NON-CONFIDENCE VOTE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a motion relating to the motion standing in the name of the Right Hon. Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark) for debate later this day, with respect to capital punishment.

In keeping with the precedent set by a previous Liberal Prime Minister, and to enable everyone to vote on the substance of today's motion without having to consider the issue of confidence in the government, I would seek the unanimous consent of all hon. members to move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That, notwithstanding the provisions of Standing Order 58, this House does not regard the vote scheduled for 9.45 p.m. this day, in connection with a proposed reference of the question of capital punishment to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, as a vote of non-confidence in the government.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, we might agree to that, if it should be a permanent change.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

NATIONAL SECURITY

PRIVY COUNCIL OATH OF SECRECY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, whereas every Privy Councillor takes an oath of secrecy with respect to matters of state security, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans):

That the Leader of the Opposition make a public statement indicating whether he considers himself and other members of his party to be bound by the Privy Councillor's oath.

And, further, that the matter of statements made by the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections to determine whether they were made in breach of his oath as a Privy Councillor.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE ENVIRONMENT

GARRISON DIVERSION PROJECT—STATEMENT BY PREMIER LYON OF MANITOBA—MOTION UNDER S.O 43

Mr. Robert Bockstael (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, I rise on an important matter under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the Premier of Manitoba, the Hon. Sterling Lyon, in a recent radio interview reportedly declared that, pursuant to the negotiations carried out by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and President Reagan over the Garrison Diversion project, he wanted to express the highest regard for the action of the federal government in the handling of this international matter, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Cousineau):

That this House unanimously agree to echo the sentiments expressed by Premier Lyon.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

QUESTION OF NON-CONFIDENCE VOTE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of some importance. A motion will be placed before the House later today dealing not directly with the issue of capital punishment, but rather with the right of Parliament to debate the issue. The motion will request that hon. members of the House approve presentation of the matter to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs for examination in depth and detail. This motion must not be considered as a vote on the reinstatement of capital punishment.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Darling: Such a motion might be brought to the House at the conclusion of the deliberations of the committee. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence):

That this House affirms its belief that the motion to be put to the House at 9.45 p.m. this evening, pursuant to Standing Order 58, relates to the right of members of Parliament to discuss all issues of public importance and refer them to standing committees for investigation and report, and does not at this stage involve a decision on the question of capital punishment or of confidence in the government.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

PROGRAMS ON AGRICULTURE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the publicly funded body, the CBC, has a responsibility to incorporate the highest levels of journalistic integrity and unbiased reporting in its programming, and in view of the fact that the program "The Monopoly Game" aired last night on television completely failed to present a balanced and honest appraisal of the Canadian Wheat Board, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Humboldt-Lake Centre (Mr. Althouse):

That this House condemns the agriculture and resources section of CBC Television for its consistently biased and reactionary programs on agriculture; ; and, furthermore, that this House calls upon Al Johnson, the President of CBC, to dismiss the producer of "The Monopoly Game", Doug Lower, and others responsible for the program, and replace them with people who are prepared to present unbiased programming on agriculture.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

DEBATE ON NON-CONFIDENCE MOTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Peter Lang (Kitchener): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Given that the Conservative party has put forward a motion on the important issue of capital punishment, and tied that motion to supply proceedings so that we have a non-confidence motion resulting in the farcical situation that even if the motion is passed the issue of capital punishment—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: —would not be dealt with as there would be a general election, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Guelph (Mr. Schroder):

That the House request the Conservative caucus to stop wasting the time of the House and the taxpayers' money with its attempts to denigrate the important issue of capital punishment by using it as a political tool to embarrass their own leader.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

SUGGESTED STATEMENT BY MINISTER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that no announcement has been made as to whether or not a payment has been triggered under the provisions of the western grain stabilization plan, notwithstanding the fact that the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board, when originally proposing the plan, stated that such decisions would be made early in each calendar year; and in view of the fact that no announcement has been made with respect to compensation to grain producers arising out of the Russian embargo, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gustafson):

That the Minister of Agriculture make a statement on motions with respect to both these matters to indicate that he still retains some interest in agriculture in western Canada.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

That the Solicitor General explain to the House in a statement on motions which part of the force would be reduced, or which part of the country would

SALMON FISHING ON RESTIGOUCHE RESERVE IN QUEBEC—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mel Gass (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The natives of Restigouche Reserve in Quebec were instructed to cease all salmon fishing by midnight last night or suffer the consequences. As of 11 a.m. this morning, 300 Quebec Provincial Police and fisheries officers have the reserve surrounded and under siege. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Corbett):

That this House instruct the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to contact his provincial counterpart, urging him to intervene so that a peaceful solution can be found before this crisis situation gets further out of hand.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

POLLUTION OF NIAGARA RIVER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the Minister of the Environment has told the press that the pollution of the Niagara River is a top priority concern to his department, and whereas it has now been reported that levels of cancer-causing PCBs have jumped from 153 to 266, and the Lindane compound is now at 26 when it had not previously been detected, and whereas four million gallons of untreated industrial and domestic waste continue to be dumped into the Niagara River from Niagara Falls, New York, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe South (Mr. Stewart):

That this House instruct the minister that the people of Niagara want more action on the Niagara River problem and a good deal less time spent on consuming and unproductive talk with the press about his department's top priorities.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

HOUSING

INCREASE IN NUMBER OF EVICTIONS FOR NON-PAYMENT OF RENT

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Yesterday the Minister of Finance advised home owners and farmers who face foreclosure to talk to the banks about their situation. Whatever the merits of that particular policy, the minister avoided saying anything whatsoever about tenants. Even the minister must be aware that evictions are radically increasing across the country. In Toronto, alone, during the first four months of 1981, people in 1,081 units were evicted. What advice does the Minister of Finance have for those people?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member totally misunderstood the nature of my remarks yesterday on the subject of the impact of high interest rates on various groups in the community. I stated that I had a meeting with the representatives of The Canadian Bankers' Association, and they assured me that the banking institutions would lean over backwards in attempting to assist hardship cases in the present circumstances. That is quite different from his comment to the effect that I had given advice to various people to go to see the bankers. That was not the nature of my comment.

QUERY RESPECTING INTRODUCTION OF SHELTER ALLOWANCE PROGRAM

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Finance may then recall that on March 6, 1981, his colleague, the minister responsible for housing, said:

> The time had clearly come for all of those truly interested in the meeting of people's housing needs to seriously consider the idea of a shelter allowance.

That was stated many months ago. There has been no talk of a shelter allowance since that time. It is clear that the Minister of Finance does not agree with the minister responsible for housing, because it is somewhere close to the bottom in the government's list of priorities. I would like to ask the Minister of Finance if he would reconsider his policy and put shelter allowances back up in a top priority, where it belongs.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has referred to a comment made by the minister responsible for housing that a shelter allowance is something which ought to be considered. I agree with him on that matter, and it has been considered. When it comes to the point where financial circumstances would permit the Government of Canada to finance a shelter allowance, I will, of course, be pleased to make an announcement in the House; but at the present time, in view of the constant—

Mr. Clark: Money you are spending on Petrofina.

Mr. MacEachen: —exhortations that I am being given by his colleagues on the other side to restrain government expenditures, I would not want to go against that overwhelming advice from the other side.

Mr. Clark: Maybe Maurice Strong would contribute.

Mr. Crosbie: The record is getting worn out, Allan.

Mr. MacEachen: So are the questions.

INCREASE IN HOUSE PRICES

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): The minister may be happy with that response, but I can assure him that tenants are not. I would also like to remind the minister that everyone in this country knows that low income people are being hurt by his policies. What the minister must also know is that middle income people are increasingly feeling the squeeze, and they are feeling it hard. The average price for a home in Vancouver is now $135,000. For a single mortgage—

An hon. Member: One hundred and sixty.

Mr. Crombie: —on an average home in Toronto one needs $36,000. Middle income people are renegotiating mortgages at a current record rate. People are now paying $300 and $400 more every month. I would like to ask the minister whether the best he can say to the middle-income Canadians is, "Go see the banks." Is that it? Is that the government's policy?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): No, Madam Speaker, that is the hon. member's rhetoric.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

AGRICULTURE

INCREASE IN FARM BANKRUPTCIES IN ONTARIO

Hon. John Wise (Elgin): Madam Speaker, my question is in the same general subject area and it is directed to my friend, the Minister of Agriculture. It refers to farm bankruptcies, foreclosures, and forced sales. Farm bankruptcies in Ontario have increased by 90 per cent, year over year and foreclosures and forfeit sales have increased ten times. The minister gives commitments, and the minister does not fulfil commitments; he gives promises and he breaks promises. When can we expect at least one single piece of legislation before it is too late?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows that there is some legislation that may help farmers. For instance, the meat import bill is before the Standing Committee on Agriculture at the present time. If it received speedy passage and came back to the House before the end of June, it could be law before many days pass. It is up to members of the committee to deal with the legislation that is before them in committee.

MINISTERIAL SPEECHES

Hon. John Wise (Elgin): Madam Speaker, the farmers of Canada have a very descriptive term for the minister's words, but I think it is unparliamentary so I shall simply refer his answer as sheer and utter nonsense. The minister travels across the country and when in one province he is going to amend the Bank Act; in another he is going to amend the Income Tax Act; then he is going to bring in amendments to the Small Business Development Bond to include the unincorporated farmer; in the next place he speaks he is going to bring in amendments immediately to the Farm Credit Act. When is the minister going to stop talking and do something?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wise: When is the minister going to stop misleading farmers or leading them down the garden path? Again, I give the minister the opportunity to tell us when he is going to do one single thing that will help farmers with this problem of high interest rates?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, the hon. member asks when we are going to do something. I find it very strange that his party says that the economics of the nation is so important, yet they take one of their opposition days and waste it in the House of Commons, not even talking about economics. Who is the biggest hypocrite in this House? They have talked about legislation, but all they have to do is get rid of some of those foolish opposition days, and give us one of those days and we will bring some legislation forward.

BANKS AND BANKING

MINISTER'S MEETING WITH BANKERS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. After his interesting meeting with the bankers association the other day, the bankers emerged saying that the impact of high interest rates on farmers and home owners was not as black as it had been painted. It certainly is not bad for the banks which are having record level profits.

Considering that the banks did not come up with one specific suggestion to help either home owners or farmers, could the minister tell the House whether he took a specific proposal to the bankers that they could act upon?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the purpose of the meeting was to seek the co-operation of financial institutions in helping individuals who may be in real difficulty in the present circumstances. I believe that was a very important request and a very important subject to discuss with the representatives of the banks. They have assured me that in present circumstances they will do everything they can to avoid the kind of tragedy that was mentioned yesterday in the question period, namely, the possibility of foreclosure.

The hon. member may realize that a year ago, at about this time, we had a very rapid run-up of interest rates and people were concerned, as I was, about the possibility of foreclosures. The fact of the matter is that because of the co-operation between the minister responsible for Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the financial institutions, it was possible for home owners who were renegotiating their mortgages in that period of high interest rates to get over the period and to maintain their homes and their payments. That is the objective that I have at the present time in enlisting the co-operation of the financial institutions.

SPREAD BETWEEN INTEREST RATES PAID AND CHARGED

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, the reality is that 1,000 Canadian families have to abandon their homes every month. The reality is that 100 Canadians go into personal bankruptcy every day. That is the result of this government's continuation of the high interest rate policy. It is time the government changed that policy, instead of coming out with vague expressions of concern.

• (1425)

Since the minister did not propose one thing specifically to help home owners or farmers, did he at least go to the bankers with another question concerning the spread between what the banks pay families who have savings accounts compared to what the banks charge for loans? This spread, as everyone knows, is one of the major reasons for record level profits for the banks. Did the minister at least say to the banks that they should reduce that spread and bring their profits down to reasonable levels?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has put some statistics on the record, which I find to be really quite offensive—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: —because of their inaccuracy. I believe the hon. member ought, first of all, to produce the statistics which support his claim that 1,000 home owners for a period of time are losing their homes. I think that is totally false.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: He ought to back up his rhetoric with some facts instead of poisoning the atmosphere in the country by these false statements.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, I would be happy to take the minister to Halifax, to Montreal, to Toronto or to Vancouver, so he can see the thousands of Canadians who are losing their homes. The minister should go and talk to the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: What about Cuba?

REASON FOR MEETING

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. Since the minister has acknowledged that he took neither a specific proposal to the banks to help home owners or to help farmers, nor a specific recommendation that the banks reduce their profits, is it any surprise that the banks came up with no specific commitment at all? What was the point of the meeting which the minister had?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I asked the hon. member for some firm statistics, but instead he offered me a trip.

Mr. Broadbent: I will send them over to you.

Mr. MacEachen: I do not find that an adequate substitute. I believe I received something much more important from the representatives of the banking institutions not in specific details but a general assurance that under these circumstances they would show the necessary tolerance and humanity in dealing with their clients. I believe that is very important, and it was that same attitude we succeeded in bringing to bear on a similar problem a year ago. The hon. member believes in different techniques. I believe in techniques that work.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss MacDonald: Show us one that does.

AVIATION SAFETY

COMPOSITION OF ADVISORY COMMITTEE TO REVIEW DUBIN REPORT

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. There are now nine associations connected with all aspects of aviation in Canada which have denounced both the composition of the minister's advisory committee as well as the review process with respect to the implementation of the Dubin recommendations on aviation safety. The composition of the review board and the process, which the minister has outlined, are being perceived as an effort to discredit the very good work of the Dubin inquiry. Yesterday the minister met with representatives of the nine associations who appealed to him for changes both in the composition of that committee and in the process. Is the minister seriously considering the suggestions and recommendations which were advanced by this group yesterday? If not, why not?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, we did meet yesterday. As a matter of fact, I had given consideration to the arguments which were presented by the group of nine yesterday. They had wanted me to appoint representatives of these different groups to this committee. I thought that this would not wash because we would simply have had a repeat of the Dubin inquiry. I suggested very strongly that appointing knowledgeable people who were connected with the industry in the past to give me advice was the right approach.

The most difficult problem is the presence of Mr. McLeish, the air administrator, on that committee. My hon. friend has mentioned that repeatedly. My reason for having him there is simply the fact that the air administration will have to implement the decisions that I make on the recommendations of the advisory committee. He will have to do that. He will also have to provide, as he is entitled to do, his opinion to the advisory committee. If he does not do that, the advisory committee will lose a lot of essential information. I was interested in the fact that the group, and ATAC in particular, recommended that Mr. McLeish should be there in an ex officio position. I fail to see the difference between him being a member of the advisory committee as a full-fledged member or as an ex officio member.

● (1430)

IMPLEMENTATION OF REPORT'S RECOMMENDATIONS

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): The minister should know that, unless he alters the course he is presently following, the continuing confrontation will undermine the credibility of the Dubin report. It will also impair the objectivity and indeed the independence necessary to ensure that the implementation process is orderly and smooth. In short, it is casting serious doubt upon the government's intentions as to whether it is serious about implementing the major recommendations of this report. What steps does the minister propose to take to restore confidence within the aviation industry? What steps is he proposing to assure the Canadian public that indeed the recommendations of the Dubin report will be implemented and not diluted?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I suggest that common sense will prevail very soon. If you have a series of regulations and measures that have to be implemented by your department, the least you can have is representation of your department on the committee which advises you to do that. If Mr. McLeish were not on the committee, I would be faced with the difficulty of having to receive advice from the committee and then having to check the advice with my department. I thought it made sense to have my department represented on the committee. I repeat, common sense will prevail very soon.

Mr. Mazankowski: The minister is suggesting common sense will provide the solution.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Will the minister make a clear statement on behalf of his government and his department in particular on whether he accepts the principle and the major recommendations of the Dubin report? If he were to do that, it would move the process along. It may provide the initial start toward ensuring that confidence is once again restored in the aviation sector.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, if the hon. member is referring to the main recommendations in the first volume of the Dubin report, I have already done that. It is in Hansard. Some of the press have acknowledged that. For example, here is a headline, "Pepin Pledges Impartial Air Board". What else can I do? I have done that repeatedly.

The department readily accepts the necessity of having an independent air aviation safety board. This is clear. The problem is how to go about it. Should we accept the whole of the Dubin recommendations? My position on that is simple. Instead of accepting the report without discussion, I suggested we look at it and see whether we will accept 89, 90, 95, 99 or 100 per cent of it. That is what we are now doing.

ENERGY

FUTURE OF COLD LAKE, ALTA. MEGAPROJECTS

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. A few weeks ago the minister told this House that he would be able to give assurances to Alsands and Imperial at Cold Lake that a pricing regime would be ready in time to avert the cancellation of these two megaprojects in northeastern Alberta. Will the minister tell this House why he is so certain that these plants will not be cancelled in light of his failure to reach an energy agreement with Alberta yesterday? Also, what assurance is he prepared to give to the developers of these two megaprojects today so that they will proceed on schedule this summer?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the hon. member started with a reference to a statement I allegedly made. I would like him to quote the statement so that I can judge its source and content.

Mr. Shields: The minister knows full well that he said in this House that he would be prepared to give assurances to the two companies.

GOVERNMENT LOAN TO IMPERIAL OIL

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Last fall the government took Imperial Oil's threat to cancel its oil sands project at Cold Lake significantly serious enough that it loaned Imperial Oil $40 million of the taxpayers' money. After what date does Imperial Oil have no further obligation to repay this loan, if indeed it is forced to cancel because of the lack of an energy agreement with Alberta?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the hon. member did not give the exact reference he was attributing to me. I invite him to do so. As far as his question is concerned, we have an agreement with Imperial Oil that it would be given the loan, that the advance would not lapse for at least a year after the expiration of a particular date in June—I believe around June 20. If the project is approved or proceeded with within the next year, the obligation of Imperial remains.

RAILWAYS

TRANSPORTATION OF URANIUM CONCENTRATE

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Transport. This week while the Minister of Finance was offering the ailing nuclear industry his love but no more money, and I congratulate him for that, a Canadian Pacific trainload of Australian yellow cake uranium concentrate has been travelling from the west coast through the major population centres to Eldorado Nuclear refineries in Port Hope, posing a radiation threat to men, women and children.

Mr. Blenkarn: Nonsense.

Mr. Rose: The U.S. nuclear regulatory committee has termed a yellow cake spill in a populated area as the worst conceivable accident that can happen in the front end of the fuel cycle. So much for nonsense! Why has the minister allowed this potentially lethal foreign cargo, which if spilled would pose considerable risk to humans and the environment, to be transshipped by rail across our country?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, dangerous goods will be transported in Canada for a long time to come. This is part of the Canadian economy, as it is part of the economy of any industrial country. The question is whether we are taking all precautionary measures which should be taken in such circumstances. In this instance, yes we are. The Atomic Energy Control Board's regulations as well as the regulations on packaging of the Canadian Transport Commission are being implemented as they should. The transportation of dangerous goods section of my department is monitoring the operation. All precautionary measures are being taken. I suggest that is all that can be done unless you want to stop the economy, a great amount of which is based on the transportation of dangerous goods.

Mr. Rose: I would like to see a cost benefit study on that one.

CONTINGENCY PLANS TO COPE WITH POSSIBLE DISASTER

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): This country does not have a clean-up team such as the private clean-up teams offered by the Western Sherwood Mining company in the state of Washington. The minister knows that a derailment in the Fraser canyon could wipe out fish stocks for years to come, salmon stocks in particular. He also knows that a derailment in a populated area could contaminate it for years to come. Since this insanity is being permitted, and this is not the first time, I have two questions for the minister. First, will he outline to the House briefly what contingency plans he has other than just labelling the boxcars or flatcars, to prevent another Mississauga, a nuclear Mississauga? Second, will he assure the House that this kind of Australian "nuclear special" will not be permitted any reruns?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I explained at some length that the regulations of the Atomic Energy Control Board and the CTC are being implemented in this case. I went to some length to explain that my department is keeping a watchful eye on the situation. What else can be done? I do not deny that there is a danger. I am just saying that if one takes as a postulate that you should not carry dangerous goods, you would have to stop a good percentage of the Canadian economy. That is what I am saying.

● (1440)

On the subject of transportation of dangerous goods, this House passed legislation recently, about a year ago, which is being implemented now, and regulations are being developed. We have also had an inquiry, the Grange inquiry, into the transportation of dangerous goods, and nine of the 15 recommendations of Justice Grange are already being implemented, and the other six are being discussed before the CTC. I am just saying the problem is a real one and we are taking the necessary measures to cope with it.

TRANSPORT

CONSULTATION BETWEEN FEDERAL GOVERNMENT AND PORT OF MONTREAL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal-Sainte-Marie): Madam Speaker, could the Minister of Transport tell us whether the statement made by the Quebec Minister of Transport to the effect that there had been no consultation between the federal government and the port of Montreal is true or not?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I must say that the difficulty lies in the fact that the statement was made by the Quebec Minister of Economic Development rather than by the Quebec Minister of Transport. Now we are not in a position to decide to whom we should report; in this case, we are reporting to the Quebec Minister of Transport. The new port policy was discussed at length at least twice with department officials. The minister received the publicity, the press release, the booklet, along with the announcement. So we do not think that Mr. Landry has any cause for complaint. He might have cause for complaint because his colleague the Minister of Transport failed to tell him about his exchange of correspondence with us on the matter.

UREA FORMALDEHYDE FOAM INSULATION—COMPENSATION FOR HOME OWNERS

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, will the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs tell the House if the government has decided to pay compensation to those people who installed urea formaldehyde foam insulation in their homes? The minister indicated that the cabinet was to consider the terms of an assistance package today.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question for it enables me to tell the House that the government has authorized the immediate establishment of an action and co-ordination centre in my department in Ottawa to help Canadians who are facing this problem. Second, all Canadians anxious to contact this action and information centre will have access to a toll-free telephone service. Third, a national program will be launched in the coming months to monitor some 2,400 houses throughout Canada with a view to meeting the needs of those who feel most affected and most concerned by this question. Fourth, special monitoring and research units will be set up in Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver. Finally, Madam Speaker, pursuant to the Hazardous Products Act, the board of review will be created and will hold its first hearing at the end of this month.

HOME OWNERS' ASSOCIATIONS

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I might say that I am pleased to note that there is some indication of concern on the government's part for these people who have installed UFFI, but I did not hear any mention about dollars and cents, or anything about compensation for those people who were given formal approval by the government to put this stuff in their homes. Is the minister aware of a number of groups forming across the country, the latest one in Toronto last night, well organized, responsible and voluble groups who are threatening massive class actions if the government does not consider some form of compensation for those who have put this material in their homes?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I find it somewhat puzzling and irresponsible that the hon. member should make such remarks. The government is assuming its responsibilities and will spend a few million dollars to make this house study and monitoring program available to Canadians. To my mind, it is a very significant first step, and the hon. member should commend us for this initiative instead of giving the impression he wants to solve this issue even before the board of review established under the Hazardous Products Act has had a chance to hold public hearings and submit its report. I am aware of the hon. member's interest in matters within the purview of my department. He ought to be familiar with the Hazardous Products Act and know that we cannot speak of really hazardous products as long as that board has not presented its report.

EXPOSURE TO FORMALDEHYDE GAS

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): This question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, Madam Speaker. Now that the government has assumed a degree of responsibility on this urea formaldehyde question, and my question to the minister concerns the health of Canadians who may have been exposed to urea formaldehyde gas, what is she doing to check on those people who may have been exposed to the gas? Is she prepared to follow the example established by her colleague, and set up, in co-ordination with the provinces, action centres across the country to do a check on the health of Canadians who may have been exposed to this gas?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I would like to say that the co-ordination committee will give top priority to all men and women who have health problems. One of the cabinet instructions was to make sure that this co-ordination committee will give priority to men and women whose health is affected or who believe that they are affected by this product.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

AVAILABILITY OF FUNDS FOR EXTENSION OF NATURAL GAS SERVICE

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources who will recall that in a letter to me, dated January of this year, he stated that under the National Energy Program provision has been made for federal-provincial assistance for the extension of natural gas service into communities where such service would otherwise be economically prohibitive. I have been informed that the Hon. Robert Welch, the minister's provincial counterpart in Ontario, has given approval for the construction of a natural gas line into the town of Parry Sound but has been informed by the federal ministry that funds for such a project are not available this year. Will the minister tell this House if, as he stated, there are funds for such projects and, if so, when such funds will be available?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the announcement made in the National Energy Program, indeed, provides for several hundred million dollars to be allocated over the next ten years for this particular purpose. The first priority we have set up, however, for this year has been the establishment of the Home Conservation and Oil Substitution Program, which means subsidizing individual citizens to the tune of $800 for conversion away from oil. We want to set this program in operation and have it fully going this year. Next year we will start the program concerning help for distribution systems.

As far as the particular project of concern to the hon. member is concerned, I might say that even if Mr. Welch had approved this project, that does not necessarily mean it would be eligible for a grant. This would have to be studied in terms of whether or not the project is viable on its own or needs help and support. That program will have funds available starting next year.

PROVINCIAL ROLE

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, I was certainly informed by the minister, and certainly misled as a great many others were, that it was up to the province of Ontario, that there was $300 million plus in there and the federal government was willing, able, and ready to hand that money over. That was the impression you gave me in January. You said to go to your provincial counterparts; they are the ones who make the decision. Now you have changed the rules. What are your comments on that, Mr. Minister?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, my suggestion to the hon. member would be that he take a course in either quick or slow reading. To go back to my letter, I never said what he attributed to me.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REQUEST THAT JOURNALISTS AND TECHNICIANS BE GIVEN SAME ADVANTAGES

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Strathcona): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. An agreement in principle has been reached between the corporation and its technicians in Montreal. After a three-week long strike, both parties have agreed to a 10 per cent raise over the first year and a 10.5 per cent raise over the second year plus a 3.5 per cent raise resulting from the restructuring of the pay scale, which adds up to raises of 10 and 14 per cent respectively. That is the new national standard for the CBC. Does the minister intend to ask the corporation to offer similar raises to its journalists who have been striking for over seven months? Also, could not this agreement serve as a basis for the settlement of the other current conflicts?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is mentioning the fact that the union leaders have agreed to recommend to their members acceptance of the offers the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has made to its technicians and on which they will be called to vote today. Needless to say, Madam Speaker, I would be pleased to convey the hon. member's suggestion to the president of the CBC. I should like to mention, however, that that union has also agreed to an increase in the number of working hours every week.

SETTLEMENT OF DISPUTE BEFORE HOLDING OF ECONOMIC SUMMIT

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Strathcona): Madam Speaker, in view of the fact that the CBC has negotiated and apparently nearly concluded a contract with its technicians in Montreal before doing so with its technicians in Toronto, which is something of a novelty, and in view of the fact that its journalists in Montreal and its technicians on the English network would be happy to receive the same offers before the economic summit, would the minister prevail upon the corporation to negotiate and settle these conflicts before the summit, or would he prefer to let these conflicts deteriorate until September, now that the corporation can use its transcoding installations in Montreal to broadcast the proceedings of this summit to the world without having to settle with its employees who are still on strike?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): In view of the way the CBC has been bargaining this week, Madam Speaker, it is clear that it is anxious to get agreements from all its working units as soon as possible. There are some 24 or 25 of these units, and the CBC has already signed agreements with 16 or 17 of them. Which means that it still has to get agreements from 5 or 6 of them, and we hope that the parties will be able to sign new working contracts as soon as possible.

AGRICULTURE

HERD MAINTENANCE PROGRAM—DELAY IN PAYMENTS

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. Final settlement for many beef, dairy and sheep producers under the Herd Maintenance Program is being delayed while the minister in charge of DREE travels in Africa. Producers are frustrated and angry at still having to wait two months after their appeals have come to Ottawa for his attention, and in the meantime prices have continued to go down. They need the money now.

Is the minister impressing upon his colleague, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, the need to deal quickly with these appeals, and when will the funds be forwarded to the producers who have waited almost a year for them?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, the hon. member said they waited almost a year on the appeals. A lot of these applications were not submitted until after the deadline, which was the end of December, 1980. So the appeals have been here, and a committee of ministers will meet later this afternoon to discuss them further, and hopefully we can come to an early settlement.

COST SHARING OF DROUGHT RELIEF PROGRAMS

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, it is interesting to note that the deadline has been extended to December 31. Most of our producers did not know about that one.

In March the province of Saskatchewan announced a continuing program of assistance should drought continue into this season. Does the minister intend to inform Saskatchewan and other provinces as to his intentions regarding cost sharing of such programs, and when is the government going to make an announcement in that regard for 1981?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, we are more optimistic than is the hon. member. We hope no announcement has to be made of any kind. As we said earlier, we are monitoring the situation very closely and we will be meeting with provincial ministers in early July for further discussions.

Our reports show that there are probably at the present time much better moisture conditions than last year in most areas of western Canada. We know there is one area in particular in Saskatchewan in need of moisture, but the crops planted have in most areas germinated quite well, and if they do get moisture within the next week or ten days we could still have a very good crop in those areas.

NATIONAL REVENUE

SAINT JOHN, NEW BRUNSWICK—CUSTOMS SERVICE

Mr. Mike Landers (Saint John): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. Is the minister in a position to put to rest rumours of customs personnel reductions at the Saint John, New Brunswick, airport?

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. I can assure him there will be no reduction of services in the city of Saint John. There has been a review, with regard to the most efficient and effective use of manpower, but I can assure him there will be no reduction of the services of my department in that city.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

FISHING DISPUTE AT RESTIGOUCHE RESERVE, QUE.

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I have been in touch with the chief of the Indian band at Restigouche and he tells me that about 200 QPP officers have surrounded the reserve. The dispute is over fishing. The children are blocked from school and his band office is surrounded.

I am wondering if the minister could state whether he has some officials there attempting to solve this situation, and if he could bring us up to date as to what has happened in order to alleviate this situation.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I would tell the hon. member that I have just been advised the police have left the Restigouche reserve and the band chief has been in touch with the appropriate officials from Quebec and the deputy minister there, Mr. Gourdeau, and the band is resuming negotiations. The dispute is over the number of fishing days. The Indians wish to fish six days, the Quebec government which administers the Fisheries Act there wants three days, and the dispute is over the remaining three days. They have agreed to resume negotiations.

FEDERAL INVOLVEMENT

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Madam Speaker, as a short supplementary, does the minister have any officials on hand in order to keep the situation under control, and have there been any other federal officials involved such as members of the RCMP or federal fisheries people, in order that the band chief can have some indication of what has happened?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I do not believe the RCMP have been involved at all. It is the Quebec Provincial Police. I think the matter just broke out this morning. My director general in the Quebec region has been in touch and is keeping a very close watch and is ready to assist in the negotiations.

EMERGENCY MEASURES

TAX ON MATERIALS USED TO REPAIR DAMAGE CAUSED BY NATURAL DISASTERS

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Madam Speaker, my question is for the President of the Privy Council in his capacity as the minister responsible for Emergency Planning Canada. At the June 5 conference of federal and provincial ministers and officials responsible for emergency planning, we are told that the participants addressed, among other topics, "more equitable arrangements for sharing the financial costs of large-scale natural disasters."

Since one of the government's stated aims in this area is the "mitigation of human suffering", and since the government has undertaken to consult with the provinces on arrangements for measures to alleviate hardship to individuals arising from disasters, I ask the minister if he raised with his provincial colleagues the possibility of remitting excise taxes levied on materials used in the course of repairing and/or replacing buildings and other losses as a result of major disasters? And if not, could he explain why?

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, indeed, on Friday last I had the honour of chairing a federal-provincial conference on Emergency Planning Canada which was attended by my provincial counterparts. The spirit that prevailed was most encouraging. Indeed there was an obvious willingness to co-operate even further to ensure that every region in Canada is able to cope more efficiently, more significantly and more constructively in the various emergency situations that may occur. With regard to the specific and quite restrictive suggestion made by the hon. member, no provincial minister brought it up at the conference, at least not to my knowledge and I was at the meeting all day. Be that as it may, I shall take note of the hon. member's suggestion since we are in permanent consultation, and I shall certainly take it under advisement.

● (1500)

[English]

Mr. Halliday: Madam Speaker, I asked his colleague, the Minister of Finance, a few months ago if he would bring this matter to their attention. Obviously they forgot it, or just ignored doing it.

PARTICIPATION OF MUNICIPAL REPRESENTATIVES IN PLANNING CONFERENCE

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question. In peacetime emergencies the government has indicated that it "recognizes and reaffirms that the initial responsibility for meeting emergencies normally rests with those directly affected". To this end, in part, the government sponsors courses on emergency planning at the Federal Study Centre in Arnprior. However, why does the government itself not seek important feedback from the private sector, from citizens who have been directly involved with peacetime emergencies and natural disasters?

At the recent conference last Friday on emergency planning, convened by the federal minister, why were those individuals, who have local experience in their own communities with natural disasters, not invited to attend? Finally, will the minister tell the House whether he will invite experienced private citizens to attend any future conferences on emergency planning?

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, that conference was a first at the ministerial level and we considered it an important step toward a better planning of emergency measures in Canada. What the hon. member is suggesting surely makes sense. Should the individual and the private sector become more involved? I fully agree with his suggestion, and because they were not invited to attend the first meeting is no reason why we should not be interested in the views they may wish to express. I can assure the hon. member that, through our regional directors, the responsible provincial ministers and our own federal ministers who are responsible for emergency measures in their respective departments, we are quite willing to consult the private sector, as we have always done in the past and will continue to do. We did not invite them to this first federal-provincial conference because it was a ministers' meeting; but there is no saying that, in the future, when other meetings are held, whether it be at the provincial, regional or federal levels, here in Ottawa, we may not have the opportunity of having discussions with all parties interested in emergency planning in Canada.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I wonder if I might direct a question to the government House leader with respect to business of the House tomorrow and into next week.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, tomorrow there is an agreement among representatives of the parties that we dispose of all stages of Bill S-7, an act to provide for the prohibition of certain international air services, standing in the name of the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs. The agreement was to the effect that one speaker per party will participate, and then the bill will be voted through all stages. I understand that if a recorded division is required any time tomorrow, it will be postponed until next week.

Following Bill S-7, we will deal with report stage and third reading stage of Bill S-4, an act to amend the Department of Labour Act. Finally, we will deal with Bill S-10, an act to amend the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act.

Those are the three bills for tomorrow, S-7, S-4 and S-10, in that order.

[Translation]

Concerning the business for next week, we will later on be giving notice of a motion on behalf of the government to debate the important issue of the North-South dialogue and international affairs in general. The government therefore will be debating this motion, of which notice will be given later today, on Monday. Technically, we could wait until tomorrow to give this notice, but as a courtesy to the opposition and at their request, I will make sure that they can have the text of this motion, which will be introduced on behalf of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan), later today.

Tuesday will be an allotted day set aside for the New Democratic Party, and we understand that they will keep the promise they made in this House to the effect that, if the government agreed to set aside a day to debate the important issue of the North-South dialogue, they would word the motion for their allotted day in such a way as to allow the House to debate the same subject. We therefore expect that Tuesday's debate will also deal with the North-South dialogue, which means that to all intents and purposes, we shall probably be dealing with international affairs and the North-South dialogue in the House of Commons next Monday and Tuesday.

Finally, many amendments to Bill C-57 have been moved. They should be disposed of next week. We are now having discussions in order to decide when we should have our second day of debate at the report stage. Whatever day we choose, at the end of it, we should be expected to vote on several dozens of amendments, and we have tentatively agreed that the votes should not take quite as long as they could. In theory, Madam

Speaker, if we were to vote 46 times, which is possible, members of the House would spend six hours yo-yoing and I believe no one here is interested in this type of exercise.

At a meeting this morning, we agreed that we could perhaps make arrangements to vote for a maximum of two or three hours if this debate were held on Thursday. In any event, we shall be completing the report stage of Bill C-57, on Thursday probably, but this remains to be confirmed. If such were the case, we would proceed to third reading on Friday, and if a recorded division is required, it would be deferred to the following week, once again depending on when we have the report stage of Bill C-57. If this were to occur Thursday, as I have just stated, Wednesday will be considered more or less like a Friday, and I shall then make arrangements with my colleagues, the other House leaders, to choose bills on which there is agreement to try to clean up the Order Paper, which is still rather crowded for this time of the year. Madam Speaker, that is essentially what we shall deal with tomorrow and next week.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, with respect to the understanding of the government House leader concerning Bill S-7, that we would deal with it in all stages with one speaker each tomorrow, that is agreeable to us. If there were to be a House order in that regard, there would be no difficulty.

Also, we concur with respect to the question of the divisions. I will have a discussion with my colleagues with respect to the procedure on the voting on Bill C-57, but it seems generally acceptable; we can work out the details later.

I realize the government House leader is not in a position this week to give consideration to the legislative program for the balance of this session, but does he feel that he might be in a position next week to discuss the matter? Would that be possible?

Before sitting down, I want to say that we are very grateful for the indication of the debate on Monday regarding the motion standing in the name of the Hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs, and the fact the New Democratic Party has forfeited a day. This will allow a two-day debate generally in the field of foreign affairs, which is consistent with the time we used in 1977 when the motion was in the name of the government.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I will try to answer the question raised by the hon. member. I think I will be in a better position to provide the hon. member with the details of the program for the balance of the month of June, and perhaps part of July, hopefully next week. I told him that this morning, and I will try to live by that suggestion.

In so far as the debate on Monday and Tuesday is concerned, I am grateful to the NDP.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): If the government feels it necessary, we would be prepared to agree to a House order now with respect to Bill S-7.

Mr. Knowles: It is not necessary.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, it is not necessary. I take the word of my hon. colleague, as I always do, and I never regret it.

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, the program announced for tomorrow seems quite reasonable. I do not think we need a House order with respect to Bill S-7.

● (1510)

With respect to Monday and Tuesday, I wonder where both of my friends have been. They speak as though, because the government has offered to spend a day on external affairs, particularly on North-South, they are glad that we are willing to do the same. The record will show that it started the other way around. We proposed that there be such a debate. We suggested that it be a three-day debate. A few days ago I indicated that, whether or not the other parties offered a day, we would use our day next week for external affairs, with particular emphasis on North-South. So I thank the government House leader for adding a government day to discuss the same subject. I am sorry that I cannot extend the same thanks to the members of the Progressive Conservative party. They have so many opposition days surely they could have given one to this subject as well.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, with respect to Bill C-57, we, too, have already set in motion possible discussions so that we do not have to vote for five or six hours, requiring the Clerks at the Table to call out several thousand names while we vote 30 or 40 times. I trust that the negotiations with respect to that matter will be successful.

Madam Speaker, all of that is preliminary. I come now to an important question. As the government House leader knows, hardly a week in this session has gone by in which I have not pressed the need for amendments which will take care of the veterans' widows who were left out of last summer's Bill C-40. I want to say to the minister that his answers have been very helpful and encouraging and have led most of us who are interested in this subject to believe that there will be such legislation in this session, even to believe that it will come before us in the month of June. Can the minister now say whether that legislation is ready to be placed on the order paper, or, if not, can he say whether we can count on it in June?

I might ask a supplementary question. Is it time that we started to make arrangements for a short debate so that once we have the legislation we can get it through and those who are the beneficiaries of it will know that that legislation is on the statute books?

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, the legislation my hon. colleague is talking about is actually under consideration by cabinet. When it has received final approval it will be introduced in due course. Whether that will be in this session and whether it will be before the end of June, I regret to say I am not in a position to confirm or deny at this time. I can tell the hon. member that since he has been confident, polite and optimistic in the past, there is no reason he should change.

Mr. Waddell: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. On Monday, June 8, as reported at page 10350 of Hansard, I asked a question of the President of the Privy Council with respect to the government's intentions on Bill C-48, the oil and gas bill. He replied that he would be in a position to give me a more detailed answer on Thursday.

This being Thursday, I wonder if the minister is in the position to answer my question, which specifically dealt with the request that the government not proceed with Bill C-48 in this session. It is in committee now and people in the north, specifically native people, have expressed the wish that they be given more time to make their representations on this bill. Is the minister now in a position to tell this House that it is the government's intention not to deal with this bill in this session of Parliament but to wait until the fall to deal with Bill C-48?

Mr. Pinard: No, Madam Speaker, I am not in a position to give that assurance to the hon. member. However, I have been told that the minister responsible for energy is talking to the energy critics of both opposition parties with a view to coming to some arrangement to dispose of the committee stage of this bill. Obviously, depending on the results of his negotiations, I cannot at this time state what will be done with that bill. Whether it is reported before the end of June or before the summer adjournment, or whether he will deal with it in third reading in the House or at report stage, which is what the hon. member is asking, I prefer to wait for the results of the negotiations between the minister, the hon. member himself and the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson). I will then be in a better position to give some clear indications to the hon. member with respect to this bill. But at this stage I prefer to leave the matter to the minister of energy, who is trying to come to some agreement to dispose of this bill.

PRIVILEGE

MR. KAPLAN—S.O. 43 MOTION OF MR. FRIESEN

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which arises out of a motion proposed under the provisions of Standing Order 43 by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen). In that motion, statements were attributed to me which I did not make. I would like to set the record straight.

It was suggested by the hon. member that I had threatened that if the RCMP unionized I would reduce their size by 3,000 men—

Mr. Elzinga: He never said "unionized".

Mr. Kaplan: The hon. member asked whether I had spoken to the provincial attorneys general about this matter. In fact, I did not threaten that the RCMP would be reduced by 3,000 men.

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Kaplan: I did indicate that if the RCMP did organize, their mandate would have to be reconsidered.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The minister does not have a question of privilege. He is obviously trying to set the record straight, but there are other opportunities to do that.

Mr. Friesen: I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker. I feel I must correct the record. I did not use the word "unionize". I think the Solicitor General—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. This is exactly what happens when hon. members start to correct the record.

PETITION

MR. DARLING—REINSTATEMENT OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, at this time I have the privilege to present a petition containing some 30,000 names which have been gathered together by the wives of the Ontario Provincial Police at the Huntsville, Ontario detachment. The wives are sitting in the gallery at this time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Darling: There are names on the petition representing people from one coast to the other and, particularly, there are a great many names from the provinces of British Columbia and Quebec. The petition states that the undersigned are firmly convinced that capital punishment constitutes a reasonable and effective deterrent to criminal homicide of police officers and other persons in Canada. The petitioners support the reinstatement of capital punishment as a deterrent.

Mr. Beatty: I bring to Your Honour's attention question No. 1,852, which has sat on the Order Paper for more than six months. When I rose in my place a couple of days ago to bring this question to the parliamentary secretary's attention, I received yet again the assurance of the parliamentary secretary that some action would be taken. The Minister of Communications intervened with a very irrelevant interjection, to suggest that he had the information and was ready to provide it before an estimates committee. I am wondering whether I am to infer from the intervention of the Minister of Communications that he is not prepared to answer questions which have sat on the Order Paper for over six months, and which information was made available to him several months ago, according to the chairman of the Canadian Film Development Corporation. I would like to know the reason for the delay in view of the fact that the chairman's term has expired since this question was put on the Order Paper.

Mr. Collenette: It would be helpful if the hon. member would refer to my previous answers to his six previous interventions on this subject; but I would like to say that the government has never refused to answer any particular question put on the Order Paper.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—NON-CONFIDENCE MOTION—CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition) moved:

That this House calls on the government to send a reference to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs authorizing it to hear arguments for and against the reintroduction of capital punishment as the penalty for some classes of murder, and, requiring the committee to report its conclusions by December 18, 1981; and

That this House further expresses its view that a free vote should be permitted by all parties on a motion to concur in the report of the committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is a debate about democracy, about the—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: I am surprised that the very utterance of the word "democracy" should evoke from the Liberal benchers howls of protest. Certainly they have not practised democracy in their time as a government. We give them the opportunity to do so today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: What we are proposing here today in this motion is an opportunity to give to the people of Canada a right, through their elected representatives, through their elected Parliament, to discuss and decide questions which the Canadian people believe to be important. For some time members of this House of Commons have talked about rights. We have talked about unity. We have talked about national institutions. Today we offer the opportunity to members of Parliament to act on the right of the people to be heard on an issue which is national in importance, through the only institution which can speak for all of Canada. We propose today to let Parliament discuss the question of capital punishment.

The vote tonight is on the simple issue of whether Parliament is free to discuss important national questions. Some months from now, there would be a vote on capital punishment, after the evidence for and against the death penalty has been heard in public committee meetings of the people's Parliament. That vote would come later. The vote tonight is on the question whether Parliament has the right to debate what it chooses; whether this institution, which exists to express the public's will, will refuse the public's right to have an important question considered.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The question tonight is whether Parliament is free to consider a matter in which the view of the people may differ from the view of the government; whether Parliament is the people's institution or the government's instrument.

[Translation]

Since the government does not see to it that the House makes more time available to private members, it is almost impossible for them to raise issues that their constituents consider most important, capital punishment being one of them. Millions of Canadians are now seriously asking themselves whether it should not be reinstated. We are asking in this motion that the committee conduct an objective study on the matter and report back to Parliament in order to allay the concerns of so many Canadians on this issue.

[English]

Through nine years as a member of Parliament, and through two election campaigns as a party leader, I have put on record two consistent beliefs. One of those is personal, a matter of conscience, about the death penalty. I oppose the death penalty. I have spoken against it, I have voted against it, and I believe the evidence proves that the threat of execution does not stop potential murderers from murdering.

The other principle is that the rules of Parliament and the views of party leaders must not be allowed to frustrate and to limit from expression the strong views of other members of Parliament who were elected by their constituents.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The principle is quite clear. On a question of conscience, I should have a vote as a member of Parliament, but I should not have a veto as a party leader, nor should any other party leader in this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Holding those views, as I do, I am pleased with the present law against capital punishment, but I am not proud of the way it was achieved. Without reflecting on the vote of private members, I believe that the government's procedure in introducing the resolution as a government measure prevented a truly free vote, at least—I say, at least—among cabinet members. But that vote is behind us. The question now is whether the matter of capital punishment will be closed forever from debate and decision in this House.

Each year we change laws regarding taxes, pensions, and even regarding constitutions. The tradition of Parliament is clear. No Parliament is bound by the action of its predecessors. Every Parliament is free to consider any question. Is capital punishment to be the exception to that tradition? Is the Constitution to be open to discussion but capital punishment closed? If we make that exception, we open the way to other exceptions and we erode both the power and the reputation of Parliament.

That question of reputation is important. If we are to build a sense of national community in this country, we must build respect for the institutions that serve the whole community; and Parliament is paramount among them. All of us who serve here must share the concern that Parliament does not command the respect in the country it deserves. I believe that is because Parliament is known to have too little power over the executive, and the government I led sought to bring much more power to ordinary members of Parliament.

But if we trace the causes of cynicism about Parliament, I think it is clear to all of us, whether we are abolitionists or retentionists, that one of the most basic and most dramatic causes is that, on the question of capital punishment, where most Canadians have strong views, Parliament went one way and the public went the other. That sense of wrong was compounded by the belief that the last vote was not in fact free.

An hon. Member: It was rigged.

Mr. Clark: It will be compounded again if the government uses its majority to stop the question from even being considered by a committee of this House of Commons.

Mr. Collenette: Forty-one Liberals voted for retention.

[Translation]

Mr. Clark: Why would government deprive members of the opportunity to express their views and vote on this issue that their constituents consider most important? How can we get the public, which already has misgivings about our parliamentary system, to change its views if the government refuses to have the matter studied objectively and in a non-partisan manner? How can the government stand in the way of a free vote on such a crucial issue without harming our democratic traditions?

[English]

The government may argue that this motion is, technically, a question of confidence. I would hope they would not make that argument as they have not made it in the past on occasions I will cite. But they may seek to hide behind a technicality rather than take the opportunity to let Parliament deal with an important public question.

There are three answers to the technical argument that they may raise. The first is that we, as the proposer and as the opposition in this Parliament, do not regard the question as a matter of confidence.

• (1530)

The second is that a predecessor of this government, under the leadership of the late Mr. Pearson, when defeated on a budgetary matter, did not treat that as a question of confidence. A party which treats a budget vote as not involving confidence cannot in conscience argue that it loses its right to govern by referring a question to committee.

Finally, in June, 1978, in an allotted day concerning the Indian Act, the government treated our motion on its merits, not contesting our explicit statement that confidence was not in question. Again, in February, 1978, concerning sunset laws and other reforms to reduce government spending, the responding minister welcomed the debate and did not raise questions of confidence. This matter, too, deserves to be dealt with on its merits, and not run away from on the basis of some technicality.

What is at issue here is whether Parliament has any control at all over its own agenda. We are using one of the few allotted days available to the opposition to allow this whole Parliament to consider a question in which the great majority of Canadians are interested. We have been careful to remove any tone of partisanship—any question of confidence—any bias in the subject matter we want referred to a committee. Clearly, this motion does not involve a vote of confidence in the government. It does, however, involve a vote of confidence in Parliament. To vote against this motion is to vote against the right of Parliament to inquire into an important public question.

I have spoken of the right of the Canadian public to have their Parliament consider a question of public interest, and the importance that it can have for the role, the reputation and in time the reform of Parliament, a reform that would give more power to individual members, not power to the executive.

There are two other reasons why I introduce this motion. One is educational. Violence and murder are matters about which the Canadian public has more fears than information. A public study can improve public understanding of the issues and the options involved.

We in this Parliament have just concluded a long experiment in public hearings on the Constitution, and there is no question that public opinion was informed and changed as a result of that process. Public discussion is the way a democracy becomes informed about public issues. If we want a democracy that decides on the basis of facts rather than on the basis of fears, public discussion of public issues is essential.

My other reason for proposing this motion is that I personally believe that a close study of the facts will cause more people to oppose capital punishment. The most recent statistics on homicides were released yesterday. They indicated that, for at least the fourth year in a row, the rate of homicide is going down, and the rate of murder is going down dramatically—a 17 per cent drop last year. Obviously other factors are also at work, but the fact remains that homicide and murder rates have gone down in Canada since the abolition of capital punishment.

I believe an honest, open inquiry would introduce other evidence to demonstrate that, if we are interested in making society more safe, we should look to remedies other than having the state kill people. But as one member of Parliament, I am prepared to take my chances with the facts, and I would hope that all other members who respect Parliament and have faith in their views will do the same, will support this motion and will allow the objective study by Parliament that we propose.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Mr. Speaker, I am privileged today to represent this party in responding to the motion proposed by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) to send the question of the death penalty to a committee. The last time I know of when that happened was when Pontius Pilate did it.

I am very sorry that the Progressive Conservative party was not able to come to terms with what is going on in this country and the world. I am very sorry that the Progressive Conservative party did not see fit to give a day to debating the world's problems. I am very sorry that the Conservative party did not see fit to speak about Canada's problems, to speak about the economy that is going to pieces, to speak about the fact—

An hon. Member: Where have you been?

Mr. Ogle: —that this government is not standing up to the questions that affect the lives of everyone in this country.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Ogle: I am surprised that the party to my right was able to face the fact that what is taking place now is not a question of capital punishment but a question of having old people live a life that is worse than capital punishment. What is happening to the old people in this country because of what the government is doing to them is making them less than human.

I am sorry that the Progressive Conservative party was not able to prepare a motion that would enable us at least to speak about what is happening this summer as it effects the whole North-South question. Rather, they turned around with a direct attack on their leader who had to get up today and, I am sure, humbly stand before this House and the country and say: "The leader of this party is being hanged by his own party."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ogle: The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) stood here and explained to the people of Canada that it is against his conscience to have capital punishment. He has been forced to this by his party, and everybody knows that he has been forced by his party. He has been hanged by his party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ogle: The Leader of the Opposition is not speaking about a committee, he is speaking about the fact that he can no longer control his party. He is speaking about the fact that he has been hanged and that the Conservatives have decided that there will be a new leader. That, I feel, is a very distressing thing for Canada. It is capital punishment all right, Mr. Speaker; it is the hanging of the leader of the Progressive Conservative party.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ogle: At the same time that this is happening to the leader of the Progressive Conservative party, the party on the other side of the House is smugly glad that another day is going by that they do not have to come to terms, face to face, with the problems that are basically affecting every Canadian, the real problems of this country.

Mr. Corbett: Tell us why you are going to vote against it.

Mr. Ogle: I am going to vote against this proposition this afternoon because we are dealing basically with the principle of life and death. What is being covered up here is that this is a way of sneaking back to the act of killing people. That is what it is about.

Mr. Siddon: Speak about abortion, then.

Mr. Ogle: I will speak about abortion.

Mr. Elzinga: Tell the truth.

Mr. Ogle: I have been asked to tell the truth.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) rises on a point of order.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I would remind you that we listened quietly and attentively while the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) was speaking.

An hon. Member: He told the truth.

Mr. Knowles: I submit that the hon. member for Saskatoon East (Mr. Ogle) deserves the same courtesy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's point is well taken. The hon. member for Saskatoon East (Mr. Ogle).

● (1540)

Mr. Ogle: Mr. Speaker, I have been asked to speak the truth. The simple fact that that has been asked of me would indicate that I do not speak the truth. I do not know how to take that in this House of Commons. In a situation like this, I speak the truth.

In the election, I ran on this issue of life and death. I said that if elected I would defend human life from its conception until its natural end. Last November 18 I spoke on the first part of my principle, which is against my party's position, and today I speak on capital punishment, the second part.

Mr. Clarke: It is not the debate.

Mr. Ogle: The debate is on capital punishment.

Mr. Clarke: Read the motion.

Mr. Ogle: The debate is on the motion to bring again to this House the question of capital punishment. The position of the New Democratic Party, which every member of our caucus supports, is that clearly and unequivocally we are against capital punishment, against corporal punishment of any kind.

Mr. Corbin: Be consistent.

Mr. Ogle: A committee would not bring anything more to the people of Canada than what the Leader of the Opposition has already stated.

Since capital punishment was abolished in this country, the incidence of murder has decreased. I do not believe that any more information could be found except that found in transcripts of committee hearings. I have before me part of the debates which took place in 1976. I think probably the clearest and fullest argument on this subject was presented by the then solicitor general, the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand).

I shall read into the record a speech given on June 7, 1976, as found in Hansard at page 14215:

> In my examination of the evidence—and, like other members of the House, I have made it my business to look at the evidence as it relates to the deterrent effect of capital punishment—it has been my judgment that capital punishment does not function as a deterrent in the case of those peculiar people who commit murder.

Those are the words of the Leader of the Opposition.

I have here material which was presented to me, and to members of this House, by Amnesty International. It states that all cruel punishment at this time, the death of people, be taken out of our country.

An hon. Member: What about murder?

Mr. Ogle: Also I have documents from the Canadian churches. The Catholic church, all branches of the Protestant faith and the Jewish communities all speak morally against capital punishment.

I want to tell a personal story about what murder and capital punishment is all about. After I had been nominated as a candidate to run in the new riding of Saskatoon East, and several months before we believed was going to be the time of the election, a mounted policeman by the name of Brian King was viciously murdered by two young teenagers from our city. The next day, people were angry. They were crying out, "kill them."

My background teaches me that when there is trouble, one should get to the people in trouble. It just happened that I knew all three families involved in this crime. I knew the mountie who had been murdered, I knew his wife and I knew his children. They were parishioners of mine. I knew the two youths and both of their families. Those two boys had walked out in the morning as two 17-year-olds. They never came home again. They were arrested that night after a vicious crime. I am not in any way trying to cover for the crime. During the course of the next few days I acted as an intermediary for the three families. Two families were distressed because of what their children had done. The other family was distressed because of the loss of a father, a husband and a son.

My story is about three mothers, the mothers of the two young boys and the mother of the policeman. It was hard to console the mothers of the two young boys. It was difficult to console the mother of the policeman. She said to me, and I remember this so well, that killing their two sons would not bring back her son. If there is a question of humanity in the hearts of human beings, she said it clearly.

That is not the whole story. This murder caused a rise in human emotion. Several weeks later, in the same district, two grade five boys from a local school came home to play during lunch hour at the home of one of the boys whose parents happened to be away. They found an old 22 rifle and started to play cops and robbers. One of the boys shot his friend, who fell seriously wounded. The boy who had shot his friend ran home, went into the basement, took a rope and hanged himself. He hanged himself because he thought that would be the punishment for someone who had shot a human being. People who permit the idea that capital punishment will decrease violence are wrong.

If today we had been able to have a motion on capital punishment, I would have been proud to support the Progressive Conservative party in their move had it been a clear motion to support what the Amnesty International people are asking our country to do. That is to remove the provision of taking the life of someone else for the crime of treason, and join the 20 other civilized democratic countries in the world who have removed that provision from their code.

Our party will be voting against this motion.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, like members opposite, I intend to address the merits of this motion and the appropriateness of debating the question of capital punishment at this time either here in the House or in committee. Before doing so, I must say that we are dealing with a question of confidence in the government—

Mr. Clark: No.

Mr. Kaplan: —however the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) tries to disguise it. We are debating a question under Standing Order 58(9) of our rules. The rules clearly indicate that this is a question of non-confidence, and our party views it as such. The Leader of the Opposition refers to his willingness, as an individual, together with some of the members of his party, to change the rules. He referred to a precedent of the Pearson government which took place under other rules. We see ourselves in the position of following the rules and being obliged to do so.

● (1550)

Mr. Clark: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, in my remarks in relation to the subject matter of capital punishment I was naturally expressing my views as an individual. When I was speaking on the question of confidence, I was speaking as the leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition and indicating that Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition in this House does not consider this to be a question of confidence and will not so treat it. I simply say that to correct the record.

Mr. Kaplan: I hear the Leader of the Opposition but I also see the rule. It is clear. The members on this side of the House are bound to view it as a question of no confidence and will be voting accordingly.

The Leader of the Opposition also indicated that the position that the government and members on this side might take on the matter could only be interpreted to mean they were against Parliament's having the right to deal with this issue over which there is a great deal of public concern. Certainly there is a good deal of public concern and I want to talk about that.

I want to indicate to the Leader of the Opposition that this is not the right rule or the right type of debate for this kind of issue. Given the evidence of the last five years, which I want to describe, this is not the right time for this debate. I concede that Parliament has the right to change a decision made in the past, to open the question of capital punishment and consider it. However, it is the view of the government that this is not the House rule, and given the history of the past five years, this is not the time to reconsider and perhaps reverse the decision which was taken in a free vote five years ago.

I reject the notion that there ought to be a six-month consideration of this question by the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. It is a wonderful issue, a very attractive one for debate. However, from my experience of having watched four parliamentary debates on this question, another debate on this question would inevitably be futile and inconclusive.

The same statistics are used by both sides to prove opposite points. Our moral traditions—the Jewish tradition, Christian tradition and others—are referred to in order to prove the opposite side of the argument. Logic is used in different ways to prove completely different results. What it boils down to is an excellent subject for debate, but one in which very firmly held views by all those who generally participate in it are simply confirmed.

When one looks at the important work the justice committee has before it, one must recognize and agree that the committee should not be used for six months as a debating society. It has before it the access to information bill, a bill which will give additional rights to Canadians to require and demand information from the government. There is before that committee a very lengthy bill completely revising the criminal justice system for young offenders, one to which I hope it will turn its attention on an urgent basis. I expect it will shortly have before it amendments to the RCMP Act giving additional rights to members of the force to grieve within the system and giving additional rights to the Canadian people to have their complaints heard by an independent tribunal. With all of this business before the committee, a six-month debate which we know in advance will change very few minds, if any, and will raise very little new evidence, if any, is a very unproductive use of the time of a parliamentary committee under the circumstances.

Capital punishment is a matter of public concern. That is obvious from the number of times the House has addressed this subject in recent years and from the number of private members' hours that have been allocated to it.

Mr. Lawrence: What about the public?

Mr. Kaplan: Public opinion has also been very lively on this subject. I also recognize and respect the desire of every member of this House to do that which his conscience tells him is right. We are all concerned with the reality of crime. We are especially determined to protect the physically weaker members of our society who most often are the victims of murder; women, young people, defenceless older people. There are particular concerns for the safety of those who risk their lives in order to protect the rest of us; I am thinking of our police, our correctional officers and members of our security forces.

Each member brings to this House a reflection of his own deep and personal sense of justice. Each of us has wrestled with the question of what is the appropriate punishment for someone who has killed one or more innocent persons. We all share in the frustration that crime is an evil and apparently intractable component of human society. But the issue has not changed since we last explored this territory in 1976. As the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) stated in that debate, it is not the goal of protecting innocent people from the ultimate violence which divides us. He further stated:

> It is a goal we all share. What divides us is the question of the appropriateness of state execution of murderers as a means of achieving that goal.

In my view, and as I will show, there is nothing new in the way of evidence to justify changing the decision that was taken deliberately and freely in 1976. In my remarks today, I will not argue that capital punishment is not a deterrent to murder. I think it is. It is not evident, however, that capital punishment is any more effective than the sanctions which have been put in place. At best, if there were to be a six-month debate and a fair view of it by an objective outsider, if one could find an objective analyst, one could only concur with the conclusions of Albert Blumstein and Daniel Nagin of Carnegie Mellon University that:

> The deterrent effect of capital punishment is definitely not a settled matter and this is the strongest social-scientific conclusion that can be made at this time.

It would be so much more straightforward if there were conclusive evidence on the subject one way or the other, or even a reasonable prospect of conclusive evidence; but this is simply not the case.

There is something which is new, however, and I want to refer to that for the balance of my time. That is the experience since 1976 and I will turn to it in a moment. Before doing so, I want to remind the House about the predictions which were made by members of Parliament in 1976 during the very debate that hon. members now seek to resume. The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) said then:

If we remove that ultimate penalty, we will have filleted our nation. We will have removed its backbone and removed from our citizens the will to stand up and defend our way of life.

Has that happened? The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers) said that "Canada will become a haven for criminal activity". The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta) said that "Capital punishment is necessary if we are to prevent civilization from becoming more brutal and lawless". The hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) said:

Communities of senior citizens (could be) forced to surround themselves with electrified barbed wire fences patrolled 24 hours a day by security guards in order to keep out marauders and potential criminals.

I recently opened a senior citizens' home in Edmonton in the constituency of the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), who also had fiery words on the subject five years ago. There are no barbed wire fences around that senior citizens' home or guard dogs, even though they had advance warning that I was coming. On another line, an important point made by several members but perhaps most emphatically by Arnold Malone—

Mr. Clark: "The member for Crowfoot".

Mr. Kaplan: He is not in the House now.

Mr. Clark: He certainly is.

Mr. Crosby: It was Horner who was defeated.

● (1600)

Mr. Kaplan: He said this:

If you weaken the protection afforded to the police forces of this country, it goes without saying that when policemen act under duress, people will be killed. Policemen will obviously want to feel secure and, not having the protection of the law, will shoot first and ask questions afterwards.

Later he said:

If this amendment is not passed, capital punishment will not be done away with. It will be simply a case of the due course of law not being followed. Police officers and prison guards in this country will, in more rapid succession, be using their weapons in self-defence. The result will be capital punishment without trial.

The available evidence indicates that the words of the prophets in this case were widely mistaken. The trend in homicides, as the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) indicated, since 1975 has undoubtedly been downward. The actual over-all homicide rate over that period has declined from 3.07 per 100,000 to 2.48 today. Even more encouraging, however, is the information on murders committed during that same interval. In 1975 the murder rate in Canada had reached an all-time high of 2.79 per 100,000. Today that rate has fallen by about 25 per cent to 2.06. Yesterday, as was mentioned, data for 1980 were released by Statistics Canada, and last year alone the decline in the murder rate was equal to 17 per cent.

Let me interject because I want to speculate without being able to demonstrate. I hope that an analysis will be able to show that the tough gun control legislation we introduced a few years ago, and which is now in its second year of operation, had something to do with that rapid decline in the murder rate last year.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kaplan: I know that gun control law is hard to live with, that it has a lot of red tape associated with it, and that it has a lot of nuisance associated with it, but even with that I hope the trend we are seeing toward less lives being lost will be taken by hon. members to justify it.

This trend toward reduced homicides can be seen everywhere. In our three major metropolitan centres, for example, between 1975 and 1978 the murder rate fell from five to 2.4 in Montreal, from 2.2 to 1.8 in Toronto, and from 4 to 3.2 per 100,000 in Vancouver. In every single province except British Columbia both the 1980 homicide rate and the 1980 murder rate were below 1975 levels. These figures are encouraging signs and they are good news for all Canadians. They stand in stark contrast to many of the intemperate predictions that were made in this House five years ago.

The Canadian experience over the past few years argues eloquently against the reintroduction of capital punishment in the absence of any decisive evidence. Given that deterrence is a moot point, is there anyone who, in the face of this data, can stand and state unequivocally that the law as it now stands has served Canada badly? What so many feared has not happened; what so many predicted has not taken place. Even if we only focus on murders of policemen, where numbers are so small that the statistics are unsteady, the average rate over the past five years is lower than in the preceding five-year period. The facts tell us that in all categories of homicide, not only have the rates of the crime fallen, but the absolute number of incidents has dropped as well.

I do not want to leave the members of this House with the impression that there are no problems related to the status quo. There are problems relating to the managing of the 25-year "lifer" population who refer to themselves, recognizing the statute of 1976, as the "C-84s". We currently have 148 prisoners serving first degree sentences and an additional seven with second degree convictions with a minimum parole eligibility term of 25 years. At this point, after a year as Solicitor General, I have met most of these individuals and I have had an opportunity to talk with them. There are 20 who are women, and in the male population, as well as the women, it is settled that they are far from necessarily being the most dangerous inmates. The problems guards have in maintaining order and security are directed to some of this group, but certainly not to all of them, and their elimination from the prison population would not significantly alter the problems of security and order that exist in our penitentiaries. They include some of the most dangerous, but they are not all the most dangerous and far from it. Many of them, nearly half, are individuals who have had no association with crime before having committed their murders. Their murders involved individuals they loved, hated or worked with, and their appearance in the criminal community in prison for that very significant number was the first association with a criminal lifestyle.

Among the first degree group, all but six of whom are still being held in maximum security, there has been a relatively small number of incidents. Of 51 hostage-takings since July, 1976, first degree murderers have been involved in fewer than ten. There has been only one single report of an assault on a staff member by a "C-84" inmate, and four assaults on other prisoners. Four have escaped, of whom all but one have been recaptured, while there have been four escape attempts, three others involved in a plot to escape with violence, and another involved in a separate escape plot. Other relatively minor incidents have included two offences of contraband possession, a cell fire, one brief hunger strike, and five found to be participants in a minor disturbance. There has been less manifestation of severe psychological stress due to the length of sentences than some had expected. We have had a single incident each of attempted suicide self-inflicted injury, but there have been no suicides.

This population does present program problems to the correctional service of Canada. Despair is an issue. They are matters which concern my department and they are getting attention in the context of the over-all management of our penitentiary system and the maintenance of a satisfactory prison environment; but this experience of these inmates and the problems we have with them should not, in my view, since we can handle those problems, bear heavily on the subject of the debate before us.

I am conscious of public opinion, and some members opposite have referred to it more than once while I have been speaking. I think public opinion is important. But on this important subject of capital punishment I would only observe that public opinion is very much more influenced by sensational incidents, by a tragic killing which I would speculate is inevitable in any society or in any community, than by the underlying trends which I have described, trends which indicate that we are coping well in the criminal justice system with the problems of crime.

I challenge members who support this motion to come up with anything new in the experience of the last five years, with any argument that was not put forward, that was not answered or that was not considered which would justify a reconsideration of capital punishment. In all, I agree with the spokesman for the NDP who indicated that there are better ways the House could have spent this day, and better ways that the justice committee could spend six months.

● (1610)

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, before getting into some of the reasons I am pleased to have this motion before the House today, I would first like to say how pleased I am personally to be able to have this opportunity to second the motion presented by the leader of our party.

I would also like to remind the previous speaker, the minister responsible, that he has a very short memory. Just a few months ago—I have a copy of Hansard here for October 14, 1980—I asked this very minister:

> Will the minister give the opportunity to members of this House to vote on capital punishment?

And what was the minister's answer? He said:

> I could remind hon. members opposite that this is an opposition day and they could have chosen any subject—

Including capital punishment.

An hon. Member: Hypocrisy.

Mr. Domm: Bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, that I was asking at that time for a free vote, a vote free from political pressure, free from having a leader telling his frontbenchers how to vote. I asked if he would allow a private member's bill to come to a free vote in the House. His response was that it was none of his business, that it was the House leader's business. I went to the House leader and I got jockeyed back to the minister. So what we are getting is a deferral, a postponement, a failure for every member in this House to at least be honest with the people of Canada and to give them the opportunity to respond to a committee on how they feel about capital punishment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Domm: Mr. Speaker, we had some 30,000 signatures presented to this House today. Is that not indication enough to the members opposite? What problem creates more of an issue in the province of Quebec than the issue of capital punishment? What province has a higher percentage of people who would like to have a free vote in this House than the province of Quebec? Where are the 75 members of the backbenches? I do not see them in the House. Are they going to stand up here and give the people of the province of Quebec the opportunity to come before the committee?

The Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) stands up in this House today and has the gall to tell us that gun control has caused a reduction in the murder rate—

Mr. Kaplan: I said I hope it has.

Mr. Domm: —or there has been a reduction in the number of homicides. He is defeating his own argument. He has new information that might give strength to us to abolish capital punishment if we were convinced as retentionists that there is some justification. He flies that in the face of statistics showing that never in the history of this country have we had more homicides caused during the act of committing a criminal offence than we have had in the past year. Does this minister realize that 14.5 per cent of homicides today occur during the commission of a criminal offence? That is in Statistics Canada records. That is proof to me that there is a reason to review his facts in comparison with some facts from police associations who are involved in this process on a daily basis. Do they not have something to contribute? Do members to my left not have constituents who feel there is a need to review capital punishment?

I challenge the members of the NDP. There is not one NDP member in this House.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Domm: Here comes one lone abolitionist. In 1976 11 NDP members voted for abolition. How many Liberals voted for retention in 1976? Thirty-seven. Where are they now? Have they betrayed their constituents?

An hon. Member: Yes.

Mr. Domm: Have they flown off to their ridings? They are not in the House; where are they?

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Domm: What about the front bench over here? One minister is in the front row and the other one has just spoken.

An hon. Member: Oh, come off it.

Mr. Domm: I am stating facts that can go into Hansard. This is an issue. Whether you realize it or not, since 1953—just listen. You do not want to hear the facts.

An hon. Member: Here come the ministers.

Mr. Domm: The ministers are flocking in now. I am surprised their leader is not in front of them.

An hon. Member: You are putting on a show for the gallery.

Mr. Domm: How many ministers in 1976, Mr. Speaker, are on the record in Hansard as supporting retention of capital punishment when they campaigned in their ridings? They are not in the House today because they lost their seats. The whole Liberal front row voted for abolition in 1976, and we considered that a free vote! Six votes made the difference. Had three votes gone the other way on the government side or in the NDP, we would still have capital punishment today.

An hon. Member: Eighteen Tories voted for abolition, including Joe.

Mr. Domm: The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), our leader, made it plain—

An hon. Member: Are you sure he is your leader?

An hon. Member: You bet he is our leader.

Mr. Domm: They do not want to face up to responsible parliamentary government.

An hon. Member: Eighteen Tories.

Mr. Clark: Is that your I.Q.?

Mr. Domm: I would remind this House that leadership involves the quality of directing by example. I would think that putting Parliament above the decisions of any one man is an example that many in this House could well profit from. Let me repeat, whether a society endorsing the abolition of capital punishment is a valid barometer of civilized behaviour or not is beside the point. What is to the point is whether the government and members of this House are willing to accept in practice the democratic principle of truly reflecting the wishes of the people to whom they are ultimately responsible.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Domm: Every capital punishment opinion poll taken in Canada since 1953 has demonstrated that the majority support is for capital punishment. Let us examine what the public have said since 1953 on capital punishment, keeping this point in mind. In 1953, 71 per cent of Canadians believed in the death penalty. In 1975, according to Gallup, virtually the same number of people felt the same way. Since 1966, according to four separate surveys, a growing number of Canadians—72 per cent in 1975, up from 43 per cent in 1966—feel that we do not deal harshly enough with criminals.

As to what we are doing today about it, to the question asked in April, 1978, "Would you be in favour or opposed to a vote being held on the issue of capital punishment?", 82 per cent of Canadians surveyed nationally favoured such a vote. My own constituents were polled. There were 7,000 responses to the question: "Would you support capital punishment for first-degree murder?"; 87.2 per cent responded in favour, and those responses were tabled in this House.

Another revealing figure from the StatsCan report shows that the number of murders committed during the course of another crime, which I mentioned earlier, has remarkably increased since the abolition of capital punishment. Perhaps the most crucial statistic is the murder rate as a proportion of population. In 1961, the year before the last person was hanged in Canada, the murder rate per 100,000 people was 0.94. Since then, as I have pointed out, it has increased two and a half times, and murder is increasing everywhere.

Canada's homicide rate is far worse than that of France, Germany, Japan, England, Sweden and Italy, to name but a few countries. There is far less chance of citizens being murdered in those countries where, in some cases, they have retained capital punishment, than there is here in Canada.

In conclusion, I would say that the principle of democratic representation is a much greater principle than that of any single cause—whether or not, for the best of reasons, members are convinced of the rightness of their action which is contrary to the clear opinion of their constituents. What I seek to defend is the right of the people to exert their will, which I feel should supersede the right of government—within the limits of order—to exert its will if that is contrary to the people's.

• (1620)

Finally, the principle of a free vote is far preferable to the muzzle which has been imposed upon certain sections of seats in the House when it suits the purpose of certain interests. I view the free vote practice as serving democracy, the best interests of the people and the country, and endorsing a leadership which is flexible, honest and sensitive. I urge the House to subscribe to those principles and refer this matter to committee in order that Canadians will have some say in the actions of the government.

We will not settle, as members of the opposition, for the point made by the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan), that this is a non-confidence motion. This is a motion requesting the opportunity for the majority of Canadians to have some say in the decisions of members of Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mrs. Céline Hervieux-Payette (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, it is both as a member of the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs and, of course, as a citizen and elected representative from Quebec that I welcome this opportunity to rise in this House this afternoon on the motion introduced by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). For the benefit of my constituents, I would like to recall some facts that led to the free vote held on July 14, 1976, when Bill C-84, to abolish capital punishment, was approved by 134 yeas to 124 nays.

In support of the government bill, the Leader of the Opposition, Mr. Clark, had this to say at the time on capital punishment, and I quote:

> ... it has been my judgment that capital punishment does not function as a deterrent in the case of those peculiar people who commit murder.

This, Mr. Speaker, is taken from Hansard for June 7, 1976, page 14215. He went on to say:

> ... What we have to do is determine whether the threat of capital punishment would stop those people who are likely to take human life, or likely to commit murder, from undertaking that act. I have seen no firm evidence to suggest that the threat of capital punishment is a deterrent.

This is on the same page, Mr. Speaker.

A week later, the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) Leader of the New Democratic Party, stated the following, as reported on pages 14496 and 14498 of Hansard:

> ... I am not persuaded that capital punishment can be supported by reason or moral argument ... the solicitor general and others have shown that the evidence—and I shall not put it stronger than this—is simply not persuasive.

Capital punishment therefore was abolished for all offences in the Criminal Code, with the support of the leaders of the three major political parties in this House.

Historically, Mr. Speaker, I submit that we should look back on the past in order to find out what types of crimes, according to the tradition of our British law, of course, deserved capital punishment. In the 18th century, England dealt out capital punishment for 250 offences. However, there is no evidence that so many executions had any incidence on the crime rate at that time. Quite the opposite, a study of offences committed in Britain three years after executions were suspended for a number of property crimes shows that their number had significantly decreased.

Mr. Speaker, at the time it was abolished capital punishment applied to a specific type of murder, namely the first degree murder of police officers or of people working inside prisons. I contend that murder will always be murder and that we cannot consider the death of one individual as having a greater significance than that of another. In this regard, if we had to reconsider this issue, we would have to examine what other types of murders could be subject to this penalty. I must say that I am really shocked when I think that thousands of deaths in car accidents each year will never be subject to this kind of penalty, nor will the numerous deaths occurring through neglect because companies or business owners decide to reduce safety measures on work sites or in the manufacture of certain appliances. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that you cannot put a price on any life and that it is not by reinstating capital punishment that we shall bring back to life those who will die because of the carelessness of other people.

The paradox that should be noted concerning the death penalty is that if it is dealt out too often, it forgoes its frightful nature, and if it is seldom applied, the risk of being sentenced to death gets blurred in the minds of criminals. I believe that this was the conclusion arrived at when Bill C-84 was passed in 1976. Its proponents have never shown that it can be a deterrent or that it is more of a deterrent than life imprisonment. In Canada, capital punishment seems to have been a deterrent less for the murderers than for jury members, Crown attorneys, judges and members of the Privy Council. Thus, many of the accused have been acquitted, or found guilty of lesser crimes, or have been declared temporarily insane or had their sentence commuted.

According to available data, the annual rate of convictions for murder has varied in Canada between 33 per cent and 46 per cent during the period extending from 1880 to 1960. Between 1960 and 1974, the total rate of convictions following an original indictment for first degree murder has been less than 10 per cent. However, the percentage of murderers tried under the original indictment for first degree murder and sentenced for a lesser crime has been 64.5 per cent, and this brings the total rate of convictions to 74.2 per cent. We can therefore conclude, Mr. Speaker, that Canadian jurors are reluctant to indict an accused for first degree murder, but will rather find him guilty of a lesser crime which does not put his life in jeopardy.

Statistics also show that shortly before 1962, a murderer had one chance in ten of being hanged in Canada because many jurors were reluctant to bring in verdicts of guilty for fear of seeing the death penalty imposed. Therefore, before that year, not only were murderers not condemned to death, but they had also a better chance of being sentenced only to a short prison term or of being acquitted. After the last hanging in Canada on December 11, 1962, successive governments, both Liberal and Progressive Conservative, on the basis of the evidence including minutes of proceedings, commuted death sentences to life imprisonment according to the merits of each case.

In 1976, when it was faced with the arduous task of reviewing ten death sentences, and in a strong position because of the knowledge it had gained over the years through the study of death penalty cases, the government of the day came to the conclusion that the law was indeed prescribing a cruel and barbarous punishment which stood in the way of a new approach and of legislative and operational amendments likely to guarantee a better protection for society. Neither the judges nor the jurors would voice their opinion on the sentence since all they were required to do under the law was to decide whether the accused was guilty or not guilty. The sentence is spelled out in the law.

Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary decision to do away with the death penalty was not taken on the spur of the moment. Briefly, here are some of the major aspects which the parliamentarians had in mind. First, the only rational justification for the death penalty would be evidence that it is indeed a deterrent against murder. Such evidence cannot be deduced from the figures that have been gathered thus far. That is why repeating the action of killing can only contribute to the violence which our society is trying to prevent through every kind of alternate legislative and civic measures. Indeed, the mere fact that a sentence is even more likely to be handed down is one of the most effective deterrents against any kind of criminal action, even murder. Jurors are more inclined to come up with a verdict of guilty when they know that the sentence will not automatically call for capital punishment.

For that reason, the death penalty had seriously undermined the probability of a sentence, which is essential for the effective application of a deterrent measure. Besides, studies have shown that, as a rule, in those countries or states where the death penalty has been abolished there has not been an abnormal increase in the number of murders. Nor did the reinstatement of capital punishment significantly contribute to lower the murder rate. Proof positive is that our American neighbours have a criminal code which is applied differently in 51 states.

Furthermore, the number of police officers or prison guards who are murdered fluctuates greatly from year to year. Therefore, there is no connection whatsoever between this type of murder and the death penalty. In fact, experience in Britain shows that the abolition of capital punishment has had no effect on the murder rate of police officers. The abolition of capital punishment was but one of the reforms the government undertook with a view to protect society more adequately and remedy the problem of violent crimes. Because they were completely revamped, the firearms provisions contained in the Criminal Code are now better suited to meeting the needs of police forces and the public in that they prohibit the dangerous and criminal use of firearms. To ensure that criminals are convicted and placed under custody in detention centres, the government has set strict sentences for murder. For instance, premeditated murder, including murders committed by hired killers, is considered first degree murder and leads to a 25-year prison term before which time the National Parole Board will not consider granting parole. The killing of police officers and prison staff is also considered first degree murder. Let us take for example the case of someone who commits such a crime at age 20. His sentence could not be reduced nor could parole be considered before he has reached the age of 45. That means, Mr. Speaker, that the accused would spend more than half his adult life in prison, based on life expectancy in Canada today. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that such a sentence is much more civilized albeit very strict.

I have met inmates in some of our federal penitentiaries who are serving a 25-year prison term, and let me tell you that they are experiencing terrible mortal distress which I found absolutely wrenching. If this House, by a motion other than the one now before us, proposed to reconsider this 25-year sentence with a view to shortening it to a more human scale, I would be the first to support it.

Individuals guilty of a second degree murder are not eligible for parole until they have served a 10-year jail sentence. Once again, Mr. Speaker, since most murderers are generally young, it means that they will spend a good part of their adulthood in prison.

Those strict provisions will establish a system whereby the criminal will have to bear the brunt of the law and suffer the rejection of society. The courts can now impose a jail sentence for an indefinite period on dangerous delinquents who are likely to wound or harm other people, because they may be unable to control their feelings. I think of some individuals, Mr. Speaker, who could be described as mentally ill but who are really dangerous criminals and about whom it is quite difficult to determine whether they might again resort to violence.

The adoption by Canada of more sensible and effective measures to control violent crimes is in keeping with a worldwide movement. I would like to remind my colleague opposite, who a while ago referred to countries such as France, that in a special interview granted by government officials at the Élysée Palace, the new President of the French Republic, Mr. François Mitterrand, publicly stated that he was against capital punishment and that when in office, he would act in a way consistent with his view on this matter.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, I can say that the President of the Republic intends to introduce a bill in the French National Assembly in the fall to repeal capital punishment. The spokesman for Mr. Mitterrand's government said he felt that justice must constantly be concerned with the fight against crime but that, for his part, he could not accept a justice that kills. To my mind, that reflects very well indeed the reasons and motivations of the new French government.

On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, I would remind the House that when an attempt was made on the life of His Holiness Pope John Paul II, he certainly did not call for either the death penalty or severe punishment against his assailant. Instead, he asked forgiveness for the culprit in whom he saw a poor, unfortunate and despondent creature who could not possibly have been very happy.

Mr. Speaker, the same can be said of President Reagan who was also the victim of an attempt on his life. Had it succeeded, it would have meant that a president of the United States had been murdered once again. I believe President Reagan's first reaction was one of sympathy for the family of his assailant, the parents of the young man who, to put it briefly, committed a senseless act.

The abolition of capital punishment is actively sought by the United Nations. In that regard, Mr. Speaker, may I say that, last September, I took part in the international conference on the treatment of prisoners, held in Caracas, and this subject was fully discussed at that time. Most Western countries agree that the death penalty should be abolished, but I must say that, internationally, some countries have not yet reached that stage of social maturity where they can face the question of collective violence versus individual violence. Capital punishment was abolished in Great Britain in 1969. In Italy, recent legislation passed to repress terrorist activity does not, however, go so far as to impose the death penalty. Finally, I trust that through the United Nations social development committee, we can do away with the death penalty worldwide.

Even though, according to the official report, the Leader of the Opposition is in favour of the abolition of capital punishment, he said recently that if he were elected leader of the next government, he would let members introduce a bill on hanging. Not only would the Leader of the Opposition not follow the example of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who launched the debate by introducing a government bill and making sure that he had the support of all his ministers on the matter, but he would also proceed by a roundabout way and let one of his members carry on the fight. We can only question the new style of leadership the Leader of the Opposition intends to adopt, even though he claims it is a new form of leadership. It is especially hard for us not to believe that the Leader of the Opposition takes that approach because he is afraid of not being able to get the support of his cabinet, if he had one, to introduce such a bill.

Consequently, Mr. Speaker, I think it is completely useless and inappropriate to discuss this matter, since the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, as indicated by the Solicitor General of Canada (Mr. Kaplan), has many other pieces of legislation and important bills to deal with, such as the access to information bill and the Young Offenders Act, instead of considering a bill which does not require any study in the short term.

[English]

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I rise to participate in this debate as a convinced and unrepentant opponent of capital punishment. Five years ago, after a lengthy debate, the Parliament of Canada voted to abolish capital punishment from the Criminal Code. During the debate at that time Gordon Fairweather, who is now Chairman of the Canadian Human Rights Commission and who sat then as the hon. member for Fundy-Royal, in a truly eloquent speech in the House of Commons, stated:

> I want capital punishment removed from the national agenda. I believe that for far too long it has absorbed the mind, the heart and the spirit of this place.

Mr. Fairweather went on to say:

> The discussion has gone on endlessly. Surely it is time for Canada to take its place among the civilized nations of the world which possess certain intrinsic values which tell us that the time has come to abolish capital punishment.

Canada did abolish capital punishment in 1976, a half decade ago. But, despite Mr. Fairweather's plea, the issue has not been removed from the national agenda. Nor, in my mind, will the issue be put to rest until a majority of members of Parliament on all sides of the House and most Canadians are satisfied that Parliament has disposed of the question, not only with thoroughness, but also with total freedom from the shackles of party discipline.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McMillan: Members of Parliament were not free to vote as they wanted when capital punishment was finally abolished in Canada in 1976 following a partial ban on a trial basis in 1967 and, I think, 1973. In 1976, the government of the day, a predecessor government to this one, insisted that all members of Parliament were at liberty to follow their consciences in voting on its abolition legislation, Bill C-84. But in a manner as dishonest as it was hypocritical, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) used the full force of his office to whip into line dissenters in his own party, including ministers of the Crown.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. McMillan: Can any reasonable person in this House or in the country believe that in a 32-member cabinet there was not a single retentionist? Certainly there were. In fact, there were several. I knew one or two personally. Yet they were browbeaten into submission by a prime minister hell-bent on getting his own way; and the bill passed with only six votes to spare. Is it, then, any wonder that many members of Parliament and many other Canadians still question the legitimacy of the process which led to the abolition of capital punishment, and therefore, the law itself?

Speaking as an abolitionist and as a Canadian who strongly believes that the subject has long occupied too high a place on the national agenda, I think we must rid Parliament and the country of this obsession with capital punishment as a panacea for every evil in society. I wish the matter were already well behind us. However, I know the thinking of many of my colleagues on all sides of the House, not just my colleagues in the Progressive Conservative party but colleagues on the government side and in the NDP as well. For them, the issue will not go away until they have been allowed to deal with it in an unfettered manner. Only then will everyone be content to live with the decision, whatever it might be.

Let us, as the motion suggests, refer the matter to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. Let that committee discuss all sides of the question. Let that committee investigate every available piece of evidence. Let us have a short debate in Parliament; a short one, I stress that, based on the committee's consensus. Let us have a free vote on an all-party bill or motion, whatever may be the procedure, and then forever hold our peace.

Since Canada's last hanging in 1962, there have been at least four full-scale debates in Parliament on the question of capital punishment. The Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) said there were four. I defer to his good judgment in that respect. There have been dozens of private members' bills. There have been private members' motions, questions in the oral question period day after day, and other motions. To my mind, there will be many more until both Houses of Parliament, the House of Commons and the Senate, finally have the one debate to end all debates on the issue.

I am hopeful that this motion today will give rise to just such a final debate. Surely, with interest rates at 20 per cent, inflation near 13 per cent—12.6 to be exact, I think—with at least one million Canadians unemployed, with the country torn asunder over energy and the Constitution, we could then turn to such urgent matters unencumbered by consideration as to whether capital punishment should be restored. As much as many Canadians would recoil at the prospect of hearing the same old tired and hackneyed arguments rehashed to a crisp, the alternative of allowing the question to simmer indefinitely would doubtless be even more repugnant.

Frankly, in any such free investigation and free vote on the matter of capital punishment, I am confident that reasonable men and women in Parliament will again repudiate the death penalty as a barbarous instrument of public policy for a civilized society like our own.

A few moments ago, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) said that he was prepared to take his chances with the evidence, with the truth and with the facts. I share that view. I, too, am prepared to take my chances with the facts.

I myself can lay no claim to original arguments for opposing capital punishment other than a deeply-held conviction that it is morally wrong. The taking of human life by the state betrays everything I know to be right and just by the standards of Judeo-Christian civilization.

Is there a shred of evidence that capital punishment has ever deterred or will ever deter a single person, anywhere in Canada, from committing a single crime? In those jurisdictions where capital punishment has been abolished, including Canada, Belgium, Holland, England and other countries which could be mentioned, there has been no discernible impact whatsoever on the crime rate. Indeed, experts have demonstrated that capital punishment may actually encourage violent crimes by triggering brutal tendencies in some people, including psychopaths in society who may subconsciously desire to be arrested and punished at the hands of the hangman.

In any event, capital punishment can only serve to further brutalize our society, which is already too inured to brutality, partly because of violence in the mass media. If we are genuinely concerned about the prevention of crime, and I think everyone in this House is, let us deal with the root causes of crime. These include poverty, ignorance, economic inequality and social injustice. As a maritimer, I would also stress regional disparity.

Lately, a lot has been said about public opinion polls. Already today a number of speakers have mentioned public opinion sampling with respect to capital punishment. It may well be that two thirds of people questioned do favour the death penalty, at least for some offences. However, I personally doubt that many who express support for capital punishment hold strongly to their views. Some do, but speaking as a political scientist, rather than as a parliamentarian, I suspect that very few hold strongly to the views which they express to public opinion samplers. When asked, in separate polls, to list the issues of major concern to them, most people do not even mention capital punishment, let alone put it at the top of the list.

● (1650)

Whatever may be public opinion on the subject, surely we members of Parliament have an obligation not to delegate to our constituents our duty to employ personal judgment on a moral issue of such basic importance. Edmund Burke's advice is perhaps too often quoted, but it is wise nevertheless and remains relevant to this debate. He said:

> Your representative owes you, not his industry only, but his judgment; and he betrays, instead of serving you, if he sacrifices to your opinion.

I think we politicians place too much stress on public opinion polls. Certainly the present government stresses them beyond what is reasonable. If we paid as much attention to serving the public as we do to courting their favour, we would likely be more successful on both counts.

Forgive me for concluding on a personal note, Mr. Speaker. My father was a medical doctor who devoted his life to enhancing and often saving the life of others. Although he was a surgeon and a specialist, few people on Prince Edward Island, the province I have the honour and privilege to represent, had not, at one time or another, received his medical attention, frequently following emergency calls to our home in the middle of the night. A marathon nine-hour operation to save the life of one such patient probably provoked the heart attack that killed him nine years ago at the still young age of 63.

He was affectionately known by everyone as "Dr. Joe". But there are hundreds, even thousands, of Dr. Joes in our society—men and women, doctors and nurses and paramedics, as well as individuals in walks of life entirely different from medicine—passionately devoted to the enhancement and preservation of human life. That is because deep in the soul of every civilized person is a belief in the fundamental sanctity of human life. Seen in that light, the death penalty is a dehumanizing punishment that does violence not only to the life of the offender but, indeed, to the sacredness of human life itself.

The eloquent Irish voice, now stilled, of the late Grattan O'Leary said it best shortly before he died. He said:

> Capital punishment is a moral wrong—A crime against humanity—Nearing Jordan myself, I frankly do not want to face my God with the sin on my soul of having been a party to condemning a fellow human being to facing the throne of God's judgment.

Unless every one of us in this Chamber could, with a good conscience, prepare the scaffold, tighten the noose or, as some would have it, inject the needle or dispense the pill to end the life of a fellow human being, let us put an end, instead, to this odious preoccupation with capital punishment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to read the motion presented by hon. members opposite. It reads as follows:

> That this House calls on the government to send a reference to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs authorizing it to hear arguments for and against the reintroduction of capital punishment as the penalty for some classes of murder, and, requiring the committee to report its conclusions by December 18, 1981; and
> That this House further expresses its view that a free vote should be permitted by all parties on a motion to concur in the report of the committee.

This motion is in the name of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) who, as we heard earlier, is an avowed abolitionist. Although we have had some very strange motions from the official opposition, in my opinion this is the most ridiculous they have ever put forward.

In 1976, Parliament decided this question on a free vote although hon. members of the official opposition have declared it was not a free vote. We are dealing with something that they make extremely subjective. They say it was not a free vote in 1976 but, if it happens again, it will be a free vote. They do not say, however, that we should vote on it now; they say we should refer it to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs for debate, so that the views of all Canadians may be had by December 18. This is the same committee that at the present time is dealing with the bill relating to freedom of information and which will be dealing with the bill relating to young offenders, yet they want it to deal with this question as well.

The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) is not present. He is a strong proponent of the bill relating to freedom of information and I wonder if he would be prepared to put that aside in order to have this question debated.

If this motion were brought before the committee and debated until December 18, what would be accomplished even if all the witnesses who appeared were in favour of bringing back the death penalty? Would that be the end of the matter? It would not, because it would have to come back to Parliament and we would be back where we were when the question was presented to Parliament in 1976.

Members of the official opposition claim that they want to find out what the people of Canada think about this question, yet they say they have a petition with 30,000 signatures giving the point of view of some people of Canada. This is nothing more than a cop-out. It is a ridiculous point of view and it is a waste of the time of Parliament.

This is not to say that I do not sympathize with the point of view of people who are struggling with the question of life and death and capital offences. It is a very serious question for anyone; it is an emotional question and a moral question, a question which bothers many people.

Personally, I am not in favour of bringing back the death penalty, but that is my own opinion. I do not think it would serve any particular purpose.

I feel very sympathetic and understand the tragedy which affects people when a member of their family or a neighbour dies as the result of a violent crime. Believe me, Mr. Speaker, if I thought that bringing back the death penalty would have any effect or would reduce those crimes, I would have to think about it very conscientiously, particularly in regard to police officers and prison guards. Usually the men in these occupations who die violently are not older men, but young men. The older men are likely the sergeants and corporals and not in the position that the younger ones are. It may be that by being more experienced they avoid putting themselves in the predicament of having to deal with a crazed mind.

The people the victims leave behind are in a very difficult situation—the young mothers, the young children and, in some cases, the parents who are still alive. I am sure members on both sides of the House can relate to them with a great deal of sympathy and regret.

Would it help to bring back the death penalty? The hon. Leader of the Opposition put it as well as any of us could when, using the statistics, he said that homicides and murders have been reduced in each year successively, for the last four years. This year, as compared to the year before, murder decreased 17 per cent. This has occurred since Parliament abolished the death penalty in 1976.

We could get into the question of capital punishment and why there should not be capital punishment. However, these points have been debated over and over again. Of course, we must consider that the wrong person could be executed for the crime with which he or she has been charged. This is not a moot point; it has happened. Each of us who deals with this question and debates this point of view has to decide how important it is to him or to her that one person or more has died unjustly for a crime.

There is also the point of view that capital punishment is a deterrent to crime. I think the statistics speak for themselves. The number of people who have died through violent crime has decreased each year successively over the last four years. Why do we say that bringing back the death penalty would be a deterrent? The problem seems to be the social instability which this country and to a greater extent our friends south of the border face at the present time. This is true of all countries in the western world who advocate a free society. If we are to hold up people who carry guns, who run their cars across gorges, who brutalize and assault people with whom they come in contact as fashionable, we are going to have a much higher homicide rate in this society than we would like.

There are other points. Suppose someone is in death row awaiting execution. We have read countless articles of situations like that in the United States. They have not happened all that much, but each case seems to bring with it an avalanche of literature and editorials. One would think after reading these editorials for a few days that the person concerned really deserved an order of merit rather than to be facing the death penalty. There is no way we can challenge what people are going to write about concerning those who are sentenced to death for violent crimes. However, we do not have to accentuate it by bringing back the death penalty and allowing this to go on unfettered.

There are cases within the criminal justice system itself. Undoubtedly there are juries who have brought in verdicts of manslaughter because they did not want to see the death penalty imposed. We can say to juries that they must be completely objective in these specific cases, but human beings are human beings and because they are serving on juries cannot divorce themselves from their personal feelings. There are judges who supposedly have not tried a case involving first degree murder because they did not feel they could in good conscience sentence that particular person to death.

Are these particular incidents—the reluctance of judges and juries to bring back the stiffest penalty in cases of violent crime and people who are waiting execution being exalted for what they are going through—things that promote a strong retribution to someone who has just committed a violent crime? I suggest they are not. The death penalty primarily does one thing above all others, and that is it prevents the reforms necessary to increase the effectiveness of the criminal justice system.

Certainly the question of capital punishment is the most glamorous and easily debated one. It has been debated for years from the time that students are old enough to know what debates are. Why are we just debating the question of capital punishment? Our criminal justice system is not perfect; it never will be. We try to make it as good as possible, but it will never be perfect.

There are many things on which we could be concentrating rather than concentrating on the question of capital punishment. The best social defence and hope for general respect of the law and for law enforcement in our society is to proceed with the reforms necessary to increase the effectiveness of the criminal justice system. We should not be dealing with questions upon which we cannot have an answer which will satisfy the proponents. These people, including those in the official opposition, will not be satisfied with another free vote because the next free vote cannot be any different from the last free vote.

Some hon. Members: No!

Mr. MacLellan: I am sure that any fair-minded, rational human being would agree with that point of view.

I want to deal with one of the points raised by the hon. member for Saskatoon East (Mr. Ogle), that of treason. The penalty for treason has been left on the books for a very good reason. Treason is a crime against the state. It is something about which we have no knowledge as to its seriousness or its frequency in the future. International terrorism in the western world in recent years has been extracting a very serious price. People who commit acts of terrorism and treason against their own country and other countries have to be dealt with in a way completely different from the justice system.

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. MacLellan: Because of the safety of other people who are not involved in the particular action. If we do not deal with this type of crime in an unique way, then we may be faced with the problem of having terrorism spread. The experience of recent years is that other terrorists commit other acts of terrorism in order to get the release of the first group. This is a problem with tremendous international ramifications. Hopefully this type of crime is on the wane, but at this early juncture I am not that confident. There are other problems concerning early trials, which we are not discussing here today.

I personally do not feel that bringing back the death penalty will have any merit in our criminal justice system. In fact, I think it will only cloud other things that we should be looking at. Bringing back the death penalty will be a step backward in time. It will be a regression as far as society is concerned. It will be a regression that is needless and which will be harmful and will push us back from what we have all been trying to accomplish, namely a better and more just society.

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Mr. Speaker, previous speakers, but particularly the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. McMillan) and the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys (Mr. MacLellan) have called for evidence on this subject. Later I will present some of the evidence which is not being presented by the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) or by the officials who prepare his speeches.

• (1710)

Mr. Speaker, citizens in a free society must accept responsibility for their actions. Canadians also believe that society and Parliament have a responsibility to implement laws and set penalties which provide some deterrent against crimes perpetrated against humanity. During the Trudeau reign, the "just society" that was just referred to, the incidence of violent crimes has multiplied astronomically. Later I will give some proof of that and the reasons for it. The crimes of theft, murder, rape, particularly drug related crimes, parenting of unwanted children and a number of lesser problems of family decay, have all been initiated with the coming of the "just society" and the advent of the Trudeau government.

Just as humans in society must account for their actions, governments also must account for theirs. I charge here today that the government of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has perpetrated a major crime against Canadian society. Be that as it may, if in its wisdom a government chooses to disregard the wishes of the majority, that government at least has the responsibility to persuade public opinion to accept that wisdom which contradicts the views of the majority. It is not only a responsibility but an obligation.

In the case of abolition of the death penalty, the Liberal government has suppressed public debate. Instead of using the power of public persuasion to convince people that the Liberal caucus is right and over 80 per cent of Canadians are wrong, this government hides behind cabinet decrees and denies the opportunity to Canadians within their democratic institutions to discuss this important subject. I will come to these statistics and to the evidence upon which I charge this government and the Solicitor General of being intellectually dishonest with Canadians. I can produce the facts to prove that.

Getting back to the democratic accountability aspect for a moment, we have all sent out questionnaires. My questionnaire produced several thousand returns and indicated that over 86 per cent of the people in my constituency favour a return to capital punishment in cases of premeditated murder in the first degree. That statistic is reflected in all constituencies across Canada of which I am aware. Where is the democratic accountability or at least the responsibility to persuade public opinion to conform to the wisdom that the government follows on capital punishment? I have always taken the position on this question that privately I hate to see us dispensing with human life as a means of punishment. But on the moral question, we owe society a moral obligation to do what is right, for the whole population, not merely the murderers.

I now want to give some statistics to which the Solicitor General and the government never refer. They were obtained from historical statistics of Canada and show the incidence of murder for the census years 1921, 1931, 1941, 1951 and 1961, and how that ties in with current murder statistics. In 1921 there were 77 murders in Canada. There were 49 in 1931, 40 in 1941, and 52 in 1951. By 1961, with a doubling of the population, there were only 172 instances of first degree murder in Canada.

The rate of murder per 100,000 population all through the twenties, thirties, forties and fifties was less than one murder per 100,000. In fact, the murder incidence rate was .5 in 1931, .4 in 1941, .35 in 1951 and, as my colleague noted earlier, .94 in 1961. With the coming of the "just society" and the Trudeau era, the rate of murder in 1966 was 1.03 persons murdered per 100,000. By 1971 it had jumped to 1.66. By 1972, after the Le Dain ruling, it had jumped to 1.9 murders per 100,000 population. After that ruling, the Prime Minister told the young people he would relax the drug laws in this country. They were going to create a whole new Liberal society and be more permissive toward our young people. However, the laws were left as tough as they were before, and so they should have been.

We tell young people they can get involved with drugs, and that the law will be changed one day. Therefore, in 1972 with 1.9 murders per 100,000, we found that many of those crimes were drug related. By 1976 the rate had increased to 2.43 and our most recent statistics show about 2.5 murders per 100,000. Crimes of murder have increased by a factor of ten to one compared with the thirties and forties. Compared with the pre-Trudeau era, murders have increased by a factor of three per 100,000.

When the Solicitor General tries to confuse Canadians by saying there have been marginal declines in the murder rate since 1976, he is dishonestly telling Canadians that the only thing that is reducing the incidence of murder is the abolition of the death penalty. That is dishonest because there are a number of other factors which have contributed to the slight reduction in the murder rate. The minister even admits as much in a letter of which I have a copy.

He says:

—it is not a nationally applicable law—or its absence—that is the primary factor in determining homicide rates—

In other words, he has admitted that it is not the absence or presence of capital punishment which is the primary factor in determining homicide rates. But in the previous paragraph of the same letter the minister alleges that the decline since 1976 is due solely to the abolition of capital punishment. He is in absolute contradiction with himself.

I contend that the implementation of gun control legislation probably has a lot more to do with the marginal decline in the incidence of murder since 1976, and it is only a marginal decline. Any significant decline did not occur until 1978. The minister can contest me on that, but it is in the statistics. The significant decline from 2.7 to 2.5 per 100,000 did not occur until after the implementation of gun control legislation.

If we want to look analytically at the statistics, we can argue that since the advent of the "just society" our moral standards in this society have been in a continual state of deterioration. It is not the abolition of the death penalty that has created the marginal improvement in the last two to three years, it is a combination of several factors. In fact, it is morally and intellectually dishonest to try and persuade the Canadian people otherwise.

Had we retained the death penalty in this country today, I would go so far as to suggest that the rate of crimes of murder might be as low as two per 100,000 or less because of the impact of gun control legislation since 1977. You cannot take the simplistic point of view and suggest that only the abolition of capital punishment influenced the statistics, as the minister implies. In that regard, he and the government are misleading Canadians. This is the reason why it is so important to have a full public airing of the real import of these statistics. It is just not a simplistic one to one relationship. As the minister has admitted, there is a complex of factors which affects the incidence of murder and violent crime in our society.

A government which passes laws against the wishes of the demonstrated majority of the electorate, yet fails to persuade public attitudes to change, is not a democratic government. Such a government is tyrannical. That is what this government is if it chooses to vote against this motion. They would deny Parliament access to all of the statistics and a complete historical interpretation of those statistics. We would not have the opportunity to summon witnesses, hear expert testimony from people around the world and then make a decision in the forum of Parliament in the setting of democracy. If such a decision does not reflect the wishes of the people, then the government must produce the evidence to persuade the people to change their minds.

This government is taking a dishonest approach because it is fiddling with the figures. The minister will have to admit to that sooner or later. I just hope the government will accept that this is such an important and crucial problem for Canada, that it relates to the whole quesiton of the just society, moral decay, trauma and tragedy imposed on our people, particularly the people of my riding where the rate was six murders per 100,000 people last year.

• (1720)

Of those numbers there were two separate cases of young girls, one 15 and one 12, were left naked, raped and stabbed one of whom was found on a dike a few days before Christmas morning. I could tell many stories involving circumstances of that nature in my riding. The facts prove that 20 years ago we had only 50 murders a year and we now have 500. It is a crime against humanity and society that 450 additional people are being killed each year in this country because of the policies of this government.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, on a Conservative motion, as is the case today, we notice at this point in the debate that there are about 14 Tory members present out of 112 in the House. That is a remarkable show of support for—

An hon. Member: You can't even count.

Mr. Caccia: I am glad to stand corrected. It is about 14 out of 102 in the House, so 10 per cent of the Tory party members have had the time and conviction to show up this afternoon in support of what I would call this phoney cop-out, the joke of the nation.

An hon. Member: There are only 13 Liberals present.

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, today is an opposition day. This is a Tory motion, and the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) had better learn what an opposition motion is all about on a day which is allocated to the opposition. Such a day is one on which the official opposition has the responsibility of showing it has support for the motion it puts forward. Today we see present in the House less than 12 per cent of the Tory membership.

In a speech earlier this evening the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark) implied that the last vote on this matter in the House was not a democratic vote.

An hon. Member: It was rigged.

Mr. Caccia: I will address myself for a moment to that issue because it has been picked up by other members of the official opposition who said it was not democratic; or, to quote from the fine speech by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. McMillan), he referred to the "shackles of discipline having been imposed". I can understand that hon. member making that allegation because he was not here in the House; but the Leader of the Official Opposition was in the House when we held that vote, and he must have seen, unless he is blind, that on that day we had members of the Conservative party who voted for abolition and members of the Liberal party who voted for retention. So much for the lack of democracy!

An hon. Member: Speak to the motion.

Mr. Caccia: I am on the motion. The claim of the opposition is that the vote we took in 1976 was not democratic. How does he then explain that members of the Conservative party voted for abolition and members of the Liberal party voted for retention? There was a display of something I would call democracy. Members may want to call it something different, but that, in my book at least, was a free vote. I do not have precise figures before me, but vaguely from recollection there were some 30 Liberal members or more who voted for retention that day, perhaps even as many as 40, while on the Conservative side some ten, 15 or even 18 Conservative members voted for abolition. You will see, Mr. Speaker, that the whips were not on; it was a free vote and everybody voted according to his own judgment in that very historic vote on second reading.

The Leader of the Official Opposition—and this is the second issue to which I would like to address myself this afternoon—said a couple of hours ago, and I paraphrase him since I do not have the blues, that to vote against this motion is to vote against the right of Parliament to inquire into this matter. If this is not the joke of the month, it is a cop-out, as another colleague of mine said earlier. It is perhaps the phoniest reason I have ever heard during many years in this House for moving such a motion. I will explain why. It is a phony excuse because the leader of the Tory party simply does not have the guts needed to give leadership to his own caucus. He is simply caving in to pressures from his own backbenchers in allowing this kind of motion to come forward here today. That is why the motion is before us today. He trots along a phoney reason in relation to democracy, asking for the right of Parliament to vote on something which has been voted upon. He does not have the strength or the honesty to resist the pressure from his own backbenchers, or the strength to give leadership to his own caucus. What a shame, what a disaster, when we have at this point—

An hon. Member: You are getting more ridiculous all the time; keep going.

Mr. Caccia: Will you please call the House to order, Mr. Speaker. It is the time of the opposition that is being wasted anyway, Mr. Speaker.

For those reasons, inevitably members on this side of the House and the Canadian public have to come to the conclusion that what is before us is a caving in on the part of the Leader of the Official Opposition to pressures within his caucus. He does not believe in this motion and he has said that himself. He does not believe in capital punishment, but he cannot resist the pressures from the Neanderthals in his own backbenches.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Caccia: That is a fact. It is a reality.

An hon. Member: He is doing it for the gallery.

Mr. Caccia: As I listened to the speeches this afternoon—

Mr. Domm: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I recognize the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm) on a point of order.

Mr. Domm: Mr. Speaker, in fairness to the mover and seconder of the motion, it is totally in error for a speaker on the government side to say that the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark) does not believe in his own motion. That is in error.

An hon. Member: That is what he said.

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm) for realizing that the position of his party is so frail that a remark by a Liberal backbencher must provoke his intervention to demonstrate to us that his leader really means this.

Let me get on with my remarks. When listening to the speeches this afternoon I was making some quick notes on what would have been an alternative subject for an opposition day of the official opposition. I recall the hon. member for Edmonton South (Mr. Roche) writing a very fine article which appeared in The Globe and Mail a few days ago in which he complained about the fact that somehow this Parliament has denied him, and most of us who are interested in international affairs and foreign matters, a debate of several days on the issue. Evidently he was sitting in his seat looking not very enthusiastic or excited about the choice of topic for today's debate. Evidently he would prefer to have another topic for debate, judging from what he wrote in The Globe and Mail the other day. We know the hon. member for Edmonton South would prefer to have had a debate on North-South issues, in which he as well as some other of his colleagues and members of all parties in this House are interested. I jotted down the names of a number of other members who would like to have a debate on East-West relations. There are members who would like, for the benefit of Canadians watching us on television, to have a debate on the devastating effect of Washington's monetary policy on Canada and western European nations. Why not have a debate on urea-formaldehyde foam which is affecting the lives of many Canadians?

• (1730)

An hon. Member: Bring it in.

Mr. Caccia: I will go on, Mr. Speaker, with a few more quick draft proposals for the official opposition. Why not have a debate on jobs and the consistent and chronic vacancies in certain industries in this country? Why not have a debate, for the benefit of the official opposition, on nuclear armament and the need to get a handle on this tough issue? Why not have a debate on labour management and government and the desirability of intensifying consultations between these three sectors so as to achieve certain national goals? Why not, Mr. Speaker, have a debate on acid rain, or on food additives and artificial colours and what they do in the long run to the health of Canadians?

An hon. Member: Ask your own caucus.

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, why not have a debate on propane and methanol and other substitutes that would help reduce our dependance on costly imported oil? Why not have a debate on the spread between interest rates on loans and the rates paid on non-chequing deposits? Why not have a debate on the desirability of covering under social security programs Canadians who have part-time jobs? Why not have a debate on the performance of multinationals in Canada whose policies on world product manufacturing leads to unemployment among our workers who have given, in some cases, over 20 years of their life to their company, as is the case with employees of CGE in Toronto, and that company's decision to stop production of transformers?

Mr. Lawrence: This is quite a condemnation of the government.

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, why not have a debate on where we are on multiculturalism ten years after the announcement of this policy? Why not have a debate on marketing boards and whether they serve public interests? Mr. Speaker, why does the opposition not choose a debate on the long-term effect on the health of Canadians of the use of pesticides in agriculture? Why not have a debate on the improvement of ground transportation services in Canada, or a debate on how parliamentary reform would help to better serve the interests of Canadians, or a debate on quotas on imports, whether they help the industries concerned and the consumer? How about having a debate on a reduction in the spending on arms, which amounts to something like $500 billion a year?

An hon. Member: Speak to the Russians first.

Mr. Caccia: This would lead to greater development aid to needy countries. Mr. Speaker, why did I make this list?

Some hon. Members: Why?

Mr. Lawrence: Because you cannot think of any arguments.

An hon. Member: Are you going to answer yourself too?

Mr. Caccia: I made this list, Mr. Speaker, to prove a very simple point, that—

Mr. Lawrence: The government is a lousy government.

Mr. Caccia: —the official opposition is bankrupt of ideas.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Caccia: And the second point is, Mr. Speaker, that the Leader of the Official Opposition has lost his grip on his caucus.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Mr. Speaker, I am—

An hon. Member: Smile, John, you are on TV.

Mr. Gamble: —pleased to have an opportunity to speak on this important motion, a motion which—

An hon. Member: You want to hang Joe Clark.

Mr. Gamble: —requires, if accepted, the submission of the issue of the reinstitution of capital punishment to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs where, between the time it is referred and December 18 of this year, a determination may be made and a decision taken which would then be referred back to this House for further debate and vote. In that process it is recommended that members of this House be free to vote on that issue without being chained by party links and party discipline.

The substance of the motion itself, Mr. Speaker, ought to be a topic near and dear to the hearts of every member of this House provided they are prepared to speak their minds freely, because I doubt there is any issue that affects more deeply a new member of Parliament who is still confident that it is within our individual right and power to decide how we should speak and vote on an issue. The issue as to how we should vote is accepted as being fundamental, I should think, in examining and scrutinizing the democratic process with which we are all so familiar. But the fundamental principles behind the motion, if closely examined, are that, given the practice in the House and the freedom of the individual member to debate and vote on this issue, there may well be a direct correlation between what the individual member says and does and what his constituents believe he should do.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that correlation is fundamental to the principles of representative democracy which hold as their basic tenet the concept that members of Parliament represent someone other than themselves. Curiously enough, those "someones" are the people who reside in the riding and who send him or her here for the purpose of reflecting, they believe, their will in this place so that the laws of Canada may be in accord with the desires of Canadians. While that law may be viewed differently in different parts of the country, I doubt that there is a single issue which has had such universal acceptance among Canadians as have their views with respect to the issue of capital punishment for some classes of first-degree murder.

We have had an opportunity to examine the polls and studies on this issue and not one of them has indicated at any time that the majority of Canadians have ever viewed as being acceptable the action of this government and its predecessor of eliminating capital punishment for first-degree murder. Shortly after my election in 1979 I had an opportunity to canvass my constituents with respect to this issue. Of the 2,461 responses from every region of my riding, which consists of the three towns of Markham, Richmond Hill and Vaughan and various small communities therein, a full 82.6 per cent of those responding wished this government—at that time the Conservative government—to reinstate capital punishment. My question was: "Do you favour capital punishment for those who commit premeditated murder or take a life during the commission of an indictable offence?" That is a far more extensive and all embracing question than the usual question simply with respect to premeditated murder. Of those who responded, 14.7 per cent rejected the concept and would have voted in opposition, while a full 2.7 per cent had no opinion.

Surely the issue is not whether it is right or wrong but whether the basic and fundamental principles of democracy are to apply. Everyone of us has varying views. Those views have already been expressed within our party; and it is to our party's credit that within its framework there is enough freedom so that men and women can stand and declare their position.

I know there is a terrible temptation from the outset to say that the motion has built within it the framework of an immediate reimposition of capital punishment and that those who are opposed should vote against it because, in so doing, they stop the first step toward the reimposition of the death penalty. Well, that is true, if indeed members of Parliament respond to the demands of their constituents. Unfortunately we have seen in the past that there is certainly no direct response, no relationship between what the public wants and demands and what it gets. It is not a matter of dealing with a revenue bill where one may say, "If we ask the public whether it wants income taxes reduced, how will it respond?" This is a moral issue with respect to which every Canadian from coast to coast has an equal right to a view.

Let me ask those who would vote in opposition to this motion and who oppose capital punishment: what is your justification? Do you know best? Are you wiser? Are you more prudent? Let me see your IQ qualifications, if it is decided on the basis of wisdom and knowledge—wisdom and knowledge, is that why you say, "I know best"?

I suggest it is appropriate for all those people to tell their constituents: "I, indeed, am better informed than you. I propose to lead you around by the nose because that is my prerogative. You have elected me, and until the next election you take your chances". This is not the way representative democracy is intended to function. I reject out of hand the "divine right of kings" concept of rulers who adopted it in the belief they could do no wrong. That concept vanished into history, to be resurrected by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) of the country who directs his caucus as to how its members should respond.

I heard the statistics which were given by the last speaker for the government. He did not mention that there was not one cabinet minister of the entire 30 who would step out of line from under the control of the Prime Minister and, in fact, vote as he or she desired. It is well-known that some of them would have preferred to do so. That is not a free vote, but regardless of whether it is free or shackled, the real issue is whether this House is to be responsive to the public will.

We know the answer. The House has not been responsive in the past, and it will not be again. There is nothing wrong with our party, despite the fact that the views of some of its members vary with respect to this matter. They have the courage to bring it forward, hoping that hon. members over there and to my extreme left may in fact be people who feel similarly and recognize that their fundamental responsibility is to the people of Canada. It is that responsibility we intend to discharge.

We heard some illuminating statistics today which indicate how, since 1976, there has been an apparent decline in the number of murders in Canada. Of course we have not been advised of the rate of murders before the withdrawal of capital punishment as a penalty for first degree murder. The reason is that the statistics show that before capital punishment was removed from the provisions of the Criminal Code, the rate of murder in Canada, per hundred thousand persons, was lower than it is today. In 1963 it was approximately one per hundred thousand, approximately one murderer for every 100,000 people.

All these figures disclose nothing but the people who were not deterred; these are the murderers. The murderers who committed those offences were not deterred either by capital punishment or by a 25-year prison sentence. We need an analysis of those people who might have committed murder but were deterred by either capital punishment or by the fact that they would spend 25 years in jail. From where do we get those statistics? Do we go out and ask the general public, "Sir, have you ever in your lifetime contemplated the commission of first degree murder, and were you ever in fact deterred by the prospect of the grim reaper standing in the shadows with a scythe raised?" Who would respond honestly to such a question; who in fact will? Those are the questions which should be asked if we seek evidence of deterrence.

Mrs. Hervieux-Payette: The Conservatives.

Mr. Gamble: Well, it just so happens that we have a man who, in fact, has given some testimony with respect to that issue. I was rather intrigued by the comments of the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) who said, "There are fully 148 criminals incarcerated in our prisons who are there as a consequence of the commission of first degree murder, and I visited some of them."

Did the Solicitor General have occasion to speak to Mr. Saul Betesh, the gentleman who, together with another by the name of Robert Kribs, was convicted of first degree murder, having raped, drugged, strangled and then drowned a certain Emanuel Jacques in Toronto on July 31, 1977? After having been convicted, Mr. Betesh said that in the event there had been capital punishment, he might well not have committed the offence.

Mr. Kaplan: This is your expert testimony!

Mr. Gamble: He is a man who in fact committed the offence.

Mr. Kaplan: He has a low regard for human life, including his own.

Mr. Gamble: We desire some further clarification of the half-truths given by the Solicitor General this afternoon. He indicated that some of the 148 criminals had been involved in attempted prison escapes. He did not specifically mention a hostage-taking in the British Columbia penitentiary in June, 1975, or the participation therein of three gentlemen, a certain Andrew Bruce and Douglas Lucas, two of the group of three, who held hostage 15 individuals, one of whom was a certain Mary Steinhauser.

Mary Steinhauser was an employee of the prison. In the process of stopping her attempt to assist in that prison escape, she was killed by a guard who rushed the inmates holding the hostages. What significance does this have? Well, Andrew Bruce was convicted in 1970 as a hired killer of a dancer and sent to prison for 25 years. With him was a certain Douglas Lucas, two of the three gentlemen to whom I made reference, who was one of two men sentenced in Winnipeg to life imprisonment on June 27, 1974, for the axe killing of Michael Ray Hurd. He was sentenced to life imprisonment. Had both these gentlemen been subject to capital punishment, the prison break would not have occurred and Mary Steinhauser would not have been killed in an effort to relieve the hostage-taking.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): How do you know?

Mr. Gamble: She might well have fallen and broken her neck the day after, but the issue here is whether or not it is the responsibility of the government and of Parliament to protect the innocent.

This is the purpose of the Criminal Code. It is not to punish the guilty; it is to protect the innocent. Unless we assume that a human being is like a tree in the forest that does not think, there is absolutely no doubt that anyone confronted with the prospect of losing his own life will give serious second thoughts to the perpetration of the offence of murder. Anyone who would suggest otherwise is denying the right and ability of the human being to think.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gamble: Indeed, this may be the reason why we have such opposition on the other side of the House, because the government party assumes the people of Canada cannot think. It assumes that murderers do not think. But its assumption extends to those people who might have, but did not, commit murder because they were deterred, and more deterred in the years gone by when they themselves might have lost their lives.

• (1750)

I submit it is absolutely essential in the interest of furthering the democratic process, as it is absolutely essential in discharging the obligation of this House in protecting the innocent, that regard be given to this definite cause of retarding the growth and development of the mind of man directed toward the commission of these heinous offences. I submit that the discharge of that obligation can only occur in the event that this resolution is passed and the matter is properly dealt with in committee and then referred to the House for further study and vote in the fashion which we hope would occur.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, in my seven years of sitting in this House seldom have I heard such a piece of absolute sophistry as the one we have just heard. The hon. member who preceded me said that it is not a question of right or wrong but a moral issue. What the hell is he talking about? If it is not a question of right or wrong how can it be a moral issue? He asks whether we are wiser or more prudent than the voters. Of course we are not. But we must study the issue, while the voter does not. The general public does not have to go into the details. When we are elected as representatives of the people, the public expects us to know what the issues are and to vote according to our judgment. That is what they expect. This may be foreign to the minds of hon. members opposite who are out today, as the hon. member for Saskatoon East (Mr. Ogle) said, to hang their own leader. That does not seem to me to be a very good reason for bringing about this debate today.

The hon. member also referred to there being an apparent decline in the number of murders. He obviously does not believe the figures. But, Mr. Speaker, the figures are there. He would rather make a judgment on what a convicted killer has said he might not have done had some other system prevailed at the time. He wants to have the people who might have committed murder interviewed. Well, who will find those people who might have committed murder? If I had to listen to much more of the garbage which we have just heard, I might be tempted to commit the act myself.

Mr. Taylor: Why not sit down?

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) says, "Why not sit down?" We have just heard a lecture from the hon. member for York North (Mr. Gamble) in which he told us that we do not have any freedom over here and that his is the only party in this House which has freedom. Yet as soon as one of the members on this side stands up to express his views, the hon. member for Bow River says, "Why not sit down?" The hon. member for Bow River cannot bear to hear a reasoned argument. He only wants to hear the garbage which we just heard.

Mr. Taylor: You said it was useless, not me.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, following the lead of the hon. member who preceded me, I think it would be fruitful for all of us, since the hon. member said it is a moral issue, if we again reviewed some of the moral issues and arguments which surround the question of capital punishment.

First, I want to refer to the caprice with which the law was applied when capital punishment was on the statute books of Canada. In any given year there are about 450 killings in Canada. The last year in which capital punishment was actually applied there were two convicted killers who were executed. There were approximately 448 killers that same year who were not executed. Where is the justice in that system? Where is the justice in a system in which the wealthy can afford to hire the best lawyers available but the poor must rely on legal counsel whose competence is not known, who are appointed by the court?

Mr. Taylor: You would rather let them all off.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Where is the justice in a law which says that the poor can hang but the rich, who can hire the right lawyers, can go free? That is not the kind of justice for which my constituents elected me to vote.

Mr. Taylor: Why don't you change the law? You are the government. What are you complaining to us about?

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, if you know what the hon. member opposite is babbling about, I would appreciate it if you would inform me. It is certainly beyond my comprehension.

In this country we have a principle known as the right to life. It seems to me that that right is one of our basic premises. For that reason I think that those who are in favour of capital punishment have the burden of proving that this form of killing by the state is justified. I personally do not think that capital punishment can be justified by moral arguments.

The retentionist will argue that society needs a sanction which adequately expresses its moral outrage against both the act of murder itself and the perpetrator of that act. It is argued that capital punishment is the only just or fitting response which society can make to that most awful of crimes—murder. But this supposed just and morally endorsed sanction carries with it the seeds of severing justice through its unequal application on the poor, the ignorant, the uneducated and through the possibility that it might be applied in error. I wonder how those great proponents of capital punishment opposite can justify the hanging of an innocent person. These seeds of injustice cannot be eliminated, despite the elaborate safeguards which have been built into our system of criminal justice.

Mr. Taylor: What about the innocent victim?

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): The hon. member for Bow River is squawking again. He wants me to tell him about the innocent victim. Let him tell me about the innocent victim of capital punishment. Let him tell me how hanging someone will bring back the life which has already been taken. Where is his sense of justice? It must be in the backwoods someplace.

Mr. Taylor: I would like to tell you that they will never do it again. They will not be killing three and four like they are now.

[Translation]

Mr. Cousineau: Mr. Speaker, out of courtesy for the speakers this afternoon, I refrained from shouting or interfering otherwise. I listened very carefully to the hon. member for York North (Mr. Gamble) and would also like to hear my hon. friend, if only the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) would shut his trap.

[English]

Mr. Taylor: Tell the hon. member not to ask questions, then.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. First, any hon. member seeking the floor and who wishes to be recognized by the Chair should wait until he is recognized before he speaks. Second, heckling is not going to disappear and I know of no way to reduce it. Third, it is six o'clock and the House is adjourned until eight o'clock.

At 6 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, when we adjourned for the dinner hour I was trying to discuss some of the moral issues involved in capital punishment and the uneven application of the law. I will continue by saying that punishment which carries with it such possibilities of injustice in terms of its actual application cannot possibly be defended on principles of justice or morality.

One commonly heard argument is that the punishment must fit the crime, and that the most serious and heinous crime in our society merits the most serious punishment. On the surface, this principle seems logical. It also suits very well as criminological or penological principle. The more serious the crime, the more serious the punishment. However, that principle is not the same as saying that one must punish in exactly the same way the crime was committed, which is the issue before us in terms of capital punishment.

Those in favour of capital punishment say that murder by an individual requires, as punishment, murder by the state. That is erroneous reasoning. The fact that it is erroneous is demonstrated easily enough. For example, there are many instances of assaults and woundings in this country in which the victims are injured, to a greater or lesser extent. If, for example, a victim receives a stab wound, does it necessarily imply that the state must inflict a stab wound on the perpetrator of that crime? Does it mean that if someone commits a robbery, he must, be robbed; or that if he commits rape, he must, in turn, be raped? Of course, it does not. We would think the person who would suggest such a thing to be ridiculous or uncivilized. That kind of reasoning smacks of revenge more than justice.

In this country in the western world, we have evolved a complex system of justice to deal with these matters. It is the purpose of the courts to decide upon the appropriate penalties within the law which are tolerated within Canadian society. Generally speaking, the more serious an offence, the more likely it is that the offender will be given a term of imprisonment, deprivation of freedom being considered a very serious penalty by Canadians. Proponents of capital punishment do not argue that for crimes other than murder the offender must receive the same degree of injury or damage that he inflicted on his victim. Why do they then do so for murder?

I repeat, it is not logical to conclude that murder must be recompensed in kind by a murder by the state. If the state is involved in violence, it seems to me that the state is, in fact, encouraging violence. I think of that old quote from Sir Arthur Conan Doyle: "Violence does in the truth recoil upon the violent, and the schemer falls into the pit he digs for another."

A second type of moral argument which is put forward is that the majority of Canadians want capital punishment, and therefore the government must respect their wishes. I am also sure that a majority of Canadians do not want to pay taxes and they do not want regulations; but no one has suggested that we stop paying taxes or that we stop regulating the activities of the people at large.

An hon. Member: We suggest you reduce them.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): That is a totally different argument. The hon. member says, "We are suggesting that you reduce regulations and taxes." That is a totally different argument. However, every town and city in this country has zoning regulations. No one likes them particularly when they run afoul of them, but everyone likes them when someone wants to put a tract beside their houses.

The argument appears to be that if one has a head count on a certain issue, representatives in Parliament must carry out that issue. The hon. member who spoke previously made that very point. This is, in fact, a rather tenuous moral argument but one which is based more on a view of what government is, on what democracy means and what the role of a member of Parliament is. I contend that because polls, seemingly, show opinion to be in a certain direction, it is not necessarily incumbent upon a member of Parliament to pursue that direction. Decisions must be based on reason and evidence. If a community is small enough, then all may participate in a discussion of an issue. When the community is too large, and now we are talking about Canada, it is the role of the elected representative of the people who elected him to engage in that discussion based on reason and evidence. That is what representative democracy is about. My constituents know my stand on this issue; and I, for one, am quite prepared to defend my position before my constituents and to take the consequences of whatever decision they make when the next election comes.

A third type of moral argument contends that capital punishment is a deterrent to murder. People use the word "deterrence" in two senses.

An hon. Member: Look at the statistics.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): The hon. member says to look at the statistics. I would commend him to his own advice.

We speak of general deterrence; that is, to execute a person will prevent other people in society from committing murder. Second, we talk of specific deterrence; that is, executing the murderer will prevent him from committing further murders. That is patently obvious. There is no doubt of the specific deterrence aspect. Once dead, a person cannot commit another murder. However, the line of reasoning for specific deterrence is that a murderer, having once murdered, will murder again. The evidence does not show this. Murderers are the most unlikely group of offenders to repeat their crimes. The general deterrence argument is a much more difficult one; its validity depends in large part on the results of statistical analysis.

If it is not clear that capital punishment is a deterrent, and if it cannot be argued on moral grounds, using moral reasoning, that the killing of a human being can be justified, how do we reach the conclusion that capital punishment is permissible? It is a brutal act of killing. It is wrong to kill, wrong to take a human life, whether it is taken by the individual or by the state. Execution does not erase the crime of murder. It does not bring back the one who has been murdered. It simply repeats it. I do not see how states are exempted from that clear statement which declares the sanctity of human life.

Killing is certainly abhorrent at all times; but when the state sets out to deliberately destroy a human life, perhaps that is one of the most heinous acts of all. When the state indulges in murder, the result is the weakening of the moral fabric of the society, for by such a cruel and vengeful act, the state contributes to the brutalization of society as a whole. If the state demands that its citizens act with moderation and tolerance, it would seem to me that the state cannot sanction the deliberate destruction of life. The state must set the clear example of respect for human life through the tolerant and patient advocation of law which looks to other more effective means of protecting society and discouraging crime.

An hon. Member: What about the 450 extra murders each year?

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): The hon. member opposite asks, "What about the 450 murders each year?"

An hon. Member: Extra murders.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): I do not know what is meant by extra murders. I did not know that any murder was ever an extra one.

An hon. Member: It is extra compared with 50.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): The fact is that if 450 people committed murders in Canada in any given year, even when we had capital punishment there were never more than five or six who were executed in any given year. What happened to the other 444 or 445?

• (2010)

Where is the justice in such a system which applies severe punishment with such caprice? How are we going to solve the problem by having the state commit an additional 450 killings? If the state demands that its citizens act with moderation and tolerance, it must exercise some self-control and it must avoid the destruction of life. It is my belief that we are only justified in taking another life when it is the last resort in self-defence, personal self-defence, or national self-defence, as in wartime. To my mind it is very clear that capital punishment is not the last resort in self-defence. Each time the state executes a person, it admits failure, a failure of its family system, a failure of its education system, a failure of its social and economic programs, a failure of its moral and religious institutions, and above all, a failure to cope humanely and optimistically with anti-social behaviour. An execution is an act of despair toward the value of the human person.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to add a word or two to the discussion of the means of execution. There has been much debate over the years as to the "cleanest" and "quickest", most humane method for the state to employ in killing a condemned person. It would appear that as in all things there is a margin for error in the conduct of executions. Time magazine has written:

> Even the cleanest execution, and an appalling number are not, is so revolting to see that witnesses commonly vomit and faint. Electrocution is relatively swift, though the victim's flesh sometimes burns while his eyes strain out their sockets. With cyanide and the rope, it sometimes takes five minutes for the dying man to fall totally unconscious, and usually fifteen minutes before he is pronounced dead.

Many people seek to avoid the terrible reality of an execution by concentrating on the supposed swiftness or painlessness of the process. I am very much afraid that the history of executions in Canada, as in all other countries, is filled with grisly tales of botched hangings which have led to decapitation, double hangings and a ghastly host of other suffering inflicted upon the condemned. One should not try to gloss over this fundamental reality, no matter how distasteful it is. I too find it distasteful that those who propose the various methods of execution always propose them for someone else to carry out. They want someone else to do their dirty work.

If there are no logical, moral reasons why society should execute a person, then it seems to me that there is only one reason that remains why proponents of capital punishment continuously pursue this issue. They are interested in vengeance and retribution. I contend, Mr. Speaker, that we cannot have laws based on vengeance and retribution. I do not think Canadians want laws based on those two qualities. They want reason, and laws that will lead to the ultimate protection of society.

In 1976, Mr. Speaker, I voted against the death penalty. I think this is an unnecessary and wasteful debate and I shall vote against the motion this evening.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) on a point of order.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne) whether he was the author of the document he read to us because, as you know, Mr. Speaker, it is a tradition in this House that hon. members not read speeches that were obviously prepared elsewhere. I studiously observed the hon. member. He tore away page after page which had been stapled to the previous page. I just ask him, quite honourably, whether this is a speech—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lambert: I could not care less what the hon. member from—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please.

Mr. Lambert: On a point of order—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I appreciate the hon. member's point of order and he has made it, but the Chair faces two difficulties. The first is that I know of no regulation, rule or Standing Order which relates to members dealing with or reading speeches prepared by themselves or prepared by anybody else.

Mr. Lambert: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The only reference that I know of that is made is that by tradition, members are not expected to read a speech verbatim, but, rather, to use notes.

I simply want to assure the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) that if the Chair is to begin to enforce the rule that members may not read verbatim, then the axe will fall everywhere equally in the House.

Mr. Lambert: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I will recognize the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi simply on the basis of equity but the point of order raised by the hon. member for Edmonton West—

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, you are blind. I would just—No, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Sit down.

An hon. Member: Apologize.

Mr. Lambert: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I dealt with the point of order raised by the hon. member. I will disregard that comment and recognize the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi.

Mr. Lambert: —disgrace.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): In answer to the rather facetious remarks of the hon. member, I want to tell him that when I make a speech in this House I usually prepare some notes. I happen to have a stapler in my office, so it is not very difficult to staple the pages together. The notes I used make up about half of my total remarks. In the final analysis, I resorted to reading from my notes because when I departed from my notes, the heckling from the opposite side was so intense that it was virtually impossible to speak and be heard.

An hon. Member: You deserved it.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, a point of order—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. member for Edmonton West on a point of order.

Mr. Lambert: I will simply say, Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member and in deference to some of the several catcalls from some of the backbenchers—

An hon. Member: Apologize, you have no respect for the Chair.

Mr. Lambert: —on the government side whose usual retort and operation in this House is to yell from their seats with little or no participation in this House—

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, I will make my point. This House has proceeded for many years on the basis of hon. members making their contributions, not from prepared texts, not piled up on—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please.

Mr. Lambert: —yet we see a continuing—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please.

Mr. Lambert: —an absolute increase in this with the absolute consent from the Chair, which is an abuse of the principles of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I think there are a number of abuses in the House at this point. First of all, it seems to me there is a standing tradition that when the person occupying the chair stands, then it is expected of hon. members that they will seat themselves. That is the first thing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I am not here to defend my particular ego on the subject; I am here rather to express what I think is the necessary respect due to the Chair.

The second thing is that it is understood that the person occupying the chair and an hon. member do not speak at the same time. I find myself disturbed in that I have to address an hon. member who is a former Speaker and to remind him of that.

Mr. Lambert: —disgrace. The rule is a disgrace.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. member continues in this fashion, I will have very little choice but to look to the rules and apply them. I am embarrassed that they should have to be applied to a former Speaker.

Mr. Lambert: That's fine.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I want to apologize to the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie). I indicated to him earlier that he would be the next speaker. This is an opposition motion, however, so I would have to ask him if he would not mind waiting and I will recognize the hon. member for Haldimand-Norfolk (Mr. Bradley).

Mr. Bud Bradley (Haldimand-Norfolk): I rise to speak on this motion, Mr. Speaker, in respect of my own views and in respect of the views of my constituents. I personally favour some form of capital punishment. I feel in my heart that it is a deterrent. However, I was also elected by the constituents of Haldimand-Norfolk to represent them and their views in this House.

● (2020)

In a recent questionnaire to my constituents, one of eleven varied questions read:

> Do you feel that capital punishment should be reinstated? Yes; No; Undecided.

In response to that questionnaire, 85.6 per cent indicated yes, 5 per cent were undecided and only 9.4 per cent indicated no. I doubt if my constituency varies greatly from others in this country.

People in Haldimand-Norfolk have the same concerns as others across this land: concern for their children, concern for their friends and relations, and that concern is growing.

There has been much talk this evening about statistics on murder. In fact, the number of attempted murders has increased tremendously. There are other factors affecting the number of murders committed. Consider such things as improved equipment and improved skills of medical personnel such as those the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Hudecki) possesses. I am sure he is well aware that countless lives of attempted murder victims can now be saved which possibly could not have been saved 20 years ago. That is evidence we must consider.

We live in a democratic society where the majority should rule. I suggest that the people's voice should be heard. Abolition has failed to convince them. People are demanding a return to capital punishment. We must be a responsible government. We must be mindful of the wishes of our people or we will have failed.

Is capital punishment a deterrent? What is a deterrent? If you are found guilty of impaired driving, you lose your licence. That is a deterrent. When I went to school many years ago if a child was found guilty of an infraction by a teacher, that child was strapped. That was a deterrent. Our society has been built on deterrents. We are a society of rewards and punishments. If the punishments are reduced, it is only natural that people reap the rewards legally and illegally. Too many of our deterrents are being removed from society today.

Is it not time that we started replacing our deterrents and re-educating ourselves toward respect, respect for ourselves, respect for others and respect for the standards expected of mankind?

Individuals in our society today still hold the belief that crime must be punished. The question is to what degree? Society once held that the greater the crime, the greater the punishment; the ultimate crime, the ultimate punishment. Should we not return to that belief? Should the punishment not match the crime?

Certainly one has the right to life, but should he not also forfeit that right if he wantonly denies another of his right?

What was wrong when capital murder drew the death penalty and non-capital murder drew life in prison? One major fear was that of errors by the jury.

In reality, if any doubt was in the judge's mind, not a reasonable doubt but any doubt, he would withdraw the capital charge, convert it to a non-capital charge, and the only charge on the jury was to decide guilt or innocence. We have a great judiciary in Canada. Let us give it the trust, the respect and the support it should have.

Other protections are provided. The courts provide protection for insanity, which is not knowing that what was done was wrong, and they provide protection from provocation.

I am not asking you today to agree with my views. I am only asking that you agree that changes in society have taken place, that our constituents are asking us to reconsider the capital punishment issue.

I dislike the thought of taking a human life as much as anyone else, but I have become concerned over the drift toward almost casual murder.

What do we do with a person who takes another's life, be it deliberately, planned, through passion, hatred, jealousy, greed, emotion or just for a thrill? That is a very serious question. I tell you Canadians want us to reconsider our answer.

How can we ignore the petition which was presented today by wives of OPP officers from the Huntsville detachment? This petition contains 30,000 names of concerned Canadians, concerned about the answer which this House has given to them on capital punishment. I ask members of the Liberal party and members of the New Democratic Party to put their party lines aside—

Mr. Kaplan: They are aside.

Mr. Bradley: —and help the people of this country by taking another look at this issue. New evidence has been presented tonight from both sides of the House, both pro and con. That evidence should be studied.

In my constituency last year a young OPP constable, happily married, with two children, was called at home and told that if he met the caller at a certain spot he would be given important evidence regarding drugs. The officer went to the designated spot, recognized the caller and approached the man's truck. As the constable reached the truck, the caller emptied a hand gun into the officer. As the officer fell to the ground, the man drove over him numerous times to ensure he was dead. This murder was committed because the constable, as a result of an accident, had charged the man with impaired driving about a year previously. This man was judged insane at the time of the crime. However, it could be said this murder might have been premeditated by as much as a year, and with a proper deterrent it may have been avoided at some sane point along that path.

I grant you, situations and conditions have changed since the 1960s. Statistics have changed, people have changed, morals have changed. Society as a whole has changed since capital punishment was abolished.

I do not feel we can apply today's statistics as valid benchmarks for comparison against those of the 1960s any more than we can compare today's society to that of the 1960s.

We have taken great steps as a government in the last 20 years toward seriously damaging our judiciary system, and indeed our society. Let us pause a moment and reflect. Let us review the pros and cons of capital punishment as a deterrent. The committee report could well prove me wrong. If so, I shall accept it. But let us at least have a look.

It is like a sign on a road warning you about a curve and telling you to slow down to 50 kilometres an hour in order to navigate the curve safely. Statistics tell us how many did not slow down and thus did not make it. But there are no statistics to tell us how many heeded the warning, slowed down and safely rounded the curve. Statistics tell us how many were not deterred by capital punishment, but there are no statistics available to tell us how many were slowed down by the deterrent of the death penalty.

Perhaps we could relate to that dangerous curve in the road. That warning sign is very necessary. I feel the time has come to return to that curve to take another look at that warning sign.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, this evening I will not go into the arguments against capital punishment. I think they have been made and made well during the course of the debate today in the House. Instead I would like to do something else. I invite all members of this House to reflect along with me on the continuing desire of many Canadians for the reinstatement of capital punishment. Why, in spite of the fact that the murder rate has actually gone down since capital punishment was abolished, do some people still have the feeling that restoring capital punishment would somehow be a good thing? Obviously we have here more than just a practical opinion about the deterrent effect of executing murderers. Something else is going on.

● (2030)

It appears that people are particularly inspired to argue for the restoration of capital punishment when either the innocent, such as children, are murdered or when law enforcement officers are killed in the course of their duties. The pain and anger which such deaths create in all sensitive human beings is not to be ridiculed. It is a legitimate response to the finality and brutality of murder.

People feel that the moral order has been transgressed, as it has, and that something must be done to show that these are not mundane events but rather events which, if permitted or regarded lightly, would eventually call into question the very basis of civilized society. They are morally outraged that such things can happen. It is moral outrage we are dealing with when we talk about the call for a return to capital punishment, moral outrage and powerlessness.

I add powerlessness because, as we encounter the mystery of death and our powerlessness to bring the dead back to life, we are tempted to turn away from the mystery and imagine that there is something we can do to make things all right again, something we can do that will atone for things already done. This is a temptation that must be resisted.

In the case of moral outrage about individual acts of murder, it is particularly tempting because there is an easily identifiable agent of our distress, the murderer. In an age when everything seems to be permitted, there is a desire among people to say that there is indeed a limit, that there are things which shall not be tolerated. In my view, the restoration of capital punishment has become a symbol for many Canadians of that need to show that there are limits.

The desire to restore capital punishment is also a response to the increasing confusion and impotence we all feel as we look around us and notice the increasing breakdown of private and public morality, the victory of greed and self-interest brought on by far too many years of living by the philosophy that individual material success is the goal of human life. The values of the modern marketplace and the goal of the healthy and whole human community cannot be held together. Yet, rather than admit this, there are many among us, including many in this House, who fall for the temptation of looking for scapegoats, of imagining that if we could execute a few murderers, and reduce government spending, of course, all our problems would somehow go away. This is simply not the case.

One is reminded of the moral majority in the United States of America, a movement not without its supporters, I am sure, in the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada. There is nothing in the view of the moral majority which demonstrates that they understand that individuals, though they are ultimately responsible for their actions, do not act in isolation, and that what changes are needed, whatever they are, will have to be structural in nature, that is to say, social and economic, and not just, or even legal, in nature.

Therefore, one of the most basic and important insights of the old but ever valid social gospel, that we cannot expect to improve individual morality apart from improving objective conditions and human relationships and that conditions as well as persons can be said to be good, is missing from the analysis of this movement. We are relational beings, not just isolated moral agents.

The outcome of this missing link is a self-righteousness in which we hear no self-criticism, nor any encouragement to collective and social self-criticism by the American or Canadian people. It is all somebody else's fault the way we are, and the role of the state, which otherwise is a sore upon the body politic and should keep off the backs of the people, particularly as it pertains to commercial matters, is to hammer these recalcitrant individuals into shape. There is no sense of community responsibility for the present state of affairs.

It is in this sense that the moral majority is a classic case of false prophecy. It does not call the nation to repentance. It does not criticize the fundamental values of our civilization. It does not see nor even suspect that the current state of affairs is the natural outcome of our values. Instead, they can only see the present as a distortion, an aberration which needs to be forcibly corrected. There is a complete lack of social and economic analysis.

They rail against the disappearance of the family farm, but would not question the freedom of business imperatives to destroy the family farm. They rail against the destruction of the family, but would not consider guaranteeing families enough to live on or paying single parents to look after their children. That would be too liberal. For that they work to defeat you.

They rail against abortion, but would abandon the child to the marketplace the minute it is born. They rail against modern sexuality, but would not counsel the idea of publicly subsidized TV without the blatantly seductive and sexist advertising characteristic of free enterprise. That would be state propaganda. They rail against the lack of sense of community, and cannot see that 200 years of teaching individual success as the goal of human life is bound to come to evil, once the residual sense of community from days gone by has eroded. They, in effect, lament the total victory of the ideology that they otherwise espouse.

The moral majority is an ideological package, and an incoherent one at that, and the Gerry Falwell's of the world are either charlatans or suckers for their part in taking the legitimate concern of decent, suburban Christian women about the number of abortions, and making them soldiers in a political campaign to restore America's pride and military power for the purposes of holding down the poor of the world and eventually—one can only hope that will not be so—of fighting a so-called limited nuclear war in which the number of deaths and the extent of suffering associated with the problems the moral majority would like to solve through their own kind of moral and intellectual fascism, would seem insignificant.

We are all in need of a conversion to a new appreciation of the value of human life. We all participate in the radical devaluation of human life which is characteristic of the modern world. Life is cheap, and even its basic form, such as the family, is expendable. But this is not the cumulative effect of many individual acts. We do not contend with flesh and blood alone, but with powers and principalities. Persecution of singled-out groups like welfare mothers, prisoners, or even bureaucrats, will not do. Life has always been cheap, but it is only in the last few hundred years that the cheapness of life has been rationalized and sanctified by an economic system that reduces persons to things. Thus if we wish to fight for the sanctity of life, we must fight for it on all fronts, by fighting it at the root, at the source of all current exemplifications, which is the basic and economic world view of our civilization.

This is the problem, Mr. Speaker. This is what the moral majority cannot do. This is what the loud, strained voices to my right cannot do, because they are not willing to be Jeremiah to their people. Instead, they prefer to play the false prophet Hananiah, assuring the people that God is on their side and that all will be well soon if only these few changes are made. Movements which challenge the basic world view of a society are not likely to be as successful as the moral majority, but they are likely to be more faithful to the truth.

This is why the motion today is worthy of opposition, not because the concern of people about the murder of innocents and the murder of policemen is illegitimate—not at all. This motion is worthy of opposition because the perceptions of those who moved the motion are out of focus, and this is the kindest way of putting it, but I say it in this way because I believe there are people who are supporting this motion who are sincere. But there are others in the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada who could not care less about murder and who simply wish to play upon the fears of the Canadian people. They are the hate mongers who poison and pollute all political debate in this country with their mealy-mouthed, paranoid, self-righteous rhetoric about everything that comes up. They are a scourge, a plague upon the political culture of our country, and I hope that someday they will receive the obscurity and derogation which they so richly deserve.

It is only when I perceive that members of the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada are as morally outraged by the death through poverty and starvation of millions of children throughout the world as they are about the homicide statistics, that I will listen to them. They could not even permit a debate on the North-South dialogue. That is how cheap they are. Only when I perceive that members of the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada are as outraged about the damage that is being done to future generations through the laissez-faire introduction of chemicals, toxins and radioactive wastes into our environment for commercial purposes, will I listen. When I perceive that they are genuinely morally outraged about the thousands of people who have been tortured, maimed and murdered by military regimes which they support for the barefaced, disgusting reason that these regimes are friendly to their rapacious friends, the multinational corporations, only then will I listen to them, but not before. But in the continued absence of such outrage on their part, I can only regard this motion as an act of political deflection or hypocrisy, or both.

What of the Liberal Party? They pride themselves in the fact that they abolished capital punishment. This is one of their few claims to fame as a party of humane and progressive values. They often hang their whole self-image on this one hook, with a kind of intellectual snobbery that many, quite rightly, find irritating. The Tories seem conceptually unable to graduate from seeing morality as anything other than individual in nature. Talking about collective political morality, about social and economic justice, about exploitation and oppression, just rebounds off their thick skulls. But the Liberals seem at times, and I say this in all sincerity, to have lost the ability to be outraged about anything anymore. They are the cool trippers. They are in charge, and they are, for the most part, protected from the consequences of their indifference to human suffering, whether it be the James Bay Cree, children dying in Northern Quebec, the poor of El Salvador, the consumers who are victimized by dangerous products on the market, or the generations to come who will have to live with the folly of their nuclear program. It is not cool around here to really care about anything.

Setting up a committee to look at capital punishment will not get to the heart of the matter, but neither will the defeat of this motion in and of itself. That will take more courage and more clarity than I at this point have come to expect of the present government.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I wish to address the argument that those of us who oppose the restoration of capital punishment, in spite of public opinion, are somehow violating the spirit of democracy. Apart from the obvious hypocrisy of this charge, given the fact that the same people from the PCs who spoke today would not change their minds about PetroCan if the whole world was for it, there is the irony of hearing these arguments from members of a party who would like to be thought of, and who parade themselves, as defenders of parliamentary democracy, the kind of democracy in which the representatives of the people are elected to use their best judgment and to be answerable for that at the next election, which I am quite prepared to do. I have answered twice already. As Edmund Burke, that great Conservative thinker, said so clearly, MPs owe their constituents many things, but their good judgment and their conscience are their own, and so it should be.

The so-called defenders of parliamentary democracy are arguing for the politics of the public opinion polls and for referendums, which incidentally they oppose when it comes to constitutional matters. I am prepared to discuss with my constituents those areas where I am at variance with the majority of opinion, and, indeed, I do because I respect their views, and I have found that they also respect my views even when they disagree. If the politics of the Conservative spokesmen today prevailed and if they were to have their way, we might just as well pack up the House of Commons and instal a computer which would assess public opinion at any given time and make decisions accordingly. Of course, in many respects, this is what the Liberal party is already doing to destroy democracy. In this we now seem to have once again Conservative agreement.

I have little more to say except to apologize to the remnant, the minority within the Progressive Conservative party which does oppose capital punishment. I extend to those members my sympathy this evening for the embarrassment which many of their colleagues must have caused them up to this point in time. Thank you.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, let me begin my remarks by referring to the specifics of the motion which I can summarize very briefly in this way. What we are asking the House to approve is a reference of the subject of capital punishment to a committee of this House, nothing more than that. As the Leader of the Opposition, the right hon. member for Yellowhead (Mr. Clark) explained when he addressed this House, this is an exercise in parliamentary democracy. But it has become much more than that. It has become an exercise in democracy because, while we in Parliament ought to have the opportunity and chance to express our views on this subject, the people of Canada ought to have their opportunity to express their views on this subject, and they ought to be able to do that before a parliamentary committee so their views can be recorded and recognized by this House of Commons and by this Parliament of Canada. We should not sweep the matter under the table and let it go on the vote that took place years ago. This is 1981 and we have to face the problems of 1981. We cannot hide behind something that was done four or five years ago.

● (2050)

I am ashamed, Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie) is ashamed, because I would have thought the point made in this debate would be: I might not agree with what you have to say, but I will fight for your right to say it. And that is not the attitude of those armchair socialists to my left in the New Democratic Party. The hon. member for Saskatoon East (Mr. Ogle) rose in a throe of smug pomposity, and told us that we do not know about these things. He knows about them, he has talked to people, he has been there and understands the situation.

An hon. Member: You sound a bit agitated.

Mr. Crosby: Well, I can tell that smug and pompous member of parliament that I have been there too. Five years in legal aid, the defence of murder case after murder case—

An hon. Member: All of which you lost.

Mr. Crosby: I walked through the jails, Mr. Speaker, where the guards were afraid to go in the cell with the accused person. So I walked the walk and I can talk the talk, and I can tell you that I am in favour of this matter going to a committee, I am in favour of the reinstatement of capital punishment, and I defy anyone to deny my right to say that in this House or anywhere else.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Who is denying your right to speak? You are speaking now.

Mr. Crosby: Mr. Speaker, in Canada it is one man, one vote, and every Canadian has a right to their view on capital punishment. Be they smug clergymen, be they dishwashers in the lowest restaurant, they have their right to their view on capital punishment. It has been proved time and time again that the majority of Canadians support the reinstatement of capital punishment. To deny the expression of that view in this House is to deny our democracy, and I am not listening to any empty rhetoric—

An hon. Member: Who is denying anything?

Mr. Crosby: —in this House that places it on some other basis, that says a man or a woman does not have the right to hold a view, the right to express that view and to have it recognized in this House.

An hon. Member: Have you been in some other debate?

Mr. Crosby: We have heard talk about the Third World, and I am interested in that. I am concerned with the plight of the children in the Third World, about those who do not receive enough to eat, who are starving and dying every day. We know about that, but in Canada we have starvation, we have problems. If you do not believe that, come with me and I will show them to you in the heart of the city of Halifax, and I suspect in the heart of Saskatoon as well. There are these problems, but we cannot deal with every problem in the world. If we were to pray to the Almighty, we would pray for the knowledge, wisdom and capacity to allow us to change what we can change and not waste our time attempting to change what cannot be changed by us.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosby: I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that one of the things we can change is the law with respect to capital punishment, if that is the desire of the people of Canada. We have heard statistics throughout this debate. The Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan), whom I would otherwise admire, has said that there is evidence that capital punishment is not a deterrent to murder. Well, I can tell him through you, Mr. Speaker, that he does not know that. You do not count it on just the—

Mr. Kaplan: I did not say that.

Mr. Crosby: —simple statistics of the murders that have occurred. We do not know what evil lurks in the hearts of men.

An hon. Member: The Shadow knows.

Mr. Crosby: We do not know who is deterred from what action. No one can stand in this House and say, "Look, I have the answer", I can tell the Solicitor General that he does not have the answer. I do not want to be mean to him, but several months ago in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs the Solicitor General described the prison population. I asked him at that time to remove from the prison population those offenders—those convicted criminals—who were beyond rehabilitation, who were dangerous even in the confines of the prison, to other inmates and to the guards. I said that in Dorchester penitentiary that situation existed then. In the same smug, arrogant way that he is telling this House about capital punishment and the fact it is not a deterrent to murder, he told me that that was not necessary, that the best course of action was to keep those prisoners in the prison population and that this would lead to their rehabilitation. Several months and one murder later he was back in this House saying that they are making a list of the most dangerous offenders in our prison population and they are going to isolate them. The trouble is, Mr. Speaker, that was one murder later.

Having said that, I recognize, as I think all members do, that there are many views on this subject. There are people who are opposed and there are people who support the restoration of capital punishment. I think something that has been totally lacking in this debate, particularly among the members of the New Democratic Party who have spoken, is respect for the different views on the subject. I would have thought that that would prevail in this House during the debate—respect for different views.

I have here a memorandum from the Canadian Council of Churches referring to the work of the task force on capital punishment that involved a great many societies in Canada. I respect their view. I understand what they mean. I understand their concern. I can see why they want capital punishment to remain abolished in Canada. I respect their view. But I expect them to respect my view, and my view is that, as a member of Parliament, I must represent the people who elected me. I intend to do that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosby: The purpose of this exercise is to make sure that, as members of Parliament, knowing what our constituents feel about this subject, we do something to ensure that they have the opportunity to express those views. How can anybody argue against that?

An hon. Member: Nobody is.

Mr. Crosby: Mr. Speaker, punishment in our system should have three elements: retribution, deterrence and rehabilitation. When I talk about capital punishment, I am talking about people beyond rehabilitation who, by any test, cannot be allowed to exist and go free in society. I am not talking about a 16-year-old boy who commits murder in almost accidental circumstances. I am not talking about a person whose mind is so diseased or disordered that he or she cannot be expected to account for their actions. I am talking about terrorists, the worst kind of murderers, and the planned and deliberate murders that I have seen in my own career. I defended ten men during my career because it was my duty to do so, and I performed my duty. But right now I have a different duty. My duty is to represent the people of Halifax West, to listen to the people there and the people across Nova Scotia and Canada, and to present their views in this chamber. That is exactly what I am doing and that is what all the members here are doing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosby: To come into this chamber and impute motives to us of the kind and character suggested in this House today is despicable, in my opinion, and I will not tolerate it. I am certainly not in any way, shape or form in fear of the public or anyone else because of my view of how I should represent my community. But I do reject, and I hope all members on this and the government side reject, the idea and philosophy—this holier than thou attitude—that certain members know certain things which allow them to dictate a certain course of action. I tell you, Mr. Speaker, they do not know. They cannot solve the problems in El Salvador, and right now it appears they cannot even solve a crucial problem in Canada because they will not allow it to come forward for discussion. They will not allow the democratic right of the people to be exercised through this chamber. They want to spin it off and deal with it on some higher basis. Well, I do not know what higher basis there is in political life in Canada than the people of Canada. Their views and our ability to represent those views in this chamber.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine East): Mr. Speaker, any murder anywhere in Canada is a horrible act and should be condemned, and communities where these horrible murders take place have every right to be outraged and upset when a murder takes place in their midst. But it is completely false and misleading and, I maintain, phony, to suggest that any community or individual will be protected from murder by the reintroduction of capital punishment. The evidence is overwhelming, not only in Canada but around the world, that capital punishment does not protect communities or individuals from murder. It does not protect policemen; it does not protect children; it does not protect old people; it does not protect prison guards. Generally the lowest murder rates exist in states without capital punishment. As a matter of fact, the highest rate exists in countries with capital punishment. In western Europe, the highest murder rate exists in France where they officially have capital punishment and have applied the guillotine several times in the last few years.

• (2100)

Mr. Lambert: No, that is not true.

Mr. Allmand: It is true.

Mr. Lambert: They have applied it twice.

Mr. Allmand: It has been used four times. In Canada, since the abolition of capital punishment in 1976, there has been a continual decline of the murder rate. Because some hon. members opposite have disputed that, I want to put the figures on the record once more. In 1975, there were 701 murders in Canada; in 1976, the year of abolition, there were 668; in the year 1977, there were 710, which was a slight increase; in 1978, there were 658; in 1979, there were 631; in 1980, there were 593.

In the city of Montreal, which had a reputation for horrible and serious murders several years ago, in 1975, the year before abolition, there were 112 murders. In 1976, there were 83; in 1977, there were 100; in 1978, there were 70; in 1979, there were 68, in 1980, there were 45. The most recent statistics are for the end of March this year when there were 24 murders. If that trend continued for the rest of the year, there would be approximately 60 murders, which is a considerable decline from the 112 in 1975.

Some people believe that capital punishment should only apply for the murder of policemen. The highest number of policemen ever killed in Canada was 11 in 1962 when capital punishment was in force. At that time, two people were hanged in this country for killing policemen. Since that time, the number has always been lower. I must say that any number of policemen who are killed is too high, but to suggest that capital punishment will protect policemen is false, misleading and phony. There is no relationship between murder rates and capital punishment.

The only real reason behind the wish to bring back capital punishment is vengeance. Unfortunately, vengeance is not a sound basis upon which to build a criminal justice system. Some people say to me that if someone in my family were murdered, then I would change my mind. There is no doubt that if a person were murdered in anyone's family, the family would be considerably upset and the first reaction would be against the killer. However, this is no basis upon which to build a criminal justice system.

In the Kennedy family in the United States, two sons were murdered. We did not hear Mrs. Kennedy or the rest of the family clamouring for the return of capital punishment. When

Martin Luther King was assassinated, we did not hear Mrs. King clamouring for the return of capital punishment or for capital punishment to be applied. In the last capital punishment debate in the House, I was the minister putting through that bill. In the middle of the debate, a young policeman was murdered in Toronto—it was a horrible killing. Of course it affected the debate, but what was significant was that the widow of that murdered policeman wrote to me and to Mr. Brewin, who was then a member of the New Democratic Party, and pointed out that although she regretted and grieved the loss of her husband, she did not want to see the killing repeated and she did not want us to vote in favour of capital punishment. In fact, she said that her policeman husband who was murdered would not have wanted it to be brought back.

If we were really interested in lowering murder rates and protecting the public, we would try to determine the causes of murder and violent crime, and we would go to work on those causes. Some of the causes which have been suggested are the rise in violence due to the use of alcohol and drugs, the ready availability of guns, our poor education system, poverty, injustice, poor housing, weak and inadequate recreational programs, weak family life, poor systems of juvenile corrections, poor psychiatric services and inadequate support for our policemen. If we want to support policemen, let us give them the support they need so that they can do their jobs properly—the training, manpower, equipment and so on. But let us not fool them by going along with the myth that they will be protected if we reinstate capital punishment. This is the real solution.

Mr. Domm: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am sure the hon. member on the government side will want to correct his statement wherein he corrected us by saying that we gave wrong figures concerning France versus Canada. If the hon. member would relate the number of fatalities in France per 100,000—and they have capital punishment—he will find that our rate is much lower.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member is entering into debate.

Mr. Allmand: I was not comparing the rate in France to the rate in Canada. I said that France was the only country in western Europe with capital punishment and that its rate of murder, in comparison with its neighbours in Holland, Belgium, Sweden, Denmark and West Germany, was higher. I never said that it was higher than the rate in Canada; it is higher than that of its neighbours in western Europe.

If we are really interested in solutions and in protecting the public, we should aim our efforts toward the causes of violent crime and correct them. When we ask the public in a simple poll in a referendum whether they are in favour of capital punishment, of course they will answer yes, because they are outraged by the crimes in their communities and want protection. If we ask them other questions, they may reply in different ways. If we said, "What do you think is the principal cause of violent crime and murder" or "What would be the best way of protecting communities against murder" and listed many options including capital punishment, we would find capital punishment somewhere in the middle of the list.

No one in Canada wants to see a long string of executions. They want protection from violent crimes and murder. We in this House have a responsibility to give them that protection. We should direct our efforts and deliberations into that area.

Capital punishment is not justified for several reasons. First, capital punishment is deliberate killing, and deliberate killing is morally wrong, unless it is done as a last resort in self-defence. Capital punishment is not a last resort in self-defence.

Second, it does not effectively protect communities and individuals against murder. Since capital punishment involves, by its very definition, the taking of life, the burden of proof is on those who would present it as a solution to show that it will be effective and will do the job they claim it will. I have not heard any argument either tonight or in the other five debates in which I participated on this subject.

Third, capital punishment is not justified because if a mistake is made, it can never be reversed. With all other penalties in the Criminal Code, if one makes a mistake, one can reverse the situation, release the person and give him damages for what he suffered, his wrongful imprisonment.

Fourth, when capital punishment is applied traditionally and historically, It is applied inequitably. It has been applied more often to the poor, to racial minorities, to the uneducated and to immigrants. Those people with means, who are wealthy or have connections, have a much better record of escaping the penalty of capital punishment, of escaping execution.

Finally, it is unjustified because—and this point was made by the head of Scotland Yard in Britain—it is ineffective since it leads to too many acquittals. In countries where there are juries, juries are more likely to acquit when the penalty for murder is capital punishment because they are afraid that they may wrongly send someone to their death. As I said, this argument was made by the head of Scotland Yard in Britain. On the other hand, when juries know that capital punishment is not the penalty for murder, they are more likely to convict, and at least put the person away where he will not be a danger to society.

I can suggest some matters which should be sent to committee for study if the House is really interested in studying the basics of this problem. First, as I suggested before, we can make a reference to committee to study the cause of violent crime and what the responses should be to those causes.

Second, we could examine whether the present sanction for murder is the best one. I am thinking of the life sentence with a minimum term of imprisonment of 25 years before parole for first degree murder and a minimum of ten years' imprisonment before parole for second degree murder. I think it is time to re-evaluate this to see whether it is the most appropriate penalty for murder when there is not capital punishment.

Third, a committee could very well study programs for long-term offenders. How do we deal with offenders when they are sent to prison for a long period of time? How do we change those programs to make them more rehabilitative, more secure and more humane?

Fourth, a committee could very well study how we could better assist the victims of crime. Very often parliamentarians forget that by executing the killer, we do not bring back the murdered person. But there is a great deal we could do to assist the victims of crime. I would certainly support any party in this House which would refer those matters to committee.

There has been some suggestion in this debate that there really was not a free vote in 1976, the last time we dealt with this matter on an official basis.

Mr. Siddon: Right on, it was a fraud.

Mr. Allmand: I want to assure members of this House, as the minister who had to pilot that bill, that it was very much a free vote. As a matter of fact, 30 per cent of the members of this party voted against my bill. On the three votes which we had to face in this House, we only won those votes by margins of five to 15 votes. If we had not had the support of the New Democratic Party, of which all members voted for abolition, we would have lost the vote. The whip of my own party, whose views I respect, campaigned against the bill and against me on the issue and persuaded many members of this party to vote against the bill. In a speech I made at that time I can recall stating that the vote on the bill was to be a free one for everyone except the cabinet. I presumed that since the cabinet approved the bill, they would be exempted from the free vote situation. Within a day of having made that speech, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the then House leader, who was Mr. Sharp, stated publicly that I was wrong and that the free vote applied to everyone, including members of the cabinet, despite the fact that they approved the bill.

Mr. Kilgour: Just coincidental.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, members opposite will believe anything they want to believe to suit their purposes. I am telling you, Sir, that the vote caused many of us an awful lot of trouble. I think I was the only minister in at least 25 years who had to go to the House with a serious bill and not know that I had my caucus behind me.

We did get the majority in the caucus behind us, but 30 per cent of this caucus voted against the bill. They say that because all the cabinet voted together, therefore it was not a free vote. Yet all the social credit members in the House at that time voted against the bill. Was that not a free vote for them? They all voted against the bill because that is what they believed in. Members of the cabinet decided to support the bill because that is what they believed in.

I would like to say, Mr. Speaker, that in principle I am opposed to having free votes on these types of issues. I believe that if a government has to administer a penalty, then it should take the responsibility to see that the penalty is one with which it can live. I do not see how the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) can state, as he did when he was prime minister, that he would allow a free vote on the issue, even though he did not believe in capital punishment. He said he would live with the result. On a question of principle such as this, I do not see how a government which believes in one thing can administer a law which is completely contrary to its beliefs. As far as I am concerned, I think that if a government and a party believe in something they should stand together on an issue and either survive or go down with it. That is the way I feel about this particular situation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Allmand: Some members of the opposition have suggested that a true parliamentary democracy is one in which the members in this House vote on the basis of opinion polls and referendums. One after another members of the opposition have stood up in their places and said "I have conducted a poll in my riding, the results of which are such and such." If parliamentary democracy is to be equivalent to voting on the basis of opinion polls and referenda, then we have descended to a very low level.

As the New Democratic Party spokesman who preceded me pointed out, the Conservatives have certainly not read one of their great philosophers and inspirations, Edmund Burke, who pointed out—and this has been repeated time and time again—that in the British system of parliamentary democracy members are elected to represent their constituencies by studying issues in depth, by considering all arguments and then making a decision which they consider to be best for the country based on all the evidence. They then go back to the electorate the next time around and face the music.

I have voted against capital punishment four times in this House already. Twice I have presented bills to abolish capital punishment. I have gone into six elections, three of them following the bill I presented to abolish capital punishment, and I was re-elected. The issue was raised in every election campaign, as was pointed out in this House in debate. People disagreed with me, and I disagreed with them. But we put our views on the table honestly, and despite that it was felt that this was an issue in which one should see balance. As I said, we were re-elected.

Mr. Gamble: You say you know more than your constituents.

Mr. Allmand: I will be glad to distribute those comments about my constituents at the next election. In fact, I will give a copy to the Conservative candidate.

In conclusion, if the supreme value in this country and in this House is human life, then society should never repeat the act of the criminal. A criminal justice system based on revenge is not appropriate to civilized society. We must look for solutions that are humane, civilized but also effective and that offer security. Capital punishment, Mr. Speaker, is not effective, it does not offer security, it is not humane and it is not civilized.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I am indebted to my friend, the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight) for yielding his position on the Speaker's list to allow me the opportunity to address the House on capital punishment.

This is probably the most important and difficult subject any member of Parliament can deal with during his tenure in the House of Commons. Capital punishment is important to many thousands of constituents in whatever riding a member is honoured to represent and whatever his political persuasion. It is difficult because, while the 75,000 people I represent in my riding of Hamilton-Wentworth expect me to speak on their behalf, I know I will be placing on the parliamentary record views with which many will disagree. I know that there are colleagues around me in this chamber who will strongly disagree with what I am about to say.

I have heard some very reasoned arguments today from the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), from my friend from Hillsborough (Mr. McMillan)—and a very excellent speech it was—and even from my friends the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grace (Mr. Allmand) with all his reasoned arguments. Those gentlemen are convinced abolitionists. I know, too, that most of my former colleagues in the parliamentary press gallery will profoundly disagree with my stand on capital punishment. However, my colleagues in this House cannot disagree with my stand on the right of Parliament to debate this issue and to hold a free vote on capital punishment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (2120)

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): I will leave it to the lawyers and the self-styled criminologists to set down their learned arguments on the benefits to society or otherwise of capital punishment. I am not going to get involved in the statistics game in terms of whether the number of murders in this country since the death penalty was abolished is up or down. In fact, the most recent statistics today show the murder rate is down. But, as my distinguished colleague, the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling) has just pointed out, no one is talking about the number of attempted murders. Because of science and medical skills, over the last few years many lives have been saved which might otherwise have become a number in murder statistics. Who knows what would have happened to the President of the United States, his press secretary and his bodyguard if they had been shot in the same way ten years ago? I do not believe statistics. I simply observe what is happening. I see international terrorism on the rise. I hear the head of the U.S. Federal Bureau of Investigation say that this is the most violent period in contemporary U.S. or Canadian history.

I read of a man who had been convicted on a previous charge, who telephoned a policeman, asked him to come down to make an appointment, and lay in wait for two or three hours. This was the policeman who had nailed him on the previous charge. Then he gunned him down, leaving a young widow and three children to mourn the death of that policeman who had only been trying to do his job. That one incident in Delhi, described by my colleague, the hon. member for Haldimand-Norfolk (Mr. Bradley) convinces me, more than any number of statistics which one could cite here, that society can do without that kind of offender.

Is the death penalty a deterrent to murder? It probably is not to the person who, in passion, shoots a girlfriend, or a wife, or the wife's boyfriend, or whoever. I am not arguing the "shoot first, ask questions afterwards" syndrome. I am concerned about premeditated first degree murder. I am zeroing in on the convicted murderer of a young Portuguese shoeshine boy in a homosexual slaying a few years ago in Toronto. The killer was publicly quoted as saying: "If I'd known the death penalty was still in, I'd have thought twice about doing it." I am zeroing in on a known terrorist who almost fulfilled his vow to assassinate the Pope. I am zeroing in on kamikaze terrorists who hold innocent people hostage and keep the world in suspense while trying to force countries to release their terrorist comrades from jail so that this vile network of guerrillas can continue to plunder and pillage a world that is striving for "peace".

In this motion today, we in the official opposition are zeroing in on the question of capital punishment to hear the views of the people of Canada through their elected representatives; because deterrent or not, statistics to the contrary, there is a silent majority out there, and a very sizeable silent majority, that wants a return to capital punishment. The government, the media, surely must ask, why, is this just another part of the sway to the right that we have seen in Great Britain, the United States and in other countries? Can it simply be revenge? Is it a reaction to the increase of violence and terrorism on the international front? Is it a disbelief of statistics, a disbelief of those who say that there really is no deterrent with the death penalty? Is it a combination of all these factors? Or is it something deeper?

You would never know it by reading the papers recently, Mr. Speaker. The surest indication that today's motion has touched a raw nerve with committed abolitionists is to read what the media heavyweights are writing lately. The Toronto Star calls this exercise "inexcusable Tory mischief". Southam News Services' Christopher Young, under a Montreal Gazette headline, "Tories Grab Own Throats Again", asks, "Why divert attention from (other) valid issues by trying to stir up a new campaign for capital punishment, which could not in any case be successful?" The Toronto Globe and Mail reported: "It is an issue that is charged with emotion, a base emotion in many cases. Capital punishment was permanently abolished by a free vote in the House of Commons in 1976."

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): I will have a little more to say about that statement in the Globe and Mail editorial in a moment; that 1976 vote was anything but free. Let us not leave without a word from Mr. Allan Fotheringham, who characteristically describes this debate as "grasping at the noose when there are pressing problems before us is not only sleasy, it is super cynical". In his eyes, we on this side are

"fang-toothed slobberers after revenge; narrow-eyed yahoos who cannot wait to get back to the rope".

An hon. Member: Show us your tooth!

An hon. Member: Show us your fangs!

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Well, we media types always did like to feel we were in the vanguard of public opinion. Given real public feeling on this issue, I really think that these media sources speak for themselves.

Let me dispense with the free vote myth that my colleague, the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine East (Mr. Allmand) dealt with and that has been mentioned as well by Chris Young. I covered that 1976 debate and the crucial vote in detail as a reporter for many broadcasting outlets across the country. I know for an absolute fact that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) ordered his entire cabinet to vote abolition, that he put his chief government whip, the then hon. member for Hamilton Mountain under excruciating pressure to change his mind on the issue, and then Mr. McFarlane was exhorted to put some pressure on other wavering Liberal colleagues to tow the government line. I have no idea. I do not even want to know.

An hon. Member: Pure nonsense!

An hon. Member: Pure garbage!

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Do not get too excited over there. This must be touching a nerve.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): I do not even want to think about some of the political carrots that were dangled before those Liberal members who were sufficient in numbers to tip the scales and, by a very few votes, succeed in abolishing the death penalty in Canada.

The point I want to leave with the House is that the 1976 roll-call on capital punishment was anything but free. It is clearly the most dramatic example of this government flouting the will of the Canadian people. There are others: unification of the Armed Forces; its force-marching us into metric shopping. But in no area has this government, indeed this Parliament, been more out of tune with Canadian public opinion than on the capital punishment question.

There is one consistently true argument made by the media movers and shakers of public opinion: capital punishment should not be the highest priority issue, either in our ridings or in the Progressive Conservative party at this time. There is absolutely no question that the economy, gas prices, energy pricing arrangements, the uranium cartel, issues before the public these days, are deemed to be more important and more newsworthy by the media.

I want to put on the record today that we have sought for many months the chance to bring the death penalty matter before Parliament. Since 1978, through three federal election campaigns, I have promised the people of Hamilton-Wentworth that I would raise the capital punishment question in the House at the earliest opportunity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): The Liberal government has refused to reconsider this controversial issue since I became a member of Parliament. Indeed, the Prime Minister stated during at least one of the election campaigns he would see to it that capital punishment would never again come before Parliament so long as he is in charge. We have therefore been forced to use one of our allotted opposition days to make one simple request of the House; and that is, to refer the capital punishment question to the appropriate standing committee, and to recommend that there be a truly free vote on this issue. This is our one chance. A great many people will be watching what we say here today and how we vote later tonight.

Let me deal with another myth surrounding this debate, namely, that we are merely a bunch of right wing yahoos—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): —who have pressured our leader—I figured we would get some reaction—into agreeing to this opposition day subject because he does not dare deny his caucus this opportunity to appeal to a certain segment of society. That is the kind of media bilge people have been reading. If the CBC were not still on strike, we would be hearing a lot more of it.

I want to remind the House and my former media colleagues that it is our leader, the right hon. member for Yellowhead who, through two federal elections, agreed to allowing a truly free vote on capital punishment, and who informed our party's caucus that, as prime minister, he would abide by Parliament's decision. No other party leader has made that commitment. I am proud to have a leader who keeps his promise and who allows members of his party to speak their minds on a fundamentally moral issue on which we and our leader can disagree. The Leader of the Opposition has the guts to listen to his MPs and to bring this intensely personal matter where it belongs, and where the Liberal government has prevented it from coming to the floor of this House of Commons, then to be sent to a parliamentary committee in the glare of a concerned public opinion. That is the way a democratically elected assembly should be able to operate.

● (2130)

I firmly believe that we, as elected representatives in this chamber from whatever party, should do the best we can to accurately reflect the views of the people who sent us here. I do not know how my hon. friends on the Liberal and NDP side of the House can deny their electors the pledge they made during past election campaigns to speak on their behalf? Are we not all honoured to be members of Parliament because the majority of our constituents felt that we would truly represent their sentiments? Surely we are expected to reflect public opinion, not thwart it.

On this issue especially, I know I am speaking for the vast majority of the people of Hamilton-Wentworth when I worry about the fact that we as a society treat the killers better than we do the victims' relatives; certainly we give them more consideration. I also believe that I am speaking for most of my people when I echo the thoughts of an eight-year-old girl who wrote to the Toronto Star on January 24, 1981, as follows:

> I am eight years old. I think the OPP, Ontario Provincial Police, should have bullet-proof vests because I want my daddy to stay alive. I think other policemen's children would like their daddies to stay alive too.

That is from Dana Rankin, from Midland, Ontario.

A bullet-proof vest might have saved Duncan McAllesee's life; I do not know. What I do know is that we must face some grim facts. We must discuss those grim facts in committee and decide on those grim facts in a free vote in this House. The world is reeling with blows struck by people who gun down popes and presidents and policemen. We must stop them. That happens to be my own personal view as a parliamentarian. I urge the House to support our resolution to permit all other members of this House of Commons to express their views in a free vote. It is a most difficult issue but one of great importance to a great many Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roland de Corneille (Eglinton-Lawrence) Mr. Speaker, having heard the comments of the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Scott) regarding his concern for the tragic violence in the world, and his citation of the fact that there have been attempted assassinations on His Holiness the Pope, the President of the United States and others, I want to say that I do not take second place to him in his concern about terrorism and assassination. I recall that it was on the same day as the attempt was made on the life of the Pope that I moved a motion under Standing Order 43 calling for action in the United Nations and for an international conference and others steps to be taken, to try to find ways to cope with the problems of violence and assassination in the world.

I recall, too, that on a previous occasion, last October I believe, I moved a motion in this House condemning the acts of terrorism in France and the violence which brought about the death of a number of people in Paris. They were the innocent victims of an attempt to kill a lot of Jews who were in a synagogue at the time, who were innocent people and who might have been destroyed as well. So I take no second place to anyone in this House in my concern about acts of violence and terrorism.

The hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth asked why we are so concerned about looking after the criminals and not the victims of violence. I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that this House of Commons has indicated concern only about criminals and their well-being. It seems to me that time after time we have expressed our condemnation of any kind of violence and terrorism. If we say that we should be caring about the innocent victims of crime, then I would be the first to support any motion to discuss what we can do for them. It seems to me that if this subject were brought up, it would advance the cause of those who are suffering, and that we could do something worth while for those innocent victims. It would be deserving of a day of debate to see what more we could do for the victims of crime.

I have to ask myself, Mr. Speaker, what the reason is for this debate. What is the motive for bringing this debate about? It is obviously a problem for many people, not just for those of us on this side of the House or in the New Democratic Party. Is it because there is moral authority for it? Is it because moral forces are calling across the nation for some change in our laws about capital punishment?

If I consider the moral authorities, as they are usually described, they are those who are concerned about international terrorism, those who are concerned about concentration camps behind the iron curtain, those who are concerned about the sudden disappearance of people in foreign countries.

I have received in the mail, as has every member of Parliament today, yesterday or in the past week, a plea from Amnesty International not to support this motion. It sent a leaflet which states as follows: "The death penalty is the ultimate cruel, inhuman and degrading punishment and violates the right to life."

Amnesty International goes on to say that it declares its total and unconditional opposition to the death penalty; that it condemns all executions, in whatever form, committed or condoned by government and that it declares its commitment to work for the universal abolition of the death penalty. That is the studied response of an organization which exists to combat violence and crime, nationally or internationally.

Is this supposed to be some kind of moral crusade? When we look to those we might think give some kind of moral leadership, if it is not Amnesty International, then I have to bring to the attention of all hon. members that the Anglican Church of Canada is opposed to capital punishment; so also is the United Church of Canada; so also is the Canadian Catholic Conference; so also is the Central Conference of American Rabbis; the Presbyterian Church in Canada—

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour) on a point of order.

Mr. Kilgour: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Would the hon. member for Eglinton-Lawrence (Mr. de Corneille) accept a question?

Mr. de Corneille: Perhaps at the end of my remarks, Mr. Speaker. I was trying to list those which are, presumably, the religious institutions of our nation, those who are the leaders and have given careful study and have set up committees to examine the results, theologically, morally or practically, of the subject of capital punishment. I was citing the major churches, and I think I had reached the last in my list. I was bringing out the fact that the Baptist Convention of Ontario and Quebec, the Unitarian Council, the Lutheran Church in America, the Quaker Society of Friends and the Mennonite Central Committee—all of these denominations which probably include the vast majority of those identified as organized religion in this country—oppose the death penalty.

This motion is not before us because of a concern about a moral issue that is being violated by this House in not bringing it forward. Indeed, it would seem that we are being appealed to by all the moral authorities not to raise this subject at this time. If if is not moral authority that is calling for this and if it is not that we are unconcerned, then we have to ask ourselves why the media also seems to regard this question as a rather strange one to raise. The hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth has already cited the litany of the names of the various major publications in this country, many of which are customarily prone to support his party, the Tory party.

● (2140)

Mr. Darling: Who are you kidding?

Mr. de Corneille: Many have done so but are themselves puzzled and are asking why this subject is being raised at this time. He has cited the names of these newspapers. As I have said, many are Tory newspapers. This question is not being raised because of any outcry on the part of the Canadian public. The motion put forward by the Conservatives has made it necessary for us to again debate the issue.

They have tried unsuccessfuly since 1976 by introducing private members bills to have this matter debated again. Now the Conservatives are ready to use their valuable opposition time to debate this matter on an opposition day. That puzzles the media. Why would they use the time when there are concerns about inflation, the rate of interest, the international problems in the world, the grave threat of Soviet intervention in Poland, and the problems in the Middle East? We are debating this issue when there is no moral outcry. The media asks why this subject is being debated. I am at a loss myself.

Mr. Corbett: Sit down then.

Mr. de Corneille: More particularly, why should we debate this at this particular time. There has been no call from the public to bring back hanging. We have been monitoring the situation since the abolition of the death penalty.

We have been assessing the facts to see what the Canadian experience has been.

Mr. Siddon: What about the 30,000 signatures today?

Mr. de Corneille: The facts are simple and they are worth noting. Again, I have to ask why the Conservatives are asking for this particular debate at this particular time. Since the abolition of capital punishment in this country, there has not been an increase in murders. On the contrary, the incidence of murders has decreased. For the edification of those across the way, I think they should have the facts before them. I know one can distort statistics, but I think these are rather simple. These are not figures that can be distorted easily. I do not think any hon. member could challenge that.

In 1975, the murder rate was 2.8 per 100,000 population. In 1976 and 1977, the rate decreased to 2.7.

An hon. Member: What about attempted murders?

Mr. de Corneille: In 1978 and 1979, the rate further decreased to 2.5 per 100,000 population. What new evidence or arguments have come to light to justify this debate?

First, there is no outcry on the part of moral authority, nor is the media calling for a debate. No increase has occurred in the rate of murders since capital punishment was eliminated. On the contrary, there has been a decrease in the number of capital murders. What is the motive for the opposition in calling this particular debate, if this is the case?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being 9:45 p.m. it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every item necessary to dispose of the business of supply in accordance with Standing Order 58(9).

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Clark) which was negatived on the following division.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

HOUSE OF COMMONS

APPOINTMENT OF JEAN NOEL TREMBLAY AS DIRECTOR OF PUBLIC RELATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of importance. In this regard I refer to a statement made by Madam Speaker, on April 23, 1980, and I would like to quote just one sentence from that statement, in part:

All positions of the House of Commons will be awarded through competition . . . if there is a question of promoting them inside the structure once they get in, then they will have to submit to a competition.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie):

That Madam Speaker be respectfully asked to report to the House the reasons why Jean Noel Tremblay, a member of the House of Commons staff, formerly of the Department of Communications, reportedly did not submit to a competition before his appointment as Director of Public Relations to the House of Commons; and finally, it is the opinion of this House that since members are, by tradition, masters of their own House, this information should be made available as soon as conveniently possible.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

POST OFFICE

DOOR TO DOOR MAIL DELIVERY IN CALGARY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Kushner (Calgary East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. For the past two years the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) has been studying the situation and promising the residents of Whitehorn, Temple, Falconbridge, and Castleridge, mail delivery. To date, nothing has been done. The minister's empty promises and arrogant attitude in passing the buck can no longer be tolerated. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko):

That the Postmaster General take action immediately to ensure that these residents receive the same door to door postal delivery, which is provided in other parts of the city of Calgary.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

BANKS AND BANKING

LEGISLATION TO ESTABLISH DEBT ADJUSTMENT BOARDS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Because of the Liberal government's high interest rate policy, the present indebtedness of many home owners and businessmen is beyond their capacity to pay and they are being evicted. Whereas it is essential in the interest of Canada to retain people in both their homes and businesses, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen):

That the government introduce legislation which would allow banks and other lending institutions to establish debt adjustment or debt moratorium boards. Such legislation was in effect on the prairies during the 1930s. This would make it possible to ease the burden of staggering increased monthly mortgage payments for home owners and the bankrupting effect of loan payments on businesses.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SUPPORT FOR FARM MARKETING BOARDS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the Economic Council of Canada report, "Reforming Regulation", has found marketing boards such as the hog boards, the fruit and vegetable boards and the Canadian Wheat Board as "generally . . . operating successfully and to the benefit of society", and whereas the council's analysis of supply management boards is fraught with inconsistencies and dubious economic assumptions and has ignored the real contribution of such boards to the stabilization of farm incomes in Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae):

That this House supports the right of farmers to a fair return for their products and ratifies the concept of farm marketing boards as the means whereby farmers can gain such a return where currently denied because of insufficient bargaining power in many commodities in Canada.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FINANCE

CAPITAL GAINS TAX—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of importance. In view of the fact that high levels of inflation are becoming institutionalized within the Canadian economy through mechanisms such as COLA clauses and indexed pensions, and in view of the fact that those who are subject to the capital gains tax do not have the benefit of having their initial investment appreciate on the basis of the inflation rate, which leaves them with a much greater paper profit than corresponds to their actual gain, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington):

That the Minister of Finance consider changes to the capital gains tax which would index the initial investment of a capital gain to the inflation rate so that the government's cut would be a fair, equitable and more accurate means of taxing real gains rather than paper profits, and that such needed changes be included in the Minister of Finance's next budget.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

POLICE OCCUPATION OF RESTIGOUCHE RESERVE IN QUEBEC—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Greenaway (Cariboo-Chilcotin): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Yesterday a small army of federal and provincial officials occupied the Restigouche Indian Reserve in Quebec for four hours, thereby bringing relations with the native people to a new low point. In light of this excessive and inappropriate response to a fishing dispute, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Erie (Mr. Fretz):

That the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, as well as the Solicitor General, immediately launch an investigation into the Gestapo-like tactics which were shamefully employed at the Restigouche reserve yesterday.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

COURTS' TREATMENT OF LABOUR LEADERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Considering that all people should be treated equally in the eyes of the law, and in view of a recent decision by one Crown prosecutor to recommend a conditional discharge for three officers of K-Mart Canada Limited guilty of conspiring to thwart a union's organizing efforts, while courts have recently given jail sentences for labour leaders such as Jean-Claude Parrot of CUPW, Sean O'Flynn of the Ontario Public Service Union, and Grace Hartman of CUPE, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House express its opposition to a double standard in the punishment for labour/management offences and urges the courts to treat labour leaders in the same light as management.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AGRICULTURE

HERD MAINTENANCE PROGRAM—LATE APPLICATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under Standing Order 43. Whereas the government extended the boundaries of the western region designated for herd maintenance by adding special designated areas equally damaged by last summer's drought, and whereas many producers in northeastern Alberta who were originally ineligible for assistance under this program were suddenly included but upon submitting their applications for assistance were informed that their applications could not be accepted because they had missed the deadline for application previously set, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper):

That the government end its discrimination against those producers who filed their applications after the official deadline because their regions were added at the last moment as special drought areas, and recognize that many western farmers still have legitimate claim to herd maintenance assistance, and adjudicate each case on its own merit.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ECONOMIC COUNCIL OF CANADA

RECOMMENDATIONS RESPECTING REGULATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Scott Fennell (Ontario): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I move, seconded by the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Thomson):

That this House commends the chairman and members of the Economic Council of Canada on the steps that they have proposed in their report on reforming regulations, to initiate the deregulation of the private sector and permit the ability of the free market system to operate in Canada.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ENERGY

NEGOTIATION OF PRICING AGREEMENT WITH PROVINCE OF ALBERTA

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Since the beginning of 1980 the price of a barrel of oil has increased some $12.79. Of that increase $4 was shared by the federal government, the provincial governments of the producing provinces, and the industry. The federal government took in a total $8.79. The result is that 72 per cent—would you like me to repeat those figures?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wilson: Since 1980 the price of a barrel of oil has increased $12.79 a barrel; $4 of that was shared among the producing provinces, the federal government, and the industry, and $8.79 was taken by the federal government. The result is that 72 per cent of the $12.79 increase is taken by the federal government in the form of increased taxes, and the consumer has had to pay 60 cents more per gallon of gasoline during this period of time.

The Prime Minister indicated on Tuesday that the major obstacle in the current negotiations with the province of Alberta was in the area of revenue sharing. Can the minister indicate whether the price negotiations, in which he has played a part this week, concerned only a re-allocation of the $8.79 among the other parties, the provinces and the industry, or is it the federal government's intention to keep all of that revenue? Is the minister only discussing a re-allocation of the additional price increases currently under discussion with his colleague in Alberta from now on?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, included in the prepared figures mentioned by the hon. member, which he attributed to the federal government, he knows that something like $2 is a result of the cutbacks imposed by the government of Alberta.

Mr. Crosbie: That is nonsense. Pinocchio, watch your nose.

Mr. Lalonde: This charge was necessary to pay for the additional imports. In addition, a significant amount of the federal share also goes to pay for what is called the Syncrude levy. We have to pay world price for the oil produced by the tar sands plant and the production coming from that plant.

As far as the other part of the federal government share is concerned, most of that has to do with oil import payments. We have to pay high prices for oil imports because of decisions taken by OPEC over the last couple of years.

In terms of pricing itself, I want to repeat that what the federal government has been collecting has all gone for energy purposes in the area of oil payments.

Mr. Crosbie: Come off it.

Mr. Lalonde: It has not gone into the general revenue of the government for other expenditures.

As far as the issue of negotiations with the government of Alberta is concerned, I am pleased to inform my hon. friend that we have discussed both the question of revenue sharing and the question of pricing.

REVENUES FROM FUTURE WELLHEAD PRICE INCREASES

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, again I sought an answer and again I received no answer. The fact is that 72 per cent of the revenues are going to the federal government in the form of increased tax revenues. That is a fact and you cannot get away from it. The $2 to which the minister referred, blame for which should be shared between himself and his colleague from Alberta, I agree, was instigated by the minister of energy in his energy program. Even if you take away that $2, over 50 per cent of the revenues still end up in the federal coffers. That does not take into account the production tax or excise tax on natural gas also introduced in the energy program.

• (1120)

It is clear that the federal government is more interested in increasing its revenues than sharing those revenues with the different parties in the negotiations. If the wellhead price does increase, will there be any additional revenues from that price increase, the production tax and the excise tax on natural gas, which will allow some reduction in the federal tax revenues and thus allow for some reduction in the burden on the consumer?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the hon. member says that the Government of Canada is getting a greater share than before as a result of the increases that have been announced since the budget. There is no apology necessary because, of all the federal countries in the world, Canada was getting the least moneys for the responsibilities it had incurred. If you compare it with other federations, such as the United States or Australia, you find that since 1973 the national government in Canada has been getting an extremely low share. It is a definite purpose of the National Energy Program to ensure that in the future the national government, on behalf of all Canadians, receives a fair share so that it can help the regions and people in need, while at the same time assisting Canadian consumers with prices that will not be as extreme as they would have been under the Conservative budget of December, 1979. The hon. member's question is obviously hypothetical and not according to the rules of the House.

Mr. Wilson: It may be hypothetical to the minister, but those who are paying 60 cents more a gallon do not find it hypothetical. Indeed, they find it very painful.

DETAILS OF OFFER WITH RESPECT TO PRICING AGREEMENT

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question deals with another aspect of the energy negotiations, the megaprojects such as the Syncrude expansion, Alsands, and the Cold Lake project. These projects are potential casualties of the negotiations if there is not a proper conclusion. The problem is partly because they have been put on hold by the province of Alberta, and very significantly because of the price regime set out in the energy program last October. I have two questions for the minister. First, are the prices for the synthetic crude products a subject of the current negotiations? Second, is the minister intending to offer an increase in the price and the escalation factor, if it is necessary, independent of any agreement that he might come to with the province of Alberta in order to get these projects moving ahead and working toward increasing our future supply?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, nobody likes price increases, least of all the Government of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: First we had Uriah Heep; now Marc Heep.

Mr. Lalonde: If the hon. member looks at the figures he will find that the consumers are paying less than they would have been paying under the budget of the hon. member for St. John's West.

Mr. Crosbie: Nobody believes that anymore.

Mr. Lalonde: Second, thanks to the measures we have taken, Canadian consumers have saved about $2.2 billion, which represents about $370 per family, because of the pricing policy we have followed since the 1979 election. That is money Canadians have in their pockets thanks to the measures we have adopted. Third, I already stated that if the Alberta cutbacks were to be eliminated tomorrow, we could reduce the price by seven cents a gallon. These are facts the hon. member should not forget.

As to the question concerning tar sands, I have indicated that the government is ready to show flexibility on all aspects. I have suggested in the past that the matter of tar sands plants be considered separately from the general discussion on conventional oil, but the government of Alberta has taken the position that no agreement other than a comprehensive agreement would be entertained. I am afraid this is a matter that is in the hands of the government of Alberta and about which I can do little.

REQUEST FOR REDUCTION IN FEDERAL SHARE OF REVENUES

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, earlier this week the Prime Minister said in this House that he would be satisfied if the federal government received 23 per cent to 25 per cent of petroleum revenues in Canada, yet the minister's own department provides figures which indicate that 56 cents, or 33.7 per cent of the price of every gallon of gasoline sold at the pumps in Ontario, for example, goes to the federal treasury, as compared to 22.7 cents for the producing provinces, 10 cents to the dealer, 19.3 cents to the producer, and so on. In view of these statistical facts which far exceed the Prime Minister's own expectations in regard to federal revenues, will the minister now cut back on federal energy taxes, from present energy revenues to at least the 25 per cent level suggested by the Prime Minister?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, first of all, I invite the hon. member to refer to what the Prime Minister said. Second, when we mentioned 23 to 24 per cent in the budget, we were making a comparison with the base that had been used for years and yielded a rate of about 9 or 10 per cent for the federal share. That was the base used for many years to determine the revenues of the various levels of government. This estimate is not arrived at on the basis of prices at the pump, but rather of wellhead prices. This is how those figures are established. On that basis, the Canadian government's share was only about 9 per cent of the wellhead price before the last budget, and between 23 and 25 per cent approximately under the budgetary proposals.

If my hon. colleague wants to introduce another formula to take into account prices at the pump or retail prices, he will obviously arrive at other figures and other percentages. In such a case, the Canadian government's share would, of course, be other than the 23 to 24 per cent mentioned by the Minister of Finance in his budget. I therefore invite my colleague not to change the formula along the way. He must not change the rules of the game!

ENERGY TAX REBATE PROGRAM

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, the minister may not be looking at the price of gasoline at the gas pump, but every Canadian who is a consumer is looking at that price which has increased by 60 cents a gallon since the beginning of last year. As far as the Prime Minister's statement is concerned, which the minister questioned, I will quote the Prime Minister from page 10397 of Hansard for June 19. When talking about energy revenues the Prime Minister said:

> We would like the over-all result to be the federal government sharing 23 per cent or 25 per cent of the take—

The minister's own department provides figures which indicate that the take is 33.7 cents. Since the minister is not prepared to cut back energy taxes across the board, would he at least now be prepared to return part of this excessive share of revenue to those Canadians who have been disproportionately affected by the energy price increases? In other words, is the minister now prepared to introduce an energy tax rebate program for low and middle-income families and, if not, why not, considering these facts from his own department?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I will try in English, Madam Speaker. The hon. member is talking apples and oranges. When the budget was put forward it provided the federal government with a 23 per cent to 24 per cent take at the wellhead. This is the way this calculation has been made consistently. If my hon. friend wants to come back to a calculation at the pump, obviously there will be other percentages, and the figures mentioned by the Prime Minister and the figures mentioned by the Minister of Finance would have to be adjusted accordingly.

There is one way of calculating that has been consistently followed. I remind my hon. friend that that was followed by the Conservative government for the short time it was in office, and we are following exactly the same formula for calculating the share of revenue which was contained in the infamous budget of December, 1979. We have not changed the rules of the game, and I invite my hon. friend not to change the rules of the game.

• (1130)

As far as consumers are concerned, the government has moved—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

THE ECONOMY

CONSUMER PRICE INDEX—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister, who no doubt has been made aware that cost of living figures came out today. I hope he noted that, excluding food prices, prices went up by 12.2 per cent, which is the largest increase in 31 years. There were record increases in the cost of transportation and housing. I would like to ask the Prime Minister if he will now acknowledge that the government has no general anti-inflation policy at all which is effective. Specifically, would he tell us how his government's interest rate policy will bring down the price of housing and the price of transportation one little bit?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, it is people like the Leader of the New Democratic Party who have caused the science of economics to be called the dismal science.

Mr. Broadbent: That is worthy of Adam Smith.

Mr. Trudeau: The Leader of the New Democratic Party always seeks out the worst sub-item of any item, hones in on that, tears his hair out, and suggests that things are going terribly. The Leader of the New Democratic Party knows perfectly well that the cost of living year over year has fallen this month compared with the equivalent month of last year, so why does he take out one sub-item and draw his economic theories from that?

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, it was not I who took out one sub-item. If the Prime Minister looks at his briefing notes with care, he will see that Statistics Canada has a separate listing for changes in the cost of living with food exempted. It is Statistics Canada which points out that we have had the largest increase across the board in 31 years. We are not making up those figures. The government should pay attention to them.

QUERY RESPECTING ASSISTANCE TO CONSUMERS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, in January prices went up by 12 per cent, in February by more than 12 per cent, in March by more than 12 per cent, and the same in April and May. For five months in a row we have had this increase, which is another record. Never in 31 years have prices gone up by more than 12 per cent five months in a row. When will the government announce a single new initiative which will help Canadians cope with escalating prices?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Finance announced such an initiative two days ago in this House when he indicated that he had met with the chartered banks.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I understand that the Leader of the New Democratic Party does not like the Minister of Finance meeting with bankers, but that is part of his job.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, economics may be a dismal science, but we surely have a dismal Prime Minister when we get answers like that today on such an important subject. The Prime Minister knows that the Minister of Finance did not bring a specific proposal away from the bankers. If he does not know that, the people of Canada do.

EFFECT OF GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister took pride a couple of weeks ago in saying to me that as a Liberal he believed in gradualism. Considering that for three years in a row Canadian living standards have gone gradually down, and considering that for five months in a row prices have gone gradually up beyond 12 per cent each month, will the Prime Minister confirm that gradualism for the Liberals really means a gradual decline in the living standard of every Canadian from coast to coast?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, when I answered that question about two weeks ago and showed the Leader of the New Democratic Party, with statistics, that Canadians are better off today than they were ten years ago, the Leader of the New Democratic Party said, "Of course they are, but that is not my point". I do not know what point he wants to make when he says Canadians are worse off. When we indicate with statistics that they are better off, he says, "Of course; I am not denying that". I wish he would make up his mind on what he wants to complain about.

ECONOMIC COUNCIL OF CANADA

REPORT ON REGULATIONS

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. The Economic Council of Canada has just completed a report on regulations which cost $3 million and which was done at the Prime Minister's direction and at the urging of the provinces. The council was asked to assess government regulations in Canada. The report suggests that Canadian consumers could save billions of dollars a year in trucking, airline and food costs if the council were listened to. The council found that direct economic controls have resulted in what it says is a substantial waste of economic resources.

This study has taken three years to do. It has cost $3 million. It was done at the direction of the Prime Minister. The Economic Council of Canada reports to the Prime Minister. Would the Prime Minister tell the House what action the government plans in following up on this three-year study? Will the government report to this House what recommendations it accepts and what recommendations it rejects, and why it accepts or rejects these recommendations which cost so much to bring forward to the House?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the thrust of the report of the Economic Council is one which the government has been concerned about these past few years and which caused us to set up the task force composed of members of this House, and so ably chaired by the hon. member for Willowdale, which has reported to this House. As a consequence of that report—and, no doubt, in studying further the report of the Economic Council—the government will continue to accelerate its initiatives in order to do away with or to simplify regulations which can be done away with or simplified. In cases of overlap with provincial regulations, we will continue to put an end to such overlap.

The hon. member might want to know that the government has established the office of co-ordinator for regulatory reform under my excellent colleague, the President of the Treasury Board. Of course, when we created the office of controller general, the controller general initiated a program of evaluation which will lead to some substantial improvement in this area.

REQUEST FOR POLICY STATEMENT

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. The report of the House of Commons committee on regulations was filed here on December 19. Very little has been done about it. One of the committee's main recommendations was that there should be a special committee of this House on regulations set up on a permanent basis. Nothing has been done about that. As part of my question I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether he is going to accept that recommendation which was put in by that special committee.

After a three-year study, the Economic Council of Canada has reported to Canadians that billions of dollars can be saved by de-regulation in the transportation field and with respect to food costs and the like. This is a very serious conclusion, and the people of Canada are entitled to know if it is so. If it is so, will the government do it? Is the Prime Minister taking this report of his council seriously? Will he report to the House in the next week or so on what recommendations the government accepts and sees merit in, and what recommendations it does not accept?

For example, the Minister of Agriculture certainly does not accept aspects of the report. Will the government treat this frankly and honestly and report to us and the Canadian consumer as to what it is going to act on, what it is not going to act on, and just exactly what it is going to do, because this is a very amazing, one would say, and important report?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I am glad the hon. member is attaching such importance to this report. He will be a positive influence in his own party when we come to discussing the question of parliamentary reform, which is very high on the government's agenda and which would permit us to consider the implementation of some of the recommendations in the Peterson task force report.

In so far as the Economic Council recommendations are concerned, the hon. member is correct in pointing out that they refer particularly to certain departments. The Department of Transport and the Department of Agriculture are two examples. Of course the ministers responsible for these departments are already beginning to study the report and to consider ways by which action could be taken.

Mr. Crosbie: Would you report to us on it?

MULTICULTURALISM

PROGRAM TO COMBAT RACISM

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Multiculturalism, who announced with much fanfare the other day a $1.5 million program to combat racism. He made remarks about how terrible racism is, and I agree with him.

● (1140)

While the minister is announcing a $1.5 million program to combat racism, the Minister of Employment and Immigration is cutting the funding for the Immigrant Services Society in British Columbia. Given the fact there are 1,000 immigrants a month into the lower mainland area of British Columbia, and given the fact that 43 per cent of children starting school in my area speak English as their second language, and given the fact we have a large non-white population in the lower mainland, and given the fact that without the Immigrant Services Society—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fraser: Who is the speaker over there anyway? Given the fact that we brought—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fraser: Madam Speaker, what they do not want to hear is obvious.

Madam Speaker: Members will hear anything during debate, but Question Period requires members to put their questions rather concisely.

Mr. Fraser: Madam Speaker, my question is this: Why is one hand of government cutting the funding so desperately needed out there, while people in the minister's department are going around trying to make heroes out of themselves by saying they do not like racism?

An hon. Member: Same old gang.

Hon. Jim Fleming (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Madam Speaker, perhaps the reason I did not immediately catch the hon. member's question was because it is the first question I have had from the opposition in eight months. They certainly seem to have a great interest in multiculturalism and equity in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fleming: I believe there was a shot at the end of the question to the effect that we were trying to do something self-seeking in announcing the program to improve racial equity in Canada. I do not find that self-seeking; surely that is a fundamental policy supported by all sides of this House in several motions under Standing Order 43 in the last couple of months.

The question of ISAP funding should, of course, be directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration, but I might say that the statements made by the hon. member in posing his question are alarmist and untrue according to the facts I have.

REASONS FOR GOVERNMENT ACTIONS

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): I invite the minister to retract what he said. I know what goes on in my own area.

I ask the minister: why do you indulge in the hypocrisy of this kind of announcement when you cut the funding that we so desperately need in an area where we will have problems if you do not support the very agencies and organizations that are on the ground trying to fight racism? That is what I want to know.

Hon. Jim Fleming (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Madam Speaker, I believe the government has been most supportive of those immigrant settlement organizations.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fleming: In fact, Madam Speaker, it was this government that established the increased acceptance of boat people in the refugee program, and I think if the hon. member lost a bit of his histrionics and theatrics and just waited a little, he would find there was some pretty good news for those organizations.

ASTRA TRUST

COMPENSATION FOR INVESTORS

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Finance concerning the affairs of Astra Trust and Re-Mor.

In light of the statement by the superintendent of insurance, and I am quoting from the statement he made to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs at which the minister was present:

> In the light of what has happened, I can only say that it would have been better had the licence not been granted.

—and in light of the fact there are two groups of investors who have not been compensated, those who invested more than $20,000 in Astra Trust and those who invested in the Re-Mor company thinking it was associated with Astra, I would like to ask the minister does he not think the federal government has a responsibility to participate in the compensation of these individuals?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I am glad that the hon. member has raised this issue once again. We should go back to the first discussions we had on this subject and differentiate between the responsibilities of the federal government toward corporations with a federal charter and the responsibilities of the provincial government.

As concerns Astra Trust, which indeed comes under federal jurisdiction because of the compensation agency provided, the depositors were covered up to the $20,000 maximum provided under the law. Investors in Re-Mor, which is a provincially incorporated institution subject to the review of provincial regulatory mechanisms, have to look to the government of Ontario to take its responsibilities and compensate them for their losses.

[English]

Mr. Rae: Madam Speaker, that is a truly incredible statement. Re-Mor existed for over a year before the federal government was even aware of its existence, and the principals in Astra Trust are exactly the same people as the principals in Re-Mor. Many of the people investing in Re-Mor did so on the assumption that they were in fact investing in a company covered by federal insurance. In light of those facts, the minister's abdication of responsibility is truly incredible.

REQUEST FOR FEDERAL INQUIRY

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): As a supplementary question, Madam Speaker, I ask the minister, in light of the statement by the superintendent of insurance that the Astra licence should never have been granted, and in light of the fact that there are many questions surrounding the application for the licence and the operation of that company and related companies, does the minister not think it is the responsibility of the federal government to have a federal inquiry into the circumstances surrounding the licensing of that company? And quite apart from the existence of criminal and fraud charges which are under way, does he not think the federal government has a civil obligation to see that we know how it is this was allowed to happen, and to make sure it does not happen again?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I think that all the members of this House have noticed that the hon. member often has a tendency to draw general conclusions from narrow premises. When he concludes that the superintendent of insurance indicated to the committee that the licence should never have been granted, he is distorting totally the comments of the superintendent of insurance, and I invite him first of all to learn to read, and second, to read the statement made by the superintendent. As for the need for an investigation, my position is still the same, and the answer is no.

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

DANGERS OF USE OF MARIJUANA

Mr. Stanley Hudecki (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In light of the growing advocacy by some members of this House and the press for changes in laws pertaining to possession of marijuana which appear to lessen their severity, will the minister take equally aggressive action to warn and educate the people of this country by every means at her disposal of the long and short-term medical dangers and hazardous effects of this drug, and introduce important medical considerations into the implementation of any proposed change?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, we will launch an information and educational program on the dangers of marijuana, just as we now have, for instance, on tobacco and on alcohol abuse. I can assure the hon. member that any decision will be made in light of the need which may exist to eliminate certain legal injustices, but also of the need to warn people against developing a dangerous habit at certain moments in their lives.

FINANCE

PRICE PAID FOR TREASURY BILLS

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Acting Minister of Finance and arises out of the price Canada had to pay yesterday for Treasury bills, and out of the fact that the government of the United States in tendering the same kind of Treasury bills on Tuesday was able to borrow its 90-day money at 14.9 per cent, and its 180-day money at just slightly over 14 per cent.

Can the acting minister tell this House why Canada had to pay 18.82 per cent for its 90-day money, and 18.22 per cent for its 180-day money, a spread of nearly 4 per cent between the borrowing cost in the United States and the borrowing cost in Canada?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, the gap between those rates proves that the Leader of the New Democratic Party is wrong when he claims that Canada's interest rate policy is dictated by the United States.

● (1150)

REASONS FOR PRICE PAID

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Would the minister then confirm that the credit of Canada is at least 4 per cent worse than the credit of the United States? Would he confirm that the only reason we have to pay this kind of money is to keep our dollar at 83 cents? Can the minister confirm that with our resources and with the National Energy Program which is now in place, we are in real trouble, which is why we must pay 4 per cent more than the American government does in the same marketplace for the same kind of money?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I fully disagree with the simplistic conclusions of the hon. member. He ought to examine the phenomenon as a whole, look for the causes and endorse the position of the Minister of Finance who is going to pursue his attempt to control inflation so that the interest rates will be much more acceptable to Canadians.

HOUSING

GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE TO BUILDERS

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister whose government practises the dismal science so dismally. There are people in my riding who are terrified that they will be evicted from their homes because rent increases are climbing beyond their ability to pay, because of present interest rates. Since the Prime Minister's government is looking to the private sector to extend pension coverage, and since it is also looking to the private sector banks to alleviate the devastation caused by the government's interest policies, why is the Prime Minister so unwilling to look to the private sector construction industry to help resolve the housing crisis by offering builders financial incentives to build rental housing?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I fail to understand the premise of the hon. lady's question when she says we look to the private sector on pension matters. Surely she should recall that one of the first acts of this Parliament was to increase the guaranteed income supplement by $420 a year, which has now been escalated to $460. So, it is not correct to say that. We find that we have, within the fiscal restraints which we all recognize in this House, obligations, and we discharged that particular one the first thing after the election.

Miss Carney: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is also for the Prime Minister, and if he wishes to contradict the stated public policy of his minister responsible for pensions that is his right.

EFFECT OF MORTGAGE RATES

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): The Prime Minister's colleague, the Minister of Finance, has maintained that his high interest rate policies are not reducing the quality of life for most Canadians. As a Canadian whose mortgage rate is going from 13 per cent to 18 per cent, I can assure the Prime Minister that my quality of life is being reduced by about $300 a month in extra interest costs. There are millions of Canadians in the same boat.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Miss Carney: Since the average cost of a Vancouver home in March of this year was about $152,000, and since a person with a 10 per cent down payment would require an annual income of $73,500 to pay for one of those homes—a Liberal cabinet minister could almost qualify in the unlikely event that one could be elected in Vancouver—what advice has the Prime Minister, whose home is supplied by the Canadian taxpayers, to offer the first-time home buyer in B.C. where the average family income is $29,000 a year? Or does the Prime Minister reject the right of Canadians to own their own homes?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. lady complains that her quality of life has been reduced by virtue of high interest rates. Of course high interest rates are a very regrettable phenomenon, but I wish to point out to the hon. lady that the reason her quality of life has been reduced is because salaries of members of Parliament are fixed at a ceiling of a 7 per cent increase per year when, as the Leader of the New Democratic Party pointed out earlier, the cost of living has been rising considerably in excess of that over the past several years.

Mr. Siddon: What are you going to do about it, Pierre?

Mr. Trudeau: Indeed, that is why the McIsaac Report recommended that members of Parliament do away with this 7 per cent ceiling. The hon. lady probably could give the answer to the Tory in the back benches who asks what we are going to do about it. We are asking members opposite if they will join with members on this side to ensure that members of Parliament are remunerated in a fair way.

Oral Questions

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

P.E.I. CONSERVATION AND RENEWABLE ENERGY AGREEMENT

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. On page 85 of the National Energy Program it states very clearly and categorically the following:

> In addition to expanded national renewables programs, extension of the P.E.I. Conservation and Renewable Energy Agreement will be undertaken, at a four-year cost of over $9 million.

In view of this firm commitment in black and white in the National Energy Program, how can the minister explain the fact that he has now announced to his counterpart in Prince Edward Island, the Hon. Barry Clark, that the agreement to which I have referred is to be scrapped and not renewed?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, under this agreement the government of Prince Edward Island has been extremely delinquent in terms of providing its own share of 20 per cent. As a matter of fact, at the present time the government of Prince Edward Island owes $1.8 million as its contribution under the program.

In conversations I have had with the energy minister in Prince Edward Island I have told him that I was ready to extend the program for a few months in order to ensure that all commitments which had been made under the previous program would be met, and also in order to allow time for the government of Prince Edward Island finally to make its own contribution under this program.

This particular program was obviously creating financial difficulties for the government of Prince Edward Island. Consequently, in the future the national government will pay the same amount, which was mentioned in the National Energy Program, but the sum will be paid by the national government directly without waiting for the provincial contribution. This will leave the provincial government free to spend whatever it wants in this regard, but the federal government contribution will be paid to the citizens of Prince Edward Island directly.

FORM OF PAYMENT TO ISLANDERS

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, in light of what the minister has just said, I have two questions. Is the minister saying that there is a firm commitment now that the federal government will be paying to the people of Prince Edward Island a total of $9 million over a period of four years, albeit in a different form than that referred to in the National Energy Program, and if so, in what form will those payments be made? What sort of programs can the minister tell islanders they can count on, in view of the fact that in the last year energy costs in Prince Edward Island have soared 33 per cent over the previous year, compared with 28.5 per cent in the country as a whole?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, of this $9 million 80 per cent was to come from the national government and 20 per cent from the government of Prince Edward Island. The commitment is that the federal government's 80 per cent share will be paid to the citizens of Prince Edward Island. As for the other 20 per cent, it is up to the government of Prince Edward Island to do whatever it wishes. Indeed, I hope it will pay that amount to the citizens of Prince Edward Island. But looking at the past experience over the last couple of years I must say that I am rather doubtful, or skeptical, as to whether that share will be paid. As far as the national government is concerned, we will pay our full share under this program over the next four years. This share will go to energy conservation and renewable forms of energy, as it did before. We will observe our commitment completely.

CORPORATE AFFAIRS

REPORT OF INQUIRY INTO PETROLEUM INDUSTRY—PRIVATE PUBLISHING VERSION

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Supply and Services. I am holding up the Bertrand report published by the minister's department, entitled "The State of Competition in the Canadian Petroleum Industry", which sells for $70—and it weighs about a ton. In my other hand I have the James Lorimer version published by Lorimer and Company, which costs $15 and it can be carried around by you on your bicycle, and you can read it when you wish. The minister's lawyers are trying to have the Lorimer version taken off the book stands, especially in Toronto. As I understand it, Lorimer and Company have offered 8 per cent royalties. I would ask the minister if he is prepared to enter into negotiations in good faith with Lorimer and Company, so that this report can be distributed widely, or does he not want this particular easy version of the report to be distributed?

● (1200)

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, I would call to the attention of the hon. member that the heavier report that is available contains an abbreviated summary of the contents of the report. I would suggest that he could read that if he does not have time to go through the total report. The other matter involving the James Lorimer Publishing Company is sub judice, so I will not make any comment at this time.

Mr. Waddell: Madam Speaker, I would hope that the minister would try to settle this matter so that the book can be distributed.

CROWN COPYRIGHT—REQUEST FOR REVIEW BY GOVERNMENT

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Prime Minister and it refers to government policy for distributing documents. In the United States every document is public property and can be distributed. In Canada we have Crown copyright, which is quite proper. Documents come out in this form and are very rarely distributed in this way. In the United Kingdom there is a sort of a middle road where there is Crown copyright but through a government circular some documents are made available to be published like this.

I hesitate to use the words, but in the interests of "participatory democracy", which some people may still believe in, is the Prime Minister prepared to commit the government at least to reviewing the nature of publishing documents and government reports so that they can get out to the people who can read, in this case about the workings of the oil monopoly in Canada? They would become better informed citizens and would be able to deal with these problems.

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, I want to advise the hon. gentleman that the policy he has described is exactly that which I follow. I enter into negotiations on a regular basis, a bona fide basis, and I do grant the copyright at any time there is justification. The purpose of the policy that I follow is to make available to as many Canadians as possible the information they ought to have. In effect that is why the report is available both in summary and in complete form. As for negotiations, anyone who wants to deal with me in good faith, Madam Speaker, can rest assured that I will deal with him in good faith.

AGRICULTURE

GOVERNMENT POLICY—ROLE OF MARKETING AGENCIES

Mr. Marcel Dionne (Chicoutimi): Madam Speaker, I have read the report of the Economic Council of Canada and despite what the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) may say, the council does indeed recognize marketing boards and the role they play in marketing Canadian farm products. However, it does express reservations about the Canadian dairy policy by saying that the control exercised by the Canadian Dairy Commission could result in an increase in the supply of milk at the consumer level. Could the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture tell us whether he agrees with this?

Mr. Marcel Ostiguy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, it is difficult to comment on this because the dairy policy is under review at present and will be announced in early August. However, I want to point out to the House that Canada's dairy policy is not more of a burden on Canadian taxpayers and consumers than the American dairy policy and it is certainly much less so than that of the European Economic Community.

POST OFFICE

SERVICE TO CALGARY SUBURBS

Mr. John Kushner (Calgary East): Madam Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Postmaster General. I have asked this question on many occasions. I see the minister is not in his place so I wonder if the acting minister would answer. My question refers to the group boxes to be installed at Whitehorn, Temple, Falconridge and Castleridge. It was promised that they would be installed shortly, but we have been dealing with this problem for the last two years. Has the acting minister got any additional information about when they will be installed and when mail delivery will be made to those boxes?

Mr. Gary F. McCauley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. I take it as a two-part question. First of all, he is concerned about group boxes in certain Calgary suburbs. According to the information provided to me, Canada Post is providing service within the capability of the staff available. The equipment necessary for the provision of group box service to these areas is now in place. I can assure the hon. member that the group box service is temporary and letter carrier service will be extended to the suburbs of Calgary when manpower becomes available, either by the lifting of constraints or by a realignment of operations or new efficiencies introduced by the Post Office.

DOOR TO DOOR MAIL DELIVERY

Mr. John Kushner (Calgary East): Madam Speaker, I should like to ask the acting minister if he is in a position to inform this House of the situation today. As he knows very well, numerous studies have been made on the subject of mail delivery in that area. For the last two years we have been promised, month after month, that we would have an answer. As a matter of fact this has been studied to death. Can the acting minister at least give us some indication of when mail delivery will be made from door to door?

Mr. Gary F. McCauley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, due to the growth in the suburbs of Calgary because of the great growth in the economy of Alberta, it is very difficult to give a date because we are under manpower restraints and Calgary is so successful in its economic development. We will endeavour to give the hon. member a date as soon as possible.

Point of Order—Mr. Andre

POINT OF ORDER

MR. ANDRE—PROVISIONS IN MAIN ESTIMATES, 1981-82—RULING BY MADAM SPEAKER

Madam Speaker: On June 1 the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) argued the point of order that he had raised some weeks earlier, namely, the procedural acceptability of certain items contained in the main estimates for 1981-82. It had been suggested to the hon. member on that earlier occasion that he await until the estimates were formally returned to the House May 31, at which point there would remain ample time to dispose of the matter well before the last allotted day.

Both the hon. member for Calgary Centre and, in reply for the government, the President of the Treasury Board, (Mr. Johnston) dealt briefly with the history of the points of order relating to what the estimates should contain.

This history shows that during the past ten years, members have objected that in one way or another the estimates that have been submitted from time to time by the government have attempted to do more than set out the spending requirements of the government for the next fiscal year. This is of course supposed to be the acknowledged purpose of estimates and appropriation acts.

In 1971 the Chair ruled that items in the estimates that attempt to amend existing statutes are out of order. This was confirmed by most subsequent rulings.

In 1974 and 1976 the Chair went further and dealt with the question of matters of substance being put in the estimates. The Speaker, in effect, ruled that the Appropriation Act is not the place to seek authority to do something such as to establish a program. Rather, the Appropriation Act should only seek authority to spend the money for a program that has been previously authorized by a statute.

In 1977 the Chair continued to lay down these principles that should be followed in the use of the estimates and added that it makes no difference whether the item attempted to spend a large sum or simply one dollar. The distinction is unimportant. The test is whether or not the government is putting forward a spending estimate under authority it already possesses, or whether it is really seeking new legislative authority to do something.

In March of that year the Speaker said:

> The government receives from Parliament the authority to act through the passage of legislation and receives the money to finance such authorized action through the passage by Parliament of an appropriation act. A supply item in my opinion ought not, therefore, to be used to obtain authority which is the proper subject of legislation;—

In other words, the government may not by the use of an Appropriation Act obtain authority that it does not have under existing legislation.

The then Speaker summed it up in this way in December, 1977:

> Supply ought to be confined strictly to the process for which it was intended; that is to say, for the purpose of putting forward by the government the estimate of money it needs, and then in turn voting by the House of that money to the government, and not to be extended in any way into the legislative area, because legislation and legislated changes in substance are not intended to be part of supply, but rather ought to be part of the legislative process in the regular way which requires three readings, committee stage, and, in other words, ample opportunity for Members to participate in debate and amendment.

Finally, it seems clear that it is in order to extend the purposes of an item in an Appropriation Act by means of an item in the estimates provided that it does not amend any other legislation.

● (1210)

The hon. member for Calgary Centre objects to 12 items contained in the main estimates. Of the 12, Agriculture vote 30, Department of Public Works vote L-70, Supply and Services vote 5, and Transport vote 110 each mention specific legislation which they seek to amend, and are clearly out of order on the basis of the principle established in 1971 and repeated continually in all of the rulings from the Chair since that time; that is, estimates which attempt to amend existing legislation are out of order.

The hon. member for Calgary Centre then objects to Energy, Mines and Resources votes 35, 40 and 45. An examination of these items clearly shows that they seek both to establish a new program in the absence of other legislative authority and the funds to put it into operation. This runs counter to the rulings of the Chair since 1974, which hold legislation is required to authorize new programs, particularly matters of major substance. That we are dealing here with matters of substance is demonstrated by the fact that vote 45 seeks even to grant to the governor in council the power to pass regulations. By definition, the estimates seek spending authority alone; they are not intended to ask for substantial authority, such as to pass regulations.

Accordingly, consistent with earlier rulings, Energy, Mines and Resources votes 35, 40 and 45 are out of order. I note that in his remarks last June 1, the President of the Treasury Board confirmed this view when he addressed the question of the receivability of these items by saying, "Of course, legislation will be introduced with respect to those programs". By asking for money now, he would be putting the cart before the horse.

The next items objected to are External Affairs votes L45, L50, L55 and L60, and Finance vote L15. They are grouped together because each of them seeks authority to finance international development by the use of issuing demand notes to the credit of the various named banks or institutions upon which they may draw in the Bank of Canada, or to purchase shares in the listed banks. The hon. member for Calgary Centre suggests that these items are an attempt to grant to the government authority to undertake certain actions rather than simply asking for funds, and that they also contravene the provisions of Section 80 of the Financial Administration Act, which states that the Crown cannot assign its debts without legislative authority.

While I suggest that these items do not seek, for the Crown, the right to assign its debts, three of them, nevertheless, seek to grant authority for the government to take certain action, and on a very substantial scale. This is, of course, contrary to the previous rulings of the Chair mentioned earlier, which stated that legislation and legislative changes in substance are not intended to be part of supply.

However, two of the items, External Affairs votes L50 and L55, have previous statutory authority, albeit previous Appropriation Acts, and thus are in order. With respect to the three other votes, that is, External Affairs votes L45 and L60 and Finance vote L15, they have no statutory foundation and are legislative items. Again, following the principles enunciated in previous rulings of the Chair, votes L45 and L60 of External Affairs and vote L15, Finance, must be ruled out of order.

That these items are really legislative items which deal with matters of substance is confirmed in the Blue Book. There is shown, on the same page which contains these items, an amount to be paid as a statutory item, and the statute referred to is the very programs for which approval is being sought. In other words, if vote L60, which includes the initial subscription for shares in a bank, were to be passed this year, next year the second instalment would be shown as a statutory matter, and the program consisting of the remaining instalments for shares in the international bank would be shown as a votable item.

As I said earlier, the programs described by External Affairs votes L50 and L55 are authorized by previous Appropriation Acts, and therefore the moneys sought for the instalment to be paid are in order.

I notice that on March 25 of this year, when the House dealt with a point of order in respect of similar items by the hon. member, I ended my ruling on the note that they should be raised at some future date, and I would have to be convinced that these similar matters are not really legislative items that should be introduced by separate statute. It seems that that time has come, and I am not convinced. It is certainly apparent to me that if complicated votes such as these and, for that matter, if all votes included a reference to the statutory authority on which they are based, it would be easier to determine whether or not they were in order.

While the significance of such a ruling is not lost, as was said on March 22, 1977, the function of the Chair is to ensure that what Parliament attempts to do is procedurally correct. Furthermore, the Chair is comforted by the fact that the President of the Treasury Board said on June 1 last, in reply to the point of order at issue here, that legislation will be introduced with respect to these programs, referring to the programs for insulation and conversion from oil to gas.

While the hon. member for Calgary Centre may be correct in his suspicion that there are other votes in the estimates which are out of order, it is not the role of the Speaker to act on her own initiative in such procedural questions.

Finally, while in the past, including the Chair's ruling earlier this year, time constraints may have dictated a certain course of action, this is not the case here. The hon. member for Calgary Centre raised his point well in time, and long before the day when the House will actually deal with their adoption in the bill based thereon.

Accordingly, I must now find that Agriculture vote 30, Public Works vote L70, Supply and Services vote 5, Transport vote 110, Energy, Mines and Resources votes 35, 40 and 45, External Affairs votes L45 and L60 and Finance vote L15, as contained in the main estimates 1981-82, are not properly before the House, and they are thereby ordered to be deleted therefrom.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

MR. DARLING—REINSTATEMENT OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Madam Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has laid upon the table the fifty-first report of the Clerk of Petitions stating that he has examined the petition presented by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling) and finds that it meets the requirements of the Standing Orders as to form.

PRIVILEGE

MR. FLIS—THE PHILIPPINES—RECOGNITION OF NATIONAL DAY

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Madam Speaker, my question of privilege is twofold. For two days now, I have been trying to obtain the floor to put a motion recognizing the valuable contribution that the Philippino people have made to the growth of Canada; because as the House knows, today, June 12, marks the national day of the Philippinos.

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. member sent me an advance copy of the motion which he wanted to put under Standing Order 43 today. He was not obliged to send me a copy of his motion, but since he did, I read it. The hon. member knows, of course, that Standing Order 43 deals with matters of urgent and pressing necessity. Matters must be urgent and pressing to be put in the House. I would not have been able to put it to the House because it is not a legitimate type of motion under Standing Order 43. Therefore, knowing what his motion was about, I did not recognize him.

I do have to tell the hon. member that he has been in the habit of putting several motions of this nature to the House on the occasion of national days. While that is extremely commendable and there are a lot of wonderful things we would like to do in the House, our rules are set in order to ensure that only matters which should, in fact, be dealt with in the House are dealt with, and again, at certain times.

Therefore, I would ask the hon. member, indeed all hon. members—because the hon. member for Parkdale-High Park (Mr. Flis) is not the only one who uses Standing Order 43 to congratulate someone—to co-operate with the Chair and not attempt to put to the House under Standing Order 43 motions to congratulate certain people.

Mr. Flis: Madam Speaker, I would not have raised the question of privilege if precedent was not set in this House. But—

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. member is commenting on a ruling which I have just made. I am sure that he accepts the terms of the ruling. I know he is not happy with it. I know he would have liked to mention the national day of The Philippines, but I simply cannot accept that.

MR. WENMAN—DEFINITION OF SUPPLEMENTARY QUESTION

Mr. Robert Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Madam Speaker, my question of privilege is both a question of privilege and a point of order. I find my ability to—

Madam Speaker: Order. It cannot be both. The hon. member will have to make up his mind.

Mr. Wenman: I am bringing it forward specifically as a question of privilege, and there are other elements which Your Honour may want to consider in another format later.

At any rate, I find that my capacity as a member of Parliament has been inhibited due to Your Honour's interpretations of the rules and procedures of this House. I refer specifically to supplementary questions. I feel my privilege has been disrupted. On several days I had questions prepared which fitted in with other supplementary questions that had been asked. Under a previous Speaker in a previous House, my privilege was further extended. First, there was a direct definition of what is a supplementary question. I would ask that that definition be restated by the Speaker as it relates to second supplementary questions of members and also supplementary questions to questions asked initially by other members. Fewer questions are being asked in the House because those who are recognized automatically ask two questions each. As well, when a supplementary question is called, the second supplementary is not being recognized. This has happened on three or four occasions.

• (1220)

Could Your Honour tell me what the procedure is as it relates to the previous House and also advise me of your interpretation?

Madam Speaker: First of all, the hon. member does not have a question of privilege. Through a question of privilege, hon. members cannot raise the fact that they have not been recognized in the House. I think I have described the policy and the interpretation which the Speaker makes in the conduct of question period.

The hon. member invites me to define what is a supplementary question. I am not sure he would gain if I were to be so brave as to attempt to define a supplementary question. I think the spirit of it is that the question ought to be supplementary, that is to say, a follow up on whatever answer a minister has given in the House. If I were to follow that procedure very rigidly, I think I would have to rule out many supplementary questions. Sometimes a new question is asked dealing with new subjects.

I think we are governed by custom. When the rules are not too precise, the custom has been that when a member is recognized he is usually granted a question and what we call a supplementary. In other words, a member has two questions. He has a chance to follow up on whatever has been given as an answer in the House.

The hon. member is complaining that he has not been recognized sufficiently often.

Mr. Wenman: No, Madam Speaker, I am not.

Madam Speaker: I am delighted to hear that. That is very rare!

I just want to tell hon. members that in an attempt to be as fair as I possibly can, I do have a cumulative list. It used to be for a few days back; now I keep a cumulative list of members who rise in the House during question period. As days go on, their names are struck off when I recognize them.

Today I had quite a number of members who happened to be on the cumulative list but were not in the House. I will try to put them on the list for another day. Members know that I do extend the question period slightly on Fridays to give people a chance to be involved in the question period. I would counsel hon. members to be in the House on Fridays if they are really eager to take part in question period.

That is the policy and that is the interpretation. I do not think I have departed from what my predecessors did. I am, however, having a great deal of trouble with the length of questions. I used to have as many as ten Conservative members asking questions during the question period. I am now down to recognizing seven or eight members. I say I am down; I should say the Conservatives are down. I say "I" because I am concerned that they all be included. This cannot be done every day. I have noticed in the last two or three weeks that I am down to recognizing seven or eight members. I regret that, but I have a time restriction and I have to permit members of the New Democratic Party to ask questions. They cannot be down to two questions a day. That would be impossible, taking into account the proportion of New Democratic Party members in this House. If members asked shorter questions, I do not think they would lose much and other members would then gain additional opportunities to be recognized during the question period.

MR. McKINNON—MOVE OF RCMP HEADQUARTERS "E" DIVISION

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, once again I am in the position where a member with a question of privilege is expected to apprise the Speaker of it at the earliest possible moment and at the same time prepare the case to support his contention that he has a question of privilege. The time constraints in that regard are very difficult indeed.

My question of privilege today has to do with a House order that was passed requiring the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) to supply all the papers, documents and reports concerning the RCMP move from Victoria to Vancouver. This House order was passed on June 3. Last night I received my copy of it. It in no way complies with the House order.

I am sure you will realize how serious this question of privilege is, and I would ask you to extend to me the courtesy of additional time to prepare precedents and evidence to support my question of privilege.

Madam Speaker: I will look into the matter and take it under advisement.

POINT OF ORDER

MISS NICHOLSON—APPORTIONMENT OF TIME IN QUESTION PERIOD

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Madam Speaker, I rise on a brief point of order. I listened with great interest to Your Honour's explanation of the way in which question period is managed to give equity to members. I noticed Your Honour mentioned a desirable number of questions for each of the opposition parties.

May I express my hope that when we are considering reform of the rules of the House we may have some discussion in the House, and perhaps at that time Your Honour might consider the advisability of increasing the number of questions available to supporters of the government. One could perhaps make a case that our constituents have an interest in seeing us raise matters of public policy in the House as well as in caucus.

Madam Speaker: I do not think that matter is the object of a rule. It is a decision which the Speaker makes on her own. I will agree with the hon. member that the government side has not been particularly spoiled with opportunities to ask questions because of the constraints I have which were described earlier. I have not given the government side the numbers which legitimately, I suppose, it could expect.

Hon. members from the government side realize that the government does have an excellent opportunity to express itself through the ministers who answer questions, a procedure which does take a lot of question period time. That is why backbenchers on the government side are not recognized as often as they would desire, That, too, is a matter of custom. Also the custom is that members on the government side do not get the privilege of a supplementary question.

I am in the hands of the House leaders, if they want to discuss this matter among themselves. I know how to establish the proportion that members on the opposition side should have in the Question Period, but I must say it is much more difficult to establish the proportion that should be given to the government side. I have looked at precedents and I have been guided by them. However, I am willing to discuss this question with the House leaders.

AGRICULTURAL CHEMICALS—METRIC CONVERSION

Question No. 2,106—Mr. McKnight:

1. Was there a change in the labelling of farm chemicals from per acre measurement to hectare measurement and, if so (a) under what authority (b) on what date (c) for what reason?

2. Did the Metric Commission receive briefs requesting that the labelling of agricultural chemicals be in hectares rather than in acres and, if so, from which organizations and industries?

3. Does the chemical industry have to comply with the hectare changeover requirement and, if so (a) since what date (b) what is the penalty for non-compliances?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council):

I am informed by the Departments of Agriculture and Industry, Trade and Commerce as follows: 1. Yes.

(a) Under the authority of regulations under the Pest Control Products Act administered by Agriculture Canada.

(b) Effective from January 1, 1981, labels and instructions for those products governed by PCP regulation are required to show metric units only.

(c) In accordance with the recommendation made by the agricultural chemicals industry in Canada, in support of Canada's conversion to the metric system of measurements to achieve the policy goal stated in the 1970 White Paper on Metric Conversion in Canada, that " . . . a single, coherent measurement system based on metric units should come to be used for all measurement purposes required under legislation, and generally be accepted for all measurement purposes".

2. In order to achieve the policy goal of Canada's metric conversion, Metric Commission Canada established a structure of steering and sector committees, covering all sectors of the economy, with representatives of industries, businesses, labour, consumers, education and appropriate government departments and agencies. As part of this structure, the Canadian Agricultural Chemicals Association has been participating in the sector committee for chemicals and chemical products, which is responsible for the investigation, planning, scheduling and implementation of metric conversion in its area of interest. The Canadian Agricultural Chemicals Association has also been operating its own metric conversion committee, which has been feeding the association's input to the metric conversion plan developed by the sector committee. At its fifth meeting on March 21, 1974, the sector committee adopted the National Standard of Canada—Canadian Metric Practice Guide as the governing document for metric units to be used by the industry. At the eighth meeting of the sector committee on November 21, 1974, in discussing the development of a sector plan for metric conversion, the representative of the Canadian Agricultural Chemicals Association stated that his industry would find metric conversion advantageous, resulting in a standardization of containers. These decisions are reflected in the metric conversion plan prepared by the sector committee and approved for publication by Metric Commission Canada on October 26, 1976.

In May, 1976, the Canadian Agricultural Chemicals Association through its metric conversion committee published a recommended list of units and container sizes to replace imperial units and sizes. In April, 1979, the association published an expanded Metric Practice Guide for the Canadian pesticides industry. The adoption of metric units meant that acres were replaced by hectares.

Recognizing that agricultural chemicals are controlled by government regulations pertaining to their sale and usage, that industry has been in continual consultation with Agriculture Canada with respect to the timing of metric conversion and also the usage instructions in metric units. In April, 1977, the Canadian Agricultural Chemicals Association wrote to Agriculture Canada requesting them to "arrange for a change in the measurements used in the Pest Control Products Act from the present system to SI units." On October 3, 1977, the association wrote again to Agriculture Canada on the matter of hectare versus acre and noted that "a system using part SI and part non-metric would . . . create a state of confusion and introduce the possibility of greater errors . . ."

At its eighteenth meeting on September 13, 1977, the sector committee on Chemicals and Chemical Products went on record as unanimously adopting the hectare for land measurement.

3. Yes (a) January, 1981. (b) Prosecution under the Pest Control Products Act.

CBOT NATIONAL NEWS COVERAGE

Question No. 2,218—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Are any steps planned by CBC to improve the calibre and to increase the scope of national news coverage by CBOT TV in Ottawa and, if so, what are they?

2. Is the viewing audience for the 6 p.m. CBOT newscast below that for the 6 p.m. CJOH newscast and, if so, by what amount?

3. Does CBC channel 4 carry as much (a) national and parliamentary (b) regional news as CTV channel 13 and, if not, for what reason?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications):

I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1. The CBC considers that the calibre and scope of CBOT's national news coverage is already excellent. "The National" at 11 p.m. daily provides CBOT and other CBC network stations with thorough and complete coverage of national news. The full resources of the CBC's national news department are available for such CBOT local news programs as "Newsday", which receives national and other news items fed from the network. In addition, wide national news coverage is provided by the programs named below in the answer to part 3. All CBC stations constantly strive to improve their productions as staff and funds permit, and CBOT is no exception.

2. See reply to question No. 1,968 answered April 2, 1981.

3. CBOT carries local, regional, national and international news as follows:

"Newsday"	Monday to Friday	18 h—19 h
"The National"	Daily	23 h—23 h 25 (weekends 23 h—23 h 15)
"Newsday Final"	Daily	23 h 25—23 h 35 (weekends 23 h 15—23 h 25)
"CBC Saturday Evening News"	Saturday	18 h—18 h 30
"CBC Sunday Evening News"	Sunday	17 h—17 h 20

The above programs also feature government and parliamentary news items, and these areas are also covered in whole or in part by the following programs:

"This Week in Parliament"	Sunday 17h20—18h
"CBC Newsmagazine"	Monday 22h—22h30
"The Watson Report"	Monday 22h30—23h

Parliamentary news is sometimes included in other programs, such as "Take 30" and "The Fifth Estate".

Because the number of such items on television stations can vary from program to program, week to week and season to season, no valid comparison between stations can be made.

CBC—NEWSCASTERS STYLE

Question No. 2,244—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Does CBC require as a matter of policy a stereotyped style on the part of their newscasters?

2. Does CBC stipulate the use of the news style used by former CBOT anchorman Ab Douglas in preference to the style used by Max Keeping of CTV's Ottawa outlet?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications):

I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1 and 2. No. There are, however, a number of general requirements, as there are for any position, as well as some with specific reference to TV newscasting, such as knowledge of speech techniques and good on-air presence.

TRIDENT AIRCRAFT LIMITED

Question No. 2,427—Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich):

1. (a) During the fiscal years 1979-80 and 1980-81, what amount of public funds was advanced to the Trident Aircraft Co. of Sidney, British Columbia and for what purpose (b) what amount is to be advanced during the fiscal year 1981-82 and for what purpose?

2. (a) Is Mr. Derek Lock still attached to the Trident Aircraft Co. (b) did he re-enter the Public Service and, if so, in what capacity and in which department?

3. Does the government have any commitments to the Trident Aircraft Co. and, if so, what are they?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council):

I am informed by the Departments of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Regional Economic Expansion as follows:

1. (a) Public funds in the form of a repayable contribution were advanced by IT&C to Trident Aircraft Limited as follows:

Fiscal year 1979/80	$1,300,000.
Fiscal year 1980/81	$2,700,000.

The repayable contribution was to assist in the re-structuring of the company to enable the completion and production start-up of the Trigull amphibian aircraft.

(b) IT&C has not planned to advance any funds to Trident Aircraft Limited for 1981/82.

2. (a) Mr. Derek Lock is no longer with Trident Aircraft Limited and has left the Public Service.

(b) Not applicable.

3. Under the Canada-British Columbia Industrial Development Subsidiary Agreement, DREE has agreed to cost share with the province a low interest loan in the amount of $2.9 million to the British Columbia Development Corporation (BCDC) to finance the construction of 110,000 square feet of manufacturing space for Trident Aircraft Ltd. at the Victoria International Airport. This loan to BCDC, which will build the space for Trident on a lease-back basis, has as one of its conditions, the requirement that Trident must have all its financing in place before any disbursement will be made on the loan. As this condition has not been met, no DREE funds have been disbursed to date under the terms of the agreement with BCDC for the Trident facility, and in view of the cessation of Trident, it is not anticipated that any money will be disbursed in the future.

EXPORT DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION—INSURANCE CLAIMS

Question No. 2,454—Mr. Herbert:

1. In each of the past five years, how many insurance claims were paid by the Export Development Corporation and what was the total paid in each year?

2. How many of the claims originated in the United States and, in each year, what were the claims as a percentage of the total amount paid?

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of State (Trade)):

In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned, Export Development Corporation states that:

1.

Year	Number	Total Amount Paid ($ thousands)
1976	95	$ 2,295
1977	93	3,047
1978	104	6,657

1980	109	10,382

Year	Number	Per cent of Total Amount Paid
1976	34	15.0%
1977	20	5.0%
1978	27	1.9%

Mr. Collenette: I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Is it the pleasure of the House that the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

PROHIBITION OF INTERNATIONAL AIR SERVICES ACT

MEASURE TO REGULATE CERTAIN ASPECTS OF AIR TRANSPORT

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved that Bill S-7, to provide for the prohibition of certain international air services, be read the second time and, by unanimous consent, referred to a Committee of the Whole.

He said: Madam Speaker, the objective of the bill before us is to implement in a concrete and practical way the government's commitment to combat aerial hijacking, a particularly prevalent form of international terrorism. The bill is a direct result of the Declaration on Hijacking made at the Bonn summit in July, 1978. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was personally instrumental in the final formulation of the text of that important declaration, which was jointly issued by the seven heads of state and government of the Federal Republic of Germany, France, Italy, Japan, the United Kingdom, the United States and Canada. The text is not long, but to save time I will not read it.

The obligation to extradite or prosecute hijackers has a firm basis in international law. It is, for example, an essential operative provision in the 1970 Hague Convention for the Suppression of the Unlawful Seizure of Aircraft, to which Canada and over 100 other states are parties. However, the difficulty the international community faces in combatting hijacking, and indeed various other forms of terrorism, is not the absence of international agreements defining offences and setting out appropriate penalties. The difficulty is, rather, the reluctance of governments to face up to their obligations when it comes to taking appropriate legal action against alleged offenders. Indeed, as recent events bear witness, some governments, for political reasons even condone, if not openly support, the activities of the wrongdoers.

It is this kind of culpability or attitude on the part of governments that the declaration is directed against. The severing of air links with the offending state, or defaulting state, to use the language of the bill, is intended to act as a kind of sanction to induce compliance with international obligations. In addition, the severing of air links can be seen, in appropriate circumstances, as a gesture whereby Canada dissociates itself from governments which are not prepared to take all necessary steps to deal with terrorists.

Clause 3 of the bill provides for determination of default by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Such determination would be the result of close consultation with the other six governments which would each be monitoring and assessing the follow-up to any given hijacking incident. This activity would be undertaken primarily by the embassies of the seven governments in the country or countries involved in the hijacking. Based on the advice of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Transport, the governor in council would then be in a position to determine what prohibitive action, if any, is appropriate in the circumstances. Hon. members will see in Clause 3(1) of the bill the range of possibilities that are open in this regard. In exceptionally serious cases it is conceivable that all six prohibitions would be invoked.

The bill also provides for amendment or repeal of an order of prohibition as well as for penalties for air carriers which fail to comply with the order.

The government considers it desirable to enact specific legislation for implementation of the Bonn declaration even though existing powers would permit some measures of the kind of action required by the declaration. Because of the often fast-moving and unpredictable nature of hijacking incidents, the government should have available a procedure that is clearly established in advance and can be implemented on short notice.

As hon. members will see, the bill is brief and uncomplicated. It provides for drastic measures, but we believe that in situations which often involve loss of life and the taking of innocent hostages, drastic measures are called for.

The essential element to be considered here is the obligation to extradite or prosecute hijackers. We are convinced that unless governments act resolutely to deal with hijackers, such incidents of terrorism will increase. We also believe that terrorists would largely be ineffective were it not for the support or acquiescence of some governments, achieved by intimidation. The Bonn declaration has put the world on notice that the Government of Canada, and the six other governments involved, will not stand idly by while international law is flouted and terrorism condoned and encouraged.

Passage of this bill will ensure that Canada is in a position to comply fully with the terms of the Bonn declaration. The forthcoming Ottawa summit will again provide an opportunity for the seven governments to reaffirm their commitment to combatting terrorism. It is noteworthy, I believe, that the previous government in effect confirmed a decision already taken by the former Liberal government that special legislation should be enacted to implement the declaration. This is therefore not a partisan issue.

The efforts of Canada alone are not enough to resolve this problem, but if all governments were to act in the same spirit, the situation would be greatly improved.

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to lend my party's support to the implementation of Bill S-7. It is a bill that addresses only one part of a greater, over-all evil that has left no nation in the world untouched. The evil to which I refer is that of international terrorism.

The philosophy of violence that is a trademark of terrorists and their organizations has been, and continues to be, repugnant to any nation which adheres to a civilized, democratic and law-abiding way of life and equally towards peaceful co-existence. Terrorism, however, is not a new phenomenon to any country. There are many types and examples of terrorism that one could cite from history, but they pale into insignificance when compared to the nature or style of today's international terrorism.

It is a phenomenon that knows no borders, respects no laws—be they domestic or international—and is marked by indiscriminate targetting, the senseless loss of lives and a total lack of morality.

Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, terrorism is a sign of our times, for we live in a world riddled with strife and violence, caused in part by political, cultural, economic and religious division. Because of these facts, it is vital to world security that the international community resists terrorism in a unified and effective approach.

• (1240)

The subject matter of Bill S-7 deals with the unlawful seizure of an aircraft and its passengers, a criminal act more commonly known as "hijacking". Hijacking acts have been committed by a variety of terrorist groups or individuals. No member in this House needs reminding that in such hijackings violence is always used and, tragically, has often resulted in the taking of innocent lives.

As the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) has said, Bill S-7 owes its existence to the declaration on hijacking adopted at the Bonn summit. On January 17, 1978, the seven nations participating in that Bonn summit issued a declaration which became known as the "Bonn Declaration on Hijacking". That Bonn declaration was reaffirmed at the Tokyo economic summit in June, 1979.

This declaration highlighted a problem that has confronted nations who are attempting to combat terrorism in all its forms. The problem is that certain nations which have been designated by hijackers as their final destination have in the past failed or refused to prosecute or extradite the hijackers and, in some cases, have welcomed them as heroes.

With this rather distressing conduct of certain nations the ensuing problem has been that those countries committed to combatting terrorism have been consistently frustrated and hamstrung by the action of these nations in their refusal to co-operate, refusing to abide by the principles of international law or any civilized domestic code of law.

These actions do not offer much hope for some form of peaceful global co-existence. These actions only cultivate frustration, mistrust and a sense of futility. How can law-abiding nations hope to combat terrorism effectively when the offenders know full well that they will not face prosecution or extradition by certain states? It is imperative that these criminals be given notice that they will find no safe haven throughout the world and will ultimately face full and just punishment for their criminal activities.

There is a serious responsibility placed on the nations which believe in this goal of deterring terrorism not only to support international declarations such as the ones adopted at The Hague, Montreal and Bonn, but in addition to bolster them with domestic legislation having a specific aim toward pressuring other nations into punishing terrorists who unlawfully seize aircraft, threaten innocent crew members and passengers and sometimes murder them. Bill S-7 will serve, hopefully, as a notice to those who support terrorism that Canada intends to honour its international commitments.

As stated before, the campaign against terrorism by all law-abiding nations must be founded on both a collective and individual desire to attain that goal. I believe quite sincerely, Mr. Speaker, that the debate on this piece of legislation should transcend partisan politics because passage of this bill is crucial to Canada's international reputation.

Adoption of specific legislation such as Bill S-7 will undoubtedly give clear authority to the government and, of course, greater certainty when dealing with hijacking incidents. In the case where a hijacking occurs and Canada finds a state in default of the legislation, Bill S-7 will enable the government to respond and act with greater speed. Needless to say, Sir, action and, to a lesser degree, speed are two important elements required to give this commitment credibility and effectiveness.

I would like to say that the passage of such legislation is long overdue. Admittedly, the frequency or rate of hijackings has decreased somewhat, but now is not the time for nations to become apathetic or lethargic in their efforts toward deterring terrorism or, in this case, hijacking.

Terrorism, unfortunately, will continue to be practised by a number of misguided individuals, organizations and states. It is our duty and responsibility now to stand up and be counted among those in the world who are opposed to such evil practices. It must be made clear to terrorists that no state will entertain any demands, that terrorists' acts will be universally condemned, and in the end offenders will be brought to justice. This legislation is a move in that direction.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am happy on this occasion to join with the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) and the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) in making this a piece of legislation which we are dealing with on a non-partisan basis and which we all support.

The spokesmen for my party who deal with external affairs and with air transport in particular have studied the bill very carefully. We have dealt with it in the New Democratic Party caucus and I am authorized on behalf of my party to say that we are quite prepared today to give this bill its second reading and to deal with it in Committee of the Whole, and also give it third reading.

We support the statements which have been made by the minister and by the previous speaker regarding the concern we feel and must feel about terrorism, about increasing violence in the world. We are glad that the seven nations that meet in summit conferences reached the agreement set out in the Bonn communiqué, and we are glad we now have before us a piece of legislation that will implement that communiqué.

Since what the three of us are saying is that we are prepared to support this bill, there really is no need to spin out the debate. But it did occur to me that since all of us have been referring to the Bonn communiqué of July 17, 1978, and since it is rather short, it might be useful to have its actual words in the pages of Hansard. As I say, it is the one issued by the seven nations at the summit conference in Bonn on July 17, 1978, and it is as follows:

> The Heads of State and Government, concerned about terrorism and the taking of hostages, declare that their Governments will intensify their joint efforts to combat international terrorism. To this end, in cases where a country refuses extradition or prosecution of those who have hijacked an aircraft and/or do not return such aircraft, the Heads of State and Government are jointly resolved that their Governments shall take immediate action to cease all flights to that country. At the same time, their Governments will initiate action to halt all incoming flights from that country or from any country by the airlines of the country concerned.

I like the last sentence:

> They urge other governments to join them in this commitment.

What we have before us now is a bill to provide Canada's implementation of that commitment, and I want to say to the Secretary of State for External Affairs that I welcome the suggestion that we should have appropriate legislation on the books so that if any action is necessary there will be legislative authority for the appropriate order in council which might have to be issued.

We welcome the introduction of this legislation by this government, the same legislation the last government was ready to introduce, and I think I can say that the House is prepared to pass it through all stages before we rise for lunch.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Francis in the Chair.

Clauses 2, 3 and 4 agreed to.

On Clause 5—Offence.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, before Clause 5 carries I should like to invite the minister to make a comment on it. It is the clause which provides for a penalty of $25,000. It does not say whether that is a total penalty, or $25,000 per day, or what have you. Some of my colleagues who have studied this bill felt at one point that it would be desirable to raise the amount of that fine. They had discussions with the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I wonder if the minister could give the reason, in the case of such a serious offence, the penalty is so low.

Mr. MacGuigan: Mr. Chairman, the matter which is now raised by the hon. member was discussed in the other place and there, with our concurrence, the fine was raised from $10,000 to $25,000. It is our interpretation that this applies to each day on each offence; that, as I said in my address, in exceptionally serious cases it is conceivable that all six prohibitions could be invoked; and that there could be a number of offences committed simultaneously, each of which for each day would trigger a fine of $25,000.

The reason for not going above that figure is not to spare the perpetrators of any acts under this legislation, but to keep it at the level of an offence punishable on summary conviction in order to simplify the procedures. I had mentioned that we do have some legislative measures already in effect which could enable us to take such action, but they are more cumbersome, and one of the principal purposes of this legislation, as I said in my address, is that the government must have a procedure which can be implemented on short notice. The expeditious procedures here are able to be taken, in part because we do not go above $25,000, which would involve us in an indictable offence and more complicated procedures.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR ACT

REMOVAL OF REQUIREMENT TO PUBLISH LABOUR GAZETTE

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour) moved that Bill S-4, to amend the Department of Labour Act, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I understand there would be agreement on all sides to move the motion for third reading now. The minister would then call it one o'clock and speak at two o'clock when we resume.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: By leave, now.

Mr. Regan moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in standing to speak at the third reading stage of this bill the most appropriate thing I could do at this moment would be to ask if I may call it one o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 2 p.m.

At 12.57 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. When the House arose at one o'clock p.m., the Minister of Labour (Mr. Regan) had been given the floor.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if you might ask the House for unanimous consent to allow the minister to speak a second or third time if we have any questions to ask as a result of his speech on third reading.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The minister is proposing third reading and the House would have to give unanimous consent for the Chair to recognize the Minister of Labour for another round.

Mr. Collenette: Well, Mr. Speaker, it is a most unusual request. If there could be some guarantee that there would be just one question from the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton), perhaps we could facilitate him.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): The reason for asking the question is that we went through the procedures pretty fast at five minutes to one and I had expected the minister would say a few words on third reading. From that speech I could then decide whether or not I was going to ask any questions. My point is that I understand the minister cannot speak more than once on third reading, so I am asking for unanimous consent to have him answer any questions we have.

Mr. Knowles: I was going to suggest, Mr. Speaker, that, as is sometimes said, when the minister finishes the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) might ask a question or two before the minister sits down.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Provided the same privilege is extended to other members.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I think there is no problem in accommodating one member who perhaps was not at the committee when this matter was discussed. But if we are now suggesting a protracted question period where everyone has the right to question the minister on third reading, I think that would be a little too much to ask.

We are quite willing to accommodate a question by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain, who might not have been here earlier or who might not have attended the committee meetings; but I think the suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, that the hon. member might want to ask a question and the minister might want to answer, is a frequent practice. However, to extend that rule to all members when we have other business to discuss would, I think, be a little too much to ask.

Mr. Hawkes: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I would just like to understand the commitment from the parliamentary secretary. Those who were not at committee and did not have—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There appears to be agreement that the Minister of Labour has the floor. At the end of his speech he would entertain a question from the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain.

Mr. Regan: Mr. Speaker, at one o'clock I had indicated that I was rising to speak on third reading of Bill S-4, an act to amend the Department of Labour Act of 1900. In doing so, may I say that I am pleased and a little surprised to see that there might be sufficient interest in a bill which is relatively narrow in its scope as to generate some questions. We will deal with those matters as they arise, perhaps at the end of my remarks.

• (1410)

I imagine the large majority of the members of the House are familiar with the objective of this amendment which, in effect, would eliminate the legal requirement for the Department of Labour to publish the Labour Gazette and its companion La Gazette du Travail. I also suppose that hon. members may recall that this enabling legislation was originally placed before the House in December of 1978 and again reintroduced in October of 1979. Finally, second reading was last June 6. In effect, the bill was introduced by the former Liberal Government and died with the dissolution of that Parliament.

It was then introduced by the Conservative government. When that government ceased to exist, since the bill had not made its way through the House we introduced it once again and it is before the House today for third reading.

Perhaps it is necessary for me to provide a brief history, since some hon. members are perhaps not familiar with the earlier deliberations on this bill or the history of the Labour Gazette. The statutory requirement that the Labour Gazette be published monthly by the Department of Labour goes back to 1900 when the Department of Labour really came into existence with a piece of legislation which also provided the statutory requirement that this publication occur monthly.

Prior to 1900 almost all of the labour law in the country was provincial. It was limited and it certainly lacked greatly in uniformity. One could say that from the time that the first federal legislation in the labour field was passed in 1900 the federal legislation was adopted by a variety of governments and used as a showpiece, if you like, as a way for the provinces to follow. This resulted in a general pattern of uniformity of legislation evolving in the succeeding years.

It is interesting to note that the first editor of the Labour Gazette was a young man by the name of William Lyon Mackenzie King. He had prepared a report on the state of working conditions and other matters which related to labour in the country. His report was prepared in 1898 for the then postmaster general, Mr. Mulock. Subsequently, when the postmaster general brought forth the legislation in 1900 he enticed Mackenzie King to become the first editor of the Labour Gazette and, in effect, also the first deputy minister of the department, which I believe took place in September of that same year. Thus, this publication which could and would go out of existence with the passage of this legislation actually dates back that far and has had a distinguished first editor.

The Labour Gazette played a key role for many years in relation to the publication of statistics and other facts which relate to industrial relations in the country. I think it made a very substantial contribution to a better understanding among all parties of the actual facts and developments in the labour scene. But times change and, perhaps, the Labour Gazette can best be described as having become a victim of the changing times. Its original need existed as a consequence of an absolute vacuum in relation to publications on subjects of that kind.

With the passing years there were more and more publications relating to labour matters, some of them put out by provincial governments and some by private agencies, and, indeed, others put out by the federal government. I think it is interesting to note that the requirement that the Labour Gazette be published monthly also came to be a bit of rigidity in relation to better serving the interests, because from the point of view of the type of statistics which are useful to management, labour and other people involved in industrial relations, quarterly publications are often more useful than monthly ones.

This rigidity perhaps led to a variety of other publications taking over part of the original role of the Labour Gazette. Toward the end the publication had changed very considerably in its character and had really become a forum for the expression of opinions and trends in relation to the whole subject of industrial relations. That was a useful purpose, but I think the essence of the consideration by the two previous governments, as well as this one, in introducing the legislation to remove the statutory requirement that such a magazine bear such a name, and that it be published monthly, was the cost in relation to recovery. The fee which could be realized by sale was in the vicinity of $7.50 per issue, while the cost of publication amounted to about $60 per issue. One can see that there was a loss of over $50 per copy. A former minister indicated that between 1978 and 1980 the loss would have amounted to something in the vicinity of $400,000 had the publication been continued monthly.

There are two salient points in relation to why the legislation comes forward. First, the place has been taken by a great number of other types of publication, and I will mention some of them briefly later on. Second, the costs in relation to the number of readers and the value of that particular publication has become prohibitive. I might add that today a great deal of the communication of much of the information which formerly appeared in the Labour Gazette is dealt with on a very frequent basis by electronic communication, as well as by the greater use of other forms of communication. This does not mean that the Department of Labour is in any way receding from its responsibility to circulate statistics and other materials with reference to industrial relations.

I would now like to mention the names of a few of the other publications which the Department of Labour puts out. They are: Base Rate Increases, published quarterly and annually; Calendar of Expiring Collective Agreements, which is published annually; Report on Strikes and Lock-Outs in Canada, which is published annually; Wage Rates, Salaries and Hours of Work, published annually; Arbitration Services Reporter, which is published monthly; Labour Standards in Canada, which is published annually; Legislative Review, which is published annually; Collective Bargaining Review, which is published monthly; Wage Developments, published annually; Wage Developments Resulting from Major Collective Bargaining Settlements, published quarterly; Work Stoppages, published monthly; and Working Conditions in the Canadian Industry, published annually. In addition to these publications we have a high level publication entitled The Quality of Working Life, which is becoming more and more important and which is available quarterly upon request.

In addition to all of these publications, Labour Canada is planning a new initiative to replace the Labour Information Bureau which was proposed in Bill C-9. Bill C-9 encountered stiff resistance from the labour movement, especially public sector unions concerned with the proposed bureau's mandate and composition. The new approach, which we believe genuinely acceptable and responsive both to the labour movement and to employer organizations, calls for the establishment of the Industrial Relations Information Service, or IRIS—everything needs to have a name which can be shortened, I guess. IRIS will operate as a service of Labour Canada, providing convenient access to the wealth of public information concerning labour matters which is available from a variety of federal government sources. The primary clientele of IRIS will be active industrial relations practitioners, namely labour and management negotiators, their research support people and third parties, such as mediators and arbitrators. Special legislation is not required for this new service.

I think that that gives some of the background of the history of this bill and of the Labour Gazette, the interrupted efforts of two previous governments to put this rather slight piece of legislation through the House, and the fact that today we have finally reached third reading of it. Presumably, if this government survives a bit longer than the fate which befell the two previous bills, it will not confront the efforts which I think are generally supported in the House to remove this statutory requirement.

It is, of course, with some sense of history that we recognize that the Labour Gazette, founded by Mackenzie King, in effect, comes to an end after 81 years. However, as I have indicated, this is a consequence of new services, new ways of communicating information and of our changing times.

Finally, I would emphasize that the provision of a forum for independent labour-related opinion still has merit, provided it can be produced at a reasonable cost. It should be noted that the effect of this legislation, while it eliminates the requirement to publish the Labour Gazette and La Gazette du Travail, does not prevent introduction of periodicals under the same or similar title if circumstances justify such action. The bill then, confirms the decision to discontinue these publications.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, the minister's remarks helped clarify, in part, what my concern was earlier on a point of order, namely, I was very curious about the way this bill was drafted. I am not a lawyer and I am not the official labour critic. What I am concerned about is that I see a bill in front of me which was originally passed by the Senate a year ago, on May 8. I can understand that with the elections and all the other problems which would occur, there could be a delay. It was the first occasion we had to get it through. Therefore, I have that history fairly straight. However, when I see certain words like "shall" in that paragraph which makes up this new amendment or new legislation repeated twice, my curiosity is aroused very swiftly. I know the difficulty which exists in getting the word "shall" into legislation. The lawyers of justice fight it like the devil is supposed to fight holy water. However, when I see it twice in one paragraph, my curiosity is aroused.

I gather from the minister's speech that he is saying that the Labour Gazette is being discontinued. The legislation which we have before us says:

> With a view to the dissemination of accurate statistical and other information relating to the conditions of labour, the Minister shall collect—

That means that the minister is ordered by Parliament. He has no choice but to put out these figures. That is straightforward enough. I will forget the other "shall" for a moment. However, what makes the matter very suspicious is the second term of his bill, which says:

> This Act shall be deemed to have come into force on January 1, 1979.

I do not have to be a labour expert at all, probably I do not have to be above the level of a moron, to know that there is something very fishy going on here. What this means to me, although I have no proof, is that they have been collecting these statistics all this time, and this is put in to legitimize by Parliament and give statutory authority to that which has already been done in the last two and one half years. Therefore, these people who have been paid to do this work are now going to have it legitimized by Parliament two and one half years later. When the country is told that we are getting rid of the Labour Gazette, for whatever reason, and the government is now bringing in a bill providing that the department shall do the same thing, and then it is dated back two and one half years, as I said, then all the suspicions of even a moron are raised.

Therefore, my question to the minister, preliminary to my major remarks, is: Is there any correctness to this suspicion that I have that someone is covering up? I think the phrase is "CYA". Are they covering up for the fact that this work has actually been done for the last two and one half years and we must now pay these people legitimately? Is that the reason this bill was made effective two and one half years ago?

Mr. Regan: Mr. Speaker, I thank the very distinguished member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) for his question. As one who served here as a young member with the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain some 18 years ago, and who followed his very distinguished career as a minister of agriculture prior to that, I have to say that I think this is probably one of the very few times in his career, which I have followed with some close interest, in which he has put an improper interpretation upon a situation.

Actually, the department has the full authority to go ahead, to collect, and to publish material, whether Section 4 of the Department of Labour Act exists or not. Indeed, since the former section is in effect until this bill is passed today, until it goes out, it would also provide authority to publish various types of statistics and documents. For many years, the department has carried on a number of different publications in addition to the Labour Gazette.

Section 2 of the bill provides the retroactivity to January 1, 1979, for a very different reason. It is not the reason of making legitimate the collection and publication of materials that I am now directed to do. Rather, it is because of the fact that the former Conservative and former Liberal governments had ceased the publication of the Labour Gazette, feeling that the passage of the bill was imminent. Therefore, this bill, as were former bills, is dated back to that date to legitimize the fact that the Labour Gazette has not been published since that time. The backdating is for the purpose of dealing with the outgoing section, not for the purpose of dealing with the incoming Section 4.

I trust that explains the situation to the hon. member. I can assure him that the drafting of Section 4 in such a way as to have the word "shall" in it at least twice, as the former section had also, is perhaps aimed at assuring any people who had regret upon the passage of the Labour Gazette that the responsibility will still be on the Department of Labour to continue to collect and publish statistics, though not necessarily solely through a labour gazette, and not necessarily on a monthly basis rather than another length of time. That, I trust, is an explanation which meets the concern and constructive comment of the hon. member.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the minister for trying to explain what has aroused my curiosity. Quite frankly, I am still confused, because if all that he said was completely true, why not just make the bill effective June 1 of this year? Then the hon. member would have no problem with suspicions like mine. I will just leave it at that because it is not the main subject I want to speak to.

What struck me about this bill was the double use of the word "shall". I am now informed by the minister that it was in the previous legislation. I presume the second "shall" was not in the previous legislation. It reads:

—shall institute and conduct inquiries into important industrial questions upon which adequate information may not at present be available.

Is that part new? If it is not new, then certainly there has been a lot of laxity in the last 50 years since Mackenzie King was in this chamber. I am simply pointing out that the phrase "shall institute and conduct inquiries into important industrial questions" is a very significant and pregnant type of phrase.

● (1430)

Mr. Regan: It is in the former section.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): In the proposals I shall put forward it is clear, then, that to help the job-creating purpose of the Department of Labour, as opposed to settling disputes, is very important to this country.

This country has suffered terribly this last 50 to 60 years because we have never had any follow through on the work we have done in the various sections of government that would add to the final production, namely, new jobs. Everyone knows and accepts that Canada has what the world needs. Every child from the time he starts school spends his life learning how much Canada has in the form of wealth of all sorts. We always come up against the fact that even though we have it all, we are not doing very much with it in a co-ordinated manner. We call "doing something with it" intelligently by various names. One of the names that we use for it is "industrial strategy".

I have some knowledge of the history of the pre-1914 period. I have a lot more knowledge of the events of the 1920s and 1930s. I might say I have a very intimate knowledge of the events in the 1960s. One complaint Canadians have a right to hold against governments is that they have failed to push through the work done in bits and pieces here and there in government and outside of the government in getting a clear-cut industrial strategy so that the whole world knows where we are going.

One thing that holds this up, which I tie to labour, is the input into final decisions, which never seem to come from governments. Labour needs to know where the opportunities are. Labour should be able to throw its considerable weight, which it has in Canadian public affairs, in the direction of making more jobs for the people they represent.

For example, the Association of Canadian Geographers published a report as a contribution to the centennial year of 1967 which set out the need for Canada to immediately press forward with doing those things which would facilitate four new industrial complexes. These were to be set up in Canada to relieve the pressure on the one complex we do have running along the St. Lawrence to Windsor and Sarnia, which is obviously heating up and getting overcrowded. The cost of living is going up so fast that we are pricing those workers out of jobs.

We have had a series of crises over the last 20 years and we have handled them on an ad hoc basis. That whole area is now paying the price for the lack of a planned decision to shift the emphasis toward developing areas needed for industrial complexes which will spread the load and reduce the growth rate in the overheated area.

I will not quote all of the industrial complexes in this bill, but I want to make it very clear that the people of Ontario and the people of Quebec are suffering terribly by the lack of decision-making over the last 25 or 30 years. This downward trend of the economy in Ontario and the danger to the southwestern part of Ontario at the present time is very great. If we could take the reading of this bill seriously and really believe that a minister of labour would insist that the word "shall" in the legislation means shall, and that the minister could make certain that his department does produce studies on industrial questions, not only would the labour force be served well but we would all be served well.

I know that these things are being done in half a dozen different places in federal departments. I know they are being done at the provincial government level, but as the Resources for the Tomorrow Conference of 1961 showed, there was no driving force to pull it all together to make an industrial strategy.

Every time problems are raised, particularly over the last 20 years, all that government has done about them is to reorganize and set up new departments. More and more departments are set up, and they are all doing the same thing. The more we reorganize, the more the problems grow. Departments are so thoroughly organized in their own fields that they are not co-ordinating their work. We could have much better action if we had a powerful political force behind these positive suggestions from the labour people.

The farmers of Canada have been a little more successful in dealing with governments over the last 50 or 60 years. They have organized their political weight behind some things that were good for their industry and governments have been pretty good at coming along and meeting those needs under pressure. We have never had that type of pressure on growth from the labour side. All we have done for labour is to set up machinery to settle disputes between labour and management and we are now given statistics.

Now we have before us a clause which has been there for 50 or 60 years, according to the minister, which says that they shall institute and conduct inquiries into important industrial questions. Maybe they have diagnosed that industrial questions do not include getting more jobs. But we really need some federal department to use its political clout, such as the Department of Agriculture, to get things done. We will certainly not get action from this group of faceless ministers who do not want to interfere with one another. They are all too frightened to move. They are too fat to fight and too frightened to run.

That is the situation. There is an opportunity here which would make labour a powerful force in this House if it spoke through its minister and threw its weight behind the industrial side, giving it a good chance for more jobs in Canada, not only because we want jobs in Canada but because we can do things cheaper and better. The consumers of the whole world would benefit because they would be able to get more of what they want at a cheaper price.

We have demonstrated this type of success through the steel industry. Canada has led the world in the last 20 years in the production of steel. This can be measured by the wages paid, the quality of production and the final cost. Our cost to produce steel is $100 a tonne cheaper than in the United States. Canada produces steel cheaper than Taiwan, Japan, Western Europe, Singapore and Australia.

We have this great ability to produce better quality goods, to pay higher wages and to do things cheaper than any other country in the world. But we are not doing anything to encourage it. It is an industrial question that labour could take a hand in. It is said as a rule that you cannot sell because things are too costly. That is not true with many of the items we can produce in Canada.

I shall cite another example which is a little more current. The civil servants of the federal government and the civil servants working for the government of Ontario embarked upon an imaginative project some ten years ago to get at this problem of the rising consumption of water, which is the greatest threat to the southern part of Ontario today. They produced technology that would have reduced the consumption of water for domestic purposes by at least 50 per cent and, if they wanted to go the whole road, up to 90 per cent. When that project was nearing successful completion, suddenly the orders came down from Ottawa and that department was squelched and not allowed to go forward with the work it was doing. What I am talking about is no secret. It is the CanWell project.

CanWell was a co-operative venture between what was then Central Mortgage and Housing, research people from the National Research Council and the Ontario Research Foundation. When I asked the minister in charge in Ottawa some eight or nine years ago why he would not tell the people of Canada about the CanWell project, his answer in this House, as the record will show, was "You tell them, not me".

The minister was in effect telling me that he had been told by his staff please not to mention CanWell because it was a success. All the hard work and imagination of the scientists and civil servants who built that success and all of that technology should have been patented. Something that is needed all over the world, is recycling and purification of water, and done in such a way that it is cheaper than what they are doing.

The great cities of southwestern Ontario are now desperately short of water. The city of Winnipeg needs more water. All these cities would not be facing billion dollar projects if the knowledge produced by our civil servants and scientists of ten years ago had been made use of.

More recently we have the example of Telidon. Tremendous know-how from the Canadian side went into the production of this technology, but I gather we do not have any patents on it. If a labour group could throw its weight behind the inquiries that are allowed here, once they showed what the facts were, put political pressure on to the city MPs and made them back up their labour people like the farmers put pressure on the rural MPs, there would be some action taken.

This is not a partisan suggestion, as I think the minister recognizes. I am simply saying this has been a failure. I did not know the "shall" provision was in the old legislation. Had I known, I would have been after my colleague when I was a minister to get his body in action and to get moving because I needed support and help. I was the one who was trying to take the lead in co-ordinating the work to develop these industrial strategies with some success, but not enough. I suggest the minister has a great opportunity, if he lives up to the word "shall" and makes his department produce inquiries about real questions that exist.

I have a list a page long of other proposals. I will take another example that is purely labour. Even though it is under provincial jurisdiction, it is the type of thing we have to face up to in politics. A company in Saskatchewan that produced binder twine worked eight hours a day five days a week. The demand for binder twine was so great that they proposed developing the plant into a three-shift-a-day, seven-day operation and thereby produce four times as much binder twine. Why did it not happen? The union which was recognized as the bargaining unit, the retail clerks union, said that under their union you can only work five days a week one shift. They refused to work the three shifts and, of course, refused to allow in any other union to do so.

This is a provincial matter, but look at the number of jobs lost to working men. When one group of working men take an attitude like that and stop progress, it is a perfect case for an inquiry by a federal organization. Make it known to the people of Saskatchewan that the labour people across Canada are backing the labour people of Saskatchewan in seeing that opportunities are given.

I do not want to bore the House or take the time of the House by going through all the things that could be done by an active group under this provision where they shall make inquiries, not inquiries to cover up but inquiries to let the people know there are opportunities for them if they put political pressure on their city MPs and get them off their seats and moving.

If the minister would take this legislation, which looks innocent enough and has been sitting around for a couple of years waiting to be passed, and really roll in his department, he would scare the devil out of all the other ministers. He could make a deal with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) to join forces and scare the daylights out of those guys. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) would not be able to do a thing with him. Once you do something worth while which has the support of all the labour people, the Prime Minister would not dare do a thing with you.

I gave the same advice to the Minister of Agriculture on interest rates. "Go ahead and do it, you have the power, they won't throw you out". The minister has these opportunities in his hands, backed up by legislation, and they should be used. It all depends on the will and the spirit of the minister who holds the portfolio whether anything is done.

I want to close by saying that the failure of governments in not having come up with a clear, direct industrial strategy for the next 30, 40, 50 years is a failure that we must all share responsibility for, but most of the responsibility falls on those sitting in the seats of office now.

I hope the minister will set up this group which he should have in his department, that he will expect them at the end of the year when he gives his report to Parliament to list all the questions that they have inquired into and their recommendations, and that he personally will make these things public to the labour unions across Canada so that the work force can be organized behind the minister and put pressure on other MPs to get things done to help us provide more jobs for the people of this country.

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I at the outset say how much I welcome many of the things that have just been said by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton). There was one spot where he might have left out a couple of sentences, but to the extent that he was pleading for an industrial strategy, for progress and development in the creation of jobs and pushing this country ahead, it was a good speech. In fact, it was so good that I urge him to make it again when the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) is before us, when the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) has the floor, as well as the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and the Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Roberts). These are the ministries concerned about that sort of thing.

I would be very grateful if the Minister of Labour (Mr. Regan) had the credentials to go into that field, but for the most part his job is that of a referee. It is not his job to find jobs; that is the job of the Minister of Employment and Immigration. It is not his job to create jobs; that is the job of the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and so on. His job is to referee labour relations.

The hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain may have read a little too much into the capacity this minister has to launch inquiries. However, it was a good speech. Sometimes Friday afternoon is a good time to get a speech on record or at least to rehearse it. I urge him to make it again to ministers who have the key responsibility in terms of an industrial strategy and the economic development of the country.

With respect to the bill that is before us, I am still against it. I have been against it every time it has come up. At this stage of the game, since the Labour Gazette has not been published for two and a half years and this bill has gone through almost all stages, there is not much point in trying to block or defeat the bill this afternoon.

I was interested in the question the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain asked about the retroactivity of this bill. He wondered whether that meant some legitimizing was being done of money that had been spent in the meantime. The minister replied that that was not what it was doing, but it was to legitimize the way the department has broken the law since January 1, 1979, by not publishing the Labour Gazette. There is no doubt that the word "shall" was there in former Section 4 of the Department of Labour Act. It says "shall issue at least once in every month a publication to be known as the Labour Gazette."

The minister says that because the department thought the bill was going to be passed, the department ceased publishing. What about some law enforcement officer over there checking to see what happens when the department breaks the law, whether the minister knows about it or not? I know at this stage the Labour Gazette had died and we are now legitimizing it to death and, as the minister said so honestly, the purpose of the language in the new Section 4 is to mollify those of us who do not like the Labour Gazette being abolished and to tell us that we are going to make it a legal requirement that there be a collection of information such as the Labour Gazette was publishing.

I recognize that times change and that there are different and sometimes better ways of dealing with things. The minister pointed out that there are now many publications which cover different aspects of labour relations and labour matters. I point out to him, as was suggested by one of my colleagues in the committee, that smaller trade unions, or locals of unions across the country particularly, have some difficulty in getting all these various publications and it was an advantage to them to have the great body of labour information in this one publication. I say quite frankly that I am sorry it has been discontinued.

I have admitted already that at this stage of the game there is no point in blocking the bill, and even my 40 minutes, if I used it all, would not do that; but I am going to give the Minister of Labour another warning. I give it to him as a result of a very interesting experience I had this week. I spent two hours or more Wednesday evening, while most members of the House were up at the farm at the Speaker's party, in the company of Sir John A. Macdonald.

Mr. Regan: I was with Mackenzie King at Kingsmere!

Mr. Knowles: Well, there is a difference. Sir John A. Macdonald came into this chamber, walked around and looked at things. He came over and talked to me, sat here and asked me what this thing was, the microphone into which we speak. He looked the place over and asked me what changes had been made. He told me things seemed quite different than they were when he was Prime Minister in the last century.

An hon. Member: Did he point out the black spots, Stanley?

Mr. Knowles: I pointed out the black spots to him and told him about the mistake I had made and how I asked to be forgiven because it was not the first time a member of Parliament had seen something that was not there.

An hon. Member: Is this another example you are telling us about?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles: He made some retort about shadow cabinets and that kind of thing. Maybe others have seen him because he was around most of the week. At one point we were coming down on the elevator from the sixth floor to the second floor. He had been up in my office for a while. As we came down, the elevator stopped at the third floor and the hon. member for Saint-Michel (Mrs. Killens), got on. I never saw a woman's face look so flabbergasted as hers. I said: "Don't be worried. I want to introduce you to my friend, Sir John A. Macdonald." I turned to him and I said: "Sir John, you don't hate Liberals today the way you used to?" "Oh, no, I love them now", he said. She got over it. It was a very interesting experience. In fact, he stood here in front of my desk, and when we were talking about committees and whether they were a good thing he said: "In my day I used to say that if the government had a big enough majority to put the right members on a committee you could debauch a whole committee of archangels". I looked at him and I said, "Well, Sir John, you have been dead since 1891 so you know a lot more about archangels that I do"!

Why do I tell about this experience I had visiting with Sir John A. Macdonald this week? I see members looking at me wondering if there should be a knock on the door and the men in the white suits should come and get me, so I will explain this in a moment. Before I give the explanation and spoil it all, I want to say to the Minister of Labour that he better watch out. If Sir John A. Macdonald, who died in 1891, can come back to these halls, Mackenzie King, who did not die until 1950, may well come back, and I do not think he would be so friendly. If he comes back and finds that this young fellow who is now the Minister of Labour has done away with his pride and joy, the Labour Gazette, he will have something to explain.

I may say that my reference to the visit of Sir John A. Macdonald was not of one who had had hallucinations. Rather, it is a fact that TV Ontario, through its educational television section, is doing a piece for students on Parliament and it devised this way of doing it, having an actor play the part of Sir John A. Macdonald and come here to have an interview with the Speaker, with the government House leader, some backbenchers and so on, and I was one of those who had the privilege of meeting with him. He certainly looked the part and it was enjoyable, but I say to my friend the Minister of Labour that when Mackenzie King comes back and sees what he has done to the Labour Gazette, he will not be able to report that experience with quite the same relish or delight.

At any rate, Mr. Speaker, it is Friday afternoon and these are the things that go on. I say again this Friday afternoon that I regret very much that this valuable publication has been discontinued. I regret that the Department of Labour broke the law by discontinuing it in 1979 and is now getting authority for that two and a half years later. I hope the minister will take seriously the responsibilities he has accepted under the new wording and do his best to collect, produce and distribute information about the labour scene that will be helpful to those who are involved in the various employment areas of this country. If I had my will I would defeat this bill and bring back the Labour Gazette, just as Sir John A. Macdonald came back here this week; but sometimes there are facts one just has to accept.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to stand in the House on a Friday afternoon and be able to follow two of our more eminent members of this House who have been with the Parliament of Canada for many years. The minister across the way and myself are relatively new to the House, but when he questions the propriety of the comments of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton), I think I am compelled to follow on some of the themes outlined by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

The hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain, from his years of wisdom and experience, indicated clearly to the House that when one sees any piece of legislation which has a retroactive feature, then as a member of Parliament fulfilling his or her responsibility to constituents one must be suspicious that the law, indeed, has been broken.

I want to go back to the minutes of the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration of June 26, 1980, just a couple of weeks short of one year ago. On that date the bill was reported to the House. It was ready for debate and passage, but it is interesting to read the debates of that day. It is perhaps unfortunate that the hon. member for Don Valley West (Mr. Bosley), who is our spokesman on labour matters, was not able to be here to debate this bill on the day it came forward because certainly in the committee he was very active and, as we read the transcript, we can tell that not all of his concerns were satisfied.

● (1500)

One of the interesting parts of that transcript should be read into our record in this House. At the instigation of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Regan) the deputy minister of labour said the following in the committee, in response to a question by the hon. member for Don Valley West:

—we were faced with the requirement to reduce our 1978-79 budget by $1.2 million and our 1979-80 budget by $2.4 million, and we came to the conclusion that the view of the public, because of that experience, was that perhaps we could dispense with the Labour Gazette since there were many other publications that occupied the field. The field had become very sophisticated. So we did do away with the Gazette.

Going back to 1978-79, a labour law was passed by the elected representatives of the people of Canada who sit in this House of Commons. That law says that the minister shall publish a labour gazette. That is what the law said back in 1978-79, and that is what the law says today. At this very moment the law says that the minister shall publish a labour gazette, yet in rather cavalier fashion, before a standing committee of this Parliament, the deputy minister said: "We were faced with a budgetary need to reduce expenditures; therefore, we broke the law."

Mr. Kilgour: Shame.

Mr. Hawkes: The department stopped adhering to what the law said it must do. Perhaps it is not the most important law on the books in Canada, but I think we in this House must be very concerned when a deputy minister, acting on ministerial authority approved by the bureaucrats from the deputy minister on down, does not say, "We must go to Parliament and change the law", but simply, "For budgetary reasons we will break the law."

Mr. Regan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Hawkes: As long as it does not eat into my time, Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to permit a question.

Mr. Regan: Is the member aware that the department ceased publication at the time the original bill was introduced into the House, not under the former government but under the government before that, and is the hon. member aware that the publication had not come out for about a year and a half before the time I became minister, that the former ministers, Lincoln Alexander and the present Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro), had ceased publication only after a bill had been introduced in the House and that as a consequence of the passage of time, two governments went out of existence in the interim?

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, it is seldom that I can express so much pleasure at a question. Yes, I am aware that the government introduced a piece of legislation and then, with impunity, began to break the law. No legislation has been passed by the members of this House, and that is a further example of the arrogance of a cabinet which, the minute it introduces a piece of legislation in this House, deems it to have been passed and acts on it.

In the thick book of bills presently before this House, one which is in my area of responsibility concerns the Adult Occupational Training Act, and it has a retroactive clause. The first piece of legislation I as a representative of our party was forced to deal with was the employer tax credit, and it had a retroactive clause. We considered it in June of 1980. It was retroactive to April 1 because the government had been making commitments—illegal commitments—since April 1. I can think of no reason to blame this minister for this particular situation because he is correct when he says he was not the minister, but the government has not changed, and what we see here is that the basic philosophy of this government has not changed one iota. When the cabinet chooses, certain things are deemed to be law. The government acts accordingly and seeks the approval of this House retroactively time after time. That is wrong.

Mr. Kilgour: It is also a crime.

Mr. Regan: What about your government?

Mr. Hawkes: It is wrong.

Mr. Regan: Your government did the same thing.

Mr. Evans: We agree; your government was wrong.

Mr. Kilgour: Breaking laws is considered a crime under the Criminal Records Act.

Mr. Regan: That is a criminal authority sitting beside you.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I would like to move on from that issue because, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said, that is history. The law has been broken in this country for 29 months. A government which was concerned about that when this bill was reported back to this house on June 26, 1980, would have put it on the agenda before June 12, 1981. The government is acting with impunity, and I suggest that is the responsibility of the current Minister of Labour.

Mr. Kilgour: Contempt of Parliament.

Mr. Hawkes: The minister has been acting illegally for one year in not publishing a labour gazette.

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think there are clear rules about abusing the microphones. The hon. member who has the floor should be the only one to use those microphones. The hon. member sitting next to the hon.

member who has the floor has been abusing the microphones all during this speech, and I would like to have that stopped.

Mr. Collenette: It is the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I have to disappoint the parliamentary secretary. Comments from any part of the House, whether they happen to be near an open microphone or not near an open microphone, have been tolerated since confederation, I think.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, the illegality involved concerns what has not been done, but what we are dealing with today is a new clause which would replace the old clause which required the government to publish a labour gazette. The idea which lies behind this—and the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) referred to this—is that the minister shall collect information, the minister shall make inquiries and the minister shall disseminate. The year is 1981. I do not think anyone who is concerned about the current data base in Canada could disagree that there is a need for information, and in the year 1981 this nation is not well served by information relating to the labour market and the relationships between labour organizations and management.

Currently, we are not well served with respect to information. I serve on a special seven-man parliamentary task force which has been examining, at least in part, the issue of information. The task force has been doing this for over a year now, and we have heard over 500 different groups which have testified before us. I think it is appalling that no one can tell us how many carpenters there are in Canada today and no one can tell us how many jobs there are for carpenters or plumbers or machinists. Regardless of how much money we are currently spending to obtain information, no one can answer those very simple questions. I have in my hand a report from the Department of Labour entitled "Absenteeism in the Canadian Context". On page two it asserts that the biggest problem is the immediate short term absences. And it goes on to say:

● (1510)

Yet, these brief absences (often of one or two days) are not identified at all in the over-all summation of total days lost which is the usual economic statistic provided in national and organizational service.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, the Department of Labour and Statistics Canada publish inaccurate and misleading figures. That is really what this Department of Labour publication says. Yet in this legislation we have the wording:

With a view to the dissemination of accurate statistical and other information—

One of the fundamental statistics it is important to know is the one related to absenteeism, and yet a Department of Labour publication tells us in advance it is not accurate. Nevertheless, they still publish it. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, whether, if this House passes this piece of legislation, a future minister who publishes inaccurate data will, in fact, be in violation of the law. I suggest he might.

There is a lack of reliable and extensive information in Canada on safety practices. There is no adequate data base that will tell us the total cost of labour-management agreements. All we get are base rates. We have no data about what employers are doing to train Canadians, how many are in training, etc. Two government departments, Statistics Canada and the Department of Labour, carry out studies on employment earnings and hours. However, their definitions and methodology vary. So we have two departments putting out different information on the same subject. What are we going to do with that if we pass a bill requiring the minister to disseminate accurate information? Does it mean the minister will not disseminate information because it is inaccurate, or does it mean Statistics Canada will not disseminate it because it is the one which comes out with the inaccurate information? Clearly, one of them must be inaccurate, therefore it is a waste of taxpayers' money, perhaps a dangerous waste because why should we collect inaccurate figures?

When I first looked at this bill I think a sort of sick grin came over my face because it said the Minister of Labour shall collect information and initiate inquiries. From time to time, as often as I can, I attend meetings of the Public Accounts Committee which presented a report to Parliament, I think, last July. One of the recommendations of members of all parties to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) was that all evaluation studies done by all departments of government be immediately referred to the standing committees of this House. That is perhaps a complex way of saying, Mr. Speaker, that we ask the President of the Treasury Board that inquiries paid for by taxpayers be made available to members of the relevant standing committee, to the parliamentarians responsible for protecting taxpayers from the abuse which can flow from a government too powerful and insensitive to the laws and realities of Canadians. The answer we received from the minister of the Crown, Mr. Speaker, in its simplest form, was no. A lot of words surrounded it, but it was no. It meant, in effect, "Taxpayers, we will take your money and carry out an inquiry into some aspects of a program, but will we give it to members of Parliament to look at so they can judge whether the money was well or badly spent".

The Minister says no, we will not give it to the members of Parliament.

Then I look at Bill S-4 and find that it says:

—and shall institute and conduct inquiries into important industrial questions upon which adequate information may not at present be available.

Well, I can applaud the commitment of a society to inquire into important industrial questions. That is in our long-term best interests. However, I cannot applaud a government that will take money from its citizens to pay for those inquiries and not give them the information when the inquiries are completed. Many of our recent question periods, Mr. Speaker, have been devoted to that basic theme as it relates to the uranium cartel where there is even a suspicion of illegality. The results of that inquiry, which cost hundreds of thousands of dollars, are not to be made available to the taxpayer or members of Parliament. And yet before us is a piece of legislation which empowers the Minister of Labour to spend taxpayers' money to inquire into anything that strikes his fancy, with no necessity to report the results thereof.

In principle, Mr. Speaker, that creates legislation which is open to abuse. The government opposite, with a history of that kind of abuse, with a President of the Treasury Board who refuses even a simple request of the Public Accounts Committee for information on the results of inquiries, asks us to expand the power of the Minister of Labour to make inquiries and spend taxpayers' dollars, with absolutely no requirement that the results of the inquiry be made available to the public generally and to members of this House.

It is interesting to see that no one on the other side is standing up to defend this legislation, other than the minister, but if I had to do that because of an order from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) or the whip, at least that part would bother me. It would concern me if I had to support a piece of legislation giving a particular individual at a particular moment in history the unchecked power to inquire into anything in the industrial sector which he or she felt was worthy of inquiry, to spend taxpayers' money on it and not have a concomitant responsibility to make the results of that inquiry known to Canadians. It is somewhat like the argument that ensued in committee when this bill was discussed. As I read it, the hon. member for Don Valley West looked at the main estimates and said that, according to the parliamentary secretary, dispensing with the Labour Gazette would result in a saving of $225,000 a year. The minister came along a little later and said that $400,000 was saved. The member from our party looked at the main estimates and said that, for information purposes, the budget is down $31,000. It is possible to say that you save $400,000, or $225,000, because you did not print a publication, but have you really saved that money if you take it and use it to print something else? I could not help but think of a housewife who would go into the supermarket and pass by the bins of oranges, apples and lettuce and say, "I won't buy a dozen oranges or a dozen apples or a head of lettuce today. Gee, I have saved $43 already." Then she goes on to the meat counter and doesn't buy a roast and doesn't buy this or that, and she says she has saved another $202. With that kind of logic it would be easy to walk out of the supermarket having saved $3,000 or $4,000 at each trip. The logic is that if I do not spend the money on these things at which I look, I have saved it. But my banker becomes a little disturbed because he does not see it; it is not in my account. This is the kind of logic involved in the saving related to the Labour Gazette.

What is overlooked is that the Labour Gazette evolved from a kind of dry, academic statistical document into a document which, for the most part, could be viewed as containing discussions. What this means is that the articles contained in the publication are written by a variety of people and present a variety of points of view. The articles are written by people from within the labour movement, management groups, universities and by people from within government who had their thoughts on labour in Canada published and disseminated to an interested audience.

When the minister indicates that there are more efficient ways to publish information, then I think we should be cautious. We should have learned from the retroactive date. We should look at that with suspicion and ask the minister whether the money is being used to publish the same kind of information wherein labour has an equal access to the publication of their views as do management, university professors and bureaucrats. Or, as taxpayers, are we now faced with an alternative expenditure which is essentially under the control of one person, the Minister of Labour? Are we now receiving, and do we have the potential to receive, a series of publications which put forward a single perspective? Is that what we will receive when the Labour Gazette is no longer published?

People from the department say let us get rid of the Labour Gazette, let us go over here, gather some information and make some inquiries and then the minister shall determine what is to be disseminated and how. This may be somewhat of an unfair analogy, but it seems to me that that principle prevails in any regime which we would classify as a dictatorship. One of the first things Adolf Hitler did in Germany was to take over the control of the means of the dissemination of information. I am not suggesting that there is a parallel in personality or intent, but I am suggesting that what the minister brings forward is a bill which provides him with that kind of authority in this field. He is provided with the authority to decide what questions to ask, whether or not the answers are accurate and whether or not to disseminate the information which flows therefrom. We may have a minister of good will, a minister who is brilliant in his tasks and who is fair; but, in essence, he is putting into law a very odious principle, that is, the power to single-handedly determine what information is collected in the first place, who it is collected from, how it is analysed and whether or not it is accurate and should be published.

Is that a principle which makes members opposite feel comfortable? It is a principle which does not make members on this side feel particularly comfortable. It is analogous to what we experienced in terms of a series of energy ads. The government took some $6 million worth of the taxpayers' money to publish these ads. It controlled the content of the ads, the publications in which they were placed, and the final message was that everything is well in energy. Yet, here we are in June of 1981 and we are told that we must pay 66 cents a gallon more for gasoline. Yet we are told that all is well in energy in Canada today.

An hon. Member: Stick to the topic.

Mr. Hawkes: I am reminded that the House pays careful attention to relevance. Are my comments relevant, Mr. Speaker? Would Mr. Speaker feel comfortable if the bill before us were to allow the Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox) to decide in perpetuity how taxpayers' funds should be spent in the dissemination of information with the kind of track record that exists in the energy field? We may have a wonderful Minister of Labour who deserves this power, but I suggest that it is clear to all members that we do not have a Minister of Communications who deserves it. Therefore, the members of this House should be very careful about giving that power in law to unspecific and unknown individuals who may hold power in the future. That is the crux of the matter. Does something exist in our past which leads us to be careful and wary? I suggest it does.

I would like to paint a scenario for the minister which he and his colleagues may or may not have considered. Imagine a taxpayer who wants to form or strengthen a labour union, or perhaps someone who wants to take the risk and start a new business—

An hon. Member: He must be crazy!

Mr. Hawkes: An hon. member says he would have to be crazy. In the present economic climate, the hon. member is right. But this is a country with rich potential, and given a government committed to the riches and to the development of a good life for Canadians, we could achieve this relatively quickly. One of the things I would like to have, if I were starting a business or if I were trying to strengthen a labour union, is information. Information would be necessary for me to decide where and how to carry out my plan. I wonder if the taxpayers of Canada would have more faith and trust that their funds were being well spent in the collection and dissemination of information on labour-management relations, which is what this bill is all about; I wonder if they would trust that information just a bit more, if there were some kind of tri-party group—labour, management and academics—who decided what the questions were to be, how the information was to be gathered and how it was to be disseminated. I wonder if Canadians might trust it a little more because of the long-term reputation, historically at least, of Statistics Canada; whether they might trust it a little more if that body, that part of the federal government were given the responsibility in this case. I wonder if Canadians might trust it a little more if there were some kind of intergovernmental body which included representation from provincial and federal governments, and they had to collectively decide what information to gather and how to disseminate it. Or would we even give it to an academic department of a university?

• (1530)

We say that information is important. We say that at least a portion of the taxes collected in this country should be spent to get it and to make it known. But has there been a single moment's thought or discussion in cabinet about what would be the best route in Canadian society to spend that money wisely and credibly? Can we believe that a partisan politician, part of the Liberal government today, has the experience, the wisdom and the objectivity to spend those dollars wisely, to get accurate information and to disseminate it accurately? Do we have to be suspicious in this House that, given that authority, the questions are likely to be loaded toward the answers which people want? In any event, when the government gets answers it does not want, it does not publish, but when it gets answers it wants, it does publish. When that happens once or twice, on what is the credibility of the data based?

It reminds me of an issue which has been raised in this House once or twice in the last week. We have been told that when one phones up a census office in Canada today, one is told, "If you do not want your friend or neighbour picking up your form, simply mail it to Ottawa. It will go to Ottawa where strangers will look at all that private information and you will not be embarrassed by your friend or neighbour knowing it." Then we find that post offices are handing those forms over to one's friend or neighbour. That is going on across Canada. It was going on yesterday, it is going on today. There is our supposedly trustworthy federal agency—

Mr. Blais: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Not only is the comment by the hon. gentleman out of order, but it is completely false and without foundation.

Mr. Hawkes: I think I was just called a liar, in somewhat more polite terms. I would bring to the minister's attention, if it has not been done already, the fact that this is happening in several rural communities in northern Alberta. An hon. member from the New Democratic Party brought that situation to the minister's attention earlier this week. It may be that the minister does not want it to happen; but I think the evidence is growing to show that it is happening. I am sure that by now all of us who serve in this House have had phone calls from people checking—

Mr. Blais: Order.

Mr. Hawkes: —the veracity of what they have put down on what is supposedly a private and confidential form. I raise this simply because in a free and democratic society—

Mr. Blais: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. I have been sitting in this House a long time. Your Honour has been in this House for as long as I have been. Hon. members usually act very responsibly. It is very seldom that I have witnessed such lack of responsibility in what is expressed by an hon. member of this House—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That is not a point of order.

Mr. Blais: —as I have presently heard from the hon. gentleman. I still insist that the matter is out of order.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the point raised is certainly a matter of debate, and the hon. gentleman may wish to enter the debate, but it is not a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I do not want to go back into each of the points of order. There is a difficulty. The hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes) has tended to stray from the subject before us. No one in this chair has ever found the perfect definition of relevance so that it could be utilized on every occasion. The minister is, in some sense and to some degree, correct. The hon. member has strayed. I am not talking about the issue as to whether the point of debate is correct, or false; that is not a matter for the Chair to consider. I would suggest that the hon. member for Calgary West try to edge a little closer to the subject matter of the bill before us.

Mr. Hawkes: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will try to come right down the throat.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Not mine!

Mr. Hawkes: Not Your Honour's. How about the minister's?

When standing up in this House, I sometimes feel that it is a great compliment for someone to attempt to insult oneself, because I think it is always revealing of the character of the person who is doing the delivering, and we then provide a piece of behavioural evidence. Canadians who sit in our galleries or watch their televisions can judge for themselves as to who shall or shall not be believed and under what circumstances.

Mr. Blais: I have been watching you for the past 25 minutes.

Mr. Hawkes: I would like to come right to the central point, and perhaps it is my final point, because I think it is critical. A good part of my professional life has been spent as a researcher who required information given freely and voluntarily by people so that hopefully I could write reports or make suggestions for this government and others which would be helpful to them in decision-making. There is nothing more critical in securing accurate information than a feeling on the part of those who have that information that they can trust the people to whom they give it and that it will be used responsibly. At the first tiny demonstration that the recipient of that information is not using that information responsibly, they cease to provide accurate information. That is the inherent flaw in this bill, that when a single individual who serves partisan interests is given this kind of responsibility to collect and disseminate, ultimately, sooner or later, those who have the information will begin to give false information if required, and no information if not required, and the nation will not be well served.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Mr. Speaker, I will be brief in asking a few questions of the minister on Bill S-4, as it says that the government requires statistical and other information relating to the conditions of labour. I would like to discuss a condition with him which was brought to my attention in Winnipeg last Saturday when the president of the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace workers contacted me about a serious labour problem in that union. He also brought to my attention the fact that the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon) has also brought this matter to the attention of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Regan). I would just like to read the contents of a letter which the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta wrote to the Minister of Labour regarding the problems with the IAM union.

• (1540)

The letter to the minister reads:

I have now received from Mr. Marc Lapointe, QC, a copy of the "Reasons for Decision" arising from the Hearing of the foregoing application before the Canadian Labour Relations Board on July 9-11 and November 4 and 5, 1980.

Mr. Minister, I have never in my life seen a rendering of judgment from a government board which is so filled with veiled insults, childish vindictiveness and absolute socialistic piousness, as is reflected in the aforementioned document, of which I have attached a marked copy.

The document casts scurrilous invective at the integrity and good will of the applicants, who are valued employees of the taxpayers of Canada. In his attempt to suppress the individualistic instincts and human pride of these persons, the author has chosen to use language which might have been extracted from the Communist manifesto!

As a professional person myself, I find it regrettable that well-compensated members of a semi-judicial board should allow such an unprofessional document to go forward in their names. They have insulted the integrity of all Air Line Technicians. Such comments as "their attitude reflected a degree of selfishness which fails to appreciate the true basis of collective action to democratize the work place" and "rather then turn their energies to the benefit of all, they seek to enhance only their well-being through CALATA" bely a strongly Communist bias.

The suggestion that "they (CALATA) want to be viewed as referees or managers, while still retaining superstar status" is the sort of drivel one might expect from a ten-year-old child.

The belittling of CALATA's paramount concern for air travel safety is intolerable.

Mr. Minister, the Aircraft Technicians of CALATA have every right under the laws and proposed Constitution of this country to form their own collective bargaining unit. They are entitled to the right of free association. Many other collective bargaining units exist in this country with fewer than 243 members, including the Canadian Airline Dispatchers Association with only 56 members.

I would like to point out that this will also concern the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin). They, too, are concerned with the air safety problems within Air Canada. The letter continues:

I hope you will read the attached statement "Reasons for Decision" and take note of my comments in the margins. It is a totally biased document, laden with value judgments and devoid of any factual evidence of justification for the decision rendered.

I demand that the author of this document be fired, and that the applicants be granted a new hearing. Such serious misdemeanor cannot be left unchallenged and accordingly, I intend to raise this matter in the House of Commons.

I have raised the matter in advance, Mr. Speaker, and I hope that the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta will also raise it.

I would like to hear from the Minister of Labour as to what action he will be taking in response to this letter. Perhaps he will volunteer some information as to what action he proposes with regard to the very serious labour problems with the IAM union.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): If the House wishes to revert to some form of Question Period under rules I do not know, I must advise hon. members that we will need unanimous consent to do so. I heard the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie) indicate that he had several questions. This is not committee stage of the bill. Perhaps the hon. member could indicate to the Chair just what procedure he has in mind before I can encourage that type of question and answer.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, earlier when we were discussing this bill, the minister was answering questions and making statements. Unless something has transpired in the last half an hour or so, because I had to leave the chamber for a short period, I assume the same procedure continues. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) made a few comments on the bill and the minister answered him on two or three occasions. I thought that same procedure was followed.

Mr. Regan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. By agreement of the House I answered one question which dealt with the subject of the bill. I would be happy to discuss this matter elsewhere with the hon. member, either inside or outside the House under appropriate circumstances. But what he has raised does not relate to the bill in any way. I do not believe it is within the rules of the House for me to deal with this question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I think that answers the issue in my mind, both in terms of what the practice was earlier this afternoon and in terms of the minister's reply. We do not have a question and answer period. The hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine is welcome to take the floor.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the minister's comments. Now that I have read this letter into the record, I hope he will take the first opportunity to write to me telling me what action he and his department will be taking to deal with this very serious problem.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. On the point of order which I raised initially which related to the census, I want to indicate to the hon. member from Calgary that I am pleased to announce that Statistics Canada has received 82 per cent of the questionnaires. This response far exceeds our wildest expectations.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point or order. You have just permitted a minister to make a statement. I believe that under those conditions when a minister stands and makes a statement we are entitled to a question and an answer.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): That is a very interesting interpretation. The Chair has to hear enough of an hon. member's point of order, whether it be that of a minister or not, to determine whether there is a point of order. There was not a point of order, but I did recognize the hon. member for Calgary West just to see if he wanted to make some sort of comment. He has made his comment. I will now recognize the hon. member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson).

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, it had been my intention, and it might still be, to finish shortly before four o'clock so that this matter can be dealt with. However, I consider some of the interventions made by the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Blais) quite unnecessary. I am now reconsidering the view I held previously.

Department of Labour Act

It is a pleasure to speak on a matter that, in its importance and urgency, truly befits Friday afternoon's debate in the House of Commons. The objective of the bill before us, which has been stated several times, is to remove the statutory requirement to publish the Labour Gazette. A number of members have referred to the drafting of the revised Section 4 which we have before us. As far as I can see, this is exactly the same wording, word for word, as we had in the first part of the old Section 4. I do not see much to challenge in this wording. It has stood the test of 81 years of time. The only difference between this wording and wording which might be put into place in 1981 is that the legal drafting within the Government of Canada and the Department of Justice in this day and age tends to be somewhat more precise, but it also tends to be more difficult to understand. I think the 1900s style of legal draftsmanship is in many respects better than, for instance, that of the income tax amendments with which we dealt earlier this year.

As pointed out by previous speakers, the minister has been breaking the law for some time now. He has not published the Labour Gazette. This is something we should not take too lightly. Had it not been for the manner in which the motion that was before the House yesterday had been dealt with, I might be able to suggest certain sanctions that might be applied to the minister on account of his transgressions, but that is not to be the case. By and large I am inclined to buy the argument presented by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Regan) today. I presume that the statements of reported facts are correct. I have no reason to believe otherwise.

I understand that the circulation of this journal is quite small and has been declining for some time. As well, it is very expensive to put out. We have heard estimates ranging from $400,000 a year down to $30,000 a year. Probably the absolute truth lies somewhere between those two figures. The information is available elsewhere today. There are methods by which information relating to labour and discussions on matters of labour can be dealt with. There is a wide variety of both academic and popular journals in which people can read about labour matters.

I can understand the objections put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and his rather sentimental attachment to the Labour Gazette. Most of the views of the NDP on labour matters come from that period of time, or slightly before. Most of it belongs to the latter part of the nineteenth century.

Mr. Knowles: Come, come.

Mr. Nickerson: That is quite true. In the old section 4 of the Department of Labour Act, it was specified that the Labour Gazette should deal with statistics and other information dealing with conditions of the labour market as opposed to the part of section 4 that we have here which refers to conditions of labour. I suggest there is a distinction there, but in all probability conditions of the labour market could be included in the definition "conditions of labour" which still exists.

It is important that some branch of government deal with conditions in the labour market. I understand much of this work is being undertaken by the Department of Employment and Immigration, the manpower part of which probably did not exist in the year 1900. It is important that we know the number of jobs available across Canada in the various parts of the country, what people are available to fill those jobs and where they are located. It is important to have an understanding of the willingness of people to travel from one part of the country to another, such as unemployed people in Nova Scotia travelling to Alberta to find work.

Having this information enables policy decisions to be made relating to the relocation of labour, the immigration policy and policies respecting unemployment insurance and various other social programs. It also gives us an idea of the need for training and the training opportunities that are needed so that Canadians who are presently unemployed can avail themselves of opportunities that exist. The Minister of State for Mines (Mrs. Erola) has just left the chamber. She must be well aware of the problems in the mining industry. The mine may be located in an area of high unemployment but the mine operators are unable to get skilled people to work in the mine.

Section 4 will still require the minister to "collect, digest and publish in suitable form statistical and other information relating to the conditions of labour". It is useful that this practice be continued. Obviously this should be done in conjunction with the provinces and territories which have the responsibility for labour standards; labour relations and standards in the case of the provinces and labour standards only in the case of the territories.

I urge the minister to look into the possibility of amendments to the Canada Labour Code so that eventually the territories can also take over responsibility relating to labour relations. I could go into that situation in some detail, but because I only have a couple of minutes left, I will not do this at this time. However, I can assure the minister it is a matter of considerable importance in both the Northwest Territories and the Yukon territory. It is important that the requirement be there to instigate and conduct inquiries into important industrial questions. These can be published, not in the Labour Gazette but hopefully in other magazines and publications with wide circulation among those interested in labour affairs.

Finally, I would like to suggest three areas of study in these matters which it might be advantageous for the Department of Labour to look into. First, I would like to see comparative studies made in labour matters between Canada and various other countries. I have listed three: the United States of America where they have the free agent approach to life, Germany, which is renowned for its co-operative approach between labour, management and government, and Japan where they have a paternalistic approach to labour relations. It would be useful to know how the various labour regimes in these countries result in differences, loss of productivity, number of days lost through industrial disputes, and so on.

Second, I would like to see more study into working conditions and wages of public servants. The record of industrial disputes is not to be envied. In the senior levels of the public service many good people are being lost.

Third, I would like to see a study carried out into the concept people have of strikes. At one time a strike was a last resort, but today it is becoming more and more commonly accepted as a tactic in labour relations; it is no longer a last resort. It is something people do as a matter of course, just as they go to the negotiating table or to a conciliator. This is something to be looked into. That is all I will say at this time. I hope I have left enough time for the vote to be taken.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, it should be stated in the few minutes that remain that we have a statute to underline the point made by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes) and the hon. member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson) that this Parliament has passed a law called the Criminal Records Act. It states clearly that if you are convicted of breaking any federal statute, for the purposes of that act you are considered to have a criminal record. In the vernacular, that makes one a criminal.

It is obvious that it is not the fault of the present Minister of Labour (Mr. Regan) that we are in the process of doing something which clearly contravenes an earlier act, nor is it the fault of his predecessor the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser). However, it should be very clear in the record of this House that we are talking about something which, if there had been a trial and conviction, would constitute, in the vernacular, a breach of a federal statute, in other words, a crime.

That point has to be driven home again and again to those opposite. We have laws in this country. If they are federal statutes, the breaking of them constitutes a crime. It cannot be made too clear to those opposite that whether they are talking about uranium and the Combines Investigation Act or the legislation here which they have been breaching for the last year and half, what they are doing is breaking the law without having been convicted of it. That is a very serious matter for any government in a democratic or non-democratic country to be contemplating.

I would simply express complete agreement with the points made by the hon. member for Calgary West and the hon. member for Western Arctic. Is there an understanding that the vote will be taken at four o'clock?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my friend in the course of his remarks has indicated a question with respect to an understanding. There was an understanding that we would dispose of this bill at this stage at four o'clock. I would have no objection if you did not see the clock for a few moments.

Mr. Evans: I agree.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

● (1600)

Motion agreed to bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Knowles: The ghost of Mackenzie King will walk tonight.

Mr. Regan: He may give me some advice.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Does the House have a mind to consider Bill S-10, or shall I move on to private members' hour?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I would think it would be advisable to move on to private members' hour.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It being four o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely, notices of motions, public bills and private bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[English]

SOCIAL SECURITY

ADVISABILITY OF IMPLEMENTING CASH ASSURANCE PROGRAM

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of implementing a Cash Assurance Program (CAP) which would provide stability of income in the agriculture and other food industries (fish), make pay-outs on an individual basis, provide cash in the year of low income, replace or complement certain other programs, minimize the requirements for capital borrowing from institutions, provide equity for contributors, reinforce the family farm and minimize the exodus from the agriculture and other food industries, and avoid erratic pricing of food to the consumers.

He said: Mr. Speaker, again I find myself in the position of reintroducing a proposal which I have presented to this House on previous occasions. Although time has passed and there have been a few changes in the situation, what really has occurred is that the problems have increased, or have been compounded, since my first proposal on January 26, 1976, during consideration of the Western Grains Stabilization Program. At that time the minister in charge was not too receptive to this idea. However, since then we have had a change of government and there was a change in Parliaments and in the attitude of the government.

When I proposed my motion on November 26, 1979, as it appears at page 1701 of Hansard, the Conservative government accepted it and allowed the motion to pass. I might mention that the previous introduction of this measure was on January 26, 1976, and it appears at page 10306. I mention those references in case anyone wants to refer to the comments I made on those occasions or the comments of others who participated in those debates.

When my motion was passed it was one of the few occasions since I have been in this House over the years that a private member's motion of substance has been accepted. That was somewhat of a rare occasion and I was elated because from that point I felt things were going to move. On November 26, 1979, when I introduced the motion, the Liberal hon. member for Glengarry-Prescott-Russell (Mr. Ethier), made these comments:

This motion is almost a complete replica of the program which the previous minister of agriculture, the hon. member for Essex-Windsor (Mr. Whelan) was in the process of implementing prior to the May 22 election.

Suffice it to say that at that time there was an indication of complete support on the part of Liberal members as indicated by those remarks. The hon. member for Bellechasse at that time was a Creditiste member who also supported the proposal, as did the spokesman for the NDP, although he made some comments also about what he wanted in the proposal. Those comments were welcomed at the time. I said at the time I introduced my motion that I would welcome any additions or deletions in the hope that this plan might be put into effect.

As I saw it at the time, and still see it, the present stabilization measure is inadequate because pay-outs following a disaster, whether it be a drought or what have you, are made in the year following the disaster. We witnessed the drought situation last year which had such serious consequences for the cattle industry. At that time we saw the implementation of the herd maintenance program. To this date pay-outs have not been made under that program, and its is now almost a year since that disaster. Similarly, pay-outs under the present stabilization program cannot be made until the following year. What happens is that the year following such a disaster we could experience, as we are at the moment, increased sales to Russia to which a considerable amount of grain is to be sold. As a result, pay-outs are made at the wrong time. In these days of high interest rates and high energy costs people need cash.

Let us consider the current situation of freshwater fishermen. Statistics would indicate that many freshwater fishermen have simply walked away from this occupation. Some thirty years ago there were 250,000 freshwater fishermen. Today there are about half that number. These people have simply left that industry.

People are walking away from various industries, many of them going bankrupt, because there is no cash flow. These people cannot provide a living for themselves and their families. What people really want is stability for themselves and their families. They have responsibilities to their families and other commitments they have to keep. These people want to work but they are unable to find a living. There is a desperate need for cash flow. It is particularly so in times of disasters.

Perhaps I could relate the situation to the grain industry more easily because there are so many variables or ups and downs in that industry. Let me refer specifically to the quota system. Just two years ago I remember there being a quota in one area of 2.9 bushels per acre, with another quota of 7 bushels per acre in an area just a few miles away. That is a man-made situation. Now we have high interest rates with an increasing number of bankruptcies in the agricultural industry. There were 224 agricultural bankruptcies last year. The Farm Credit Corporation made 229 loans to individuals in the agricultural industry in Atlantic Canada. In other words, such a situation could result in the bankruptcy of all the farmers in the Atlantic region. What about all those people who are near bankruptcy? They realize that something is happening and they had better duck out from under before the situation gets worse. Those people simply pull out of the industry.

If one looks at the statistics one sees that 1,000 farmers annually in the one province of Ontario are leaving agriculture. I know there has been considerable comment in the last little while about the very serious problems that exist. The main problem relates to a lack of cash flow.

We all know of the situation involving the dumping of cattle which suddenly depresses the price of cattle, putting people out of business. We experienced a drought situation when there was not enough feed and farmers went bankrupt. Farmers may have been in the industry for 50 years, spending their entire lives on the farm. Suddenly they found themselves in a situation where they could not afford to buy feed. There was no feed to be had, so they had to unload. When a producer unloads in a situation like that, the income tax people immediately come along and say, "We've got you this time". A producer's life savings are put into his operation, and he does not have enough for retirement. Producers—whether they be fishermen or involved in vegetable production or any form of farming or horticulture, fruit growing or whatever—all have problems, but they have always felt that their retirement incomes were entirely wrapped up in their operations. With the capital gains tax moving in on these people, suddenly they find themselves having to unload whatever products they may have and selling out. The government zeroes in on whatever income they may have. Suddenly they find themselves in the position where they cannot retire. This kind of situation should not be allowed to continue.

There is no need for young men to go out of business, even if the banks say they are not good risks. Over the years there will be risks. Anyone involved in agriculture realizes this. This is true in any other industry. If a person starts a law practice, he does not find people walking in the door the first day he puts up his shingle. Businesses have to be built up over the years. So it is with a farming operation. There will be lean years, but a farmer can survive if he toughs it out and if there is a willingness on the part of the government to assist through difficult periods.

There is a cash requirement when disaster strikes, but the cash should come not a year later or two years down the road. We are still haggling over the embargo. Producers were promised there would be a payment because of the embargo. There was a commitment. We still have not heard what is going to happen. Nothing is going to happen. Producers cannot operate just on promises. In this day and age there is a need for cash flow.

My proposal takes into account a plan which is very similar to the existing grain stabilization plan. Under that plan the producer contributes 2 per cent. The suggestion I have been making is that the producer put in 3 per cent and that the federal government double that by putting in 6 per cent. At present the government puts in 4 per cent of sales and the producers puts in 2 per cent. However, if necessary, I think every producer would be quite prepared to increase his contribution, as long as there is a fund available so that he can draw on it when necessary. There will be periods when there will be adequate incomes to tide producers over, but there will also be slack periods. At present there is a 2 per cent contribution to the stabilization program and an approximate 5 per cent contribution to crop insurance. That is a 7 per cent contribution being made at the moment. I am sure every producer would welcome, or at least consider, some other proposal which might in the end eliminate the requirement for programs like crop insurance, the cash advance program or even the stabilization program.

Under my proposal producers would not have to go hat in hand as they did under the herd maintenance program. During that period of cash requirement producers simply begged at the door of the government. I do not think anyone in this day and age should have to come begging to the government. When that happens it appears to taxpayers that they are helping the industry out. All of a sudden the CBC comes in with a nice program showing a big farm operation. It does not matter if the operation is over its head in debt; the place looks big and the equipment is new. It is all financed at 22 per cent, probably, but that is the kind of project the CBC will probably show the people of Canada, telling them they are helping people who have great assets. I do not think there should be that kind of requirement to beg.

Other programs have been put forward. For example, the Cattlemen's Association has been putting forward an equity plan. The association thinks producers can put money in in periods when there are larger sales, and so forth. Sadly, a time of drought is the time when cattlemen have to unload because they cannot supply enough feed. That is when their incomes are high. Yet they may still have their land, they may still have their operations, but they do not have the necessary funds to go back and start the following year with an adequate supply of feed. In a case like that, what we need to do is to allow cattlemen to plow their money back into a fund. That would build up the fund, and capital would be available to assist others in the industry if they want to go back the following year when feed is available or if they have retained their land. As long as they pay their taxes, they can still go back to the fund.

What I am suggesting is that during that one period they should be tax exempt, provided they plow that money back into the fund. It should be tax exempt if they go back into the industry the following year. In that way the plan will have adequate funds. It will help. In fact, the industry would be helping itself. There would be adequate funds. For example, the Farm Credit Corporation is crying desperately for $200 million. It is not available. The government is not putting it in. In this case the producer could put this money into the fund, and it could be made available to those who need it. Similarly, on retirement, instead of the government's zeroing in by way of capital gains tax, farmers should be allowed to put money into the fund. If that money is in the fund, it helps the industry and relieves the government of the necessity of raising funds by issuing bonds. Farmers would be putting money into the fund and then drawing it out during retirement, when they have cash requirements or if they need it in order to have the standard of living they wish to have and to which they are entitled. Many producers do not pay enough into the Canada Pension Plan in order to make it worth while, but under this program there would be sufficient funds for themselves, and the rest of the money could be put to work for the benefit of the industry.

I will refer to several examples of how I think the plan should work. I would average producers' incomes over the last five years, although because inflation is over 10 per cent, perhaps the program should operate at 100 per cent of the last five years. Perhaps it should be reduced to four years or three years. However, for the sake of argument at the moment, my proposal is the following. If, for example, a five-year average is $10,000, the producer contributes 3 per cent and the government contributes 6 per cent; that would be 9 per cent of $10,000. Therefore, $900 would be forgivable if a farmer did not have a crop at all during that particular year. The balance would be taken by way of a loan. In other words, this is not a subsidy, this is not charity. Part of it would be a loan which would be repayable during the course of that year if a farmer has income. If at the end of that year the loan is not repaid—interest-free, I might say, because we do have an interest-free plan under the cash advance program—then immediately the farmer is in default, and the current rate of interest applies. That way there would be no ducking under the fund. The producer becomes responsible.

If a producer's five-year average remains at $10,000 and his sales for the year are $9,800, the shortfall for that year would be $200. In that case the amount forgivable would only be $200. That would be the amount. Instead of $900, it would be $200. In other words, he is not always getting the maximum amount of 9 per cent.

The following is the third example. If the five-year average is $10,000 and the sales for the year are $5,000, the shortfall is $5,000. The forgivable amount is 9 per cent, or $900. The amount of the loan would be $4,100.

In different industries incomes are different, and perhaps different rates apply. In the case of a big operator the five-year average might be $50,000. The sales for the year are, say, $40,000. The shortfall is $10,000. Nine per cent of $50,000 would be $4,500. In this case the forgivable amount is $4,500. The amount of the loan would be $5,500. Because the plan does not have enough money in its infancy, I would suggest that you break up the fund into two portions, a portion from July 1 to December 31—in other words you would be entitled to only half a loan because there was not enough money in the fund to start with. Then from January 1 to the end of June you can come in with the other half, if required, until such time as the fund builds up.

Now if you did not reach into the fund, you would have an equity there and after ten years, if you did not draw from the fund, you should be able to draw out in the eleventh year the amount of your contribution in the first year. If you did not draw any equity after that, you would have an equity built up in such a way that you would get an interest rate comparable to the bond rate during that period.

Let me point out some of the features of the plan. It provides stability of income to agriculture, the food industry, the fishing industry, and so on. The pay-out would be to individuals rather than to industry because in some areas you have failure, in others you have bountiful production, for example, if disease happens to strike a particular area in the cattle industry, or if there was hail in an apple producing area. Anyone involved in the horticultural field is aware of the kind of disasters that can befall them. So the payments should be made to individuals.

The plan would replace certain other programs, for example, cash advance, stabilization, crop insurance, marketing quotas, and so on. Marketing boards would still be able to operate. It would minimize the requirements for capital borrowing from financial institutions. Everybody knows the banks are very reluctant to make loans these days and nobody wants to go to the banks. These farmers who do not pay income tax, or the ones who have sold out, should be willing to accept a lower interest rate because of the fact they did not pay income tax on the money they plowed back into the fund. It would thereby allow young farmers a chance to borrow money at lower than the going rates. If, for example, a farmer did not have to pay capital gains tax and he plowed the money back into the fund, he should be willing to receive 10 or 12 per cent instead of 17 or 18 per cent because he is not paying income tax on that money. That would allow young farmers to take loans at interest rates of about 8 per cent or thereabouts. In that way we would get around the immediate problem. This would help to reinforce the family farm, avoid erratic pricing of food to the consumer because of the fact—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I have given the hon. member considerable extra time and I wonder if he might be able to wrap up his remarks.

Mr. Korchinski: May I just state in closing that I think the plan should be voluntary, and still allow marketing boards to operate. I apologize for the time taken, Mr. Speaker, and I would welcome any changes to the suggestions I have made. I hope that the government sees fit to accept the idea.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Ostiguy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the motion introduced by our colleague opposite at first glance looks most commendable in its principles and objectives. However, at close range it seems that we would have to start at the very beginning with regard to income security and price stabilization in the agriculture, food and fish industries.

Yet an analysis of current conditions clearly shows that there is a host of government-administered programs the aims of which are precisely those contained in the motion now before us. This motion states, and I quote:

> The government should consider the advisability of implementing a Cash Assurance Programme (CAP) which would provide stability of income in the agriculture and other food industries (fish), make pay-outs on an individual basis, provide cash in the year of low income, replace or complement certain other programs—

I think, Mr. Speaker, that this first part of the motion could be discussed at great length. I would first of all say that I have serious doubts about the need to replace or complement some of the programs—by one super-program having the same objectives as those being pursued by several existing ones which have been developed in response to specific needs. These specific needs can relate to a specific group of producers or a given region. Individually administered programs aimed at a specific target group have greater chances of success than one all-encompassing super-program which must be implemented in a variety of different ways and use various means to achieve an over-all objective. There is no doubt that several programs, within a flexible system, which co-ordinates the various activities, can be more efficient in their approach, have greater chances of achieving their objectives and in the end have the same results and, I hasten to add, at a much lesser cost.

As many of my colleagues are certainly aware, we have national programs administered by the federal government which not only have the same objectives as those mentioned in the motion of the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Korchinski), but which also use the very same means as those described in the first lines of his motion, namely "pay-outs on an individual basis" to stabilize farm incomes.

Mr. Speaker, may I remind the hon. member that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) has just announced stabilization payments of $8.96 for each hog marketed during the last marketing campaign under the 1980-81 Canadian hog prices stabilization program. These stabilization payments of $8.96 are individual pay-outs made directly to Canadian pork producers.

In view of the motion which we are now discussing, it may be useful to recall that the Agricultural Stabilization Act allows the government to meet many objectives pertaining to the stabilization of farm incomes and consumer prices. I would also like to remind the House that the latest report of the Economic Council which was given to us yesterday, states on page 51 in the chapter on marketing boards, and I quote:

> Prior to the early 1970s, the average income position of most farmers in Canada was below that of persons working in industry or in service activities. Not surprisingly, there was substantial movement from the land. Since then, the situation has changed, and most families farming full-time today appear to be enjoying a standard of living that compares favourably with that of nonfarm families. Undoubtedly, government support and opportunities made possible by organized marketing systems have helped raise incomes; but other factors, particularly the dramatic climb in food prices, as well as the abandonment or sale of marginal farms and the renewed interest in farming among young people, have played a significant role.

Mr. Speaker, the Agricultural Stabilization Act guarantees the producers of nine products designated in the act, an income equal to at least 90 per cent of the average prices during the five previous years, adjusted on the basis of variations in production costs. Support prices are computed annually under the act for the nine designated products, which are: beef, pork, sheep, milk, industrial cream, corn, soya, as well as oats and barley produced outside the designated zone of the Canadian Wheat Board. Other products can also be designated for price support at the discretion of the Minister of Agriculture if in his view market conditions so warrant.

The nine products for which support prices are set automatically each year include the main animal and vegetable commercial productions in Canada.

● (1630)

The Agricultural Stabilization Act, as its title implies, was passed to guarantee the producers an income despite market uncertainties. But it is also intended to protect family farms and thereby promote that type of farm operation. The payments made to the producers under federal stabilization programs are therefore limited to a specific volume of products for each farmer or operating group. In the case of pork, for instance, the maximum number of head for which payments are made was changed last year and set at 5,000 per family farm or a maximum of 15,000 head for each incorporated group of operators; at the most, three operators are eligible for subsidies, and they must prove that they share equally in the work, management and investments in the business.

The Agricultural Stabilization Act, was amended in 1975, and has been in force since 1958, Mr. Speaker. As of March 31, 1981, the federal government had paid out $3.6 billion including, of course, its payments to the Canadian Wheat Board and Canadian farm producers, under the act.

Naturally, in the last few years, there has been a proliferation of provincial acts providing for the stabilization of farm prices and income. This year, the fact that the provinces paid out about $35 million under that legislation indicates some degree of unrest. But negotiations undertaken a few years ago should soon result in interesting proposals that should enable us to organize the various stabilization programs across the country into a harmonious whole.

The establishment of national marketing agencies is another way for the federal government to intervene and offer assistance to stabilize prices and ensure fair income levels for producers. Pursuant to the Agricultural Products Marketing Act, the National Farm Products Marketing Agency monitors the operations of the national egg, turkey and chicken marketing boards established under that act in 1972, 1975 and 1978, respectively. Those boards are responsible for co-ordinating supplies and stabilizing the prices of those three commodities through provincial agencies. Those programs provide for Canadian egg, turkey and chicken producers incomes which take into account their production, labour and investment costs. Since poultry feed represents in excess of 65 per cent of the production costs of those three commodities, the fluctuations in the egg, chicken and turkey production costs and consumer prices are closely linked with movements in the levels of feed prices.

The costs such as interest rates are also taken into consideration in the pricing formula for those products. Although there is no guarantee that prices will cover production costs, the prices of those commodities never did drop below the cash production costs since those boards were established. I would not want to launch an argument on the justification for or the appropriateness of those boards in a so-called free market economic system. The purpose of my remarks today relate to a motion urging the government to consider the advisability of stepping in to implement an agricultural cash assurance program. I believe indeed that the national marketing boards as established do offer within their limits the type of guaranteed income suggested in the motion introduced by our colleague from Mackenzie and, in that respect, they are quite timely.

There are also several other federal government programs which, each within its respective application to meet as best it can a given situation or specific and definite needs, are designed to contribute to the fulfilment of the over-all objective, namely to protect Canada's agricultural and food sector and to enhance its growth and effectiveness. Mr. Speaker, I am referring among others to crop insurance, farm credit, advanced payments for crops, all programs that have been put forward by this government to better help farmers get a fair margin of profit between their production costs and the market price of their products, financial assistance programs for produce cold storage facilities, feed grain freight assistance and the agreements with Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia under the feed grain freight assistance adjustment program. The government also acts in many other ways to protect farm income. These programs may not appear at first glance to have a direct impact on farm income, but they help producers become increasingly efficient, reduce their production costs and derive better revenues from their farms. These measures and programs benefit not only farmers, but clearly consumers and the over-all Canadian economy, and in that context it is our belief that agriculture is doing well. Indeed, I understand the Economic Council of Canada report says so in a number of places. Reference has been made earlier to the fact that farm abandonment declined after 1970. It is therefore my belief that the over-all Canadian farming industry is doing well, to the benefit of our Canadian economy.

[English]

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate today since it deals with one of the two parts of what is required for survival in agriculture. The first thing any farmer must do to survive in agricultural production is to be able to produce. The second thing he must be guaranteed is the ability to sell his product at a price which will allow him to produce again next year. It is a very simple but complex formula. First of all, one must have production and some form of guaranteed production, to be viable for years, year in and year out. One must also have some form of income protection if one is to be able to continue producing from year to year.

Being a third generation Saskatchewan farmer, I feel that I may know about variability in both production and income, both from personal experience and from listening to my grandfather and my father recount some of their experiences. As well, I have spent a considerable amount of time reviewing the economic history of the region.

I suppose, to oversimplify, what the country really requires is farms which are able to survive. That is the bottom line. Survival at the farm level is the absolute bottom line. Over the years, and after much pressure on the part of farmers and much agitation, we have put pressure on political institutions, and with much assistance from politicians we have finally come part way in overcoming some of the problems by bringing in crop insurance for most of the crops which we now produce, which provides minimal guarantees of production.

The other part of the equation, the price part, is only dealt with on a skip and miss basis. As the parliamentary secretary to the minister has just outlined, quite often the response is only when disaster strikes. The hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Korchinski), who moved and is sponsoring the original motion, just pointed out that the funds coming from those kinds of programs often arrive far too late to be of any use to the farmer in his particular circumstance.

Therefore, I think we have to consider programs which are something like what the hon. member has put before the House today. We should go slightly further than to simply talk about a cash assurance program. We should talk directly about an income assurance program, because that is the other part of the equation which must be faced and dealt with directly. It should not be considered as something that should be passed over, as the hon. member from the government side said, simply because it does not deal directly with the particular problem. Based on the research I have done, I think that programs can be designed to deal directly with individual farm problems, just as we do under the crop insurance program. We deal directly with the crop loss on an individual farm basis. We could deal with price on an individual farm basis as well.

What I visualize is a program where producers of all of the major commodities would contribute to a central pool. I think, simply from past experience, that kind of pool could be kept actuarially sound. We know that while the market price in one commodity may be at disaster levels, there are nearly always compensating higher prices at the other end of the commodity scale somewhere else. Therefore, I think the funds could be kept actuarially sound. It could be managed by contributions from producers and from government.

I would suggest that the producer contribution should never exceed one third. The question as to who would pay the other two thirds is something which could probably be worked out between the federal and provincial jurisdictions, both of which have some jurisdiction in this particular case.

To this point in time, we have never dealt directly with farm incomes at the federal level. Some of the provinces have attempted to do so. I cite British Columbia as one example. The reason I think income programs have to be the focus of our attention is that the kind of stabilization proposals we have seen in this country, first of all, while they may cover a range of ten products, do not cover all the products and, second, they always operate on the basis of past history, and consider 90 per cent of the previous five years, or some such combination or formula. In a period of inflation, such as we are now experiencing, 90 per cent of prices which go back as much as five years provides very little protection for the producer, if, indeed, his commodity is protected at all. Of course, the companion problem is one of not receiving payment until a year or a year and a half after the bad experience on the part of the producer. Therefore, it does not supply the cash flow which is necessary for a farmer to maintain his fixed costs and his operating costs and to provide some minimal living standards for his family. It is, therefore, quite inadequate.

I would propose that the government give careful consideration to some sort of program similar to the one outlined by the hon. member for Mackenzie, with perhaps more emphasis on income than just the provision of cash on a willy-nilly basis. Obviously, such a program must be national in scope, perhaps similar to the unemployment insurance program, so that the benefits are equitable right across the country and the contributions are the same no matter what part of the country one is in or what commodity one is producing.

It would be based on a small percentage of one's production as an insurance premium, if so desired. Coverage of the program would be based on average production costs and current market prices so that one could establish what is, in fact, the income for that particular quarter in the year. It should be self-financing. It must be actuarially sound. As I said before, the producer should not be expected to provide more than one third of the funding. The other two thirds can be agreed to between the federal and provincial jurisdictions. There should be an eligibility ceiling such as that which is found in unemployment insurance. We do not want to be paying out $1 million to one producer, or anything like that. There should be a ceiling which is consistent with average incomes in Canada. The incomes should be available to farm families in order to allow them to have living standards which are at least equal to what one sees in the rest of the economy.

Clearly, all major farm commodities must be covered and must be contributing members of such a plan. It should also take into consideration subsets of commodities which develop because of production changes and techniques. For instance, weaning pig producers have not always been part of any stabilization programs, and neither have cow-calf producers, and the end producer has always received the benefits of such production. We tend to ingore the primary producer in any programs which we have developed up to this point.

It is very important that pay-outs must be computed on at least a quarterly basis. Certainly we should not leave it for an annual computation and find ourselves making pay-outs as much as a year and a half or two years after the greatest loss has taken place. Most certainly and most definitely such pay-outs would have to be computed on an individual basis, which is not too radical; but in terms of stabilization and income programs, this is a radical departure. It is very similar to what we have done with crop insurance. I can remember when I was very young going to meetings where government officials explained how it was totally impossible to make pay-outs and give crop insurance on an individual basis. We have been doing it since 1961 or 1962. It has created no untoward problems. I think we can do the same thing with an incomes policy as we have been able to do on the production side. Both parts of the formula for successful farmers are important, and both must be addressed.

I would support the general thrust of the resolution and recommend the same to the government members.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, the proposal put forward this afternoon by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Korchinski) is a refinement of a proposal that he originally put forward in 1976 during the debate on the western Canadian stabilization of grain prices. I have to pay tribute to the hon. member for taking the time and for putting the effort into thinking this proposal through, just as he did in 1976. Now in 1981 he has brought it forward as a private member's motion, refined and improved from what it was in 1976. He has married it with a couple of other ideas which have come out in the various proposals in the House. I think he is coming up with a positive, practical proposal, without requiring a subsidy by the government. It presents no admistration difficulties. It is simple. It is individual. He has the concept of the income-averaging annuity in it which the tax people accept here. I think recognition should be given him for what he has done. He has made a major contribution in proposing this agricultural program.

I have some knowledge of the developments of the history of the agricultural programs over the last 35 years in Canada. This fits in and harmonizes with what we started to do at the end of the war. In the original thinking we thought about how we could get accelerated sales. This was the first principle. Then we thought about how we could work out systems and formulae to stabilize price, which the hon. member for Humboldt-Lake Centre (Mr. Althouse) talked about. Then we thought about stabilization of income and we put in the crop insurance concept. We talked about a modern system of farm credit and we created the Farm Credit Corporation. Then we brought in the rehabilitation development theme which we know as ARDA. All that was good, fundamentally sound legislation based on information that we got from hard experience in the 1930s and during the war years. We did get this into place pretty well in the period of the late 1950s. But the truth is that no legislation or programs produced from the minds of men are ever perfect. So we have had to improve this fundamental program as the years have rolled by.

I have mentioned western Canadian stabilization price legislation which was brought in by the Hon. Otto Lang. I did not agree with his complicated formulae, and I said so, but it was an attempt to refine and improve what we had done originally on the stabilization of income.

At that time there were four distinct proposals made by the Conservative party on how to get away from what we saw were difficulties that would arise in the western grain stabilization program brought in by the then minister in charge of the Wheat Board. The worries that we had in 1976 have proved, unfortunately, to be true. It has not worked because it does not meet the condition we have to contend with. The point raised by the hon. member for Mackenzie, was that the real problem was a group of crazy nitwits in the western world who have been running our monetary policy and who have deliberately, on the basis of a false theory, rammed up interest rates to absolutely critical levels which has made it impossible for these programs, built over the last 25 years, to work. I am speaking not only of the farm programs but of programs for the small businessman and the large businessman. The home owner has been affected and so has the whole country. We have heard about this ad infinitum over the last few weeks in the House. The positive proposals made by members of the opposition over the last few weeks on small business, the export industry, farming and home building have to be listened to by the government.

I was very pleased when I heard a week or so ago that the four proposals made by the party whip for the Conservative party were accepted in principle by the minister on the government side. Two members of the New Democratic Party supported those four proposals. These were strange words for me to hear in this House, having witnessed so much cantankerous fighting and confrontation over the last few years on subjects on which we should be working together. These subjects are usually agriculture and labour. One cannot claim there is such a thing as an ideological difference between us. It is just a question of the status quo versus a desired change. I think that the government should be congratulated. I spoke after the proposals were made. I suggested to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) that he try an income-averaging annuity for farmers. This would allow farmers to put any spare money they had into a fund on any basis they could work out individually. There would be no administration. It would be left between the farmer and the bank, the farmer and the credit union, the farmer and the Farm Credit Corporation or any other institution. It is not necessary to have government administrators for a simple individual system. In return for getting the protection of the tax law, which business and other people get, farmers will now be eligible and the money could be lent at reasonable rates of interest of 6 per cent or 8 per cent with no loss to the tax collector. There would be no loss to the institution lending the money, and certainly no loss to the guy borrowing the money if he is getting it at 6 per cent or 8 per cent.

The proposal made by the hon. member for Mackenzie fits right into this scheme. The day after I spoke in the House I challenged the Minister of Agriculture to make an announcement that he would accept the principle, that he would work on it and bring it to fruition. I told him that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) would never dare to throw him out because all farmers would be behind him and so would all members of Parliament. The minister did accept that proposal and announced it on television. I have hopes that if enough support is given to him, he will push his proposal through cabinet. It will not cost the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) anything. In fact, it would be an asset.

This proposal, which the minister accepted ten days ago, is identical to the type of proposal that has been on the Order Paper for months as a private members' motion in the name of the hon. member for Mackenzie.

We should all realize that this is a sincere and honest effort, an effort over many years, trying to get an improvement which all parties want, namely the better handling not only of our agricultural industry but of others. We should realize that constructive proposals do come from members of Parliament and the word should be spread all across the country that we can force this cabinet to move.

Mr. Knowles: Question.

Mr. Stanley Hudecki (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, in the few seconds allotted me, I want to say how pleased I am to be invited to speak on this subject. It is unusual for an urban dweller to speak on farming matters. However, I speak with the intention of showing my appreciation and the appreciation of the urbanites of the farmers for the contributions they are making to Canada, for the dedication they have to their work, and their contributions to our welfare.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but the hour provided for private members' business has now expired. It being five o'clock, the House stands adjourned until next Monday at 2 p.m. pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 5 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.
