NEW MEMBERS

Madam Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has received from the chief electoral officer a certificate of the election and return of Jack Burghardt, Esquire, member for the electoral district of London West; and also a certificate of the election and return of W. Bennett Campbell, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Cardigan.

THE ECONOMY

CALL FOR REVIEW OF INTEREST RATE POLICY BY STANDING COMMITTEE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Madam Speaker, I rise to propose a serious motion having to do with the economy. If the government is serious about the plight of the economy, I hope that it will approve this motion. The Bank of Canada has been influential in maintaining interest rates at such high levels that small businesses, consumers, farmers and the whole Canadian economy, is suffering drastically. I therefore propose to move a motion, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis) which is the exact same motion as was moved by the present Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) when he was in opposition and the Bank of Canada rate was 13 per cent as opposed to the 17.75 per cent it is now. I therefore move:

That this House immediately order its Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs to undertake an immediate review of the interest rate policy of this government and the Bank of Canada, and that for this purpose the Governor of the Bank and the Minister of Finance appear before it to explain their actions and what they will be doing to solve the problems which the Governor of the Bank himself said, regarding interest rates, are now being caused for individuals and business.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE CONSTITUTION

APPLICATION OF AMENDING FORMULA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Now that the government, through its latest amendments to the constitutional proposal, recognizes the need for equality among the western provinces as well as the Atlantic provinces when dealing with the amending formula, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon):

That the government maintain consistency in the application of the principle of equality and apply it, as well, to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec so that all provinces in Canada can share fully in the heritage of being Canadian without being made to feel like second-class citizens in a checkerboard Canada.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HOUSING

DEMAND THAT MINISTER VISIT VANCOUVER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, I also rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a very urgent matter. Last week thousands of concerned citizens acknowledged the Vancouver housing crisis by attending a week of hearings and discussions which appealed for government action to alleviate the unbearable housing situation in B.C. Since the minister responsible has taken no action except to call for the removal of rent controls, and since B.C. loses more confidence in the federal government each day, I move, seconded by the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett):

That the minister responsible for CMHC be decentralized to Vancouver in order to experience the housing emergency first-hand, where he will have to choose to between sleeping in a clothing box on the street, camping in a tent, or buying a condominium costing half a million dollars. I further move that he act now or be fired.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AGRICULTURE

PAYMENT OF INTEREST ON PFAA FUNDS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Madam Speaker, I, too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the government has taken no steps to deal with the reference to the Standing Committee on Agriculture on the subject matter of Bill C-245, an act to repeal the PFA Act and set up a trust to invest $9,066,972, presently in a non-interest bearing account known as the Prairie Farm Emergency Fund; and in view of the fact that each day of delay means a loss of over $3,000 which should be available for research and development, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger):

That the government immediately begin paying interest at current government bond rates on the said $9,066,972 of producers' funds until such a time as a trust for research and development is established.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE ECONOMY

CALL FOR REVERSAL OF INTEREST RATE POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, as a result of the government's high interest rate policy, first mortgage rates are now 17 per cent. The prime rate is once again 18 per cent and seems to be heading higher. Businesses of every kind are saddled with inflationary interest costs which are hampering production and causing tremendous distress. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Scott):

That this House demand that the Minister of Finance reverse the damaging high interest rate policy that this government has imposed on business, home owners and consumers generally.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

USE OF WASTE OIL TO GENERATE HEAT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mel Gass (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Thousands of service stations right across the country have problems disposing of their waste oil, and I have been informed that waste oil conversion is not covered under the Canadian Oil Substitution Program. In view of the fact that there exists an efficient waste oil burner, and considering that we need to conserve our conventional source of oil, I move, seconded by the hon. member for York North (Mr. Gamble):

That the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources be instructed by this House to include the conversion of waste oil in the Canadian Oil Substitution Program, so that service stations can benefit, and make use of waste oil which would otherwise be disposed of.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

MEASURES TO PREVENT DUMPING OF JAPANESE CARS ON CANADIAN MARKET—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter which takes on increasing urgency. Given the desire by all Canadians to support a strong and vital manufacturing sector right across the country, and given the fact that Canada suffered in 1980 a $2.1 billion deficit in trade of manufactured goods with Japan, and in light of further reports that indicate Japan may be forced to dump nearly 120,000 cars in the Canadian market, further damaging both our trade balance with the Japanese and our domestic auto industry, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie):

That the government outline immediately the measures it intends to take to prevent any dumping of cars into the Canadian market.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

MARKETS FOR SURPLUS EGG PRODUCTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Madam Speaker, given that yesterday the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency announced that it will pay egg producers to slaughter some of their hens in order to reduce the large surplus of eggs on the Canadian market, and recognizing the urgency and importance of this situation to all Canadian egg producers and consumers, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Scott):

That the Minister of Agriculture act decisively and allow Canagrex to prove its worth in this situation and find markets for surplus protein from time to time and that the minister get on with this legislation, or is this another one of his "in a few more weeks" kind of proposition?

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PUBLIC SERVICE

EMPLOYMENT OF NATIVE PEOPLES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, since the 1980-1981 report on increased participation of indigenous people in the Public Service has pointed out the failure of the government to hire and promote Canada's native people, and whereas only 19 of 58 government departments and agencies last June complied with a Treasury Board directive to prepare action plans for native employment, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk-Interlake (Mr. Sargeant):

● (1415)

That this House expresses its regret that the only Treasury Board action that has resulted from the release of this damning document was a news release by the President of Treasury Board which reiterated policies that ministers and government departments have ignored in the past.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AIRPORTS

MIRABEL—REDRESS FOR EXPROPRIATED LAND OWNERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Strathcona): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion concerning a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering that nearly 500 buildings, both agricultural and commercial, have been destroyed for no apparent reason outside the operational sector of Mirabel airport; considering that a number of people were forced to leave their homes as a result of unsound administration, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bruce-Grey (Mr. Gurbin):

That the government right the wrong it has done to those people and to all the others who still live there by taking immediate steps to resell those lands.

Madam Speaker: Presentation of such a motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

HOUSING

MINISTER'S POSITION ON RENT CONTROLS

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for housing. On March 3 the Prime Minister made it clear to this House that rent controls are a matter of provincial jurisdiction. He also made it clear that the minister of housing's comments during the Ontario election, no matter which side of the issue the minister was on that particular day, were not an enunciation of federal government policy in provincial matters. The minister has raised the issue of rent controls again. In view of the Prime Minister's comments, is it still the intention of the minister to seek the federal cabinet's instructions, vis-à-vis a policy of rent controls, as he indicated to the House yesterday?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, as I indicated yesterday, although the hon. gentleman was not here, the National Housing Conference indicated that some provinces think that the issue of rent control is a good policy device. Some think it is not. Some provinces have changed their minds and are in the process of changing from rental control to a gradual withdrawal of control. This is a matter of provincial jurisdiction. However, as a citizen of this country and one who observes the effects of this provincial policy, of course I have my personal opinion. No doubt the government is impacted by policies of the provincial housing ministries in the area of rental control, but it remains a matter under provincial jurisdiction.

Notwithstanding the fact that when the Constitution is returned to Canada and we proceed with review of jurisdictions and the appropriateness of same, as well as the role of the various governments, I think that a strong case will be for provinces to continue to exercise jurisdiction in this matter.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Prime Minister, are you sure he is sure?

CUT IN BUDGET OF HOUSING MINISTRY

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. Over 40 per cent of the total expenditures for 1981-1982 are spent in the social affairs envelope. This is said to reflect the high priority which the government addresses to social affairs. I am sure the minister is aware of the concerns of Canadians these days over housing.

Therefore, why is it that out of 11 ministers who have budgets in the social affairs envelope, the housing ministry is the only one which has had its budget cut?

Mr. Paproski: It was because of the minister.

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I have indicated, for example, that the government's responsibility to this tight market is to attempt to work within available resources. The community services project, which was a program designed to assist municipalities with recreation facilities, was probably not the best way of spending existing moneys and funds that we direct toward housing. For that reason the government did not renew the program.

We are hopeful that with the assistance and the advice of hon. members opposite, together with the provinces, municipalities, and the public generally, those moneys which are freed will be better directed toward addressing the very difficult problems we have with housing today.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL MINISTERIAL MEETING

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, I believe the minister said his budget was cut. On March 14 the minister of housing was quoted in The Financial Post as saying that policy decisions had been delayed until the National Housing Conference had been held, and that he planned a meeting with the provincial housing ministers within two months. Yesterday in this House the minister indicated that meeting would take place some time later this year. Does the minister not feel that the situation in housing is important enough to have a meeting right away?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Yes, Madam Speaker. The question of a meeting with the provincial ministers is a top priority with me as minister responsible for the corporation. To that end we have today invited the provincial ministers responsible for housing to meet with me and the officials of the ministry in Ottawa on June 1. It is my hope that the work we have done in terms of preparation for the National Housing Conference, the all-sector conference, together with our exchange of correspondence since that time as to what we will have on that agenda, will enable the other ministers and myself to have a fruitful meeting on this subject in the first week of June.

CONSIDERATION OF ACTION TO ALLEVIATE SITUATION IN METROPOLITAN TORONTO

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, my question is also to the minister responsible for housing. The minister will know that in the metropolitan Toronto area there are over a million people who live in rental housing accommodation. Yesterday the minister indicated in an interview that, in his view, only a small minority of Torontonians can look forward to buying their own homes. He will also know that in the Toronto Star of last week, in a series of articles the Star pinpointed panic buying in the city and metropolitan area. What consideration has the minister given, if any, to a proposal to alleviate the situation with respect to housing in metropolitan Toronto?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, in my responsibility as Minister of Public Works I have had an opportunity of discussing this problem with the mayor of the city of Toronto. I have addressed the potential of the Harbourfront lands which are owned and administered by the federal government through Public Works as one of the areas where, for example, social housing could be started. It would be of assistance to those people at the lower income levels. With regard to social programs, section 56(1) of the act could be used to augment the present allocation of social units in metropolitan Toronto.

Mr. Crombie: Madam Speaker, the minister surely knows by now that housing in this country has become a national disaster. At the housing conference, he indicated that in his view it is reaching such a crisis in the city of Vancouver that he has proposed a tri-level program to see if he can deal with the matter. Is it not time the minister broadened that concept so that Canadians can again look to the opportunity of being able to own their own homes?

Mr. Cosgrove: Madam Speaker, implicit in the hon. member's question is the principle that all Canadians should own homes, that that should be the style of life of all Canadians. Of course that does not fit with the facts. We know that a large percentage of Canadians do not prefer home ownership as a style of living.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McGrath: What a statement for a housing minister.

Mr. Cosgrove: We know that the industry has bounced back from a very difficult time. We know that there is strength in the number of starts in the industry. They have risen from 125,000 a year ago to an expected 180,000 starts this year. By all standards that is only some 20,000 below what was expected to be built by anyone who objectively studied the market. Therefore the protestations that there is this crisis has to be put in the perspective, number one, of an industry that has rebounded from a difficult point of view, and put in the perspective of a continuing difficult affordability problem for many Canadians. We are aware of that and we are addressing that problem.

INCREASE IN SALARIES OF EMPLOYEES AT DEPUTY MINISTER LEVEL

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, after that expression of deep concern for the ordinary Canadian, I would like to ask the President of the Treasury Board a related question. The average worker's income this year for the fourth year in a row in real dollars will actually decline. Could the minister explain to the House how the government can possibly justify an increase in salary of up to 26 per cent for the top civil servant mandarins at the deputy minister level, whose average income now as a result of this increase will be $80,000 a year?

● (1425)

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I am glad the hon. member for Oshawa has raised this matter which was the subject of some very misleading comment in the press today. The government has given a 9.5 per cent increase to the executive group. This is happening at the same time as the implementation of the new management category. That category in fact was approved by Treasury Board and brought forward to cabinet, and the approval took place in February. The entire cost of that reclassification transfer from the executive group to the new management category was estimated as something in the neighbourhood of $500,000. Based on the total payroll of about $150 million, that gives you some idea of the magnitude of a percentage increase across the board. But to speak in terms of 26 per cent is utter nonsense.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, it is not utter nonsense at all. The minister has just indicated a certain percentage increase which, when complemented with the change in categories, adds up to exactly what I talked about, a 26 per cent increase. This means that the people at the very top end of the pay schedule in Canada in many cases are getting an increase which exceeds the pay of the average worker in the civil service. That is the sort of situation which is completely unjustifiable to anyone who has a sense of fairness.

Since the minister is providing up to $13,000 per year increases for certain categories of Canadians, how can the government conceivably do this at a time when it is doing nothing in terms of mortgages, in terms of energy costs, or in terms of tax breaks for the ordinary Canadian family?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to answer the first part of that question. The hon. member is engaging in arithmetic acrobatics of the kind usually practised by the hon. member for York-Peel. The fact is, Madam Speaker, that I challenge the hon. member for Oshawa to point to any examples of 26 per cent increases. He is confusing the new rate structures which are taking place and the classification which is taking place with the 9.5 per cent increase, the general increase approved across the board, which I might add is considerably less than the 10.4 per cent general increase in settlements in the public service last year.

REQUEST FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF FAIR PRICES COMMISSION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, the sophistry of the minister will convince no one who is not a backbencher in the Liberal party, and everyone in the country knows that. I would like to ask the minister if he will deal with the second part of the question. There are a lot of Canadians out there who are poor and suffering from inflation. Let me ask him one specific question. There is one act the government could take which would help the average Canadian, and that is to establish, for example, a fair prices commission with the authority to investigate price increases and roll them back when they are unfair and not justified. Will the minister take steps now to establish such a board which could be of concrete benefit to the average worker, instead of helping those who do not need help, which is the underlying policy of the Liberal party at this time?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Oshawa also seems to be confused in respect of my portfolio responsibilities. That is not a question which should be addressed to the President of the Treasury Board. But I can repeat, Madam Speaker, we are all mystified by this large number of public servants who received these 26 per cent increases. I would be very pleased if the hon. member would name them for my benefit.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

DECISION BY CANADIAN EGG MARKETING AGENCY TO KILL HENS

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, and it has to do with this disturbing and unfortunate headline: "Hens will die to keep egg prices high". By its own admission CEMA has over-estimated consumer demand over a two-year period and says its projections are all out of whack. This is causing problems for both egg producers and consumers.

I want to ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs if he has satisfied himself that his colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, who is responsible for CEMA, is serving the best interests of both egg producers and consumers at a time when farm incomes are declining and egg prices are on the rise?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Yes, Madam Speaker.

[English]

PASSAGE OF CANAGREX LEGISLATION

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, I am sure everyone will be satisfied to learn that the minister is satisfied with his colleagues. I will ask the minister on a supplementary question if he is pressing his colleague to get Canagrex through cabinet and into legislation so that it can do the job both for producers and consumers, as promised in the Speech from the Throne.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, the competence of my colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, is well known and I do not think he needs help from anyone whatsoever to carry out his projects properly.

INDUSTRY

MASSEY-FERGUSON FINANCING AGREEMENT

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. As representatives from some 280 banks are in Toronto today expecting to have a deal confirmed with respect to the refinancing of Massey-Ferguson, is the minister prepared to sign the final agreement guaranteeing the financing for Massey-Ferguson? On February 6 he indicated that was the decision of the government when he chose to make an announcement outside this House, concerning the guaranteeing of equity on behalf of Massey-Ferguson.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, we have indicated to Massey-Ferguson the terms on which we are prepared to guarantee the new equity portion of the refinancing, and I understand they are satisfactory to Massey-Ferguson. The formal coming into effect of the government's guarantee will, of course, depend on the drafting and signing of appropriate agreements between the various lenders, Massey-Ferguson and ourselves, and I understand that further drafting and discussions in that regard have to be completed.

POSSIBILITY OF BREAKDOWN IN AGREEMENT

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is also directed to "Dr. Doolittle," the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Is it not true that ten weeks ago it was represented that what the minister is now referring to as an agreement still to be finalized would be finalized by now, that in fact the financing faces a deadline of this Friday, and that if the minister does not finally move and if he cannot get an agreement out of his cabinet, there is a danger that the entire financing for Massey-Ferguson will break down and there may be as many as 6,000 Canadian jobs at stake?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, our efforts have been very much along the line of bearing in mind the concerns with respect to the 6,000 jobs and the role of the company in the Canadian economy. It is certainly through those efforts, and not through the empty words of the hon. member, that these concerns will be acted upon in an appropriate way for the Canadian economy.

Mr. Stevens: Are you ready to sign?

Mr. Gray: We are making progress in a satisfactory way as far as the Massey-Ferguson company is concerned. We need to have agreements in place which reflect the positions of some 250 banks as well as our own position and that of Massey-Ferguson. As far as I am aware, the timing is proceeding in a way which meets the requirements in question.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

F-18 FIGHTER AIRCRAFT—TEST FLIGHTS IN COLD WEATHER

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence, and it is with regard to our fair weather fighter. A week ago the minister met with his American counterpart and sought assurances with respect to the F-18 program. I would like to ask the minister if, during his meeting with Secretary Weinberger, or at any other time, he was informed of the most recent and very serious problems concerning the inability of the F-18 to function in what can only be described as normal Canadian winter conditions. I remind the minister that any aircraft which has unsatisfactory performance at –17.8 degrees and takes 66 minutes to activate its controls at –28.9 degrees could never function in the real world of the Canadian north.

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, it would be untrue to say that I did not expect this question from the hon. member. I expected the question, and I ask him to wait for a while and to see what the answer of the company and the U.S. navy will be.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lamontagne: Just a moment.

Mr. Broadbent: Let's wait for August. Do you want the country to warm up?

Mr. Lamontagne: Do you want to have the answer or not?

Madam Speaker: Order, would hon. members allow the minister to answer the question.

[Translation]

Mr. Lamontagne: Madam Speaker, I believe it would be better to wait till the company or the American navy have explained some of the allegations published in a number of newspaper articles and reports which are rather sketchy. Obviously, when an aircraft is being tested, it is quite natural to find certain defects. The purpose of those tests is precisely to correct them. I can say that the American Defense Secretary confirmed to me without a shadow of a doubt that the United States and the American Navy are committed to the F-18 as a fighter plane and that the McDonnell Douglas company is also committed to meeting the specifications given in the contract.

[English]

POSSIBLE DELAY IN PRODUCTION SCHEDULE

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Madam Speaker, if the minister honestly believes the pablum he is trying to feed us, our fighter program is in more serious trouble than I thought.

Can the minister tell us why he is always the last to know about problems facing the F-18 program? Could he tell us when he expect the latest problems to be resolved and why he feels no concern about possible delays, when even spokespersons for McDonnell Douglas have said these problems could very well delay the aircraft's scheduling?

[Translation]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I do not think the hon. member has all the details about what he is saying. Nothing has been said about delaying the manufacture of the F-18 fighter. I should also like to tell the hon. member that we are advised immediately when there are defects and corrections have to be made, that we have a team about one hundred strong in St. Louis, at the very plant where the F-18 is being built, monitoring the development of the aircraft; the American navy is doing the same. So, with those assurances, Madam Speaker, I feel we can relax and need not worry.

[English]

STATISTICS CANADA

EXAMINATION OF CONSUMER PRICE INDEX ITEMS

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Supply and Services. In view of recent criticisms from the Grocery Products Manufacturers of Canada that food price increases are not now accurately measured by the consumer price index, can the minister say whether Statistics Canada is examining consumer price index items to ensure that they do in fact represent current consumer spending patterns?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to receive the hon. lady's question in the nature of a representation. I might advise her that, in accordance with the information I have, there is no immediate plan to revise the food basket. However, we are monitoring the representations which are made by the marketplace and we take those representations into consideration.

AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

IMPORTATION OF JAPANESE MOTOR VEHICLES

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the minister of industry, trade and Japanese imports.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jelinek: Yesterday the Japanese government proposed that Japanese auto makers voluntarily cut exports to the United States by 7 per cent. I would therefore like to ask the minister what guarantees he can give us that this reduction in exports to the United States will not seriously increase the percentage of the Canadian market share of Japanese vehicles. Will he promise to resign if imports continue to rise, as he did with respect to interest rates?

Second, could he at the same time advise this House of the results of discussions held by the Canadian delegation in Japan last week regarding this very issue?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, on April 8 I called in the Japanese ambassador and conveyed to him, on behalf of the government, the message that if the Japanese government took action to restrain exports to the United States and did not take similar and parallel action with respect to exports to Canada, then we would be prepared to take unilateral action of an appropriate nature within our own structure in the light of Canadian market conditions.

The purpose of the task force which went to Japan was to make sure that this message was fully understood by senior Japanese authorities in Japan, and our discussions are continuing.

● (1440)

Mr. Jelinek: Madam Speaker, the Japanese commercial counsellor, Mr. Masaaki Mangaku, repeated today that Canada should not necessarily expect the same deal from Japan as the United States. Also he claimed that the meetings between Canadian and Japanese officials last week were merely repeat discussions and did not even reach the negotiation stage, as has been the case with the United States.

Therefore I should like to ask the minister whether he and his officials have determined if the Canadian automotive market can withstand the absence of more stringent import restrictions, notwithstanding the United States-Japan position and, as well, if he would like to comment on the effects this lack of policy already has and will continue to have on this market and on the economy as a whole.

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, I think my hon. friend is mistaken when he suggests that the Japanese government entered into formal arrangements restraining exports of vehicles from Japan to the United States to a certain level. It is my understanding that they are still considering the situation. We are very much aware of the impact of imported Japanese cars on the Canadian marketplace. That is why we have very firmly expressed our views to the Japanese authorities.

I should like to repeat in the House of Commons our position. If we do not have parallel and similar action, on the part of the Japanese government with respect to imports into Canada of Japanese cars, to what they do with respect to the United States, then certainly we are prepared to take unilateral action of an appropriate nature within our own legal system. I think that is a pretty clear and definite statement. It indicates our efforts and commitment to deal with the needs of the Canadian industry and the Canadian economy.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

F-18 FIGHTER AIRCRAFT—DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED STATES SECRETARY OF DEFENCE

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, I should like to return to the Minister of National Defence and the question of the F-18 aircraft. I wish I could become enthusiastic about the NDP concern for defence matters. I wonder if I might ask the minister whether, during the visit of Secretary Weinberger, the question of the status of the F-18 was raised between himself and the secretary. If so, what results of that conversation could the minister communicate to the Canadian public?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I think it was very clear in my comments after the visit of the Secretary of State for Defense of the United States that he said, in answering the media, that the United States was fully committed to the F-18. In our discussions about the possibility of cutting the numbers, or doing whatever about this program, he frankly told me that the program was on schedule and should go ahead as planned.

QUERY RESPECTING CONTINGENCY PLAN

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, because of the impact of the loss of the $500 million which Canadians invested in the predevelopment program that we are going through now, and notwithstanding the fact that even if they started to build tomorrow they could not produce an aeroplane within 16 months, could I ask the minister whether or not, within his own department, or in conjunction with Treasury or the Department of Supply and Services, he has called for the development of a contingency plan in the event that the series of difficulties at the testing phase of the development of fighter replacement aircraft continue? In fact, are we preparing ourselves for the worst in the event, God forbid, that it might happen?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, as I mentioned before, we have assurances from the United States and the company that the program is going ahead as scheduled. So, actually we do not require a contingency plan. However, if something happens which I do not believe will happen—and I say this just to answer the hon. member—as far as a contingency plan is concerned, we have a list of aircraft from which we chose the F-18; we compared one with the other. We have all the studies. We could go back and look into them, but I am sure it will not be necessary.

FOOTWEAR INDUSTRY

INQUIRY CONCERNING PROTECTION FOR INDUSTRY IN BEAUCE, QUE.

Mr. Normand Lapointe (Beauce): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The many Beauce workers in the shoe industry got together and sent me several petitions asking the federal government to extend the application of its special protective measures for this sector. In view of the great concern of the small businesses which are concentrated nearly exclusively in Quebec and Ontario and which are in serious trouble because of the competition of countries where the wages are lower, can the minister tell the House whether a decision in this regard will be made in the near future?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, we have just received the report of the Anti-dumping Tribunal of Canada on the Canadian shoe industry. We are now developing our new policy for the shoe industry and I am certain that this policy will be implemented long before the present system expires. We are well aware of the needs of this industry.

FISHERIES

REPORT OF FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL AGREEMENT RELATING TO FRASER RIVER FISHERY VIOLATIONS

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. A confidential report submitted to the British Columbia government, and leaked to the press this week, indicates that the Fraser River is nothing more than a sewer channel through which salmon must migrate. Also the report suggests that there is a gentleman's agreement between the federal government and the British Columbia government which calls on the federal government not to enforce the Fisheries Act under its jurisdiction. Is there indeed a gentleman's agreement between the federal government and the province of British Columbia to turn a blind eye to violations of the Fisheries Act, and if not, why have there not been more charges laid against the 200 suspected polluters in the lower Fraser River?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, if there is a gentleman's agreement, it is to avoid double permits being issued.

The fact is that in some cases we have laid charges in spite of the fact that a provincial permit was given. If my memory is accurate, one of our own harbour commissions was charged in the last few days. I was somewhat surprised by reports of the content of this report which was ordered by the provincial minister of the environment whose predecessor, by the way, opposed the enactment of amendments to the Fisheries Act about three years ago.

I must confess that at times I find, in the name of avoiding double permitting, some provincial governments are a bit lax in the enforcement of the Fisheries Act. I gave instructions some weeks ago to my officials to be much more vigilant than they have been in the past.

REQUEST FOR MEETING BETWEEN FEDERAL AND PROVINCIAL MINISTERS

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Mr. Minister, the fact of the matter is that 40 per cent—

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Miller: Madam Speaker, despite not getting the parliamentary procedure right, the fact of the matter is that 40 per cent of British Columbia salmon production takes place in the Fraser River. The minister is daily imposing more and more restrictions on sports and commercial fishermen, yet officials turn a blind eye to violations of the Fisheries Act, and the resources are depleting.

In view of the report, is the minister now prepared to initiate a meeting between the British Columbia minister of the environment, his colleague, the Minister of the Environment, and himself, to deal with the real problem of fish and stock depletion in the Fraser River before the fishermen of British Columbia cannot make incomes from the industry?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, if one compares the legislation which was put on the books three years ago with what existed before, there has been very, very important progress.

Some hon. Members: Enforce it.

Mr. LeBlanc: Some members opposite are shouting "enforce it". I would be glad to open the files; I do not know how many complaints there are about works we have prevented, dredging operations we have interrupted, and charges that have been laid. If the hon. member wants me to stop all industrial activity on the Fraser River, then I ask him to come out publicly and say so. There is no doubt that there has been a loss of fish habitat over many, many years. We are trying to push this back; we are trying to prevent damage. But if the hon. member wants to stop total industrial activity, I wish he would say so.

INFORMATION

PRINTING AND DISTRIBUTION OF PRIME MINISTER'S SPEECH ON THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister who last Wednesday told the House that the Liberal party, and not the taxpayers of Canada, would be paying for the 25,000 copies of his constitutional speech, which the Prime Minister's office instructed the Canadian Unity Information Office to draw up and which are currently being sent out by the Liberal caucus and by the National Liberal Party. In view of the fact that following the Prime Minister's statement, the Prime Minister's press secretary and the publicity director of the Liberal Party of Canada stated that the Prime Minister was wrong and that, in fact, 100 per cent of the cost will be borne by the taxpayers of Canada and not by the Liberal party, what is the truth?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I am glad I gave the hon. member the answer I did during the question period last week, which was the correct answer. After the question period I was informed that I did not have the facts. I tried to set them straight, but apparently my first answer was the correct one; so I refer the hon. member to my first answer.

USE OF TAX DOLLARS TO MEET COST

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, how does the Prime Minister justify using the Canadian Unity Information Office as a $23 million propaganda machine for the Liberal party? Will the Prime Minister give Canadian taxpayers the assurance that in the future the Canadian Unity Information Office and the taxpayers' money will not be used to promote the views of one man, on a matter which is still before Parliament?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I gave the answer last week in my response to the hon. member's question. I repeat it today. Every member of the House uses taxpayers' money when he sends a copy of his speech out to his constituents in the various parts of Canada. The Tory party does it, the New Democratic Party does it, as do we.

INCOME TAX

POLICY APPLICABLE TO RESIDENTS OF NORTHERN REGIONS

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, as is customary at this time of the year I would like to ask the Minister of National Revenue a question with regard to the taxation of northerners and northern benefits. He has used the terms "equity and fairness", and "ability to pay", which is one of the underlying criteria used in the tax legislation to establish regional taxation differences. Can the minister tell me whether the study which has been going on for some time in his department with respect to the critical problems of the gap in the cost of living between the north and the south is yet complete? Does the minister have anything to report to the House today with respect to any future policies which the government might adopt to redress this serious situation?

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. I want to tell him that the moratorium that we put in place will be in place until the end of 1981. I announced that decision the day before the budget of my colleague, the Minister of Finance, was announced. There have been some discussions between a number of departments, including the Department of Finance and my own department. I have nothing further to report on future policy at this time. The moratorium on the taxation of northern benefits is still in place and will remain in place until the end of 1981.

Mr. Oberle: It would, of course, be crucially important to consult some northerners about future policies which may be adopted by the government.

LETTER SENT BY PRESIDENT OF CANADIAN LABOUR CONGRESS

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the minister how he plans to respond to the letter he received from the President of the Canadian Labour Congress, Mr. McDermott, wherein he makes the suggestion that the government either appoint or establish a parliamentary task force or a royal commission to study the question of northern taxation. The letter the minister received was also sent to the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance, and others. Can the minister tell the House whether it is his intention to broaden the inquiry and establish such a commission or task force? Failing that, is the minister at least intending to meet with northerners to arrive at a position which would, indeed, be equitable and fair to all Canadians?

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, I have already met with a great many northerners as a result of the intervention of my colleague, the Minister of State (Mines).

An hon. Member: Who?

Mr. Rompkey: I have met with representatives of the Mining Association of Canada, with representatives of the governments of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, with the Steelworkers Association, with the Canadian Teachers Federation and with a number of different interested groups, as well as my own colleagues, with regard to this situation. I thank the hon. member for his own contribution which was in the form of a very useful brief.

There is wide-ranging discussion on this particular issue. We intend to take into account all points of view. Until such time as a further decision is made with regard to future policy, the moratorium will stay in place.

SMALL BUSINESS

TRIDENT AIRCRAFT CORPORATION—GOVERNMENT SUPPORT

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism). I would like to remind him of some commitments which were made by his government to an aircraft company in my riding in Sidney, called the Trident Aircraft Corporation. Can the minister briefly outline the connection that this government now has with Trident in terms of financial support and in terms of support personnel?

[Translation]

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, I do not have a detailed answer to this question at hand. However, if the hon. member will give me some time, I shall be happy to report on this matter tomorrow.

[English]

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, the minister is gathering this information. I hope he will put it on the record in the House.

Will the minister also give a history of the connection with the company, which quite clearly was a loser at the beginning and which was used by his party to gain votes during the last election—a matter which failed abysmally?

[Translation]

Mr. Lapointe (Charlevoix): Madam Speaker, I strongly deny the unwarranted statements made by the hon. member. I would like to tell him that when the government can come to the assistance of Canadian industries throughout the country to allow them to survive, maintain employment at its present level and develop new technologies, we do everything in our power to provide such assistance. Unfortunately, in certain cases, we cannot succeed. However, as you will agree, Madam Speaker, the extent of the information requested by the hon. member does not allow me to provide a complete answer during the question period. I shall be happy to provide this information in writing to the hon. member.

SEARCH AND RESCUE

INFORMATION ON RAISING ALARM IN EMERGENCY SITUATIONS

Mr. Stanley Hudecki (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. Some rescue efforts of a very efficient and daring Search and Rescue arm of the Canadian Armed Forces are thwarted by delays in receiving appropriate information. Can the minister inform the Canadian public what steps must be taken in these desperate emergency situations to bring search and rescue support in life-threatening situations?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I understand very well the concern of the hon. member for Hamilton West, considering the regrettable incident which happened in his riding involving the drowning of two children. In the interests of everyone listening in the House and outside it, I would like to tell the hon. member that the best way to obtain the services of the Search and Rescue arm of the Armed Forces when in distress would be to first call the local police or local authorities to ensure that they have a contact with the co-ordination centre of Search and Rescue.

I can assure the hon. member and the House that every time a case like this happens we do our utmost to make any kind of improvement we can in terms of search and rescue procedure, so that we can save as many lives as possible and help all Canadians in such cases. We keep a sharp eye out to try to make any such improvements.

REQUEST FOR HOLDING OF FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE—PRIME MINISTER'S POSITION

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Mnister who has now perhaps had an opportunity to reflect a little more carefully and fully on the proposal put forward by the eight first ministers when they met last week. I think the Prime Minister would agree that it would be preferable to all concerned if we could reach agreement in Canada with regard to the contents of constitutional reform. In that light, I wonder if the Prime Minister could tell us what he thinks he has to lose in convening a first ministers' conference to discuss any aspects of constitutional reform—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: —before that matter is finally voted upon in the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, a simple answer can be given to that question. The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition asks me what he thinks we have to lose. It is very simple. If we go the route suggested by the premiers and by the party of the Leader of the Opposition, we have to lose the charter of rights, we have to lose equalization, we have to lose the guarantee of aboriginal rights, we have to lose the rights of official language majorities in Canada to have education in their language in every province. We have to lose the Official Languages Act. We have to lose mobility rights. We have to lose, indeed, a great deal of things which make Canada Canada.

● (1500)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The Prime Minister speaks with a great deal more certainty than knowledge. He has the opportunity, as the first minister of the country, to put on the agenda of a first ministers' conference any questions he wants to put on the agenda. He can put his charter there. He can put equalization there. He can put any question there.

The simple matter that I want to put to him is: why does he not accept the opportunity which is open to him as Prime Minister of Canada to bring together the 11 first ministers to see what agreement can be found on his agenda, or on theirs, so that we can get agreement in Canada on a wide range of constitutional reform? What does he have to lose? Why will he not proceed now before the matter is finally voted upon by the House of Commons?

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member asks what have I got to lose in meeting the premiers. I remind the hon. Leader of the Opposition that I offered to meet the premiers. They chose to meet within days of the matter going to the Supreme Court. That was a fact well known by them. They chose to meet on Holy Thursday before our break of four days here. I indicated that I was free and available to meet with them during those days, and the Leader of the Opposition was party to an agreement which said that we had to move all amendments by last night.

If the Leader of the Opposition was so convinced that we could gain by a further meeting—he knows that I was prepared for that meeting—why did he not enjoin some of his friends amongst the premiers to accept the offer of meeting that I made to them?

The Leader of the Opposition says I would have put what I wanted on the agenda. He knows that we did put the charter on the agenda and that it was debated most of the summer. This was on the agenda. No, not this charter; a charter which was considerably weakened in negotiations with the premiers and which has since been strengthened by participation of hon. members of the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: The Leader of the Opposition knows that the premiers then refused the charter, refused even to discuss it until they got more rights for themselves, either over the fisheries or over other matters. He also knows that they met here last week and that they made it quite clear that they were not including the charter in their negotiations; that they wanted to discuss an amending formula, but they did not want to discuss a charter. Even the amending formula they did not want to discuss now, but some time later.

What we have to lose is an agreement by all sides of this House to proceed with this matter and a schedule which we all negotiated and agreed to together, so that hopefully we can get on to other subjects rather than continue—as the Leader of the Opposition, I believe, suggests—for another two years of negotiations on the Constitution, where we would then see if the provinces agree to a charter. We know they do not agree to a charter. That is why this House is so determined on seeing the charter included in the resolution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: First of all, the Prime Minister does not know what the premiers are prepared to agree to. He cannot know until he sits down—

Some hon. Members: Ha, ha!

Mr. Clark: No; they laugh!

The Prime Minister may have some view in his own mind, but it is now only that, and he has not given the Canadian process the opportunity to work out an agreement in a Canadian way.

A moment ago the Prime Minister said that last week or a few days ago he was prepared to meet with the premiers. Why is he not prepared to meet with them now? Why will he not take advantage, or the opportunity as it exists in the country, to sit down and try to get agreement among the first ministers, that, if it were found, could be brought back to this House of Commons so this House of Commons would deal with the matter that was the product of Canadian agreement rather than the product of a unilateral determination by one man leading one Liberal government?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I was prepared to meet the premiers last week; I was prepared to meet them yesterday and the day before. I would be prepared to meet them next month, and next summer, and next fall, and next winter, if they want.

The resolution before the House, as the Leader of the Opposition knows, provides for such meetings when we can exchange views on a better amending formula, if that is the subject they want to discuss, or on improving a charter, if that is what they want to discuss. I have even made the point very clearly that the resolution before the House permits the charter of rights to be done away with if that is what the premiers want; and if that is what the Leader of the Opposition wants to say is a position of his party, this is possible. We will have an amending formula which will permit us to do away with the charter.

All I am saying is that at some point hon. members of this House must make up their minds. We have been waiting for the premiers—I will not say for 54 years; I think I can say, in fairness, about ten months—to say what their position was.

The Leader of the Opposition challenges me to say whether I know what is on their minds. They have said what is on their minds. Premier Lyon, for instance, made it quite clear that he was against the charter. Premier Lévesque made it quite clear that he did not want entrenchment of educational rights for minority groups. These were made quite clear. If the Leader of the Opposition wants to espouse those causes, let him make that quite clear, too. Then we will have a debate in this House.

However, I think the Leader of the Opposition, like the premiers, is only intent on one thing. It is to procrastinate, because he cannot make up his mind.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I guess the real question is what you are afraid of.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

POSSIBLE USE IN EVENT OF STRIKES

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Solicitor General, if he will stay in his seat. Can the minister advise the House whether he authorized RCMP Chief Superintendent Fagan to promise the RCMP as strikebreakers within one hour of a police municipal strike in Halifax, even though such a strike would not involve 40 per cent of the municipal police officers in Halifax, and furthermore, can the minister advise the House whether he intends to make it a policy of the RCMP to act as strikebreakers in the event of a legally constituent police—

An hon. Member: Constituted.

Mr. Parker: —constituted police strike?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Well, Madam Speaker, the hon. member has it all wrong. We have a series of agreements with the provinces pursuant to which the RCMP are provided as a provincial police service. These agreements have expired; but I have indicated to the provinces that so long as bona fide negotiations continue, those contracts will continue to be regarded by us as being in force except for the financial provisions. It is those agreements which give the provincial attorneys general the right to call on the provincial police force, the RCMP in the province, to serve on an emergency basis in any capacity. I believe that this is the authority to which the hon. member is referring, and he should certainly address himself to the provincial attorney general.

QUERY RESPECTING POSSIBILITY OF MINISTERIAL TALKS

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): That is not to whom I am directing it, but to the Solicitor General. It was a request from the Mayor of Halifax for the RCMP to come in, in the event of a strike.

My supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Labour. Can the Minister of Labour advise the House whether he has had any discussions with his colleagues with respect to the use of federal employees as strikebreakers during legally constituted strikes outside the federal sector? Specifically, can the minister tell the House if he has had discussions with the Solicitor General regarding the use of RCMP in Halifax during this legally constituted strike? The point I am trying to make to the Minister of Labour is—

Madam Speaker: Order.

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): No, Madam Speaker.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, I believe my two colleagues, the other House leaders, will agree with me that in the agreement we presented on April 8 we covered just about everything which needed to be covered. However, it has been drawn to my attention that we did not make any change with respect to private members' hour tomorrow. In view of the fact that there are still many members who would like to speak in the debate on the Constitution and one hour would provide time for at least two more speakers, I wonder whether there could be agreement to cancel private members' hour tomorrow so that all of tomorrow's debating time would be given to the motion before the House?

• (1510)

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I am aware that private members' hour was to continue. As a House leader I have no objection to that but private members' hour does belong to the private member involved. Perhaps we could find out who the private member is and have some discussions with him, on the understanding that we could deal with this matter publicly a little later.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I am told that tomorrow private members' hour will be used up by the hon. member for Vaudreuil. I know that he is here, but I will be ready later today to confirm to my colleague whether it will be necessary or not to defer or cancel private members' hour. However, I wish to point out to my colleague from Winnipeg North Centre that it was not an oversight, because it was agreed that we would sit normal hours and follow the usual order of business. We had anticipated that there would be a private members' hour tomorrow. However, if the member for Vaudreuil now wishes to have it cancelled, I am ready to do so, if he agrees.

Madam Speaker: Order. The new arrangements will be laid before the House a little later when negotiations with the hon. member for Vaudreuil are completed.

MR. F. BELFORD—SPEECHWRITER

Question No. 2,165—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to the answer to question No. 5, that the former minister of national defence, the Hon. Barney Danson, spent $1100 of public funds to pay Mr. F. Belford for writing a speech given to the Canadian Defence Association (a) what were the qualifications of Mr. Belford (b) for what reasons were departmental officials not used to assist with the speech (c) approximately how many minutes did Mr. Danson take to deliver the speech and what was the resulting cost per minute for the speech?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence):

(a) Mr. Belford's qualifications are not known to the department. He was hired directly by Mr. Danson and any correspondence pertaining to Mr. Belford's qualifications, would be in Mr. Danson's papers in the Archives to which the department has no access.

(b) In the timeframe in which Mr. Belford was hired, no departmental officials with the specific qualifications of a speechwriter were available to assist Mr. Danson with his speeches. This was primarily due to the recent arrival of Mr. Danson as minister of national defence.

(c) It is not known how long it took Mr. Danson to deliver the speech. However, its length was 30 type-written pages.

RESEARCH GRANTS RESPECTING OIL

Question No. 2,182—Mr. Waddell:

1. Did the government give research grants to Imperial Oil or any of its subsidiaries and, if so (a) to whom (b) in what amounts (c) on what dates (d) under what program?

2. Did the government give research grants to the (a) Cold Lake consortium (b) Syncrude consortium (c) the Alsands consortium and, if so, in each case (i) to whom (ii) in what amounts (iii) on what dates (iv) under what program?

RESOLUTION RESPECTING CONSTITUTION ACT, 1981

The House resumed debate on the motion of Mr. Chrétien, seconded by Mr. Roberts, for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

And on the amendment of Mr. Epp, seconded by Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton)—That the motion be amended in Schedule B of the proposed resolution by deleting Clause 46, and by making all necessary changes to the Schedule consequential thereto; and on the notices of amendments of Mr. Knowles, Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton) and Mr. Pinard.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take the floor again in this protracted debate to explain to the House the amendments which the government wants to propose, the amendments we are prepared to accept, and also to set forth the reasons which prompt us as the government to reject the amendments proposed by the Progressive Conservative party, the official opposition.

First of all, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that the government has proposed two main amendments. The first concerns the supremacy of God in our Constitution. As all hon. members know, in the course of the lengthy summer negotiations we had proposed a declaration of principle as the preamble to our Canadian Constitution in which it was clearly stated that we wanted the supremacy of God to be recognized in our society.

During the summer, and for many other reasons, we were unable to reach an agreement with the provinces on that point to establish the nature of the preamble to the Canadian Constitution, and our intention has always been to write in the Constitution that our society had to acknowledge the supremacy of God. We believe that the best place for that was the preamble to the Constitution. But as we have been doing since the onset of our proceedings in the House and in committee, we listened to hon. members, we received a number of representations, and I am pleased today, as a result of the many discussions in this House and the pressure from Canadians—I believe my department has received close to 7,000 or 8,000 letters urging me to have the supremacy of God included in the constitution—and that is why, as the first government amendment, I am pleased to announce to the House that our charter of rights will include a very short preamble which will read as follows:

"Whereas Canada is founded upon principles that recognize the supremacy of God and the rule of law:"

Therefore, tomorrow night hon. members in the House will have the opportunity to include in the charter of rights the recognition of the supremacy of God.

The second amendment which the government wants to propose relates to the amending formula which might apply if, in the course of the next two years, the provinces cannot agree on an amending formula, thereby leaving us unable to submit any text of the provinces to the people of Canada in a referendum. There would be an amending formula in two years after patriation of the constitution. This amending formula we wanted was the one which has its roots in history and which had been approved by the eleven governments in 1971, namely the so-called Victoria amending formula.

When this amendment was dealt with in committee, as well as on a great many occasions after that, we received complaints, especially from the prairie provinces, that the so-called Victoria formula was creating for the prairie provinces a constitutional status different from that of the four maritime provinces. During the committee proceedings, I indicated that if the provinces—I mean, the western premiers—wanted to change that, they only had to say so. They did not say anything.

The Premier of British Columbia who had a special interest could have said something, because it has been established that the Victoria formula, especially that which concerns western Canada, had been demanded by the father of the current Premier of British Columbia, but the Mr. Bennett of today has not shown much interest. Therefore, under the so-called Victoria formula, an amendment to the Constitution would require the approval of the Canadian Parliament, two Atlantic provinces, the two central provinces, and two western provinces having more than 50 per cent of the total population of the four Western provinces. As it was perceived by Western Canada that this amending formula would create discrimination between the prairie provinces and the Atlantic provinces—

[English]

That was stated to me very well by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) in committee on November 12, when he said:

You gave Prince Edward Island a commitment. I am asking you for the same commitment for western Canada.

At that time I said I had to wait and see the reaction of the first ministers. At the same time the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom), who was the spokesman for his party in the committee, was pressuring me on that matter. Many of the members of the committee felt that it was very important. There has been some little movement in the New Democratic Party since that time and in the last few weeks the pressure has been coming from the leader of that party. Some of my colleagues in cabinet, particularly the minister from Manitoba, were putting pressure on me about that. As a result, cabinet has accepted the change and I am pleased today to be able to give the commitment which the hon. member for Provencher requested. Accordingly, the amending formula will be changed by deleting the population requirement in western Canada. Western Canada will be treated in the same way as Atlantic Canada.

• (1520)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: In other words, the amendment will be made, with the approval of the Parliament of Canada, to include any two provinces in western Canada, any two provinces in Atlantic Canada and the two provinces in central Canada.

[Translation]

As I indicated on several occasions to the House and the media, Mr. Speaker, we have also agreed, as the government, to accept the amendments proposed by the New Democratic Party. When we were sitting in committee, we received a great many representations concerning Clause 15, which deals with the rights of women and sexual equality and which has been the subject of a long debate. That clause has been accepted by virtually all committee members. After the committee had completed its work, the groups representing women kept on making representations to emphasize their eagerness to have absolute equality of the sexes enshrined, representations which I have referred to the cabinet, assuredly with the assistance of the hon. Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) who is responsible for the status of women to Parliament, and we have been glad to allow the New Democratic Party to propose this amendment. I think that the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) had raised the issue in committee on several occasions, and this party will gladly vote tomorrow in favour of this NDP amendment which will ensure equal status to women, as requested by many pressure groups.

We also accept that the other part of the NDP amendment, according to which the constitutional rights of our native peoples which are now or will now be enshrined in the Canadian Constitution may only be amended in the future by using the general amending formula, that is, by including in clause 54 of our constitutional project the fact that the rights of our native peoples, as protected by the Constitution may only be amended by means of the general amending formula which gives even greater protection to our native peoples, the Indians, Eskimos and Métis here in our own country. We shall be pleased to vote for that amendment.

[English]

I would like to turn now to the proposals put forward yesterday by the Progressive Conservative party, the official opposition. In his haste to please the eight provincial Premiers, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) has put forward a document which is unfortunately illogical and inconsistent. The Tory party thinks that it is proposing patriation and an amending formula only with the approval of seven provinces. However, the Tory party's last minute drafting proposes nothing of the sort.

As the Leader of the Opposition should know, the resolution asks the United Kingdom to enact the Canada Act, which will include as a schedule the Constitution Act, 1981. The amendments he proposes do not touch on the Canada Act, which deals with patriation and would come into force immediately in Great Britain. Also it would serve to end Britain's role with respect to Canada's Constitution. The Tory amendments would provide that the Constitution Act, 1981, or any part of it, would come into effect only if approved by seven legislatures representing 50 per cent of the population. However, it is the Constitution Act, 1981 which contains the amending formula. In other words, an amending formula would only come into effect if between now and July, 1983 it is approved by seven provinces.

What would happen if there were no such approval of an amending formula? Patriation would have taken place because of the enactment of the Canada Act. Britain would have given up its sovereignty over the Constitution. The Canadian Constitution would have been patriated without an amending formula, the exact situation we faced in 1931.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That is not right.

Mr. Chrétien: Because we could not agree to patriate with an amending formula, we asked Great Britain to retain legislative jurisdiction over the amendment of our Constitution. The alternative at that time was patriation without an amending formula. This was considered to be highly unsatisfactory because it would have left a great deal of uncertainty as to how amendments could be made.

It is that alternative which the Tories are proposing today, because we will be accepting the Canada Act without an amending formula. If we do not agree on an amending formula, there will be no amending formula. Therefore, we would be back to where we were in 1931, and no one is interested in that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: Accordingly, the Leader of the Opposition, although he may not know it, is proposing unilateral patriation and an amending formula to come into effect if agreed upon by seven provinces. If there is no agreement, he is proposing the creation of a legal vacuum. That is the consequence of his party's proposal and it is the first, the only and the absolute reason to vote against it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: Let us look at what would be the effect if we were to have agreement on an amending formula. Let us therefore examine the amending formula which the opposition now favours. After proposing three amending formulas, including one which would have required unanimity and one proposed after the committee hearings which would have provided for opting out of a charter of rights, the Tories have come with their fifth preferred formula.

First, the amendment contains a provision whereby constitutional amendments may be enacted following the approval of seven legislatures representing 50 per cent of the population. After it has been approved, amendments would normally be made by seven provinces with 50 per cent of the population. In other words, as a general rule, constitutional amendments could be made without the consent of all the provinces. For example, amendment would be possible with British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan opposed. Or, to take another example, Quebec, or Quebec and New Brunswick, would no longer be ensured of a voice in the protection of the French language at the federal level.

[Translation]

We know what that means. It means that with that formula, a majority in Parliament plus seven provinces could decide that in the future French would no longer be spoken in the House; that we would be denied the use of the official language of our choice in federal courts; that in all federal institutions in which we are represented we would no longer have any bilingualism; that the Official Languages Act soon to be enshrined in our Constitution, to protect it against the whims of the majorities, could be abrogated precisely on the whim of the majorities, without the Quebecers or even one or two of the other provinces favourably disposed toward the French fact being able to do anything about it. That is why, Mr. Speaker, the Progressive Conservative proposal is totally unacceptable to us.

● (1530)

Second, while the amending formula would be adopted by seven legislatures representing 50 per cent of the population, it would be only natural that it be changed in the same way. However, that is not the case. For some reason, changes to the amending formula will require unanimity. Here all provinces will acquire a veto right. The logic is less than overwhelming.

The Tory party will drop the referendum provision for breaking deadlocks. Despite a history of being unable to agree on constitutional change in Canada, the opposition does not see the need for a deadlock-breaking mechanism. Despite our democratic traditions, they do not trust the people to break deadlocks between governments.

What is the effect of not having a deadlock-breaking mechanism? Let me give an example. The federal Conservative party is in favour of a charter of rights as being the will of Canadians. They have said that many times. However, they propose an amending formula whereby a charter of rights can only come into effect if approved by seven provinces. In other words, it could be vetoed by any four Premiers.

The Tory proposal will not allow this veto to be tested in a referendum whereby Canadians could express their will. I will give an example. The six biggest provinces in Canada represent 88 per cent of the Canadian population, roughly 22 million people. The four smaller provinces represent about 12 per cent of the population, roughly three million people. Suppose that federal parliamentarians plus 88 per cent of the Canadian population want a charter of rights. We may not have one because 12 per cent of the population could deny Canadians a charter of rights or bargain a charter of rights against jurisdiction over fish, oil or other resources.

The Leader of the Opposition argues that there will be no opting out of a charter of rights. How can he guarantee that there will be a charter of rights under his amending formula? The eight Premiers who want to opt out will not have to worry because they will be able to veto the very existence of a charter of rights.

Furthermore, the Conservative proposal states that before the Constitution Act or any provision thereof comes into force, it will require the approval of seven provinces. We already know from last summer that all the provinces are opposed to the inclusion of a clause on property rights. We spent three months on that subject and all the provinces opposed it. Therefore, the amendment on property rights is mere grandstanding. The Leader of the Opposition and the opposition party know that this is one provision to which the provinces will never agree. It is just grandstanding. Under their formula, there will never be property rights in the Constitution.

The Tory amending formula will allow any four provinces to veto any provisions of the charter. In other words, the constitutional guarantee of the right of Canadians to live and seek work anywhere in Canada will be subject to the veto of any four premiers who want to prevent Canadians from other provinces from seeking work in their own province. What about mobility rights?

The same applies to language of education. Does the opposition really believe that with a new amending formula, Mr. Lévesque will agree to a constitutional guarantee of English minority language education rights in Quebec? However, if the other premiers do by chance agree to such constitutional protection for the French-speaking minorities in their provinces, would the Leader of the Opposition be prepared to use his amending formula to impose such guarantees on Quebec despite the objection of that provincial government?

What about aboriginal rights? Four provinces could block these as well. There would then be no aboriginal rights. What about non-discrimination rights, rights of women, the rights of the handicapped and all those matters we spoke about so much in this House in the last seven months? Some premiers could find that the Constitution is affecting their provincial jurisdiction.

What about legal rights? In effect, the Tories want a charter but will ensure that either there is none or, if there is one, that it is an emasculated charter of rights, and that is not what we want.

As far as the proposed amending formula is concerned, the Conservative party has maintained the checkerboard formula of the eight provincial premiers. Opting out remains. I might add here that we have been told during this debate by members of the opposition that without opting out there would have been no Canada Pension Plan, Quebec Pension Plan or medicare. I want to remind hon. members that neither the Canada Pension Plan nor medicare is a constitutional right. They were enacted by statute as a federal expenditure.

Mr. Trudeau: By a Liberal government.

Mr. Chrétien: And by a Liberal government acting against the will of the provinces.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: I have to tell the opposition that there is a very big difference between opting out of a statutory program and opting out of a provision in the fundamental law of the country.

Then the Conservatives propose that there be a special provision to the effect that the Constitution does not abrogate Parliament's power to legislate with respect to abortion and capital punishment. The law officers of the Crown have expressed their opinion that nothing in the proposed charter affects the power of Parliament to make laws respecting abortion and capital punishment. However, a precise statement to that effect in the Constitution would open the door to questions as to why other subject matters have not been specifically excluded. There is a rule of interpretation that I learned in my second year of law school: "inclusio unius exclusio alterius". In English, that means to include one but exclude others. That is why we cannot accept the opposition's proposal; it could have a devastating effect on the Canadian charter of rights.

The final change proposed is the creation of a permanent constitutional conference—this is one of the good proposals—but the conference could not begin its functions until its creation is approved by seven legislatures. In other words, until the provinces agree on an amending formula, perhaps as late as 1983, or perhaps never, there could not be any constitutional conferences. The formula has to be approved first by the provinces before the conferences can start. Therefore, I prefer our proposition that there be two meetings in the next two years. Everyone will have to be there. In the meantime, we will apply the unanimity rule. It is less complicated. It is clear. We could wait a heck of a long time before the other proposal came into effect.

The view of this government is that there should be at least two constitutional conferences in the next two years. The opposition has been asking us to meet the premiers, but has proposed a mechanism whereby there may never be a constitutional conference. After 54 years of frustration, the Tory drafters are proposing more delay. It is the view of the government that we must act now.

We have come a long way since last October. When I introduced the resolution on behalf of the government in October, quite a number of people thought it was deficient in many regards, and it was so because we had tried to propose a charter that would please each and every one, all the premiers at the same time, and that is very, very difficult. Today, we have reached the end of this debate and I am very happy to see that we can bring it to a close in a more civilized fashion because finally, the majority of hon. members can express themselves as democracy would have them, and tomorrow evening we can vote on these amendments. Then we shall wait for the Supreme Court ruling. The matter was not referred to the Supreme Court by us. How many times have I said in this House that the judiciary was not to be involved in the legislative process. The provinces are the ones who dragged the matter before the courts; we won two decisions and lost one.

But what is astonishing, with the beginning next week of the last phase which will lead to the final result, is that the opposition is changing its mind and that the provinces are now saying that legality is not important. It is not so much a legal issue as a political one. But who instituted legal proceedings against us? The governments of Quebec, Manitoba and Newfoundland. Who asked us to wait for the Supreme Court's ruling? The opposition. So we are saying today that we will respect the supremacy of God, as it is enshrined in the Constitution. The opposition is saying: no, no, no, it will become a political issue if you win, but it will remain a legal one if you lose.

[English]

I do not want to take too long as my time is quite limited, but let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the result of the work we have done will be one of the most important pieces of legislation to be enacted in the last 50 years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: It is hoped that what we have here today will determine what will be the Canada of tomorrow. There have been more contributions toward this piece of legislation than any other piece of legislation. How many provisions do I now read in the charter of rights that were not there in October?

I note the presence of the hon. member for Don Valley East (Mr. Smith) who is chairman of the committee on the handicapped. His committee put pressure on me. We were not sure that we should include their proposal but it is now there. I remember that the members of the NDP, of my party and the Tory party were very cheerful in the committee on the Friday afternoon when we agreed that we should recognize at last aboriginal rights in the Canadian Constitution.

Let me say a word about women's rights, and I will terminate on this subject.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order please. I regret to inform the hon. minister that his time has expired.

The hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) has the floor.

[English]

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, the theme of my remarks is taken from the great teacher Hillel, who asked three famous questions: "If I am not for myself, then who is for me? But if I am only for myself, then what am I? And if not now, when?"

The first question, "If I am not for myself, then who is for me?", strikes at the core of the dilemma in which we Canadians find ourselves. The Fathers of Confederation, some 114 years ago, worked hard to produce in Canada a Constitution that reflected the needs of that time. That we are here today is a measure of their success, but like all measures it was not perfect for all time.

Since the British North America Act of 1867 was an act of the British parliament, the only way it could be amended was for the British parliament at Westminster to make the changes. The British parliament has done this at the request of the Parliament of Canada several times over the past 100 years. Since 1867, it is important to know, Canada has become self-governing in most important senses of the word.

Yet, Mr. Speaker, there has always been something missing. That something has been the means to forge our own constitutional identity here in Canada. Hillel's question puts it very clearly; we have to be for ourselves before we can be for anyone else. Yet, Mr. Speaker, we cannot be fully for ourselves so long as the Canadian Constitution remains an act of the British parliament and not something which truly belongs to the Canadian people.

This debate is not just a bunch of lawyers arguing about the meaning of sovereignty. The patriation of the Canadian Constitution is a critical step in Canada's coming of age. Patriation is not the last step to nationhood but it is a necessary step. If we are to focus in the next decade on the task of patriating our economy, which I believe in profoundly, we have to act now on the question of the Constitution. The division in the country is over how this should be done.

Hillel's second question, "If I am only for myself, then what am I?", speaks directly to this debate. If our preoccupation becomes not what is best for the whole country, but simply what is best for a province or a region, or even, I might say, what is simply best in the immediate or short-term interest of one political party or another, then Canada will clearly be the loser. No province likes the prospect of losing an absolute veto over any future constitutional change, but the hard fact is that if we give a veto to each and every province we shall never achieve any significant progress in reworking the Canadian Constitution.

This resolution does not necessarily impose an amending formula. What this resolution says is: Here is the best effort to date. If the premiers can find a better one, we will let the Canadian people decide between the two in a referendum.

Eight of the provincial premiers met last week and produced a new amending proposal. They did not deal with the charter of rights, they did not deal with native rights, they did not deal with the question of equalization, or even with the question of provincial control of resources; they dealt with one question and with one question only, and that was the amending formula.

There is, of course, a vital difference in principle between the method of amendment proposed in this resolution and the method proposed by the eight premiers. Under the first, that which is contained in the federal resolution, the constitutional amendments approved by the federal government and the provinces would apply to all Canadians and to all provinces. Under the second, that of the eight premiers, provinces that did not like an amendment because they thought it affected their existing powers could simply opt out.

In my view, the eight premiers' proposal is a classic example of people being only for themselves. It denies the essence of the creation of the federation of 1867. Frank Underhill once described a nation as a "people who have done great things together in the past and look forward to doing great things together in the future". An "opt out Canada" means that what we have in common in Canada would be constantly under threat. If one province or any group of provinces continually exercised their power to opt out of changes they did not like, Canada would no longer be a people who did great things together in the future, and I question whether we could long survive as a nation.

In refusing to deal with the charter of rights now, the eight premiers have made much of the fact that they represent 60 per cent of the Canadian people and that we should put off consideration of the charter until some unspecified time. They have also said that any provincial majority should be able to opt out of any features of the charter they do not like as well as future amendments.

The premiers have failed to recognize that three times in the past decade all three federal parties have gone on record as favouring a charter of rights for all Canadians. Do not the members of this House represent Canadians who live in those eight provinces? Is the House of Commons not in Canada? Do we not speak for Canadians? Do Canadians in Manitoba really want fewer or different fundamental rights than their cousins in Saskatchewan or Ontario? And can we survive as a country if the fundamental attributes of citizenship are different in neighbouring provinces?

I want to turn now to the third principal feature of the resolution, the charter of rights itself. I want to say a few words about what the charter will do, why it is necessary and why it is important that we include it as part of this resolution. In doing so, I am answering Hillel's third question, which was the theme of my remarks: "And if not now, when?"

The issue is not a Canadian charter versus a charter from Westminster. The issue is a charter of rights debated, studied and approved by the Parliament of Canada dealing with the basic attributes of Canadian citizenship, versus a Canada where the guarantees of these freedoms are subject to permanent veto by the provinces or, equally fatal to our country, subject to some provinces deciding to opt out of basic rights.

Let us look at what the charter actually provides and what it will really do. The charter guarantees certain freedoms which Canadians have come to recognize as fundamental: freedom of speech; freedom of association; freedom of conscience and religion; the right to work and live anywhere in Canada; the right to vote in democratic elections; the right not to be detained by the state without having a criminal charge laid; the right to counsel; the right, in the case of certain serious charges, to a trial by jury; protection against the state having unlimited powers of search and seizure; protection at trial against the use of illegally obtained evidence; the right to a bail hearing; and other associated legal rights.

The second thing the charter does is to guarantee what it calls equality rights. This will have the effect of making discrimination on the grounds of sex, colour, creed, religion and mental and physical disability unlawful. It means that every citizen of Canada has the right to demand of his fellow citizens and of his government, whether provincial or federal, that he or she be treated equally and with respect. It means that those citizens who feel that they have not been treated equally can take their fellow citizens and their governments to court to have those rights enforced. It means that certain practices and prejudices will have to change. It means that minorities, however temporarily unpopular, as well as all Canadians will have constitutional guarantees of equal treatment before and under the law.

This is not just a right to fair procedure; it is a right to equality in the substance of the laws themselves. It means that no person and no government is above the law but is subject to it. It means that federal and provincial governments are equally subject to claims by all Canadians, of whatever background, that they are to be treated equally in form and in substance and that, if they are not treated equally, they can take their government to court. It means that this right to take the government or anyone else to court cannot be unilaterally taken away by either the federal government or a provincial government.

This is a charter with teeth, and many of the weaknesses in the courts' interpretations of the Diefenbaker Bill of Rights will be removed because of the clarity of the standard Parliament is setting in this charter. It is to clarify these standards further that our party is putting forward its amendments respecting women and native people.

The third feature of the charter is the section on language rights, the guarantee that French and English will be the official languages of the country and the guarantee that minority language rights in education will be protected everywhere in Canada wherever numbers warrant. I regard these provisions as the fulfilment of the promise of 1867. I am proud of our official languages, and so is our party. We have to provide for their full expression.

To those Quebecers who are convinced that the proposed provisions ensuring minority educational rights strike a blow at provincial integrity and jurisdiction, I must say that I do not agree with these conclusions for fundamental reasons. The educational rights of francophone minorities are now protected throughout the country. It was a long and hard-fought battle, but we won over the forces of reaction and intolerance in the rest of Canada. There will never be another Penetanguishene.

This is not simply a matter of education, but a matter of survival and of cultural development. The French language is as vital for the life of francophones as the air they breathe. If these minority educational rights are recognized, they must also be recognized in Quebec. I cannot believe, Mr. Speaker, that to recognize minority rights in well-defined and limited provisions such as those in the resolution really threatens the francophone majority in Quebec, in view of the vigour shown by Quebec in the last few years and of the sure and confident manner in which Quebec has managed its political and cultural affairs for so long.

Personally, Mr. Speaker, I sincerely regret the decision of the Ontario government not to recognize officially what actually exists already for Ontario francophones as far as the recognition of French in the legislature and in the courts is concerned. If clause 133 were to apply to Ontario, nothing would change in actual fact, but it would have a significant symbolic value for francophones in Ontario and elsewhere in Canada. The rights of Franco-Ontarians should be recognized in the same way as are those of the English minority in Quebec; this would be only fair.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rae: For my part, I am deeply disappointed in the Ontario government which, in the name of certain egotistical interests, refused to be generous to the francophone minority in Ontario. I sincerely hope that the Ontario government will change its policy in this regard.

[English]

In addition, the charter of rights sets out to guarantee the principle of aboriginal rights for Canada's original peoples, the Indian, Metis and Inuit. There is also the assurance that the question of land claims and other aspects of native rights will be on the agenda of forthcoming federal-provincial meetings between the first ministers.

The explicit recognition of the historical and collective rights of Canada's original peoples is, in my view, a milestone in our constitutional history—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rae: —a milestone which would not have been achieved without the determination and courage of a number of people, including my leader, the hon. member for Nunatsiaq (Mr. Ittinuar) and the hon. member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands (Mr. Manly). It is a hard fact of political life that had these members, dealing with both the leaders of the native communities and the government, not been prepared to forge a new confederation bargain, there would have been no recognition of aboriginal and treaty rights in the resolution to form part of an amended Canadian Constitution.

The charter also guarantees the rights of those Canadians who are neither French nor English in their heritage. Across the street from my home on Withrow Avenue in Toronto is an elementary school which is no less international and multicultural than the United Nations itself, but that is in every sense Canadian. It gives me great joy to represent a constituency where Canadians of Greek origin, of Chinese origin, of English origin, of Scottish origin and of all backgrounds live and work together. They are proud of their parents and their grandparents. They are proud of the countries and the cultures from which they come. They are also deeply proud of the country in which they have chosen to live, Canada, and prouder still of the common inheritance which their children and grandchildren will have as Canadians. I am delighted that the charter of rights reflects the diversity of all those who cherish their Canadian citizenship.

That is what the charter of rights does. Why is it necessary? There are observers of all political persuasions who tell us that Canada's common law and civil law traditions are perfectly adequate to protect civil liberties in Canada and that an entrenched charter would give the courts powers which are better left in the hands of legislatures.

There is obviously not time here to deal with all the pros and cons of this issue, but it needs to be said that our traditions have not been adequate to protect many Canadians and that as our country becomes even more diverse we can no longer rely simply on the good will of majorities to protect the rights of minorities.

Let me remind the House that while many Chinese Canadians built Canada's railroads and many died building those railroads, they were not regarded by the majority as fit to be Canadian citizens until 1949. Let me remind the House that generations of Chinese were not allowed to be reconciled with members of their family because the majority at the time saw fit to shut the doors to all Chinese immigration between 1923 and 1946. We must think of the hardship and isolation that enforced separation must have meant for those we are now so proud to call fellow Canadians.

The history of Canada's treatment of its native people is filled with examples of discrimination and prejudice of which we cannot in any way be proud. It is a hard fact that we have as a nation yet to accept fully in our hearts and laws, as well as in our rhetoric, the multicultural and indeed multiracial character of our society. Tragically there are many Canadians who, by virtue of the behaviour of their fellow citizens, have been made to feel that they are in Canada on sufferance and not as a matter of right. There are, ominously, signs of the revival of the most vicious kind of racial prejudice in the re-emergence of the Ku Klux Klan and similar groups in Canada.

Japanese Canadians know from bitter experience just how generous the majority and the Liberal government of the day was prepared to be to protect their rights in World War II. In the meagre compensation paid to them by the Liberal government after the war, we know what "parliamentary sovereignty with no entrenched charter of rights" has meant for them.

There are countless other Canadians who have known over past generations the full meaning of the words, "tyranny of the majority" which has from time to time taken hold in our country and made life so difficult for those who thought differently, spoke differently, prayed differently or lived differently. These differences must quite simply be protected; that is the meaning of the charter of rights.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rae: Canada is not a homogeneous country or society. We cannot pretend any longer that minorities either have been or will be protected unless those minorities have guarantees, guarantees which are not simply those of a parliament or of a legislature but are guarantees of a constitution.

Some spokesmen have made much of the fact that rights do not come from governments—but rather come from God, or at least from one's view of what it means to be truly human. I agree with that view. By the way, that is why our party will be supporting the amendments put forward by the Liberal party to the preamble. If we are to take rights seriously, we must recognize that their foundation stems not from what is convenient for the state to give, but rather from what freedoms are necessary to express our humanity in all its fullness.

An entrenched charter does not simply come from Parliament or the legislatures. We are not giving rights or taking them away whenever it is convenient. An entrenched charter recognizes that those rights which encourage the full freedom of the human personality need the additional protection of a constitutional guarantee in order to be secure. It is precisely because rights are not simply utilitarian conveniences to be given and taken away at will by legislatures and parliaments that we need to entrench them in the Constitution.

I find it completely contradictory that those same critics who have made such a point of saying that rights do not come from governments but that rights are prior to governments, a point of view which I wholeheartedly share, then go on to say that these same human rights can only have effect in those provinces which are prepared to pass them. If the rights are basic, surely they cannot be nullified by a provincial legislature.

This checkerboard theory of fundamental rights in Canada is said to reflect our historic diversity. What nonsense! We are not talking about diversity but about whether a native Canadian living in Manitoba should have the same rights as his brother in Ontario; whether a disabled Canadian in Quebec should have the same claim to fairness from his countrymen as his sister in Nova Scotia. The fundamental question is whether we can long survive as a nation if there are no fundamental attributes of citizenship that apply regardless of which province one happens to live in. The view that fundamental human freedoms, the basic attributes of Canadian citizenship or what it means to be a Canadian, should be subject to sterilization by any province has on more than one occasion been rejected by the Supreme Court. It should also be rejected by Parliament.

In making explicit and then guaranteeing rights which have become fundamental to our view of what it means to be a Canadian, we cannot then go on to make those rights depend upon the geographical roulette of where in Canada you happen to live. Federalism is not simply the stringing together of a number of sovereign states or a mere community of communities. In the words of the British North America Act of 1867, we created a federal union, strengthened by the growth of new provinces and by the historic decision of Newfoundland in 1949 to join with the country. We did not create an agency of provinces in 1867; Canada is more than the sum of its parts.

I began my remarks with a reference to the famous three questions of Hillel. The last question was: "And if not now, when?" It is now clear that the tensions within federalism are far more than dual and far more than simply cultural or linguistic. That is why the debate on the Constitution is not irrelevant or the private fantasies of one man. The challenge of constitutional, economic and political reform will be with us long after the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) disappears from the scene.

Many years ago a Canadian who has contributed much to the political, cultural and intellectual life of our country, Frank Scott, said that one day Canada will have a rendezvous with the BNA Act. Canada's rendezvous with the BNA Act is imminent, and I am proud that my party and, if I may say so, my leader have not flinched at the prospect of this rendezvous but rather have welcomed it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Henri Tousignant (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend today to give a historical account of federalism in Canada. This has been done many times already—

[English]

Some hon. Members: What is going on?

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Have we lost our right to free speech? Do we on this side of the House never get a chance to speak? What are you trying to do, knock us out or something?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. No members have been prevented from speaking in the House; it depends upon when they are recognized. The Chair has always followed the tradition of recognizing the parties evenly.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Taylor: We have already heard two Liberals.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): For the information of the hon. member, I could go through the list of speakers who have participated so far. It is traditional that the Chair goes from government to opposition. This has been a long-standing tradition, and I have followed it quite fairly.

Let me start with the last round. The last NDP member who spoke yesterday afternoon was the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn). Then we had one Liberal, one P.C.; one Liberal, one P.C.; one Liberal, one P.C.; one Liberal, and the eighth speaker today was a member of the NDP, the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae). Now we go back to a Liberal and then a P.C.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am not in the habit of questioning what the Chair has said, but when I approached the Chair earlier today, Your Honour will recall that I reiterated a conversation which had taken place yesterday with a member of the chair. The arrangement yesterday was that there would be four speakers for the government side, three speakers for our party and one for the NDP.

Mr. Epp: Just let me finish. You will recall that at the same time the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn) came to the Chair. Through the gentlemanly arrangements which take place in this House, we agreed that he would be recognized earlier in that first cycle of eight because of his own time schedule. That was the arrangement which was left with your predecessor yesterday, Mr. Speaker. It was agreed to by all parties.

Today when you recognized the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae), I came up to the Chair and pointed the matter out again. In order to try and rectify the situation you said subsequently that you would be recognizing the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty).

We are now in a difficult situation. On the one hand you say that you will be recognizing a member of the government party, and on the other a member from the opposition. That is fair and I have no objection to it, but I say to you, Mr. Speaker, with all the respect I can muster, that a mistake was made in terms of the arrangements which were agreed to yesterday.

Mr. Collenette: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I do not think that we should prolong this matter. If it is to be a point of absolute determination on the part of the opposition, I am sure we can reach some accommodation. But I would like to set the record straight.

Yesterday afternoon I informed the Deputy Speaker that during the three days of debate the government would be exercising its normal right on a government motion, which is to put up a speaker for each speaker from the opposition. As you will note, the hon. member for Victoria-Haliburton (Mr. Scott) had the floor when we were debating this matter a few weeks ago, and he continued his remarks yesterday. In fact, he was allowed, theoretically, ten minutes more than the order since we felt he had started under the old rules and should not be restricted. We have since alternated government speakers with opposition speakers. There was some arrangement made yesterday to accommodate the hon. member for Brant; but that was strictly a matter of the Chair dealing with the opposition party. The normal rotation is four government speakers and four opposition speakers; that is, four Liberals, three Conservatives and one member of the NDP.

At this point in time, Mr. Speaker, according to normal practice and according to the point I made yesterday with the Deputy Speaker and with the hon. member for Lachine (Mr. Blaker), in telling the Chair who our speakers would be, it is now the turn of the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Tousignant). You have recognized the hon. member for Témiscamingue, and if members opposite are going to force the issue, move a motion and cause a vote to be taken, that is something we do not want. We do not want any unpleasantness. I am sure my hon. friend from Témiscamingue will withdraw. But I must say that in this case it is the right of the government member, having been recognized, to speak in the normal rotation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I would like to clarify this situation. I have been reminded by the hon. member for Provencher that a decision was made by the Chair yesterday of which I was not aware. Subsequently, the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Collenette), said that if there was any arrangement it is not that any speaker on the government side will be lost. He said that he intends to exercise his party's prerogative, which is to have one speaker for the government opposing one speaker for the opposition. I also informed the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty) that he would be the next speaker.

There was no other hon. member seeking the floor at that time, nor had I received notice from any member seeking the floor. I did receive a note from the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Tousignant) informing me that he wished to seek the floor. Therefore, following the tradition of alternating from one government speaker to one speaker from the opposition, I had to recognize the hon. member for Témiscamingue. The parliamentary secretary now suggests that there could be an undertaking made by the hon. member for Témiscamingue that he would seek the floor later.

Mr. Tousignant: I agree to that, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The matter has now been resolved. The Chair recognizes the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to begin my remarks by thanking the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Tousignant). This situation was not of his making and I appreciate his graciousness and generosity in being willing to stand down to allow a member of the official opposition to speak now.

In the remarks of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) there was very little with which I agreed. But there was one point I agreed with, namely that this resolution which is before the House today is one of the most important pieces of legislation to come before Parliament in 50 years. That is why the conduct of this debate and the resolution itself is critical, and it is why the attention of all Canadians is focused today on Ottawa. This is why Canadians from one coast to another are expecting this government and this Parliament to accept their responsibility to unify Canadians, to bring this country together; to have as the last achievement of our nationhood in Canada an act which unifies Canadians, which gives them hope for the future instead of embittering them, driving them apart and casting serious doubts upon our ability as a country to survive in the future.

Parliament is now entering the second to last phase of the government's constitutional plans this week. It is a project which was justified to Canadians on the grounds of unity and national maturity, but which was conceived and promoted in division and colonialism. The government's strategy, which was made clear in the infamous Kirby memorandum and which was also made clear today in the partisan, divisive and bitter speech made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), has been to pit region against region and Canadian against Canadian. It has been to use our last colonial ties to make major changes to our Constitution in a foreign country.

Gaining the last element of our independence, which should have caused unparalleled unity among Canadians. Embedding basic human and political rights in our Constitution, should have caused celebration of our good fortune as one of the freest people on earth. Instead the government, through its stubborn and dangerous belief that our Constitution is the property not of 23 million Canadians but of one man, has corroded the national ties which keep this Canada from breaking into ten unconnected fragments of a country. It is common sense and good will which binds Canadians together; yet the government's actions have defied common sense and have damaged that goodwill.

When members of this House listened to the speech given by the Minister of Justice today, or when they sat through the constitutional screed of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in which he spoke for two hours and 13 minutes on March 23, did members hear either of them refer to the Canadian traditions which form much of this country's rich heritage? Did they hear a defence of our Constitution which has helped Canadians stay united and free for over a century while many other countries which had a history of civilized behaviour far older than ours, disintegrated into social chaos and dictatorship? Did they hear either the Minister of Justice or the Prime Minister praise our federal system of government, which with our thinly spread population dispersed over the second largest land mass of any country in the world, has managed to strike the proper balance between the needs of the nation and the desire of Canadians to maintain regional and ethnic cultures and traditions? Those elements of our Canadian system of government, if they were mentioned at all, did not feature prominently in speeches which were filled with talk of failure, with bitterness and contempt for those in Parliament and for the provincial levels of government who dare oppose one man's constitutional plans.

The Prime Minister and his confederates in the New Democratic Party have chosen not to co-operate with Canadians to modernize a Constitution which has served this country well, but to impose one man's constitutional vision against their wills. That this course was followed at all is, of course, regrettable. That it was followed, even though it was unnecessary, is tragic.

My party believes that our Constitution can be amended in a way which respects Canadian traditions and unites our people. That is why my leader took the courageous decision last October to oppose the government's constitutional juggernaut. Our party fought for and won the right of Canadians to see and hear the constitutional committee's deliberations. We fought for and won an extension of hearings so that more Canadians could be heard respecting their Constitution. We fought for and won improvements for the charter of rights, including protection of the rights of handicapped Canadians and now a recognition that rights come, not from a benevolent and all powerful government, but from God. We fought for and won an opportunity for Quebecers to express their feelings in the recent provincial election before Parliament concluded its hearings. We fought for and won a chance for Canada's premiers to make their proposal on an amending formula before debate was closed off in Parliament. We fought for and won the right of Canada's Supreme Court to judge the legality and constitutionality of Ottawa's proposals before it was too late.

These were significant victories by anyone's standards. They were significant not just for the Progressive Conservative party but for all Canadians. In each instance they were fought for with courage and determination by my leader and my colleagues. In each instance they were fiercely resisted by the government.

When the history of these events is written, it will record the fact that if this party had followed the course which is being chosen by the NDP, a course of silent complicity as Canadian traditions and practices have been shunted aside, then the government's proposals would have long ago been sent to Britain and written into law in a form which would have been seriously deficient, dangerously divisive and possibly illegal.

But although we have won significant victories for Canadians, the resolution and the methods being used by the government to bring it into law are still seriously flawed. When the Prime Minister stated on March 23 that our objections related exclusively to the form of the changes proposed by the government and not to the substance, his claim was false, as anyone who has followed this debate since last fall will know.

I want to turn for a few minutes to the remarks which were made here by the Minister of Justice today, because, sadly, what we are seeing in what will be one of the final interventions by the Minister of Justice in this debate is a tone of bitterness, a tone of sarcasm, and a tone of contempt for those who oppose what the government is attempting to do to Canadians. I think that that is not the tone on which we should be going about trying to change our Constitution in Canada. I do not think that the comments he made—in which, in many instances, he misrepresented the proposals being made by our party and the effect they would have upon the constitutional activities of this country—should be allowed to stand unchallenged.

First of all, the Minister of Justice took credit for the fact that the government was finally recognizing that there should be reference to the fact in our Constitution that we recognize the divinity of God. Yet if one reads the amendment which is proposed by the government, which is very simple and straightforward, one finds that it adds the following, immediately after the heading "Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms" on page 3: "Whereas Canada is founded upon principles that recognize the supremacy of God and the rule of law." There could be no more sterile or arid description of what we believe is a very fundamental principle. That is why, when we moved in our amendment that the principle of the sovereignty of God be recognized, we did so by borrowing wording which came from the Diefenbaker Bill of Rights which reads as follows:

> —affirming that the Canadian Nation is founded upon principles that acknowledge the supremacy of God, the dignity and worth of the human person, and the position of the family in a society of free men and free institutions;—
> Affirming also that men and institutions remain free only where freedom is founded upon respect for moral and spiritual values and the rule of law.

That is how Mr. Diefenbaker, when he proposed his Bill of Rights, dealt with this issue. This is how we feel the charter of rights should read in its preamble. Yet what the government has chosen to do is to grudgingly make the most insipid and arid description of a very fundamental principle that it could possibly find.

If, indeed, the government agreed with the representations which were made by literally thousands of Canadians from coast to coast, if it believed that it was wise to include reference to God in the charter of rights, then why did the government's leading constitutional spokesman, in the constitutional committee, Senator Austin, make this statement? It is reported in the minutes of the constitutional committee of February 9, 1981. He was talking about the amendment to the Constitution which we had proposed which would recognize the supremacy of God. He said this:

> What I said at that time in the Committee, and I want to repeat it here, is that the main difficulty with the Conservative amendment was that it was tacked on to the resolution in the wrong place. It belongs in stage two as a preamble, and it belongs as a preamble to the entire constitutional process, and not to a portion of it. My own view is that the Conservatives are trying to downgrade God—> —and we will put him in his right place at the right time.

Listen to this, Mr. Speaker:

Only among Liberals, with their Liberal arrogance, would one find the belief that the Liberals will put God in his right place at the proper time.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Beatty: Senator Austin, when he spoke, said reference to the supremacy of God should come as part of the preamble to the whole of the Constitution; and yet now the Minister of Justice is proposing not that, but that this arid and insipid reference be made at the beginning of the preamble to the charter of rights.

There are many other comments which the Minister of Justice made with which I want to deal very briefly. First, he has recognized that his amending formula was flawed and that improvements should be made because we in committee had pointed out that what the government had done was to grade Canadians on the basis of their province of residence. Then, based on which province one lived in as a Canadian there would be first-class Canadians, second-class Canadians and third-class Canadians.

What the government has done with the amendment it put before the House today is to state that instead of first-class, second-class and third-class Canadians, we will have only first-class and second-class Canadians. It says that the third-class of citizens would be dropped, making those Canadians now into second-class citizens, and the government believes that this should win the support of the official opposition and the support of the millions of Canadians who will be put in this secondary position. We reject that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Beatty: We believe that the concession which was made by the government was no concession at all.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Beatty: The minister went on in his sarcastic way at quite some length to suggest that one would have a situation where we could have no amending formula, that we would have patriated the constitution, and there would be no amending formula because it would be necessary to have six or seven provinces agree to it before we would have an amending formula. The only matter he overlooked is that there was a meeting here in Ottawa last week at which eight of the provinces, representing 60 per cent of the population of Canada, agreed upon an amending formula.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Beatty: So, there is agreement. It is a bogeyman he is trying to raise to scare Canadians, to try to discredit the proposals we have made and the amendment before the House today.

An hon. Member: Dishonest!

Mr. Beatty: But ministers of the Crown and all members in this debate have a responsibility to deal fairly and factually with Canadians and not to present proposals—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Beatty: What we heard last week, when the Minister of Justice called a press conference to denounce the proposals made by the premiers, even before the ink was dry on the premiers' signatures, was that what the Minister of Justice and the Prime Minister want is not agreement on an amending formula, because agreement, we know, can be reached, but what they want is agreement on their amending formula. They want not to have co-operation, not to have consensus, not to have compromise; but rather, they want to put a unilateral demand before the provinces that either the provinces accept their amending formula, or else they will impose their prized amending formula using this colonial device of going to Great Britain to have changes made there which should be made here in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Beatty: When we started this whole exercise, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice said it was humiliating for Canadians to have to go back to Great Britain to have substantive amendments made to our Constitution, and this was the reason why it was essential to act today, that we wanted—as the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice have said so often—to remove this last vestige of colonialism, that it was disgraceful, distasteful, and humiliating for Canadians to have to go to Great Britain to have changes made. Indeed, what we saw was a play acted out by the Leader of the NDP (Mr. Broadbent) and by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) in which they tried to construct the belief in the minds of Canadians that there had been deliberate interference by the British High Commissioner in an attempt to meddle in Canadian affairs, and that here we had signs of British imperialism. So this was to be ended. We were to bring the Constitution home, because no longer should Canada, as a sovereign nation, have the power to amend our Constitution resident in Westminster. However, when the Gallup Polls showed that 64 per cent of the Canadian people just wanted to follow a procedure according to which would bring the Constitution home and amend it here, and when our party proposed that and when the premiers proposed that, what did the government say? It said, "Well, we aren't sure that the Constitution would be amended in the way that we want, if we were to do that". If all that we were to do were to ask Britain to patriate our Constitution with an agreed upon amending formula, as the Canadian people said they wanted, then it said, "We will never have a charter of rights", and so the story changed.

Now what we have is that the government will go to Britain, it will use these colonial ties one last time to make the amendments that it wants over the opposition of 64 per cent of the Canadian people and eight of the ten provinces. The government will write it into law, and then will sever this tie which was so humiliating before. Before, the Prime Minister first proposed that we act now. He said it was essential that we sever this tie immediately because it was humiliating and underminded our sense of nationhood. Yet when it served his purpose to get his changes made, and when he said he would not want to do it in Canada because he did not think he could do it by seeking consent or agreement through his amending formula, then he had no hesitation at all in using those mechanisms for his purposes.

Some hon. Members: Devious.

Mr. Beatty: Who can credit the government with dealing with the Canadian people honestly when we are dealing with this sort of argument?

I want to come for a minute to the amending formula that the government is proposing. The government's whole argument relating to the charter of rights is very informative when we look at the government's amending formula.

The Minister of Justice and the Prime Minister have said the reason they have to go to Great Britain to have those amendments made in Great Britain when they should be made here in Canada is that if we simply patriate with an agreed upon amending formula, with their amending formula—even if we cannot agree upon one, even if they impose their amending proposal—it will be impossible ever to have a charter of rights in Canada. Never, under the government's amending formula, would it be possible for Canadians to have a charter of rights which the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice say are self-evidently desirable for Canadians, and are desired by Canadians from coast to coast. Indeed, when the Prime Minister spoke on March 23 he listed eminent authorities in support of his charter of rights. He listed my colleague, the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp); he listed the Progressive Conservative Party; he listed the whole of the House of Commons; he listed 91 per cent of Canadians; he mentioned the late John G. Diefenbaker; the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson); Tommy Douglas; Premier Davis; Premier Hatfield; Premier Lougheed; Premier Peckford; Claude Ryan and, not stopping there, he mentioned Pope John XXIII as being in favour of what he was proposing.

Notwithstanding the fact that two of the people he mentioned died before he made the proposal; that by and large the endorsements were given well before that and that they were not endorsing his constitutional proposals, and notwithstanding the fact that many of the people who were speaking were talking about the concept of an entrenched Charter of Rights and not what he is proposing, which is seriously flawed, he says there is this massive support. Who am I to deny what he says about this overwhelming support for a charter of right in Canada?

Why not do it here, Mr. Speaker? Why would his amending formula not be adequate to get something which he says has such massive, self-evident support?

What the Prime Minister is asking us to do is to write for all time, into our Constitution, an amending formula which he says could not be changed and for which he says there is massive support in Canada.

If anything should have given the Minister of Justice pause as he unleashed his tirade today and attacked our proposals for an amending formula, it should have been the fact that both he and the Prime Minister have said that their proposed amending formula would not be adequate for making the changes they want.

I want to deal as well with some of the sarcastic arguments made by the Minister of Justice with regard to property rights. He said that under the Conservative proposal, what we would have is a situation where four of the provinces would be able to veto the inclusion of property rights, for example, in the Constitution. Under his proposal, one province with a veto, such as Ontario or Quebec, could do that. They would not even need the position that has already taken the Prime Minister and himself where they put the Liberal party on record as opposing the inclusion of property rights in the Constitution at this time. Let us not have this sort of sophistry.

They raised the spectre, as did the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwod (Mr. Rae), of a checkerboard Canada, of rights that would vary from province to province.

The minister dimissed what my colleague, the hon. member for Provencher, said last night about the Quebec pension plan and the fact that we probably would not have had a Canada Pension Plan had it not been for the opting-out principle which the late prime minister Pearson had accepted. Does the Minister of Justice himself not participate in the Quebec pension plan and does he not feel that it is a good idea? He said that this is different because it is not a constitutionalized provision; that it does not deal with people's rights but simply federal spending and that is O.K., but that when it comes to rights, there should not be differences from province to province.

I would say that if I were from Newfoundland and I believed in the dissentient school system, which has been constitutionally protected since Newfoundland entered confederation, I would be seriously worried about what the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice, with the support of the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood, would be doing about the dissentient school and the right to have schooling in the religion of choice. That is a constitutional right which is protected for one province and not for others. The principle being followed here by the Liberals and the NDP, is that when it comes to rights, unless everyone has exactly the same constitutionalized right, no one should have a constitutionalized right. It should exist for no one. That is what their amending formula says.

The hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood obviously had not read our constitutional proposals when he unleashed his attack upon them. He spoke about a checkboard Canada as it related to rights. He did not realize that the amendment we put before the House today would not allow opting out on the charter of rights. We would not have that. Where there would be opting out is in other areas which, since the time of confederation, have been given exclusively to the provinces. The Liberals and the NDP referred to this as a checkerboard Canada; we refer to it as the Canadian federal system. We believe that it is a system that serves Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Beatty: The hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood spoke at considerable length and with considerable eloquence about the value of diversity in our society; about the fact that Canadians live differently; that they have different beliefs and styles of living; about the need to protect that; about the belief that a charter of rights would help to protect the right of people to be different. I believe that and I support the concept of a charter of rights, although I believe that this charter is seriously flawed. He went on to attack the ability of some provinces, under our federal system and under our constitutional amending proposal, to opt out of specific amendments to our Constitution. If it is appropriate for an individual to have the right to lead a life that is different from that of his neighbour, why is it improper for people in one province or one region to choose standards which are different from standards in other areas of the country?

What we are talking about here is not a checkerboard Canada. We are talking about an attack upon the very basis of federalism which has served this country so well for over 100 years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Beatty: The hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood was right when he said that Canada is not a homogenized society. I pray that it will never become a homogenized society. I come from rural Ontario where diversity is a source of pride and where various groups have maintained their ethnic and traditional cultures. This has helped enrich the whole of our society. They have maintained their right to freedom of religion, and I hope that we will never find ourselves in a situation where those rights are taken away.

Why are we proposing, when it comes to the very essence of federalism, when the rights of people to maintain historical legislation, historical traditions, historical ways of life, that these be suddenly swept away by Ottawa and this juggernaut? I say that this is wrong and it is something which this party cannot support.

The Minister of Justice dismissed with contempt what we have proposed in this amendment, that capital punishment and abortion should be dealt with by Parliament, and not under the Constitution. We are concerned that once the Constitution is made law—and the Minister of Justice does not dispute this—inevitably cases would come before the courts based on the charter of rights which would make arguments related to capital punishment and abortion and, as a result of the constitutional amendments we are making today, we could very well find that the power to make decisions on these questions would be taken away from Parliament and put into the hands of the courts and would be virtually impossible to change.

All that we are saying is that the principle which the Minister of Justice says he supports, namely that Parliament should make these decisions, should be explicitly recognized in the Constitution. He says that he has an opinion from the law officers of the Crown to the effect that no court would find that these provisions in any way deal with the issues related to capital punishment or abortion. But on Bill C-60, the Minister of Justice of the day told the House of Commons and told the parliamentary Committee on the Constitution that he had an opinion from the law officers of the Crown that there was no question that the government had the power to do whatever is wanted with regard to the Senate. What happened when that went to the Supreme Court? The Supreme Court found that what the government was seeking to do was illegal and it struck it down unanimously. If the advice of the law officers of the Crown was fallible then, why is it not also fallible today? Why is the minister contemptuously dismissing with the back of his hand, the proposal to ensure that Parliament should make these decisions and not the courts?

The Minister of Justice played an interesting game. He said that initially we were arguing that this was essentially a legal question; that our concern with what the Prime Minister is doing is based on a question of legality; that what was essential was that a court should be heard from; that this was the only impediment to our support for the package, and that now that it is going to the Supreme Court against the wishes of this government, we are shifting ground and saying that we have concern about the propriety or political nature of the proposal. From the outset, anyone who has followed the conduct of this debate since last December knows that we had concerns both about the legality and about the content of this particular resolution. Those concerns remain undiminished today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Beatty: Let us have vigorous debate in this House of Commons about these constitutional proposals, but let us not misrepresent what people who disagree with us are proposing.

When, on March 23, the Prime Minister spoke in the House of Commons, he repeated what has become a familiar Liberal refrain, that this debate is no different from the flag debate and that in time Canadians will forget what the government has done to them. Perhaps they will. Perhaps Canadians will forget that $6 million of their tax money was used for advocacy advertising campaigns to promote one man's policies. Perhaps they will forget that the Prime Minister had no mandate for his proposals. Perhaps they will forget that in the 1979 election he ran on a platform of constitutional change, and he was defeated. But where in the Liberal literature from the 1980 campaign do we find reference to major constitutional change as the central element in the package? Where does the Prime Minister have an endorsement from the Canadian people?

The Liberals say if Canadians do not like what is being done to them now, that in the next election they can elect a government which will move the Constitution back to Britain and undo everything they have done. It is somewhat analogous to what could have happened to the Minister of Justice when he was in hospital earlier this year. What if his doctor had come to him and said "while you are here, I will take out your liver", to which he would have replied "I am not in favour of that". What if the doctor had argued and said to the Minister of Justice, "It does not matter what you think. If you do not like it after I take it out, you can get some other doctor to put it back in". That is wrong, Mr. Speaker. But perhaps, as the Prime Minister says, Canadians will forget that.

Perhaps Canadians will forget that the government acted unilaterally over the express opposition of 65 per cent of the Canadian people. Perhaps they will forget that the government tried to bypass the courts by ensuring that by the time the Supreme Court had a chance to rule on the legality of the proposals, they would already be law. Perhaps they will forget the many improvements to the charter that were rejected by the Liberal-NDP alliance, including the right to hold and enjoy property. Perhaps Canadians will forget the divide and conquer tactics so clearly spelled out in the Kirby memorandum and so clearly demonstrated here today in the speech given by the Minister of Justice. Perhaps they will even forget that the Prime Minister, who began this exercise by complaining of the humiliation of having to go to a foreign country to amend our Constitution, chose to do precisely that instead of bringing our Constitution home and amending it here.

Even if time obscures those bitter memories, permanent change will have taken place in our country that for all time will create first class and second class Canadians. People living in Ontario and Quebec will have a permanent veto on any future change to our Constitution. They will have that veto no matter whether the population in either province grows, remains static or shrinks, while Canadians from other provinces will not have that veto.

Every single time that this discriminatory amending formula is used to remind some Canadians of their second-class status, bitter memories will be recalled and the good will that provides Canada's constitutional glue will be weakened.

As I conclude my remarks, I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that I think this country will stay together. I pray that it will. The glue which has held this country together and has managed to overcome centrifugal forces, which have threatened to tear it apart for over a century now, has been good will, common sense and self restraint. Yet what we find in the government's actions is a denial of good will, actions in the face of common sense, and an attack upon the very federal system which has served Canadians so well.

Before we vote on these amendments, the government has the time to change its policies, and I ask in the name of Canada that the government take advantage of that opportunity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Henri Tousignant (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend today to give an historical account of Canadian federalism. This has been done many times already. Even after reading many books and consulting numerous experts, I have concluded that everyone has his own interpretation of the facts. We must therefore consider the record of Canadian federalism and the initiative we are taking today in a much more general perspective. In my opinion, this record is certainly not as dismal as some would have us believe. Of course, it is difficult for us, 113 years later, to know what the Fathers of Confederation truly intended and if their original purpose has finally been achieved. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, the federalism developed by the Fathers of Confederation has served us well, and we have proof of this every day. How could we not recognize, for instance, that a small population of 23 million people scattered on such a vast territory has been able to achieve such a standard of living and provide infrastructures across the country, such as roads, telephone services, telecommunications, and so on. How is it that in spite of this geographic vastness which should give rise to numerous natural disparities among the various regions, we have been able to make these regions relatively and equally prosperous. The federalism of the Fathers of Confederation has served us well in spite of the limited means available to them at the time, such as the lack of information and communication services.

The constitutional discussions of 113 years ago were held with much less ceremony than today. No one can tell me that every Canadian citizen had detailed knowledge of every section of the constitution. Early in this century, very few people needed a public relations officer to tell them what they wanted. The Canadians of that time certainly had fewer opportunities to express themselves than today. Now, everyone wants to decide, everyone wants to intervene, many probably only for their own personal glorification. While we have managed quite well with what, it must be admitted, is a rather rudimentary framework compared with the one we have today, as concerns preparation, consultations, representations, legal notices, jurisprudence, and so on, I believe that the proposal now under consideration will be greatly refined, not to say a real masterpiece, compared with the one we were given 113 years ago.

Of course, some people will tend to question this brief and rough analysis, to indict our forefathers of 1867 and convict them without further ado. I would reply that only the weak prefer to quibble about past events. Some will say: "I told you so. It was to be expected. They should have acted otherwise, and so on." The formula used by the great architects who are building the future is obviously different and not as simplistic. However, we must face the facts. For some years, we have been hearing what I would call the glory boys of the cicada family tell us that the Canadian government needs to enhance its image in order to better seduce the Canadians and that it should therefore make immediately in-depth changes to the Constitution as, according to them, this is absolutely essential for the welfare of all Canadians. We must admit that for many years serious attempts have been made to find grounds for agreement to the satisfaction of the Canadian people.

What were the causes of so many differences? They are quite simple, Mr. Speaker. First, we indulged in what I call acute idealism and thought the unanimity rule alone was essential. Ideally, discussions and negotiations in every area should lead to unanimous decisions. But, needless to say, in every day life things are quite different. Federal-provincial discussions are no exception.

We tried everything to involve the provinces in our process. But after first agreeing they turned round and tried to trade this patriation proposal for an unacceptable package deal that went beyond everything that was discussed last summer. I would even go so far as to say that the provinces were consulted and that they rally agreed to this measure on two occasions at least, in 1978 and during the Fulton-Favreau round of talks. Why do some of the provinces oppose this proposal, and why are they fighting it before the courts? In my view, this is beyond understanding.

They have a golden opportunity here to show their good faith, and it seems to me that instead of resorting to all sorts of chicanery before the courts, they would make a greater contribution to national unity by supporting the action we have initiated. It is a fact, Mr. Speaker, that 15 years ago the present Quebec premier was publicly supporting both patriation and an amending formula that was much less favourable to his province, at a point in time when talks were far less advanced than they are now. Today, he would have us believe that patriation is horrendous. I do not understand this, or rather, Mr. Speaker, I cannot stand that kind of political opportunism. Mr. Lévesque and his group want to wreck the building, as is well known, and in the same breath they hurry to support the walls of the building lest they crumble. How sincere they are! The premiers of the dissenting provinces are beginning to understand the subterfuge as they deal with the elusive Quebec premier. Why on earth trade off a measure that would benefit everyone against any sort of advantage? Do we have to remain the laughing stock of the whole world by being the only independent nation unable to amend ourselves our own Constitution? How odd, especially since this has been going on for 54 years! Let us therefore have the courage of our convictions; let us put aside our self-interests; let us show consistency and integrity. Commenting on the failures of the Adams statesmen in American political life, John Kennedy wrote, and I quote:

● (1650)

[English]

Yet their failures, if they can be called failures, were the result of their own undeviating devotion to what they considered to be the public interest and the result of the inability of their contemporaries to match the high standards of honour and rectitude that they brought to public life.

If we adopt this measure, Mr. Speaker, I think history shall judge our action.

In addition, the bill now under consideration includes an amending formula which can give us a gleam of hope that some substantial amendments will be made to the British North America Act of 1867. On the one hand, we are allowing ourselves a two-year delay to continue to operate under the consensus rule which has always been enforced. On the other hand, we give ourselves an amending formula and a means, the referendum, to break a deadlock and make changes without being unconditionally at the mercy of a few provinces or of a high-handed majority.

The delay granted before the implementation of the new formula will enable the various Canadian governments to reassess their constitutional positions and probably to agree on several points before that delay expires. The Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark) disagrees with our procedure or would have us believe that he disagrees. However, I must point out to him that he is mistaken by maintaining the position he took at the outset of this debate, because he is playing into the hands, if such is not his purpose, of the very ones who cause the division and the racial tension which have developed in the country, yet, he knows full well deep down inside that we are acting in the general interest. The dissenting premiers know it as well. However, why are they challenging us?

An hon. Member: For the sake of challenging!

Mr. Tousignant: For the sake of challenging, of course, as my hon. colleague said. The reason is quite simple. All those fine people are trying to protect short-term, immediate political interests. Is there a better electoral platform, Mr. Speaker, than to brandish all sorts of bugbears, claiming jurisdictions, natural resources and provincial autonomy, all of which could be seized by the big bad federal government? Such facile and I would even say demagogic arguments are certain to catch the people's imagination. However, reality is quite different and it is simple. Why are these people trying to make it complicated? For the sake of immediate political interests, Mr. Speaker, out of sheer selfishness.

If people had the intellectual and moral honesty to speak the truth, 99 per cent of the population of Canada would agree with our approach. But no, they would rather entertain confusion. It is politically profitable for the Official Opposition to spread all sorts of falsehoods, gossip and even hatred, particularly in the West. Some members opposite, Mr. Speaker, even carry demagogy to the point of associating the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) with the metric system, mainly in the West. Can you imagine anything more ridiculous? One really has to be short of arguments to go that far, Mr. Speaker.

The half-leader of the official opposition—I am told he is two-thirds of it—understands full well and endorses the good old philosophy according to which in politics it is more profitable to support a respectable falsehood than an untested truth. We do not believe in such a thing. We know full well that as responsible administrators, we sometimes have to take decisions that could give rise to dissent or confrontation.

This happens quite often when municipal authorities must take an important and unpopular decision, for instance, when a city council decides to build water and sewer systems. Of course, there are arguments and discussions and a referendum is held, and then the matter is settled, and as far as I know, life goes on as before. The role of representatives, of public authorities, is precisely to express and to carry out within each period what is considered to be due justice in the collective consciousness.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, we know full well that if all these people were telling the truth, 99 per cent of the population would fully agree. Of course, one could discuss ad infinitum about furnishings and decoration, about the colour of the walls or the best place for the sink and the toilet. One could also seek the advice of all the tenants who signed the lease and who are eagerly waiting to move into their new apartments. But in so doing, construction would be delayed indefinitely and one could never be sure to please future tenants moving in two, three, four or five years hence. So are we going to avoid or abstain from building for unfounded reasons? It is also ironical, and I would even say astonishing, Mr. Speaker, to find that the same persons who are dead set against our proposal, both in principle and in the name of the Canadian electorate, are showing such a lack of interest in their daily behaviour. Could it be that the store sign or the advertising do not truly reflect the contents?

An hon. Member: They do not know themselves!

Mr. Tousignant: Right, they do not know themselves. We have had to listen to a few inflammatory and racist speeches—

An hon. Member: Mostly that.

Mr. Tousignant: From some hopeless and diehard radicals with hoarse and sepulchral voices so befitting their party. As Lafontaine said, referring to the plague-stricken animals "of the tiger, of the bear nor of the other powers the least forgivable offenses".

The mini-leader has himself delivered a lifeless and unconvincing mini-speech under the dull eyes of a few bystanders forced to listen to him because of their party convention that was to be held during that weekend right here in the nation's capital. But where have they gone all those who yelled. "Death to the donkey." Yes, Mr. Speaker, as Jean de Lafontaine my favorite poet in college said, these people remind me of the plague-stricken animals. You will find here and there a somewhat learned wolf who will demonstrate thanks to his oratory talents that this damned animal, this bald and mangy animal from which all their evil stems should be devoured. Our sin, the Liberal sin is that we want Canadians to be proud of being Canadians. That is our cardinal sin and that is what we are being blamed for now. This sin is actually considered by the plague-stricken animals as an abominable crime.

Mr. Speaker, let us be objective, let us look more closely at the seriousness of our opponents. At the beginning of this debate the Progressive Conservatives told us they needed more time to debate this important issue and that consequently they would have several amendments to present. Yet up to this day, up to the last agreement between the parties, only one amendment had been submitted—

An hon. Member: And not receivable—

Mr. Tousignant: Not receivable as my colleague says and we have heard well over 80 speeches, yes, 80 speeches on only one amendment. Just imagine! At this rate, Mr. Speaker we will long be gone, we will all have retired by then and yet we will not have started the debate on the main issue. The worst part of it all is the fact that the mover of this amendment, the main spokesman for the Progressive Conservative party on constitutional matters, the member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) from Manitoba has decided that during these important discussions, he would travel to Africa and South America. Just imagine! How best to show the importance of this debate in the eyes of these people! I let Canadians be the judges of that, Mr. Speaker, and decide who is sincere in this House and who is faking—

An hon. Member: —and who is serious.

Mr. Tousignant: —and who is serious.

How can one take seriously those who, in front of TV cameras, shed crocodile tears when they do not even believe in what they advocate? We have been marking time long enough on this matter, Mr. Speaker. Everyone will agree that it is always with some apprehension that one sees the dentist's needle or knife, but what a relief when the bad tooth or the pain is gone!

It is the same with the constitutional issue. Let us act right now. Let us put an end to those endless discussions which are consuming us all. Let us give ourselves the tool, the key, the wrench to tune up our engine in order to avoid failures and needless delays. Often a new piece of equipment will cause much disruption and negative reactions among the people affected in a plant, for example. But after a while, those same people will swear by that new equipment. Likewise, our newly patriated constitution will enable us, with the agreement of the provinces and the people, to bring about the changes we deem necessary and advisable and to give ourselves a charter of rights designed to protect everything our fellow citizens hold as most sacred so as to eliminate to the greatest extent possible any possibility of injustice just as were eliminated in the past, through good will, smallpox and the plague. Injustice is debasing just as racism is offensive to human dignity.

An hon. Member: True!

Mr. Tousignant: No economic situation whatsoever, as for the individual the want of a job, his age, the early loss of a loved one or a personal handicap, no event whatsoever can justify that such a thriving nation like Canada will not put all its citizens on an equaal footing and act accordingly. It would be unforgivable, Mr. Speaker, not to settle down to this task or, should I say, this noble cause.

An hon. Member: The hon. members opposite do not believe that.

Mr. Tousignant: To recall the words used by the Right Hon. Prime Minister when he was quoting Péguy, those who pride themselves on having clean hands, Mr. Speaker, are those who have no hands.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: How true!

Mr. Tousignant: As far as we are concerned, Mr. Speaker, at least nobody will be able to accuse us of having shirked our responsibilities. We do not hesitate to set our hands to the plough and that is exactly what right-thinking Canadians expect of us.

I am glad to see that the parties in the House have agreed to seek the opinion of the Supreme Court about the legality. Still I deplore the fact that we have to operate against tradition and contrary to our responsibilities. As legislators our role is to enact laws since that is why we exist, and that is precisely why people elect us; the role of the courts is to judge only after the laws have been adopted by Parliament. However, we had to make a few concessions to the Leader of the Opposition. We gracefully accept knowing as we do how clever he is at always flying in the face of common sense.

An hon. Member: His electors will make him grow old.

Mr. Tousignant: In conclusion, as conscientiously and as honestly as I can, I want to pay homage—I think that the people across the aisle ought to listen carefully to these comments. Mr. Speaker, I want to commend several Progressive Conservative and NDP members who, from the outset of the debates, have demonstrated their objectivity and broad-mindedness and who have tackled this issue as intelligent people would.

An hon. Member: There are not many, but there are some.

Mr. Tousignant: There are several.

They are at peace with their conscience and they never did yield to partisan temptation and to chauvinism.

For instance, I have in mind the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie), to name only one, but I could commend several others. They made sound and level-headed interventions and gave us their unrelenting support since the beginning. I want Canadians to know that we have had the support of several Progressive Conservatives and of most NDP members since the debates began. That is not what they would have the members opposite believe, for there are many divisions within that party. From the outset, Mr. Speaker, we have had the support of several Progressive Conservative and NDP members, unrelenting, open and honest support for this project, and their approach has been a precious and priceless contribution to the understanding and enlightenment of the Canada of today, for which we all entertain hopes, and of the Canada of tomorrow for the generations to come. All the great works which remained unpublished are not worth much more than the paper on which they were written. If we are responsible men and women, let us at least have the courage to afford future generations the possibility of judging us.

• (1710)

Mr. Dubois: Mr. Speaker, as—

[English]

An hon. Member: What the hell goes on now?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The Chair would like to be informed at this time of one or two things. Perhaps the Chair has been misled—not intentionally, I hope—but I thought there was an understanding when there was a switch a while ago from the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Tousignant) to the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty). I was informed that there was an undertaking by the two major parties that the two following speakers would be Liberals. If I am incorrect, I would like to be corrected by hon. members. I was told there was an agreement to that effect. If not, I will alternate parties, as I am supposed to do.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I explained what happened earlier. There was a bit of a mix-up; it does not matter who was at fault, but we allowed the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty) to speak even though, following our normal practice of rotation, it was the turn of the hon. member for Témiscamingue, a Liberal. Subsequent to that, I had a conversation with the hon. member for Burlington (Mr. Kempling), the Conservative whip, and I asked if it would be all right if, after the hon. member for Témiscamingue spoke, we could correct the order of rotation by having the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Dubois) speak followed by a Conservative member so that the normal 50-50 ratio would be followed.

That was the understanding I had, and that is what I indicated to Your Honour. That was my understanding; we discussed it.

members, especially opposite, who at the time said most emphatically that the flag now standing on your right, Mr. Speaker, would divide the country. Quite the contrary: today one can say to the Canadian people, and the whole population of two other countries, that this magnificent flag has decidedly brought us great national pride and pride of independence compared to what we felt before. Finally, in 1980, the Parliament of Canada adopted the national anthem. I hope and trust that in the near future we shall pass an act making July 1 Canada Day. So, patriation of the Constitution, that is, the fact of bringing it home, becomes the last step on the road to full independence. That is why, Mr. Speaker, this situation is very important.

I feel, therefore, that those few remarks can answer the question of why we should patriate our constitution. Now, to the next question: Why renew our Constitution? It is quite obvious that the situation in 1867 was entirely different from what it is today. The constitution of 1867 allowed the Canadian federation to flourish in peace and freedom; it promoted the growth of the population and the economy as well as social and cultural development in all parts of the country; but our needs have changed, Mr. Speaker. It no longer meets our aspirations, our needs; it must be thought out anew, reshaped and reworded in keeping with today's reality. It still contains, doubtless, several good points that could be rejuvenated and combined with new elements to form a truly Canadian document that meets current needs.

What are the faults and weaknesses in our Constitution? Our written constitution is, to a large extent, made up of British parliamentary laws. We have not yet managed to bring back those laws to Canada, nor to update them; they somehow still bear the stamp of a colonial past. A large part of our Constitution is scattered throughout a multiplicity of acts, several of which are quite unknown to the Canadian people. Those are two weaknesses in our Constitution. The distribution of powers between the federal Parliament and the provincial legislative assemblies, as written in the British North American Act of 1867, is neither as specific nor as functional as we might wish it to be. There is no bill of fundamental civic rights and freedoms in the Constitution, Mr. Speaker. Finally, the language rights are not sufficiently guaranteed and the amending formula is not properly defined in the constitution, and we must always appeal to the British Parliament to have some sections amended. All this is therefore evidence to all Canadians of the reasons why we must renew our Constitution and really break away from our colonial past.

Another important matter, in my opinion, is the repatriation procedure. What was the situation in the past to allow the repatriation of our Constitution? Was something done? Were there actions or meetings in order to achieve this? Mr. Speaker, for close to 54 years, Canadian political leaders have been looking for an amending formula without which repatriation would be nothing more that a symbolic gesture. What have past positions been, Mr. Speaker? Is the present situation totally unprecedented or, if there have been previous attempts to bring about the unanimity which is said to be essential today, was our Constitution successfully repatriated and made a Canadian law through the various formulae that have been discussed, with the unanimity rule that many consider to be still valid today? There was of course the 1964 Fulton-Favreau formula which required unanimous consent for changes to some sections of the constitution, such as those dealing with power distribution.

Many other amendments could have been made with the consent of two-thirds of the provinces representing 50 per cent of the Canadian population. The Fulton-Favreau formula did not succeed in bringing about the required unanimity. We then had the amendment formula of the Victoria Charter in 1971 which required regional consent to amend the provisions of the Constitution, in other words, the assent of two Atlantic provinces, of Quebec and of Ontario, and of two Western provinces representing 50 per cent of the population of the region.

After the latest amendments introduced in the House, this formula is partly the one included in the resolution, Mr. Speaker, with some variations concerning the Atlantic provinces. The matters of 50 per cent of the population and the Western provinces are no longer mentioned. We also had what occurred in Toronto, in 1979, when the members of the standing committee of ministers on the Constitution asked that unanimous consent be required to change any amendment formula and any provision concerning provincial ownership of natural resources and provincial jurisdiction. For all other matters included in the Constitution, this formula required the consent of at least seven provincial legislative assemblies representing at least 85 per cent of the Canadian population. Finally, we had the Vancouver consensus which concerned a formula based on a proposal made by Alberta during the constitutional discussions of the summer of 1980. This proposal required the assent of Parliament and of the legislative assemblies of two-thirds of the provinces representing at least 50 per cent of the population. As for the questions related to the powers and the rights of a legislative assembly and the assets or properties of a province or its natural resources, the said province would have been able to opt out of an amendment which had not been approved by its own legislative assembly.

In spite of all this, Mr. Speaker, no agreement was reached. We have not been able to agree on patriation of our Constitution with an amending formula. There have been many exchanges and suggestions of giving certain powers to the provinces. For instance, there is the matter of family law. I am somewhat familiar with this issue as I was able to work in this field in my law practice. At first, we were told that there would be an agreement and that the provinces as a whole would agree to take over this field of jurisdiction. But once again, some of the provinces said: "We are not ready, we are

The problem is not actually with respect to the ratio between Liberal and Conservatives. The problem arose yesterday in accommodating my friends in the New Democratic Party and the subsequent speech this afternoon by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood.

However, I must insist at this point in time, after having informed the Deputy Speaker yesterday that we will be following our normal ratio of speakers, that the hon. member for Lotbinière must speak so that we preserve the normal left-right balance. According to the conversation I had with the hon. member for Burlington, the hon. member for Lotbinière will speak next, and when he finishes, a Conservative member will follow.

Mr. Kempling: That is right, Mr. Speaker. I confirm that that is the arrangement we have made so that we can return to the normal balance we had arranged previously.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Guy Dubois (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, now that everything is settled, I would like to address myself to a situation that goes back to 1927. Many of my colleagues on this side of the House as well as members from across the aisle have expressed their views on the Constitution and have tried to explain why they should or should not support the resolution.

As member for Lotbinière, Mr. Speaker, I too want to contribute to this debate, and ask and try to answer some questions with respect to the resolution which is now before Parliament. Fairly regularly for almost 54 years now, we have been discussing the Constitution, the changes that ought to be made, the amendments that ought to be included, the provisions that would so to speak eliminate disparities. It was high time, I think, that the debate on this resolution should come to a conclusion and action be taken with regard to our Constitution in order to make it a true Canadian Constitution and make Canada a truly independent nation.

An hon. Member: Speak the truth!

Mr. Dubois: That is exactly what I intend to do. I think we should ask ourselves a few questions with respect to this constitutional issue. Why patriate? Why renew our Constitution? Third, how should we patriate?

Fourth, what types of rights and freedoms should be protected? Why indeed should we patriate our Constitution? As citizens of an independent nation which has come to maturity, many Canadians believe that the time has come to patriate our Constitution so we do not have to petition the Parliament of another country every time we wish to amend it. I think that having to depend on another country whenever we want to change the fundamental law of our land, which contains the provisions that concern all citizens and regulate our Canadian parliamentary system, smacks of colonialism without giving that word a derogatory meaning.

We all know that the British North America Act is the constitutional basis of the Canadian federation. The resolutions binding together New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Ontario and Quebec were passed by the delegates of those four provinces without the involvement of any British representative. The Fathers of Confederation decided on their own to ask the British Parliament to pass an act approving these resolutions. But whatever fulfilled the needs of Canada in 1867, Mr. Speaker, no longer, I think, corresponds to present conditions.

It is worth mentioning, and I have done so on a number of occasions to my constituents, that the British North American Act lists at least six areas which do not fall under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Parliament. It is really a somewhat special situation. Here we have Canada, a sovereign state which claims to have reached maturity and achieved independence, with a number of constitutional areas which do not fall under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Parliament. There are the powers of the provinces' legislative assemblies. Next, there are the rights and privileges granted to a provincial government or legislative assembly. Third, there is a minimum of rights guaranteed to both the French and English languages. Fourth, the right to separate schools. Fifth, the obligation for Parliament to sit at least once a year. And sixth, the obligation for Parliament not to sit for more than five years. To make changes in those areas, the government of Canada must obtain the assent of the British Parliament. The British Parliament, however, has never turned down any amendment wanted by Canada. In most cases, Canada has sought the advice of the provinces before asking the British Parliament to amend a provision of the British North America Act.

Now, what about the requirement to go through London to amend the Constitution? I think that this requirement weighs heavily on the pride of a great many Canadians, who feel that this is not only an embarrassment but an outright national shame. Let us examine the stages of our evolution as a country, which previous speakers have fully described in this Chamber and which I should like to summarize now, Mr. Speaker.

In 1931, Canada's independence was confirmed by the Statute of Westminster; in 1949, the Supreme Court of Canada became the court of last instance and the Parliament of Canada acquired the power to amend the Canadian constitution except in the six areas which I enumerated earlier. In 1952, a Canadian citizen was appointed for the first time Governor General of Canada; in 1965, Canada chose its national flag. Some hon. members who were already in the House at the time can bear witness to the intensity of the debate and to the fact that many situations were presented as causes of division in Canada.

The right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), in his speech on March 23, recalled some of the words spoken by hon.

not sure this should not stay within federal jurisdiction." Thus, this offer was made but no agreement was reached.

• (1730)

How could we, Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: They do not want to agree with anybody.

Mr. Dubois: How can we break the deadlock? Family law is but one example, and there could be others. How then can we break the deadlock? No previous suggestion has received unanimous consent from such a large number of organizations, trade unions, municipal councils or other bodies where decision-making is a collective procedure. Do we require unanimous consent to pass a regulation, a resolution or an act? In most trade unions, a 50 per cent majority is good enough. Some might say that such a comparison is unsound, since what is at stake in this resolution are our rights as citizens and the powers of the legislatures. But, generally, it can be said that nowhere is unanimous consent required. And some people still insist that unimous consent is mandatory. The government of Canada decided, therefore, to table before Parliament a proposed resolution for patriation with an amending formula.

The resolution says that all amendments to the BNA Act which can only be made in London at the present time, will have to be passed unanimously by Parliament and the legislative assemblies or governments of all the provinces, until an acceptable amending formula is decided along the lines of any of the three following manners. I want to point out, Mr. Speaker, to quite a number of Canadians and to my constituents that many people have been saying: "Good, the House of Commons is going to vote on the patriation of the Constitution." The text will be sent to London and then; a good many people thought that everything would be settled then, that there would be no discussions and no problem whatsoever thereafter.

Here is what we expect to do, Mr. Speaker. If the federal and provincial governments reach a unanimous agreement on a formula within the next two years, that formula will be adopted. To facilitate the reaching of such an agreement, a constitutional conference of prime ministers will be held each year until a formula is agreed upon and put into force. That is provided for in the resolution.

Should the provinces and the federal government fail to agree unanimously on a formula while seven or more provinces representing at least 80 per cent of the Canadian population—originally, the resolution asked for eight provinces, but the minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) proposed an amendment on that subject in January—agree, within the two years following the patriation of the constitution, on an amending formula that would meet the demands expressed in the resolution, that formula as well as another one resembling that of Victoria would be proposed to the Canadians who would have to elect one through a referendum. Some say that powers are taken away from or given to the federal government, but I think powers are given to the people of Canada when a referendum is held on a matter which would pit the provincial governments against the federal government. However, the federal government could then propose its own formula instead of a modified version of the Victoria formula. Finally, and that would be the third stage, should the provincial governments not have any alternative to present at that time, a formula resembling that of Victoria would automatically be put into force two years after the patriation of the Constitution.

Generally speaking, this formula would require that all amendments to the Constitution be approved by Parliament or provincial legislatures or, through a national referendum, by a majority of voters representing a majority of the provinces, that includes every province that at any time had a population of at least 25 per cent of the population of Canada, two or more provinces of the Atlantic provinces and two or more of the western provinces. That is the way, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian government has decided to break the stalemate. As I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, there will be three choices open following patriation: Consultation and discussions will take place for two years and if an agreement is possible, the amending formula will be accepted as such. Otherwise, there will be a referendum and eventually the implementation of the Victoria formula. As I said earlier, that is the way the Canadian government thought it could break the stalemate.

Now, with this Constitution and its patriation, what are the classes of rights and liberties that ought to be guaranteed? As mentioned in the resolution I think Mr. Speaker that some rights and freedoms must be protected by the federal and provincial governments. To name but a few: fundamental freedoms, democratic rights, mobility rights, minority language educational rights, judicial guarantee, rights to non-discrimination and another element that the Canadian government suggests is very important and I agree with that, is the right to use official languages, thus giving a status to French and English as well as equal rights and privileges as to their use in parliamentary institutions and within the Canadian government; making sure that the Official Languages Act is institutionalized, that it is enshrined in the Constitution, to me is very important. Some have said in certain cases that we should not have a charter of rights and only patriate the Constitution without an amending formula or even a charter of rights. As the Right Hon. Prime Minister pointed out on March 23 in his speech to the House, opinion polls have been conducted and they show the following results: On August 6, 78 per cent of the respondents stated they wanted Canada to have its own Constitution written and adopted by the Canadian people.

To this other question: "Should the Constitution protect fundamental human rights?", 91 per cent answered yes. Asked whether they wanted the Constitution to guarantee minority language rights, 81 per cent answered "yes". As far as the charter of rights is concerned and this is very important, Mr. Speaker, I want to remind you that at the special constitutional committee hearings, out of 75 witness groups, 54 supported the entrenching of a charter of rights in the Constitution. Mr. Speaker, these figures speak for themselves and if they are not eloquent, I do not know what is. I do not know where one can find as high a percentage of people who support the entrenching of a charter of rights. Mr. Speaker, those are the few questions about the Constitution which I wanted to answer. Those are the ones I wanted to elaborate on.

As far as the text itself is concerned, obviously there were some clauses, some points which have been emphasized strongly. Let us go down the resolution clause by clause or let us consider the whole package of clauses before the House. For example, from clause 1 to 16, the question of fundamental rights, the freedoms of conscience, of faith, of thought, of press and other information media, the freedom to hold peaceful meetings are dealt with. But, Mr. Speaker, who, in this House, could be against such rights? Can one be against freedom of association? It is provided for in the proposed resolution. Can one be against democratic rights as provided in clause 3? Mr. Speaker, can one be against mobility rights in Canada?

Mr. Speaker, can one be against those legal rights under which everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person? Can one be against those rights, Mr. Speaker? But those rights are granted in the proposed resolution, Mr. Speaker! Can one be against those rights and say: Everyone has the right not to be arbitrarily detained or imprisoned? Can one be against those rights, Mr. Speaker, and say: Everyone has the right on arrest or detention to be informed promptly of the reasons therefor?

As a lawyer, as a representative of my riding, when I see that very important provision for Canadians, I wonder who could be against those rights that will be entrenched in the Constitution of Canada. To retain and instruct counsel without delay and to be informed of that right! Can one oppose that? Such guarantees are to be found in the proposed resolution, Mr. Speaker. Has anyone the right to object to the provision under which everyone has the right not to be subjected to any cruel and unusual treatment or punishment? Mr. Speaker, those provisions are to be found in the proposed resolution. Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to deal with clause 31, the clause relating to equalization which says: Commitment to promote equal opportunities.

Mr. Munro: It has existed for 20 years!

Mr. Dubois: Very good if it has existed for 20 years, because the poorer provinces made the most of it. British Columbia or Nova Scotia might have benefited from it. What is the purpose of those things which can be institutionalized, enshrined in our Constitution? It it precisely to promote equal opportunities for all Canadians in their search for well-being. That is provided for in the resolution, Mr. Speaker.

I am coming to these sections to comment on the resolution in general. There might be flaws in our resolution. But if we look at it in general, at all the rights it guarantees, we can see that for instance section 31 provides that the Parliament and the provincial legislatures will be able to promote equality for all Canadians, to stimulate economic development, to reduce the inequality of opportunities and to provide an appropriate standard of living and essential services for all Canadians; it is all provided for in the resolution. Considering this section and sections 32 and 41 I mentioned a moment ago about constitutional conferences on an amending formula, I think that is, generally speaking, a package that I can accept and support.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out that according to many people, we should have kept on debating the constitution. Now, there is a political situation and also a judicial situation. Courts have already judged two against one on the legality of the action. It was said, of course, that these judgments were also a kind of a political action. The Supreme Court will hear the case on April 28. Many people might have said: "Well, now Manitoba has judged the government right." And it was said about Manitoba: but it ended three against two, so it might not be that clear! Mr. Speaker, according to the little experience I acquired in eight years of practice, when a case is submitted to a court of five judges, a judgment rendered by three against two is still a judgment. Mr. Speaker, considering the whole of this resolution, I think it was time to do something about our Constitution and try to bring it home. Considering the whole resolution as it is, I for one say that we should support it and do what has to be done to make our country sovereign and independent.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The building of a Constitution should contribute to the building of a nation. The creation of a Constitution can and should develop the respect and pride in the whole of one country, something so necessary to a federal state. The principles of unity and loyalty which should naturally flow from a new Constitution are sadly lacking in this national debate.

We are, instead, being forced to fight a race against time to meet the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) deadline against the will of over 60 per cent of the Canadian population and eight of Canada's premiers.

We would be under an idyllic illusion if we tried to arrive at a unanimous point of view on all parts of our Constitution. We are a diverse nation in a fast and changing world; difference of opinion is our right and our privilege. That is the reason we need a flexible amending formula.

But we should not hold one level of government at a higher level in this federal state if we wish to achieve a sufficient degree of consensus that will give a new Constitution the degree of support it must have among the partners in our Confederation. How can we expect Canadians to display loyalty for their country when they see one level of government imposing its will over the others? Canada is a federal state, not a unitary state. Alterations to the Constitution affecting basic relationships between the national and provincial governments will never be acceptable on a unilateral basis in a federal state. It is illogical. It ignores the reality of Canada. It is unacceptable.

A Constitution must bind people together, give them a common cause and provide a focal point for the sense of devotion to their country. This "imposed" Constitution will not provide that. It will not move this country to a greater sense of unity. It will commence its existence mired in controversy. Future progress toward agreement on matters of fundamental importance such as division of powers and new federal institutions will be delayed and possibly even thwarted by this stormy birth.

At a time when Canada needs a great store of good will on which to build our future, this Constitution will cause ill-feelings towards the federation of Canada.

Felix Frankfurter very wisely observed that "In a democratic society like the United States, change must come through an aroused popular conscience that sears the conscience of the people's representatives." Where are the consciences of the people's representatives today, particularly those on the other side of this House? This government is certainly not representative of all of Canada when it talks about the Constitution. It is moving far too hastily to unilaterally impose a law on this country, a law which should be the very basis and foundation of the laws in the country. It is a law which should awaken the consciences of Canadians to the greatness of our country, to the expanse of its potential. It must not be a law which Canadians must pass "holding their noses", in the hope that over time we will come to respect it. That respect must derive immediately from the law itself and the means of passage. It must not be seen as a symbol of dominance of one level of government over another. It must not be seen as the dominance of a distant government over the regions of the country. It must be passed with enthusiasm as a first step to a great future.

We have the choice today to make the constitutional proposals workable within our present federation. We can proceed with patriation, we can proceed with passing an amending formula which is acceptable to all of the provinces, and in due course we may proceed to a truly Canadian charter of rights respecting the many rights and freedoms which our country has today.

We have the opportunity today, because of the arduous work of many parliamentarians working on the constitutional committee and debating in the House of Commons, to allow the Prime Minister to take his responsibility to all Canadians seriously. I ask him to reflect upon the amendments presented by our party last night, which were introduced in this House of Commons to improve the constitutional proposals now before Parliament.

Our omnibus amendment to the constitutional proposals is based upon respect for our federation. Our amendment contains proposals to protect the federal nature of Canada and to strengthen the charter of rights and freedoms. We urge support of our amendments based on reason and through consensus of our population.

Rather than the divisive amending formula currently put forward in the constitutional proposals, we define the consensus necessary to bring home and change the Constitution as being the partnership of the federal Parliament and the legislatures of two-thirds of the provinces representing 50 per cent of the population.

We propose an opting-out formula that is limited to protecting provincial powers that have existed since confederation.

In our amendment yesterday, we proposed again the preamble of the Diefenbaker Bill of Rights affirming the supremacy of God, the worth of the individual, and the position of the family in a society of free individuals.

We propose and encourage all representatives to recognize the right of Canadians to enjoy property. This is a fundamental right and should be incorporated into a charter of rights. Recognizing the importance of property, the Diefenbaker Bill of Rights tried to ensure the right to own and use property and to ensure that no one could take property from individuals unless it was done legally with a fair hearing. The denial of this right has caused great concern among Canadians, including many of my constituents in Etobicoke Centre.

Why has it been omitted? It has been omitted because the NDP did not want it in as it might restrict the right of the government to expropriate property. Why has the government acquiesced? We have the clear example of why the government has acquiesced in a piece of legislation that is before us today, namely, Bill C-48, in which the government proposes to expropriate, without compensation, 25 per cent of the properties that have been developed by companies in northern Canada under the laws that existed at the time. It amounts to retroactive expropriation without compensation. That is why the government has not moved to put that proposal in the charter of rights as it stands today. I urge the inclusion of the right to own property in any charter of rights put before this House for a vote.

In our omnibus amendment and pursuant to the charter of rights, we proposed a section affirming that "notwithstanding anything in the charter, the rights and freedoms set out are guaranteed equally to male and female persons." This amendment should be readily accepted by all sides of the House. This injustice was corrected through an amendment in the other place by Conservative senators who clearly felt it urgent to correct this injustice prior to the constitutional proposals being rushed out of either chamber.

In a new section which we propose, questions of conscience should not be bound by this imposed charter of rights and, therefore, nothing in it should affect the authority of Parliament to legislate in respect of abortion and capital punishment. These moral issues should be left to the legislators of the day to represent the views of their constituents and to reflect changing moral values in society.

We are asking this Parliament to add a new clause to Section 54 to recognize the monarch. The only means of amending the Queen's position within the Constitution would be through a proclamation issued by the Governor General and authorized by resolutions of the Senate and the House of Commons.

To improve the constitutional proposals, my party has proposed amendments which more clearly reflect the views of Canadians. It is obvious that we would have preferred the Prime Minister to continue to improve the proposal through ongoing discussions with the premiers or through a consideration, early in the process, of the amendments we put forward at the committee stage. This would have been more reflective of a confederation. It is clear that the Prime Minister, in his headlong rush to pass the Constitution, is not interested in bargaining, either with us or with the provinces. This unreasonable position will result in the balkanization and greater regionalization of our country.

The Prime Minister has repeatedly based his case for unilateral action on the constitutional convention that the British Parliament must act upon a request from the Canadian Parliament to amend the BNA Act. This is an important convention. When we look at the whole question of unilateral action, we must consider the legal side and the political side. I am going to deal first with the legal aspect.

Apart from that first convention, there is another equally important convention. In those areas of constitutional change which affect federal-provincial relationships, the consent of the provinces and the federal government is required. The basis for this has been clearly established through the years.

Two authorities, at least, tie the two conventions together. The first is the 1964 white paper on the amendment of the Constitution, the first principle of which was that action by the British Parliament should be taken only upon formal request by the Parliament of Canada.

The fourth principle set out in the white paper which is the second convention that I wish to refer to is that the Canadian Parliament will not request an amendment affecting federal-provincial relationships without prior consultation and agreement with the provinces. Clearly, realization of the second convention must precede the first.

Prime Minister Louis St. Laurent, speaking in 1949 of the need for an amending procedure in order to make amendments affecting federal-provincial relations, said:

> It will be much preferable to secure agreement on the method to make the future changes, and when we do secure that agreement we shall have to make one more pilgrimage to the Parliament at Westminster—
> If and when we can get agreement with the provinces we will have one last amendment made by the Parliament at Westminster—

It is true that there have been amendments made to the Constitution without the formal consent of the provinces. What is relevant is the nature of the amendments for which consent was not sought and whether or not consent was sought and given on amendments affecting federal-provincial relationships.

Let us examine the latter category. I have a couple of examples. In 1930, when the jurisdiction over resources was given to western provinces, the agreement of those provinces was obtained. A year later, in 1931, the statute of Westminster was specifically amended in Section 7 to protect the provinces from potential unilateral action by the federal Parliament. At that time, the federal solicitor general of the day said:

> We admitted the fact, suggested by the Premier of Ontario, that our Constitution was really an agreement made between the provinces after full consultation and discussion, and we consented that the provinces should be consulted before any amendment or imperial statute should be passed.

At the same time, the then premier of Ontario said that the confederation of the provinces of Canada was brought about by the action of the provinces; that our Constitution is really the crystallization into law by an imperial statute of an agreement made by the provinces after full consultation and discussion, and that the province of Ontario held strongly to the view that the agreement should not be altered without the consent of the parties to it.

My final example occurs in 1940 when unemployment insurance was transferred from the provinces to the federal Parliament. Again, consultation and consent was unanimous.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, a point of order. Following the exchange that occurred after question period between the President of the Privy Council, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, there have been discussions about not holding private members' hour tomorrow and instead, continuing with the constitutional debate between five and six o'clock.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I gather that this discussion concluded affirmatively in favour of using that hour. I think that is the purport of what my hon. friend said and that is agreeable.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I suggested it and I still agree.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It is agreed, and so ordered, that private members' hour tomorrow be suspended.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I think we should thank the hon. member for Vaudreuil who forfeited his right to proceed.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order please. It being six o'clock p.m., this House stands adjourned until 2 p.m. tomorrow, pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 6 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

EXPRESSION USED BY MR. STOLLERY—REQUEST FOR WITHDRAWAL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ron Stewart (Simcoe South): Madam Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 43. The hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery), the pinball player, has introduced the word "hatred" in the House. I do not hate any person or race, and I find the word "hatred" abhorrent.

I move, therefore, seconded by my friend the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor):

That the hon. member for Spadina, if he has not the courage to do so himself, be compelled to apologize for using this four letter word in the House.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

NORTHERN RESOURCES

CALL FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF JOINT COMMITTEE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The Yukon, the Mackenzie Valley, the Beaufort Sea and Arctic Island hydrocarbon and mineral resources are being increasingly delineated. The ownership rights, further discovery and delineation, development and transportation of these vast resources to markets present Canada with a major challenge and will set the stage for the future well-being of the northern half of this nation. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson):

That a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons be established to examine and report on the ownership rights of such resources, the programmed development of such resources, the appropriate transportation systems for delivery of such resources to markets, and the desirable nature of community development in the high Arctic.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

NATIONAL SECURITY

INQUIRY INTO ESPIONAGE ACTIVITIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Earlier this week the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) refused to initiate an inquiry into ongoing espionage activities in this country in favour of his obvious band-aid, and hit and miss approach. His argument that the previous government should have dealt with the matter is an absolute cop-out since many new revelations, including the sudden disappearance of relevant documents, did not surface until he was back in office.

In view of these and other new revelations, including the arrest just this week of Norbert Scheinflug, an East German suspected of spying in both West Germany and Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton North (Mr. Paproski):

That this House be instructed to initiate forthwith, a full-scale inquiry into espionage activities being conducted in and against this country.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

NATIVE RIGHTS

SETTLEMENT OF LAND CLAIMS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Peter Ittinuar (Nunatsiaq): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Yesterday the National Energy Board approved construction of the Norman Wells pipeline. In 1977 Mr. Justice Berger recommended a ten-year moratorium on the development of a pipeline in the Mackenzie Valley. The Dene nation has consistently opposed development before the settlement of comprehensive claims, and the government of the Northwest Territories, the city of Yellowknife, and the Dene and Metis of the Northwest Territories have all expressed serious reservations about this project. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Beaches (Mr. Young):

That the federal government fulfil its responsibility to northerners by settling comprehensive claims in the Northwest Territories before approval of development projects such as the Norman Wells pipeline, to ensure that certain items are not pre-empted or precluded from claims negotiations by the existence of these projects.

COMPENSATION FOR ONTARIO WHEAT PRODUCERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. John Wise (Elgin): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the disastrous outbreak of vomitoxin which ravaged the 1980 Ontario winter wheat crop, resulting in a financial loss of some $17.4 million to some 15,000 producers in Ontario, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Huron-Bruce (Mr. Cardiff):

That the Minister of Agriculture instruct his officials to develop, as quickly as possible, an assistance plan which would compensate these producers for their financial losses from a disease over which they had no control.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I rise under S.O. 43 to speak on behalf of the 1.5 million innocent hens in Canada who face capital punishment for being overproductive, probably the only success story of increased productivity under the Trudeau administration. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That the Canadian consumer be made aware that:
A million and a half hens should pay for no crime
Because they are productive all of the time.
Off with their heads, ordered lean "Mean Gene"

INCREASE IN INTEREST RATES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Today the Government of Canada broke a new record with the new Bank of Canada rate being 17.40 per cent, the highest rate ever. This rate indicates that the government has lost control. I point out that bankers' acceptances in the United States yesterday were 14.9 per cent. We cannot even borrow money on "T" bills for less than 17.15 per cent. The same applies when we compare our "T" bill rate with the United States. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke):

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

UREA FORMALDEHYDE—STEPS TO PROTECT HOUSEHOLDERS

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, this morning at her press conference the Minister of National Health and Welfare, in announcing a continuation of the ban on urea formaldehyde which she announced on December 17, said, and I quote, "The government is victimized by a lack of knowledge."

The minister knows that she was advised by a report of a committee that was given to her in June, 1980, of the health hazards of this product, and again in another report on December 8 on which the decision was based. The committee said:

> The committee is therefore not prepared to recommend any level of formaldehyde exposure as inherently safe.

That was the final report released today. My question therefore to the minister is this. What steps does she propose to take to protect the health of the quarter million or more Canadians who live in anywhere from 60,000 to 100,000 homes which have had this insulation installed, many of them under government licence through the CHIP program?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, we have estimated the number of Canadian homes insulated with UFFI at between 60,000 and 80,000. According to the data we now have, most of them are problem free. We will be making an assessment to determine the exact number of family units which may have badly installed foam. This will be done through a survey conducted by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources by sampling 800 of these houses.

Mr. McGrath: Perhaps the minister might tell the House how she was able to determine that these homes were problem free before the sampling that she just announced is undertaken. How has she satisfied herself that these homes are problem free when the report states that any level of gas from this substance is dangerous, and when she announced in her press statement this morning, and I quote:

> —it can produce allergic responses in sensitive individuals. It has also been shown to produce cancer in laboratory animals.

That is a very serious problem. The minister knows that the state of Massachusetts has already banned it and that the United States government has taken steps. Now she tells us she has nothing to offer the one quarter million Canadians who are stuck holding the bag because she says she has been short-changed.

Miss Bégin: Madam Speaker, I do not think that shouting or looking emotional will help—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss Bégin: —anybody understand exactly the meaning of the ban we are confirming today. Canada is the first western world country to ban the use of UFFI in insulating houses. We announced it first as a temporary ban on December 17, based on the best knowledge we had and as soon as we received it.

The responsibility of the health minister is to inform Canadians of exactly what we know and what we do not know. The considered opinion of the committee of experts was that it was better to risk losing some jobs for Canadians and to announce a ban on the use of that foam. That is what we are doing.

As I stated in my first answer, the department received complaints before I announced the ban. Since the temporary ban of December 17, the problems have been extensively discussed through a lot of media coverage. This informed the public, who in turn told us of their problems, or made inquiries. That is how we know that the UFFI was properly installed in many homes and will not cause health problems.

REQUEST THAT NATIONAL SURVEY BE CONDUCTED

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): We are concerned and my colleagues will express concern at what has happened to the thousands of jobs that have been lost. But if I express any emotion, Madam Speaker, it is on behalf of the hundreds of thousands of Canadians whose health could be seriously threatened.

• (1420)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: Surely, Madam Speaker, that is the responsibility of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I would ask her this question. She knows that the U.S. government has already started public hearings preliminary to announcing a ban; she knows that at least two states banned it over a year ago; she knows this problem was flagged about seven or eight years ago in the Government of Canada, and she knows there have been three different government departments involved in this, yet she has not acted, and today she tells us—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member, especially on a second supplementary question, should ask a precise question.

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the minister what she can tell Canadians in about 60,000 to 80,000 homes who are exposed to this potentially dangerous gas? The only consolation they have is instruction from the minister to call their nearest regional health office. Is she going to undertake a national survey to determine just exactly the extent of the health hazard? That is a simple question, Madam Speaker.

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I want to correct again a few facts which are wrongly put forward by the hon. member. The United States has not banned the use of UFFI. The Consumer Products Safety Commission has only recommended prohibition, and we do not know what the new administration will do with that recommendation. I want the record straight. When the member speaks of a long period of time over which information was kept from the public, that is false. I want to put the record straight again.

As soon as we collected enough expert evidence that formed a body of knowledge for an opinion permitting us to ban, we immediately moved to action. There was one week of interval between the report and the first announcement. I received the second report this weekend, and the announcement is made today. I am telling Canadians the symptoms they may suffer, and I repeat "may suffer". I have written an information letter to all doctors in Canada. I am asking the co-operation of the public and of everyone on this question.

WARNING ISSUED BY DEPARTMENTAL OFFICIAL

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, as a preface to my question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs on this very serious subject, I should like to point out to the Minister of National Health and Welfare that several American states have banned urea formaldehyde foam insulation.

My question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is this, Madam Speaker. A warning was issued in 1978 by Dr. Richard Viau, head of the chemical and fire safety program in the minister's department, as follows:

> People should think quite carefully before installing this product in their homes . . . Formaldehyde is a very irritating chemical and exposure can lead to headaches, allergies and a whole gamut of other problems.

In view of that warning, can the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs explain to this House why, when his department knew about this threat in 1978, the government proceeded to finance this home insulation program under CHIP grants, why was his official ignored, and why should the consumer now be left holding the bag?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I do not quite understand the questions asked by the hon. member since the government has banned this product and since we have again today maintained this ban.

[English]

REQUEST FOR AID TO HOUSEHOLDERS

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, the point of the question is that the minister's own department knew and issued a warning about the health risk of UFFI. The Minister of National Health and Welfare said during her news conference this morning that the government was victimized by a lack of knowledge about UFFI, and yet, as I pointed out, several American states have conducted extensive studies, and Canadian authorities did have knowledge of a potential problem with this stuff.

● (1425)

I ask the minister again: now that the government has proof that UFFI is a health risk, what leadership will the minister's department give to consumers to help Canadians determine whether they know or how they know their homes may be problem-free? Does the minister not believe that the government has, at the very least, a moral obligation to assist householders out of this mess, or is the minister just going to tell consumers, "You are on your own now"?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I am sorry, Madam Speaker, I understood that in his preamble the hon. member had addressed his question to my colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. I shall repeat to him what I said earlier.

[English]

I never said that the government was victimized. I explained at the press conference, in answer to a question, that cases of chemicals about which all of us have limited knowledge will surely be on the increase in our complex society. I explained that the government in that respect did not have access to more knowledge than the consumers, and that there is no point in accusing people of having acted in bad faith. The important process of government involved here is to inform the public fully as soon as the information reaches the government, which is what we have done. I have explained that we did write a letter to doctors, that we have publicized extensively the symptoms of health conditions which are the result of living in homes insulated with UFFI. The National Research Council has put out booklets explaining ways of fixing such houses.

NATIVE RIGHTS

NORMAN WELLS PIPELINE DECISION—REQUEST FOR SETTLEMENT OF NATIVE LAND CLAIMS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Yesterday the National Energy Board recommended that the Norman Wells pipeline be constructed along the Mackenzie River, which decision is completely contrary to the recommendations of the Berger report, which said that no such pipeline should be built until the land claims of our native people in that part of the country are settled. I would like to ask the minister to give the House the government's unequivocal assurance that no such pipeline will be constructed until those land claims are settled.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I think the Leader of the New Democratic Party should be aware that we received notice of the National Energy Board decision almost contemporaneously with its press release announcing it. I have assured George Erasmus and the Dene Nation that once that press release announcing the decision of the National Energy Board was made known, I would be joining with my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, in taking the matter to cabinet. There will be no decision to proceed until it has been decided by the government, and that process is just starting now. In the meantime, prior to proceeding to the cabinet for a decision on the matter, consultations will be held. I will be having consultations with the Dene and other people in the Northwest Territories who feel seriously affected by this decision, during the month of May, probably about the middle of May.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, the minister took three minutes not to answer the question. Will he now, after telling us about all the deliberations the government will undertake, assure the House and the native people who live in that part of our land and who had their expectations legitimately raised by the positive support given to the Berger recommendations by the majority of Canadians all over this land, that the government will not proceed with that pipeline until those claims are settled?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, I cannot give the hon. member that type of assurance because the matter has not yet gone to the government for a decision. I am sure the hon. member does not expect me to make a unilateral decision before the government has had a chance to be seized of the question.

As far as the land claims are concerned, we have appointed a negotiator to negotiate land claims settlements and, of course, the possibility exists, after the consultations come to a conclusion, that land claims may not be affected by this particular development at all. I think at least the opportunity should be explored to determine whether or not that is a fact.

• (1430)

REQUEST FOR GUARANTEE OF CLAIMS SETTLEMENT

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask a question of someone who can speak for the government, that is, the Prime Minister. I hope he can speak for the government.

Given the importance of this issue and the past positions indicated by the government in previous debates, which tended to give support to the moral claims of our people in that part of our land, will the Prime Minister offer his assurances to the House and, to use an old phrase, will he give an ironclad guarantee which will stand up, that before we proceed with this pipeline the legitimate moral claims of our native people will be met in terms of a land settlement?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, when we appointed the Berger commission it was because we wanted to have many independent sources of information on this matter. We have that now. The matter has been before the country for several years, now, and I understand that the matter of the claims has made progress. As the minister said, it is in progress now. But we do not know when it will be settled.

I agree with the minister completely, we cannot just make an open ended statement of the kind that the Leader of the New Democratic Party requests. We will certainly attempt to pursue negotiations and bring them to a conclusion as soon as possible. I do not think we could undertake to wait forever. That should be clear.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERIES OF COMMONWEALTH SPEAKERS

Madam Speaker: I would like to draw the attention of the House to the presence in our galleries of the Speakers of the Commonwealth countries who are attending the Sixth Commonwealth Speakers' Conference, which Canada has the honour to host.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

TESTING OF UREA FORMALDEHYDE BY CANADA MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for housing and CMHC. At a press conference this morning the Minister of National Health and Welfare stated that the government was a victim of a lack of knowledge with regard to urea formaldehyde foam insulation. Surely CMHC must have done some testing on the product before approving its use under the Canadian Home Insulation Program. I would like to ask the minister responsible for housing whether CMHC was also the victim of a lack of knowledge? What testing was done by CMHC before unleashing this product on Canadian home owners?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, has already addressed the allegation with regard to the word "victimizing", and I refer the hon. member to her answer on that point.

In so far as CMHC and testing is concerned, when the temporary ban was announced, of course CMHC no longer permitted or encouraged the use of UFFI in the Canadian Home Insulation Program. In so far as the tests up to that time are concerned, I think the minister indicated as well, and most people know, that the issue was one which was not settled and that on the basis of the information in that study, a temporary ban has been adopted by this government. I think I can add little more than that, except that the evidence at this point indicates to the government that it ought not to permit the use of this material.

Mr. Lewis: Madam Speaker, I would submit that the evidence indicates that CMHC ought not to have approved the use of this material. The Minister of National Health and Welfare stated that the government had no plans to compensate those people having problems with UFFI in their homes. The government's CHIP acceptance number gave this product credibility. Does the minister and his department not feel a sense of responsibility to Canadian home owners who have put this product into their homes, aided and abetted by federal government money and federal government approval?

Mr. Cosgrove: Madam Speaker, the hon. member began by answering the question with the answer given by my colleague, the minister of health. I can add nothing further.

EFFECT OF INCREASE IN BANK RATE

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. It touches on a matter of government policy. As the Prime Minister is undoubtedly aware, the bank rate at two o'clock today was set at 17.4 per cent, up 5.6 per cent since the last budget was introduced—a jump of almost 50 per cent as far as interest rates in this country are concerned. Would the Prime Minister indicate whether such a high interest rate structure was contemplated when the budget was brought in by the government last October? If so, would the Prime Minister indicate whether the government anticipated the tremendous hardships which have subsequently occurred as a result of his high interest rate policy, to home owners, consumers, small businessmen, and the farmers of this country?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, if the hon. member takes the trouble to reread the budget speech of the Minister of Finance, he will realize that the Minister of Finance realistically told all Canadians that the main enemy for the Canadian economy this year was inflation and that we had to unite our efforts to fight it. As far as the monetary policy is concerned, the approach of the Bank of Canada, which has the support of the Minister of Finance, is a gradual approach. We know that a new technique is being used to adjust the interest rate and that we have a floating rate which reflects inflationary pressures and forecasts when the rate is set at the auction every Thursday.

On the other hand, I would like the hon. member to note that the government clearly stated to the Canadian people that the fight against inflation was extremely important and that it was concerned about the unfavourable effects of inflation. This is why the Minister of Finance maintained indexation in this same budget, as it represents several million dollars more in purchasing power for Canadians. The government has also clearly indicated by increasing the guaranteed income supplement that it wants to help those who need it most and who suffer the most from inflation in our society. The government is therefore aware of this situation and is taking action to rectify it.

[English]

GOVERNMENT PLANS TO ALLEVIATE EFFECTS OF HIGH INTEREST RATES

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, if I may, I would like to go back to the Prime Minister, who apparently does not deign to speak to such lowly members of this House and who only deigns to speak to members at Westminster on questions of constitutions.

Perhaps the Prime Minister could deal with a more economic related subject. Would he not agree that it has now been demonstrated that his high interest rate structure is actually fuelling inflation and not dampening it? If he agrees that it is fuelling inflation, would he indicate whether or not it is the government's plan either to lessen the present level of interest rates in this country or bring in suitable measures to relieve the pinch being felt by the small businessman, the farmer, or those who have to buy homes or renew their mortgages.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, the hon. member should tell us where he stands. The government has taken a gradual approach to decreasing the monetary supply precisely to reduce inflationary pressures. Would the hon. member want the government to have a much more radical policy to reduce even more quickly the M-1 fork and the money supply? Would the hon. member want us to reduce the deficit much more quickly, which would prevent us from helping those who need housing, such as our senior citizens, or those who need aid because their incomes are lower and would he want us not to apply indexation to family allowances? Would the hon. member want us to take radical action and make everyone suffer, or would he prefer that we have a more liberal approach such as the one we have used to try to help those who need it most while maintaining a realistic policy to fight inflation?

TEXTILES AND CLOTHING

DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF NEW POLICY

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Sherbrooke): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

The minister recently indicated that he intended to announce the government policy on textiles in the very near future. Does he really intend to announce the Canadian textile and clothing policy within the next few days?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, the new policy has to be determined by the government. We have already made considerable progress and I trust we shall be able to announce the new policy within a few weeks.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

STEPS TO IMPROVE COMMUNICATIONS WITH FIELD OFFICERS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. In testimony yesterday before the McDonald commission by former RCMP Commissioners Higgitt and Nadon, it was revealed that they and the then solicitor general misled members of the House of Commons as to RCMP practices relating to wiretaps in criminal investigations. As an internal document prepared then stated, there was a gaping abyss between policy and practice and in fact the law was being violated.

What steps has the Solicitor General taken to ensure that this kind of massive breakdown in communication, to put it in its best light, between the RCMP in the field and the Solicitor General will not occur today? What specific mechanisms has the Solicitor General in place to assure members of Parliament that they and the Solicitor General are not being misled by senior RCMP officials about matters of RCMP practice in the field?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, to begin with, as the hon. member knows, I will not comment on the day to day matters which are being reviewed by the McDonald commission. I am looking forward to the completion of its work which is scheduled for May 15, and which I continue to believe is the date on which the government will receive its final report.

An hon. Member: Oh, come on.

Mr. Kaplan: As to changes that have taken place in the organization of the relationship between the Solicitor General and the force, a great deal will depend on our consideration of the recommendations which will be coming from the McDonald commission. But in the meantime, as I have indicated frequently in the House and when I have appeared before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, I maintain the closest possible relationship between myself and the RCMP and the security service to assure that I am being kept fully informed about the operations of the force and the operations of the security service, to be sure that their activities are lawful, that they are appropriate, and that the operational policies which are in place and which I have constantly under review are in fact being obeyed.

SOLICITATION OF SUPPORT FROM PROVINCIAL ATTORNEYS GENERAL

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, some of us think that the relationship at times is a bit too close. It was also revealed yesterday at the commission hearings that RCMP commissioner Higgitt in 1973 was attempting discreetly to solicit provincial attorneys general for their endorsement of the RCMP's views on wiretap legislation then before Parliament.

My supplementary question is: in view of this clear attempt to do an end run around the then solicitor general and to subvert the parliamentary process at the time, will the Solicitor General inform the House whether the present commissioner or his officials have, either directly or indirectly, solicited provincial attorneys general for their support for RCMP views on proposed legislation on RCMP review, or mail opening? Will the minister tell the commissioner that any such activities are completely unacceptable to this Parliament?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, if I felt it were necessary, I certainly would tell that to the commissioner, because the RCMP should not be engaging in political advocacy. But I can assure the hon. member that their policy is not to do so, and I am satisfied from discussions we have had on the subject that they do not do so.

PIPELINES

NORMAN WELLS PIPELINE—IMPLEMENTATION OF NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD DECISION

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It is on the same subject as that of the hon. member for Oshawa, namely, the NEB recommendation respecting the Norman Wells pipeline. My question is from a slightly different perspective.

Contrary to what the hon. member for Oshawa said, I can assure the minister and the House that this report was favourably received in the north and received a wide measure of public support.

An hon. Member: By whom?

Mr. Nickerson: Can the minister assure the House that he will proceed as expeditiously as possible to reach a cabinet decision to implement the NEB report? Can he give us an estimate of when that decision will be reached?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I heard the representations of the hon. member. It is obvious to the whole House that they are quite opposite to the representations of the Leader of the NDP. But my answer to the Leader of the New Democratic Party stands, that consultations will be held. Now that we know the decision of the National Energy Board, consultations will be held with all those people who feel seriously affected by this decision. After those consultations have been held, I will, combined with my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, go to cabinet with an assessment of the situation for a decision by the government. I am not sure how long those consultations will take, but I think they can be concluded probably in the month of May.

Mr. Nickerson: Madam Speaker, because the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources seems to be stricken with a special dumbness today—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nickerson: —I will direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

An hon. Member: What is your explanation?

Mr. Nickerson: First of all, I wonder if the minister could use his good offices, especially the recently established one in Yellowknife, to ensure that reports of this nature, which affect the area for which he has regional ministerial responsibilities are distributed simultaneously in the north as they are here in Ottawa.

Second, is the minister aware that in order to maximize the benefits, both by way of employment and entrepreneurial opportunities, for local people in the north, a decision must be made pretty quickly on this matter?

Third, in its report the NEB addressed itself to the problem of additional funding which is necessary for the government of the Northwest Territories to provide the proper territorial and municipal services that this type of development necessitates. Has the minister taken this into consideration?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, I assure the hon. member that all the factors he enumerated in the House today will be taken into consideration before the government makes a decision.

METRIC CONVERSION

OPPOSITION BY GROCERS AND SMALL BUSINESSMEN

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism. It arises out of a question which I asked him on April 13, as reported at page 9199 of Hansard. I asked whether the minister would start to respond to the concerns of small businessmen in Canada against this forced march to metric. The minister responded by saying that he was convinced he spoke for Canadian small businesses, that his contacts indicated that they are in support of this, and that the Canadian small business sector "will benefit enormously from metric conversion in Canada".

In light of the fact that 4,000 members of the Canadian Federation of Retail Grocers and 3,800 members of the Canadian Organization of Small Businesses, not to mention all the corporate food chains in Canada, are opposed to metric, would the minister now retract his answer to my question on April 13 and agree that the majority of the people of Canada do not want metric on January 1, 1982?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, not only shall I not take back the answer I gave earlier but I should like to inform the House that, as the hon. member probably did too, I had a very fruitful meeting with the president of the Canadian Federation of Retail Grocers as well as the president of the Canadian Organization of Small Businesses. The discussion we had in no way indicated that those two organizations were opposed to the metrication of balances in the retail food business; on the contrary, they said they recognized the inevitability of conversion. They simply asked that with them I look into the possibility of setting another time schedule and of finding other means of easing into conversion.

• (1450)

COMPOSITION OF METRIC COMMISSION

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): My supplementary question flows out of the statement by the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism that the march to metric is inevitable. I would like to address my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I wonder if the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce would examine the structure of the food sector of scale conversion before it meets next Tuesday and confirm to this House at the earliest opportunity that that metric section is made up of a majority of foreign countries manufacturing metric weigh scales. There are more of them than those in the retail food business. After examining that, would the minister report to this House on why foreign multinational weigh scale manufacturers have more votes in the metric commission in deciding on this matter than do those in the retail food business?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, my colleague, the Minister of State for Small Businesses and I are working closely together in the implementation of this program—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That explains the problem.

Mr. Gray: —in a way that is sensitive to consumer and small business needs and in the best interests of the Canadian economy. I am very happy to continue to support him in these efforts which will be in the long-term and short-term interests of the small business sector as well as of the economy, and will strengthen our over-all capacity in meeting competition in world markets.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

GOVERNMENT PLANS TO DEAL WITH FAILURES LISTED BY COMMISSIONER

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In his annual report, the Commissioner of Official Languages states, and I would like to quote these two sentences:

—it is clear that in staking so much time and effort on the constitutional card, the Government not only produced a negative reaction in some quarters but effectively missed out on other opportunities for advancing minority rights. Indeed rather than using the occasion to lead by example and to work with the provinces to improve programs and services vital to the minorities, the federal government may have succeeded instead in diverting attention from much needed reforms.

My question is as follows: could the Prime Minister tell the House what he intends to do about the disturbing failures which the Commissioner of Official Languages pointed out in his report?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I think that could be discussed in the appropriate committee, and I understand that our House Leader will move, on motions, that the report be referred to that committee. There are many things to be said about the report, and they will be said before the committee. But for the time being I find it surprising that hon. members should ask us our position with regard to this charge that we have not done enough to protect minorities. The charter contains all kinds of provisions to protect language minorities, to name only those. But I am happy to state now that, with the consent of the opposition, the next step could be to try to get Ontario to comply with section 133. I do hope that we will have unanimity in the House when the time comes to press for that.

Mr. Clarke: Madam Speaker, I am a member of the committee to which the Prime Minister referred. Does the Prime Minister intend to shelve this report next to the Pepin-Robarts Commission report?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I am very happy to see this renewed interest on the opposition's part in discussing matters related to the Official Languages Act. As I just said, in about five minutes we will move that this report be referred to the joint committee. I am delighted to know ahead of time that we can count on the active and positive co-operation of the official opposition with a view to improving the official languages situation in this country.

AIRPORTS

GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS RESPECTING APPLICATION OF NEW FUEL COSTS POLICY

Mr. Robert Gourd (Argenteuil-Papineau): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Following statements by an official of the Department of Transport to the effect that Mirabel airport seems clearly disadvantaged with regard to fuel costs they charged to carriers compared to carriers using Toronto and western airports, can the minister tell the House whether he intends to implement a new policy on fuel costs designed to favour Canada as a whole without for all that putting the largest airport in North America, namely Mirabel, at a disadvantage?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, in his October 28 budget, the Minister of Finance indicated to the House that he intended to implement a tax on fuel used by all aircraft on internationl flights. This would put all Canadian airports on the same footing with regard to international flights. Within five minutes or so, I intend to table a ways and means motion designed to implement the decision announced by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech. This should deal fully with the problems raised by the hon. member and put Mirabel on exactly the same footing as any other airport in Canada. In fact, Mirabel was not the only airport concerned but all eastern airports were in the same situation which is somewhat different from that of airports west of Toronto.

PETRO-CANADA

METHOD OF FINANCING ACQUISITION OF PETROFINA

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It has been widely reported that the minister intends to implement a tax on gasoline in order to pay for the takeover of Petrofina. I would like to know why the Minister would choose to use that particular measure, given that it can only add to the already difficult to cope with inflationary spiral, given that it would add to the price of every single consumer product in Canada, given that it will add to the cost of transportation for every Canadian, instead of—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Flip-flop.

Madam Speaker: It would be helpful if the hon. member would not make a speech, but would just ask a question.

Mr. Deans: Why would the minister choose that approach rather than impose an excess profit tax on companies which are already ripping off the Canadian consumer?

An hon. Member: Tax PetroCan!

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the hon. member must have been absent from the House when the budget was read. In that budget we imposed an 8 per cent tax which is having a very significant impact upon the cash flow of oil and gas companies, as the hon. member knows.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: We have never denied that. This was done because we felt that the national government was entitled to a greater share of the resources from the oil and gas companies than it was getting before, and we have done that. At the same time, we also indicated in the National Energy Program that we wanted to expand, very significantly, Canadian ownership in the oil and gas industry, and in particular also to expand the public ownership on behalf of all Canadians, and that in order to achieve this purpose, to pay for those acquisitions, a Canadian ownership charge would be imposed which would be paid by all consumers of oil and gas in this country, who would, in the end, be the beneficiaries from the larger Canadian ownership in the field. We intend to do this, and I intend to introduce a ways and means motion today to achieve that purpose so that Canadians will own a larger share of that industry.

• (1500)

Mr. Deans: As a supplementary question I would ask why it is that the Minister would not impose the tax at the gasoline pump to recover the money that was piggybacked onto the price of gasoline by those self-same oil companies at the time of the last increase, and use that method to recover the money for the Canadian consumer that is now going into the pockets of the oil companies that are already making record profits, rather than impose another tax that can only work a hardship?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, if the hon. member has looked at the most recent quarterly reports of the various oil and gas companies he will have found that the rate of the profit is not a record. Last year there was a record rate. The taxes that have been imposed by the Minister of Finance in his budget on October 28 have made a significant bite into the profits of the various oil and gas companies. As far as we are concerned, we intend to introduce a Canadian ownership charge as foreseen under the National Energy Program and, contrary to the NDP, we do not believe that you can get something for nothing in this world.

Oral Questions

INCOME TAX

TREATMENT OF FISHERMEN ON EAST COAST

Mr. Mel Gass (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue who, on April 10 and 13, assured this House that the fishermen of Atlantic Canada would be treated fairly and reasonably in the method of collecting back taxes. The House will note that the minister gave his word just as the people of Cardigan, P.E.I., were preparing to vote in a byelection. Within days of that byelection, the fishermen of P.E.I. started receiving demands for payment in full within 15 days, or they would face legal action.

Considering the fact that 347 Newfoundland fishermen have had third-party demands of up to 50 per cent of their gross fishing revenue placed with the prossessors who normally buy their landings, and that writs have been issued by the Supreme Court of Newfoundland to seize land, homes and trucks—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I thought the hon. member was telling me that he was just asking a question, but he went on with the preamble. It is the question we need.

Mr. Gass: These actions, Madam Speaker, were initiated by the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador, who is the Minister of National Revenue—

Madam Speaker: No, no. When I ask the hon. member to put his question, he must do that right away.

Mr. Gass: Does the minister consider this fair and reasonable treatment of the fishermen of Atlantic Canada?

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, when I hear the kind of question that is asked on that side of the House, it makes me even more proud that the electors of Cardigan had the good sense to elect a member to this side of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rompkey: I note they did that even though the audit was in progress.

The points that have been raised are a distortion. It is not true that a fixed amount of assets or income is set for any one fisherman. Every fisherman is treated differently, as every taxpayer is treated differently. The department tries to come to an accommodation for payment based on the means of the individual to pay. There have also been distortions from some politicians in Newfoundland that I do not intend to answer in this House, but I will at a later date.

Mr. Gass: Madam Speaker, the minister does not seem to be aware of what is going on in Newfoundland. He should read the papers in his home town tomorrow.

Will the minister assure the fishermen of Atlantic Canada again that they will be given sufficient time, and that is what they are asking for, to make orderly payment on their revised assessments, taking into consideration their other legitimate commitments, their ability to pay, and the economic hardship that may result to the detriment of the individuals and the community as a whole? Will they be given time to pay?

Mr. Rompkey: Madam Speaker, I will repeat what I said before, that the fishermen will be treated fairly and squarely as are all taxpayers in Canada. I want to say again that their cause is not helped by members who distort the facts. I certainly intend to see that they get fair treatment, and they will.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, this being Thursday, and because we will be leaving this evening after the House finishes business for the day to commence the Easter break, is the government House leader now in a position to indicate to the House the order of business for the first week of our return?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Yes, Madam Speaker. As hon. members know, we will return here Tuesday, May 12 and, pursuant to the standing orders we have to set aside twelve opposition days between May 12 and June 30, which means that the government has to keep those opposition days in mind when planning House business. That is why in the first weeks after we return we will have no alternative other than to designate two days a week as allotted days. That is why as soon as we get back, even if it is only a four-day week, we have to designate Wednesday and Thursday as opposition days. On that Thursday we will hold a meeting such as the one we had this morning to try to set the order of business for Friday and the following week. As to the only day remaining in the first week after we return, a Tuesday, given the circumstances we thought it would be more practical to suggest that we complete the second reading debate on the bill concerning juvenile delinquents, Bill C-61, and if we have any time left on that first day, May 12, we will consider the bill to amend the Canada Elections Act to shorten electoral campaigns from two months to about a month and a half. That would be the proposed order of business for the first few days after we return; to sum up, on May 12, Bill C-61 followed by Bill C-58 if we have time. Then Wednesday and Thursday will be opposition days, and after that we will set the business of the House for the following days.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES COMMISSIONER

REFERENCE OF REPORT TO SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, before I sit down I should like to report that, further to our consultations earlier today, the House leaders have agreed to the following motion that deals with the report of the Commissioner of Official Languages that was mentioned during question period. I would therefore ask you to seek the unanimous consent of the House to the following motion:

> That the report of the Commissioner of Official Languages, tabled April 22, 1981, be referred to the Special Joint Committee on Official Languages and that a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their honours thereof.

The arrangement is that this motion be agreed to without debate.

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, that matter was indeed discussed. There is anxiety on the part of all parties in the House of Commons that the report get to the committee for study, as was indicated today in question period, and we are prepared to concur.

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, we also agree to this motion and we agree to its being passed without debate.

I should like to put a question about House business after you ascertain the will of the House on this motion.

Madam Speaker: Does the House agree to give unanimous consent to the motion presented by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard)?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: Agreed and so ordered.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, to go back to House business, I suppose there is not a member in the House who could not predict the question that I want to put to the government House leader. We are going to be away for 18 days. That provides a number of opportunities for the cabinet to meet and approve of legislation to be introduced when we return. May we now have the assurance that one of the pieces of legislation to be introduced when we return will be the bill from the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs regarding widows, and any other matters respecting veterans that may be in that legislation?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, the last time I indicated to the hon. member that his concerns had been conveyed to the minister responsible. Indeed I spoke with the minister responsible and I think that within a reasonable period after our return, we will be in a position to give a more definite answer and confirm to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that his concerns are taken under very serious consideration.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Madam Speaker: I have the honour to inform you that a communication has been received, which is as follows:

Government House
Ottawa,

April 23, 1981

Madam,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Antonio Lamer, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 23rd day of April, at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Madam,
Your obedient servant,

Edmond Joly de Lotbinière

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order so as to clarify the record at the earliest possible opportunity. My point of order arises from a quotation which my colleague the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis) and I used from the press conference given this morning by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin). We suggested she had said the government was victimized by a lack of knowledge about UFFI. While I paraphrased what the minister said in my question, I am happy to place on the record now exactly what she did say this morning.

The minister was asked whether the government had a legal responsibility to home owners.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. This is really debate and I cannot allow it to be raised as a point of order.

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker, I do not want to anticipate what my colleague was going to say, but the point of order he was trying to raise was that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin)—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. McGrath: Perhaps, Madam Speaker, you will hear me out. Albeit inadvertently, the Minister of National Health and Welfare did mislead the House today when she denied having said what my colleagues quoted. That is a legitimate point of order; it is to correct the record.

Madam Speaker: It is not a legitimate point of order, it is debate. It is a different interpretation of what a member of this House had said. As it is not a legitimate point of order, I cannot recognize it as such.

TABLING OF MOTION RESPECTING PETROLEUM ADMINISTRATION ACT

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 60(1), I should like to table a ways and means motion to amend the Petroleum Administration Act. These amendments will enable us to impose a levy which will be used to recoup the subsidies paid for fuel for international maritime and air transportation, as well as certain taxes which will be used to finance an increase in the Canadian public ownership of the gas and petroleum industry in Canada.

CANADA PENSION PLAN—INVESTMENTS

Question No. 1,637—Mr. Elzinga:

1. What is the method of investment used to increase the Canada Pension Plan fund?

Order Paper Questions

2. What rate of interest are CPP funds, which have been invested in any way, currently receiving?

3. (a) Have any loans been made to the provinces from the funds and, if so (i) at what rate of interest (ii) what is the schedule for repayment (b) do any provinces owe money and, if so (i) by province, what is the debt owed, including interest (ii) have any asked that their debts or the interest thereon be forgiven and, if so, which ones?

4. What is the amount of readily available cash on hand in the fund?

5. What is the breakdown of (a) the annual interest owed on loans (b) investment of moneys from the fund for the fiscal year 1979?

6. Did the Department of National Health and Welfare carry out studies, either through their officials or with consultants, to determine if private pension plans are investing their funds in a proper manner and, if so (a) who carried out such studies (b) what were the conclusions?

7. (a) What rate of interest is being paid to private pension plans for moneys invested by them (b) is the average rate, in the department's opinion, a realistic one in today's economy?

8. What are the names of private sector businesses which offer pension plans whose funds are earning less than 5 per cent interest?

9. Is action being contemplated by the department to ensure that pension funds are properly managed and, if so, what is such action?

Mr. Doug Frith (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. Canada Pension Plan contributions not immediately required to pay benefits and expenses are loaned to the provinces through the purchase of provincial securities. A province may borrow moneys from the fund to the extent of contributions received from that province.

2. The securities purchased by the Canada Pension Plan bear interest at the average market yield of 20 years outstanding obligations of the Government of Canada applicable at the time of issue of the security i.e., 12.5 per cent in October, 1980. The interest rate is published in the Canada Gazette upon the advice of the Minister of Finance.

The total investment of securities as at March 13, 1980, yielded an average interest rate of 8.4 per cent.

3. (a) Loans have been made to the provinces from the funds

(i) at the interest rates reflected in the list below, interest rate on investments purchased by month, calendar years 1966 to 1979.

(ii) the loans are for a term of 20 years.

(b) (i) The provinces owe funds as at September 10, 1980, including interest as follows:

Newfoundland	$ 352,845,000
Prince Edward Island	72,079,000
Nova Scotia	685,674,000
New Brunswick	511,395,000
Quebec*	85,552,000
Ontario	9,447,539,000
Manitoba	1,009,190,000
Saskatchewan	773,590,000
Alberta	1,757,931,000
British Columbia	2,578,140,000

* The amounts available to Quebec relate only to those federal employees, such as members of the Armed Forces, who are residing in the province but excluded by legislation from the Quebec Pension Plan.

(ii) No province has asked.

4. As at September 30, 1980, the amount of readily available cash on hand in the fund is $18,091,196,000 comprised of an operating balance of $681,968,000 and investment fund of $17,409,228,000.

5. (a) The weighted average rate of interest on securities issued during the fiscal year 1979 is 9.55 per cent. Since interest earned on investment made during the fiscal year 1979 has been fully collected, no breakdown is being provided.

(b) The investment of moneys from the fund for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1979, was as follows:

Prince Edward Island	7,537,000
Nova Scotia	68,176,000
New Brunswick	53,269,000
Quebec	7,324,000
Ontario	915,916,000
Manitoba	99,309,000
Saskatchewan	76,002,000
Alberta	185,459,000
British Columbia	260,506,000
Government of Canada	12,015,000

6. No studies were carried out or requested by the Department of National Health and Welfare.

7. (a) The Department of National Health and Welfare does not monitor the investment funds of private pension plans and so cannot comment on the amount or the appropriateness of interest rates paid.

(b) See part (a).

8. The department does not have the names of such funds for the reason given in the reply to question 7(a).

9. The department has no legal mandate to take such action and therefore none is being considered.

PERSONS DRAWING PENSION FROM PRIVATE PLANS

Question No. 1,703—Mr. Herbert:

What percentage of persons drawing pension from private plans are believed to be (a) fully indexed (b) partly indexed (c) on fixed pensions?

Mr. Doug Frith (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): There are no figures available on the percentage of private pensions-in-pay that are fully indexed or partly indexed.

Figures are available on the extent to which current contributors are in plans that provide indexation. In 1978, 32 per cent of all plan members were in plans that provided for automatic indexation: two-third of pension plan members in the public sector were in plans that provided automatic indexation compared to only 5 per cent in the private sector. Those in the private sector that were automatically indexed were generally limited to 2 per cent or 3 per cent annually. It must be emphasized that these figures relate to contributors only and do not bear any direct relationship to the number of pensioners currently receiving indexed benefits. Nor do they bear any direct relationship to the number of future pensioners who will receive indexed benefits.

MR. P. J. KIRKLAND—JOB DESCRIPTION

1. Did Mr. P. J. Kirkland, a deputy director of the Canada Labour Relations Board, write a memorandum to Mr. J. Drew, director general of the Canada Labour Relations Board dated November 26, 1980, furnishing at the request of Mr. Drew a description of his job and, if so (a) for what reason was such a description required (b) was Mr. Drew not aware of the duties of members of his staff (c) does the memo state in part "my apologies to you and Gerry for the delay" and, if so, who is "Gerry" and what is his job designation?

2. Is Mr. George Champagne connected with the Canada Labour Relations Board or any other branch of government and, if so (a) what is his connection and job designation (b) is Mr. Champagne mentioned in the memo?

3. Did Mr. Kirkland in his memo state in part "I put some emphasis on the northern part of my job . . . its a bit phony, inasmuch most of the good stuff we've done . . . in the past and won't be repeated" and, if so, what is a full explanation of this sentence and what are all the reasons that Mr. Kirkland would write a memo which he in part describes as "phony"?

4. Does the memo include the phrase "please feel free to tinker" and, if so, what was the recipient, Mr. Drew, supposed to "tinker" with?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): 1. Yes.

(a) New position descriptions have had to be prepared for all management positions already classified at the PM-7 level of equivalent, for eventual conversion into the new management category, as per the announcement of the President of the Treasury Board, the Hon. Donald J. Johnston, on July 10, 1980.

(b) Yes he was. However, a well-known and classical way to elaborate a job description is to require the incumbent to prepare a draft of his own position.

(c) Yes. "Gerry" is Mr. Gérard Legault, deputy director, field operations (east), Canada Labour Relations Board, who holds a position and responsibilities in the eastern division of the board which are very similar to those of Mr. Kirkland. The apology by Mr. Kirkland was predicated upon the fact that the job description of both had to be filed at the same time and that of Mr. Legault was ready.

2. Yes and no. He is connected with the Canada Labour Relations Board but not with any other branch of government.

(a) Director, administration branch, Canada Labour Relations Board;

(b) Yes he is mentioned. His duties include participation in the co-ordination of the positions description, most specifically in the area of meeting and satisfying the requirements for format and wording of the Management Category Conversion Task Force and advising Mr. Drew, his supervisor, accordingly.

3. Yes; this sentence means that Mr. Kirkland and his staff have now completed two major projects the purpose of which was (i) to streamline the operational and adjudicative functions of the board with respect to the standardization of bargaining unit descriptions in the construction industry operating in the Yukon and Northwest Territories, and (ii) to determine the degree of compliance with Section 161.1 of the Canada Labour Code in the construction industry in the territories; Section 161.1 requires that unions operating hiring halls establish rules for the purpose of referring persons to employment, apply these rules fairly without discrimination and post the rules in a conspicuous area in the hiring halls; the use of the word "phony" was an unfortunate choice as Mr. Kirkland and his staff must now embark upon another major project which is similar in nature and which involves the determination of the degree of compliance with Section 161.1 of the code in the water transportation and longshoring industries in the west.

4. Yes. Mr. Drew was to ensure that the position description as drafted by Mr. Kirkland, accurately reflected the functions he is expected to perform on behalf of the Canada Labour Relations Board and then, to ensure, with the advice of Mr. Champagne and his staff, that the finalized position description met the specific requirements of the Management Category Conversion Task Force, and to make any appropriate modifications to that effect. That is the extent of the "tinkering" referred to.

PERSONS DRAWING PENSION FROM PRIVATE PENSION PLANS

Question No. 1,983—Mr. Knowles:

1. How many persons are receiving pensions from private pension plans, such pensions being based on employment in Canada, and what is the average pension per month received by such persons?

2. Of those indicated in the answer to Part 1, how many (a) are having their pensions escalated annually at a rate equal to the rise in the Consumer Price Index (b) are having their pensions escalated annually at a lesser rate (c) receive no annual escalation of their pensions?

3. How many persons are contributing to or are enrolled in private pension plans based on their employment in Canada?

4. Of those indicated in the answer to Part 3, how many are in plans which provide (a) after retirement, for an annual escalation of their pensions at a rate equal to the rise in the Consumer Price Index (b) after retirement, for an annual escalation at a lesser rate (c) for no escalation, after retirement, of their pensions?

5. How many persons in Canada are receiving retirement benefits from annuities, insurance plans, retirement savings plans, or other schemes apart from employment-related pension plans, and what is the average amount per month received by such persons from such plans?

6. Of those indicated in the answer to Part 5, how many (a) are having such benefits escalated annually at a rate equal to the rise in the Consumer Price Index (b) are having their benefits escalated annually at a lesser rate (c) receive no annual escalation of their benefits?

7. How many persons in Canada are enrolled in retirement plans of all types other than employment-related pension plans?

8. Of those indicated in the answer to Part 7, how many are enrolled in plans which will provide, after the payment of benefits commences, for (a) an annual escalation equal to the rise in the Consumer Price Index (b) an annual escalation at a lesser rate (c) no escalation?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Statistics Canada is able to supply some information in response to parts 1, 3 and 4 of this question, but no data is available concerning parts 2 and 5 to 8 inclusive.

1. In the taxation year 1977 (the latest year for which data is available), benefits from private pension plans in Canada were received by 751,232 beneficiaries. The average benefit for 1977 was $3,185.00 per year (average monthly benefit is not available).

3. At the beginning of 1978 (the latest year for which data is available), participation in private pension plans in Canada was 4.2 million workers.

4. (a) 899,647 members participated in plans that provided for the annual escalation of pensions after retirement at a rate equal to the Consumer Price Index.

(b) 438,151 members participated in plans that provided for the annual escalation of pensions after retirement at a lesser rate.

(c) 2,855,446 members participated in plans that provided no escalation of pensions after retirement.

PRECIOUS METALS MARKING ACT—INSPECTORS

Question No. 2,124—Mr. Nickerson:

1. How many persons are presently designated as inspectors under the Precious Metals Marking Act and how many are customs officials?

2. How many assays are conducted annually by (a) the Royal Canadian Mint (b) other agencies or private firms in connection with the administration of the act?

3. How many (a) charges were laid (b) convictions were obtained, under the act during the last year for which figures are available?

Mr. Gary F. McCauley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): 1. There are 168 persons designated as inspectors under the Precious Metals Marking Act, none of whom are customs officials. A working relationship has been established between this department and Revenue Canada (Customs and Excise) for the administration of the act at Canadian points of entry.

2. In connection with the administration of the act, it is anticipated that the following approximate number of assays will have been conducted during the current fiscal year: (a) 400, (b) 100.

The above assays represent destruct analyses and do not include any screening tests, i.e., non-destructive scratch tests or acid tests performed by inspectors on a routine basis.

3. During the 1980 calendar year: (a) 88, (b) 32.

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the Parliamentary Secretary have been answered.

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, I indicated to the parliamentary secretary earlier today that at this time I would be raising question No. 1,852 with him. I placed this question on the Order Paper on December 9. It asks a simple question with regard to the chairman of the Canadian Film Development Corporation and his involvement with conflict of interest guidelines in the activities of his law firm. Last Tuesday night the chairman of the CFDC came before the parliamentary committee. He informed us that this information had been provided to the government some time ago but the government had not yet decided to table the answer in the House of Commons. I want to bring this matter to the attention of the parliamentary secretary. Could he tell the House when this question, which has been outstanding for over four months now, will be answered?

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, following my conversation with the hon. member this morning, I am checking on the matter. I fail to understand why an answer has not been transmitted through the Privy Council office to be presented in the House. I will do my best to have it as soon as we return from the recess.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, if question No. 2,036 could be made an order for return, this return would be tabled immediately.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that question No. 2,036 be deemed to have been made an order for return?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: Agreed and tabled forthwith.

THE CONSTITUTION

RESOLUTION RESPECTING CONSTITUTION ACT, 1981

The House resumed debate on the motion of Mr. Chrétien, seconded by Mr. Roberts, for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

And on the amendment of Mr. Epp, seconded by Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton)—That the motion be amended in Schedule B of the proposed resolution be deleting clause 46, and by making all necessary changes to the Schedule consequential thereto; and on the notices of amendments of Messrs. Knowles, Baker (Nepean-Carleton) and Pinard.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, when I spoke yesterday I referred to the amendments to the resolution we had introduced on Tuesday evening and how they were directed at bringing this country together, not driving it apart as the current resolution seems to. I was discussing the unilateral action being taken by the government as well as some of the legal aspects, and why we believe substantively this is wrong. This afternoon I want to discuss the impact this action will have on the much broader political element and on the rest of the country.

Just before completing my remarks on the legal aspects, I shall refer to a statement made by former Prime Minister St. Laurent in 1949. In explaining an amendment to the Constitution which affected only the federal sphere, he said:

> It has been felt that the amendment giving Parliament the power to amend its own Constitution—

He was speaking about its own powers. Mr. St. Laurent continued:

> —was all we could attempt to do without agreement with the representatives of the ten Canadian provinces, and that we should do at once everything we had the right to do.

In other words, to do only those things we had the right to do within the sphere of our activity. It is clear that amendments of a federal-provincial nature require the agreement of both levels of government. The government has argued that the proposed charter of rights would not involve any transfer of powers between the federal and provincial authorities. It would place certain limitations on both federal and provincial governments and legislatures. In fact, it would remove powers from provincial legislatures without their consent, and here I am referring to education, minority language rights, civil rights, mobility rights and some elements in the area of justice.

If the provincial legislatures are sovereign legislatures within their own fields of jurisdiction, then the federal government is asking Britain to remove powers from those legislatures without their consent. I submit this is wrong. I would also point out that the amending formula, whether arrived at unanimously, the Victoria formula or the Vancouver formula, is also a matter of federal-provincial concern.

I might just digress here on this question of the Victoria formula. The government said quite recently that the Victoria formula is the one which is being put before us through the constitutional resolution. But the Victoria formula has been changed on two different occasions in two different ways, so it is not the Victoria formula which was agreed upon in 1971. The government has made the point that the provinces did agree at that time. They did, but it was agreement to a formula different from that which is before us today. That is the concern I am putting forward here. The resolution, either through referendum or deadline, imposes on the provinces an amending formula without their consent.

In the Liberal amendment which was put forward on Tuesday evening, we have the incongruous situation where we have to vote on one amendment, which includes the amending formula and the reference to the supremacy of God. This amendment is put forward by the same man who is complaining that the provinces are trying to bargain fish for rights. Now under the same amendment we have to make the distinction whether we are voting for this amending formula or for the supremacy of God. Members of this House should not be asked to vote on just one amendment, which is the case now.

• (1520)

Mr. Evans: There was unanimous agreement on that.

Mr. Wilson: I would like to address the point the hon. gentleman just raised. There was unanimous agreement, I agree. I am making the point that we are asked to vote on two matters which are totally unconnected. There is no linkage between them. It is important that in future we divide these two matters. Matters which have no linkage at all should be voted on separately so that members on both sides of the House—and I stress this—can express their point of view on each of the individual items separately.

It is for reasons relating to the division of powers that the Supreme Court of Canada must decide whether or not the resolution should be passed and submitted to the British parliament. It is for these reasons that I believe our party has performed a very valuable service to this country by forcing this government to acknowledge this discipline, since the precedent that will be established by the Supreme Court will be a historic one.

Let us not be bound only by the legal arguments and precedents. In a sense, these legal considerations are less important than the political considerations. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has acknowledged that, but unfortunately he has failed to recognize the true significance of the political element under debate.

Let me again refer to the Premier of Ontario in 1931. He said "the confederation of the provinces of Canada" into the country of Canada "was brought about by the action of the provinces". We must not forget that. We must also not forget that the huge geographical mass that is Canada has developed important traditions and a history which are the foundation of the country we live in today. The action of the government in moving this resolution ignores that tradition. It disregards the history that shapes the attitudes and aspirations of many Canadians in distant parts of the country.

It is comforting to me as an Ontario member of Parliament, as I am sure it is to members opposite who are from the province of Quebec, to feel that our provinces will always have a veto over any future constitutional change. But it is also very degrading for those in other provinces for us to have this special status. It perpetuates in a very permanent and divisive way the sense of political power that has dominated this country for 114 years. It robs these other provinces of the possibility of achieving a more equitable balance in confederation.

It is not clear now what the impact will be, but over the next few years the impact is going to become very clear to us as we get further down the road in energy negotiations and negotiations regarding federal-provincial shared-cost programs such as medicare, higher education and pensions. If many provinces feel they were taken advantage of in this constitutional resolution, they are going to be that much more difficult to deal with when it comes to these very tough negotiations on energy and shared-cost programs. I can see where provinces such as Ontario and Quebec will suffer—not benefit—as a result of this constitutional reform because of the problems we will be facing when we get into those shared-cost negotiations.

I will try and illustrate what I have just said by a quote from Henry Kissinger's book "The White House Years". It is a reasonably long quotation, but I will read it because there is a lot of very sound thought in his words. I quote:

> Resolutions conducted in the name of liberty more often than not refine new tools of authority, Academics may define human freedom by concepts of human rights; historians understand that freedom resides not only in legal structures but in the general acceptance of institutions and the ease of human relationships. A society not scourged by irreconcilable schisms can practice tolerance and respect human dignity even in the absence of legally defined rights. Tolerance is inherent in its structure. Britain has never had a written constitution; civil rights are guaranteed by tradition.

> But a nation driven by factions, in which the minority has no hope of ever becoming a majority, or in which some group knows it is perpetually outcast, will seem oppressive to some of its members, whatever the legal pretensions.

There is much wisdom in that paragraph and much for us to learn in Canada today. I draw from it the following lessons. First, it is essential for the Prime Minister and the government to move quickly to heal the wounds which have resulted from this debate. The west will feel permanently oppressed because of the unilateral action which has been taken here and the second class situation in which they have been placed. That applies to the east as well, but I think feelings are more strong in the west right now. The unilateral action lies not just in constitutional reform but in energy policy. That is going to be a festering sore until corrective action is taken by this government.

This problem has been reinforced by the nature of the amending formula, which now puts the government in a position where it can move in on the resources which are the heritage and foundation of the traditions of the western provinces. That is a very divisive element facing us head on today.

The second lesson is that the rights we have been talking about in this debate are the property of the people. Rights are given to governments, not the reverse. Governments invariably take rights away. We must be alert to this in the coming years as we better understand this charter of rights. There will be a temptation, since the charter has established certain rights in black and white in a statute book in Ottawa, to believe that we have a security blanket. We will feel that our rights are protected because they are written down somewhere, but that is wrong. The protection of our rights depends on the respect and tolerance of this society.

It also depends on the control of government by the citizens of this country. We must constantly be on guard against any intrusions on those rights in any sense. We need to have constant discipline and vigilance among ourselves to ensure that these rights are not taken away. That viligance and discipline will be the only lasting discipline we can be assured of in this country. If we ignore these simple lessons, we do so at our own peril and at the peril of this country.

It is ironic that in the past the roadblock to constitutional reform has always been the inability of the provinces to agree, or the desire of the provinces to demand more than the federal government is prepared to give. The Prime Minister has made this point on a number of occasions. Now the provinces are ready to agree on historic matter, to patriate the Constitution with a flexible amending formula. This would provide a sound, flexible means for evolving the change which we in this House and this country know must come to the Constitution as it now stands.

Now the roadblock to consensus on constitutional reform is the very Prime Minister who has been so spiteful and derogatory about the position of the provinces in the past. The shoe is now on the other foot, but the difference is that he has the power to bull through this constitutional resolution without the consensus that is so necessary—unless the Supreme Court rules otherwise.

The dangers to our country are great. Let me close by quoting Edward Gibbon in 1788, from his masterpiece, "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire":

> The principles of a free Constitution are irrevocably lost when the legislative power is nominated by the executive.

I have just one more paragraph, Mr. Speaker, if you will bear with me.

We have a comparable situation in Canada today. The balances and checks to power in our country have traditionally been the official opposition and the provinces. Their power, which is nominated, is being taken over by the executive, the federal government, in this constitutional resolution through closure and unilateral action. We are in danger of losing the principles of a free Constitution before they have even been enacted.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I rise with some diffidence to participate in this debate in view of the many excellent speeches we have heard, especially those by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), both of whom have expressed for so many of us the nature of the Canada we are trying to build through this resolution. I am pleased to have the opportunity to make some comments as the debate proceeds to a conclusion, at least of this particular stage of the constitutional resolution.

The Constitution

The Concise Oxford Dictionary of Current English defines the word "canard" when used in English as meaning a false report or a hoax. Since this debate began last fall a number of canards have been perpetrated or concocted or, indeed, hatched, if one uses the French meaning of the word "canard". These canards are untruths which are uttered, repeated and then reshaped. Although untrue they take on an essence, a certain validity through constant repetition, an independent existence, so to speak, regardless of the truth which may not be found in the statements. It is surprising that even though this debate has lasted for months, the parliamentary joint committee has met, debate has proceeded in the House of Commons, and bushels of commentaries have been written, these canards still fly and find themselves repeated, even in the last days of the debate.

Let me give a number of illustrations. We hear it often, almost every day from the opposition and the press, that the Constitution Act is the personal obsession of the Prime Minister. As recently as Wednesday, yesterday, the Toronto Globe and Mail in an editorial said in a final sentence:

> Canada cannot afford to have one man's views written in stone.

Yesterday during the question period the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), following a well established habit, when he was asking whether the Prime Minister would convene yet another federal-provincial conference, said "He can put his charter there". Then in another part of the question period he made a similar comment when he talked about "Canada having to live with the unilateral decision of one man".

The hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty) objected to the distribution of the Prime Minister's speech in this debate to Canadians and suggested that taxpayers' money was being used "to promote the views of one man".

I can only wonder at the motivation for the constant repetition of this theme. I wonder, and the people of Canada must wonder, why it is that throughout the debate the fiction has been constantly repeated that the Constitution Act, this great enterprise which is engaging the attention of us all, is the obsession of one man. Why would The Globe and Mail write, knowing better, that "Canada cannot afford to have one man's views written in stone"?

This is not a new tactic, certainly not on the part of the official opposition. I sat in the House when a similar theme was struck at the time of the flag debate; they labelled the present Canadian flag as the "Pearson pennant". Like the flag, I believe the Constitution will become in the minds of Canadians a national symbol, not the Constitution of any one person, not the obsession of the Prime Minister.

Whatever the motivation, the constant repetition by members of the opposition that this great effort of Constitution writing is the obsession of one man, is the work of one man, is untrue and insulting. It is insulting, first of all, to members of this party, members of the House of Commons and the millions of Canadians who have asked our party to take this step we are now nourishing in this debate.

I have only to look back at successive conventions of the Liberal Party of Canada to illustrate to members of this House and to Canadians that we have been at the forefront of constitutional reform. For example, here is a resolution from the 1970 convention:

> The Canadian Constitution should be repatriated and a suitable amending formula incorporated into it.

This is from the 1973 convention:

> The government act immediately to amend the Canadian Bill of Rights to ensure its supremacy over all federal legislation as it respects discrimination by reason of race, national origin, colour, religion or sex; and that measures be taken to have the said Bill of Rights entrenched in the BNA Act.

I just end on that note by quoting from the 1978 convention. There were then 22 resolutions put forward, ranging in sentiment from "that Canada remain a confederation" to recommendations for patriation, the insertion of essential rights and a charter of individual human rights, and recommendations for an amending formula and consultative mechanisms. So what the Prime Minister is doing, and what we are all doing, is carrying out the wish—certainly as expressed in our conventions for many years but particularly over the last ten years—to achieve the purposes which are contained in the proposed Constitution Act.

The repetition of this canard is not only insulting to me and to members of my party but also to most members of the New Democratic Party. It is insulting to the premier of Ontario. It is insulting to the Premier of New Brunswick. It is an insult to the groups of people who appeared before the joint House and Senate committee asking us for a charter and asking that their rights be additionally protected. This is not the obsession of the Prime Minister but a claim on the future of Canada, as they said before members of the joint committee.

I find it offensive to have this canard repeated because I know it to be untrue. I know the step-by-step decision-making process of this government since the breakdown of the constitutional conference in September. It certainly would have been wonderful, and much desired and applauded by all of us, if we had been able, in the series of conferences in the summer and climaxed in the fall, to reach an agreement with all the Premiers. We wanted to put it all together. It did not happen.

Then the question was what to do. There were various options which were open to the Government of Canada. They must have been obvious to members of the opposition. We discussed within our party and within our caucus these various options. We could, as the Premiers seem to have proposed—belatedly—have selected the option of patriation and an amending formula. That would be one option. We could have added to that option, for example, minority education rights in the provinces. That would have been an enriched option. Or we could have taken a further big step and included in the package the charter of human rights. It was not the Prime Minister who said in the cabinet or in the caucus, "I want my personal place in history; give it to me by including a full charter".

Mr. Stevens: How did he put it?

Mr. MacEachen: I will answer the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens). It was the overwhelming force of the opinion in the cabinet, later supported overwhelmingly in the Liberal caucus—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: —that said to the Prime Minister: "This is a historic opportunity; let us not miss this opportunity; let us go first class".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: I must say that I am proud of the Prime Minister. I am proud because he listened to the will of his own party as expressed in conventions, in the cabinet and in the Liberal caucus. He is now leading us and, unhappily and unfairly, taking the flak as the leader of the Liberal party in carrying out the wishes which have been expressed to him by members of his party.

Mr. Stevens: Poor Pierre.

Mr. MacEachen: I think members of the opposition in the Conservative party should have more respect for their own party and for the leader of their party in the province of Ontario, Mr. Davis. Is it his obsession? Is he lining up with the Liberal government because he believes what we are doing is the obsession of one man? Not at all. He is doing it because he believes it is necessary for the future of Canada. Let me quote Mr. Davis.

Mr. Stevens: Tell us about the bank rate.

Mr. McDermid: Tell us about Claude Ryan and his stand.

Mr. Stevens: How about the 17.4?

Mr. MacEachen: I find it very interesting that suddenly members of the Conservative opposition erupt. I must be cutting close to the bone. I must say that their bones are very exposed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Last week the Premier of Ontario, the Hon. William Davis, commenting on the results of the meeting here in Ottawa of the other eight Premiers, said:

> As a Canadian and as a Conservative, I believe that individual citizens must have basic protection from the unfair use of power by government, through means of an entrenched charter of rights.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Then he made what I thought was an even more important statement because it seems, in a sense, to clarify the difference between him and another group of Premiers, the group of eight. He said that the federal proposal protects fundamental freedoms "in a way that is basic to my view of this country". It is basic to our view of this country as it enters the eighties that we must take steps to protect fundamental freedoms.

When the Prime Minister stands up tonight to vote in support of the resolution on the proposed Constitution Act, 1981, he will not be standing up in this House of Commons alone. He will be supported by all his Liberal supporters on this side of the House and by members of the New Democratic Party who freely have made up their minds. He will also be applauded by many millions of Canadians who are asking that this step be taken.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: So much for that canard.

I want to mention another which has been developed in this debate, and it has been repeated so often that it has taken on a life of its own, namely, that a majority of Canadians are opposed to what we are doing in putting forward and advancing this resolution. Well, I do not find anyone knocking on the door of Parliament asking that we stop this process. I do not find anyone knocking on my door in my province asking that this government stop what it is doing.

Most polls which have been taken on this subject have been distorted. They have been unfairly interpreted to say that the views of the Canadian people represent opposition, when what they really do is express a preference most of us have and most of us share, namely, that it would be better if it were possible to make these advances with the consent of all the provinces. The people of Canada believe that, I believe that, the Minister of Justice believes that and so does the Prime Minister. But what one prefers is often not possible. Let us not continue to repeat the falsehood that the majority of the people of Canada are against what we are doing in this constitutional effort. I could quote so many polls, but this would take up a lot of time that is not available to me. I find it very interesting that recently the Premier of Ontario, who is a strong supporter—

An hon. Member: And a fellow traveller.

Mr. MacEachen: Someone opposite said that he is also a fellow traveller. He is a supporter of this package. He went to the polls explicit with the people of Canada about his support for the federal package, and he achieved a majority which had eluded him on two previous occasions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: I do not think hon. members opposite find that very unappetizing to swallow. Just yesterday we introduced into the House of Commons two new members of Parliament, both of whom are sitting on this side of the House, one from Ontario and the other from Prince Edward Island.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: The people of those constituencies in two widely separated provinces had an opportunity to say "No; stop!" One can imagine that if we had lost those byelections the Leader of the Opposition would have said, "I now have a clear indication that what you are doing is wrong and unpopular".

Yesterday we received the results of the Gallup poll which was taken at the height of the hijacking of this Parliament, when members of the official opposition were doing everything possible to bring to the attention of the people of Canada that what we were doing was wrong and dishonourable and that we were breaking up the federation of Canada. On the very day that they were screaming out their questions of privilege in the House of Commons, the people responding to the polls were saying "We prefer the Grits. We prefer them more than we did in the last election."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: I say let us not perpetuate the mythology that what we are doing is being opposed by the majority of the people of Canada.

I find it amazing that there is another canard being promulgated, and that is that the Parliament of Canada, by proceeding without the consent of the provinces, is establishing a new principle of confederation, or introducing a new principle into the Canadian federation. The Premiers are urging that nothing be done without their consent. It is not the Parliament of Canada or the Government of Canada which is attempting to build into our federation a new principle; it is the Premiers and their supporters who are now trying to create the view that the only way Canada can proceed is through some form of consent by the provinces.

On a radio program the other evening the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) talked about the double majority being the way to proceed. It may be his preference but he will not find much support in the precedents and the law of Canada. Yesterday the hon. member for Etobicoke-Centre (Mr. Wilson) repeated the same line. I refer both hon. members to the speech made by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Joyal), the co-chairman of the joint committee, who in my opinion gave one of the most lucid presentations that I have ever heard in the House of Commons. It is a model of clarity, information and analysis. He said:

> Indeed, the Canadian Parliament is not required to consult the provinces and get their agreement before submitting a request to the British Parliament. The Chief Justice of the Manitoba Court of Appeal explained this quite well and substantiated it in an elaborate judgment given on February 3 last. In any case, long before this judgment was given, Canadian experts had already recognized this fact.

If hon. members want another authority, I refer them to a former prime minister of Canada, the late Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, who spoke in the House of Lords in 1946 and made a most revealing statement, the frankest exposition on this point that I have read. He said:

> There has been a good deal of discussion about an amendment of the Constitution being a political measure.

He might have added to that if he had heard this debate. I continue the quotation. He said:

Canada is the only one of the dominions in which a party majority can amend the Constitution. They cannot amend it directly, but they do it indirectly, because we have agreed that we will consent to pass any legislation that they may petition to have passed by this Parliament.

He is speaking there about the British parliament. Let us not have continued the repetition that we are creating a new principle by doing what we are doing. It is they who ask us to do otherwise who fly in the face of law and precedent, as the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Treasury Board said. But we will know more about that later on.

I have only a minute or two left, Mr. Speaker. I must say that I was somewhat taken, impressed, disappointed, whatever word you might wish to use, when I observed what happened at the meeting of the eight Premiers in Ottawa last week. I have respect for the Premiers; I know most of them. But I must say that my respect does not carry to the point of agreement with their points of view, and the Premiers in their conclusions of last Thursday revealed how deep the chasm is. They revealed how deep the division of opinion is between them and the majority of members of Parliament as to what the future of this country ought to be. If one wanted a clear signal that they have a somewhat different view of the future of the country and the society which ought to be built in our view, then just contemplate their conclusions of last Thursday.

The process that we have been going through has been not only contentious but enriching in many ways, certainly to me, as I have observed views being expressed on both sides of the House. I recall one particular incident when the Minister of Justice reported on the results of the joint committee of which the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) was a distinguished member. He told us about the results of the hearings of the committee, when representatives of Canadian women came forward and said that they wanted better protection in the Constitution. He told us about the aboriginal people, the Indian, the Inuit and the Metis who came forward. He told us about the handicapped and other ethnic groups who, as he said, are not part of the two main streams of our country. They all came forward and said that they wanted special recognition. They said "We want our rights and our place to be protected in the future". They were making their claim on their inheritance as Canadians. That was rather important.

Then the Minister of Justice in his report—and members opposite must remember what he said—stated that the charter makes specific reference to the multicultural nature of our society. Well, he was taking in all the groups and the committee took in all the groups, giving recognition to even poor Scots like myself; we were also included in that multicultural heritage. It seemed to me to be a rather magnificent demonstration of what was at work in the committee and what the House was doing.

I cannot forget reading the testimony given before the committee by the representatives of the National Association of Japanese Canadians. It was pretty touching and moving when they told us about their experiences for 70 years in Canada about when they had to pay taxes without even the right to vote. They went on to say:

Surely some guarantee of human and civil rights is mandatory in the light of the experience of Japanese Canadians.

Members of the committee must have heard their voice when they said:

A charter of rights entrenched in the Constitution to prevent what we have gone through is the least that Canada can do to make amends for what has happened to us and to ensure that such injustices will never be repeated again.

Why do I use such references to illustrate the difference in the concept of what Canada ought to be between the Premiers and those of us on this side of the House? Why do I mention what the Minister of Justice said? I mention it because Premier Lyon and Premier Bennett told us that at their meeting, when they were trying to reach an accommodation, they did not even discuss the charter of human rights.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to find the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) involved in debate. He usually comes in when the government is in trouble. I have heard the Deputy Prime Minister speak very aggressively, very much on the offensive and very much on the defensive. I find it hard to recall a time when his speech was more lined with defensive comments than was the case in the remarks he made in the House today.

They have a great deal to be defensive about. We are meeting now at the end of one phase of this debate. I must say for my party that we enter this phase of the debate with some pride, because we have waged a fight which has kept this question Canadian. The plan of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was to have this measure out of Canada by Christmas, to have it decided in Britain before Canadian courts could consider its legality and before Canadian opinion could consider its propriety.

As we all know, this Parliament or this institution exists to enact and improve good measures and to stop or delay bad measures. My party and I are proud of the work we have done in having Parliament delay and improve this resolution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: It is very clear that this most basic Canadian question about our own Constitution remains in Canadian control today only because the Progressive Conservative party stood and fought in the House of Commons and in the country. We have not yet won the war to protect Canada's federal institutions, although we have made it possible for that war to be won, but we have demonstrated the strength of Canada's parliamentary institutions. The government used every available instrument, from media manipulation to dishonesty about our diplomatic exchanges, to bulldoze this measure through. This party, with no help at all from the New Democratic Party, proved that Parliament is strong enough to stop bad measures being forced down the throats of the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: There is one other aspect of this phase of the debate of which I am particularly proud. At a time when Quebec is questioning whether it can find a full future in Canada, the Progressive Conservative party, whose greatest strength is outside Quebec, defended and argued the cause of Quebec when its own elected members chose to be silent.

Quebecers have reason to question the wisdom of trusting the Liberals, but, more important, they have proof now that Canadians other than Quebecers, from Alberta, Ontario, Newfoundland and elsewhere in our Canadian family, share and are prepared to fight for the federal principles which are essential to the survival of Quebec and Canada. The Liberal party may betray Quebec, but Canada will not betray Quebec.

I deeply regret the discipline which the Liberal party has forced upon the elected members of Quebec who, unfortunately, do not speak on behalf of that province in this House. Only the Liberal member for Montmorency (Mr. Duclos) has had the courage to put the interests of his province ahead of the instructions of his party.

Mr. Lalonde: Shame!

Mr. Clark: The minister says shame. Indeed it is a shame for the members from the province of Quebec to abandon their electors just as the Liberal members have abandoned the electors of the province of Quebec.

What an ordeal for the people of Quebec who see the members they have sent to Ottawa to represent their interest, who see their own members remain silent or behave like sheep instead of rising against a measure which threatens the federal system, a system which is so important for Quebecers and for the province of Quebec. Is it not ironic that all members of the National Assembly decried this measure, that all the provincial parties denounced this measure? And yet the members who were sent to Ottawa to make sure that federalism would enable Quebec to grow within the Canadian family, those members do not utter a single word against a measure which undermines federalism, genuine federalism.

[English]

I recall that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) used to entertain thoughts about going to the province of Quebec to win a provincial election. Well, he has done that; he and his Prime Minister, by pushing this measure through, have gone to the province of Quebec and have won an election. They won it for René Lévesque and against Claude Ryan.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: It is well for us to review what is at issue here. This resolution proposes bringing our Constitution home; that is a goal which everyone supports. It proposes a means to change the Constitution when it is at home, and everyone agrees that we need an amending formula, an amending process. It proposes a charter of rights, which all parties in Parliament support. Those are the goals.

But the issue is that the government has determined to pursue those goals in a way which ignores Canadian history, which abandons Canadian practice, which may violate Canadian law, and which very seriously threatens the future of a united Canada.

• (1610)

The Supreme Court of Canada will decide the narrow legal question, although it is worth noting that the Liberal government tried every trick in the book to keep that Canadian question from going before a Canadian court. The legal question is important and it is legitimate. My colleagues and I are pleased that the government failed in its attempt to deny Canadian courts the right to decide the Canadian legal question. However, the court is only part of the process. The court can tell us whether this resolution is legal according to past law and past practice; but only we in this Parliament can decide whether it is good law and good practice for the future of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: That is a decision for legislators, not for judges. The Supreme Court will decide whether the federal government now has the power unilaterally to change the Constitution in areas of direct provincial jurisdiction. Our decision in this Parliament is whether we want future federal governments to have that power, for that will be the effect of passing this resolution in its present form and through the present process.

The Parliament of Canada will be asserting, as the newest and strongest precedent for future courts, that we have the power exclusively and arbitrarily to change any parts of the Constitution we want to change. That is the underlying principle of this measure and of this process, and it rips the heart out of a federal system.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: That is not just my view. That is also the view of distinguished Canadian Liberals, who sit among other places in the Senate, where they exercise more freedom to speak their minds. I want to draw to the attention of the House and read into the record the comments, for example, of the former Liberal leader in the province of Ontario, Senator Andrew Thompson, who said on March 2, 1981:

> Putting it bluntly and simply, my question is: are we keeping our word; are we breaking the rules by which we agreed to govern ourselves in the federation? No matter how noble and worthy the purpose of this resolution—and I believe that what we are trying to achieve is worthy—the end does not justify the means.

Here is what former Liberal minister the Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets had to say, and I quote:

> This unilateral project goes against and negates everything in which I have believed, which I have supported and endorsed in all my years in Parliament. If it remains in its present form, I shall not be able to support it.

In my opinion, this unilateral proposal threatens to break up, for all practical purposes, the balance of powers which has always existed between our two levels of government.

That is the opinion of a Liberal Senator, Mr. Deschatelets.

[English]

Then I quote the remarks made last month by Senator George McIlraith, who served with such distinction for so long in this House, including as House leader on the government side:

I have served in Parliament now for the past 41 years. During that time the governments have been headed by five Prime Ministers. I have been a Liberal all my adult life. All of the political leaders I noted earlier in my remarks were leaders I respected and admired. With the exception of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Honourable Hugh Guthrie—whom I merely met but could not say I knew—they were friends of mine. Were they all wrong? Were all the leaders of the Liberal party in the past three-quarters of a century totally wrong, or could it be that our present government is wrong in taking a diametrically opposed course of action to the one all those leaders thought necessary and proper? Could it be that the present government is wrong in this attempt to make these basic amendments to our Constitution unilaterally, with a bare majority in the federal Parliament?

I want patriation but I cannot acquiesce in the wrong and dangerous course we are being asked to follow in most of the proposed legislation before us. In the exercise of my responsibilities as a senator, I have no alternative but to vote against this resolution in its present form.

Thus spoke Senator McIlraith.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: A great Canadian!

Mr. Clark: The Prime Minister has not listened to the Liberals in the Senate. He has not listened to the member of Parliament for Montmorency-Orléans (Mr. Duclos). He has not listened to Claude Ryan. He has not listened to Gordon Gibson. He has not listened to the long list of others in his party who are offended by what he is saying and what he stands for. He has not listened to the elected premiers of the eight provincial governments who oppose his measure.

He rejected our proposal in the fall to bring the Constitution home with the Vancouver formula. He rejected our proposal to split the resolution and to send the charter to the provinces for consideration. Now he indicates that he will accept none of the amendments we proposed to improve the charter of rights and respect the federal nature of Canada.

Instead of treating the Constitution as though it belonged to the whole country, he has acted as though it is his alone, to change in ways that are his alone to choose.

Some hon. Members: Shame, shame!

Mr. Clark: The Liberal party lets him get away with it, as does the NDP, sitting complacently back while the constitutional measure which is one man's obsession is forced through this Parliament. I do not begrudge the Prime Minister his place in history, but I would like him to leave us a country to live in when he is gone.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: It is that country which his measure and his method deeply threaten. He has one more opportunity now to prove that his concern is for the country and that his motive is national and not merely narrow and personal.

[Translation]

The Prime Minister now has a chance to do his duty as a Canadian statesman. He has at least six weeks ahead of the Supreme Court ruling, six weeks in which to try to achieve a consensus. Once the Supreme Court decision is handed down and if the latter asserts the legality of the resolutions, at least as far as its format is concerned, the order of the House will provide the Prime Minister with two days of debate in the House, followed by speedy action in the Senate, and this will conclude the consideration of this proposal by Parliament. This time frame has been set, and we accept it. But it also allows the Prime Minister, without any delay whatsoever, to follow-up on the premiers' initiative.

In September, the ten premiers made him an offer. He failed to make a counterproposal. There are now eight premiers who are proposing a detailed amending formula. He does not have to accept it in toto. But we consider it a basis for serious round of discussions, in the same way that we consider the government resolution, including the charter of rights with the amendments we propose, as a basis for serious and reasonable discussions.

I maintain that the Prime Minister of Canada has the duty to call a meeting and the right to draw up its agenda. Why will he not call such a meeting? Why will he not respect the federal system? What is he afraid of? He has just been rejected by the people of Quebec. Is he afraid to face the Premier who has just served him a good thrashing? The Prime Minister of Canada should not be afraid of such a meeting. If it does not lead to any agreement, he could then follow up on his resolution unless the court finds it illegal. And if there is an agreement on the procedure to follow with respect to a charter of rights, an amending formula, and perhaps the application of Section 133 to Ontario, he and Canada as a whole will have gained enormously.

The Prime Minister should put aside his personal vanity and take advantage of this opportunity to gain so much for Canada. He has the absolute obligation to call a first ministers' conference.

[English]

We now have before us amendments from the three parties. I want to deal very briefly with the very skimpy amendments put forward by the Liberal party, by the government. Of course, they come in two batches: the official ones under the name of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard), and the unofficial Liberal amendments in the name of the New Democratic Party.

We want to congratulate the NDP on agreeing with our wording on equality for women in the amendment.

• (1620)

Mr. Clark: Of course, we shall be voting for that, even though it is tied to a so-called "aboriginal rights" clause which merely requires the provinces to approve amendments to aboriginal rights.

What of the official Liberal amendments? Because of our assistance and insistence, particularly that of the hon. member for Provencher, they are grudgingly putting the word "God" in the preamble to the charter. Not with the eloquent and inspiring wording from the Diefenbaker Bill of Rights, with accompanying references in that document, but not in this one, to "the dignity and worth of the human person and the position of the family in a society of free individuals and free institutions", but instead, words inserted as an afterthought. This is what I find especially reprehensible: they are saying we can have a little bit of God if we accept their amending formula.

They ask us to join them in making 70 per cent of the people of western Canada—the population of Alberta and B.C.—irrelevant so far as constitutional amendments are concerned.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: They want us to join them in making those provinces third class in exchange for a reference to God. There is a better way to reflect the supremacy of God in the Constitution of Canada, and that is to accept the amendments in the name of my colleague, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker). That package respects both God and the federal system. That is the way we should proceed in the Canadian Parliament.

The amendments which we put forward give proper recognition to the sovereignty of God, the worth of the person and, which is very important, the position of the family in a society of free individuals. The government rejects that approach. It rejects enshrining the right of Canadians to enjoy property.

It wants to allow the courts to decide conscience questions for Canadians. It wants the courts to be free to bar Canadians from deciding laws on capital punishment and abortion. For months the government has talked about the tyranny of unanimity and has practised the tyranny of unilateral action. In the amendments we have put forward, we have offered them a reasonable definition of consensus which we would join with them in supporting, a definition which includes seven provinces representing at least half the people of Canada, acting in concert with the Parliament of Canada. But the government is not interested in that. It is not interested because it does not want a Constitution or a charter of rights that anybody but the Liberals write. It deliberately keeps the charter hostage to a divisive process. It is trying to trade off rights for an amending formula.

When the eight premiers met in Ottawa they all dropped their packages and their conditions. The Liberal government does not want to drop its conditions. A Quebec government finally agreed to patriation but the government says, "who cares?". The government wants its agenda in its way, in its time. We will have nothing to do with a process of that kind which is wrong. It is a process which is deeply wrong and is deeply divisive. This government's preference and guiding star is to proceed unilaterally. It rejects proposals which respect the history and nature of Canada.

The government invents new phrases to condemn the enduring realty of a diverse Canada. If "checkerboard" means that different standards apply at different times, at different places, that has always been the case in Canada. That, indeed, was the political principle that allowed medicare to begin in this country. The same principle allows Quebec to enjoy a different pension plan, allows Newfoundland to have a school system different from that of British Columbia, and Ontario a system different from that of Quebec. Some of those differences date from before confederation; others, such as the Newfoundland school system, were specific conditions of entry into confederation. Of course there are differences in Canada. That is our history. That is our nature. To condemn it is to condemn Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Indeed, one of the most alarming elements of this highly centralist Liberal position is the underlying assumption that difference is dangerous. The Fathers of Confederation believed the opposite when they wrote a Constitution which protected local identities. So did the British parliament well before confederation when it wrote laws which guaranteed the distinct identity of the French Canadian society in Quebec. So do those of us who today celebrate the excitement of multiculturalism, which is the incarnation of difference or respect for diversity, or those of us who cheerfully work to learn a second official language.

The Prime Minister and his colleagues like to suggest that they speak for Canada against the provinces. In fact, they speak for official Ottawa against Canada. The Prime Minister and the little clique that advises him will sometime learn, I hope, that there is a Canada beyond Ottawa, a Canada beyond official bilingualism, a Canada beyond a charter of rights. It is a Canada of diversity and emotion, of innovation and of proud identities. Those Canadians cannot all be shaped into the same mould. Mr. Speaker, they should not be, because were they so shaped they would lose the essence and value of this great and unique nation.

Our speeches are limited to 30 minutes in this debate, but there is one brief theme that I want to touch on because this has been one other common theme in our history. I refer to the need to have a national feeling that unites us. We know that laws are not enough to unite Canadians; there has to be a feeling of nationality. It is one of the most bitter of ironies that the means the Liberals have chosen with which to impose the centralist view has weakened the Canadian feeling of common nationality. A Constitution which should have been the source of Canadians coming together and growing proud together has instead become the source of division in this country. That is entirely the fault of the way in which the government has proceeded.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: When I hear the Prime Minister speak, as he does at length, and when I hear other members on the government side speak, one word recurs and that is the word "failure". The Prime Minister speaks of 54 years of failure in constitutional negotiations. He speaks of failure with the premiers. Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister can find failure if he seeks it. The point that must be made is that we have also succeeded dramatically in this country. This has been a country of success when governments sought success. It has been a country of agreement when governments and leaders sought agreement.

We have faced much more complex questions in the past than some of the questions we face today regarding the Constitution. It was a far more complex matter for the Diefenbaker government to negotiate with the Sauvé government, a means by which federal funds could be made available to the province of Quebec. Yet that was done, overcoming decades of suspicion and reluctance, because there was a mutual will to make the federal system work.

It was far more complex to introduce and have accepted a system of medicare across the country, but that was done. And the Canada Pension Plan was accepted across the country because there was determination to seek agreement to go forward. Therefore, when the former government in Ottawa was prepared to seek agreement on a national energy policy, we were able to achieve agreement, something which has eluded this government for 22 months.

• (1630)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McDermid: The Prime Minister laughs. He has not been able to do it.

Mr. Clark: There is a secret to this. There is bound to be failure when a government ignores the nature of this country and runs counter to its nature. We have succeeded in Canada when we have respected the nature of Canada.

This proposal fundamentally attacks the basic federal nature of Canada. Even if it is upheld in the courts, it will create a legacy of bitterness and division.

Mr. Trudeau: What about the flag?

Mr. Clark: It is not necessary to go this way. We can bring our Constitution home. We can have a charter of rights. We can have an amending formula, and we can have it by agreement if we work within the Canadian tradition instead of abandoning it and if we follow the Canadian way to agreement.

I urge the government to accept those amendments and, just as importantly, to accept the federal spirit which inspires those amendments.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roland de Corneille (Eglinton-Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, before I commence my remarks on the Constitution in general and on the amendments, I would like to say in immediate rebuttal to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) that I was disappointed that he chose to denigrate and minimize the inclusion of an amendment to the Constitution by the government which calls for the inclusion of a reference to God. I did not think it was necessary for the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition to try to turn this into a partisan, political issue.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. McDermid: Don't be so hypocritical.

Mr. de Corneille: Therefore, I must set the record straight for the public. Also I want to set the record straight for Hansard. It is bothering members of the opposition at the present time to have this brought to their attention. Nonetheless, I must persist in pointing out that there is a reference to God in this Constitution, one which is being proposed by the Liberal government.

This is not the first time the Liberal government has had a decision to make concerning a reference to God. Only recently, as a matter of fact, in the new text of "O Canada" the government departed from tradition and asked through this hymn: "God keep our land glorious and free!" This party proposed those words. Those words were a departure from the traditional text of "O Canada".

Incidentally, the Leader of the Opposition speaks about reference to God in the Diefenbaker Bill of Rights. It is ironic that the original text of the Diefenbaker Bill of Rights had no reference to God. In fact, it was a Liberal member of this House at that time, the hon. member for Windsor, who proposed that these words be included in the Diefenbaker Bill of Rights, and that proposal was accepted by the opposition. That is how these words in the proposal from the Tories were accepted—because of a suggestion made by a Liberal member of Parliament. There was another effort on the part of the government to include God in the proposed Constitution. The suggestion was made at last September's conference when representatives of the federal and provincial governments met to discuss the future of the Constitution. The Liberal government proposed an amendment to include a reference to God in the preamble to the Constitution.

I suggest it would be better if we did not try to be pious or pretend that we are superior.

Mr. Kilgour: Sit down.

Mr. de Corneille: Rather, it would be better to say that it is desirable to include a reference to God, for which I hope all parties will vote. This is something which the Liberal party has stood for in the past, which it stands for at present and will continue to stand for in the future at all times.

As we debate the resolution on the Constitution, a true perspective would show that we are participating in one of the greatest events in Canadian history.

[Translation]

First, by patriating our Constitution with an amending formula and provisions for eventually holding a referendum, we will enhance our sense of identity as Canadians. Second, by including a charter of rights and freedoms, we will check whatever appears to our minds to be acts of injustice and inequity. Third, proclaiming our values is ideal in a document which will serve as an example for future generations and would constantly remind other nations of the kind of people that we are and of what we believe in.

[English]

First, I said that by patriating the Constitution we will deepen our sense of identity as Canadians. At a superficial glance, patriation may seem to be only symbolic, ceremonial, or psychological. It is all of these at least. But throughout this debate and the events which will follow, Canadians are becoming far more aware of their history and their identity than they have ever been, at least for a very long time. Some are surprised, if not amazed, at how recent has been our emergence into nationhood and how precariously our human rights have been protected in the past.

Second, I said that by the entrenchment of the charter of rights and freedoms we are moving to eliminate what are recognized by most Canadians as injustices and inequalities, old and new. As parliamentary governments throughout the world have become more and more habituated to operate by government regulations, rules, orders in council and similar instruments, it becomes increasingly urgent and important to protect the individual through an entrenched charter with the fundamental right to appeal to the courts for redress against arbitrary government violations of personal rights and freedoms. Further, the charter will protect every Canadian individual and minority from the tyranny of the majority, a fact which is of vital importance in a nation so constituted as ours. One wonders what there is about the orientation of the official opposition in this House that makes its members so strongly resistant to granting such a charter now. Some say they are for a charter, that it is a great idea, but that we cannot have it now; perhaps two years from now, perhaps some time later, but not now. Others say they are opposed outright to the charter. Some of their arguments against it are most imaginative, if not downright ingenious.

One such argument we have heard quite often from the opposition is that our Canadian charter will not protect anyone anyway. If there is a will to circumvent the charter, they argue, it will be circumvented. Some of these opposition members illustrate this idea by pointing to the Soviet bill of rights which, they state, is a marvellous document on paper but is continuously and flagrantly violated in practice. They are correct when they say that human rights in the Soviet Union are flagrantly violated over and over again. However, in the heat of their opposition against the Canadian charter, they do not tell us the whole story. They fail to explain that the Soviet bill of rights is a "marvellous document" only if one totally ignores the fact that it provides the Soviet authorites with huge loopholes. They are so big they can talk about human rights with tongue in cheek and crossed fingers.

For example, in the Soviet document there is written in on purpose a basic and fundamental escape hatch; it is the provision that these rights are given in accordance with the interests of the people and "in order to strengthen and develop the socialist system". In other words, one has no freedom unless one supports the Soviet government. The Soviet bill of rights is not a marvellous document because it is not a sound document; nor does the Soviet Union support a just interpretation of it. We should dismiss such opposition arguments against a Canadian charter as baseless.

A second alleged reason given by some of the members of the opposition for their resistance to the charter of rights is even less convincing. This was alluded to recently by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). The opposition maintain that they cannot support it because it is the current, singular and peculiar obsession of our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). Now that is an amazing, prejudiced reaction by which to decide the affairs of state, even if the observation were true, which it is not. First of all, the charter is no current whim of the Prime Minister. In 1967 when he was minister of justice he published a book entitled "A Canadian Charter of Human Rights". I need hardly remind members that that was some 14 years ago, hardly a recent whim.

Second, the charter is not an original idea or unique to him. The entrenchment of a charter has been advocated by Liberal, New Democratic and Tory leaders well before our present Prime Minister. The assurance of basic human rights and freedoms for all Canadians was of paramount importance to the late Right Hon. John G. Diefenbaker, and to that fine parliamentarian, Tommy Douglas. If we must talk of obsession, then let us say that it has been the obsession of Canadians since 1927, following the Imperial Conference when the matter was first raised. It was the obsession of the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent. It was the obsession of the late Prime Minister Lester B. Pearson when he wrote in January 1968 these words:

> As Canada enters into its second century of confederation, Canadians could take no more meaningful step than to entrench firmly in our constitution those fundamental rights and liberties which we possess and cherish. A Canadian charter of human rights would reflect and protect the high degree of freedom enjoyed by Canadians and the unique bilingual character of the country. I recommend to all Canadians the acceptance of a Canadian charter of human rights.

So it is not merely an obsession of our present Prime Minister. The charter has been a torch for the Liberal party and for many New Democratic and Tory leaders over the decades. Now it is borne proudly by the Liberal caucus, for with this torch of freedom, we hope to kindle the fires of justice and equality everywhere.

We rejoice, as pointed out by the Minister of Finance in his recent speech, that the overwhelming majority of Canadians support the entrenchment of a charter of rights and freedoms in the Constitution. We rejoiced on March 25 last when leaders of 18 minority communities came to Ottawa armed with petitions and resolutions from their organizations. They called for the immediate entrenchment of a charter of rights and freedoms on behalf of two and a half million Canadians who belong to minority groups.

I am sure it will not lessen the stature of our Prime Minister that he is attacked for being obsessed with human rights. What seems to me really to underlie the major opposition to the entrenchment of the charter of rights and freedoms is a lack of urgency or sensitivity on the part of some members in recognizing the lack of protection of rights for so many people across this country, both now and in the past. The opposition fails to realize how dangerous it is to continue to rely on the comfortable majority to protect frustrated or disadvantaged minorities. The hon. members for Provencher (Mr. Epp) and Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) can lean back and philosophize from now until kingdom come about how all these rights are inalienable—that therefore, in theory, these rights already exist. But just try telling that to the aboriginal people of Canada, to women, to the handicapped, or to may of our unprotected minorities. Theirs is too much of a laissez-faire approach which assures us that all will work out somehow, somewhere, some time, but not just now.

How can we ignore the fact so sagely observed by Dr. Walter Tarnopolsky that so far as the provinces are concerned, as of now, in 1981, although all ten have anti-discrimination statutes, only three provinces have bills of rights which cover political civil liberties, that is, fundamental human rights, and only one guarantees legal civil liberties. Tarnopolsky therefore concludes:

> Considering that the fundamental principle of the parliamentary system of government which applies in Canada is that the legislatures are supreme within their jurisdiction, there is absolutely no constitutional limitations on seven of the provinces from restricting fundamental freedoms, and nine of them from restricting legal civil liberties.

If those who oppose the immediate entrenchment of the charter had their way, the result would be not only a prolongation of certain injustices and a delay in the establishment of linguistic and mobility rights, the rights of the aboriginal people and the handicapped; there would be one more serious consequence that is often overlooked. This is my third point, that our Constitution and our charter will proclaim our values and ideals as a nation. By this charter, we declare to all Canadians and to all people everywhere that not only are we a democratic society, but also that, by enshrining the sanctity and freedom of the individual, we entrench very sweeping limitations on the power of the state and reject any and all forms of totalitarianism. The Canadian charter is a declaration of justice and compassion which is probably unequalled on this earth.

It has been developed in its present form by first being drafted on the basis of the finest tradition of the Canadian heritage of the British common law and the French code, and then by being perfected by passing through the refiner's fire of the testimony of Canadians who have fled from every form of oppression in every corner of the globe, and who have suggested, on the basis of their personal experiences, ways to advance still further the entire cause of human dignity. We underestimate the importance of this constitutional charter as a teacher to this and future generations.

Some reject the charter and would prefer to rely on public attitudes. They argue that you cannot legislate morality, that you cannot change bigotry by laws, that you have to wait for attitudinal change. That kind of mentality, which one hears often from the other side, is all too tragically reminiscent of the same point of view of the governors in the southern United States who stubbornly opposed federal civil rights legislation. They maintained that local popular acceptance was first required. They further claimed that federal civil rights legislation interfered with local states' rights.

Dr. Martin Luther King, as Gordon Fairweather has said, put the relationship between law and morality in stark terms when he said:

> It may be true that law cannot make a man love me, but it can keep him from lynching me.

Dr. King went further in pointing out that the law is also an important teacher of values. The law transmits from age to age.

Why do hon. members of the opposition so underestimate the importance of the written law, the codified law, as a teacher and transmitter of values? Why do they shrink from wanting to put it down in black on white in the charter? The ten commandments are laws. It is true that they are not always obeyed. People still, unfortunately, kill, steal and bear false witness against their neighbours; but the ten commandments and other moral laws are values which were and are inculcated into the minds of people. Does law not teach and change values? Is not the bible itself a codified book of laws? In some circles, in fact, it is known as the "volume of the sacred law". When the Presbyterian moderator of the Church of Scotland presents the volume of the sacred law, the volume of the bible, to the monarch at a coronation, the moderator makes the presentation with these words:

> Here is wisdom. This is the royal law.
> These are the lively oracles of God.

I say to my hon. friends that law changes attitudes, and so do many of the laws we pass here, as will the charter of rights and freedoms, to the benefit of the aboriginal people, the handicapped and all others whom this charter has been designed to protect.

Moreover, I believe this charter to be so essential that it deserves not only passage in this House but special treatment thereafter as well. Presently as chairman of the northern pipelines committee I serve on a standing committee with a permanent frame of reference to monitor and watchdog the progress of the Alaska pipeline. Surely the rights and freedoms of Canadians are as important to Canadians as the pipeline. I would advocate not only passage of the charter in this House, but also the establishment of an ongoing House of Commons standing committee as a watchdog to monitor and uphold the principles and values for which this charter stands.

Finally, I plead with all members of this House, I plead with all Canadians, to remember the oppressed people who are suffering brutal violation of their human rights throughout the world. I have always been convinced that the struggle for human rights throughout the world is indivisible. That is why ten years ago, as head of a Canadian national human rights organization, I presented a petition to the federal government signed by thousands of Canadians and calling on our country, both nationally and provincially, to endorse Canada's signature to and ratification of, the international human rights covenants of the United Nations.

We presented that petition on human rights day, 1971, to the Right Hon. Prime Minister, who immediately assured us of his readiness to give federal ratification. It took five more years before all the provinces concurred, before Canada in 1976 was at last able to speak out on behalf of the oppressed in many foreign lands. For the sake of those oppressed as well as our own sake, we cannot afford to wait again.

I plead that we remember that Canada has a great and central role to play in international human rights commissions and courts. I wonder if we realize that, when we speak up on behalf of victims of oppression in the Soviet Union and elsewhere, we are often taunted with the accusation in international courts of justice and commissions: "Where is your human rights legislation to guarantee protection for all Canadians? What about the rights of your aboriginal peoples? Why is your Constitution totally silent on human rights?" Let us be able to reply to these taunts resolutely: "We have entrenched in our Constitution all these rights. Our hands are clean; now wash yours."

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, just a few weeks ago during this historic debate on the establishment of a truly Canadian Constitution I indicated why we were supporting the measure now before the House. I indicated then that among the reasons, first and foremost was the following. The action the Parliament of Canada is now taking would lead to a truly Canadian Constitution, one that would be here in our own land. Contrary to what some people have been saying, not only in the House of Commons but from coast to coast, this would be a Constitution made for Canadians, by Canadians right here in the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Secondly, the proposal before us contains a workable amending process, something this country has lacked throughout its history and which has led in fact to many of the divisions, both regional and within regions. We have lacked the process necessary to make needed constitutional change.

I say in passing that while the formula for amending the Constitution in this document is not perfect—indeed, if you look at the constitution of any federal state you will not find a perfect amending formula—it still remains a fact, as pointed out by members of my party and by others, that if the premiers in the next couple of years come up with a better formula, there is a process in this resolution by which a preferable formula can be selected by the people of Canada. That seems to me to be a very reasonable proposal indeed.

Thirdly, and very important to members of my party, this document we are debating contains a charter of human rights, something my party has been calling for throughout the land since the Regina manifesto. I am not going to dwell at length on the need for a charter of rights. I did that in my speech a few weeks ago, and it was again addressed very eloquently as a subject by two of my colleagues, among others, the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson), who is our justice critic, and yesterday by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae).

We need a charter of human rights in a federal state which is diverse regionally and culturally. I repeat that we do not need to elaborate on the arguments; we have heard them already in the House and they cannot be ignored. Our country on the whole has had a proud history, but our country has also had moments of which none of us should be proud such as when we discriminated against the Japanese, against our native people, against the Chinese, and against women. With the accomplishment of the aims which are included in this charter and the fundamental rights which will be guaranteed, I hope we will never do that again in the future history of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Having said that, I want to note certain particular aspects of the charter which are of particular importance to my caucus colleagues. First among these that I want to stress are the rights which will be established in all provinces for francophone Canadians.

[Translation]

As an anglophone it is very important to me at this moment in our history to see that the people who belong to a culture other than mine have the same rights, and it is very important in the province of Ontario, I want to emphasize this, that all francophones enjoy the same rights as anglophones have in the province of Quebec.

[English]

With this resolution it would not be true to say that we will have achieved that goal. As all members in this House know, we will not have achieved the same rights for francophones in the province of Ontario as anglophones have in the province of Quebec, and that is something about which we should all be concerned with respect to future action.

In mentioning that I want, through this body, to address particular comments to the Premier of the province of Ontario. The Premier of the province of Ontario has moved in accepting minority linguistic rights in schools and has done so by supporting the measure which is before Parliament. These rights will be enjoyed by French-speaking Canadians in schools right across Canada. I say to the Premier of the province of Ontario that that is one important step, but before very long, if he has any sense of justice at all, he must do for all francophones in the province of Ontario what has long since been done for anglophones in the province of Quebec.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: My colleagues are also pleased that in this charter we find protection for those of us coming from outside North America originally who are neither English-speaking nor French-speaking by ancestry; that is, the group we usually include in the term "the ethnic community", which makes up more than one-third of our population. It is indeed fitting for a federal state like Canada to note particularly the contribution that group has made to the history of our country and to have a section entrenched in our Constitution with particular reference to them.

I am also pleased at the inclusion of the handicapped, and I am pleased, as are my colleagues who have fought so hard in recent years in two major campaigns at the national level for women's rights, that at long last with this charter, and especially with the amendments which will be voted on later tonight, equality, at least in terms of the law and in terms of fundamental rights, will be provided for Canadian women. I say "at long last"; we still have a long way to go.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Finally, a particular group I want to mention is our native peoples. As is indeed true in the United States of America and in South America, we in this country have not been as generous to the original inhabitants of this country as have people outside this part of the planet to their original inhabitants. Let me put it more bluntly. We have all too often been cruel and indifferent and, indeed, at times murderous to the original inhabitants of this continent. At long last we will begin to redress a profound historical injustice by entrenching in the Constitution of Canada aboriginal and treaty rights.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: In that connection I want to say that I am pleased that the government has decided to support an amendment tonight which will entrench those rights with the same degree of legal solidity, if that is a proper term, as all the other fundamental rights which will be entrenched in the Constitution.

I must say in passing that I was disappointed to hear the comment of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) earlier today in giving such grudging acceptance to this notion. I want to say that it was members of my party—other colleagues in my caucus—and of the government party as well who worked very hard at the committee level and in private to obtain these rights, and there was no movement at all at that time in terms of determination by members of the official opposition. I resent their condescending attitude toward the important step we will be taking in voting for the entrenchment of aboriginal rights later on tonight.

I must also say that the Leader of the Opposition was somewhat disappointing when he said that he would support our amendment as it affects the equality of women too "because it was, after all, the wording which was selected by the Conservative party".

Mr. Benjamin: Hogwash.

Mr. Broadbent: If the Leader of the Opposition wants to be completely honest, he knows very well that the Conservative party had wording in an amendment in the Senate which was not nearly as effective as this wording, and it was only after this wording in the proposed amendment became public that the Conservative party carefully extracted it from some newspaper and included it among their own amendments. It is one thing to get up and say they are going to support something, whether it is women's rights, native rights or any other basic matter; but then to pass off in a rather cynical way that the idea was really their own is something I find just a little hypocritical and out of place in a debate as serious as this.

Since I last spoke in this debate there have been two developments on which I want to comment. One was the premiers' conference. I say—and I mean it when I say it—that when the premiers of the eight provinces who opposed the position taken by the Government of Canada and by my caucus got together, I hoped they would come together in Ottawa and present us with an amending formula which was better than the one we had thought was workable. I thought it would be better for Canada if the premiers came up with a formula which we could incorporate as an amendment to this resolution. Because if they had done that, then indeed it would have been accurate to say that the new Constitution that we will have—and I am confident we will have it—was not simply the result of parliamentary action but the result of serious, constructive participation by a majority of the provinces.

The premiers met, Mr. Speaker. Not only did they not come up with a better amending formula; they did not come up with anything that approached the notion of a charter of rights in any sense. Therefore, they failed on two important counts, since the essence of the resolution which is before us is to provide us with an independent Canadian constitution with an amending formula for the future, on the one hand, and, on the other hand, provide a charter of rights. The premiers failed to achieve an amending formula. They presented one which would create a patchwork or a checkerboard, whatever term one wishes to use, in which women would have rights in one province but not in another, in which native people would have rights in one part of Canada and not another.

I want to go on record as saying that my party does not object to an amending formula which, in some cases, could include, by agreement, opting out of special, non-fundamental rights areas. But how can anyone who seriously believes in the notion of nationhood, who takes the concept of citizenship as a basic given right for a country, ever propose an amending formula, as the premiers did, which could result in Canadians having a different status of citizenship depending upon where they lived in our land? Our party can have nothing to do with such an idea.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: In having failed to deliver when they came here, the premiers have legitimized, as nothing else could, what we are now in the process of doing in debating and voting on this measure. I meant it when I said that I regretted it, but that is one of the ironic and unintended consequences of that meeting. The vast majority of premiers made it clear that they do not believe in a charter of rights. The same premiers are heading governments in provinces where the vast majority of citizens in every province wants a charter of rights; the evidence is overwhelmingly clear on that. We represent Canada just as much as the premiers, if I may say so, since we too come from all parts of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: If we want to take our responsibilities seriously and meet the needs and demands of the people of Canada who want a charter of rights, then I ask you, Mr. Speaker, what can we do? The premiers have come up with an amending formula which is unworkable in terms of a charter of rights, which they did not even discuss at their meeting. What they have done is exactly what some of us were saying last fall in explaining why Parliament had to act. What they have done is shown that only the Parliament of Canada can bring to the people of Canada the charter of rights which they need.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Before I conclude my comments on the resolution, I would again like to deal briefly with what I can only regard as the hypocritical stand of the Conservative party on the amendment standing in the government's name. In the government's amendment there are two key points. One recognizes the concept of God in the Constitution; the second aspect would put the western provinces of Canada on exactly the same basis as the Atlantic provinces when it comes to the amending process.

Mr. Kilgour: Second class!

Mr. Broadbent: On the one hand the Conservative party has talked about unity, about the Canadian way and how it is important that we should co-operate. On the other hand they have been going all across our land stirring up discontent, turning one region of Canada against the other.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: I want to be honest about this, Mr. Speaker, specifically when it comes to the question of the prairie provinces. The Progressive Conservative Party of Canada has been running ads in the newspapers of the prairie provinces telling the citizens in those provinces that they are citizens in a third rate province.

Mr. Kilgour: Second rate.

Mr. Broadbent: Some ads have said second rate and some have said third rate.

Why are they doing this? They have said the prairie provinces have less powers than Prince Edward Island. Well, this very amendment will ensure to the prairie provinces that they have exactly the same powers as Prince Edward Island.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: If the Tories were not the hypocrites that they are in this process, then they would be voting for this amendment tonight.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Not content with stirring up regional discontent in the prairies, which they have been doing for the last several months, they are now deeply concerned because we have an amendment which puts the prairie provinces on an equal basis with Atlantic Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: The Tories are getting a little excited. I listened with care to the Leader of the Opposition. I would like the Tories to listen now to what to I have to say.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) has the floor.

Mr. Fulton: Quiet down, you half-baked dinosaurs!

Mr. Broadbent: I apologize to all the dinosaurs for that comment!

I was just saying that, not being content with stirring up regional conflicts on the prairies, which I frankly find despicable—they now have an amendment to remove that grievance—they have moved farther west. They are now saying that Alberta and British Columbia are being discriminated against.

Mr. Kilgour: It is true!

Mr. Broadbent: I predict that when this resolution is finally voted on, as it will be, and accepted by the people of Canada, Canadians will see the Tories for the hypocrites they have been.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: As I suggested a minute ago, we are now near the end of this important process. I am confident about the Supreme Court's final decision. I am confident that the divisiveness which has occurred during this debate with regard to our Constitution and our charter of rights, which is probably the best in the world, will soon be replaced by unit. I am confident, having said that, that this Parliament will have acted with historical foresight which will benefit future generations of Canadians.

Before I conclude, I want to say that while we have tried to do what was done in the 1860s, when people representing different political parties put aside some of their partisan differences and put up with silly, mindless abuse of the sort we have heard in this debate—since some parties happen to want to co-operate to build a better Canada—

Mr. Kilgour: Cross the floor, Ed.

Mr. Broadbent: There is the intellectual level of the Conservative party being demonstrated right now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: I say to the hon. member that if Sir John A. Macdonald had had the same attitude the hon. member has, then Canada would not exist today.

• (1720)

Mr. Broadbent: I have no regrets at all in saying that my party has worked very hard to improve a charter of rights and an amending formula to aid in the process of bringing home the Constitution from Great Britain to our land where it belongs. Equally I have no hesitancy in saying that surely some credit must be given to the Government of Canada. Also I do not hesitate to say that two parties were playing an important, historical role.

I conclude by noting that while we have worked in tough-minded co-operation to build the Constitution of Canada, there are important matters to which we must turn our attention. I refer to matters such as housing, energy, jobs for Canadians, pensions and declining family incomes—in short, matters which affect the economic well-being of Canadians—which this Parliament must now start to address in a serious way. I want Canadians to know that we have accomplished much together in developing the Constitution, but in the days and weeks ahead the Government of Canada can expect the New Democratic Party to be fighting as strongly as it ever has in the past to improve the economic well-being of our people from coast to coast.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gary F. McCauley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to speak following the statesman-like address of the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent). I congratulate him for his vision of what this country is all about; it is one that we on this side o the House share.

Canada in the 1980s is still a nation of young pioneers struggling to create a nation. Thankfully our country has always been blessed with statesmen who had vision, a vision of what Canada could be economically. I speak of those with the foresight to create railways to carry us to prosperity. Those trains carried to the north and to the west pioneers who bent their backs breaking the land, and the words "Dominion from sea to sea" rang true. We had statesmen with a vision of what our society should be—compassionate and egalitarian. Since all Canadians in every region contribute to the growth of our country, we should all benefit from that growth. Progressive legislators brought in pensions, family allowances and regional equalization payments. Curiously enough, they were all Liberals.

Our society is not founded on the theme of survival of the fittest; it is founded on equality, compassion and recognition of past contributions to the nation. We have achieved much and we have grown much in economic and social terms, but in political terms we are still, as the poet, Earl Birney, put it:

> . . . a high school land
> dead-set in adolescence;
> loud treble laughs and sudden fists,
> bright cheeks, the gangling presence.
> This boy is wonderful at sports > and physically quite healthy;
> he's taken to church on Sunday still > and keeps his prurience stealthy.
> He doesn't like books, except about bears, > collects new coins and model planes, > and never refuses a dare.
> His uncle spoils him with candy, of course, > yet shouts him down when he talks at table.
> You will note he's got some of his French mother's looks, > though he's not so witty and no more stable.
> He's really much more like his father and yet
> if you say so he'll pull a great face.
> He wants to be different from everyone else > and daydreams of winning the global race.
> Parents unmarried and living abroad, > relatives keen to bag the estate, > schizophrenia not excluded, > will he learn to grow up before it's too late?

Will he learn to grow up before it is too late? That is the essential question, and now is the time to answer it. It is time for us to grow up and leave behind our political adolescence, the "gangling presence". It is time to bring our Constitution home.

No longer will our birth certificate lie in a parent's purse; it will be in our own hip pockets. With it will be a charter of rights that testifies to our conceern for the well-being of all Canadians, not just the ones who can make it on their own. We will guarantee the rights of the disadvantaged, the minorities and people in the poorer regions of Canada.

There is opposition to this initiative. How does one explain it? How does one explain the antics of the premiers, the gang of eight? How does one account for the position of the official opposition? In answer to the first question concerning the premiers, let me simply quote Michael Valpy of The Vancouver Sun, who wrote:

> The only conclusion to come to is that (the premiers) are a somewhat mediocre bunch whose meeting last week will be remembered as one of the funny curiosities of Canadian history—like the Canadian Army's 1920 battle plan to attack America.

What about the Tories? What about Her Majesty's loyal opposition? I want to be careful and charitable in answering these questions. First, we must look at the nature of our parliamentary system. There is an old British dictum that it is the duty of the opposition to oppose everything, support nothing, and defeat the government as often as possible. That is the system. If we on this side of the House were to stand in our places and say that two and two are four, hon. members opposite would find some reason to disagree.

I firmly believe that that fact of parliamentary life is behind much of the opposition to this constitutional proposal. Much of the overblown rhetoric, the nitpicking objections and the Chicken Little cries that the sky will fall if we go forward are rooted in the Tories' determination to oppose everything and support nothing.

We had a prime example of a Chicken Little speech in the speech of the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) a few moments ago. Even his Chicken Little speeches are wearing thin like watered-down chicken-noodle soup. I noticed that only half his colleagues were present in the House to listen to his speech; that was not very many.

Mr. Taylor: There are only 12 listening to you.

Mr. McCauley: I hear the hon. member opposite. Let me tell him that I do not happen to be the leader of my party.

Mr. Taylor: Thank goodness.

Mr. McCauley: Also I was interested in the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition clothing himself as fidei defensor, or defender of the faith. The hon. member for Eglinton-Lawrence (Mr. de Corneille) pointed out the hypocrisy of his statements about the inclusion of God in the Constitution, so I will not repeat him. But I feel a great deal of sympathy for the Leader of the Official Opposition. At his best he is a decent man and a good man, but when faced with the question of how to bolster his position as leader of a very fractious party, he chose to do so by nitpicking away at this constitutional initiative. It was not, I fear, because he believed in his heart of hearts that there was anything basically wrong with it, but because he had to appear strong at a time when those in his party were ready to pounce on any sign of weakness.

• (1730)

So it is because of the nature of our parliamentary system and the peculiar circumstances of the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark), that an attack was mounted, an attack having really nothing to do with the merits of the case, in my opinion. How else, then, does one explain the Tory amendments? At face value, most of them make little sense at all. Nothing in this charter affects the authority of Parliament to legislate in respect to abortion and capital punishment. Why just abortion and capital punishment? Why not the handicapped? Why not aboriginal peoples? Why not the kitchen sink? Why not? Because this amendment is simply a crass appeal to special interest groups, an attempt to win brownie points on moral issues.

On property rights, the Conservatives have been calling for the charter to include the right to property. At the same time, they are trying to present themselves as the protectors of the provinces. Yet it was at the request of the provinces that a guarantee of the right to property was left out of the charter. The provinces say inclusion of this right would put all laws on zoning and land neutralization in jeopardy.

Prince Edward Island has argued movingly against guarantees of property rights. Islanders have had the sad experience of watching their prime agricultural and recreational land bought up by non-Islanders. So they passed laws limiting non-resident ownership of property, laws they fear will be ruled unconstitutional if property rights are enshrined in the charter.

So not only does the Conservative amendment on property rights go against the wishes of the provinces, but it is also meaningless. The Tories know Canadians will have the same guarantees of property rights under the new Constitution as under the BNA Act. Property ownership will be subject to the laws of the land, as always.

On the amending formula, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) eloquently demonstrated in this House yesterday that the Conservative proposals just will not wash.

I want to say a few words now about the charter of rights, in my opinion, the sine qua non of this initiative, hailed by many as the best charter of rights in the world. Without a charter of rights, the only protection for minorities is the good will of the majority, which is often lacking: just ask Canadians of Chinese descent, or Japanese, French Canadians, or English-speaking Canadians. Or take, for example, our native people. They are not power brokers. Governments could ignore their concerns with little political backlash in their non-native constituencies. But when we are at our best, deep in our hearts we know that our native peoples have been pushed aside for too long, that their plight must be our concern. So we have recognized their contributions to Canada and their rights in the Constitution.

It may be, Mr. Speaker, that you and I and the majority of people in our ridings will not need to call on the charter of rights to defend us from some arbitrary action; but maybe we will. Maybe it will protect us, at some point in time, from unreasonable search and seizure. Upon arrest, the police will have to inform us of our right to legal counsel, something they have no obligation to do now. We will have to be informed why we have been arrested, and be released if detention is determined to be unlawful.

Some people are concerned that ensuring such rights means weakening our laws, that the charter will aid offenders in eluding the long arm of the law. Those people forget that a fundamental principle of our justice system is that everyone is innocent until proven guilty. Sometimes such fundamental principles are violated. I cite an example from my own province of New Brunswick. Section 33 of the fish and wildlife act deals with night hunting laws. It is worded in such a way that the onus of proof is shifted from the accuser to the accused. That is a basic perversion of our system of justice!

The prosecution has only to say that a certain person committed a crime, a certain offence at a certain place, at a certain time. No evidence is required to support the charge. A citizen is accused, and then the burden of proof is on him. If he cannot prove the charge false, the case is won by the Crown by default. A private citizen may lay the information and, upon successful conviction, collect half the fine for his trouble. Such informers may never have to appear in court or be known by any person outside the ministry of natural resources. In other words, they are secret witnesses.

Surely such a law is in direct contravention of the proposed charter of rights, because the charter is designed to protect our rights and to ensure that everyone is assumed innocent until proven guilty. It will ensure that all of us have certain inalienable rights which can only be taken away through a fair trial by just laws.

One would expect western Canadians in particular to support the charter for its guarantees of civil rights. The west, in large part, was settled by people from eastern European countries who fled the arbitrary and oppressive actions of totalitarian governments. If anyone knows the value of a charter of rights, westerners do.

Opponents say that the charter of rights is unnecessary and our present system of common law is good enough. They figure a charter of rights is an instrument of a republican type of government, foreign to our parliamentary system. But other members of the Commonwealth have bills of rights: India, for example, and the United Kingdom itself which has the Magna Carta, a bill of rights, and an act of settlement. Britain also helped draft the European convention of human rights and is subject to adjudication by the European court of human rights.

Other critics fear the courts will use the charter to declare legislation unconstitutional. They say it would be usurping Parliament's supremacy to have judges rather than legislatures deciding what is law and what is not.

First of all, the courts can already declare legislation ultra vires, in conflict with our present Constitution, the BNA Act. Since Canada is a federal state, the Constitution is the immutable law of the land and the courts must become the interpreters of the Constitution.

In the experience of other countries like the United States, courts rarely find legislation unconstitutional. That is because most legislators keep in mind their obligations under the charter of rights when drafting laws, the same way as now they keep in mind the limitations the BNA Act places on their powers.

The charter reflects the opinions of a vast cross-section of Canadians, past and present, as opposed to common law which tends to reflect only the opinions of those in the law profession.

The charter expresses the will of the people because it has had input from all segments of society, as has the entire constitutional resolution. It is arrant nonsense to claim, as does the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition, that it is the work of one man, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

Let me refer to what has happened in this whole debate. The proposed resolution debated in the House of Commons from October 6 to October 23. Seventy-four members spoke, of whom 33 were Liberals, 32 were Progressive Conservatives, and nine New Democrats. In the Senate, 34 speakers spoke on the resolution from October 14 to November 3, of whom 17 were Liberals, 15 Progressive Conservatives, and two Independents. Then the proposed resolution was referred to the special joint committee composed of 25 members of whom 15 were MPs and 10 senators. There were 15 members from the Liberal party, eight members from the Progressive Conservative party, and two members of the New Democratic Party.

In all, 170 senators and MPs served on the committee. From the House, 119 members served at one time or another. There were 50 Liberals, 43 PCs, and 26 New Democrats. From the Senate, 51 members participated, of whom 32 were from the Liberal party, and 19 from the Progressive Conservative party. The committee held 106 meetings on 56 sitting days, for a total of 267 sitting hours. Of the total number of hours, 176.5 hours were spent with witnesses, and 90.5 hours in clause-by-clause analysis.

As of February 2, 1981, 914 individuals and 294 groups had sent letters, telegrams and briefs to the committee. Of those who expressed the wish to appear before the committee, three special witnesses, 93 groups or associations and five expert witnesses attended.

Phase 3 of the debate commenced in the House on February 17. As of March 23, when the proceedings were interrupted by the hijacking of Parliament, 109 members had spoken, 35 Liberals, 58 PCs, and 16 NDPs. In the Senate to March 26, 36 speakers had been heard: 23 were Liberals, 12 PCs, and one independent.

Let us not be taken in by the silly argument that this constitutional initiative is the work of one man.

As I said at the beginning of my remarks, the time has come for Canadians to grow up, to move forward, to change. Change is part and parcel of our federal system. As Senator Maurice Lamontagne said: "One of the characteristics of federalism is that it obliges countries which adopt it to rethink their constitutional situation constantly and redefine intergovernmental relations in the light of their experience and development." Constitutional discussion will not end with this patriation package. It will continue as a constant process of rejuvenation.

We need to constantly encourage fresh, new ideas on how Canada should grow. Bob Dylan, that symbol of youth in the 1960s, said it best: "He not busy being born, is busy dying."

This constitutional resolution is the product of Canada's historical development, the end result of years of discussion and developing ideas. We are changing, and will continue to change in the future.

Society evolves. If it is alive, it evolves. We cannot write into the Constitution now all the social problems and possible solutions. We can only begin, recognizing that public attitudes will change, as they have in the past.

For example, people in New Brunswick have said they cannot believe that a Conservative premier would back bilingualism in the province. But that has happened. The times are a-changing. Canadians are becoming more sensitive to the aspirations, the hopes and dreams of other Canadians.

I am very disappointed that Ontario did not see fit to adopt institutional bilingualism but I can foresee it coming to Ontario some day, as it has officially come to New Brunswick.

This constitutional resolution before us with the amendments we will adopt this evening, is just and equitable. It is a blueprint for the future of this great land, founded on our past traditions and keeping in mind the kind of nation we want our children and grandchildren to inherit. Will we harness the momentum behind all these constitutional discussions and finally bring our nation to adulthood? Or will we simply let it wash by and drift off into the backwaters of history? Will we grow up? Or will we forever be gangling adolescents?

At the very beginning of his incredible, courageous cross-Canada odyssey, Terry Fox said, "Anything is possible . . . Dreams are made if people only try."

If people would only try! Let us realize some dreams for Canada, in Canada. Let us make some dreams come true—the dreams of Terry Fox and other handicapped persons, and the dreams of hundreds of thousands of Canadians for a fully independent and sovereign country with the rights and freedoms of all, guaranteed for all.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate has passed Bill C-42, an act to establish the Canada Post Corporation, to repeal the Post Office Act and other related acts and to make related amendments to other acts without amendments.

Mr. Knowles: Did they mail that to us?

RESOLUTION RESPECTING CONSTITUTION ACT, 1981

The House resumed debate on the motion of Mr. Chrétien, seconded by Mr. Roberts, for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

And on the amendment of Mr. Epp, seconded by Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton)—That the motion be amended in Schedule B of the proposed resolution by deleting Clause 46, and by making all necessary changes to the schedule consequential thereto; and on the notices of amendments of Messrs. Knowles, Baker (Nepean-Carleton) and Pinard.

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I hope you do not become so wrapped up in my remarks that you miss Black Rod pounding on the door!

I have one comment on the remarks of the hon. member who just spoke about dreams. His dreams may well be our nightmares. I have twice been prevented from speaking by closure or near closure. When one feels so strongly about an issue such as the Constitution, it is difficult to find that one may not have a chance to speak and that there are others who will not either because of the process by which this resolution is being put through the House. We fought for a change in that process and I am proud of the successes we have had. We won the right for Canadians to see members participate in the deliberations of the committee. We fought for time and were successful in having time granted to enable a number of members to speak before the committee, for provinces to deal with amending formulas, and so forth. As well, we fought for and won time for the Supreme Court to rule on the resolution.

If we had not fought for these things, this debate would not be taking place now and a number of members who are attempting to represent their constituents in this House, would not have had a chance to speak. Some will still not have that chance.

Even though we have opposed this process from the beginning, we are still caught up in it because of the majority that sits opposite. We were forced to deal with the resolution in committee and we were forced to move certain amendments in an attempt to improve the process.

As I see it, the process is the problem and I want to deal with that in a number of ways. The first problem is the unilateral action in bringing the Constitution home versus doing it by consensus. I think a consensus could have been reached and it would have made this a unifying process for Canada instead of one that may well engender disunity. The aboriginal peoples of this land who put a great deal of faith in the amendments that we were going to move in the House and in committee in order to protect their rights were forced to deal with the question within a matter of days and have been deceived by the process. They are now opposing that which has been proposed in the NDP amendment.

Many eloquent speeches have been made by my colleagues about the amending formula which is so offensive to the regions of this country. The premiers have proposed a formula and a formula is proposed in our amendment which would be much more fair to the regions. But now we have a number of classes of provinces. Every time we have to face this amending formula in the west and the maritimes, we will remember this process.

The Constitution of our nation should be amended in such a way as to provide protection for those who are considered weaker. We in the west are only considered weaker in the sense that we have less population than other provinces. That is the manner in which we have grown and in which we have entered this federation which we call Canada. The amending formula produces strong provinces, Ontario and Quebec, and it gives them a veto. It produces provinces which have much less protection, the regions, the prairies, B.C. and the maritime provinces. Now we are faced with an amendment, an amendment which requires three provinces in western Canada to defeat an amendment and only two provinces to pass an amendment. I see the time coming when an attempt will be made by this government not so much to remove the resources of western Canada as to search for funds. An attempt will be made to take away the wealth of the area and to distribute it by an amending formula as we find it necessary to meet certain demands in this country. That is when we in western Canada will remember the amending formula and the process by which it was imposed upon us.

We have been forced to move various amendments. The speaker before me spoke about the many groups and organizations which have come to this House to attempt to tell members of Parliament about the problems they see in this resolution regarding property rights. I ask that hon. member whether he has ever had his property expropriated. He should talk to my neighbours and to me. I know the feeling. It is not a very nice feeling when you are in that position. I suggest this government should tell all Canadians that their property cannot be expropriated unless the due process of law is observed and proper compensation is made. That is not the case in many provinces of Canada. That is why that amendment is so important.

Amendments to include the supremacy of God, equal rights regarding men and women and the right to legislate as far as capital punishment and abortion are concerned have been moved. These are important amendments. But what do we face? Again, we face the problem of process. We are now forced to vote on an omnibus amendment.

Even the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) asked how he could deal with this resolution when he had to trade off offshore rights versus human rights. He has put us in the same position tonight when we vote on these amendments. We shall have to trade off rights for native people, which I suggest are anaemic, versus equal rights for men and women; or the amending formula, which we find offensive to certain parts of this country, versus the supremacy of God. We support the inclusion of the supremacy of God. But who is going to be the Solomon tonight? Who is going to do the dividing in half? Perhaps some hon. members will remember the story in the Bible of a baby being brought before Solomon. Two women were claiming it. Solomon declared that the baby should be cut in half. The baby's mother objected and asked for the baby to be given to the other person. Although Solomon was able to rule on that point, how do we rule tonight? How do I vote tonight when I agree with half of the amendment and disagree with the other half? It is impossible. We are again put in a certain position by a process which is wrong from the start.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Schellenberger: I represent a riding in the province of Alberta. There is great disapproval for this resolution and the process by which we are imposing it. My constituents, my premier, the other parties in the province of Alberta, many provincial parties and governments in western Canada and the other seven premiers who oppose this resolution are doing so because they feel strongly about it. They are doing so in the only place they can, through the courts. They are doing so also through public opinion. If you believe the Gallup polls, the majority oppose the process of unilateral action. The feeling is so strong that it is not just a feeling of alienation any more, it is a genuine discussion of western separation. We are faced with the imposition of an amending formula which, in the future, may attack us in such a manner that we will not be able to accept it. When I speak on the issue, I do so as an Albertan representing Albertans, but I also speak on the issue as a Canadian representing Canadians. The two do not have to be in opposition to one another.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Schellenberger: In this entire constitutional debate, the greatest concern has been the process. Instead of the government and the people sitting down together to draft a new Constitution, a new document for this country with which Parliament can deal, we are left with the option of amending a package written by a few people in government and thrust upon this nation.

There are other ways. My leader has mentioned that when you seek unanimity, when you seek the right to deal with something and you seek that out, you can find it. That was proved by the late Right Hon. Mr. Diefenbaker.

I notice, Mr. Speaker, that you have also heard the traditional knock on the door.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Deputy Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

And being returned:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that when the House went up to the Senate chamber, the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the Royal Assent to the following bills:

Bill C-42, an act to establish the Canada Post Corporation, to repeal the Post Office Act and other related Acts and to make related amendments to other acts—Chapter 54;

Bill C-64, an act to amend the Auditor General Act—Chapter 55;

Bill S-17, an act to implement conventions between Canada and New Zealand and Canada and Australia for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax—Chapter 56.

It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

RESOLUTION RESPECTING CONSTITUTION ACT, 1981

The House resumed debate on the motion of Mr. Chrétien, seconded by Mr. Roberts, for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

And on the amendment of Mr. Epp, seconded by Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton)—That the motion be amended in Schedule B of the proposed resolution by deleting clause 46, and by making all necessary changes to the Schedule consequential thereto; and on the notices of amendments of Messrs. Knowles, Baker (Nepean-Carleton) and Pinard.

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, before the dinner hour I was mentioning how we in my constituency and in western Canada particularly disagreed with the process. I suggested that if the Prime Minister wished to get agreement, it was possible. I pointed out how in the time of the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker there was agreement in respect of financing of education, under the Right Hon. Mr. Pearson there was agreement on medicare, and under the Right Hon. Joe Clark we were able to come to an agreement on energy. It is too bad that for this nation we were not able to sign that agreement.

We constantly hear in the Prime Minister's argument about 54 years of failure. Let me refer to a little research I had carried out in respect of the last 54 years, and whether those 54 years could be considered a failure in terms of amendment to the Constitution.

In western Canada we certainly would not consider as a failure the conference in 1927, the start of the 54 years of which the Prime Minister speaks, because that was when we were first given legitimate rights to our resources. We spent some 62 days from 1927 to the present time at first ministers' conferences attempting to deal with amendments to the Constitution. From 1927 to 1931 we spent ten days dealing with the very important issue of returning resources to the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. That was a most important issue to us and an issue about which we are still concerned today.

In 1934 we spent three days altering the Criminal Code so that the province of Quebec could conduct lotteries. That was very important, I am sure, at the time. In 1941, two days were spent dealing with the Raoul Sirois report. I could go on and on. The next conference was in 1950 and dealt with old age security, tax agreements and the amending formula. In 1964, some 14 years later, we dealt with the 100th anniversary of the conference in Charlottetown and attempted to bring about a repatriation formula and an amending formula for the BNA Act. Again in 1968, when the present Prime Minister took over and began his attempt to deal with a number of issues including provincial control of social services, income support payments, unemployment insurance, workmen's compensation, retirement income and on and on, all of which were put before the first ministers of this nation, agreements were found when agreement was sought.

Surely the underlying point to this whole process is that ten to 14 years passed between each conference; premiers changed, prime ministers changed, attitudes in this country changed as society progressed, so how can one say that in the last 54 years we have met with failure in amending the Constitution when many amendments were sought and accepted?

In modern days we have failed under the Prime Minister, and I suggest the reason is that instead of putting issues before the premiers, an issue such as patriation alone, an amending formula alone, offshore rights or resources, the Prime Minister has always put the whole bag of tricks on the table. It is very difficult for premiers not to do their utmost to protect their interests. That is what they are elected to do. Again I must say, we find the problem is in respect of the process.

Surely if the Prime Minister wished to find an agreement, he could have put patriation on the table with an acceptable amending formula. In that way, I suggest, agreement could have been found. We could then have dealt at other conferences with the other issues until we reached substantive agreement, and then brought the resolution before the House.

There is another way of approaching this, and other countries have used it. We even used this method at the time Newfoundland came into confederation. I refer to the constituent convention or the constituent assembly. There are various ways of doing this. Some countries elect their constituent assemblies and some appoint them. Surely that is the way to bring the Constitution into being in a unified manner.

I used Newfoundland as one example. Let me give some others. Many of us do not realize that the United States has used the constituent assembly. India, Norway, New Zealand and Australia are all mentioned in this document put out so professionally by our library. All of those countries used that process.

There is another process which is used in separate states of the United States called the town hall meeting process. This involves putting an issue before the people of the state. We could do the same here in Canada. We could put the issue of patriation or the charter of rights before the communities of our country. They could discuss the issues and the areas with which they want to deal and what they would like printed in the Constitution. Each community or each town hall would elect two or three people to attend a provincial town hall conference where all these suggestions could be brought forward and hashed out in committees until they came to an agreement on what they wanted to present to a national assembly. Each provincial assembly would elect two or three people to attend that national assembly. In this way the people of this nation would feel they had a part in amending our Constitution or bringing it home. They would feel they had some input and this would be a unifying process. Perhaps they would even be able to accept some things that under this process today may not be acceptable to some regions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Schellenberger: During those conventions minority groups could present their opinions. At the same time the provinces through their first ministers could be discussing the issues. We could meld the two results and come up with an acceptable process, an acceptable amending formula, and an acceptable charter of rights for this country of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Schellenberger: I do not have much time left, but I want to spend some of it talking about our aboriginal people.

● (2010)

We had before us a process which, I believe, caught a group of people unawares and not knowing exactly how they wanted to entrench their important rights in this Constitution. Upon taking a second look and upon seeing the amendment put forward by the New Democratic Party, which was supposed to solve all their problems, native groups feel they have been deceived by the process.

I would like to take members of Parliament through a little history of how aboriginal people have come today to the point where they feel that their rights have to be entrenched in the Constitution for protection. Up until the 1960s they did not even have the right to vote. When this Prime Minister was elected, he said there were no such things as aboriginal rights, and the minister at the time, the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), brought forward a white paper which said that the aboriginal people, or native people of this land, should be assimilated. Of course, they objected to that. The strength of that objection came in a court case, the Nishga court case. The judges ruled three for and three against, but the fact was that there was a ruling recognizing the term "aboriginal claim".

So the government had to accept that there was such a thing as an aboriginal interest. What did the government do? It decided to fund the Indians through political organizations in order to deal with the term "aboriginal interest".

Then there was the first modern land claim. When the government of Quebec wanted to build a power dam, aboriginal interests had to be dealt with. The matter went to the court, and the court ruled in favour of proceeding with the power dam. The first modern proceedings on a land claim extinguished aboriginal rights, and anyone who has sat in this House in the last number of weeks realizes just how far that land claim went because it has not been recognized by this government. It is no wonder that the native people feel they have to have their rights entrenched in the Constitution.

The process continued. Amendments had to be made in the committee to deal with aboriginal interests. I believe hon. members and native groups of this country sat down and made an honest attempt to put into the Constitution words which would protect aboriginal interests, but because of the time limits and the legal language in which these amendments had to be written into this Constitution in the couple of hours available, I would like to tell hon. members exactly what is in them and what are some of the concerns I have which I know are shared by the native people of this land.

The first concern is with respect to why clause 25 is written in the negative. Clause 27 dealing with multicultural heritage is worded positively as follows:

> This Charter shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with the preservation and enhancement of the multicultural heritage—

The wording with respect to aboriginal people is in the negative. It's provision reads in part:

> The guarantee in this Charter of certain rights and freedoms shall not be construed so as to abrogate or derogate from any aboriginal, treaty—

Subclause (a) says that this includes the Royal Proclamation. I want hon. members to know what the Royal Proclamation says. The Royal Proclamation dates back to 1763. It set up the colonial governments of Quebec, East and West Florida and the Islands of Grenada, St. Vincent and Tobago. However, the important statement in the Royal Proclamation is the following:

> —possession of such parts of our Dominion and territories as, not having been ceded to or purchased by us, are reserved to them or any of them as their hunting grounds—

We all realize that we do not have to have a deed to land to hunt on it. If I were an aboriginal person wanting ownership of land, I would be very concerned about my rights as written in the Royal Proclamation, but what the Royal Proclamation does is to show that the British Crown recognized that there was such a thing as an aboriginal interest.

Then in subclause (b) there is reference to rights or freedoms that may be acquired by aboriginal peoples of Canada by way of land claims settlement. I just stated that it is no wonder that there are some doubts about this clause when we look at the modern settlement of James Bay in which aboriginal interests were supposedly extinguished. The Government of Canada was to provide various catch-up provisions with respect to housing, education, health care and so forth, because, as we heard in committee and in this House, of the plight of the native people there resulting from the government not implementing the spirit of that agreement. It is no wonder there is some doubt about that clause.

We then come to Part II. Clause 33(1) states:

> The aboriginal and treaty rights of the aboriginal peoples of Canada are hereby recognized and affirmed.

That is a positive statement in this Constitution, but I know that status Indians are very concerned about clause 33(2), which includes in the definition of an aboriginal person, all Indian, Inuit and Metis peoples of Canada. In effect, we are now using the term "native people".

The concern which is being expresed as to do with status Indians who need to catch up in society to become equal in their way of life to most of us in the southern part of this nation. The concern is whether the budget set aside to assist those people will now have to be shared by another 700,000 people.

The clause which causes the native people of this country much concern is clause 35. I realize that the Prime Minister could not put into the Constitution something which was not defined, so he put in a clause which sets up the procedure to define an aboriginal right. An aboriginal right will now be defined by the first ministers of the provinces, the Prime Minister and those people whom he, as Prime Minister, will invite to participate in discussions.

Mr. Manly: You left it in your amendment.

Mr. Schellenberger: For the first time the definition will be arrived at with the participation of the provinces of this country, so the New Democratic Party said it would assist by moving an amendment to solve that problem. Members of the New Democratic Party said that rather than dealing with one province, we will now deal with the whole amending formula; we will deal with all six provinces. The provinces have an interest in defining an aboriginal claim in a very narrow way because it means land within their boundaries, it means money. So rather than having one province deal with it, there will now be a gang of provinces. One can mess things up, but I know what a gang can do, and I can understand why the status Indians of this nation and the Native Council of Canada now oppose the amendment which the NDP is proposing. They asked to have a meeting with the leader. He refused to have a meeting with them to discuss this very important point, so we have lost that support.

Mr. Manly: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger) has been asked if he would permit a question.

Mr. Schellenberger: I have very limited time because of closure supported by the NDP, and I would like to continue my remarks. If there is some time left after my remarks, I would be happy to entertain a question.

Before my time runs out I want to come to a point which is very important to western Canada. As we face this amending formula and as we face the National Energy Program, many people in western Canada are asking whether their members of Parliament have the ability to represent them in this chamber because we are consistently being outvoted by the majority in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. When our country was set up, the regions of this nation were to be protected by the Senate. The wise men of the nation were to protect our regions and our provinces. We know the history of that, particularly when one Prime Minister is in power for a long time. As a result, when a budget which has disparate effects on our regions is presented, or when a resolution such as the one we are debating is presented, the regions again are manipulated and outvoted. The Senate, which is supposed to protect them, is not doing so.

I must say that there are certain senators—and our leader has referred to them—who are attempting to protect the regions and the provinces, but again the majority is against us.

After we face this Constitution and push through the National Energy Program, in my opinion we must have a change in our institutions, particularly the Senate if we are to keep this nation together. I believe the Senate should be elected. It should have the power to stop certain of these bills which affect our regions, so that we in western Canada will have some protection against the majority populations in the centre, when we are faced with this kind of situation in the maritimes and western Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Schellenberger: If we had started with this type of process, I think between the change in our institutions such as the Supreme Court, the CRTC, the Senate, and the town hall constituents assembly, we would have a great deal more unity in this nation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I regret to interrupt the hon. gentleman but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Stanley Hudecki (Hamilton West): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for giving me the opportunity of making this first address, my maiden speech, during this important debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hudecki: The sense of dignity I feel at this moment is solely imparted by the people of Hamilton West whom I represent. Hamilton West is a very special riding. It is a community of people distinguished for breaking new ground and setting high standards of achievement. On the industrial scene, tradesmen and managers from this riding who worked for Stelco and Dofasco, Canadian companies, have given other industrial nations in the world a lesson at making steel at a profit.

It was amidst our industrial heartland that the Association of Canadian Clubs was born. This national society is dedicated to fostering an interest in public affairs and cultivating an attachment to Canadian institutions. These are not our only claims to pre-eminence. In 1957, our representative for Hamilton West, the Hon. Ellen Fairclough, became Canada's first woman cabinet minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hudecki: A decade later the voters of Hamilton West elected the first black person as a member of Parliament, the Hon. Lincoln Alexander.

The riding of Hamilton West is distinguished not only for its outstanding individuals but also for fuelling the growing sense of western pride. In 1935, the Winnipeg Blue Bombers challenged the Hamilton Tiger Cats for the Grey Cup. In allowing its first victory that year in Hamilton, we easterners established a trend which shows no sign of letting up. In the riding of Hamilton West we have situated the Canadian Football Hall of Fame which immortalizes football heroes from every corner of the country.

As a Hamiltonian, however, I take more heart in other achievements. In 1949, McMaster University established the first isotope laboratory in Canada. A decade later, the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker officiated at the start-up of McMaster's full-size research reactor, the first of its kind in the British empire. In Hamilton West we have the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety, providing information and advisory services to the working people of Canada.

Having briefly cited some of our local milestones, it is now important that I address myself to the constitutional debate. These are momentous days of national renewal, days in which we are redefining our common destiny as well as reaffirming our sense of national purpose. The task of constitutional renewal has been long and difficult. We hear that the process is divisive, that actions have been unilateral, that governments are self-interested and that people are misinformed.

In this atmosphere of apparent turmoil, it might be well that we remind ourselves of certain fundamental realities. The first is that although we are in the process of change, we are changing within the well-established guidelines of tradition and stability—the parliamentary process itself. This institution, of which we are all a part, has endured the test by its very design. It is a design for which we can be thankful. Within this time honoured framework change can take place, but it takes place slowly and with much discussion and compromise. Like a large seagoing vessel, the ship of state will creak and give with the changing weather and tides, but it must stay afloat. Parliament, acting as the centre of wide-ranging and diverse experiences of a vast nation, must also creak and give with the tides, but it must also endure.

As politicians from all parts of the country, we are often criticized for thinking only as far as the next election. But in this constitutional debate, we have been asked to take part in a process that has far-reaching and long-ranging consequences. In this endeavour, the members of this House have not avoided the responsibility of seeing that the needs of all are duly represented. This, after all, is our duty.

But now the subject of our deliberations has reached the point of decision. In this constitutional debate, we aspire to articulate the beliefs and ideals of the Canadian people; but we must not lose sight of the fact that we do so within the dynamic system of parliamentary democracy with its built-in checks and balances, framed by the judiciary and intergovernmental relationships and under the scrutiny of the people who, after all, are the final arbiters of all our decisions.

We Canadians have come of age. We have served notice that we no longer need a foreign power to act as a steward for our Constitution. For that reason, the Constitution will be patriated—about that there is no question. The constitutional package, with its appended charter of rights and amending formula, is essentially the draft resolution of a special joint committee of Parliament and the Senate, articulating the position and the aspirations of the Canadian people, after interviewing 97 groups and reviewing 1,280 written submissions. The proposed resolution has evolved through a process of enlightened compromise. The spirit of the document is praiseworthy. The style could be improved, but to do so we would have to commission poets to help lawyers and academics draft more ringing phrases to match its elevated intent.

At this stage, the government is criticized for acting unilaterally in bringing this proposed resolution to Parliament. The act of unilateralism has been described as uncivilized, divisive and undemocratic. This is a justifiable criticism, but it could be explained and attributed to the process. The conventional approach has been to seek the unanimous consent of all provinces. Historically, this has been ineffective because it has been practically impossible to reach unanimous agreement with the provincial governments on any issue. Even in the past week eight premiers could not convince Ontario and New Brunswick to accept an amending formula which required the agreement of seven provinces, representing 50 per cent of the Canadian population, with opting out privileges by a two-thirds majority of the legislature. To date the provincial input into this process is limited by the tyranny of unanimity; in the future this problem will be remedied.

For a period of two years, after patriation, the unanimous consent formula will remain in place and a search will be made for a less restrictive formula.

The federal government is proposing that future constitutional amendments be made on the basis of the so-called

Victoria formula which would allow change to the amendments with the approval of Ontario, Quebec, two Atlantic provinces and two western provinces without opting-out privileges. If the permanent amending formula is finally reached, then annual federal-provincial conferences will take place in which the provinces, using the accepted formula, will finally make their contribution in adjustments to the Constitution to meet the particular needs of their provinces.

The goal of the present government is to have strong provincial legislatures to look after and supervise the needs of their particular regions but to have strong national government to speak for the nation.

I personally will always accept the right of a provincial government to exercise jurisdiction in regional matters, but I cannot agree to the country being run by a weak association of premiers. To accept anything less in the way of a central government is to betray an appalling lack of understanding of the new world order.

The world is entering the post-industrial phase, characterized by the emergence of assertive super states, global cartels and powerful multinational corporations. If Canada is to play its rightful role in the new economic scheme, it requires a strong federal system. It is folly to believe that a loose association of provinces can compete in this league. We must have a strong, wholesome government to design a national economic strategy and to meet the exigencies of the nation. We need a unified country if we are to have a significant and respected voice in world affairs.

There is some concern by the official opposition about the reliance of a people's referendum on constitutional change. The proposed amending formula contains the surest device which any democratic government can employ to resolve a deadlock. The majority of Canadians were pleased with the clear results of the most recent referendum. Once the Constitution is patriated, there will be no one to turn to in the even of an unresolved dispute between governments, except the people of Canada who elected both levels of government. The use of referenda instituted by the federal govement or by the people of Canada is an appropriate vehicle to break a logjam in federal-provincial indecision. The referendum approach must always be used cautiously and prudently. The rules of implementation must be diligently followed in a non-partisan manner. Members opposite and dissenting premiers look at the referenda proposal suspiciously, as if it were a precursor to the imposition of a unitarian form of government. Such an inference is entirely without foundation.

One example which illustrates the historic division of powers and the critical role of a central government is the development of our health care service in Canada. As a medical doctor, the front line experience of practicing the art and science of surgery for some 30 years has given me a distinct perspective. I have seen the triumph of strong parliamentary democracy and federalism in the way the majority of Canadian citizens, medical institutions and governments have co-operated over the decades to establish a publicly financed health care system throughout the dominion.

In 1968, the national medical system was born with significant input from the medical profession and hospital services and provincial legislatures. The major co-ordinating effort or the driving force, however, came from the Pearson government which, through its initiative and funding, made the project possible. It was a strong, caring national government motivated by the needs of the people, applying the principle of equalization which made the project possible. An effective, strong central federal presence was necessary. There was no willingness on the part of the provinces to accept medicare, as the Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) said this afternoon.

A recent health service review, headed by special commissioner Justice Emmett Hall, indicated that our Canadian health care system is, by world standards, one of the very best in existence today. Besides maintaining the vitality of the nation, it has the additional function of preserving the right of all citizens to enjoy unimpeded mobility throughout the dominion, a right which is often overlooked in the constitution of other democratic states. Whenever a resident moves from one point to another, he or she is assured of medical care in Canada. The national interest was served by a strong federal government. This system will be seriously at risk, if provinces are given opting out privileges in the constitutional proposals under the amending formula put forth by the eight premiers and our Conservative colleagues. I might make the observation that it is also at risk if physicians are not allowed to continue opting out privileges. The evolution of our health care system was not a historical accident; it was a culmination of a national priority.

The Canadian Medical Association was established in Quebec the same year as the British North America Act. While the terms of the act gave the province jurisdiction over health and education, doctors at that time crossed provincial boundaries in order to advance nationwide standards for medical certification.

There is a historical note which I would like to add. Parliament in that era was blessed with a much higher ratio of medical doctors to other professions and trades in the House. A staunch Cumberland Conservative member, Sir Charles Tupper, was the first president of the Canadian Medical Association. In recalling the past, I trust that he will be remembered more for that moment than for the fleeting distinction of having served as a prime minister of Canada in a Conservative government, which was in power for an even shorter period than the recent Conservative regime.

In 1920, again under the umbrella of the federal government, the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons was founded and charged with the mandate to oversee education of medical specialities and to stimulate research in medicare on a national basis.

This challenge has nurtured and supported advances in the art and science of medicine. Let me list the names of a few Canadian medical pioneers and their discoveries: Wilder Pen-field, an innovator in the field of brain surgery; Hans Selye and his studies of stress; Gordon Murray, Bill Bigelow and Bill Mustard, pathfinders in heart surgery; and Fred Banting and Charles Best who continued the refinement of the application of insulin in diabetes.

To date, the tradition of accomplishment continues into the future as advances in the field of health and health care will be made hand in hand with knowledgeable health care workers and doctors and an informed, caring, effective, national government which is ever mindful of the needs of the public.

This brings me to a personal note. I readily accept the recently proposed amendment by the Liberals, and I am satisfied with the wording of the proposed preamble in the Constitution which states: "Whereas Canada is founded upon principles that recognize the supremacy of God and the rule of law".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hudecki: In the 1978 version of the constitutional package proposed by this government, the preamble included the following statement: "The people of Canada proudly claim that we are and shall be with the help of God a free and self-governing people".

In the new version of our national anthem, "Oh Canada", we have added the sentence "God keep our land glorious and free". We Liberals have always acknowledged the existence of God and have shown respect for the dignity and worth of the human person.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hudecki: We have a deep awareness of the spiritual and moral values, and we identify with the important role of family life in the fabric of our nation. It is right and just that God's help be invoked in light of the ominous advance into our society of inhuman technology.

Before concluding, I must add my voice of anguish and sorrow to that of many members on both sides of the House on the subject of the flagrant abuse of our abortion laws. There is no question that the abuse is continuing and escalating so that nearly 65,000 innocent lives each year are destroyed, for the most part, for the sake of convenience. I do not accept the legal dictum that the act of birth is a dividing line between being a human and not being one. Life is a continuing process, and a new individual's existence begins at conception when it acquires a distinctive genetic pattern, making it a unique human being. It requires only time and nutrition to attain full human development.

The constitutional debate is not the forum to probe, examine or review existing abortion laws. This is a matter for Parliament, and should be and must be further debated in Parliament. I have sought and received assurance from the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), as recorded in Hansard, that the right to debate this fundamentally important social issue of abortion will remain in Parliament and will not be locked in the Constitution. Parliament must retain the unqualified right to amend existing provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada pertaining to abortion.

I close on a philosophical note. The debate of the constitutional proposals is approaching the last lap. It has evoked intense emotional responses from members of Parliament on both sides of the House. It has strained the goodwill and forbearance of many to a breaking point. Our legal fraternity has been drained of interpretations and opinions related to constitutional matters.

There is every expectation that the Constitution of Canada with a Canadian charter of rights and freedoms is about to emerge. It will define islands of discrimination, intolerance, injustice, real and perceived, and prejudices and biases in our society. This legal document cannot redress the wrongs of the past. It cannot undo the trials and frustrations of our ancestors, but it can, however, chart a course for a better future with better recognition of minority rights.

To have truly accomplished this lofty ideal, the Constitution will require an adjustment of our attitudes in our society. There must be a more receptive understanding of and empathy for the problems of the handicapped, the unborn, our native people, new Canadians, the poor, the aged and the underprivileged; and we must be prepared to meet and to react to the special needs of these human beings.

Therein will lie the success or failure of these magnificent debates, of the impressive manifestation of our parliamentary democracy in action, rather than in the eventual proclamation of these ideals in law.

I turn my thoughts now to the many contributors to this unbelievably complex constitutional package. These people gave generously of their skills and talents to prepare this document which will hopefully give us a more united and a more cohesive nation. I can think of no more apt quotation to describe their Herculean effort than the words of Hippocrates in his assessment of the art of medicine in his time which are as follows: "Life is short and the art long, the occasion fleeting, experience fallacious and judgment difficult." I myself feel that they faced this task with the spirit and the devotion of Louis Pasteur when he said, "Blessed is he who carried with him a God, an ideal of beauty, and who obeys it, for therein be the springs of great thought and great action; they all reflect light from the infinite."

● (2050)

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy for the opportunity to participate in this important debate this evening. If we cast our minds back over the past few weeks, we will remember that debates were closed off on a number of occasions which made it impossible for some hon. members to participate. Once again, we have come to the point where the debate is going to be shut off and a number of hon. members will not be able to participate.

I want to discuss a great many issues tonight but because of the shortage of time I will just have to make references to them in the main. The order in which I deal with them does not indicate any range of importance.

I want to start by saying that there is no nation in the world where citizens have more rights, than in Canada. Some of the statements made by members on the other side of the House in this debate have been truly remarkable. To hear some of them, one would think that there are no civil or human rights in force today. In fact, the implication is that possibly we are living in a state similar to that of Uganda. A great many people feel that the approach we are taking these days will, in some respects, jeopardize many of the rights that Canadians already enjoy.

First of all, tonight I should like to challenge the whole concept of judicial supremacy in the area of human rights. The government is telling Canadians that they do not have any rights whatsoever at the present time, and then it lists some of them, saying that it is going to guarantee those rights!

The problem with that approach is that it says that governments are the guarantors of rights. That is not so at all. The people grant rights to governments. There is no one in any government, let alone the present government, who is wise enough, intelligent enough, or bright enough to list all the rights that Canadians possess today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Patterson: The charter that has been placed before us certainly does not in any way meet the needs, the challenge of Canadians, or do for them what its promoters claim it will do. I think this brings into focus the main problem with charters of rights. They mislead people. They misrepresent facts. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has travelled across the country with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) and others, telling Canadians that they do not have any rights and that they are going to give them to us. They set themselves up as being able to change the whole situation and bring to the people of Canada a pride and an achievement and a declaration of rights such as they never had before.

In order to clarify one point, I should like to say that no matter what the charter of rights contains, it will not solve all the problems to which reference has been made in this debate. I refer again to countries that have charters of rights. I know some hon. members who spoke today took exception to this and I am sorry that I shall not have time to reply to them. As one illustration, we all realize that Japanese Canadians were treated in an unjust fashion during the years of World War II. Some people maintain that if there had been a charter of rights, it would not have happened. But, Mr. Speaker, the United States had a charter of rights and essentially the same thing happened there as in Canada. A charter of rights is absolutely no guarantee that the rights of the people will be assured just because they are written down on paper.

Another thing that should be emphasized is the importance of the supremacy of Parliament. I am not convinced that we would be doing the people of Canada a service by asking the courts of the nation to be legislators. I am not convinced that they should be asked to take on a function that has been performed well by the representatives of the people in Canada's Parliament and the provincial legislatures, or that giving that function to a group of persons in the Supreme Court, however wise and well-versed in the law they may be, is a good thing. Courts deal with laws. I believe that is the way things should remain.

A well known person has stated that the best guarantee of human rights is a vigilant legislature and the existence of a citizen body that is conscious that rights do matter and is willing, if need be, to fight for those rights. The person who wrote that was Harold Laski, author of "Parliamentary Government in England" in the year 1938.

I have serious reservations about trying to protect human rights by a charter such as that before us today. In the first place, the charter does not adequately protect the Indians of our nation. I think the Indian people were hoodwinked into the idea that certain clauses in the Constitution would guarantee the protection of their rights. When they had had an opportunity to look it over, they came to the conclusion that this was not so. I do not think many organizations of Indian people, if any, support the government's package, as far as their rights are concerned. Mr. George Manuel, the president of the union of B.C. Indian Chiefs, stated as follows:

> The constitutional resolution is unacceptable to us. It does not offer any prospect that lands and rights, which have already been taken from us, will be restored. It gives us no role in any future amendment process in which our residual rights may be at stake. The result is a 'dead-end' Constitution in so far as our rights are concerned.

As things stand now, we are faced with a resolution to support that particular reference in the package, when, all the time, the Indians are opposed to it. We also have a statement to the effect that the National Indian Brotherhood, which initially accepted this with open arms, turned against it and said that they were not going to support it when they found out what it was all about.

The second area of deficiency in this charter of rights is the protection of the unborn. I was very happy to hear the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Hudecki), who preceded me in this debate, refer to this.

I have in my possession a legal opinion on the effect this charter will have on the abortion law. It contradicts what my hon. friend said a few moments ago. In short, this opinion says that the abortion law and the Criminal Code will be unconstitutional. Abortion would be available on demand and, what is more, if Parliament tried to enact either a new statute or an amendment to an existing law permitting the unborn the right to life and to assert such a right before birth, such a law would be declared unconstitutional.

That is an impressive legal opinion expressed by the Toronto law firm of Stephens, French & McKeown. It is well thought out and carefully reasoned. It claims that this charter will not respect the life of the unborn; indeed, it will permit abortion on demand. The law will then be beyond the reach of Parliament. The only way to change it will be through a constitutional amendment which will probably never take place.

This is a serious weakness in this proposition. I believe that the unborn should have rights and should be protected by law in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Patterson: There is another matter which is of great concern, Mr. Speaker, and that is the potential harmful imbalance between individual and collective rights. This has to include religion and rights. In a brief sent by telegram to the Prime Minister, the Roman Catholic bishops of British Columbia and the Yukon said that while Section 2 of this charter guarantees the religious rights of the individual, it says nothing about the rights of the church.

● (2100)

If individuals are to have the opportunity of functioning and participating in the activities of the church, then some responsibilities are attached.

I shall just give one illustration in passing. For instance, when a church-related school or college are looking for teachers, it is necessary for the institution to advertise in Canada. No one from abroad can be accepted if there is someone in Canada who is qualified to fulfil that responsibility. This does not take into account that many church organizations and related organizations have a certain declared statement of faith and belief. There is no protection and no recognition as far as the law is concerned at the present time. The problem can be expressed in this way. If there is a position open and the institution wishes to engage a professor or someone from another church-related organization, they must advertise in Canada. No provision is made whatever for the particular doctrinal positions of the organization or their statement of faith.

I am very glad to say that as far as I am concerned, my representations to the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) and to his officials have been very cordial. They have been very co-operative. They recognize that some attention must be paid to this facet if the doctrinal integrity of the church is to be maintained. I have had a good response from the officials in this connection. However, situations change, ministers and officials change and there is no guarantee this state of affairs will continue. This places church organizations in a very difficult position.

I want to speak now about property rights. One of the most astounding omissions from this charter is the omission of property rights. It has been a basic premise of social philosophy that all human beings have a fundamental right to property. Some theorists have put property rights in the category of "natural rights", those rights that accrue to man by virtue of his humanity. Indeed, the existence of a human being is contingent on his ability to claim things as his own. In the most primitive sense, this is food and shelter. I think that is reasonable. If you ask a farmer whether he appreciates land ownership, what do you think he would say? What about asking a fisherman whether he believes in the ownership of property? I am sure we will hear say yes, I want my boat. And so it goes. Property covers a wide range of issues.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Patterson: Therefore, to limit this provision is narrow thinking because it can cover anything a certain individual or a certain administration will want to read into it.

Property covers a multitude of rights, set out in "Social Principles and the Democratic State," at page 156, written by Benn and Peters. There is no way that I could possibly list all the property rights that we should have guaranteed. If certain ones are guaranteed, it means others are not accepted or not recognized. As a result, we can see the problems we are facing in all these different areas. The point is that the exercise of property rights is an integral part of the existence of all human beings. I believe property rights should be incorporated and not traded off for support from some other individuals and groups which have perhaps a rather twisted idea of what property rights involve and what they actually mean.

Another reason given by the Liberals for not including property rights is that some of the provinces were against it.

Mr. McCauley: All of them.

Mr. Patterson: This is nothing short of being hypocritical. Eight of the provinces are against this whole measure and yet the Prime Minister is proceeding with it. The measure is totally abhorrent to the concept of federalism. Yet the Prime Minister uses the excuse that he will not include property rights because a couple of the provinces are against the measure. I think this is inconsistent and dishonest. Property rights should be included in the resolution. As far as I am concerned, the whole thing is a mess. We are, however, trying to do something to improve it because it may eventually become the law of the country. We are trying to make the best of a very bad and sorry mess.

The latest representation I had concerning this issue came in the form of a telegram from the mayor of one of the districts in my constituency. I will not take the time to read it into the record. He was representing a great many who believe that property rights should be included in this resolution.

Reference has been made to the supremacy of God. I am very happy to see that the Liberals have consented, yielded and decided to include a reference to the supremacy of God. They have done it in a very casual way, sort of just tilting their hat to God and saying, "we are just mentioning your name". This is not worthy of the situation. It is far less than what is included in the Bill of Rights, now the law of Canada, proposed by the late Prime Minister of Canada, the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker. It reads, in part:

> The Parliament of Canada, affirming that the Canadian nation is founded upon principles that acknowledge the supremacy of God, the dignity and worth of the human person and the position of the family in a society of free men and free institutions;
> affirming also that men and institutions remain free only when freedom is founded upon respect for moral and spiritual values and the rule of law;

I want to deal briefly now with the matter of federalism. The Liberals, especially the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice are fond of saying that this Parliament is the place that speaks for all of Canada.

An hon. Member: Right on.

Mr. Patterson: Someone said "Right on." I believe that it is, in a certain way which I will explain in a moment. There is another factor ignored by the Liberals, conveniently so because it would undermine the position of the Liberal party. That factor is that the provinces also speak for all Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. Patterson: Canada is a federal state. It is made up of ten provinces of equal constitutional power and status. As Dawson states in "The Government of Canada", at page 82:

> The powers of the provinces are as full and as complete as those of the dominion within the areas allotted by the BNA Act and both dominion and provincial legislatures may delegate their authority to other bodies of their own creation but not to each other.

The problem with the proposal before us is that it takes from the provinces and gives to a federally appointed court certain matters which are within the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces. What is worse, it is being done without the consent of the provinces.

We talk about property rights, educational rights and all these other things. At the present time they are under the jurisdiction of the provincial governments. Therefore I say that all the provincial governments speak on behalf of all Canadians within their jurisdictional rights and the federal government speaks on federal rights. I see an hon. member shaking his head. That is the problem with the Liberals; they are trying to centre everything in Ottawa.

I remember when the Prime Minister was minister of justice. He made the statement that he looked upon his role as minister of justice as charting the course of society for the future. I believe that we have to pay attention to that fact. It is a position that is denied and rejected by this whole package. It is breaking down the system of government we have in Canada where federal and provincial representatives deal with their own jurisdictional responsibilities.

I want to go on to the formula proposed and presented for our consideration in the matter of amending the Constitution. I believe, of course, we should not be dealing with this here at this time. We should be dealing with the patriation of the Constitution with an amending formula. However, as far as the rest is concerned, it should await the bringing back to Canada of our Constitution. That is the proposal we have made. It is the only reasonable and sensible one. The reason it is not being done is that the Prime Minister knows he would have great difficulty in getting some of his pet propositions through his Canadian Parliament.

The Prime Minister wishes to enshrine forever the inequality of provinces. We in western Canada are prohibited forever from sharing as equal partners in our federation. This is totally unacceptable to those in British Columbia and, as my friend from Wetaskiwin pointed out, in the province of Alberta as well. The proposed amending formula will discriminate profoundly against British Columbia because we find in the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia—British Columbia has 40 per cent of the population—their combined population is fully 70 per cent of the western population.

What this amending formula would do is to permit two western provinces containing 30 per cent of the population to bring about constitutional change that would be contrary to the interests of the other 70 per cent. This is unfair, unreasonable and discriminatory as far as British Columbia is concerned. The population projections for the year 2001 show that British Columbia will have 45 per cent of the population of the provinces of Western Canada. We find here the possibility of 77 per cent of the western population being dominated by 23 per cent of the population.

Further to this particular issue, we find the federal proposal is put forth in the form of a proposal to transfer the ownership of natural gas to the federal government. For approval, Manitoba and Saskatchewan, two provinces, would need to have only 16 per cent of the population in order to approve that proposition. Rejection would require three provinces. This is all up against the other proposition that the provinces of Ontario and Quebec have a veto. Each has a veto over the whole thing.

That shows the position in which British Columbia can be placed if a proposal is advanced by the federal government regarding the transfer of natural gas, for example. British Columbia will not accept that. If you think that alienation is growing in the west, you might as well understand why. Alienation in the west, if this goes through, will see a change into something far more dangerous than just a resentment or an alienation and a feeling that British Columbia is not wanted here, that all that counts is central Canada. That is not acceptable.

The Prime Minister has the view that whatever he does, even if it means the destruction of our country, is justified if he can obtain his own peculiar view of Canada. He stated on one occasion, "I came to Ottawa to save Quebec, someone else will have to save the west". Perhaps it will take God himself to do that.

Look at this Constitution. It shows what contempt the Prime Minister has for western Canada. No wonder he is not getting any members from there.

We feel that through negotiations in the spirit of fair play, we could solve these historic problems in a way that would permit British Columbia to be a full and equal partner in confederation. However, I warn the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice that if they proceed on this dangerous course, British Columbians will not tolerate it. We do not want to be a region of second-class citizens behind the perpetual veto of Ontario and Quebec. We do not want to become third-class citizens behind Manitoba and Saskatchewan.

British Columbia did not come into confederation to become subservient to the rest of Canada in any way. We have to remember that British Columbia did not come into confederation when it was first established; it came in later. It came in with an understanding that certain guidelines would be maintained and certain situations would continue. If the government is going to tear those things away, destroy them and say we are not going to get them, that it will not be held accountable and responsible for what was said in the terms of union, British Columbia will feel very angry about it. No one in their right senses could question why.

I appreciate the fact that I only have another one or two moments. I just want to emphasize once again the unfairness of the whole situation. This package which we are faced with today is a hopeless package. It is a miserable mess. Members opposite ask why then are we trying to improve it. As I said before, it is unlikely that it will ever pass, but if it happens to pass, we want it to be improved so that it will be less despicable and dishonourable than it is at the present time. That is why we are moving amendments. We trust the government will accept the amendments moved by this party and do something to at least solve the problem, heal the breach and make western Canada feel that somehow they are receiving co-operation, that they will at least be listened to and, hopefully, there will be some redress to the problems and injustices they have been facing over the last many years.

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure for me to be given this opportunity to take part in this historic debate on these important amendments. The constitutional question as it has evolved since last June has taught Canadians a great deal about their country. In the last year Canadians have come to know the difficulties of being governed in a country as geographically, culturally, politically and economically diverse as ours. The experience Canadians have shared this past year has proven that consensus and compromise is difficult to achieve within our national setting.

However, we have succeeded in reaching consensus and approval on many fronts. Opinion polls published over the last few months, and especially yesterday, have revealed that Canadians approve of what we are doing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bockstael: The premiers of Ontario and New Brunswick agree with us as did a majority of the groups and individuals who appeared before the special joint committee. The federal New Democratic Party has supported our resolution. The provincial courts in Manitoba and Quebec have rendered a decision to the effect that what we were doing was in fact constitutionally binding.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bockstael: Eight premiers have disagreed with our actions. The Premier of Manitoba has steadfastly opposed the entrenchment of a charter of rights. The Premier of Quebec has said he would not agree with the entrenchment of minority rights. In spite of Premier Lévesque's and Premier Lyon's partnership stand, latest reports indicate that some premiers now see the wisdom of accepting the charter of rights.

It is rather ironic that at the time of the referendum in Quebec last May, several provincial premiers openly opposed Premier Lévesque in his attempt to break up this country. These same premiers have today aligned themselves with the Premier of Quebec in opposing the entrenchment of a charter of rights and freedoms for Canadians, a charter which is fundamental to national unity.

Premier Lyon of Manitoba has, over the last few months, been the chief spokesman for all the dissenting premiers who have advocated an opting out approach to confederation, which to me is no different than Premier Lévesque's unswerving drive toward sovereignty-association.

A poll conducted by the Canada West Foundation revealed that Manitobans by a wide majority are in favour of a bill of rights. In fact, 73 per cent of those surveyed indicated they were in support of this federal initiative. I am a Manitoban and I want a charter of rights and freedoms. The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) is also a Manitoban and he as well is on record as favouring a charter of rights and freedoms. Premier Sterling Lyon of Manitoba has said time and time again that he would never accept a charter of rights and freedoms. It is evident that Premier Lyon does not speak for me, he does not speak for the member for Provencher, and he does not speak for the interests of the majority of Manitobans who want a charter of rights and freedoms entrenched in the Constitution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bockstael: In 1949, the noted constitutional expert, Frank R. Scott, wrote:

> There is no freedom save under a system of laws safeguarded by a Constitution, and the prime function of governments under a democracy, while keeping themselves within their constitutional framework, is to protect and advance the fundamental freedoms and human rights of every individual by all legislative measures that seem appropriate.

Professor Scott also had the following to say about the federal government's responsibility in assuring these rights and freedoms for Canadian citizens:

> Under our system of government the responsibility for national decisions on matters of policy rests on Parliament and on the cabinet which is answerable to Parliament. If a program in defence of fundamental freedoms is to be undertaken then Parliament must make the decision.

The proposed Canada Act will provide all Canadians once and for all their fundamental freedoms, their democratic rights, mobility rights and equal rights for the handicapped, among others. The amendments being proposed by the New Democratic Party will assure equal rights for both men and women and will give to our native population the assurance that their aboriginal rights will only be amended under the prescribed rules of the Constitution.

As a member of the special joint committee on the Constitution I can give a first-hand account of the events which took place from November to February 13. I would like to relate that on January 30 the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) announced that he was to incorporate aboriginal rights in the constitutional resolution. Everyone was going around patting himself on the back claiming the amendment proposed was his idea, trying to take credit for it. I would remind you, Sir, that it was the Liberal Party which introduced that amendment.

At the time the hon. member for Nunatsiaq (Mr. Ittinuar) said he had to thank the Prime Minister of Canada for agreeing to include that in the Constitution. I must acknowledge the native wisdom of our Indian friend, the hon. member for Nunatsiaq, who so rightfully asserted, while everyone was proposing we should celebrate, that he would not celebrate until the Constitution was officially brought back here to Canada. His attitude was vindicated the very next morning by the events that followed.

The chief spokesman for the Official Opposition explained that now that the committee has approved the first three chapters of the resolution, now that we have all agreed that Canada has to have its own Constitution, that the Constitution should be patriated, it goes without saying that the Constitution must have an amending formula because it cannot be brought back without such an amending formula otherwise we will have to go back to Britain for amendment. He said they agreed with the charter of rights; he had just finished agreeing on aboriginal rights, but then he said it was time to split the resolution, time to call a halt to the whole process and refer the matter back to the premiers of the provinces for their consideration. This was just another stalling tactic of the opposition, a technique to invoke opting out, an opportunity to resort to some kind of a veto which would rescind everything we have done and postpone indefinitely patriation of the Constitution and a charter of rights for which the people of Canada are waiting.

Let me review the amendments introduced by the hon. Minister of Justice. You must be well aware that it was a Liberal amendment which placed a reference to God in the 1960 Diefenbaker bill of rights.

• (2130)

Mr. Bockstael: When Canada adopted its national anthem last July, we ensured that the official text included the line "God keep our land glorious and free".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Parliament did that.

Mr. Bockstael: In our earliest negotiations with the provinces we proposed a preamble which recognized the authority of God, but regrettably some premiers would not accept such a preamble to our Constitution. For my part, let me confirm how pleased I am that the resolution in its final form on which we are about to vote acknowledges the supremacy of God and the rule of law.

At the special joint committee hearings, we were delighted to see adopted the so-called Henderson amendment for the Atlantic provinces. It stipulated that the approval of two Atlantic provinces, regardless of their size or the number of their citizens, would be sufficient to authorize amendments to the Constitution. To even things up with the Atlantic provinces, a second Liberal amendment will do the same thing for the western provinces. With this new amendment any two western provinces, regardless of their population, will have the power to approve amendments to the Constitution.

Last August in Dauphin, Manitoba, Premier Lyon said that any amending formula should protect all provinces not having as large a population as Ontario, Quebec or British Columbia. I am sure tonight this amendment will please Manitobans and will be welcome news to all western Canadians, for what it means in effect is that there are no more second-class provinces under the Constitution of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Can't you count?

Mr. Bockstael: The third set of amendments we are to consider is the catch-all omnibus amendment proposed by the Progressive Conservatives. While it may appear to them to have merit, we have to note that it only establishes a situation in which "you can't have one without the other".

Personally, I was disappointed that the right to life of the unborn was not entrenched in the Constitution, but I must point out that the proposed opposition clause which states "Nothing in this charter affects the authority of Parliament to legislate in respect of abortion and capital punishment" is absolutely superfluous, for it changes absolutely nothing.

We have been assured by the Minister of Justice that through the Constitution the government retains implicitly the right to formulate laws under the Criminal Code to regulate abortions and such related legal matters.

Turning to more positive aspects of the charter, our Canadian charter will seek to preserve and enhance the multicultural heritage of Canadians.

Mr. Fleming: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bockstael: I am ever grateful and I thank God for the privilege of having been born in Canada and of enjoying equality with all my fellow Canadians. In addition, I enjoy an ethnic background which broadens my horizons. I truthfully feel I am as anglophone as the majority of hon. members opposite, I am as francophone as every member on this side of the House, but first and foremost I am a Canadian.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bockstael: I respect and uphold the bilingual and bicultural reality of this country. I am a fully integrated Canadian.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, my colleagues appreciate the fact that I am equally fluent in French and English, for I feel wholly immersed in both cultures.

From the early days of confederation the province of Quebec has acknowledged the right to English education for its minorities, Protestant as well as Catholic.

Manitoba was called to order by the Supreme Court and asked to honour the letter and the spirit of the Manitoba Act of 1870 and, of course, it has to abide by that act.

The Charter of Rights and Freedoms which we propose to enshrine in the Constitution will give the French and English minorities, wherever they may be, the right to education in the institutions of the linguistic minority, financed with public funds, when the number of children warrants.

I recall once again that the premier of Manitoba has always spoken against enshrining the educational rights of the official minorities. What we are doing now is to make sure that the linguistic minorities will have access to education in their mother tongue, whether they are Francophones outside Quebec or Anglophones inside Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, I want to dispel the false notion that our charter is not made in Canada. Opposition members have kept repeating that it is not a constitution made in Canada. I would suggest to those hon. members that a great many years have prepared us for that constitution. Ever since Quebec's referendum last spring we have joined the provinces in our quest for a Canadian constitution and, since last October, all the members on both sides of this House and the members of the Senate have been pondering over the Canadian constitution made here in Canada.

[English]

During the first phase of our debate, 74 members of Parliament and 34 senators were given the chance to speak out on the resolution. In phase two of the debate we opened the floor to the Canadian public. The committee held 106 meetings in the course of 56 days for a total of 267 sitting hours. We listened to 95 groups and five expert witnesses who came before the committee and we received letters from 914 individuals and 294 groups. Many of the recommendations these groups and individuals made were extremely helpful in our efforts to bring further amendments to the resolution on a Constitution made in Canada.

In this third phase of the debate, well over 100 members and senators have spoken on the resolution. It is evident, therefore, that we are not proceeding unilaterally to patriate the Constitution. We have given to all Canadians the opportunity to take part in this process.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Horsefeathers.

Mr. Bockstael: I remind this House that from the beginning the Official Opposition has attempted to stall the process. The Official Opposition said it would do anything to slow down the process. Then members of the Official Opposition insisted that we needed public participation. We had to have television, so we gave them television. We had to listen to the public. We had to allow representations to be made. We had to hold public hearings. We had to have consultations so that there would be input by the citizens of Canada. We did this. It is really the asides one hears at such meetings which count. Members of the Official Opposition said, "We would keep you here until next Christmas if we could". The point is that they were not interested in giving Canada its Constitution. They preferred to retard and to withhold from the Canadian people a Constitution and a charter of rights.

• (2140)

I would like to contrast this with the premiers of the provinces. Who do they speak for? I gave the example of Premier Lyon a few moments ago. Who have the premiers consulted with? Talk about unilateral action! Look at the dissenting premiers who do not approach anyone, who do not consult with any of their electorate but who come forward and say that they are the spokesmen for the people of their province.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bockstael: Time after time we heard the opposition say "Why do you not go back to those premiers one more time?" For what purpose? I can recall the comments, reported in the media, of the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) and the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie), who were attending the leadership convention at the Chateau Laurier in Ottawa and who felt sure that Premier Lyon would be amenable to a charter of rights. A few days later in Winnipeg I heard Premier Lyon say "I speak for myself. The hon. members of the federal Conservative party do not speak for me and I will not approve a charter of rights."

How can they ask us to go back to the premiers who do not want such a thing, who want to withhold those rights from the Canadian people?

Mr. Taylor: Do you want unity in the country?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Bockstael: Mr. Speaker, once and for all we should let the Canadian people know that it is a myth that this unilateral action is not unilateral. It is the participatory action of the elected people of this country who represent all of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bockstael: That includes the territories, not the private domain of each of the premiers who want to trade off rights for their privileges and resources.

Mr. Taylor: How many do you have in Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia?

Mr. Bockstael: We have worked assiduously over a period of months to achieve what we have accomplished. We have improved the charter. We have improved the Constitution. It is now ready to be voted on and terminated tonight. But we have acquiesced to the demands of the opposition. They have said that legality is the question. They have said to take it to the Supreme Court. Thus, the resolution will be referred to the Supreme Court, and when it comes back we will deal with it expeditiously. We will send it for the seal of approval, which is no different than what we do here every day of the year. In this House we enact laws. We send those laws to the Senate where they are concurred in. Then the representative of the Queen, the Governor General, gives royal assent to it. All we are doing, once we have approved it here, is to perform our duties as parliamentarians. We are sending this resolution to England for that final royal assent, and hereafter we will be able to deal with our own policies, our own Constitution, our own rights in this country, by Canadians for Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I realize that my time is short—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Halliday: I think I would be remiss if I did not say one thing, that is, that the pathetic scene we have just witnessed in this House now where, after a speech which was full of so much tripe, delivered by the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Bockstael)—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. It being 9.45 p.m., it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the amendments, pursuant to the provisions of the order made on Wednesday, April 8, 1981.

[English]

The question is on the amendment standing in the name of the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp).

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment (Mr. Epp) which was negatived on the following division:

Madam Speaker: The question now is on the amendment by Mr. Knowles, seconded by Mr. Ittinuar:

That the proposed Constitution Act, 1981 be amended by

(a) adding immediately after line 40 on page 9 the following section:

"28. Notwithstanding anything in this Charter, the rights and freedoms referred to in it are guaranteed equally to male and female persons.";

(b) renumbering the subsequent clauses accordingly;

(c) adding to clause 54 immediately after line 20 on page 20 the following paragraph:

"(c) the rights of the aboriginal peoples of Canada set out in Part II;" and

(d) relettering paragraphs (c) to (h) of clause 54 as paragraphs (d) to (i).

[English]

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Madam Speaker: All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Madam Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Madam Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Madam Speaker: Shall we dispense with the ringing of the bells?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The House divided on the amendment (Mr. Knowles) which was agreed to on the following division.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: I therefore declare the amendment carried.

Amendment (Mr. Knowles) agreed to.

Madam Speaker: The question is therefore on the amendment of the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), seconded by Mr. Clark:

That Motion Number 36 in the name of the Minister of Justice, be amended as follows:

(a) by deleting Clause 1 of Part I and substituting the following therefor:

"1. Affirming that

(a) the Canadian nation is founded upon principles that acknowledge the supremacy of God, the dignity and worth of the human person and the position of the family in a society of free individuals and free institutions, and

(b) individuals and institutions remain free only when freedom is founded upon respect for moral and spiritual values and the rule of law, the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees the rights and freedoms set out in it subject only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society."

(b) by deleting Clause 7 of Part I and substituting the following therefor:

"7. Everyone has the right to life, liberty, security of the person and enjoyment of property and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice."

(c) by adding after Clause 27 of Part I the following new Clause:

"28. Notwithstanding anything in this Charter, the rights and freedoms set out in it are guaranteed equally to male and female persons."

(d) by adding after new Clause 28 of Part I the following new Clause:

"29. Nothing in this Charter affects the authority of Parliament to legislate in respect of abortion and capital punishment."

(e) by deleting Clause 35 of Part IV and substituting the following therefor:

"35. (1) No later than two months after the coming into force of this Act, the Prime Minister of Canada and the first ministers of the provinces shall constitute a permanent conference to be designated the "Constitutional Conference of Canada" hereinafter referred to as the "Conference".

(2) The conference shall examine all Canadian constitutional laws and propose amendments necessary for the development of the Canadian federation.

(3) A conference convened under subsection (1) shall have included in its agenda an item respecting constitutional matters than directly affect the aboriginal peoples of Canada, including the identification and definition of the rights of those peoples to be included in the Constitution of Canada and the Prime Minister of Canada shall invite representatives of those peoples to participe in the discussions on that item.

(4) The Prime Minister of Canada shall invite elected representatives of the governments of the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories to participate in the discussions on any item on the agenda of a conference convened under subsection (1) that, in the opinion of the Prime Minister, directly affects the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories.

(5) The conference shall meet at least twice each year.

(6) The conference shall be assisted by the Continuing Committee of Ministers on the Constitution."

(f) by deleting Part V.

(g) by deleting Clause 45 of Part VI and substituting the following therefor:

"45. (1) An amendment to the Constitution of Canada may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada where so authorized by

(a) resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons; and

(b) resolutions of the legislative assemblies of at least two-thirds of the provinces that have in the aggregate, according to the then latest decennial census, at least fifty per cent of the population of all the provinces.

(2) Any amendment made under subsection (1) derogating from the legislative powers, the proprietary rights or any other rights or privileges of the legislature or government of a province shall require a resolution supported by a vote of a majority of the members of each of the Senate, of the House of Commons, and of the requisite number of legislative assemblies.

(3) Any amendment made under subsection (1) derogating from the legislative powers, the proprietary rights or any other rights or privileges of the legislature or government of a province shall not have effect, financially or otherwise, in and for any province whose legislative assembly has expressed its dissent thereto by resolution supported by a majority of the members prior to the issue of the proclamation, provided, however, that the legislative assembly, by resolution supported by a majority of the members, may subsequently withdraw its dissent and approve the amendment.

(4) The provisions of subsections (2) and (3) do not apply to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms."

● (2235)

(h) by adding after Clause 48 of Part VI the following new Clause:

"49. An amendment to the Constitution of Canada may be made by proclamation under section 45 or section 47, as appropriate, without a resolution of the Senate authorizing the issue of the proclamation if, within one hundred and eighty days after the passage by the House of Commons of a resolution authorizing its issue, the Senate has not passed such a resolution and if, at any time after the expiration of those one hundred and eighty days, the House of Commons again passes the resolution."

(i) by deleting clause 49 of Part VI and substituting the following therefor:

"49. (1) The procedures for amendment prescribed by subsection 45(1) and section 47 may be initiated by either the Senate or House of Commons or by the legislative assembly of a province.

(2) A resolution authorizing an amendment made for the purposes of this Part may be revoked at any time before the issue of a proclamation.

(3) A resolution of dissent made for the purposes of this Part may be revoked at any time before or after the issue of a proclamation."

(j) by deleting clause 54 of Part VI and substituting the following therefor:

"54. An amendment to the Constitution of Canada in relation to the following matters may be made only in accordance with the procedure prescribed by section 45(1):

(a) The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms;

(b) the commitments relating to equalization and regional disparities set out in section 34;

(c) the powers of the Senate;

(d) the number of members by which a province is entitled to be represented in the Senate;

(e) the method of selecting Senators and the residence qualifications of Senators; and

(f) the principles of proportionate representation of the provinces in the House of Commons prescribed by the Constitution of Canada."

(k) by adding after clause 54 of Part VI the following new Clause:

"55. An amendment to the Constitution of Canada in relation to the following matters may be made only by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada where so authorized by resolutions of the Senate and the House of Commons and by the legislative assembly of each province:

(a) the office of the Queen, the Governor General and the Lieutenant Governor of a province;

(b) The right of a province to a number of members in the House of Commons not less than the numbers of Senators representing the province; and

(c) any of the provisions of this Part." and

(l) by deleting clause 63 of Part VIII and substituting the following therefor:

"63. (1) This Act, or any provision thereof, shall come into force on a day or days to be fixed by proclamation to be issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada where so authorized no later than July 1, 1983 by resolutions of the legislative assemblies of at least two-thirds of the provinces that have in the aggregate, according to the then latest decennial census, a population of at least fifty per cent of all the provinces.

(2) A resolution made for the purposes of this section may be revoked before the issue of a proclamation authorized by it."

Amendment (Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton)) negatived.

Madam Speaker: The question is on the motion by Mr. Pinard, seconded by Mr. Chrétien:

That the proposed Constitution Act, 1981 be amended

(a) by adding immediately after the heading "CANADIAN CHARTER OF RIGHTS AND FREEDOMS" on page 3, the following:

"Whereas Canada is founded upon principles that recognize the supremacy of God and the rule of law:"

(b) by striking out in clause 11 of the French version, line 36 on page 5 and substituting the following:

"déclaré coupable et puni;"

(c) by striking out subclause 33(1) of the French version at lines 27 to 29 on page 10 and substituting the following:

"33. (1) Les droits, ancestraux ou issus de traités, des peuples autochtones du Canada sont, par les présentes, confirmés."

(d) by striking out in subclause 45(1), lines 20 to 24 on page 16 and substituting the following:

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Madam Speaker: In my opinion, the yeas have it.

Call in the members and we shall dispense with the ringing of the bell.

Madam Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

The Constitution

[English]

I would like to wish all hon. members a well-earned holiday. As is customary before we break, I would like to invite hon. members to room 16 for a drink, where apart from sharing in the good cheer, they will have occasion to meet some of the Speakers of the Commonwealth countries who are also invited to meet some of the members.

It being ten o'clock and pursuant to order made Thursday, April 9, 1981, this House stands adjourned until Tuesday, May 12, 1981, at two o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 10.50 p.m. the House adjourned until Tuesday, May 12, 1981 at 2 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, May 12, 1981

The House met at 2 p.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

GRAIN

COST OF PRODUCTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the Canadian Grain Commission has given notice that grain handling tariffs will be increased from 10 per cent to 50 per cent this summer, and whereas farmers are already seriously feeling the pinch with regard to higher costs for everything they buy, including machinery, unnecessary increases due to metric, along with high interest rates and unprecedented inflation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields):

That the Government of Canada provide some leadership by finding ways and means of keeping the cost of production down by increasing the returns to producers and by eliminating unnecessary costs, tariffs and taxes before the industry is completely destroyed.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INCREASE IN FOOD COSTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of extreme urgency under the provisions of Standing Order 43. According to recent figures from Statistics Canada, what a dollar would buy in the way of groceries in 1971 now costs the Canadian consumer $2.85. As well, in light of the fact that food prices have risen astronomically since the government took office, forcing many Canadians to try to subsist on a "dollar diet", which is almost the price of a simple loaf of bread, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Ellis):

That the heartless, do-nothing Minister of Finance inform this House of the immediate measures he intends to take to assist Canadians who are finding it increasingly difficult to feed their families.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION

CALL FOR INCREASED FUNDING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas interest payments now account for more than 15 per cent of total farm costs, or between $1.5 billion and $2 billion; and whereas farm bankruptcies are increasing at an exponential rate, being up 78 per cent between 1979 and 1980 and continuing up at a rate of over 70 per cent during the first quarter of 1981 compared to the first quarter of 1980, I move, seconded by the hon. member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake (Mr. Anguish):

That this House instructs the Minister of Agriculture to take action immediately to increase funding available to the Farm Credit Corporation by $150 million and to make possible the reinvestment of funds in the Farm Credit Corporation by retiring farmers.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL UNITY

REQUEST THAT MEASURES BE TAKEN TO OFFSET ALLEGED PÉQUISTE PROJECTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Marcel Dionne (Chicoutimi): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion concerning an urgent and important question.

Considering that, according to an article signed by Normand Girard and published in the Journal de Montréal last May 6, the Parti québécois is unofficially committed to achieve separatism, and considering that the people are being told about the deceiving manoeuvres to which the Parti québécois plans to resort with a view to fulfilling its aims, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Gingras):

That the Canadian government take the necessary steps to thwart the plans of the Péquistes.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The presentation of such a motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED APPOINTMENT OF FULL-TIME MINISTER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Today, more than ever, veterans deserve better treatment from the government. They are now faced with an inflation rate of 12.4 per cent, an increase in gas prices of 52 cents per gallon, heating oil increases of $1.12 per gallon, food cost hikes of 15.2 per cent, and a do-nothing budget. On top of all this they are being administered by a department which is receiving no leadership and is taking up to two years to process their pension applications. There is also the fact that some veterans are dying before they receive their pensions. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers):

That this House instruct the Prime Minister to appoint a full-time Minister of Veterans Affairs immediately and that this new minister launch a full-fledged investigation into the totally unacceptable conditions in the Department of Veterans Affairs.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

RESIGNATION SOUGHT OF MINISTER OF FINANCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the absolute disaster and unbending stupidity of the government's National Energy Program have been well demonstrated by the delay in excess of $20 billion of investment in heavy oil and tar sands development in northeastern Alberta which coincides with the loss of thousands of jobs throughout Canada and severe damage to the entire national economy, and whereas approval of these major energy projects, with a more realistic National Energy Program in place, would improve the investment climate in Canada and relieve the pressure on our dollar, which is currently producing record high interest rates, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers):

That this House condemn the Minister of Finance for his repeated stonewalling of the Canadian public and demand that he produce a new budget and energy program and, if he is not capable of doing so, that he tender his resignation immediately.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

HOUSING

CALL FOR REPLACEMENT OF MINISTERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Madam Speaker, when mortgage rates were at 14 per cent a family needed to earn $28,200 in order to carry their $50,000 first mortgage. Today, less than one year later, the same family must earn $32,213 to carry their home at the present soaring mortgage rate of 18 per cent, which puts home ownership out of reach of the vast majority of young Canadians since the average family income is $26,000. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis), under Standing Order 43:

That the Prime Minister immediately relieve the minister responsible for housing and CMHC and the Minister of Finance of their present responsibilities and replace them with individuals who are genuinely concerned, if he can find any, about the plight of the home owner who has to renew his or her mortgage and of those who wish to own their homes but now find the dream out of reach.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SMALL BUSINESS

CLOSING OF CANNING FACTORIES IN PRINCE EDWARD COUNTY, ONT.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. These past few years have seen the closing of seven canning factories in Prince Edward county, leaving only three small canners, plus one large operation. With the exorbitant interest rates now being charged there is a real possibility of further closures, leaving the farm community completely unprotected. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Hees):

That the Minister of Finance take heed of the remarks of the Minister of Agriculture and immediately institute reasonable rates for small businesses, and particularly those in the agricultural business.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL MENTAL RETARDATION WEEK

SUPPORT FOR AFFLICTED PEOPLE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Madam Speaker, I seek the attention of all hon. members of this House on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, under the terms of Standing Order 43. Whereas this week of May 11 to 17 is officially proclaimed National Mental Retardation Week and whereas this same week has been proclaimed "Mental Retardation Awareness Week" in many municipalities across Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale):

That this House urge all Canadians to offer their understanding to mentally retarded individuals and to become aware of their potential and capabilities so that the mentally retarded can enjoy as full a life as possible and share in the work and recreational experiences of our society.

Madam Speaker: I am sure the House shares the sentiments expressed in this motion and will do whatever is possible, but I do not think it can be taken under Standing Order 43.

MUNICIPAL AFFAIRS

LOW COST LOANS FOR MUNICIPALITIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg-St. James): Madam Speaker, interest rates which affect the cost of capital borrowing by municipalities across this country are a matter of urgent and pressing necessity because they increase the property taxes of every Canadian. In the Ottawa-Carleton regional area, for example, only one and a half months ago the executive committee was talking about a borrowing rate of 14½ per cent for their capital necessities. Today the rate is over 16 per cent. Therefore it will cost three and a half times as much by the time they pay back the debt. Winnipeg is another example. Under present interest rates, the average householder will have to pay $30 to carry the capital costs of local public works. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the government immediately implement a program of low-cost loans for capital purposes to municipalities.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

EFFECT OF HIGH INTEREST RATES ON SMALL BUSINESSMEN AND FARMERS

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. It concerns the government's interest rate policy and the highest interest rates in Canada's history. No one needs to be told that these interest rates are causing untold hardship, but the minister considers the hardship in cold statistical terms rather than in human terms.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Miss MacDonald: I want to ask him whether he is aware of the anguish among the many small businessmen who are being forced into bankruptcy by the high interest rate policy, and in fact who are lying awake worrying at night because they must tell their employees in the morning they will have to lay them off because they cannot pay them? Is he aware of the distress among hundreds of farmers who are being forced to sell their farms which have been in their families for generations, because of the high interest rates? The minister seems to be interested in taking his pound of flesh in human terms—

Madam Speaker: Order.

Miss MacDonald: I would like to ask the minister—

Madam Speaker: Order. Order, please. I do have to ask the hon. member to ask a question.

Miss MacDonald: I should like to ask the Minister of Finance what he proposes to do in the face of these disastrous events which are hurting so many people, and will he please not tell us that it is beyond his control?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I am quite conscious of the effect of high interest rates on various members of the community, including the groups which the hon. member has mentioned. I am also aware of the even greater danger which will fall upon the over-all Canadian economy and all the people in the country unless we persist in our efforts to reduce over-all inflationary pressures. That is the chief enemy on which the hon. member ought to be focusing. High interest rates are symptoms of this high inflation and, unless we succeed in reducing inflation, much more difficult situations will occur.

But I must say I was surprised when the hon. member referred to lay-offs which she alleges are occurring in the Canadian economy. I would remind her that in the month of April we had the lowest unemployment rate in this country we have had in five years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: We have, in addition, created more jobs. We have at the same time created about 330,000 jobs year to year in Canada, an increase in employment of 3.3 per cent. No other industrialized country in the world can compete with that job-creation record in the last year.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

EFFECT ON PEOPLE WITH FIXED INCOMES

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I can tell from the minister's response that he has not been talking to any of the people who have been hurt all across this country by his high interest rates. This does not just apply to the small businessmen and the farmers I mentioned; the interest rates are hurting all the people in this country he spoke about because they are fuelling inflation and causing the prices of everything we buy to go up. I would like to ask the minister if he has looked at even the most basic, essential goods which people have to buy, including food? Is he aware of the fact that milk has gone up 73 cents for a three-quart bag since interest rates started spiralling, that potatoes are up $1.30 for a ten-pound bag, that butter is up 40 cents a pound, that sugar is up $1.40 a bag, and that bread is up 18 cents a loaf? On top of that, is he aware that—

Madam Speaker: Order, order.

Miss MacDonald: —home heating fuel has risen 36 cents a gallon?

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Order. I am sure the hon. member is quite conscious of the fact that she is making a speech. The question period is designed to ask questions. If the hon. member requires some information, she now has the opportunity to ask for it.

● (1420)

Miss MacDonald: I will put my question to the minister, who has said in recent days that these increases will have to be absorbed by the people. I would like to ask him quite simply how the people who are trying to live on fixed incomes, the elderly, single parents, and people who are disabled, are supposed to absorb the price increases I mentioned.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has misinterpreted what I said in a recent speech when I said that I believed that the Canadian economy at the present time must absorb increases in energy prices. I believe that. There is no way by which these energy prices can be transferred to any other group in the community. I believe that, but I am surprised that the hon. member would stand up in the House of Commons and pretend to take a sympathetic view about increasing prices when recently at her party's national convention she approved an increase in energy prices to 75 per cent of the world level, which would add a much greater burden on the consumer price index than anything we have seen to the present time.

REQUEST FOR AID FOR HOME OWNERS

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, the minister might talk about people pretending, but he has been pretending to act as the Minister of Finance for some months now. That is all he has been doing, pretending.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: I would like to ask the minister if he has talked to any of the hundreds and thousands of Canadians who are now being forced out of their homes because of the high mortgage rates. Have any of his backbenchers been talking to these people? A year ago the minister said that the federal government would consider special assistance to home owners if interest rates soared under the floating rate. He said that he would take action, and since he is supposedly an honourable man, I would like to ask him what he is going to do to honour that commitment.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, we have been through this particular question before. It is true that when interest rates increased very rapidly a year ago I undertook to take special account of the home owners in Canada who were renegotiating their mortgages. That was done, and we found that in a very high proportion of the cases, first, because of increases in incomes home owners had experienced and, second, because of the appreciation in the value of their homes they had experienced they were able to bear the burden of these increased mortgage payments. That is the fact.

The fact of the matter is that during that very difficult period almost all of those who renegotiated their mortgages were able to meet the problems, and that small percentage which had a higher proportion of debt to income than is normally carried was helped by special arrangements made by the minister responsible for CMHC in order to carry them through that difficulty. So there is no point, as we go through this difficult period, for the hon. member to be creating more false situations and false issues in the country than exist at the present time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

ENERGY

REQUEST FOR CHANGE IN POLICY

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Finance is crucifying Canadians on the Cross of higher interest rates and, like Pontius Pilate, he washes his hands of it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: He washes his hands. The Bank of Canada rate was 11.76 per cent before the minister brought down his budget in October. It is now 18.71 per cent, a 7 per cent increase. That is the result of the minister's budget. My question to the minister is this: the Bank of Canada and the minister say our interest rates have to go up, primarily because U.S. interest rates had to go up and the Canadian dollar is weak. Will the minister now change the new energy policy, so-called, which is anti-business, anti-private sector, anti-provinces, and is weakening the Canadian dollar? Would he change that policy and get an agreement now with the oil producing provinces to start us out of this slump and put us in a position where interest rates can be brought down? Will he do that, or will he force the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources or the Prime Minister to do that?

● (1425)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member quite correctly related the very high interest rates we are experiencing in Canada to the very remarkable increase in rates that has occurred in the United States in the last week. As was pointed out by the Bank of Canada last Thursday following the auction on treasury bills, short-term interest rates in the United States rose by two percentage points or more in the last week, having risen strongly in April. I might add that since mid-April interest rates in the United States have risen by two percentage points more than they have in Canada. There is no doubt that the pressure of U.S. interest rates on Canada is real and evident, and that the pressure is occurring on the exchange rate and on interest rates themselves. I am glad that the hon. member is aware of that.

In reply to his question, I want to tell him that of course it is the intention of the government to reach an agreement with the province of Alberta as quickly as possible. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has already had meetings. Last week further discussions were held with the province of Alberta. It would be our hope to reach an agreement as quickly as possible, and it is something that we are working toward very energetically.

FINANCE

ACTION TO STRENGTHEN CANADIAN DOLLAR

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, the Canadian dollar would not be weak were it not for the actions of the government in the last ten years and neglect of the Canadian economy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: My question to the minister is this: what action is he taking to strengthen the Canadian dollar so we are not completely dependent on the U.S., which is the position his government has put us in? What action is he taking to do that? His advice to the Canadian people is like the male chauvinist—if you are going to be raped, relax and enjoy it.

We want to know what action the minister is taking to reverse the weakness of the Canadian dollar, and we want to ask the minister this: will he give this House a solemn commitment that he will not permit the Bank of Canada to raise interest rates one jot or tittle further, and that this is as far as they are going no matter what happens to interest rates in the United States? Will he do that?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): No, Madam Speaker. I, like the hon. members opposite, regret the rise in interest rates in current circumstances which, in my view, are unavoidable. I know that the members of the opposition parties have indicated they intend to debate the economy today, tomorrow and the next day. I will be looking forward to their views as to what they have to recommend in current circumstances. But I ask the hon. member to reflect on his request at the present time, and the effect that his request, if administered by an irresponsible minister of finance, would have on—

Mr. Crosbie: We have one!

Mr. MacEachen: —would have on the inflation rate in Canada and on the exchange value of the Canadian currency. The hon. member knows perfectly well that his proposal really borders short on complete irresponsibility.

THE ECONOMY

IMPLEMENTATION OF GOVERNMENT ELECTION CAMPAIGN PROMISE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. The Minister of Finance has just said that the current high interest rate policy is unavoidable. On November 9, 1979, the Prime Minister, then Leader of the Opposition, moved a motion of non-confidence in the Conservative government of the day on the grounds that "its acceptance of record high interest rates" was unacceptable. Interest rates then were at 13 per cent.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: Considering that the prime rate is now 19.5 per cent, considering that mortgages are approaching 20 per cent, and considering that the cost of living is now higher by 12.5 per cent, I would like to ask the Prime Minister, instead of continuing with these ruinous high interest rate policies, why does he not deliver on the promise he made in the last election campaign to the people of Canada?

• (1430)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, you will recall that in the context of that campaign we indicated that high interest rates and slow growth did not make sense. That is why we campaigned against them.

Mr. Broadbent: And now they do?

Mr. Trudeau: The Leader of the New Democratic Party is now showing his ignorance. If he had listened to the statistics given by the minister he would have realized that we are now in a period of high growth and high employment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I am afraid hon. members have accumulated too much energy over their break, but so have I and I intend to keep them straight.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, you must be as bewildered as I at the groans when I mention high growth. Surely an 8 per cent real growth rate in the last quarter and a 4 per cent to 6 per cent real growth rate in the present quarter are, indeed, a high growth rate. If they suspect anything different, they are ignorant of the facts.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ANNUNCIATION OF GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, speaking of ignorance, I would point out to the Prime Minister that I asked him a question about interest rates and the cost of living, and nothing to do with job creation. If the promise made sense in November of 1979, when the Prime Minister was Leader of the Opposition, it surely makes sense to implement it now, when he is Prime Minister of Canada.

The government is continuing to mislead the people of Canada. The minister responsible for housing has indicated that he would like a shelter allowance provided to the people of Canada; the Minister of National Health and Welfare has talked about increasing the tax exemption for children and other ministers want to change the Bank Act, especially the Minister of Agriculture who wants to help farmers. With regard to each of these instances the Minister of Finance has said that the idea is ridiculous, or he has done nothing about them. I would like to ask the Prime Minister: who speaks for the Government of Canada? Is it these ministers who are making promises to the people of Canada, or is it the Minister of Finance who is turning them all down?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I cannot understand the attitude taken by the Leader of the New Democratic Party when he says I talk about high employment and high growth. Surely these issues are linked, as he knows. If you want to fight inflation at all costs, you can follow the route followed by other industrialized countries which have brought inflation down very drastically but at a cost of very high rising unemployment and at a cost of zero or negative growth in their economies. Surely as erudite a man as the Leader of the New Democratic Party would understand that there is some linking between these concepts. I say that on balance, which is the position we took in the last campaign, we prefer to see employment growth and economic growth. That is our choice, rather than stagnation. I am surprised that we do not have the support of the New Democratic Party.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, we have not decided to join with the conservatives in this country or with those south of the border in terms of implementing the kind of reactionary economic policy that the Liberals are forcing on the people of Canada.

REQUEST FOR IMPLEMENTATION OF LOW INTEREST RATE POLICY

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Considering that the Prime Minister argued in the fall of 1979 that a low interest rate policy made sense then, and considering that we in this party and many economists in the country believe it makes sense now, will the Prime Minister instruct the Minister of Finance to implement what he promised to the people of Canada in the last election campaign and instruct the Governor of the Bank of Canada to bring down interest rates? If the Minister of Finance does not do this, will the Prime Minister fire him?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I have indicated in my answers that, in my view, the question is one of over-all management of the economy, not separately attacking interest rates and employment as though they were unrelated.

In answer to the specific question as to the effect of in some way forcing down interest rates, I would point out to the Leader of the New Democratic Party that this would mean exchange controls, and until he is prepared to advocate that I would say that we are not prepared to listen to him.

BANKS AND BANKING

INCREASE IN PROFITS OF CHARTERED BANKS

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister speaks about us being in a period of real growth. I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Finance and ask him to comment about the real growth we are seeing in our chartered banks whose profits have risen to a quarter of the total profits of all the public companies in Canada, up 66 per cent compared to the same quarter last year, due to the high interest rate structure favoured by the minister. Would the Minister of Finance explain to the House why he chooses to favour a policy which is obviously so beneficial to our chartered banks at a time when countless numbers of small businesses are going bankrupt as a result of it?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I think I should remind hon. members opposite, who have properly raised the plight of the small business firms, that we have in operation the small business development bond which has been extended by this government and which brings very substantial interest rate benefit to eligible small businesses in the country. So, we have responded in these inflationary times to the requests which were made to us by the small business representatives in continuing the small business development bond.

The hon. member has mentioned the profitability of the banks. It is true that for one quarter, and possibly two quarters, there is a strong improvement in the profitability of the banks, stemming from a rather low base. I have already indicated to members of the House of Commons on previous occasions that it is my intention to monitor the situation very closely, since I do not believe that any particular institution in the country should be permitted to benefit in any unfair or inequitable way from the current high interest rates which are necessary for the welfare of the Canadian economy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Finance who said that the profitability of the banks stems from a rather low base. In the first quarter of last year the banks earned $288 million—that is what the minister calls a low base. This year they will earn $466 million.

EFFECT OF FLOATING BANK OF CANADA INTEREST RATE

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): It is now 14 months since the Minister of Finance introduced his floating rate concept with regard to interest rates. The inflation level has gone up a full 4 per cent since he introduced this policy and, oddly enough, the prime lending rates have gone up 4.5 per cent. Would the minister explain to the House when we will be entering this promised land he told us he was leading us to—a promised land with lower inflation, which would be the fallout of his following a high interest rate policy? We certainly have the high interest rates but, unfortunately, we have even higher inflation. When will we get to the point where there is lower inflation in the country? Does the minister admit that his gradualism is just not working?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member referred to the introduction of the floating bank rate which is established on a weekly basis as a result of an auction of treasury bills. Hon. members of the House ought to realize that there are very strong pressures at the present time in this country driving up interest rates. That pressure is not only from the United States. There are very strong demands from business and from all sectors of the economy for credit.

● (1440)

Mr. Stevens: What about the federal government?

Mr. MacEachen: I would remind hon. members that in April, last month, the demand for over-all credit increased by about 20 per cent. I would ask the hon. member to read the announcement made by the Governor of the Bank of Canada last Thursday when he explained these high interest rates by saying, "In respect of other economic developments the bank noted that the rate of total spending and the demand for credit in Canada have both remained disturbingly high."

Mr. Stevens: Including the federal government.

Mr. MacEachen: What the governor of the bank is saying is that we are running a very strong economy. The demand for credit is very intense, and that is one of the sources of high interest rates in Canada. The hon. member should not fail to remember these very important facts.

POSITION OF HOME OWNERS

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In answer to an earlier question the minister suggested that appreciation in the value of a home helps when it comes to mortgage payments. I would suggest that when a Canadian home owner sits down with a mortgage officer and tells him that his home has appreciated, the mortgage officer is simply going to say, "So has your mortgage payment". I would ask the minister how the appreciation in the value of a home helps a Canadian home owner who has to make out-of-pocket mortgage payments.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, if that is too complicated a concept for the hon. member to understand, I should like to draw his attention to a simpler concept, namely, the relationship between the total income of the individual and the proportion of that income that goes into home ownership payments. That is a well established principle that has been in operation for a long time.

If my hon. friend examines the situation, he will find that because of rising incomes—quite apart from changes in capital appreciation or net worth—if he examines rising incomes, he will find that a very high proportion of home owners renegotiating their mortgages are in as good or better position to bear that ratio as they were when they initially took out the mortgages. That is a fact.

EFFECT OF GOVERNMENT POLICY ON MORTGAGE MARKET

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): I wish to ask a supplementary question, Madam Speaker. There are hundreds of thousands of Canadians who are trying to understand what the Minister of Finance just obfuscated. Since the mid-1960s the standard term for a mortgage has been five years. We now have one and two-year mortgages, and there is some talk even of six-month mortgages. The Liberal party's high interest policy has created this period of instability. I want to ask the Minister of Finance if he is not concerned that the lack of action on the part of his department and the government has created an instability in the mortgage market in Canada?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I have a good many concerns and one of those concerns is obviously the impact of the very high interest rates on home owners and other groups in the community. My overriding concern is the very strong inflation that we are experiencing at the present time in Canada and my corollary that the present interest rates are absolutely essential if we are going to make any possible headway against inflation. That is the simple proposition that has to be admitted.

If hon. members ask me, as they are doing, either to protect every group in the country by new spending, or many groups in the country by new spending, or by taking a deliberate action to lower interest rates in current circumstances, they are asking me to do something that I will not do, namely, to take steps that would add further to inflation in the long term. They are saying, "lower it now," and I am telling them that if I did that they would get it in spades in the long term.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR INTRODUCTION OF COST OF LIVING TAX CREDIT

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, we have had it in clubs from the minister today. Four months ago he was blaming the Americans, something he has done again today, and last week he was blaming the Canadian worker for the kind of inflation we have been suffering. Instead of blaming the Canadian worker whose wages have fallen behind the rise in the cost of living in the past four years, and in view of the effect this has on people on fixed incomes or pensions, why does the minister continue to reject a cost of living tax credit which is not a blanket subsidy but would be a method of using the tax system to provide the kind of protection and help that those Canadians trying to keep up with increases in the cost of living so desperately need, and which would focus that assistance on people who need it most?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I want to correct the hon. member and tell him that I have not at any time blamed the Canadian worker for the current inflationary circumstances. I attempted to mention, in a speech in Toronto, how inflationary expectations in the current strong inflationary environment have fed through into wage settlements which, in my view, will lead in the long term to no benefit for individual workers, or for the economy. That is what I have been saying. If the hon. member can show how I am wrong on that, I would be glad to hear him.

The hon. member is asking me to provide protection through a tax credit for a special group in the community. That is what he is doing. He is not arguing that it is costless. He is not saying that it will not cost the treasury anything. It is obviously going to cost money. It is is going to add to spending. It is going to add to the deficit or add to higher taxes, both of which, in these circumstances, would be unacceptable as far as I am concerned.

ALTERNATIVE POLICY TO FIGHT INFLATION

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, the minister's commitment to social Darwinism would be quaint were its effect on the average Canadian not so devastating. If he sticks around tomorrow and Thursday, he will hear from us how the economy can afford to pay for a cost of living tax credit by putting taxes on the banks and taxing our largest corporations at a rate which the average taxpayer also pays. The money is there if the minister is prepared to find it.

My supplementary question to the minister is this, Madam Speaker. When the Bank of Canada started its policy of gradualism in 1975, we had an inflation rate of 10 per cent and an interest rate of 9.75 per cent. Now we have inflation running at an annual rate of nearly 14 per cent and interest rates running at 20 per cent. By what empirical test does the minister have to be convinced that the policy which the bank has been following, on his instructions and on the instructions of the hon. member for St. John's West—under what conditions does the minister have to say that this policy clearly is not working and we have to find an alternative that will have the effect of reducing inflation without killing the Canadian economy and without hurting the average Canadian?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, on the first point, the hon. member has talked about his suggestion that we tax the banks and corporate industry in the country more heavily. In my budget I introduced a number of very important taxes on the oil and gas industry. I must say that I have not received very much help from the New Democratic Party in getting those bills through, nor have I had very much support from that party for our taxation. I have wondered why not. Why have they been so silent? Let me tell the hon. member—

Mr. Deans: Did it ever occur to you that you are wrong?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the hon. member is really—however, I will not be as unkind to him as he is occasionally to me.

Mr. Crosbie: Attaway, Uriah!

Mr. Nowlan: You tender soul!

• (1450)

Mr. MacEachen: Is the hon. member serious in suggesting that in a period of five or six months, after having this rather high interest rate experience, we can turn back a deeply embedded inflation, which is not only embedded in our structures in the economy but embedded in expectations? Does he really believe that it can be turned aside in five months, or a year or two years—

An hon. Member: You created it.

Mr. Nielsen: It is wrestled to the ground.

Mr. MacEachen: —when it took about ten years to build that disbelief in the minds of the public—

Mr. Nowlan: You built it.

Mr. MacEachen: —about the value of the Canadian currency? Does the hon. member believe that?

Mr. Nowlan: You are an ostrich.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PAYMENT BY U.S.S.R. FOR DAMAGE CAUSED BY DISINTEGRATION OF SATELLITE

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Etobicoke-Lakeshore): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact it cost $14 million to search and find the radioactive material resulting from the disintegration of a Soviet satellite over the Northwest Territories on January 24, 1978, will the minister advise why he has accepted only $3 million in damages from the Soviet Union? Is it because the minister feels in some way that Canada has some responsibility for the cleanup, or is it because only a few pieces of the satellite which carried radioactive material were found?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I know the hon. gentleman, who is a very distinguished lawyer, will understand how negotiations normally proceed. This was a matter of very difficult and prolonged negotiations with the Soviet Union. The figure which he has mentioned represents the compromise on which we were able to agree.

PROJECTIONS RESPECTING ECONOMIC INDICES

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance.

The Minister of Finance took some umbrage at what a member might say to him. I have to say to the Minister of Finance that the House of Commons and the country are beginning to wonder whether or not the Minister of Finance, his department or the government really knows where they are going, or whether they have any answers. That is the reason for this question period today, and it is also the reason, Madam Speaker, why the next two days of debate will be on economic matters.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I think it is important to the country that the House understands what the government is acting upon when it takes the position it does.

In the interests of clarity and in the interests of allowing the House to understand, would the Minister of Finance now undertake, having had notice of two days of debate, to entertain motions in the name of our party with respect to the economy? Would he also undertake to file, prior to the beginning of the debate, the forecasts and new projections of the department with respect to interest rates, rates of inflation, the Bank of Canada rate, as well as projections with respect to energy prices in Canada so that all of the facts will be on the table, and members of the House of Commons, together with members of the public, can make a judgment as to whether the Minister of Finance and the government really have any economic policies at all?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member will have to make up his own mind on these matters. I have already provided projections in the budget, not only for this year but for last year and for three years ahead. When the occasion justifies it, I will be very glad to revise the projections, but it is not my intention to provide a new array of projections which in the circumstances, as the hon. member knows, are very uncertain. I do not believe, in these uncertain times, that one ought to lay too much emphasis upon projections years down the road.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Finance this morning said publicly that in economic terms the country was in a crisis with respect to inflation and other things. He said that. I heard him say it this morning. He must have made that judgment on some forecast of projections from figures, certainly not the ones in his old budget because they are hopelessly out of date. Therefore, will the minister table the projections and the figures which put the foundation to his statement today that, in terms of inflation, this country is facing a crisis? Canadians believe the country is facing a crisis but what Canadians want from this ministry is the government's intimations on how to get out of it. Obviously, it must not do nothing. There must be something which the government has in mind. Perhaps the time has come for it to be said, either tomorrow or the next day when we will be engaged in debate.

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the hon. member said I used the word "crisis". I am not so sure that I did. I thought I said to the interviewer that I regard the inflationary situation as very, very serious.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Catastrophic.

Mr. MacEachen: I have had the view, since the budget, that the main difficulty facing the country is inflation. I have difficulty today, despite the evidence of this inflation, in convincing hon. members that the monetary policy pursued by the Bank of Canada is justified, because nobody on the other side has agreed with the policy. One of the difficulties which hon. members have not yet come to realize is that the policy being followed by the Governor of the Bank of Canada is anti-inflationary and is required in the present circumstances.

If the hon. member wants me to give him some facts on which I base my feeling that the inflation situation is serious—

Mr. Nielsen: No speeches.

Mr. MacEachen: —I refer him to the bank rate which was increased to 18.71 per cent last Thursday. I regard that as a very serious development. I refer the hon. member to the last inflation figure which showed year to year inflation of 12.4 per cent. I believe these are very serious indices of the inflationary strength of the economy and the environment in which we live. I am looking forward to the debate for the next two days to get views from hon. members—during which I will also give some views—as to what they believe the next step ought to be, not about an incoherent but a coherent policy.

Miss MacDonald: Who is the Minister of Finance?

REPORTED STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE ON AMENDING BANK ACT

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Madam Speaker, one segment of society which is facing a crisis is, of course, the agricultural industry, and therefore my question is for the Minister of Finance. Last Thursday the Minister of Agriculture said in a speech in British Columbia that the government was considering amending the Bank Act to reduce interest rates for unincorporated small businesses and for farmers. Was the Minister of Agriculture stating government policy when he made that statement, or was he just talking through his proverbial green hat, which seems to be the usual case?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I do not think the Minister of Agriculture would have referred to the Bank Act—

Mr. Epp: He did.

Mr. MacEachen: —because we have completed our revision of the Bank Act and it is not my intention to reopen the Bank Act at the present time.

Mr. Jarvis: It was Whelan.

An hon. Member: Down the drain, Gene.

Mr. MacEachen: But I will say that I have had discussions, as I frequently do, with the Minister of Finance. With respect to the Minister of Agriculture—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: I have had frequent discussions with the Minister of Agriculture on questions in which he is interested. One of the items has to do with possible changes to the Income Tax Act.

I also want to tell you, Madam Speaker, that I do have discussions with the Minister of Finance.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss MacDonald: You and Mackenzie King.

Mr. Shields: Does he answer you?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Mitchell: You will be walking on water soon.

• (1500)

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF SMALL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BOND PROGRAM

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is also for the Minister of Finance. An example of what would help when it comes to the agricultural industry would be an extension of the small business development bond to include unincorporated businesses, specifically for farmers and farm businesses. The minister must realize that agriculture operates almost totally on borrowed credit. Certainly the cattle feeding industry operates exclusively on borrowed credit. We have a situation in which farm prices are starting to drop but costs have gone up substantially. Can the minister give any indication to the farm community of whether he is looking at a method such as extending the small business development bond to include farm businesses?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): I think the hon. member's question underlines in a sense the contradictions that I am hearing from members of the opposition. Yesterday I read in the newspaper that the hon. member for York-Peel, a very important economic spokesman for the opposition, was advocating further reductions in expenditures as the way to beat inflation. Today I have heard a whole series of suggestions from members opposite asking for increased spending programs.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Name one.

Mr. MacEachen: Although I must say I would like in the circumstances to respond to all these requests, I would like to know how it would be possible to increase expenditures and add to the deficit and fight inflation all at the same time.

Miss MacDonald: You are not doing any one of them.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

EFFECT OF HIGH INTEREST RATES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I ask leave, seconded by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae), to move the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the highest interest rates and cost of living ever recorded in Canadian history, which have caused economic ruin for thousands of Canadians, particularly home owners, farmers, small businessmen and fishermen; and the necessity for the government to institute a new made-in-Canada interest rate policy that will stop fuelling inflation and the resulting hardship for the ordinary Canadian.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) gave me notice of his intention to move the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26 for the purpose of debating certain aspects of the economic conditions of the country, more particularly interest rates.

The hon. member will know that in arriving at a decision on such a motion the Chair must be guided by the provisions of subsection (5) of the Standing Order, which in part reads as follows:

> In determining whether a matter should have urgent consideration, Madam Speaker . . . shall have regard to the probability of the matter being brought before the House within reasonable time by other means.

As early as tomorrow and the day following, opposition motions may be set down for debate in the House under supply proceedings if hon. members so choose.

Members will recall the lengthy debate which was allowed by the Chair under the same Standing Order on December 18 and 19 last dealing with economic conditions in Canada, a subject quite similar to that which the hon. member asks be debated today. It is obvious that the Chair under these conditions and on this matter, which is of a continuing nature, cannot accept the hon. member's request for an emergency debate.

MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE'S STATEMENT—WINDSOR STAR

Question No. 724—Mr. Cossitt:

1. To the knowledge of the government, did the Minister of Agriculture state in an interview with The Windsor Star on June 2, 1979, "Pitfield and those guys killed me on that" with reference to cabinet approval of stabilization payments for beef producers who lost money in 1976?

2. To the knowledge of the government, did the Minister of Agriculture state in an interview with The Windsor Star on June 2, 1979, that every major policy he pushed for agriculture was blocked by bureaucrats and that Michael Pitfield "more than once attempted to block a major piece" of Whelan legislation and, if so, is it the policy of the government to allow public servants to interfere with the making of policy by cabinet?

3. Are Mr. Whelan's statements accurate in regard to the past and present?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): See Beauchesne's Rules and Forms of the House of Commons of Canada, Citation 359—fifth edition, paragraph (10), and Citation 171—fourth edition, paragraphs (e) and (nn).

HOUSE OF COMMONS STAFF

What appointments by name, title and classification, were made to the House of Commons staff by the government by order in council since April 20, 1968, and what was the statutory authority in each case?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Five such appointments have been made since April 20, 1968: Mr. C. B. Koester was appointed Clerk Assistant (Administrative and Procedural) at the SX-1 level on July 1, 1975; on September 1, 1979, Mr. Koester was appointed Clerk, initially at the SX-3 level, and later promoted to DM-1 on October 1, 1980. Mr. M. G. Cloutier was appointed Sergeant-at-Arms at the SX-2 level on April 27, 1978. Mr. M. R. Pelletier was appointed Clerk Assistant (Legal) at the SX-1 level, later revised to SX-2, on October 24, 1969. Mr. J. R. J. Maingot was appointed Law Clerk and Parliamentary Counsel at the SX-1 level, later revised to SX-2 on January 1, 1971.

The appointment of Mr. Koester as Clerk was made under the authority of the Public Service Employment Act, R.S. 1970, Chapter P. 32, S. 38. The other appointments were made by the governor in council on the recommendation of the Prime Minister. This mode of appointment to these positions is a practice of long standing, the first such order in council having been issued on May 12, 1896, when Sir Charles Tupper was prime minister.

FRIGATE PROGRAM—SELECTION OF CONTRACTOR

Question No. 1,611—Mr. Howie:

1. What is the status of plans to select a contractor for the Frigate Program for the naval branch of the Canadian Armed Forces?

2. (a) At what stage is the program and on what date will the selection be made for the design stage (b) is the program on schedule and on what date is it expected to begin construction (c) on what date is the first ship expected to come on line?

3. Since proposals or tenders were first called, have any changes been made in the selection process in terms of participating parties or time extensions and, if so, what were they and for what reason were changes made?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. On the date this question was asked the government was evaluating the proposals of the qualified contractors for the performance of contract definition. As at December 8, 1980, the government selected two of the three qualified contractors for the performance of contract definition for the Canadian Patrol Frigate Program. The selected contractors are:

(a) Saint John Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Co. Ltd., Saint John, New Brunswick; and

(b) SCAN Marine Inc., Longueuil, Quebec.

The selection of the implementation contractor for the program will be made at the end of contract definition.

2. (a) The program, with the selection of these two contractors, has entered the design stage.

(b) The original schedule for the program was announced in 1977, anticipating delivery of the first ship at the end of 1985. This delivery is now scheduled for late 1987. Construction of the first ship is expected to start by the end of 1983.

(c) The first ship is scheduled to be delivered in late 1987.

3. Since the proposals were first requested in mid-1978, the government qualified three of the proposers and invited these three to respond to the government's desire to encourage, through the use of procurement, the creation and expansion of independent Canadian-owned enterprises. Organizational changes of the qualified contractors were as follows:

(a) Saint John Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Co. Ltd. replaced Sperry Inc.;

(b) SCAN Marine Inc., a subsidiary of Pratt & Whitney Aircraft of Canada Ltd., replaced Pratt & Whitney Aircraft of Canada Ltd.; and

(c) Vickers Canada Inc. replaced Litton Systems Canada Ltd.

"BUFFALO SHUFFLE"

Question No. 1,724—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is there a procedure referred to in the Department of Employment and Immigration, particularly by senior members of the staff, as the "Buffalo Shuffle" and, if so, what is a full description of the term and does it include immigrants entering Canada who have been deported to the United States and who then proceed to re-enter through the Canadian consulate at Buffalo, in many cases by ministerial permits?

2. (a) How many persons have entered Canada via Buffalo in each of the past three years after being deported or in any way forced to leave Canada (b) how many ministerial permits were involved (c) how many had criminal records either in Canada or elsewhere and for what reason were they readmitted?

3. What was the total number of persons entering Canada via the Canadian consulate in Buffalo during the past three years combined?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): 1. Yes. "The Buffalo Shuffle" is a colloquial phrase often applied to a commission procedure, facilitating admission for humanitarian or compassionate reasons of people already in Canada, but who are subject to a deportation, removal, or exclusion order and are required by law to leave the country. The same procedure may also be applied to those whose admission is deemed to be in the national interest, such as some entrepreneurs. Many such people seeking admission by this procedure are from the Toronto area, and are referred for processing to the Canadian consulate in Buffalo because of its proximity to the border; hence the phrase "Buffalo Shuffle." This phrase is sometimes also applied to the same procedure used at other Canadian consulates in the U.S.A. At the consulate's own discretion or at the request of immigration officials at national or regional headquarters, ministerial permits are issued to persons who meet the foregoing requirements, but whose admission to Canada is otherwise prohibited by law. Another large group to whom the term "Buffalo Shuffle" may be applied are individuals legally in Canada in the visitors category who are applying to remain as permanent residents through a Canadian consulate in the U.S.A.

2. (a) Statistics are not kept on the number of persons entering Canada via Buffalo after being deported, or in any way forced to leave Canada.

(b) The Canadian consulate in Buffalo has issued the following ministerial permits to persons seeking admission as residents or visitors:

April to December	1978	55
January to December	1979	61
January to September	1980	28

(c) Thirty-one ministerial permits were issued by Buffalo from April 1, 1978, to September 30, 1980, to persons prohibited admission due to criminal records, whose admission was deemed appropriate for humanitarian or compassionate reasons.

3. During the period April 1, 1978, to September 30, 1980, the Canadian consulate in Buffalo issued 2,033 immigrant visas, 19,936 visitor visas, and 144 ministerial permits.

LIQUIDITY OF MORTGAGE INSURANCE FUND

Question No. 1,879—Mr. Lewis:

1. What is the present liquidity position of the Mortgage Insurance Fund?

2. What was the total amount borrowed for the fund from the government and what were the terms and conditions?

3. What is the estimated value of the fund?

4. Did the Office of the Comptroller General, or any other agency, undertake to complete an actuarial assessment of the fund and, if so (a) on what date was the assessment completed (b) what were the results?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): I am advised by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation as follows: 1. As at December 31, 1980, Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation had outstanding borrowings on behalf of the Mortgage Insurance Fund, under Section 9(6) of the National Housing Act, totalling $175,000,000.

Note No.	Date	Rate	Amount
1	December 5, 1979	13-5/8	$ 5,000,000
2	December 21, 1979	13-5/8	55,000,000
3	January 17, 1980	13-5/8	10,000,000
4	February 15, 1980	11-7/8	97,500,000
5	March 24, 1980	11-7/8	45,200,000
6	October 29, 1980	13-1/4	14,700,000
		Total amount borrowed	$227,400,000*

*$52,400,000 of these borrowings were repaid from real estate sales proceeds in 1980.

All of these borrowings were in accordance with the terms and conditions set out in order in council P.C. 1980-396 of February 8, 1980. This order in council superseded and amended those terms and conditions set out in order in council P.C. 1979-3233 of November 29, 1979.

3. The net assets of the Mortgage Insurance Fund as of December 31, 1980, amounted to $314.4 millions.

4. An evaluation of the fund was undertaken in mid-1980. At that time, an actuarial deficiency in the order of $80 millions was cited. This deficiency assumed that the then-current market trends, which were the worst experienced in some real estate markets in recent years, would continue. An appraisal of the fund's real estate portfolio in November, 1980, indicated a 14 percent improvement over these trends.

INVENTORY OF MORTGAGE INSURANCE FUND

Question No. 1,880—Mr. Lewis:

1. What is the present inventory of units held by the Mortgage Insurance Fund?

2. How many units were sold by the fund in (a) 1979 (b) 1980, and what is a breakdown between the two years?

3. For the same years, by province, what is the breakdown of units taken over and units sold?

4. For all of the units sold in 1980, what is the difference between the acquisition cost (amount of mortgage indebtedness) and the eventual sale price?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): I am advised by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation as follows: 1. As at December 31, 1980, the portfolio of the Mortgage Insurance Fund was 15,258 units.

2. (a) MIF units sold in 1979—3,319, (b) MIF units sold in 1980—20,206.

3. See list below.

4. Not available. (Net loss on disposal of Mortgage Insurance Fund real estate in 1980 was $231,717,000.)

PETRO-CANADA'S BUDGET 1980/81

Question No. 2,074—Mr. Towers:

1. What is Petro-Canada's total current budget for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1981?

2. What is the total amount of the budget allocated for oil and gas exploration?

3. What percentage of the total budget is allocated to exploration?

4. Is Petro-Canada a partner in any current exploration contracts and, if so, how many?

5. Has Petro-Canada undertaken exclusively any exploration contracts and, if so, how many?

6. (a) Does Petro-Canada call public tenders for site preparation contracts, drilling and service contracts (b) have any such contracts been awarded without benefit of tender and, if so (i) how many (ii) what was the dollar value in each case?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Petro-Canada reports as follows: 1. 1980—$435 million.

2. $228.6 million.

3. 52.6 per cent.

4. Yes. 1980—26 contracts.

5. Yes. 1980—163 contracts.

6. (a) Petro-Canada calls for tenders as a matter of policy for purchases over $10,000, construction over $50,000, drilling services over $50,000, geological and geophysical services over $200,000.

(b) 1980

In some cases contracts were awarded by negotiation because the contractor was the only one available in certain remote locations or was the only contractor capable of carrying out the required work. In other cases the contract was for equipment specifically required to meet previously established standards and where only one supplier exists.

COMMUNITY SERVICES PROGRAM—MR. HARRY SHORTEN

Question No. 2,099—Mr. McGrath:

1. Has the Community Services Program of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans been fully integrated into regional and district management offices of the Department?

2. What are the duties and responsibilities of Mr. Harry Shorten of New Brunswick?

3. Was Mr. Shorten's contract renewed and, if so, for what amount?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): 1. Yes. The Community Services Program (including officers) falls under the authority of the local area manager, with program co-ordination and evaluation being the responsibility of the regional office.

2 and 3. Mr. Shorten's contract expired in June, 1980.

BILATERAL FISHERIES AGREEMENT—CANADA/EEC

Question No. 2,100—Mr. McGrath:

What are the terms of the bilateral fisheries agreement recently concluded between Canada and the European Economic Community?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): A long-term bilateral fisheries agreement between Canada and the EEC has been negotiated ad referendum but has not yet been ratified by the two governments involved. The draft agreement includes the following elements: (1) co-operation in the conservation of stocks beyond Canada's 200-mile zone; (2) co-operation in scientific research; (3) co-operation in dealing with threats to conservation by vessels of other countries beyond Canada's 200-mile zone; (4) protection for Canada's Atlantic salmon stocks off the coast of Greenland; (5) limited allocations of cod and squid for community vessels; (6) a reduction in EEC import tariffs on fixed quantities of cod, redfish and herring products in various forms.

MR. PETER NICHOLSON

Question No. 2,140—Mr. Crosby:

1. Is Mr. Peter Nicholson employed or was he employed in the office of the minister responsible for Fitness and Amateur Sport and, if so, in what position?

2. What salary or remuneration was or is paid to Mr. Nicholson while employed in the office of the minister and were any personal or other expenses paid or reimbursed to him?

3. What are the qualifications for the position in which Mr. Nicholson was involved and was the position advertised or offered otherwise to any other applicants?

4. Was Mr. Nicholson appointed or will he be appointed a judge of the county court for the province of Nova Scotia?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): 1. Mr. Peter Nicholson, QC, was employed as an independent contractor, under a personal services contract, to provide consultative services to the Minister of Labour responsible for Fitness and Amateur Sport.

2. Mr. Nicholson was paid a total amount of $14,213.59, which includes fees plus travelling and living expenses, in accordance with Treasury Board guidelines, for the period of March 11, 1980, to October 31, 1980.

3. A knowledge of, and organization skills in the operations of a minister's office.

4. Mr. Nicholson was appointed as a county court judge for district No. 3 in the province of Nova Scotia on March 2, 1981.

HALIFAX CABLEVISION LIMITED

Question No. 2,143—Mr. Crosby:

1. To the knowledge of the government, who is the principal shareholder or shareholders of Halifax Cablevision Limited according to the records required to be kept by the Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission (CRTC)?

2. Is Halifax Cablevision Limited required under the rules and regulations of CRTC to carry the proceedings of the House of Commons and, if so, were they carried on February 19, 1981 on or after 3 o'clock p.m., Atlantic Standard time and, if not, for what reason?

3. If Halifax Cablevision Limited failed to comply with the applicable rules and regulations of CRTC, what is the penalty for the failure to comply and what action, if any, was taken to enforce the penalty?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): I am informed by the Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission as follows:

Shareholder	Common	Preferred	Per cent Vote
A. Irvine Barrow	2,250	2,250	45.0
A. Garnet Brown	2,250	2,250	45.0
J. Keith Lawton	250	250	5.0
Donald D. Anderson	250	250	5.0
	5,000	5,000	100.0

2. There is no CRTC regulation which requires that cable licensees must provide a channel for the distribution of the House of Commons proceedings. Nevertheless, in Decision CRTC 78-441 dated July 6, 1978, the commission approved an application by Halifax Cablevision Ltd. to add a special programming channel for the distribution of the House of Commons proceedings. The licensee was recently authorized by the commission to use this same channel for the carriage of children's programming ("Galaxie") when the House of Commons proceedings are not broadcast (Ref. Decision CRTC 81-120, February 16, 1981). With respect to the services distributed by Halifax Cablevision Ltd. on February 19, 1981, it is our understanding that:

(a) "Galaxie" programming was distributed between 12.30 AST and 16.30 AST.

(b) House of Commons proceedings were distributed "live" commencing at 16.30 AST, but were not shown between 15.00 AST and 16.30 AST.

(c) Question Period was distributed via tape-delay commencing at 19.00 AST.

Further, it is our understanding that, since February 23, 1981. Halifax Cablevision Ltd. has distributed "Galaxie" programming between 11.00 AST and 15.00 AST, and has distributed the House of Commons proceedings live in their entirety commencing at 15.00 AST.

3. A violation of the commission's Cable Television Regulations by a licensee renders that licensee liable to prosecution pursuant to Section 29(1) of the Broadcasting Act. This section states that:

> "29(1) Every licensee who violates the provision of any regulation applicable to him made under this part is guilty of an offence and is liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding $25,000 for a first offence and not exceeding $50,000 for each subsequent offence."

A prosecution would be a summary conviction proceedings taken before the court in the province. It has not been ascertained that Halifax Cablevision Ltd. committed an offence and no action has been taken with respect to Section 29(1) of the Broadcasting Act.

OPEN-AIR COMPLEX AT CENTRE VAUDREUIL-SOULANGES

Question No. 2,176—Mr. Herbert:

1. Does the government intend to provide to the development of an open-air complex at Centre Vaudreuil-Soulanges and, if so (a) what will be the precise location (b) does the government own the land (c) was an agreement signed with the provincial government involving any financial or other participation by the province or local municipalities?

2. What will be the intended activities at the site and on what date is the work to be completed?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: 1. Yes.

(a) Les Cèdres de Vaudreuil-Soulanges, 1677 Centre du Plein Air Avenue, Les Cèdres, Quebec.

(b) No.

(c) Yes, DREE participated in this project under the Canada-Quebec tourism development subsidiary agreement. The Department's contribution is $132,000., or 60 per cent of the project's total costs.

2. This project will promote outdoor activities such as hiking, bush survival, nature interpretation, archery, cross-country skiing and speedskating. Work has now been completed.

Order Paper Questions

RCMP—PERSON-YEARS ALLOCATED

Question No. 2,190—Mr. Herbert:

1. In each of the past five years, how many person-years have been allocated to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for duties paid in whole or in part by provinces and municipalities?

2. What was the cost to the government for the provision of this service and what amount was received from the provinces and municipalities who requested and obtained service from the RCMP?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General):

1.

Fiscal Year	Person-Years
1976/77	8,418
1978/79	9,065
1979/80	9,245
1980/81	9,406

Fiscal Year	Total cost to Government	Recovery from Provinces and Municipalities
1976/77	209,582,000	118,694,000
1977/78	242,567,000	140,866,000
1978/79	278,579,000	164,122,000
1979/80	308,894,000	186,144,000
1980/81	339,641,000	207,321,000

PUBLIC SERVICE—VACATION AND SICK LEAVE

Question No. 2,197—Mr. Herbert:

1. Is the basis for the calculation of sick leave and vacation entitlement standard throughout the public service and, if not, which group(s) have the (a) lowest (b) highest entitlement of number of days per annum of employment in each case?

2. Are records maintained on the (a) average (b) total amount of sick leave which has accrued to public servants?

3. Is there a time limit within which a public servant must use accrued vacation entitlement?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board):

1. (a) Sick Leave Accrual

Printing operations (non-supervisory) group accrues 12 days per year. All other groups accrue 15 days per year.

(b) Vacation Leave Accrual

Lowest — Ship repair (east and west) groups and printing (non-supervisory) group accrue two weeks vacation on appointment.

Highest — Postal operations (postal clerks and letter carriers) accrue seven weeks after 35 years' service.

2. Yes.

3. There is no time limit within which employees must use accrued vacation leave though employees are expected to take vacation leave in the year that it is earned subject to operational requirements. A few collective agreements provide for the payment in cash of accumulated credits on agreement of the employee and management.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE CLAIMS PROCESSING

Question No. 2,231—Mr. Halliday:

1. Are different forms used for each unemployment insurance claimant in the processing of a claim and, if so, how many?

2. Is proof of a social insurance number necessary in order to claim unemployment insurance?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): 1. The forms routinely used in the course of processing of every claim are: (a) the Application for Benefit; (b) the Record of Employment; (c) the Worksheet—for the allocation of insured earnings; (d) the Initial Decision—for preparing the necessary computer input; and (e) the Claimant's Report.

Other forms may be used, depending on the specific requirements of the claim.

2. Yes. A claimant must provide a valid social insurance number to claim unemployment insurance benefit.

PROPOSED PUBLIC HOLIDAY ON THE OCCASION OF THE MARRIAGE OF HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCE OF WALES AND LADY DIANA SPENCER, JULY 29, 1981

Question No. 2,253—Mr. Cossitt:

Is the government aware that the wedding day of His Royal Highness Prince Charles and Lady Diana Spencer, July 29, 1981, has been declared a public holiday in the United Kingdom and, if so, is the government considering taking a similar step in Canada?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): The Government is aware that July 29, 1981, has been declared a public holiday in the United Kingdom on the occasion of the marriage of His Royal Highness The Prince of Wales and Lady Diana Spencer; there are, however, no plans for having the wedding day declared a public holiday in Canada. In 1947 a similar situation arose when Her Royal Highness The Princess Elizabeth married the Duke of Edinburgh, and the wedding day was not declared a public holiday.

CBC—COMPLAINTS ABOUT PROGRAMMING

Question No. 2,254—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Does the Secretary of State receive complaints about CBC programming and, if so, in what manner are they dealt with?

2. Are such complaints referred to CBC and, if so, what action is taken?

3. Does the minister deal with any CBC errors, inadequacies, or shortcomings and, if so, under what authority?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): In so far as the Department of Communications is concerned, the reply to the above question is as follows: 1. Yes. The manner they are dealt with is described in No. 2.

2. Yes. Letters which complain about programming are acknowledged by the minister's office and transmitted to CBC for investigation and further reply.

3. The minister, as a matter of established practice, does not intervene in the management decisions which the CBC makes in respect of its programming.

CRIME STATISTICS

Question No. 2,275—Mr. Greenaway:

1. From January 1, 1979 to date, by year, how many deaths due to unnatural causes were recorded in Canada and how many were listed as (a) suicides (b) murders and involved the use of firearms?

2. For the same period, by year, how many cases of rape were reported in Canada and how many perpetrators were (a) brought to trial (b) incarcerated (c) set free either with or without bail?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Statistics Canada reports: 1. Data on deaths due to unnatural causes are collected through two different statistical programs: the vital statistics program which gathers information based on reports from death certificates provided by provincial registrars, and the homicide statistics program which gathers basic information provided by police forces across Canada. The figures from the two programs differ for two reasons: they are collected by two different means and use different definitions. According to the homicide program, homicide is defined such that it includes all suspected cases of criminal homicide (murder, manslaughter and infanticide) occurring in Canada, regardless of whether a suspect has been identified in the killing. The program does not include Canadian residents killed in other countries. The vital statistics program makes no reference to the legal terms murder, manslaughter or infanticide. Rather, deaths are classified as having been caused by injuries inflicted by another person with intent to injure and kill, by any means. The latest data available from the vital statistics program, the 1979 preliminary death statistics, are as follows:

Total deaths by unnatural causes 16,556 (Includes deaths caused by environmental events, circumstances and conditions.)

Total deaths by suicide and self-inflicted injury 3,357

Deaths by suicide and self-inflicted injury resulting from use of firearms 1,085

Total deaths by homicide and injury purposefully inflicted by other persons 583 (Includes injuries inflicted by another person with intent to injure or kill, by any means. Excludes injuries on account of legal intervention and operations of war.)

Deaths by homicide and injury purposely inflicted by other persons resulting from assault by firearms 183

Data from the homicide statistics program are as follows: in Canada in 1979 there were 579 homicide incidents in which there were 631 victims. Thirty-three percent (207) of the homicides were committed using a firearm. Of these 207 firearm homicides, 44 per cent (91) used a rifle; 22 per cent (45) used a shotgun; 25 per cent (52) involved a handgun; 2 per cent (4) involved a sawed-off rifle/handgun; and in 7 per cent (15) cases the type of firearm was not determined. The equivalent figures for 1980 are not yet available, however preliminary figures for the first nine months of 1980 show that 15 per cent fewer homicide offences were committed than during the same period in 1979. Over the past decade the percentage of homicides committed with firearms has declined from a high of 47 per cent in 1974 to 33 per cent in 1979.

2. During 1979, 3,388 rapes were reported or known to police. Nearly one third of these were adjudged by police to be unfounded (that is to say that no offence was committed), resulting in a count of 2,291 actual rapes. Due to the procedure involved in statistical tabulation of crime in Canada, these are only approximate figures.

(a) 1,110 adults and 42 juveniles were charged with rape in 1979, and the majority of these were brought to trial, but the exact number is not known.

(b) No national statistics are available on the number of persons incarcerated for a rape conviction, nor on the number of persons charged with rape and freed either with or without bail.

RETROFIT PACKAGE—OIL-HEATING EQUIPMENT

Question No. 2,283—Mr. Herbert:

1. Was a retrofit package tested in conjunction with the Canadian Standards Association to improve the efficiency of oil-heating equipment?

2. Was a publicity and promotion campaign put into operation to advise the public on the package and to inform them of the benefits of installing the equipment?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources reports as follows: 1. Yes.

2. Information on the package has been prepared and will be made available during May as part of the public information on the Canadian Oil Substitution Program.

LANGUAGE TRAINING

Question No. 2,292—Mr. Herbert:

In the past five years, what amount was spent by the Department of Employment and Immigration to provide (a) French language training to English-speaking residents of Quebec (b) English language training to French-speaking residents of all provinces and territories except Quebec (c) official language training to immigrants who are in Quebec and do not speak French or who are outside Quebec and do not speak English?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Over the past five years, the commission has purchased (a) $2,436,804 of full-time language training for English-speaking residents of the province of Quebec, (b) $2,115,722 of full-time English language training for French-speaking residents of all provinces, except Quebec, and (c)

$34,759,978 to provide official language training to immigrants in Quebec who do not speak French, and $45,363,443 to immigrants of all other provinces and territories who do not speak English.

NOTE: The expenditures set out above do not include the cost of training allowances and other income support paid to immigrants undertaking language training.

MOVEMENT OF WOOD BISON FROM ALBERTA TO B.C.

Question No. 2,294—Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth):

1. Did Parks Canada move 65 wood buffalo from Wood Buffalo National Park in Alberta to a new park on the South Nahanni River, north of Fort Nelson, British Columbia and, if so (a) at what cost (b) for what reason?

2. Are senior officials of Parks Canada or other departments flown into the park on a regular basis and, if so, for what purpose?

Mr. Roger Simmons (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): 1. The Canadian Wildlife Service moved 28 wood bison from Elk Island National Park, Alberta, to an area near Nahanni Butte north of Fort Liard, Northwest Territories. The area is near, but outside, Nahanni National Park.

(a) Approximately $12,000 (funds provided by World Wildlife Fund (Canada)).

(b) To rehabilitate the endangered wood bison on their historic range.

2. No.

TRAINING PROGRAMS FOR FORESTRY AND LOGGING OCCUPATIONS, N.B.

Question No. 2,301—Mr. Howie:

Are there government-funded training programs to train woods workers in New Brunswick and, if so, what are the details?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Yes, under the Canada Manpower Industrial Training Program, over the last three years, 106 industrial training contracts have been signed with New Brunswick employers to train 476 woods workers in such courses as: truck drivers, maintenance mechanics, heavy equipment operators, instructor training and supervisory skill development. The cost to Canada for these training programs has amounted to approximately $300,000. Further, under the Canada Manpower Training Program (institutional training), 654 persons were trained in forestry and logging occupations at a cost of $968,391.

MANUAL DEFINING FORMULATION OF EVALUATION POLICY FOR DEPARTMENTS

Did the Program Evaluation Branch of the office of the Comptroller General prepare a manual defining the basis for the formulation of evaluation policy for departments and methods by which the policy was to be implemented and, if so, is it available to the public?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): The Program Evaluation Branch of the Office of the Comptroller General is in the final stages of the editing, translation and printing of "A Guide on the Program Evaluation Function in Federal Departments and Agencies". This document will be available shortly and I will be sending a copy to all members as soon as possible. The guide does provide the basis for the formulation of departmental evaluation policies as well as guidelines and suggestions for the implementation of program evaluation.

ART BANK—RENTALS

Question No. 2,366—Mr. Nielsen:

1. Do cabinet ministers have in their personal living accommodations works of art from the Art Bank such as graphics, paintings and sculptures and, if so, as of April 1, 1981 (a) what are their names (b) what number of works were so located?

2. Was a cost incurred by the (a) Department of Communications (b) Minister of State (Mines) for such rentals and, if so, what was the cost as of April 1, 1981?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): In so far as the Department of Communications is concerned, the reply to the above question is as follows: 1. No.

2. Not applicable.

YUKON INDIAN ELDERS

Question No. 2,367—Mr. Nielsen:

Do Yukon Indian Elders now receive benefits under the Elders Program and, if so, what number receive the benefits?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Yes, Yukon Indian Elders are now receiving benefits under an "Agreement with Respect to Providing Interim Benefits to Yukon Indian Elders" between the Government of Canada and the Council for Yukon Indians. The Council for Yukon Indians indicated on April 8, 1981, that there were 355 names on their list of eligible elders.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, if questions Nos. 1,623 and 2,174 could be made orders for returns, such returns would be tabled immediately.

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the hon. parliamentary secretary have been answered. Is it the pleasure of the House that questions Nos. 1,623 and 2,174 be deemed to have been made orders for returns?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

INTERIMCO LIMITED—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Question No. 1,623—Mr. Cossitt:

1. With reference to the answer to question No. 76 in which it is stated, that assistance has been provided to Interimco Limited to bid on specific capital projects abroad and that the "projects are confidential" (a) what type of "assistance to bid" were the large sums of money spent and did this include any pay-offs to foreign agents, representatives, etc?

2. After a bid is concluded on a specific project, what are all the reasons that the project is not made public when in a number of cases government assistance from public funds run to thousands of dollars?

3. Will the government adopt a more open policy in the future and, if not, for what reason?

Return tabled.

BIO-MEDICAL RESEARCH GRANTS

Question No. 2,174—Mr. Herbert:

1. During the last year, did the government contribute to bio-medical research and, if so (a) in what amount (b) who received such grants and in what amount in each case?

2. What amount is the budget for next year?

Return tabled.

*MANPOWER GRANTS TO AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRIES ASSOCIATION OF CANADA

Question No. 2,178—Mr. Dinsdale:

1. Were delegates from Ontario to the recent Customer Counselling Seminars sponsored by the Automotive Industries Association of Canada given manpower grants and, if so, for what reason?

2. Were delegates from Manitoba given manpower grants and, if not, for what reason?

3. Which other provinces were (a) given (b) not given, such grants?

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister and Finance): Madam Speaker, the answer to starred question No. 2,178 is as follows. 1. Yes. Financial assistance was provided under the Canada Manpower industrial training program. Most of the participating firms were small and lacked the capacity to develop and operate their own training programs. The association acted as a catalyst in demonstrating to these employers the value of employee training and the assistance provided by the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission enabled them to participate.

2. No. In Manitoba, most of the member companies already receive assistance for higher priority training of a more comprehensive nature, such as auto mechanics, autobody repair and partsperson training of longer duration.

3. (a) New Brunswick Alberta
Saskatchewan British Columbia
(b) Newfoundland Quebec
Nova Scotia Prince Edward Island

*IKO INDUSTRIES LTD.—LETTERS TO BE SHREDDED

Question No. 2,224—Mr. Dinsdale:

1. Did Miss Suzanne Evans of IKO Industries Ltd. in Brampton, Ontario discover approximately 100 letters about to be shredded in that plant and, if so, were Christmas cards from the Prime Minister among those letters?

2. Did Debbie McManus, an information officer at the Gateway Postal Plant in Toronto, state "it really is a total mystery how those letters got in that recycling plant"?

3. Was an investigation of the incident carried out and, if so, what were the results?

Mr. Gary F. McCauley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, in response to starred question No. 2,224, which is a three-part question, the answer to the first part is yes; to the second part, yes; and to the third part, yes, a special investigation was carried out, but investigators were unable to ascertain exactly how this mail arrived at the recycling plant.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

The House resumed from Wednesday, April 15, consideration of the motion of Mr. Kaplan that Bill C-61, respecting young offenders and to repeal the Juvenile Delinquents Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, in speaking on second reading of this important bill, which is the first major social justice bill to come before this House in over three decades, I must say I am sorry the minister in whose name the bill stands and who will have a great deal to do with its administration and negotiations with the provinces, is not present in the House this afternoon. This minister will also have a great deal to do with the bill once it has reached committee. I find his absence not only surprising but quite appalling, particularly as the minister and the government seemed to be in such a rush just prior to the Easter recess to pull a fast one, at least in the minds of many of us, by introducing this bill at a time when he knew the justice committee was sitting on other important legislation and, to the minister's knowledge, I was away from Ottawa with some of the minister's own colleagues. As I say, I am terribly surprised he is not here this afternoon in the House to listen to the debate on this very important measure.

In speaking about the debate which took place on April 15 last, I find myself in a little bit of a predicament. There were at least four members who spoke on that afternoon who I thought did an exceptionally good job in describing some of the complex provisions of the bill and some of its implications once it goes through the House. I do not say when this bill goes through the House, or if it goes through; I say once it goes through the House, because our position in this party I am sure is crystal clear as a result of those four speeches on April 15. I am sure it is crystal clear to the government, and I hope it is clear to the people of this country that we are wholeheartedly in support of its concept.

I thought the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn), who led off for this side, did an exceedingly able job of outlining the various parts of the bill. He took a bird's eye view of the legislation; he took an overview of it. I felt, quite frankly, because of such short notice, and especially in view of the rather tricky nature in which the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) introduced the bill, indicating he thought it should go through with one or two speeches—obviously it should not—the hon. member for Saskatoon West did a very admirable job. He did such a good job I am not left with much scope this afternoon.

I thought the speech by the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby) was particularly useful to this House from the point of view of a person who has dealt in a very practical way in the courts of this country with the problems emanating from the existing legislation.

I thought the hon. member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid) added a great deal as a non-lawyer. Then my good friend and able lawyer, the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Jarvis), finished up that day's debate in a very admirable way.

I have just a few small points to make and I will not be too long. Firstly, I find it almost inexcusable that the Liberal government of the day has delayed in bringing this legislation forward. I would like to just quote one fatuous and to my mind inexcusable comment by the Solicitor General when he opened the debate on April 15 in this House in my absence. He said this:

> Because of the large number of solicitors general of Canada in the last five or six years, possibly none of them has been in a position to review the provisions and bring forward a bill which they would have been prepared to explain, defend and discuss with the provinces in the final sense.

I do not know whether the Solicitor General was speaking of his own party colleagues who had been his predecessors in the office of the solicitor general, and perhaps he was, but I am fair-minded enough to think that all of the solicitors general in this country in the last decade had a fair hand in helping to prepare this legislation. The position we arrive at today is that this legislation is almost exactly the same as the legislation I as the solicitor general put forward to the provinces and tabled in this House in the fall of 1979.

Indeed, as I go through the bill in a detailed way I find it is exactly the same as the Conservative government proposal in the fall of 1979, with only one major exception and a few minor ones. The minor exceptions are really very technical in nature and, I must say, in my mind, increase the efficiency of the bill, representing an improvement. They relate to some very minor technical details and wording in relation to the privacy of proceedings, the review of dispositions and, finally, the availability of the records of juvenile offenders. Those are the only variances with the proposal put forward by the Clark administration in the fall of 1979, with one other major exception which I will come to later.

Therefore, I find it quite exceptional, almost insulting, to have the solicitor general of this day, speaking in his opening statement in this House in respect of this first major piece of social justice legislation in three decades, attempt to take the partisan attitude he did, casting aspersions not only on me as a predecessor in that office but also on his own colleagues on his side of the House who were also his predecessors in that office.

The fact remains that the bill before the House now, Bill C-61, to all intents and purposes is the bill I had prepared in the office of the solicitor general during the summer of 1979 when I was there. I might add that I took great pains to push and give high priority to that bill to make sure the House of Commons of the day was brought up to date with what was happening, and especially to make sure that at every stage in the drafting of the bill the provinces, which are so much involved with the implications arising from this measure, and upon whom a great deal of the burden will inevitably fall, were kept informed. Certainly the bill I had prepared and the bill which has been presented by the present Solicitor General are almost exactly word for word, except for one major point. That one major point is one that to my mind represents a fatal flaw in this bill, as I have described it before.

With the permission of the Chair I hope to do something today which might correct that one fatal flaw. There are two points I want to make, and I will be very brief. The first point is that this bill will require full and complete discussion in the committee by everyone in this House who is involved with, and interested in, criminal justice in this country. But especially there must be a full opportunity in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs for provincial representatives to come with their suggestions and criticisms.

I know that one of the excuses of the government may be that negotiations and discussions with the provinces have been going on for almost a decade in relation to this reforming piece of legislation. That is true. Those discussions and negotiations have been going on, but the House should fully appreciate that this bill has implications for the provinces, for the administration of justice in the provinces and for the provincial treasuries far more than it does for the federal government, any federal government agency and, indeed, the federal treasury.

I think it will be essential that the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs of this House make sure that the provinces have a full and ample opportunity to make their cases, because they do have cases to make. There are differences. There are differing cases to make, but I think this House owes something to the people of this country, to the young people of the future who will come into conflict with the law and especially to the taxpayers of this country for whom this bill will have very great implications. There certainly must be full, ample and open opportunity for the provincial governments to come to that committee as well as—and I say this just as an obvious argument, which I am sure I do not have to make—the many semi-public and private agencies which deal with young offenders and young people in the life of this country. I hope they also have a full opportunity to come before that committee.

However, in spite of the negotiations the provincial representatives should be able to come to that committee to make their representations, because the financial implications of this bill are such that I am not too sure that the staff of the present minister really knows or understands some of those financial implications for the provinces involved.

What will be the situation, for instance, under the Canada Assistance Plan with respect to payments in relation to youthful offenders, in relation to child welfare or in relation to young people in Canada? Here in Ottawa through the Department of National Health and Welfare we are very easily able to obtain information on the total payments to the provinces for child welfare, which includes youthful offenders, amounting to almost $80 million in 1978-79. I find it very surprising that apparently nowhere in the Department of National Health and Welfare—nowhere in the federal bureaucracy, in any event, that we have been able to discover—can we yet learn just what percentage of that $80 million for 1978-79 was devoted to young people who came into conflict with the criminal law. Yet obviously a good percentage of that money was paid out through provincial administrations and down through the myriad of bureaucratic agencies at the provincial level for child welfare and for young people in Canada who have come into conflict with the criminal law. I stress again that $80 million per year. I suspect that the amount paid in transfer payments by the federal government under the Canada Assistance Plan to the provinces is higher now than $80 million per year.

Those payments will be vitally affected, obviously, by this legislation because the whole concept will be changed, and I hope somewhere along the line, if and when we receive a reply from any meaningful person on the government benches, we will learn these figures and exactly how much has been paid out, say, in the last ten years in relation to child welfare payments to the provinces under the CAP. I hope we will find out how those payments will be affected by this legislation. If the minister, the parliamentary secretary and their staff have done their homework, then obviously they will have those figures at their fingertips and will be able to give them to us.

There is another area of grave financial concern with respect both to the federal treasury and the provincial treasuries. I am sure Your Honour is aware that currently there are young offenders' special agreements with four of the provinces of this country. Between the federal Department of National Health and Welfare and the provincial governments there have been four agreements worked out over the years dealing with young offenders. There are federal government transfer payments under those agreements to the provinces to assist them in the administration of this important work.

Just in the last three years alone, for instance, New Brunswick has received $1.5 million. In just two years Yukon has received three quarters of a million dollars. In one year Quebec—and this is a partial payment only relating back over a number of years, to 1974—received over $38 million. My own home province of Ontario in just the last three years alone has received over $50 million in payments from the federal government in relation to young offenders. Again I mention these figures only to emphasize some of the financial implications—and only some of the financial implications—for the federal treasury and the provincial treasuries in relation to this particular legislation.

This is no two-bit, picayune piece of legislation. This bill is important from a social justice and social welfare point of view, and it is extremely important as well in relation to administrative and transfer costs between the federal government and the provincial governments.

Another area to which I do not think enough attention has been given by the current minister in respect of provincial cost is the whole question of provincial legal aid, which is paid for and administered by the provinces. This bill has as one of its minor-major—if I can put it in that fashion—provisions the right of young offenders to counsel. This is something which has not been detailed for them before. This is an important section of the bill. The right of young offenders to counsel is not a privilege; they have a right to be represented before the courts by counsel.

Quite frankly, I was surprised that in outlining his position in relation to this bill the minister did not deal with this, but I would like to have some idea of how this will affect the various provincial legal aid funds and the administration of legal aid across the country. Has this section and its implications for the provincial treasuries been outlined to the provinces? Do the provinces know what the federal government is getting them into in relation to this important, but necessary, piece of legislation? I do not know. We do not know because the minister has not seen fit to tell us if he knows or not, and if he knows, just what he does know.

The final point I want to make is with respect to the major fatal flaw in this legislation. As I have said, in all important respects this bill is the same as the bill prepared and made ready for introduction by the Clark administration for the winter of 1980. Indeed, it was going to be introduced, to the knowledge of the provincial governments and this House—because we said so in the fall of 1979—in the winter of 1980, if we had remained in office, except for one section, and that one section is integral to the whole bill.

The concept of this legislation is that it is a reforming piece of legislation which will be the reference piece of legislation for young people when they run afoul of the criminal law. The concept of it has to be built into what the definition of a young offender actually is, and this changes the whole set-up. Instead of varying ages across the country with the patchwork, crazy quilt-like situation that we have at the moment, in my mind I was pushing this particular bill in 1979 because the major reforming essence of the bill had to be that we wanted uniformity in the definition of what a young offender was across this country, whether in Cape Breton Island or Vancouver Island.

It is obviously essential, when you are dealing with criminal justice, that there be uniformity across this country. Otherwise, there is no reason for the federal government to be involved with criminal law, especially when the administration of criminal law is basically a provincial concern. Obviously, criminal law in this country has to be uniform. People have to be equal in the sight and in the eyes of justice when they come before the courts of this land.

One of the major defects in the system at the moment in respect of juvenile delinquents, in respect of young people when they run afoul of the criminal law, is that they are not treated equally across this country. Mr. Speaker, I bring this to your attention because I know that as a member of Parliament from the Ottawa area you have bumped into this in your constituency work. Someone aged 17 who under exactly the same circumstances commits an offence at one end of the Hull-Ottawa bridge will be treated quite differently in the eyes of the law and before the courts of the land from one who commits the same offence at the other end of the Hull-Ottawa bridge, simply because age makes a difference in the various pieces of provincial legislation which exist across this country.

At the moment, for instance, these differences exist: in the provinces of Quebec and Manitoba the maximum age of a juvenile delinquent, a young person who runs afoul of the law, is a person under 18 years. In other words, 18 is the maximum age for a youthful offender in the provinces of Quebec and Manitoba. In the province of British Columbia, the maximum age is under 17 years. In Newfoundland, where the Juvenile Deliquents Act is not applied but they have their own provincial statute, under their legislation the maximum age is 16 and one half years. In all the remaining provinces and territories the age is under 16 years.

Quite frankly, I had some tactical reasons for introducing the provision that I did when I was solicitor general under the Clark administration. Most of the provinces provide that the maximum age for a youthful offender is a person under 16 years. The majority of the provinces agree that that should be indicated as the uniform age across this country in the new legislation. That was not my doing; that was the doing of my predecessors, and I give them full credit for it. But somebody had to grasp the nettle. Someone had to come up with a uniform age. Otherwise, in my mind, the whole purpose and reason for this reforming legislation would fall to the ground.

I therefore picked 16 years as the maximum age in the legislation that I proposed in 1979. My tactical reasons for doing so were simply that that was the view of the majority of the provinces, and if in the public debate that would take place in this House and in the committee compelling and forthright reasons were put forward by those few provinces that opposed that view in a way in which public opinion and the members of this House could be swayed, then certainly we in the federal government could retreat somewhat by arriving at the compromise of 17 years. If the worst came to the worst, I was even prepared to go to 18 years. But I really did not care whether it was 16, 17 or 18 years.

The age of majority in this country, in any event, is an accident of history. There is no logic or sense behind 21, 35, 18 or 16 years in most of our statutory provisions across this country, in any event. They are usually not based on technical or scientific data. They are just stabs in the dark or grabs out of a hat. I did not care whether it was 16, 17 or 18. I will be honest with you, Mr. Speaker, I do not care to this day. But what I do care about is that all people in this country be equal in the eyes of the law. That is the fundamental principle behind this legislation, and that is why I wanted to see a uniform age.

The present Solicitor General, on his own—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Wherever he is!

Mr. Lawrence: —has changed that concept. I think he has fundamentally changed the concept that I was prepared to bring in in 1979, because he says that 18 is the age unless any of the provinces opt out. We have heard quite a bit about what a damaging and deleterious concept it is to permit provincial governments to opt out of important legislation in this country, and yet here we have the government and the Solicitor General doing just exactly that.

Mr. Nowlan: They do it when it suits their needs.

Mr. Lawrence: That is a fatuous, almost inconceivable concept, in my mind, and it destroys the fundamental essence and basis of this reforming legislation, which is to require that people are equal in the eyes of the criminal courts and the criminal law of this country, and this will continue. To my mind, the definition section is a fatal flaw, a fatal error, in this legislation. I cannot speak with any more emotion or passion or, I hope, logic in my arguments to try to convince this House that this is a fatal flaw in the legislation and that it should be changed.

I know that there are grave problems with introducing amendments on second reading in this House. It has only been accomplished once or twice before in the eight or nine years that I have been here, and one of those times I was able to do it; but it has only been done once or twice, I believe. I think that what the Solicitor General has done is destroy the essence and the main principle of this legislation, which has to be that in criminal law all people are equal in the sight of the law and in the way they are treated by that law.

I think that is a very important principle, Sir, and you do not have to take only my word for it. Very many private agencies which have studied this bill over the last few months are taking the same view. As for the provincial Bar associations, the last item to cross my desk indicated that the Manitoba Bar is taking similar points of view, that this is excellent reforming legislation except that the Solicitor General has chickened out. He has copped out. He has opted out in respect of the maximum age.

I think this question is important enough to the very essence and principle of this bill that I am now prepared to move what I would like Your Honour to accept as a reasoned amendment with respect to this bill.

• (1540)

Mr. Lawrence: This is the motion in respect of the bill; it is not a section of the bill. We are at the second reading stage now. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour):

That all the words after the word "that" be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"this House declines to give second reading to Bill C-61, an act respecting young offenders and to repeal the Juvenile Delinquents Act, because the bill rejects the fundamental principle of equal treatment of all persons before the law by specifying that the act will apply to different age groups in different provinces."

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member has moved an amendment which will be taken under consideration by the Chair.

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words about the Young Offenders Act and the way in which we treat our young people who come into conflict with our criminal justice system. As a preface to my remarks, and as the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence) will know, our spokesman on this bill, the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson), has already indicated the feelings of our party with respect to this legislation.

If the primary thrust of this legislation is to distinguish between someone called a "young offender" and everyone else under the Criminal Code, and if the Young Offenders Act will apply to a specific group of people and the Criminal Code to another, then it is elementary and quite fundamental that the act must contain a consistent definition of "young offender". I applaud the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland for his attack on a patchwork quilt notion of rights in Canada. I welcome him to our side. In my view, if the Supreme Court rules in a particular way, and if we do have a charter of rights as a result of the resolution of this House, then the failure of the act to define the concept of a young offender and the fact that someone may be subject to the Criminal Code in Ontario and not subject to it in Manitoba is clearly in breach of Section 15 of the charter. The charter makes it very clear that discrimination on the basis of age will not be allowed.

If we accept the fact that the federal government has a responsibility to define the meaning of "young offender" and the difference between someone who will be subject to the Criminal Code and someone who will not be subject to it, then it would seem to me that the making of laws with respect to criminal justice is specifically and explicitly under the jurisdiction of the federal government. I submit that all parties must accept that because it is part of the British North America Act. Even without a charter of rights I think it can well be argued—and I have personally felt this for a long time—that an anomalous definition of "juvenile delinquent" is in itself a problem with respect to our existing Constitution.

I want to spend a few moments attempting to describe for the House, as I understand it, what we are talking about here. Prior to 1908 there was, and there continues to be, a variety of child welfare acts throughout the provinces which deal with the problems of children who are deemed by their communities to be in need of control of some kind, apart from parental or familial control. The general rule is that the provisions of the Criminal Code apply to offences against it which have been committed by people regardless of their age. If one looks back to common law cases in the seventeenth, eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, it will be found that there were very unhappy experiences taking place. At that time the situation existed where children aged ten and 11 were actually hanged for stealing. The history of the criminal justice system is filled with examples of incredible injustices being done to children well below the age of responsibility and maturity. These children were punished in incredibly harsh terms under the full force of the Criminal Code because they had either committed an offence against the Criminal Code or against the common law.

At the beginning of the twentieth century there was a movement of reform which was not unique to Canada but in which Canada took part. That reform professed that we must protect children and provide a unique system of laws and a unique system of justice for them. The reform provided that children should be treated differently because they are children and because they cannot be deemed to be responsible for their actions. The concept of taking responsibility for one's actions is at the very heart of the criminal justice system in our society. The notion of responsibility and punishment only makes sense in the context of one being responsible for one's actions. That is part of the moral fibre of our system of criminal justice.

The Juvenile Delinquents Act was passed in 1908. Amendments subsequent to 1908 had a number of problems associated with them. In substituting a paternal or maternal regime for the notion of criminal responsibility, we took away some rights. Obviously rights and responsibilities go together. In a sense we substituted the beneficent state for the responsible child.

In doing so I think we did some good things and some bad things. On the good side we obviously advanced the interests of children. We kept children out of the criminal justice system until it was absolutely unavoidable on account of age. But there are problems associated with having done that, the most important of which being that the Juvenile Delinquents Act provides categories of offences which are called status offences. In other words, it matters not what you have done but who you are.

I think this concept has been expressed by members of all parties. If the juvenile court decides that a child is a juvenile delinquent because of his behaviour, social position, the crowd he hangs around with, or because vandalism has been occurring in an area that he has frequented, the court does not have to be satisfied that the child has, in fact, committed an offence; the court can decide that because the child has been hanging around when he should have been at home, he is a juvenile offender and in need of punishment of some kind or another. The concept of status offences of this kind is clearly offensive to us. It takes away from the rights of children who, after all, are just little people. It takes away from the notion of responsibility which, as I say, is the essence of the criminal justice system as it has been established.

I must say, however, that that was not the only problem which was part and parcel of the Juvenile Delinquency Act. There were many problems associated with the administration of justice and with the responsibility of the provinces which I will not get into. There were problems of detention, problems of the kind of care which you relinquish a subject to, problems of the general decline of respect for the system which all parties to the system began to feel. There were the problems that are inevitably associated with a machinery and a philosophy which was clearly out of date and unable to deal with the explosion of juvenile crime which we are witnessing in our cities today.

There are other technical problems which are of some importance and with which, it seems to me, an act would want to deal. One technical problem is what you do in the instance where someone designated by a province to be a juvenile commits or is alleged to commit an offence together with someone who is not a juvenile. In that instance you have the anomalous situation where a juvenile could be involved in a crime, which could be one of some seriousness, and would be charged and tried on the basis of the juvenile delinquency system, while the partner in the offence would be tried in accordance with the Criminal Code. I know of instances where the partner who was tried in accordance with the Criminal Code was found not guilty because the state was unable to prove its case, but the juvenile was declared to be a juvenile delinquent and was detained because the burden of proof and the rights of the accused are so different within the juvenile system and the criminal system.

There is, of course, the right granted under the Juvenile Delinquency Act for a judge to order that a case be transferred from the juvenile court to the mainstream of the criminal justice system. Indeed, that is now the general rule rather than the exception. There are many cases of 16 and 17-year-olds being taken out of the juvenile system and put into the mainstream of the criminal system just because the judge—and one could understand the reasoning behind this—said that he did not want to see an anomaly created where one person was convicted for participating in an offence while the other person was let go, even though they had both been involved.

The problem with that is that we are then, in a sense, offending the very purpose for which we established a separate juvenile delinquency system in 1908. We are saying that we accept, for the purposes of this particular act and this particular crime, because it happened to be committed with an older person, that this young person has the prerequisite sense of responsibility and the prerequisite liability to punishment. In my opinion, the problem of transfers is a fundamental one and any new bill should deal with it.

The concerns of our party have been set out very well by the hon. member for Burnaby. I want to reinforce them and to indicate that we will put forward some amendments in committee and will be having discussion there where we will expect the minister to explain the position he has put forward.

Our specific concerns are, first of all, that if we are going to have a separate system, which we all agree we should have, let us not take anything away from the positive thrust of the reforms of 1908. As the hon. member for Burnaby said, let us not go overboard toward simply writing a Criminal Code for young people under the aegis of a fiction that you can ascribe the same degree of responsibility for what are called crimes to a young person as you can to someone who has reached the age of majority. In my view there is a danger that this is, in fact, what has been done.

The declaration of principle set out in clause 3 of the bill reads as follows:

(a) while young persons should not in all instances be held accountable in the same manner or suffer the same consequences for their behaviour as adults, young persons who commit offences should nonetheless bear responsibility for their contraventions and society must be afforded the necessary protection from illegal behaviour—

I am very concerned that in a declaration of principles for the Young Offenders Act, which is a departure for this Parliament and for Canada, we fail to specify very clearly that we are also very much concerned with the welfare of the young person; that the rehabilitation of the young person is the primary object of the exercise. If we want to preserve the rights of young people when they come into conflict with the law—I will have something to say about where the Young Offenders Act falls down in that regard—we should not provide that a ten-year-old or an eight-year-old or a 13-year-old who has committed a crime should be treated as if he were as responsible as a 20-year-old. We should not be silent in the declaration of principle on the question of the primary objective of any system dealing with young people. It would be a mistake not to say that the Canadian people are concerned about ensuring that a ten-year-old is not forever held responsible and treated in the same way as a 20 or 30-year-old, or that rehabilitation is the primary objective. I believe that there is in the criminal justice system itself the notion—which is endemic to our whole system of values, our whole concept of freedom, and which we get from our religious backgrounds—that while there is life there is hope and the means of redemption, if you like, speaking in religious terms; or simply that the individual has the means to change or to erase or atone for a mistake. That should be at the very heart of our criminal justice system.

Even more should that same concept or notion be attached to the acts of a 12 or 14-year-old. They should be able to say that they are sorry, that they made a terrible mistake and would like to reform and be rehabilitated. It seems to me a major error that that notion is not in the declaration of principle. In my opinion, the notion that a young person is in all circumstances as responsible as an older person is a fiction, and it should be treated as such. It is an important fiction, because the notion that we are responsible individuals, free to choose whether we will commit wrong, is what makes the punishment system work. It is what makes our concept of rights so important. It is the notion of individuals having responsibility that makes the concept of human rights so important in our protection of that responsibility.

I want to turn next to the question of rights. The bill makes important advances. It does give certain rights. It does provide the right to counsel and the right to bail and it provides some very important rights with respect to sentencing. It does take away from the general paternal discretion which, as I said, was endemic or part and parcel of the do-gooding state notion which was part of the 1908 reform.

We have gone back on that in this act because we have something called alternative measures. Alternative measures are what the technocrats in this field call diversion. These are set out in Section 4 of the act. What diversion and what alternative measures really mean is that in certain circumstances, as soon as the kid is caught and charged, it is possible that he or she will never see the inside of a youth court. All of us might say that is a good thing. I say that is a good thing, but I question how one gets to be subject to what are called alternative measures. The idea is that you say to the child, "Look, rather than go through all this system, how would you like to engage in a form of alternative service? How would you like to be subject to a certain kind of parole regime or how would you like to be taken away from your parents"—or whatever alternative arrangement is made—"and placed under the jurisdiction of the youth court?" In other words, we will give the offender that alternative rather than having to plead guilty or not guilty.

As the hon. member for Burnaby has said, the problem is that there must be some kind of screening mechanism which protects the child and allows the child to say that he wants to plead not guilty. This is allowed in this document. It is notionally voluntary and it is notionally restricted. The concept of innocence does not exist in our criminal justice system. We have no such thing as innocence. One is simply guilty or not guilty. If a child wants to exercise his or her right to do that, it seems to me that we have to safeguard that right more than we have done as provided by the alternative measures notion.

This problem of diversion has been discussed at some length by my colleague from Burnaby and I do not want to go into it at any greater length except to say that you cannot grant rights on the one hand, and then provide for the same kind of paternalism and the same kinds of problems that have existed in the juvenile delinquency system up to the present. That seems to me to be a serious mistake.

Another instance, which has not been touched on at any length, is that the law, in giving certain rights to young people, is not in fact doing it well enough. For example, take the problem of the use of evidence. Clause 56 of the bill provides that the law relating to the admissibility of statements made by persons accused of committing offences applies in respect of young persons. Then it goes through the instances where no oral or written statement given by a young person is admissible unless the statement is voluntary; unless the person who took the statement explained in language appropriate to his age and understanding that the young person has no obligation to make a statement and that any statement may be used against him; and that a young person has the right to counsel. As well, that the young person, even before the statement is made, must be given a reasonable opportunity to consult with counsel and so on. Those things are all enumerated.

It is also said that, generally speaking, before a young person makes a statement he or she will be informed of all their rights, that they will be read out and the young person will be able to see his or her counsel before a statement is made, and unless the statement complies with these requirements it will not be admissible in the youth court. Then again, as always, the government is concerned more with administrative convenience than with the hard notion that we must take rights seriously, that if we take rights seriously they are going to be inconvenient to the state. Clause 56(3) states:

> The requirements set out in paragraphs (2)(b), (c) and (d) do not apply in respect of oral statements where they are volunteered by the young person to a peace officer or other person in authority before that person has had a reasonable opportunity to comply with those requirements.

If that paragraph is not big enough to drive a truck through, then I do not know what is. All the statements made by young people will be oral statements. All the statements, according to the police officers, will be made voluntarily. The onus clearly will be on the young person to show that the statement was not made voluntarily; that he was not told he had the right to counsel; that he was not instructed about all of those things. At age 14, a child is not going to ask to make a written statement. A child will say all sorts of things out of fear in response to the peculiar atmosphere of a police station. I think it is very odd indeed that, on the one hand, the government is pretending it is giving rights to young people, that it is providing them with the kind of protection which should be part and parcel of our legal system, while on the other hand it is doing the kind of thing which we have come to expect of the government, namely, that where obviously there must be exceptions, we let an exception be made for oral statements. As I said before, oral statements will now be the practice, as they have been in the past, as far as young people are concerned. We have really provided no protection to our young people when we pretend that is what we have done.

I mentioned that there were other problems in association with the Juvenile Delinquents Act, problems associated with the definition of what it means to be a young offender, and problems, if you like, at the age periphery where the juvenile delinquency system blends into the criminal justice system. In my view, we have offered very little guidance to our juvenile courts, our youth courts and the judges who preside over those courts as to under what circumstances we think cases should be transferred. We have provided very little protection to young people from being transferred into the criminal justice system. Not enough has been done in that regard. I would have thought this was one of the clear, rough-edged, difficult problems that we have. I admit there is no easy answer, but we have not provided anything like sufficient guidance to those people who are being asked to exercise such important discretion over the liberty of a subject of the Crown, which is really what our juvenile judges are being asked to decide.

The hon. member for Burnaby has emphasized the importance of a specified age. The hon. member for Durham-Northumberland has indicated he supports the concept of an age. I heard the Solicitor General's (Mr. Kaplan) speech on this bill. I cannot understand his reasoning or how he can talk so happily and so casually about allowing provinces to opt in or opt out with respect to certain age groups when this is the fundamental feature of the charter of rights. The notion of rights in Canada is that there are certain fundamental rights from which no province can opt out. You cannot have a country where people are being treated dramatically differently in one part of the country from another. You cannot have one criminal justice system where people in one province are treated so differently from people in another. Being treated as a youthful offender and being tried, convicted and sentenced under the criminal justice system is very different indeed. If the federal government does not have a clear notion of what the juvenile age is and what the rationale is, then I cannot understand it.

My basic preference, and this was set out by my colleague for Burnaby, would be for the youth court to have exclusive jurisdiction over dealing with all offenders up to the age of 18. The age of majority is 18. I agree with the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland that all ages such as the age of majority are arbitrary. Some of us can get very old indeed and not achieve a great deal of maturity. Other people are very mature at a young age. There has to be a standard set by Parliament. I suggest the logic clearly is that if the age of majority is 18, then we categorize people under the age of 18 as not being subject to the rigours and toughness of the Criminal Code.

Those are the essential points I wanted to make. There are some anomalies in this legislation. To put it mildly, it is regrettable that the government has chosen to introduce a new measure for our young people who, because of poverty in Canada, the decline in our sense of community, the collapse of community values and the difficulties so many young people have in finding employment, are increasingly coming into conflict with the law. It is most regrettable that the primary objective of this bill is not rehabilitation but to make children responsible for everything they do. Having said that, the government should have gone out of its way to protect the rights of young people in all circumstances. They have not done that.

The government should have done more to overcome the difficulties we have lived with for over 70 years with respect to the Juvenile Delinquents Act. It appears we are fated to continue to live with it because the government has not seen fit to deal with some of the most difficult issues. It did not say in the definition of a young offender under the age in that jurisdiction that the jurisdiction of the youth court is complete, final and absolute and it will not allow the anomalous situation of some young people being treated as criminals in some parts of Canada and others being treated differently.

I want to make one final comment. I can think of no issue that is of more importance to the people of my constituency than the question of how efficiently, fairly and well our criminal and juvenile justice systems work. Part of the frustration of everyday living is seeing one's children come into conflict with the law for any of the reasons I have mentioned. The frustration that is created is endemic to the federal system, as pointed out by the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland. This is because the federal government is responsible for the setting of the rules and the provincial governments are responsible for administering them and for funding. Frustrations are created if we have a turnstile type of justice, a revolving door in the juvenile courts.

We can understand the problems, frustration and ill-feeling toward the whole of the criminal justice system that is created. If a person's house is broken into time and time again and that person can see no end to the process, clearly the respect that person feels for the criminal justice system is limited. It leads to authoritarian responses to many other problems. On the other hand, if we have a system which deals with youth unfairly, arbitrarily or too harshly, we get into the situation where young people have no respect, not simply for the law, but for the community values which our law is said to represent.

I cannot resist saying that if we had a greater sense of community in Canada, that if we did not regard our communities simply as a place to make money off each other but as places where we treat each other with compassion and dignity, the rate of crime would decrease. Our sense of alienation from one another would decrease. The kind of injustices that meet young people would also decrease.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak on the second reading of Bill C-61, the Young Offenders Act, the repeal of the 73-year-old Juvenile Delinquents Act, and in favour of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence), on which you are yet to rule, which would in the interests of equal justice to all Canadians make one age, whether 16, 17 or 18, applied uniformly across Canada, whether in Nanaimo or St. John's, Newfoundland.

Before getting into my main remarks, may I, as did my colleague for Durham-Northumberland, express my concern about the fact that the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) did not even bother to join us this afternoon, nor indeed has his parliamentary secretary. Looking at the government benches, I see no cabinet minister present this afternoon for discussion of a very important bill. Perhaps I might be permitted to quote the Solicitor General who, on April 15, was lecturing the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland for being unavoidably absent from the chamber. I quote:

—the top priority of the members of Parliament should be to attend to the requirements of this chamber.

That is what he said, with servitude. I must confess that my annoyance is doubtless aggravated by the fact that the Solicitor General last month led my office to believe that this bill would not be discussed on April 15 in the absence of the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland and myself. In fact, the bill was called on that day when both of us were absent from the chamber. Five members of my party spoke on second reading on April 15 and today. I will try to avoid repeating what they have said.

First, however, let me agree strongly that the outgoing Juvenile Delinquents Act is anachronistic today for many reasons. For one thing, it is a basic precept of our justice system that proscribed conduct must be clearly stated; but your child or mine, Mr. Speaker, could be found delinquent under the Juvenile Delinquents Act omnibus section for the vaguest type of conduct, such as sexual immorality or even for being uncontrollable, incorrigible or unmanageable. In short, status offences for juveniles and conviction by courts on a whole range of undefined acts were commonplace.

For another, the Juvenile Delinquents Act is replete with legislative foolishness. For example, one provision, which authorizes the waiver of serious charges such as murder against a juvenile, requires, among other things, that it must be first established to the satisfaction of a juvenile court judge that transfer is in the best interests of the juvenile, since in an adult court he or she will face adult sanctions. It has long seemed to me that it can logically never be in the best interests of a child—I am not talking here about the interests of society—to be transferred. The legal contortions necessary for a judge to waive must be enormous in view of the way that important provision in the Juvenile Delinquents Act is worded.

Where is Canadian society just now in terms of crime committed by juveniles? Only last week, in talking with about 30 high school students in an inner city high school in Edmonton, the following points, among others, emerged, and this astounds me. The school I am speaking about, like five others in the city of Edmonton, has a full-time policeman every school day during the year, and has had since last year. Last year in a corridor a teacher was stabbed in the knee. I am told that recently there has been a problem with drugs, including hard drugs, and even some juvenile prostitution in that school. Two students told me of separate incidents in which different children under ten years of age had stolen items from neighbourhood homes. These occurrences took place at one school in one western Canadian city, not in New York or Detroit.

What is happening elsewhere across Canada? I do not quote very often from members of that other place, especially Liberal members, but Senator Florence Bird was quoted in a current issue of Maclean's magazine on this subject. She was speaking of violent crime statistics in Canada and is reported as follows:

What is particularly scary (about violent crime statistics in Canada) is the 60 per cent increase in violent juvenile delinquency from 1974 to 1978. Most shocking of all is the increase of violence by the young against themselves. In the past decade the suicide rate increased 59 per cent for young people aged 15 to 19.

Even more alarming, in my view, is the situation in respect of young people south of the border. I think it is clear that what is happening in the United States has had a bearing on much of what is contained in this bill. What is currently happening there frequently is an indication of what will be happening in Canada in five or ten years.

Let me read a few quotations from a book entitled "Criminal Violence, Criminal Justice" by Charles Silberman, published in 1978. Silberman is a layman who spent six years examining the crime epidemic in his country, and he has produced, in my opinion, an extraordinarily perceptive work, as perhaps only a layman could do. For example, he states at page 34:

—the youth culture emerged (in 1960s) as a major socializing force, taking over a large part of the burden traditionally carried by parents, teachers, clergymen and other adults.

Still on page 34 he states:

Initiation into heroin use is a phenomenon of youth: Two users in three begin using the drug between the ages of 15 and 21, with the great concentration occurring at age 18—

At page 35 he states:

—a teenager's status often depends on the ability to buy the "right" records and wear the "right" clothes. The adolescent need for money, combined with the weakening of adult social controls, has provided a lethal crimogenic force.

At page 311 he states:

The problem is not that juvenile courts are too lenient, but that they are too lenient toward the wrong people—

Mr. Silberman in his chapter on juvenile justice quotes from Judge William White, a juvenile court judge in Chicago speaking on this subject, as follows:

But looking at the (juvenile justice) record I am reminded of the Peanuts cartoon showing him sadly leaving the ball field with the scoreboard showing "Visitors 99, Home Team 0". "Ugh", he says, "How could it happen when we were so sincere."

Let me quote again from page 354 as follows:

In most states, juvenile court jurisdiction ends at age 18, since 16 and 17-year olds account for more than half of all juvenile arrests for violent crimes and 45 per cent of burglary arrests, that two-year difference in the age of jurisdiction, (between New York State with 16 and states having 18 as the age of majority) has an extraordinary impact on the number of cases that come before a juvenile court and on the way these cases are handled—

Finally, let me come to the more specific aspects of this bill and mention some of my major concerns. First, I would speak on the ages contemplated in Bill C-61. The minimum age for the youth offenders act criminal responsibility is to be 12 years rather than seven as in the old Juvenile Delinquents Act, as I think other speakers have mentioned. Obviously the provinces are expected to enact their own legislation to deal with barred conduct by children between the ages of seven and 12, and to pay all related costs. I was told just a few minutes ago, and I am afraid I must agree, that today there are in fact some children between the ages of seven to 12 who do commit serious crimes. Can all the provinces with their different financial situations be expected to absorb these related costs? Will there be a judicial checkerboard, to use that now familiar phrase, caused by this federal initiative?

The maximum age for liability under the youth offenders act is to be 18 years, subject to reduction at the request of an individual province to 16 or 17. As you know, Mr. Speaker, our government proposed a uniform maximum age of 16 years, subject to accepting a higher age of 17 or 18 only if all provinces agreed. The hon. member for Durham-Northumberland mentioned this. This is why there is now an amendment before the House, and I am pleased to speak in support of it if you rule it to be in order.

This concept will be a major source of federal-provincial controversy. Obviously that is the case. Alberta and Ontario, which use the age of 16 as a cut-off, obviously want this to remain, in part because of the large cost of the administrative implications, particularly if the juvenile net is widened to include 17 and 18-year-olds. This could result in more of their youth residents going to youth detention centres, those who are now subject to adult sanctions and corrections.

I wish someone opposite could tell me, through you, Mr. Speaker, whether the federal government is being conciliatory to the provinces only because it wishes to avoid increased costs. Why otherwise is the government now tolerating a checkerboard Canada in the justice field? Different standards of programs in different provinces for youth are certainly going to remain as a result of this measure, and obviously poorer provinces will continue to have inferior programs because of their tax bases.

I am told that evidently the Solicitor General does not want one age, as we propose, because this would cause a confrontation with the provinces. In view of what the federal government has done recently in terms of confronting the provinces in matters involving, in some cases, their exclusive jurisdiction, I can only say that this is a laugh. I would remind him that his duties or responsibilities under the existing Constitution include criminal law, so nobody can complain that he is invading provincial spheres here by having one age, such as we can and do when he invades areas of exclusive provincial responsibility under the constitutional proposals.

The point mentioned by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) was that Section 15 of the charter of rights, if found legal by the Supreme Court, would ban discrimination on the basis of age, among other things. It seems self-evident that any differences in age under this bill would be struck down by the courts. Because of the particular wording chosen in Section 15, I seriously wonder as well if any age chosen would not similarly be struck down as being unconstitutional discrimination against young people on the basis of age. I have a strong feeling that no one on the other side has thought about this point.

In respect of the matter of youth records, this bill requires the destruction of these records after a crime-free qualifying period, presumably on the basis that many young persons would not in practice apply for the same without the automatic feature. In fairness, I must say that in our proposal in 1979 the records would have been sealed, with limited access for research purposes.

Another point is that the right of youths to counsel at all stages of proceedings is proposed in the bill, and I favour that strongly; but will the courts interpret this to mean the right to duty counsel alone or to more? Once again, the various legal aid plans in this area will presumably differ, as now, substantially across the country. Are we giving equal justice to all young people in that sense?

The important matter of diversion is left essentially to provincial choice. Would it not be wiser to lay out some clearer criteria or standard so that the concept carries, hopefully, the same substance throughout the country? Why should diversion be allowed in one province and not in the next, if what we are dealing with here is a matter of exclusive federal responsibility for the criminal law?

At present under the Juvenile Delinquents Act violations of provincial and municipal statutes constitute Juvenile Delinquents Act offences. No more, of course, under this bill. Only breaches of the Criminal Code and other federal statutes and regulations will be the bases for conviction under this legislation. Should there not, therefore, be at least some phasing-in time available for the provinces wishing to enact complementary legislation? It seems to me self-evident that there should be a phasing-in period for such provinces.

I come now to what I consider to be the most controversial part of the bill, and I stress that I am speaking for myself alone on this and not for my party. I have a feeling that a large number of Canadians would share my concerns about the feature in the bill which would completely revoke the concept of vicarious liability of parents or guardians which existed under Section 22 of the Juvenile Delinquents Act in favour of making only youths themselves responsible—including financially—for their acts.

Up until now, if a group of rampaging young people—I will not give them a sex—broke into a school or community hall and reduced the windows or whatever to rubble, a juvenile court had the authority to impose damages on their parents where it found that the parents in effect had contributed to the offence "by neglecting to exercise due care of the child." It strikes me that assuming such a feature is, and was, constitutionally valid as being incidental to Parliament's criminal law power, a great many Canadians will want it to remain for suitable, special circumstances. In fairness, the proposal of my colleague, the solicitor general of the time, the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland, in 1979, would also have eliminated possible parental liability, but personally I am not at all persuaded that such a feature should not be added to this bill, presumably in committee. I see that at least one of my colleagues other than the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland supports that view.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Split.

Mr. Kilgour: Indeed, on the basis of my limited experience with juvenile crime I think it would be a serious mistake to remove it. I know that some will say that society could always proceed against parents under a "contributing to juvenile delinquency" section, which I gather is to be added to the Criminal Code in the future, but why not leave this string in the legislation's bow as well? I am not saying it has to be used often, but I think this should be available.

Someone said the other day that the cost-sharing aspects—as an economist, Mr. Speaker, you would appreciate this—of the bill are likely to consume at least two weeks of committee time alone on this bill. I agree. This is, of course, because the bill revokes—I think this is important—the transfer of jurisdiction over youths made by the Juvenile Delinquents Act to the provincial sphere, thereby making the provinces no longer eligible in law for the $65 million or so they now receive yearly for shared-cost juvenile services under the Canada Assistance Plan. It is true that clause 69 of the bill authorizes new financial arrangements with the provinces at the discretion of Ottawa, and there may be some naive folk on this side or the other—not that we have any naive folk on this side—who believe that the levels of financial support present since 1965 or 1968 will continue.

I note that a minister is present now. I ask those opposite who have responsibility what incentive rests with the Solicitor General to enter into any such agreements now if this bill is passed. Surely the government—or the minister—should be up front enough to state its intentions publicly in this regard, at least so that perhaps it might have something it could renounce later on.

There are other aspects of the bill which are worthy of comment—I will not take up the time of the House because I know there is a large number of people who want to speak—including its detention and bail features, transfer to adult court provisions, privacy of proceedings, disposition of cases, release from custody, review of dispositions, appeals, fingerprinting and photographs, but I believe I touched earlier on the major areas of appropriate public concern. Hopefully this debate will serve to have interested Canadians everywhere, including members of Parliament, take a careful look at this very important measure.

In closing, I might say that if any member of the public hearing or seeing me wishes to appear at the committee hearings, I would be grateful if he or she would let any of my party colleagues or myself know as quickly as possible.

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, as a lawyer I am interested professionally in this piece of legislation. As a parent—indeed, as a grandparent—I am personally affected by the legislation. It behooves us all as Canadians to be interested in legislation affecting the youth of our country. It is for that reason I am particularly pleased to be able to join in the debate on this bill dealing with the proposed Young Offenders Act.

While I am in large part in support of the bill, I cannot accept the position of the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) that we must rush through the debate at second reading. As the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence) this afternoon shows, there is no legislation which cannot be improved, and this legislation is no exception.

Having said that, I note that this legislation has been long in coming. We have been reminded of that fact several times already. I should not belabour that particular point, but I would like to point out that the Juvenile Delinquents Act as we know it has been in effect for 52 years. We should pay some tribute to those who have been charged with the responsibility of administering that act.

I would be remiss if I did not join my colleagues in this House in stating that we owe a debt to the juvenile justice community. It is a credit to the juvenile court process, juvenile court justices, law enforcement personnel, social workers and, indeed, the provinces that serious and widespread injustices to the youth of this country have not taken place. The potential for abuses and injustices has been there and present over that long period of time, and it is refreshing and encouraging in these troubled and divisive times to see that that justice community has performed and is performing in an exemplary manner.

Although we in the Progressive Conservative party are not examining this bill in a partisan manner, it would be unfair if we did not mention the fact that, in relation to the proposed Young Offenders Act, we in this House owe to the predecessor of the Solicitor General, the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland, some credit for the legislation now being introduced. The Clark government made the Young Offenders Act a priority order of the day, and I cannot help but feel that in so doing it gave much impetus to the Solicitor General to bring forward the legislation now before us.

I must also add that I am disappointed that the minister responsible for the administration of this act is not present in this House as we debate his bill.

Legislation concerning a large segment of our population, or as large a part of it as this group represents, permits endless tangential discussions that can cause us not only to lose sight of the issue, but to cloud the issue to the extent that the good is lost with the bad. Consequently, I wish to discuss some of the measures specifically and make some general comments with respect to the process.

The Young Offenders Act has much to recommend it, particularly in the strengthening of the alleged offender's rights and the formalizing of a diversion procedure. It is hard to believe that in 1981 we are only just coming into the right of appeal, the right of legal representation, and the right to a sentence review for our young people. It is also surprising that our judges have had to govern their courts without the benefit of formal procedures and the benefit of meaningful sentencing options. Recognizing this fact, and recognizing that in this matter of sentencing options diversion is long overdue for formal sanctioning, I am at a loss to understand why the proposed act is as vague as it is.

Under the Juvenile Delinquents Act, an alleged offender would, so to speak, have his or her day in court. But in many of those instances, that day in court was not necessary, nor was it even desirable, and the judge had to take it upon himself to assume that responsibility of indicating an alternate course of action. Now, under the proposed legislation, alleged offenders would be given the opportunity, if one wants to be optimistic for the moment, to bypass the court by accepting a prescribed punishment. This implies, naturally enough, that guilt is not in question and that the crime is not a serious one. Bill C-61 does not set out definite or specific guidelines to follow for diversion. Hence, a youngster could be coerced into accepting an alternative measure rather than appearing in court, and perhaps, if he had appeared in court, being found not guilty. I recognize the words in Bill C-61, and I trust the committee will take another look at Section 3 of the act.

The number of sentencing options have a similarly vague application. Under Section 20, subsection (1), the judge would be given ten definite sentencing options, or if there was no conflicting combination of each, an added eleventh permitting the court to "impose on the young person such other reasonable and ancillary conditions as it deems advisable and in the best interest of the young person and the public". Now, that is faith, indeed! Further, despite the wide range of sentencing options available, there are no provisions in the act indicating, let alone stating, which offences should receive which degree of sentencing. This quandary may well return us to the current state of affairs, as indicated by one of the earlier speakers, as well as that facing judges in days gone by under the previous Juvenile Delinquents Act.

These two areas, sentencing and diversion, are essentially good ones simply in need of sharper definition. The same cannot be said for the lack of a uniform maximum age. I want to address this issue as others have done before me.

We have recently concluded, for the moment, a very lengthy and, yes, tiring debate on the Constitution. We heard repeatedly from the government benches that any checkerboard concept was an abomination, something to regard as anathema. Now we are being told by the Solicitor General that there is consensus today that uniformity of standards and law should be extended throughout the country. But what do we find in this proposed legislation? An accommodation of individual provinces which have expressed different positions with respect to the maximum age.

The Solicitor General goes on in his March 14 speech to state that this position reflects the different services and resources of the various provinces for dealing with young offenders. On April 15 he added that it also reflected differing philosophies with respect to the age of maturity. Mr. Speaker, this concern of differing attitudes, resources and services leaves me not just a little concerned and confused. Surely, as Canadians, there should be a uniform application of the Criminal Code right across this land of ours, and just as surely young Canadians wherever they live should be entitled to the same benefits and be subject to the same restrictions and responsibilities that this act provides.

The confusion is augmented when one considers the raising of the minimum age for criminal responsibility from seven to 12 years. I support this change. All of us do. Most if not all the previous speakers have supported it, as have eight of the ten provinces. Two provinces did not support this change, yet the Solicitor General did not allow this to prevent him from introducing a uniform minimum age. Why, may I ask, was there not the same insistence that there be a uniform maximum age?

I do not enter into any partisan approach. My concern with the lack of uniformity on the maximum age does not lie with my constitutional quarrel with this government, but with the rights of our young people. The charter of rights, Section 15, prohibits discrimination on the basis of age. How could the Young Offenders Act fail to violate that section, that clause, this right, when a 17-year-old could be treated differently in one province as opposed to another?

If nothing can be done to implement uniformity, then I think that the committee should consider alternate means of ensuring a youth's equality before the law. Perhaps an "overage" youth in one province could be permitted to apply to a court in another province that treats the youths of his age. I recognize the problems of bureaucracy, the expense; but I urge careful examination of that uniformity clause or alternates to meet the need of equal application of the law in any province of this country.

Of supreme importance is close and meaningful liaison with the provincial authorities. This act will increase the burden of the various child welfare acts of the provinces by adding to them a whole new category of children, those between seven and 12 years of age. As well, the proposed legislation has dropped all provincial and municipal laws, bylaws, and ordinances from their domain, leaving them within the provincial authorities. Without liaison work, we shall create a judicial morass that could take years to untangle. I trust the committee will be cognizant of that fact when it enters its consideration of these clauses.

Those are primary concerns with the proposed legislation. There are other points of lesser importance, but they are worth mentioning at this stage. The maximum fine of $1,000, for example, strikes me as being high. Remember we are talking of persons under the age of 18. We do not want to encourage another crime to pay off a previous one. The review procedure is potentially bureaucratic in nature. It is a bureaucratic monster with automatic reviews, optional reviews, progress reports and supplementary progress report material. The juvenile courts had to deal with almost 91,000 cases in 1978. Multiply whatever percentage of that number you like as qualifying for a review, or for a review of a review, and you have created tons of paperwork and an abundance of bureaucratic work.

Finally, I think the destruction of the criminal record after a qualifying period of good behaviour is a welcome change. But, as a legal community colleague of mine pointed out to me, employment application forms are slowly switching to the question: "Have you ever been charged with a criminal offence?" This problem would perhaps be best addressed by amendments to the human rights legislation both at the federal and provincial levels. These criticisms and recommendations are all matters that I would like to see the committee discuss seriously.

The proposed Young Offenders Act, as I said earlier, has far more in it to recommend than to criticize. It provides the three basic elements that the Progressive Conservative party believes to be imperative: young offenders have been charged with a greater responsibility for their actions, they have been given stronger rights under the law, and there is greater flexibility in, and therefore greater hope for, rehabilitation options. We also welcome the end of the so-called status offences—the omnibus charge of delinquency. These "offences" smeared our youth with a broad brush and have rendered the words "juvenile delinquent" odious in connotation. Our young people have difficulty enough without having labels applied to them that live long past the age of majority.

I would like to commend the Solicitor General for the submission of this legislation. Subject to the comments I have made today, I support the legislation. I am sure the committee will examine the reservations I have put forward with serious intent. Let us hope that we can better this legislation in the future as it affects our community, not only for today but for tomorrow. Having waited 52 years for change is far too long.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave)—Western Development Fund—Improvement of insufficient water supplies; the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Jelinek)—Automotive Industry—1. Results of Canada-United States ministerial discussions—Appeal for restrictions on imports. 2. Future of Canada-United States auto pact; the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie)—Health and Safety—Use of Dalkon shield intrauterine devices.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Kaplan that Bill C-61, respecting young offenders and to repeal the Juvenile Delinquents Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my participation in this debate will be confined to one or two aspects of the bill and, principally, to omissions in the bill. I do not know whether these omissions were deliberate or an oversight, but I propose to deal with them when the time comes.

The previous intervener mentioned the odium connected with the title "juvenile delinquent". We welcome the change of that title to "young offender". I think it is a step in the right direction in ensuring that those misguided young people who do have confrontations with the law will not carry with them for all time the obloquy of being designated a delinquent. It has a pejorative meaning. "Young offender" is a better designation.

Under the Juvenile Delinquents Act there were very important provisions, some of which have already been mentioned, with respect to parental involvement in making restitution. I think the principle of restitution is a valid one. Perhaps when we get to committee it will be possible to make amendments to the provisions of the Young Offenders Act to ensure that there is adequate parental responsibility assigned.

My principal concern is with the failure to make any reference whatsoever in the Young Offenders Act to provisions which were made in Section 20 of the Juvenille Delinquents Act. That section deals with the options open to the court to deal in a fatherly, parental or guiding fashion, if you like, with delinquents who may have been involved, for good reason or bad, or as a result of peer pressure, in activities which brought them before the court. Under the present act the courts are able to deal with the youthful offender either by diverting them to probation officers or by ensuring that they return to their parents, fosters homes or other institutions which will keep them out of the court system. The court can take this action under the existing legislation without having the youthful offender carry with him for all time the stigma of being labelled a delinquent for having had a confrontation with the law, for having gone through what must be a very unsettling process. The process sometimes brings out the very worst in the youth. It causes him to overreact and before you know it he is back in the hands of the law again.

The provisions of the young offenders bill provide for three different groups of individuals who may be dealt with in one form or another. Presumably, there are those who up to the age of 12 will be dealt with under provincial law. I say "presumably" because it is not clear in my mind that there is a consistent method of dealing with youthful offenders right across the country—those under the age of 12. Someone mentioned an offence which could be committed by someone at one end of a bridge spanning the Ottawa River, and another person committing the same kind of offence at the other end of that bridge would be dealt with in a totally different manner. This could occur in other jurisdictions where there are provincial boundaries involved.

There are financial implications of the administration of that law which would be solely and wholly borne by the provinces for offences committed by those under the age of 12. Has that been made absolutely clear to the provincial attorneys general? We are not sure of that and I think we will want to clear that matter up in the committee. We will want to be sure that representatives of the attorneys general departments across the country have an opportunity to go before the committee, to make their cases in law and to make their cases in financial terms as well. That is absolutely essential. At the same time, it may very well be possible to harmonize, if not make common law, across this land for offenders under the age of 12.

It is not generally recognized, and I suppose it is not all that easy to state, that if one looks at crime, disregarding for the moment motor vehicle incidents or confrontations with the law, from 50 per cent to 60 per cent of crime is committed by juveniles. We do not like to face this fact, because our police are expected to be the great sturdy men that they are. I know from experience in my own community that they are community workers. More power to them for that. They are not to be denigrated on that account but should be praised. They deserve all our praise for responding to that community effort in dealing with young offenders.

In one particular municipality in my riding, about 70 per cent to 80 per cent of incidents of breaking the law, disregarding motor vehicle incidents, are committed by persons considered to be juveniles. In another area where 6,800 offences were reported with only 1,100 apprehensions, 55 per cent of those apprehensions were of juveniles. Those were followed by convictions, so that means that out of the 6,800 offences committed, only 500 of the 1,100 apprehensions involved crimes known to have been committed by juveniles. By extrapolating, one could say that of the 6,800, perhaps 3,600 or even 4,000 of the offences committed and reported were committed by juveniles.

Those who are administering the law are concerned on two scores. They are concerned by the absence in the young offenders bill of some means of dealing with them other than through the courts; of not having them committed firmly to a confrontation with the law. There must be some way of dealing with those offenders between the ages of 12 and 17 other than through confrontation with a judge in the solemn dignity of a court procedure. That absence could be rectified in the young offenders bill.

Once this has been discussed with the administrators of the law in the provinces and they agree that this particular lacuna should be closed, that there should be a provision in the new legislation to deal in a more gentle way with those offenders who can be shown to have become involved in their confrontation with the law for reasons that were not long-term criminal but were, rather, usually in response to a challenge, I hope there will be an opportunity to rectify matters. What child will not respond to a challenge, to a dare? These "crimes"—and I put the word in quotation marks—can be eliminated from the system and dealt with under the provisions of Section 20 of the Juvenile Delinquents Act, but there is no method that I can see in the Young Offenders Act to deal with them in a softer manner.

I agree entirely with the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence) that one of the great failures in the bill before us is its refusal to face the need for an upper limit on that second category of miscreants or offenders above the age of 12 and up to the age of 16, 17 or 18. We must fix that age. That is the second group of individuals dealt with in a special way. Beyond that age they are assumed to be of the age of responsibility and will face the consequences of their acts under the criminal law if they have committed a crime, or under other aspects of our law.

To go back to the statistics that I cited a few minutes ago about the preponderance of crime committed by those who are under age, whatever that means, a good number of these are in the age bracket of ten, 11 and approaching 12. That is a dreadful thing to have to admit. I do not derive any satisfaction whatsoever from stating that young criminal elements are being developed at that age, but it is the case; there is no question about it. I have this on the most firm authority of those who deal with young offenders on a day to day basis and who can see the formation of the chronic criminal prior to the 12-year-old limit set in the new bill. I wonder whether 12 is the correct age to insert in this bill.

I have said, of course, that the provincial legislations across the country will be dealing with the pre-12-year-old, but since there is no assurance that this aspect will be dealt with in a consistent fashion from one coast to the other, perhaps there is a case to be made, which can be made in committee. We could reduce the requirement of age 12 to, say, that of age ten if the experience of other administrators of the law, parole officers and those who are dealing with the corrective aspects of youthful misbehaviour, can prove that it is a critical age and that it is an age group that might better be dealt with under the provisions of the Young Offenders Act. I would like to see not only representatives of the Attorney General before the committee, but also those who have been dealing with the young offenders in family court and in the parole system and so hear their experience directly. This may enable us to make the necessary amendments to make the act not only a better one but one which will be uniform in application across the country.

One of the criticisms levelled at the act is the media treatment which has been given to it. Not long ago there was a suggestion, whether in a headline or in the text of an article, that the new laws coming into effect for juvenile offenders would be tougher; in other words, more severe. This, of course, raised the expectations of those members of the community who felt the law is not tough enough because there is altogether too much vandalism and vandals are able to get away with their misdeeds. Raising the expectations of the general public in this way is a media abuse. I do not know whether it was deliberately done on the part of the government to indicate that it is really out to crack down on juvenile delinquents, or whether it was just the manner in which the statements, publications or documents issued by the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) were considered by the press.

An ancillary comment made through stories in the media was that juveniles would now have the right to appeal. In my province this right exists today. There is no need to suggest that some new provisions will come into effect when those provisions already exist. The right to appeal is certainly one of them. There are provisions in my province also for retaining a lawyer to assist youthful offenders under the legal aid system. This bill before us now provides that youthful offenders will have lawyers. That is not new, nor should it be broadcast as new. Perhaps I am speaking solely about my province. Perhaps the right to legal counsel does not exist in other provinces. But this particular provision, provided that we get the age spread correct under which the offender does have the right to legal counsel, is not all that new, and it is a mistake to characterize it as though it were.

There is a definition in the Juvenile Delinquents Act which defines a child. A child is any boy or girl apparently or actually under the age of 16 years or such other age as may be directed in any province pursuant to subsection (2). The definition of a child in the bill before us means a person who is, or, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, appears to be under the age of 12. The definition of a child is a person under the age of 16 in the existing law and under the age of 12 in the proposed bill.

Another criticism brought to my attention is that no provision is made within this bill to ascertain the age which determines whether the offender falls within provincial jurisdiction as being under the age when he would fall under this particular bill, or whether he should fall under this bill. There is no provision either for the parent or the guardian to be notified that his child or his ward has been charged with an offence.

In this respect I suppose this bill is intruding into the affairs of the family in a manner which I think is quite unacceptable. When any member of a family under that legal age—yet to be determined either 16½, 17 or 18—is charged with an offence, surely it is right and proper that the parent or guardian of that young person should be notified of the offence charged. I think it only right and proper also that the parent or guardian should be required to appear in the court to attest to the age of the child by whatever means he has at his disposal. The offender may be 11 years and ten months. This bill refers to a person who is, or, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, appears to be under the age of 12 years. How is evidence of age obtained? There is no requirement that evidence be obtained. There is provision within the existing bill to obtain that evidence. The parent or guardian is required to show that the offender is of the age required to be dealt with under this particular measure. I think that matter ought to be corrected as well.

One final matter worries me somewhat. It is related to the earlier ones and I draw the attention of the House to it. In my opinion, it will be worth examining in greater detail in committee. Specifically, I am speaking of clauses 71, 72 and 73 of the bill which deal with amendments to the Criminal Code. Sections 12 and 13 to the Criminal Code are repealed and Section 12 is replaced by a provision which introduces the 12-year age limit again. Clause 71 removes a provision from the Criminal Code which deserves to remain in some way or other. I would like to read Section 13 of the Criminal Code because of the loss of that particular provision as a result of clause 71. I read Section 13 of the Criminal Code:

> No person shall be convicted of an offence in respect of an act or omission on his part while he was seven years of age or more—

That, of course, is going up to 12.

> —but under the age of fourteen years, unless he was competent to know the nature and consequences of his conduct and to appreciate that it was wrong.

It is that final section to which I allude and which has a role to play in any matter where offences are committed against society or against another person. I quote it again so that we will be reminded of it:

> —unless he was competent to know the nature and consequences of his conduct and to appreciate that it was wrong.

Are we going to eliminate that notion of rightness and wrongness from our law, the element of moral responsibility which we should be inculcating in our young people? The young person will say that because it is not there, there is no need to worry whether it is right or wrong, the judge will decide.

This is a matter of moral responsibility. Like many other things in our society in the past ten or 12 years, the transformation is being brought about in the moral attitudes of people toward one another and to their society by changes such as this. I deplore the loss of that phrase. I feel it must be restored somewhere within the law. Not only I but social workers with whom I have spoken about this matter are prepared to attest that youthful offenders are competent to know that some of the offences they commit are wrong. They should not be discouraged from judging in their own mind the rightness, wrongness and consequences of what they are planning, are in the course of, or have performed.

Those are the comments I wish to make at this stage. I hope that when the bill goes before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, as those who have spoken before me have mentioned, there will be an opportunity to have brought before us representatives from the attorneys general of the provinces and possibly from the provincial finance departments so that they will be able to judge the fiscal implications of the bill. I implore those who will be sitting on this committee to make arrangements so that the administrators of the law, those in a position of responsibility and guidance, such as parole officers and those who have concern for these young people, who see where they are going wrong and how they can be helped, will have an opportunity to appear before the committee and make their case and help improve this bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): An amendment was proposed earlier by the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona. The Chair wishes to advise hon. members that the amendment is found to be in order. Consequently I will read it and then debate can proceed. Mr. Lawrence, seconded by Mr. Kilgour, moves:

That all the words after the word "that" be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"—this House declines to give second reading to Bill C-61, an act respecting young offenders and to repeal the Juvenile Delinquents Act, because the bill rejects the fundamental principle of equal treatment of all persons before the law by specifying that the act will apply to different age groups in different provinces."

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to hear you rule that the amendment submitted by the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence) is in order. I know there is general support for this legislation. At the same time I recognize that there are some inherent problems in the provisions and sometimes the language of the bill. Therefore, it would be good if members of the House would support this amendment in order that it might be drafted in a better form and have more acceptable support from hon. members.

Members who have been here for at least the past five years will know that I have had a continuing interest in legislation dealing with the welfare of children and young people, as well as legislation that would protect the sanctity of the home. Therefore, I welcome this legislation, which has some aspects of reality in it. I hope it will provide some measures to deal with some of the problems we face in our society and some of the problems our young people face.

I begin by reiterating what some others have pointed out. There is a shift of emphasis in the title. Rather than speak about juvenile delinquents, we will now speak of young offenders. I see both an up side and a down side to that. There was a time when a young person involved in criminal activity was called a criminal. That is what he was, even though he was young. Society determined that because of the person's youth, it was not wholesome for someone 12, 14 or 16 years of age to be labelled a criminal, so a softer definition was given to his activity. He became a juvenile delinquent. After years of having this term heaped on young people, it is now a term of opprobrium and is no longer acceptable. It is a term of disgrace. We will now redefine what originally was a criminal and call him a young offender rather than a juvenile delinquent. I would point out that the behaviour has not necessarily changed. It is the definition of that behaviour which has changed. We really have not addressed the problem that that young person is facing.

While I welcome the change in title, I see an up side and a down side. Simply changing the definition will not solve the problem. It will not make that young person feel better about himself. That young person will feel rotten inside not because of the term "juvenile delinquent" or "young offender" which is attached to him, but because he has done something wrong. The best favour we can extend to that young person is to help him face the reality that he has done something wrong, not to soften the definition of what he has done or of what kind of person he is.

Maybe some kind of reality therapy is what we ought to prescribe because he is in fact a young criminal. To call that person a young offender may, ironically in terms of the government's legislation, go some distance to meet that need because it is no longer advantageous to call him a delinquent. The term "delinquent" is a pretty soft term. That is why it was written that way. The person is actually an offender if he has offended the law and offended society. Calling such a person a young offender is actually a little closer to reality than calling him a juvenile delinquent. I see some value in redefining the term and calling the legislation young offenders legislation rather than the Juvenile Delinquents Act.

• (1730)

That leads me to a second point by way of introduction. In far too many instances we have tried to soften our criminal statistics by changing the definition of a crime. When I was young, if a young person was caught shoplifting he was stealing, but today he is shoplifting. You cannot change the nature of the offence by redefining it. You may improve the statistics but you do not change the nature of the offence. It seems to me that far too often we are trying to make society look better by redefining the crime instead of dealing with the problem. I am concerned about that fact.

Let me speak about two particular aspects of this legislation which, I feel, are wanting, and both of which have been touched upon by previous speakers. I simply want to emphasize my concern about a lapse in this legislation which fails to deal with important aspects in the lives of young people if we are to help them face reality. If we continue this lapse through this legislation we will do them a disservice.

One aspect is that area which relieves parents of responsibility for the activities of their children. I know that this legislation, by taking the responsibility from the parents, is shifting it to the broad shoulders of society in general. In some instances that implies it is not the parents but, rather, it is society which is responsible for the behaviour of young people. In some cases that may be true. There may be certain instances where society in general has created the circumstances which have led young people to take part in criminal activity. It seems to me this is an extension of the kind of social engineering under which we have been labouring for the past generation or so. The thinkers in our society have come to believe that by tinkering with the social structure and by shifting responsibility, we address the problems. That is far from the reality. I think it is also an extension of the kind of economic determinism which has been part of the thinking of our society during the past generation, that it is because of economics that people go into a life of crime. Again there may be instances where people have been encouraged because of economics to go into lives of crime. It is fallacious reasoning to conclude that economics make people turn to crime. By relieving parents of their responsibility, we are asking society in general to accept that responsibility.

Let me illustrate the shift that is taking place. I was born at the beginning of the depression. I am not saying I caused it, but somehow the chronology coincided. I grew up during those depression years which, as members know, were some of the most poverty-ridden years of this country. My parents were parents of a large family during those very deprived years. My father used to go from a small town in Saskatchewan where we lived at the time, put his bike on the Grey Goose bus in Saskatchewan and travel to the Fraser Valley in British Columbia in order to find summer employment where there were still jobs during the summer months. He would then come back in time for the harvest in Saskatchewan to get day labour and make enough to put us through the winter.

In that small prairie town of one thousand or two thousand people we had one constable. The hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo) will know of the town of Rosthern, and he is old enough to remember those years. We had one constable for the entire town, a small city we might call it today. We also had a curfew law. I remember standing on the wrong side of the sidewalk at about two minutes after nine o'clock, after the curfew bell had rung, when the constable, walking by and seeing my parents in the yard, motioned me to come into the yard. The town had a jail in the city hall, but it was usually empty, and this was at the time of our greatest depression. If poverty creates crime, that should have been the time when crime was the greatest, at least according to the economic determinism theory. Usually the jail was empty.

Let me bring you up to date. A few years ago the municipal council of Surrey decided it would help society if there were curfew legislation in Surrey. About two years ago it passed a curfew law which ordered young people to be home at eleven o'clock at night, particularly on weekends. That policy lasted about three Saturdays. At eleven o'clock at night, the RCM Police would go to the local hangouts, McDonald's or wherever they happened to be, pick up the kids who were under age and take them to the police station. They were not being put in jail but just taken there while the police got in touch with their parents. At two o'clock in the morning they were still phoning the parents to come and get their children. Because they were usually unable to find the parents to look after their children, the municipal council was not able to carry out that curfew policy.

This is what has happened in our society in terms of parental responsibility. Is it the responsibility of our police forces to look after young people under 16 years of age after eleven o'clock at night? I thought that when parents were raising children it was their responsibility to look after those children, not the responsibility of society. Therefore, I regret that the government, through this legislation, will further relieve parents of their accountability for raising children.

I am concerned about this move because of another consequence. If the government at this point is relieving parents of their accountability, at what point down the road will it prohibit parents from exercising their authority over their children? The first stage is relieving parents of responsibility and the second is prohibiting them from exercising authority. This will result in state intervention in family responsibilities. We do not have to go far outside our country to find examples of the state assuming full responsibility for looking after families. That to me spells the deterioration of a society. The first and most important institution in the land is the home, and whenever the state intervenes in the conduct of the home and takes away the authority of the home, society goes down the skids.

The second contradiction in this kind of economic determinism which says that society is responsible, because of the social scales in our society, for creating a life of crime is the fact that much of today's crime is in the affluent areas of our society. If it is poverty which creates crime, why is so much crime committed by the affluent people of our society? Why are many of the young offenders of our society coming from the high schools in the affluent sections of our cities? Why is it? Why is the worst kind of crime—and, in terms of dollars, the highest proportion of crime—white collar crime?

There are some hard realities we as a country have to face if we want to address the nature of crime in our country. If we are going to address the problem, we will have to conclude sooner or later that crime exists because people decide to engage in criminal activity. They try to take shortcuts which run roughshod over the rights of other people. Parents decide that they are going to be irresponsible parents; young people decide that they are going to take advantage of their parents' irresponsibility, and sooner or later we have to have a law which says that parents and young people, and nobody else, will be held accountable for their actions. Parents and young people both have to be held accountable for their behaviour. One psychologist said, "You may have inherited that problem but you are responsible; you cannot pass it off on your parents forever; you cannot blame them forever." Sooner or later we must decide what kind of people we want to be, and there is no sense in kidding ourselves; we cannot pretend that we are doing young people a favour by suggesting that somebody else is responsible for their behaviour.

I suggest that the government would do all of Canada a favour if, at the committee stage, it re-evaluated the position it has taken on this section of the bill, replaced the section dealing with parental accountability for the behaviour of young people and made parents socially, and many times financially, accountable for the behaviour of their children.

Second, I agree in part with what the hon. member for Broadview-Greenview (Mr. Rae) indicated earlier this afternoon. He said that young people need the opportunity to experience and display a sense of atonement. I agree with that. Young people should not be locked in and labelled for life because of their behaviour at one particular stage of their lives. Society in many cases does act prejudicially against young people because of indiscretions, because of earlier rebellions, and sometimes because of false values having been given to them. They have engaged in activity which has been criminal, but they do not deserve to be labelled for life as young offenders, criminals or whatever definition we want to use. There has to be an opportunity for atonement. Young people deserve the opportunity to be trusted because there is very slim chance of atonement in young people if they are not going to be trusted. It begins with trust.

However, I add to what the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood said by saying that atonement or a confession of atonement is totally irrelevant unless there is also restitution. That is how we know people are serious and genuine about their confession of atonement. The apology of a person who says he is sorry for what he has done is not accepted if he does not also restore the thing he has taken, whether it is money, reputation or whatever it is. It is easy for a young person to have engaged in a breaking and entering, a shoplifting or a theft of an automobile and then to say, "I am sorry", but that is not good enough, even if he means it, because part of the formula for atonement—it is integrally related to atonement—is restitution.

I want to use an adult illustration. About a year and a half ago, a gentleman was convicted of a crime in the province of Quebec. He happened to be the head of an organization known as the Apostles of Infinite Love, a pseudo-Roman Catholic institution. Hon. members have all heard of the Apostles of Infinite Love. This gentleman was convicted of the abduction of some of the children who were in his institution, and he was sentenced. He served his sentence, and a week or two ago he was released on parole, apparently on good behaviour. The fact is that he has not returned the children he abducted. He still has them in his so-called monastery at St. Jovite. He has supposedly atoned for his crime, but he has not restored the children.

This ludicrous situation makes a mockery of all law and all sense of justice. This man has been convicted. He has served his sentence. Legally he has atoned, but he still has the children, and he cannot be tried again for that offence. The system has now rewarded him because he cannot be tried again for that offence. How are we to get those children back?

When we have glaring examples like that of atonement without restitution, we reinforce all across society the belief that in many cases crime pays. It pays as long as one rides out the system. Is there not something in our legal system which says one has not atoned for one's crime until one restores what one has taken? How many cases are there in which individuals have been convicted of armed robbery, taken their loot and hidden it, ridden out their sentence and come back and lived off their loot? The famous train robbery in England is a case in point. One of the perpetrators has become a hero in England because he has been able to make a mockery of the so-called justice system. Why should we entrench in the proposed Young Offenders Act a concept which says a person can be convicted of a crime and atone for that crime by going through the penal system but that that person does not have to restore what he has taken? That is wrong. It is bad law. We ought not to let this go through third reading—not let it go through committee stage, let alone third reading, until we incorporate in this legislation the concept that one cannot atone unless one restores, and no crime has been atoned until there has been restitution.

These are two concepts that I believe are wanting in this legislation. I think that we would do an injustice to our young people if we presented to them a system which allows them to avoid facing the reality of life by escaping the reality of their behaviour and shunting that accountability on to the state. We are doing a disservice to parents by allowing them to shunt the responsibility for their children to the state. We are not teaching our young people the reality of life if we say that they can atone without having to restore. I think that is the rock bottom concept that we have to incorporate in this legislation before we give it third and final reading.

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): I would like to speak briefly on the young offenders bill, and particularly under five headings. I think the basis of the young offenders bill should be enshrined with the words "The objective to build and not to destroy".

I find that young people today who get their fun out of destroying things have made up their minds that they want to live that type of a life; and it is essential for them during their younger years, to learn the joy of building as opposed to whatever joy they get out of destroying.

The first item in this bill that appeals to me is that young persons should bear responsibility for the actions that they undertake. That has not been the case for a number of years. I remember a court case in the province of Alberta where a group of young people between the ages of 12 to 15 broke into a hardware store, took the paint and the brushes and painted everything, in the store. They made a terrific mess. They dumped paint all over the floor and all over the other items. When they came before the magistrate, he slapped them lightly on the wrist and said, "Now, you should know better than that. Go home and don't do it any more." Who bore all the expense? The couple who were operating that store were not young. They were barely making a living. They had something like $3,000 worth of damage. They, who had nothing whatsoever to do with the crime, had to pay the total cost.

I said at that time, and I say it again, that the court did those young people no favour whatever in letting them get away with the "fun". If they had been told by the court to go back and clean up that mess, at least it would have taught them the lesson that they should not have done it. But they were not required to pay, they were not required to do anything except listen to a little lecture from the magistrate, and one of them said afterwards, "I wish he hadn't talked so long. I wanted to go somewhere else."

I think we have to instil in our young people the message that if they destroy, they must pay, if they cause damage to somebody else's property, they must pay. I cannot say it nearly as well as the hon. member who just sat down. If we do not do that, we encourage young people to continue a life of crime. That is what some of our laws and courts have been doing inadvertently, not deliberately.

I know of another case where a group of young teenagers, all under the age of 16, thought it was fun to remove a "bridge out" sign on a district road. They moved the "bridge out" sign and they burned it. That night a young married couple, who were, as a matter of fact, on their honeymoon, went along that road and, of course, there was no "bridge out" sign. They went into the ravine and both were killed. Someone said to me, "Those young people will feel remorse the rest of their lives." I do not know whether that type of remorse is worth it or will bring back any happiness to the loved ones of the couple who were killed inadvertently because someone committed a thoughtless act and destroyed a sign.

I want to emphasize that this entire act should be predicated upon the fact that we pay for our sins, and if we destroy someone else's property, we pay for it in one way or another. That brings me to the second point I want to make. The juvenile courts have been working hard to help young people. Do you know how many times some of these young people have appeared in the courts? Would you say five or ten? When a juvenile judge asked me, I said, "Six, seven." He said, "Would you believe it? The boy you saw in court today has been before this court 55 times." That boy laughs at the court. The court could not do anything except levy a fine which his parents glibly paid. They had lots of money.

That is the point I think my hon. friend from British Columbia was just making. That is encouraging a boy to be a criminal. He loses his respect for the courts. In this bill, at least, I see a number of items now which will permit the courts to be effective so that they will no longer become a laughing stock among those who apparently want to be criminals. It will certainly restore the dignity of the courts and will give our juvenile judges some authority and some options that they can use in dealing with this matter.

The next point I want to deal with is the causes. Why do young people get more fun out of destroying rather than building? Why do young people want to steal rather than earn their money? Why is it that two young boys may live in the same neighbourhood, in the same environment, yet one goes out and works after school and on Saturdays to make his money while the other one steals it? I think we have to analyse the reasons for the criminal act, for the misbehaviour, or whatever you want to call it.

I would like to call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, and continue this evening.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, before continuing I would like to take this opportunity to welcome the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) into the House. We missed him badly this afternoon; it is nice to see him here this evening.

In my view the cornerstone of this bill should be to build human lives into something worth while, to take a piece of broken earthenware and make it into a vessel of substance, to make good citizens out of those who somehow or other got on the wrong track and, to put it in a nutshell, to encourage our youth to build, not to destroy.

Before adjourning this afternoon I was endeavouring to deal with some of the causes of youth offences. This bill should play a very important part in encouraging analysis of those young people who are starting off on a life of crime. When we talk about rehabilitation, there is no better time to start it than in their young years. We should not wait until people are 40, 50 or 60 years old and then try to use our prisons as centres of rehabilitation. When we try to analyse the causes of young people becoming offenders and coming into conflict with the law, it is impossible to say in a blanket manner what causes persons to go down the wrong path. Tonight I would like to suggest a few causes I have found in dealing with young people. If one finds the cause, then one has a much better chance to rehabilitate and to correct whatever is causing the difficulty.

One cause which I have found to be very high on the list was learning disabilities in school. For many, many years we did not realize that slow learners had a problem. As I heard some teachers say, we thought they were dumb or dull. I have heard some people say that they lacked initiative. But when one really gets down to the root cause and finds a slow learner, when one finds that a young person is not keeping up with his class, generally there is a very sound reason. Some people do not learn as rapidly as others. Boys and girls who go through school like to be thought well of by their peers. As a student and as a teacher, I found that analysing boys and girls to discover why they were not keeping up with their class work was an important job. When I found the cause, then generally I was able to help the young person. Sometimes I found they were simply slow learners; it was just as simple as that. They could not keep up with the regular lessons. I remember asking one boy who was having difficulty in grade five or six when I taught in a country school of 11 grades, "How come, John, you cannot keep up?" He said, "Well, I do not understand what you are saying." I said, "Why didn't you say so?" "I do not like the other kids to think I am dumb", he said. So I said to him, "How would you like to stay in for half an hour a couple of days a week after your classmates leave and we will go over the things that are bothering you?" "Oh, boy," he said, "that would be wonderful." By the time that lad reached grade 12, he was one of the top students in the school. We found out what the trouble was—John was a slow learner.

I went through a correctional institution in Edmonton a few years ago and I checked the number of students who were there. It was my belief that at least 40 per cent of those yong people who had come into conflict with the law and who were in that institution were there because they either had a learning disability or were slow learners and they had never been diagnosed as such, or ever helped. The school system had failed those people. As a matter of fact, I saw a boy 14 years of age in that correctional institution with a book in front of him. I saw from the cover of the book that it was a detective story. I thought it strange that he should be reading a story of that kind during classroom hours. When I walked to the back of the room I saw that he was reading a grade three reader. He had covered the book with the jacket from a detective story so that he would not feel bad. He had never learned to read. It is no wonder that by the time he reached grade five or six people called him dull. He was not able to keep up with the other students in his class. He had not learned the fundamentals in grades one, two, three and four, so he became a drop-out. Then his only friends were those in a similar category who came into conflict with the law. That boy said he did not want to break the law but the only friends he had were criminals. All of this was because he was a slow learner, because the educational system had failed him.

I would ask the Solicitor General to inquire into the number of young people in our prisons who are there because they were slow learners or who had a learning disability and who came into conflict with the law, not because they wanted to but because the school system had not taken the trouble to find out what was holding them back.

In the correctional institution in North Edmonton they were going right back to the grass roots. Boys from 14 to 17 years of age were learning how to read. Once they had learned how to read, a whole new world was opened up to them. One boy of 18 said to me that he had not realized before that it was so simple. He reached grade seven and he still could not read, so he dropped out of school.

I think we must analyse the reasons why people become criminals. Sometimes our system forces them into this way of life. As the hon. member from British Columbia who spoke before me outlined, it is sometimes due to parental attitudes. Most parents like to see their children do well; but many parents do not realize whether their children are slow learners, fast learners or somewhere in between. Some parents do not realize that their child has a hearing or sight disability which can hold him back to the point at which he can no longer catch up with his peers, so he becomes an outcast and he finds other friends.

A policeman in Edmonton told me about finding a 13-year-old girl on the streets of Edmonton at one o'clock in the morning. He asked her what she was doing there. She had no answer. He found out where she lived and he took her home. The girl's parents were asleep. After rousing them, the policeman said to the girl's father, "I found your daughter down on Jasper Avenue at one o'clock this morning." The father was angry and asked the policeman why he had not left his daughter there. "Why are you waking us up in the middle of the night?" he said. That kind of parent is making criminals out of his children. The policeman said that he felt terrible as a result of the father's response. He said that he was only trying to help the child but even her parents did not seem to care.

Perhaps the reason that some of our young people lose direction is that they have no home life to speak of, no father or mother to encourage them to do the right thing. They drift off to the only place where they can find some friendship. I think some of these children just make a mistake. I am sure every hon. member in the House can think back to the time when he was a youth—a time when we all make mistakes. If we had been picked up by the police every time we made a mistake and charged with a criminal offence in a court of law, maybe we would be in a penitentiary today instead of in the House of Commons. There are excellent people in our penitentiaries today who are there because of circumstances, because they made a mistake and everyone thought they were criminals.

Sometimes our police do not help matters either. I forwarded a letter to the Solicitor General recently about a group of excellent young people who were being hounded by police officers who thought they were doing their duty. I remember a boy who came to my boys' camp one year about whom my assistant said to me, "I don't think we should take this lad." I said to him, "Will the boy be having a holiday?" My assistant's reply was negative. I said, "Then we are taking him in. That is what the camp is for." When the boy got to camp I took him into my tent and said to him, "Bob, I am sure glad I have you in my tent." Bobby said, "You are?" I said, "I sure am!" By the end of the week that boy was an excellent camper. I said to him, "How come you are always getting into trouble in your town?" He said, "Every time someone breaks into a store or breaks a window, the police come to my house. What is the use of me trying to be good?" He said, "Out here people treat me well. That is why I did not break any rules. I do not like breaking rules, but I have been hounded by the police." I believe police officers are taking steps today to ensure that this type of situation does not happen. It is a responsibility they have. Because a boy makes one mistake is no reason for him to spend the rest of his life as a criminal.

Then there are the ones who decide, through laziness or something else, that they will spend their lives as criminals. They decide that they will get rich by stealing, they will take what other people earn. These are the most difficult people to deal with. They have made up their minds to pursue a life of crime. I think there must be a penalty imposed on these people so they will know that when they break a rule, they will be punished.

The next point I wish to make deals with restitution. I wish to congratulate the present Solicitor General and the former solicitor general for providing a number of alternatives to our courts for dealing with almost every type of youth who comes into conflict with the law. Restitution is one of the most effective measures provided. This afternoon I cited the case of young people who broke into a hardware store and threw paint all over the place. They received a slap on the wrist and were told to be good. Within the month some of those boys had taken a truck and run it through a wall. The court had done them no good by telling them that it would overlook the first offence because of their youth. As I said before, we do our young people no good whatsoever when they commit a crime like that if we simply say, "Don't do it again." In the first instance, the magistrate ordered the boys to go back and clean up the paint. If they had worked there for two or three days before this happened, I do not think they would have driven that truck through the wall. They should have had to rebuild that wall.

There are many ways of obtaining restitution, and it is one of the best ways of making people realize what they have done. I heard of a case in Edmonton a few years ago, of a young man from a large eastern city who had never seen a pig. One day when a policeman was going by, he called him a pig. He followed the policeman around, calling him a pig. Finally the policeman arrested that 16 or 17-year-old lad. He was tried in court and the magistrate asked him if he had ever seen a pig. He said he had seen pictures of them but had never seen a real one. The magistrate sentenced him to work on a pig farm in north Edmonton for one week and said that when the boy came back he would consider what to do then. The boy worked on the pig farm, and when he returned he told the magistrate that he would never call anyone a pig again. He had learned his lesson. Had he simply been given a fine, which his father might have paid, he would probably still be calling policeman pigs, and perhaps worse.

Restitution is an excellent thing. Most of us learned at home that when we did something wrong, we had to pay the price. We learned that we either had to take the punishment that was coming or make good the damage.

I grew up with a boy who broke a fence one time. He simply decided to tear down the fence. We did not go to court about it, but his father said that he must rebuild the fence. I went along with him, because I was with him when he did it, and I helped him build it just as good as it was before. Today that lad is a minister of the church. He knew that if he did something wrong, he would be punished.

I hope that through this bill we can make people realize that if they do something wrong, they will be punished. Let us have no bleeding hearts about that point, which is a very important one.

When the court decides to send an offender to an institution, we should be sure that it is an institution where they can learn to build and not to destroy. I had occasion to visit a young lad who was convicted of killing his stepfather because he had committed a heinous crime against the boy's sister. He was just over 16 at the time. I went to visit him in a federal penitentiary. I asked him how he was getting on, and he said, "I am learning how to become a criminal." I asked if the guards were not counteracting that. He said, "No, you are with the prisoners all the time. I have learned more about crime in the time that I have been in this institution than I ever dreamed I could. I do not want to be a criminal but they are making me a criminal." I was happy when he left that institution and I hope he is doing well now. He was not a criminal type. He had made a mistake and maybe there was some reason for that. But he was not learning much in that institution, except about crime.

In many of our prisons today there is idleness and no work. That is one of the reasons why many young people get into trouble today. They have nothing to do. I had plenty to do when I was growing up. I had to rush home from school every night during the winter months to haul coal or to chop wood in the summer. There was always lots to do. I envied the boys in the cities who had nothing to do. I do not envy them now, I feel sorry for them. If they had lived on a farm they would always have had something to do. The devil finds something for idle hands to do, which is not good.

We should provide the opportunity to inmates of our penitentiaries or correctional institutions to learn how to work. We should give them something worth while to do.

That is one point in favour of the Bowden Institution which the federal government now operates. Some time ago a boy came out of there who is now operating his own tinsmithing shop. He learned to be a tinsmith in the institution. Before that, he had no trade, nothing to live for. Now he is a good citizen, is married, and doing well in his business. The objective is to try to rehabilitate these people.

As one hon. member remarked earlier, the cornerstone of this bill should be to encourage young offenders to build, to turn from their criminal activities and become not only good citizens, but to learn how to enjoy life. They should learn how to attain happiness from helping others, not robbing them; they should learn how to attain happiness from helping others less fortunate, rather than trying to tear down lives that have been built up, or stealing from others. The cornerstone of this bill should be to build, not to destroy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, this has been a day of information for members of the House regarding juveniles in our society. It has been a day characterized by concern shown by members of the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada in this House who have demonstrated throughout the debate their concern for the young people of Canada, as they have done in the past.

It has also been a day of surprises. Of the 282 members of the House, 147 sit on the Liberal benches. It would seem that those 147 have no interest in juveniles because the day has been characterized by an absence of speakers from that side. I wonder if they have lost interest because we are dealing with a population that does not vote. I find that so much of the government legislation that comes along is dedicated not to wisdom and not necessarily to what is good for all Canadians, but perhaps far too often is characterized by what might be seen as something positive in the way of garnering votes. I am particularly pleased that the sponsor of the bill, the Solicitor General of Canada (Mr. Kaplan), saw fit to attend for perhaps 20 minutes of the debate this evening. He was not present this afternoon and currently is not in the House. I hope he will come from behind the curtain or some back room and listen to our concerns about the legislation he has placed before us this evening.

I should like to remind hon. members who were not present earlier that we are currently debating an amendment to the motion of the Solicitor General. The amendment is proposed by a former solicitor general, the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence), and is seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour), members of the Conservative party. The amendment states very clearly and very succinctly that it is the opinion of those members of the House that this bill should not even go forward to committee for further study because in its basic principles, it is based on inequality. I should like to read that amendment so that we are all clear on what we are debating. The amendment reads:

That this House declines to give second reading to Bill C-61, an act respecting young offenders and to repeal the Juvenile Delinquents Act, because the bill rejects the fundamental principle of equal treatment of all persons before the law by specifying that the act will apply to different age groups in different provinces.

I find it somewhat surprising that an 88-page bill would be brought before this House after the months of debate we had on the Constitution of Canada. It violates what we have been told is one of the principles of the Liberal Party of Canada, which is the current governing party of Canada, that all Canadians everywhere in Canada should be treated equally. Perhaps that should not be surprising. The last day we sat in this chamber was April 23. That evening we voted on the Constitution of Canada. The government party opposite, aided and abetted by the New Democratic Party of Canada, and its members from Saskatchewan, voted in this House to say that all of us in western Canada, as a consequence of the votes on that Thursday evening, would have less protection in the Constitution of Canada than we had before those votes.

The people who live in Quebec and in Ontario, through their elected officials, have a veto on future constitutional change. They are entitled in perpetuity to the protection of the Canadian Constitution. Prior to that vote on April 23, those of us who live in provinces in western Canada could, under certain circumstances, combine with one other province to exercise the veto. We did not each have a veto in each of the four western provinces but one province could combine with one other province. Two provinces acting together could protect themselves from unwanted constitutional change. But on the night of April 23, the governing Liberal party, aided and abetted by the New Democratic Party, said that was too good, "we want you weaker than that." From that moment on, no one premier in western Canada could veto constitutional change to protect us from changes we do not want. Not even two premiers could do that. It will take three premiers from western Canada to equal one premier from the province of Ontario or one premier from the province of Quebec.

Then I look at the bill before us tonight. I have been sitting is this chamber all day wondering whether or not debating this bill is a waste of time. I am glad to see the Solicitor General has come back into the House for a few moments. He appeared before the constitutional committee. During those hearings we tried to find out what was going to happen when the new Constitution was brought in. I want to bring one clause of the Constitution to the attention of hon. members. It is clause 15(1). It reads:

Every individual is equal before and under the law and has the right to the equal protection and equal benefit of the law withouth discrimination and, in particular, without discrimination based on race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age or mental or physical disability.

I wish to emphasize the word "age" in that clause. Here I have before me an 88-page bill which says with crystal clarity that, depending on your age, you will not have equality before and under the law. I think a case can be made that a three-year-old requires a different response from society than perhaps even a six-year-old, and certainly somewhat different than that required for a sixteen-year-old.

I find in this bill the concept of "your" protection, and I say to all of the young people—although I suspect very few are watching our proceedings on television this evening—that this government has brought forward a bill which states clearly that if you are 17 years of age, you will have a certain protection under the law in some provinces, in other provinces if you are 16 you will have that protection, and in still other provinces, if you are 15 years of age that protection will be afforded to you. Therefore, depending on where you live in this country, under the young offenders act, which will be a federal law, young people will be treated differently by the law.

I say to the young people, those perhaps who would like to break the law, that if this becomes the law in Canada and a person happens to live in Hull, he or she might be better off if that person came across the river to Ottawa. Likewise, if a person lives in Ottawa, the law might treat that person better if he or she crosses the river and goes to Hull. How does that jibe with the glowing statements we have heard in the last few months about the concern of Liberal party members for the rights and the equality of Canadians? We do not get it in terms of constitutional amendments as we lump ourselves together in provinces. We do not get it in terms of basic law as it affects the young people in this country. The government wants it different. Depending on the province in which a young person lives, he or she will be treated differently by the courts of Canada based on his or her age.

At the same time, I wonder whether it is all a giant public relations hoax because the majority opposite will force this Constitution on the country, if it possibly can. Does the government think that this act will be struck down because it violates the basic principles inherent in what has been called a charter of rights and freedoms? Then where will we be in this country if this particular act is, all of a sudden, declared illegal by the Supreme Court of Canada? Where will we be in terms of our ability as a nation to treat the young offenders of this country? That should give cause for concern to all members of this House who come here charged with the responsibility of making this a better nation and a better world for all of our people.

Why do we deliberately proceed to discuss an 88-page bill, to move it to committee, to call witnesses and to spend all of that time on a piece of legislation which may be declared ultra vires? If the Solicitor General were here and if he were in the mood, I would ask him—although I probably would not get an answer because I am a member of the opposition party—whether he has taken the trouble to submit this bill to justice department officials for a legal opinion on whether or not it will be ultra vires of the Constitution of Canada, assuming that the new Constitution were in place. I can guess that he has not done this. The reason I guess that is that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) himself, on many occasions in testimony before the constitutional committee, has said, "we will worry about the legislation which is on the books of this country, we will examine it for its legality, not before we pass the new Constitution, but after."

The provincial government of Quebec has paid some very skilled legal talent to examine legislation which exists in that province. These people were to advise the Quebec government on what would happen to legislation if the new Constitution were put in place. It was reported that at least 100 pieces of legislation would become illegal instantly. We have a federal government which seems determined to use its transitory majority to change this nation in a hurry in ways which will be unalterable in the future. The least we could have would be a statement from the Solicitor General that he has a solid legal opinion that this legislation, if passed in conjunction with the proposed Constitution act of 1981 will still be declared legal. If there is any probability, and I suggest there is, that it will be declared illegal, why should we in this House spend today, possibly tomorrow, and who knows how many more days in the House and in committee, examining a piece of legislation which will be declared by the Supreme Court of Canada to be beyond the competence of Parliament?

Through the Constitution act, 1981, we are saying that the Supreme Court, five out of nine judges chosen by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) or a particular prime minister of the day, without public examination, will be able to tell the Parliament of Canada, the duly elected people of this country, what they can legislate and what they cannot. That is the fundamental revolution that will take place. I suggest it has an impact on this piece of legislation.

Before we debate this much longer, I ask the Solicitor General to tell us clearly and unequivocally whether he has sought and obtained a legal opinion on whether this legislation will be declared ultra vires of the Constitution act, 1981. If he is not prepared to do that, I suggest to the government House leader that there would be considerable wisdom in arranging for this House of Commons a different order of business until that legal opinion has been sought. There is not much point spending the time of the members of this House and the tax dollars of Canadians debating a piece of legislation which is very likely to be declared ultra vires.

Any piece of legislation which takes us into the area of criminal law deserves more careful examination by the duly elected members of the House of Commons than most other pieces of legislation because it speaks of society's determination to protect itself. At the same time it speaks of society's determination to use its collective power to deprive individuals of their freedom. For those of us who have reached this point in our lives without having run afoul of the law or being charged with any criminal offence, this may seem to be distant. However, we all read in the newspapers from time to time about a miscarriage of justice where an individual has been charged, convicted and sentenced for a crime he or she did not commit.

We have an obligation to move slowly and carefully on the specifics of such a piece of legislation because we are trying to balance two very difficult principles at the same time: the protection of society from the wilful and damaging acts of an individual or groups of individuals, and at the same time the protection of the kinds of freedoms on which all of us in a society like ours place great value.

With the passage of time, our society has adopted a third principle dealing with rehabilitation. There is a concern for whoever is charged with breaking our laws and damaging our society. We treat them in a manner calculated with the best wisdom we have to ensure they do not repeat that offence. The process of involving them with our police and judiciary is calculated to produce a situation where people change from violating our group mores or standards to making a positive contribution. That is an important third element in our system.

As I read this bill, I find a fair amount of creativity, which runs counter to our historic patterns in the Juvenile Deliquents Act, which will be helpful in meeting the goal of rehabilitation. A number of members have spoken about restitution. For example, if a young offender has broken the law by defacing a building, the likelihood of his continuing that kind of pattern might be reduced if he is forced into a situation where he has to clean the building, carrying out the hard physical labour in order to put it back to the state in which he found it. Research evidence shows that kind of sentencing and treatment has a positive effect. Some parts of this bill will make that kind of treatment more likely and, therefore, recidivism less likely.

I am bothered about the other two aspects: protection of society and protection of the individual. This is not the proper time or place to deal with the bill in its entirety. We cannot in a speech in the House of Commons deal with the specifics of an 88-page bill. The purpose of a second reading debate is to deal with the bill's principles.

The first principle identified in our amendment which I find bothersome is that the bill clearly specifies that Canadians who live in different provinces will be treated differently under the law. That is unacceptable. Whether you live in Newfoundland, Quebec or Alberta, a federal court comes under federal jurisdiction. All Canadians should be treated equally and not differently depending on the province in which they live. On the basis of that fundamental principle, this legislation should be rejected until that principle is attended to and brought back for our consideration.

I know that time is running along, but I would like to deal with two or three other issues in clause 3, the declaration of principle. I wish to quote clause 3(b):

> Young persons who commit offences require supervision, discipline and control, but, because of their state of dependency and level of development and maturity, they also have special needs and require guidance and assistance;

Where is the empirical, scientific justification for that statement of principle? Which 17-year-old youngsters require supervision, all those who break the law? What positive consequence is inherent in the concept of supervision? What do we mean by that? In societal terms it means parole officers. Historically that has been our method of supervision. Has it worked? I suggest the scientific evidence would indicate that supervision is not necessarily the answer for all these young offenders. Do they all need discipline and control? Are they all in a state of dependence?

I have just returned from a visit to some other cultures and societies in the last couple of weeks where I observed first-hand 15 and 16-year-olds who were in the work force in apprenticeship programs. On the basis of my observation I would say their maturity and lack of dependence was a great deal greater than some of the 30-year-olds I have run into in my lifetime.

Surely the guiding principle involved here is that we as a society when we encounter young offenders should operate on the principle that we study the individual case, the particular age and the particular state of maturity of that individual and then attempt to design as well as we can a set of circumstances which will assist that individual in avoiding the commission of an offence in the future.

When we include a principle such as this, I wonder whether it will be possible for lawyers to argue in a court of law that particular decisions taken run counter to the principle of the proposed young offenders act. I also wonder why we have clause 3(c) which reads as follows:

> Where it is not inconsistent with the protection of society, measures other than judicial proceedings under this act should be considered for dealing with young persons who have committed offences;

I wonder why we have judicial proceedings. As I sat on the committee on the Constitution I remember spending some days on the legal rights portion of that proposed measure. Those of us who are not lawyers, I think, all found it educational.

There are protections that come from a judicial system which do not come from other kinds of systems. I wonder why we are to have a principle in this proposed act which sort of invites the setting aside of judicial principle, and I wonder whether that will be used too frequently to the detriment of the young people who come under the law according to this bill we are considering tonight.

Clause 3(d) states:

> Young persons have rights and freedoms in their own right—

I wonder, after trying to go through the bill, where those special rights and freedoms are to be found. I can remember testimony, again before the committee on the Constitution, by those involved in the Year of the Child, members of committees from across this country, who said that if we are to have a bill of rights, we need a section which deals with children and young people. I know, standing here this evening in this House of Commons, that there is no such section.

I see in this bill a statement of the principle that because of age and the state of maturity there need to be special rights. It even says that young persons have special rights and freedoms, but I cannot find them in this bill and I suspect they should be there.

I could go on in detail about other clauses in this bill, but in the last two or three parts of the statement of principles we encounter the concept of the family, and we encounter, in a very minimal sort of way, the concept of parenthood. If the Solicitor General were to heed the wisdom of members of the Conservative party in this House and withdraw the bill for changes, I wonder if he would spend a little more time in developing a stronger section about both the rights of families in Canadian society and their responsibilities.

Certainly when we proposed that the whole concept of the family and its importance in our way of doing things be part of the Canadian Constitution, that concept was rejected by the New Democratic Party and by the Liberal party. They do not believe that the family has any place in the Constitution of Canada. If they are not willing to have that concept of family enshrined in the Constitution of Canada and they do not think it is important in that measure, perhaps at least they could deal with it in a little stronger way in relation to the importance of the family and parents to young offenders and their relationship to young offenders. I suggest to the Solicitor General, members of cabinet and, hopefully, to the odd backbencher who might somehow get the courage to stand up and speak on this bill, that they consider strengthening that portion of this measure, and draw perhaps a somewhat clearer line, not just about the rights of families and the rights of parenting, but the obligations of families and parents. They have certainly specified with some degree of clarity the right of state over the rights of the individual. Perhaps they could balance it a little bit by strengthening the clauses dealing with the issues I have just mentioned.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, may I once again reiterate the fact that members of our party, the former solicitor general of Canada being the mover, have recommended that this House not give this bill second reading and reference to the committee. In effect, we are inviting the Solicitor General to withdraw it for more work. The reason for that recommendation is that the bill does not recognize the fundamental principle that all Canadians should be treated equally under the law. This is an 88-page bill deliberately dedicated to the production of inequality under the law. Therefore, in principle it is unsound, unCanadian and should be withdrawn.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Robert Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to begin tonight by commending the minister for bringing this measure forward. In doing so, I think he has indicated both respect and sincerity in his intent. I think it is important legislation to Canada and Canada's young people today.

The Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) correctly identified the objectives and purposes of this measure when he stated in the opening that:

> They must strike a balance between helping young offenders and protecting society from harmful conduct. They must safeguard the rights of young people in conflict with the law, while discouraging offenders from committing further crimes.

I think that is fairly well stated. If I were to change one thing in those objectives, it is the tone which I find throughout Canadian law; we always talk in the third person instead of in the first person. We always talk about what "they" must do. I would like to see the word "they" corrected in an attitudinal sense to say instead "we" must strike a balance and "we" must safeguard because we must take that "we" even beyond ourselves as legislators and look at it as "we" the legislators, "we" the parents, "we" the community and "we" Canadians, not just the great "they" as in "other people" or some professional "they" who will solve our problems with juveniles.

• (2100)

In his conclusion, the Solicitor General says:

> It is the various professionals, such as family and youth court judges, lawyers, police officers, welfare officers and social workers who are responsible to make the system work.

The Solicitor General is wrong here. The age of specialization in which the professional has all the answers—just give him the problem, and it will be solved—is over. That has not worked. Our statistics show that. The professionals do not have all the answers. That has not worked.

The Solicitor General is responsible to make it work, not the professionals. Not only is the Solicitor General responsible, but I am also responsible. I am responsible to make it work. All members of the Canadian community are responsible to make it work, and there should be that emphasis that it is about time all of us took our responsibility instead of trying to pass off responsibility for juvenile delinquency or adolescent delinquency. Instead, we should say we will all take our responsibility when and where we find it.

Not only do we refer to the great "they" in referring to those who will solve our problems, but we also refer to the other "they" all too often. The second great "they" is the juvenile offenders. No longer will a juvenile offender be an offender when we accept the great "they" offenders back as part of all of us, because that is where they came from. They came from the "we", the "us" sector, and they became the "they". They became the rejections from our homes, from our schools and from our communities and, most important of all, they became the rejections from their peer groupings, a most important factor among young people of this age. We need to recognize that it is not just they who have needs. The great "they" have the same needs we have. We, like they, all need acceptance and acknowledgement through positive achievement. We need open and honest relationships. We need correction without overcorrection. We need respect and love.

Who are the great "theys" we are talking about here tonight? Who are these "theys", these juvenile delinquents? Let us identify them a little more closely. Before this act is passed, the offenders are those between 7 and 18 years of age. After we pass this act, we are talking only about a small part of that child-adult grouping, and I refer specifically now to 12 to 17-year-olds. That is narrowing it to a very particular group called adolescents. We are now talking about adolescent offenders.

Who and where are these adolescent offenders? We can even narrow it a little more than that. Statistics show that the offenders to whom we refer specifically within that 12 to 17-year-old grouping are 14 and 15 years old. Fifty-six per cent of juvenile or adolescent crime is committed by 14 and 15-year-olds specifically. We can narrow that even further and find that the peak among young men is in the fifteenth year. Eighty-six per cent of offences are committed by young men. The stereotype or prototype is specifically a 15-year-old male. Why do 14 and 15-year-olds get into so much trouble?

Before I came here tonight I posed the very same question to the 14 and 15-year-olds in my house. I asked my daughter Jill and my son Kiven and their two friends, Glenn and Stewart, why 14 and 15-year-olds get into so much trouble. Their answers were indeed very revealing. In fact, I think they are the answers as to why young people get into trouble. They said young people get into trouble because they lack attention. They said young people get into trouble to try to gain some acceptance. They said they get into trouble because of family breakdowns and family problems and because they want to follow in their friends' footsteps. Their friends are doing it, so they want to do it too. They do it just for kicks or to add some excitement to their lives. They do it to be "cool". Above all they must be cool. They do it because they are bored. In a society which has given them everything, they are bored. There is a lack of direction. I think these young people have very well identified why young people get into trouble.

I spoke with a judge from the United States about this bill. He gave me some interesting statistics. He said that one of the problems he is facing is the family break-up situation. He said that in the state of Oregon where he is a judge, 81 per cent of marriages end in divorce. That is four out of five marriages. He gave another interesting statistic about family relationships as the basic problem, or one of the basic problems, causing adolescents to be brought before the law. He went around to the prisons to which he had sentenced young people and did a personal survey upon which he calculated statistics. He asked two questions. The first question he asked those young people was, "Who do you care about in your family and who do you think might care about you?" It was interesting that 82 per cent responded that either mother or sister loved or cared. The next question was, "Who do you hate in your family"? Ninety per cent said they hated their fathers. I only point this out to indicate the importance of the family structure, and that family structure has to be taken into account in any rehabilitative or corrective format because it is here that we have the greatest possibility for correction, for rehabilitation, and for reacceptance. We can perhaps reaccept a young person into a group home or a foster home, we can perhaps reaccept a young person into the school or into some community sports organization, but the ultimate success will depend on whether we can rehabilitate and get reacceptance by the family of that child. That is a critical area in any rehabilitation or reform.

Again, we can sit and list all the reasons why young people get into trouble. We all want to blame or list. We keep blaming. How many times have I heard the cycle of blame? Parents point their fingers at the teachers in the schools and say it is the teachers of the schools; and the teachers in the schools point the finger right back home. The police often say, "Why arrest them? The courts just release them on to the streets again, anyway." The courts say, "We do not make the law," and they blame the politicians; and the politicians blame everyone else. It is not a matter of blaming. It is, instead, a matter of accepting the responsibility and beginning to do something about it. I hope that this bill is the beginning of acceptance of responsibility, and starting to point toward a program and policies which will work back toward acceptance and acknowledgement of young people through positive achievement.

I speak on this subject, not lightly, but with some experience, because, as a schoolteacher, I was given a group of 25 young people and told, "Do what you will with them. They are failures. They are 13 to 15. They are in Grade 8. They are not going anywhere." Some were slow, some had emotional problems, some were just cowering and frightened. But I did find, in working with these young people, everywhere I went, that they had one thing in common. They were all rejects. They were rejected by every element of our society.

If we are going to just reject them, they are going to react; and they will not accept rejection. They will fight that and they will gain acknowledgement. They will gain acceptance one way or another, and the only way that is open to them is negative because the positive ways have, in fact, been closed to them. Those routes have been closed. Many hon. members who have teenaged children can watch this rejection by the schools and by the society. It happens at 14. It happens at 15. Young people are suddenly confronted with the reality that a door is closing. We must end that rejection and turn it into reacceptance and reintegration.

We need to establish community service programs and restitution agreements. We need a sense of responsibility. I again refer to a section of the Solicitor General's report. He promises that this program is going to develop and that this act, policy or legislation will somehow provide community service programs and restitution agreements. He recognizes that the courts have worked in this direction and that by doing this we will establish a sense of responsibility, and opportunity to repay, and self-respect and self-esteem. Reacceptance amongst peers, schools, community and family are also factors which will have to be included.

When I was a member of the legislature, in the first year that I was elected I travelled to all of the correctional institutions in the province of British Columbia. I read about an idea called "youth juries". This was an idea of getting peer group interaction. The youth jury, in fact, would sit and judge with their peers and then perhaps call for community restitution. Then, following community restitution, hopefully this same peer group of young people would reaccept or take some responsibility to bring the young person back into their group. The kinsmen group or the Kiwanis, or whatever, would run some night programs, sports programs, and things like this, to try to find an opportunity for young people to achieve and to gain some recognition, following which they would move back into the schools and into the community.

As a result of representations, such an experiment was tried in my community. It really worked quite well to a point where it broke down in that people were not willing to carry it through. They would go as far as setting up the court and making the judgments, but they would not carry through on the reacceptance back into the community. However, this youth jury idea was tried in British Columbia and I think it has been tried elsewhere.

I think the idea of community service programs, restitution, accountability, are important factors, and I am glad to see that there will be some flexibility in the program to carry out these kinds of experiments. That is, in fact, what they are: experiments. But we need to experiment because we need alternatives in our programs. We cannot really blame the judge if he has only two or three choices. If all he can do is sentence the young person to jail or release him, we cannot expect the court action, the rehabilitation, to have much effect, because just to release a person or just to send him to jail is not the answer and does not provide enough alternatives.

We need alternatives which include strengthening our foster families and homes. We can do that federally. We can say that it is the provincial government, but it is not necessarily the provincial government. There is a substantial number of tax incentives which might get people from other areas, other families, and other types of families interested. There are incentives which could be provided to perhaps produce more and stronger family groupings. We need group homes and we need community support groups. I will be interested to see what the minister has to say about these kinds of programs, for which, he says in his booklet here, the federal government takes responsibility.

There are some specific concerns about this bill which I do want to mention. I do have concern relating to youth court records. It is fine to say that the court record will be destroyed; but in this day and age of modern science the court record is only one small part of the record of that young person. The more blatant and difficult one is found in computer records, because a young person can be picked up, charged, fingerprinted and photographed, if he is to be treated like an adult, and only then the charge is dropped. But the information, just that he was charged and the charge was dropped, is still in the computer, a computer whose access and interconnection is highly questionable in today's era of public information.

So my concern is that when we are talking about records, we are not just talking about court records, we are not just talking about a criminal record filed here in Ottawa. We are talking about all records, including interconnected computer records which relate not only to charges which were followed through, but, in fact, all charges which relate to young people who may have been accused wrongly or may have been treated unfairly by an unfair conviction which has been followed through.

As far as public hearings are concerned, one of the good things about youth juries, it was said, was that if there was public understanding, part of the punishment and rehabilitation was, in fact, a form of guilt, public humiliation and shame. That is what this part of the legislation implies; this open public hearing concept somehow implies public punishment. I am not sure it is what we want for two reasons. The first reason is that when we talk about a 14 or 15-year-old adolescent who will be reaccepted in the community, the reacceptance is made too difficult by punishing him publicly, by holding him up to ridicule and exposure. It may not work; I urge caution.

On the other side of the coin, many young people seeking negative attention commit crimes for attention. When he is punished in public, he kind of likes it because he gets a lot of attention. I am concerned about these public hearings or these court hearings. When these hearings are held in private, there is a better opportunity for rehabilitation than when public ridicule and scorn is heaped on a 15-year-old. They will get it any way; they will get it in school and they will get it in the community. To play with it in the newspapers and to play with it in public by letting people sit in who are not involved needs rethinking.

As far as fingerprints and photographs are concerned, I would have very grave concern if my child were picked up by the police for whatever reason, taken to the police station, charged rightly or wrongly, fingerprinted and photographed. Parental responsibility is accepted when the juvenile is taken in, certainly there should be a protection whereby no fingerprints or photographs are taken without parental consent and knowledge.

An hon. Member: It is absent in the bill.

Mr. Wenman: It is absent in the bill. It indicates that we will treat them like adults. We must break it down right to our own children. Somehow when we talk about "they", we talk about someone else's child. But when we legislate we must legislate for everyone's child as well as our own. We must take that into consideration. I hope someone is listening. Whoever that is, I ask them to reconsider the section on fingerprints and photographs.

Another section which gives me concern is the one on flexible sentencing, that somehow we will make it more uniform or more rigid. I am not sure that is correct. Surely the objective is to rehabilitate and return a 15-year-old to society. We must have the maximum flexibility to judge that young person as he matures. This ties in with the difficulty of putting a maximum age on determining whether a person is a juvenile. The 14, 15, 16, and 17-year-old grouping is a difficult one. Which child is an adult? Is it the child who has survived out in the world by himself for two years? Is he more responsible than a child coming from a highly protected home who is physically and mentally immature or somewhat physically and mentally slow? When does one become a mature adult? I wish we could see, on this upper maximum age, some way to determine whether a child is a child, whether or not he is responsible. We should almost leave that to the judgment of the courts. I know it cannot be done, I know the flexibility is not there. It is moving toward rigidity, and I am concerned about moving toward rigidity.

At page 19 of this bill it is indicated that the Government of Canada is responsible for programs developed to meet young offenders' needs. I want to be very clear about this because usually we hear governments saying that they are not responsible. It is hard to define responsibility, but the federal government has committed itself to programs in this bill. That must be the meat of this legislation.

It is nice to tidy up things, but in fact the programs developed to meet the needs of young offenders are the test. The minister's ability to define the needs and the programs of young offenders will be the measure that determines whether or not this bill represents a significant step, as the minister indicated in his response. The significance is found in the one sentence to which I have referred. I challenge the minister to define that significance for us.

There are many things this bill will not do. This bill will not change the economic conditions of inflation and high interest which forces two parents to carry on two full-time jobs, or perhaps three, just to survive or meet their basic requirements of food and shelter. It will not change the social disadvantage of economic privation; it will not change that. This bill will not solve youth unemployment, nor will it solve the social and negative results of the drug and alcohol symptoms of the turned-off youth in our society. It will not solve those problems. The attitudes of this bill must be a larger part of every piece of legislation which passes the House of Commons. We should not be discussing only the effects of adolescent crime at this time. When we are discussing inflation and high interest rates, we should be reminded that there is a relationship to youth problems. When we are discussing a bill of rights in the House of Commons, we should be recognizing the value of the family relationship. I am disappointed that we did not recognize the importance of the family in our Constitution. The family must be made strong so that young people, the adolescents about whom we are talking, can find a way back into their families. We need to show our intention, that we understand it by mentioning it in our Constitution. We need to recognize that materialistic values must be redefined or reunderstood. Perhaps it is more important to have a little less materially but to have one parent in the home. It is important to have a father in the home. There is an attitude in society that we all go out to work in the morning and we come home to rest. When we come to rest, our family is there, our young people are there. It should be the other way around. We should go out to get a job, to earn a living in order to build our families, and we should come home to work with our young people and to spend time with them. What a hypocrite I am to stand here at 9.30 at night saying that we should spend more time with our families. I stand on the floor of the House on my son's birthday. My wife had to go out to a PTA meeting—and here I am. We must begin to work with our families in order to strengthen them, to strengthen our values and to uphold those which are right and sound. They are the value of the family, our spiritual values, our societal values, the values of work, achievement and recognition and acknowledgement of those achievements, and the heritage of our country. All these values must be upheld in everything we do in this House of Commons and in the way in which we live.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wenman: Mr. Speaker, when we speak about this bill, it sometimes seems that it is not of too much significance. Surely if we look at it carefully we will see that it is, in fact, the very core. It is where we see reflected all the things which are wrong with our society, in the abuses and neglect which we show to our young people. I think we can create this 15-year-old boy that we are talking about now. This 15-year-old boy needs a time and a place, a time to achieve and a time to be recognized. Can we create that society? I hope we can.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight to address a matter that really should have been dealt with a long time before I was elected to this House. Although I am thankful for the opportunity to take part in this debate, it seems to me that the opportunity should not have been accorded due to the fact that this piece of legislation should have been introduced and passed many years ago. Yet, I must express my surprise at the Solicitor General's comments as to the amount of discussion which should be afforded to this bill by the members of this chamber. When he introduced this bill for second reading on April 15 of this year, the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) said:

—I think a relatively short period of time should be devoted to second reading—

Obviously, his reason for making that suggestion is so that the bill may proceed to committee where full discussion should take place. I believe this is a bill of great importance, not only to the people of my constituency but to the entire population of Canada. Therefore I hope that the Solicitor General will forgive me for delaying somewhat the referral of this bill to committee in order that I may let my views be heard in this chamber.

As I have already stated, this legislation is long overdue. As the Solicitor General indicated in his remarks on April 15, there have been many previous ministers responsible who have made an attempt to introduce such legislation. Undoubtedly the Solicitor General's predecessor, the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence), would have done so himself had it not been for the fact that the Liberal government, in co-operation with the New Democratic Party, decided to change the direction of Canada and push us all down an economic spout and defeat the previous administration. No doubt the present Solicitor General has been itching for an opportunity to introduce this bill for quite a while, but he has not had the opportunity to do so due to his leader's preoccupation with the Constitution and getting it through Parliament.

When I say that this bill is long overdue, I have in mind the comments of the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand) when he was solicitor general. On December 18, 1974, as reported on page 2363 of Hansard, the then solicitor general, in response to a question from my colleague, the Conservative member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen), said:

We hope to have a draft bill and a white paper prepared for early spring.

Unfortunately, the House never saw that draft. It did not see a draft in the spring of 1975 or in the spring of 1976. Finally, in the spring of 1977 a sort of draft bill was introduced by the then solicitor general, who now sits as the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox). On March 21, 1977, the then solicitor general introduced a paper entitled "Highlights of the Proposed New Legislation for Young Offenders." Many of the members on this side of the House, such as the former member for Calgary North, Mr. Eldon Woolliams, were great proponents of the young offenders legislation. They believed that the time had finally come. A week after that paper was tabled, a series of meetings began between federal and provincial representatives to hammer out the consensus needed to ensure that the enactment of such legislation would, in fact, meet the desired goals. But that proposal did not quite get to see the light of day.

It can be seen that as far back as 1967, when a bill was brought before this House dealing with the antiquated star chamber attitude of the Juvenile Delinquents Act, right up to the present time we have discussed in this place over and over the fact that the present act should be changed.

I sincerely hope that this bill will not meet the same fate as previous ones. We can see why the Solicitor General might be a bit worried and why he might suggest that we get on with it and refer this matter to committee. Generally, we on this side of the House can agree with him. We understand the need to accomplish the passage of this legislation. But we still believe that this bill is not perfect. Yet it is still a good piece of legislation. This is certainly not surprising in light of the fact that the present Solicitor General had the hard work and expertise of his predecessor to draw from, along with many other solicitors general from previous years. I do not mean to take anything away from the present Solicitor General in saying that.

I would now like to turn to the contents of the bill which, as I have stated, has many substantive changes within its pages which are badly needed. In Bill C-61 we see that the over-all philosophy has shifted from one of parental responsibility in the Juvenile Delinquents Act to the more acceptable and practical approach of a youth being held responsible to some degree for his actions. This is the same philosophy which was adopted by the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland when he was solicitor general. It is also the same approach as put forward by the ministerial proposals of 1977. This is described in section 3(1) of the bill which states:

> It is hereby recognized and declared that
> (a) while young persons should not in all instances be held accountable in the same manner or suffer the same consequences for their behaviour as adults, young persons who commit offences should nonetheless bear responsibility for their contraventions and society must be afforded the necessary protection from illegal behaviour;

At the same time this bill addresses the adult, which I think is significant and very important. Section 10 (3) states:

> A parent who is ordered to attend a youth court pursuant to subsection (1) and who fails without reasonable excuse, the proof of which lies on that parent, to comply with the order
> (a) is guilty of contempt of court;
> (b) may be dealt with summarily by the court; and
> (c) is liable to the punishment provided for in the Criminal Code—

We can see that the bill begins to address the responsibility of the young person, as well as the responsibility of the adult.

There is no problem for members on this side with the minimum age under which a youth may be prosecuted under the act. As we all know, the present statute holds that a seven-year-old can be prosecuted. The bill before us changes the minimum age to 12 years old. The limit of 12 years is certainly a reasonable one and one which has found agreement on all sides of the House, as well as in the provinces. However, where we do get into difficulty is where the maximum age is concerned. This is due to provincial inconsistencies. It was the desire of my party to have a uniform maximum age, that age being one on which both the federal and provincial governments could come to an agreement. That was our position, and it is still my hope, Mr. Speaker, that this government can garner an agreement from the provinces in order that such uniformity can be achieved. This is the entire reason for the amendment put forward by my colleagues, the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland and the hon. member for Edmonton-Stratchcona (Mr. Kilgour).

I would also like to draw attention to the legal and other rights which will be granted to young offenders through this legislation. Such rights are a necessity for this to be a meaningful piece of legislation. I am glad that they are included.

Mr. Speaker, I could go on at length about the good points of this bill, for there are many. However, I feel that there are other aspects that should be mentioned at some point in this debate, aspects which are not really touched on in the bill and which could therefore easily go unnoticed, both in this chamber and at the committee stage.

What I would like to speak to now are the rehabilitative aspects of the bill. It has been said many times in this House that our greatest resource in this country is not our oil and gas, nor is it our forests and fisheries. Our greatest resource is neither a vegetable nor a mineral. It is our children. That is where our future lies. With that in mind it should be clear that a good deal of emphasis should be placed on the future path of our children. This bill certainly goes a long way in improving the prospects of delinquents, but we must ask if it goes far enough.

Surely one of the reasons we have had a separate piece of legislation for offenders against the law who are not adults is that we desire to make sure that the young offender does not mature into an adult offender.

We can look at this bill and see that the legislation does attempt to ensure that a life of crime will not continue. This is evident when we look at the dispositions available at the court upon conviction. They range from an absolute discharge to such things as a $1,000 fine; restitution and compensation orders; getting the offender involved in community service; having the offender compensate the victim; probationary periods of up to two years; custody of up to two years; ancillary conditions, and combinations of all of these.

I was very fortunate when I attended college in Minnesota that the professor of one of my classes was the head of Minnesota corrections. In dealing with him and working with him I was very fortunate to have an opportunity to work on a movie on the juvenile institutions of Minnesota.

One of the things brought out in that work very clearly and profoundly was the need for more than just institutions. We saw the whole gamut, from the bars and unbreakable glass right through to the pretty colours, plexiglass and nice looking buildings, but in fact that is not where the answer lies.

What really worries me is that not enough will be done to ensure that an offender will not return to his or her old ways. I am hopeful that this topic will see much discussion in the committee stage, and I hope that such discussions will not be limited to just the items which are covered by the bill. For example, I point to the rapid rate at which juvenile offences are accelerating in the middle-class strata. Not long ago there were many who believed that the rate of juvenile delinquency was a problem only in poverty-stricken homes. I do believe that is the case, Mr. Speaker. In fact, Mr. Marc Leblanc not long ago conducted a study to determine whether delinquency, defined as law-violating behaviour, is distributed randomly throughout the various economic strata. He states as follows:

—It is interesting to note that the adolescent from the upper class milieu commits as many delinquent acts as the adolescent from the working class milieu.

He continues and concludes:

Economic development and a rise in the standard of living do not seem to reduce delinquency. Poverty and posterity alike seem to produce the same effect.

In his essay entitled "Middle Class Delinquency", Mr. Leblanc also states:

—Observation indicates that the highest rate of delinquency exists in the most affluent countries.

Obviously, Mr. Speaker, our problem does not stem from the economic situation; it comes from something more serious, more rooted, something to which we must give more thought.

One of the things that society and we as individuals must address is the whole matter of the divorce rate, and stress on the family. What is happening? Our family unit is breaking down. The divorce rate is climbing. Is it any wonder that those kids lack a responsible adult model to follow? Does that in itself not create a lot of problems that result in an increase in juvenile delinquency?

If it is not an economic problem, then we should be looking at other areas, not only as legislators but as individuals and family people ourselves.

I am trying to point out that as an affluent nation, we can expect to have an increase in juvenile offences as our level of affluence rises. This means that we will have more and more children who will have to be watched through the legislation which is before us today. It means that the young offenders' court system will have a greater burden to carry in the future. Yet, nowhere do I see any indication that the facilities will be provided to ensure that the young offender will have the opportunity to be rehabilitiated before it is too late.

In the same context, I should like to point to another danger. This has to do with the provisions in the bill for commital and custody. We see that the youth court will retain jurisdiction over the offender until the sentence is pronounced, at which time the provincial director will decide on the place and level of custody. It is extremely crucial to have adequate facilities available for young offenders where they will not be exposed to criminal methods.

If a province is unable to handle its young offenders, that is, if a province is unable to provide an institution where a youth offender is placed in a hospitable surrounding, where will that offender be placed? What kind of institution will that young man or woman be sent to? If we look at the reform schools which presently house many of the offenders under the Juvenile Delinquents Act, we can see that they are certainly not the type of places that are totally conducive to reform. Albeit the facilities are certainly better now than they were 20 or 30 years ago, I find it hard to believe that they are good for the offender.

As stated in the principle of the bill, society must be protected. We must ask ourselves: at what cost should society protect itself? Should we begin to upgrade and improve the youth detainment facilities across the country, or should we be content with the present facilities and cross our fingers in the hope that the 14-year-old B and E artist will somehow see the light through the barred windows of his reformatory dorm?

As I mentioned earlier, when studying in Minnesota I had an opportunity to study a novel experiment being carried out in Europe which had some merit and which I think we should be examining in Canada. A widow in a community would be given a very small home and a small group of juvenile delinquents. She would also be given a very small amount of financial assistance, just enough to allow the group to feed and clothe themselves. It left them with a certain amount of financial need. As a result, those kids were expected to contribute to the financial needs of the home. The impact was phenomenal and the results were tremendous. The recidivism amongst those kids was almost zero.

In his essay, "Learning Technical Skills", Peter Letkemen gives a detailed account of the effects of reform institutions on the young offender. Mr. Letkemen points out that in most cases a person does not commit crime as an adult after a period of normal middle-class life, but that early delinquency "does seem to be a prerequisite for the adult criminal career".

Mr. Letkemen shows through numerous case studies how the hardened con began his career by stealing hub caps for which he was sentenced to a period of correctional rehabilitation in a reform school or similar institution. Time and again the cases show that in most instances the offender was actually educated in those institutions on how to become a successful criminal; hence the title that Mr. Letkemen uses, "Learning Technical Skills" is really a tongue-in-cheek title. In fact, those technical skills are criminal skills, skills that we do not want our young people to learn, skills that we are trying to do away with. In fact, the institution is a university for that kind of learning program.

I should like to read a few passages from this work which illustrate what I am trying to say. He writes:

Delinquency is also associated with the reformatory experience, which seems to be a first formal step in the direction of the criminal career.

Not only does it segregate the delinquent from his non-delinquent peers, but reformatory conversation as my respondent's comments indicate, centres around crime, perhaps even more than in jails and penitentiaries.

In other words, the point of interest for any debate seems to be crime. Mr. Letkemen goes into an actual conversation he had with one of his cases, as follows:

He mentions that he worked in a factory for three years and did part-time stealing on the side. He started using drugs and was arrested for illegal possession of narcotics and sentenced to six months in a reformatory, and in there he felt his criminal education began.

The convict then says:

And I went to a reformatory and in there I would say my criminal education began. In the shop that I was working at, that is, in the reformatory, I got talking to one guy about laying notes. And he showed me a couple of ways of laying notes, and explained to me how lucrative it could be. And various other ways of B and E—

We can see that in many cases reformatories are nothing more than educational institutions, promoting an education and giving a degree in something that our society and our legislation is trying to eradicate.

Perhaps those remarks would be more suitable in a debate on penitentiary reform. But I want to point out to this House that this is a very difficult aspect of the revision of the antiquated Juvenile Delinquents Act. It is important to bear in mind that the protection of society from a juvenile offender is obviously in society's interests, but it is even more obviously important to ensure that the juvenile does not become an adult offender. One of the things I discovered in working on a movie in Minnesota was that the recidivism rate among juveniles was 63 per cent. That means, for every 100 young people who ended up in some kind of reformatory, 63 would return. Obviously that system is not working. What are we going to do in Canada? We have to address that problem. It is a fundamental element of this bill.

This legislation before us does much to improve our old ways. The dispositions of the court are many and varied in order that the judge may find the best method of protection and rehabilitation. The committal to and the release from custody portions of this legislation are certainly better than those we have presently. The review of dispositions will certainly go a long way in keeping a watchful eye over the offender. But I ask this House to place some emphasis on the fact that we must protect the young offender from the world of crime if we are to protect ourselves. I hope that when this bill reaches committee, members from all sides will look for ways in which this legislation might be improved in this area. For the thousands upon thousands of young people who know not what they are doing, we should explore this area meticulously before we enact this bill.

I mentioned briefly the amendment put forward by my colleagues. It is an important amendment. If I can refer very briefly to the bill, I think we can see why. If we look at clause 2 under the heading "Interpretation", we can see the definition of an adult. An adult means a person who is neither a young person nor a child. If we turn to the next page we can see "young person". The definition reads:

"young person" means a person who is or, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, appears to be

(a) twelve years of age or more, but

(b) under eighteen years of age or, in a province in respect of which a proclamation has been issued under subsection (2), under sixteen or seventeen years, whichever age is specified by the proclamation, and, where the context requires, includes any person who is charged under this act with having committed an offence while he was a young person or is found guilty of an offence under this act;

If we look at those two definitions, we find right off the bat that we have started off with an inconsistency. We have a problem. In one province a person is an adult at the age of 16 while in another province a person is an adult at the age of 18. In one province a person is still a kid at the age of 17, while in another province at age 16 the person is an adult.

The amendment which my colleagues have brought forward is one that I can support wholeheartedly. I think it is a great improvement to this bill. As I have said throughout my speech, there are many things that I find good about the bill, many things I can support, and I think when we look at this amendment and attach it to the bill, we will find that we are dealing with and improving a piece of legislation which is so necessary. This is very important legislation. It affects our real assets, our youth. It is a far-reaching bill with many implications. It has many things which all of us must be concerned about as parents, as members of society and as legislators. It is important. Therefore, I would like to conclude tonight by saying that I would encourage the Solicitor General to support my colleagues' amendment so we can see this legislation proceed and begin to address some of the problems we face in society today.

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, may I say what a privilege it is to follow the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper) who is carrying on the tradition of distinguished representation in this House of Commons, which became part of a legend in this House when his predecessor from Peace River, Mr. Ged Baldwin, QC, served that constituency and served the system of law and justice with distinction for many years.

Although there is not very much time left this evening, I do want to address the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) at the outset on a matter which has to do with the amendment moved by the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence), seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour) as this debate began at about three o'clock this afternoon. Over the course of the day following the introduction of that amendment, there has not been a speaker from the government side to speak to the merits of the amendment. I am not telling tales out of school when I say that I had been part of the speaker's list much earlier than this tonight. I waited hoping there would be someone from the government side to address the question of the important amendment mentioned by the hon. member for Peace River which does go to the heart of one of the principles of the bill. Quite frankly, I had hoped that question could be addressed and we would know the disposition of the government on the matter long before this, particularly when it involves a reasoned amendment put forward by members of Parliament and accepted by the Chair. I am not suggesting that the Chair acted improperly. On the contrary, I think it acted quite properly because the process of reasoned amendments is a good thing. It brings a new connotation to the debate. It is incumbent then upon someone on behalf of the government to rise immediately and address the question. There will be other opportunities for the government to do so, but I think it is important that not a whole day of debate go by without a serious amendment being addressed by the government.

The amendment is important because the bill has a provision in it, as one hon. member put it earlier, that there can be a different style and basis for justice in the country applying to young people depending upon which area of the country they may come from. One might be a young offender and be treated as such in one way if he or she lives in the province of Quebec, as was explained earlier by an hon. member. If that same person committed the same offence in Ontario he or she could be treated completely differently. We have ten provinces in the country and that situation would occur and could recur in ten different ways.

Mr. Kaplan: That is the way it is today.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): The Solicitor General interjects and says that is the way it is today. He is right. That is the way it is today. That is one of the things wrong with the Juvenile Delinquents Act, it applies differently in different parts of Canada, and that is my point.

The point of the amendment is that if the Government of Canada has rejected checkerboards with respect to the Constitution of Canada as being improper because they set up different rights in different parts of Canada, then surely the same principle ought to be rejected in the young offenders act. That is the point of the amendment. It is an important point for young people. It is an important point for law enforcement officials, and members of Parliament ought not to sit through a whole day's debate while that point is not addressed by members of the government.

May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

[English]

WESTERN DEVELOPMENT FUND—IMPROVEMENT OF INSUFFICIENT WATER SUPPLIES

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, the reference that I am about to discuss tonight goes back to last February 26, page 7700 of Hansard. On that occasion I had addressed a question to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) that was prompted by his speech to the Montreal Canadian Club on February 23.

In that speech the minister made a direct reference to the $4 billion western development fund, $2 billion of which was to be spent over the next three years as a catalyst for co-operative efforts with the government and people of western Canada to ensure that potential constraints to longer-term development such as, and this is a direct quote from that Montreal speech, "inadequate transportation services or insufficient water supplies, are addressed on a timely effective basis."

I then asked the minister to enlarge somewhat on that very specific reference to insufficient water supplies in the west. I am sure that my question, which was a very serious one, caught the minister off guard as he was only able to respond very generally and vaguely.

In my supplemental question, I was even more specific and asked if this water reference might relate to a much-needed long-range contingency drought policy which the west is dearly in need of, or could it refer to the challenge of interbasin water transfers from rivers in northern Canada to southern Canada, in the west.

I also made a sincere and appropriate compliment about that high profile federal agency, the PFRA. I sincerely hope that the parliamentary secretary who is to respond does indeed address himself to my remarks and obvious concerns about prairie water supplies and the serious potential of drought across the southern prairies.

Since last February, the potential for another drought has worsened considerably, and I say that in spite of the first general rains of the spring that came only last week. Those rains were quite adequate along western Alberta, but tapered off to much less than adequate at the Alberta-Saskatchewan border. In my opinion there is sufficient soil moisture to start growth in both our grasslands and cultivated soils. This is an improvement over last year. However, the critical feature of this potential drought situation is the serious shortage of surface water across the southern parts of all three prairies provinces, and this for the second year in a row.

I am referring to an almost total absence of snow run-off water over that entire area. This, of course, was the inevitable result of no snow to melt in the spring, a situation which began on Christmas day and really developed into a winter drought for the balance of the entire winter. The net result was a complete lack of a spring flood for the thousands of small forage projects which produce most of the forage feed supplies for next winter, again for the second year in succession.

It is the western cattle industry that will once again face severe feed shortages, and this time with considerably less carry-over of hay from previous years as well as reduced grass supplies. I must point out that spring and early summer rains can still come—I certainly hope they will—but, with very few exceptions, they will not make a hay crop.

The minister's Montreal speech sounded as if the government had some contingency plans for needed water development on the prairies. If this is so, why not tell us about it? If PFRA is to be given the green light on a new phase of water conservation and utilization, let us hear about it. We have already had six weeks of serious dust storms from Lethbridge to Dauphin, Manitoba.

In spite of all of our present-day sophisticated weather techniques, there is no reason why we cannot have another decade of drought like the dirty thirties of 50 years ago. Let us take another look at interbasin river transfers in the west from our northern streams to the Saskatchewan-Nelson basin system, but all in Canada. The time may not be too far off when our freshwater supplies will be more important than our diminishing petroleum supplies. I have already said the western cattle industry will bear the brunt of this potential drought, much more so than the prairie grain industry.

Is it not about time for the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) to support the cattlemen's income averaging trust account proposal? This is a carefully researched plan put forward initially by the cattlemen themselves with the support of many associations and provinces. It essentially provides for a beef cattle stabilization plan on an individual cattle producer basis. It has much to commend it. This is the type of year when that approach could be very helpful.

My main remarks tonight are directed to the reference of the Minister of Finance to water in that $4-billion contingency plan for the west. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérald Laniel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to reply to the hon. member in the absence and on behalf of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion who left for Europe this evening. In order to give him some particulars on the point he brought up in his question of February 26 with regard to insufficient water supplies and the possibility of a federal program, that is, a program providing emergency assistance in case of drought and the participation in such a program of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Administration.

[English]

The constraint of adequate water supplies in the prairie region of western Canada applies to economic activity in all sectors, not only farming, from basic resource processing to agriculture and community and industrial development. The drought periods are those periods where inadequate supply shows up, and the very nature of the drought and when it occurs often has different effects on the economy. Recent analysis shows that a drought affecting agriculture in Saskatchewan by reducing, as an example, farm income to the extent of $450 million, could have a negative over-all effect on the Canadian economy of $1.6 billion.

With the increase of economic activity in western Canada, it is time to define these water constraints in relation to economic growth and stabilization—and in this I agree with the hon. member—to determine the level of water supplies which are adequate in times of drought, and to implement projects and programs to release these constraints.

The federal government, of course, does not operate in the water supply field unilaterally. The provinces have extensive responsibilities in respect of water management and economic development. Therefore, discussions with the people of western Canada and provincial governments particularly, must be a prelude to the federal government implementing programs to release water constraints.

It is, therefore, too early to say at this time which projects could be selected and what role the PFRA could play in the planning and implementation of those projects. It is not too early, however, to say that water supplies offer extensive constraints to economic development, and the federal government is willing to play its role in relieving these constraints.

In respect of the general planning and development of western Canada from the source of that $4 billion, perhaps the basic thing is to tackle this first problem before spending more money, making sure that everyone is protected; not just the farmers but those people who will help the further economic development of western Canada.

AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY—1. RESULTS OF CANADA-UNITED STATES MINISTERIAL DISCUSSIONS—APPEAL FOR RESTRICTIONS ON IMPORTS. 2. FUTURE OF CANADA-UNITED STATES AUTO PACT

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Mr. Speaker, my remarks this evening stem specifically from my questions in this House on Monday, April 13, 1981, regarding the ailing auto industry in this country, and generally from many other questions during the last year to date put by me, by other members of this House, and certainly by the ladies and gentlemen of the press and others concerned with the state of the auto industry, which not only affects its employees and the industry itself but the economy as a whole.

I will not dwell on statistics because of time limitations and because basically most people know the statistics in this area. However, I would like to bring those statistics up to date very quickly. Yesterday the Automobile Importers of Canada came out with a statistic which shows that one out of every four cars in this country is an imported car. That is an increase of 71.5 per cent over last year. The second statistic shows that the Canadian deficit on parts under the U.S.-Canada auto pact has reached a staggering $4.2 billion. Those two areas, imports and the U.S.-Canada auto pact, are the two major concerns this government should be facing. Indeed, for over a year the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) and others from the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce have had numerous discussions and consultations both with the United States, with regard to the auto pact, and with offshore exporter countries, particularly Japan, which now sells 21 per cent of all automobiles sold in Canada.

When asked about the auto pact, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce said, "We are not talking about joint decisions", that is, with the United States; "we are talking about making our own decisions". That was on April 11 or 12 of this year. However, no decisions have been taken. There have been none whatsoever. When we asked him about imports after the Japanese made an agreement with the United States, he said we will take unilateral action if the Japanese do not give us terms similar to those they gave to the United States. The discussions of last Saturday between the Prime Minister of Japan and our own Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) have failed. In fact, there are reports today that an official of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce said:

> We have had a telex from our trade mission saying there was progress made on both sides during the talks. There was agreement to hold further talks—

That is the progress being made.

In the few minutes I have left I want to point out two things. First, Japanese imports must be curtailed to some extent, and not just with quotas because our situation in Canada is different from the situation in the United States. Therefore, we must not only legislate quotas but we must also tie them into an increase in local content plus an increase in foreign investment in the auto industry in Canada. We need this because after the agreement between Japan and the United States to reduce Japanese imports into the United States by 7.7 per cent, Canada is virtually alone among western industrialized nations with no restrictions whatsoever except the conventional duty. I could go down the list. Australia, the United Kingdom, France, Argentina, Italy and Spain all have restrictions dealing either with local content or other forms of restrictions which support their own auto industries. Yet in our country that industry is going down the tube. This affects one out of six employees in Ontario alone.

The second point upon which I want to touch is anti-dumping by the Japanese, and by the Soviets as well with respect to their Lada cars.

I have dug up statistics with respect to specific Japanese models. The Honda Civic, for example, is sold in Canada for $769 less than it is sold in the United States. The Datsun 310 is sold for $828 less in Canada than it is in the United States. The Toyota Tercel is sold in Canada for $721 less than in the United States. That is, of course, before federal sales tax and the exchange of the dollar is taken into account. However, the Japanese receive roughly 18 per cent to 20 per cent less for the same automobiles which are dumped into Canada, and this is before the reduction in the United States. Can hon. members imagine what will happen to our market if members of this government continue to sit on their fat behinds and fail to act, except to talk and to say there will be more discussions and more discussions? What will happen after imports into the United States are reduced? Hundreds of thousands of cars suddenly will not be shipped into the United States. They cannot be shipped to the other western nations because they have restrictions.

I will refer to just one example. In Mexico there is 50 per cent local content. An imported automobile has to have 50 per cent local content. The list goes on.

I realize that I am running out of time. I do not want the parliamentary secretary to say the same thing the minister has been saying, that is, that there are more deliberations and meetings under way, because the industry, the economy and we have had enough. It is time this government took some action, and now is the time to take the action. I want to hear what it will be and when it will be taken.

Mr. Gérald Laniel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure I will be able to satisfy the hon. member. We, of course, understand his preoccupation. It is a preoccupation of most Canadians, and not just those in Ontario or in provinces where there are automobile industries. The whole of the Canadian economy is affected by the industry, but in referring to the question put by the hon. member I wish to try to answer as succinctly as I can.

Mr. Speaker, the discussions held by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) with the commercial representative of the United States and the trade secretary in Washington last April 10, to which the hon. member referred in his question, were an opportunity to review a whole series of questions which interest and concern both countries, particularly the auto industry.

During President Reagan's visit to Canada in March, it was also agreed to continue the discussions already launched with the previous American administration concerning the automotive agreement and the over-all situation of the auto industry. The recent discussions held in Washington by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce gave us the opportunity to make the United States aware of the need to develop the North American industry in a way which is fair and equitable for both countries. Since an American delegation had gone to Tokyo to negotiate lower exports to the United States and to make the Japanese government aware of the situation of the auto industry in the United States, and since a similar Canadian delegation was about to leave for Japan, discussions during the visit of President Reagan made it possible to get better acquainted with the respective positions of the two countries concerning imports from Japan.

The Government of Canada is concerned over the automotive industry and has already taken several steps to help it, as we did with Chrysler Corporation, and through other measures which were announced in the House. With respect to imports of Japanese cars, the Japanese government knows that the Government of Canada expects that any restriction which the Japanese might make in their exports to the United States would apply to Canada. In its discussions with the United States, the Canadian government will continue to seek ways to improve the application of the automotive agreement and thus enable the North American industry to get back on its feet.

Finally, Mr. Speaker—

● (2215)

[English]

I wish to bring to the attention of the hon. member that as of today we must say that Canadian officials in fact made progress in discussions in Tokyo last week. They agreed on the importance of an earlier resolution of this question for the increasingly close relationship between the two countries. We looked forward to an early resumption of the discussion between Canada and Japan and Japanese officials, and we are optimistic that the matter can be resolved in a mutually satisfactory manner.

The hon. member will have to recognize that Canada benefits from its trade with Japan in a positive way. Our trade surplus is $1.6 billion and we have a bigger tariff than Japan. All these things must be taken into account if we want to protect not only the automobile industry but the whole industry of Canada.

HEALTH AND SAFETY—USE OF DALKON SHIELD INTRAUTERINE DEVICES

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, since 1971 some 127,000 Dalkon shield intrauterine devices have been sold in Canada. The manner in which this device entered the Canadian market, the inadequate premarket testing of this device, the inadequate substance and application of our medical devices regulations, and the continuing inaction of the Liberal government which has endangered the health of Canadian women, illustrate precisely the type of situation that in Canada has become the rule rather than the exception.

Since becoming NDP health critic, I have asked many questions in the House relating to medical devices. None so completely exposes the weaknesses of our medical devices regulations as this one concerning Dalkon shields. None so completely exposes the fact that Liberal governments are only willing to act after large numbers of complaints are received by the Department of National Health and Welfare about a particular device.

A little history is in order. As I said before, some 127,000 Dalkon shield intrauterine devices were sold in Canada prior to 1974. Ninety per cent of these were actually implanted in the bodies of Canadian women. In 1974, A. H. Robins, the manufacturer of this particular device, ceased production presumably in an attempt to stave off the perceptions of liability which were growing with the evidence that more than 20 per cent of women who had Dalkon shields had problems within three years of insertion. This is U.S. data, as usual there is no Canadian data.

These devices were not recalled by government. Women were not informed of the danger. The company simply stopped making them. Subsequent studies showed that if a shield is left in for seven years, the probability of a major problem occurring is almost a certainty.

In September, 1980, A. H. Robins, responding to the growing body of literature associating the Dalkon shield with a certain form of pelvic infection, put out a press release concurring with recommendations that the shield be removed from asymptomatic women, which is to say, women who as yet are experiencing no problem with their Dalkon IUD.

The problem is this. According to Robert Manchester, a lawyer for the Boston Women's Network and an expert on the issue, there are likely some 12,000 women in Canada who may still be using this device.

All I have asked of the government in the House and subsequently in a letter to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) is that a medical alert be put out on this device. Why not? What is the reason for not doing so?

In a letter of reply to me, the minister said that there have not been enough Canadian incidences to justify any action. How many is enough? Does the minister think that the reproductive organs of American women are more susceptible to disease than those of Canadian women, thus invalidating the evidence? By what twisted logic or, worse, fatuous indifference characteristic of the Minister of National Health and Welfare does she purport to be acting responsibly in this particular situation?

In its response to me this evening, no doubt the government will lament the fact that there are thousands of classes of medical devices on the market, and bewail its incapacity to test or regulate them all. What it will not say is that only five classes of these devices out of those thousands are subject to regulation and premarket review, and these five have been picked in response to public opinion rather than systematic scientific caution.

We are the laughing stock of the western industrialized world when it comes to the protection we offer Canadians in this area of concern, that of medical devices. If the Minister of National Health and Welfare does not act soon on this by bringing in amendments to the appropriate legislation and in other ways so that Canadian women and their health are not sacrificed to profit and to the inertia of her bureaucracy, she will be quite rightly laughed out of her image as protector of the health of Canadians.

Mr. Norman Kelly (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, the intrauterine device marketed under the trade name Dalkon shield was manufactured by A. H. Robins of Richmond, Virginia, U.S.A. It was first available in Canada in August, 1971. It was promoted actively and its sales here rose from 26,000 in the first year to 54,000 in 1973. By 1975 a total of 127,000 units had been distributed.

The company became aware of some 36 cases of septic abortion in the U.S.A. in 1973 and, in consultation with the health protection branch of the Department of Health and Welfare, issued a "Dear Doctor" letter on May 30, 1974, informing Canadian physicians about potential problems. At about the same time, further sales of the device were suspended in Canada. A survey by the department's regional offices that fall confirmed that the Dalkon shield was no longer available for sale on the Canadian market.

In view of the importance of intrauterine devices, a nationwide survey was carried out in 1974 to determine use patterns and adverse reactions. The evidence obtained via questionnaires from physicians did not indicate that the Dalkon shield was significantly more hazardous than others. However, it became evident that IUDs in general could give rise to health problems, and all major manufacturers of this product were asked to submit before March 1, 1975, evidence of safety and effectiveness of their IUDs. On June 4, 1975, the Canadian distributor of A. H. Robins was informed that, on the basis of evidence submitted, further sales of the Dalkon shield would be considered a violation of the Food and Drugs Act. Other manufacturers were requested to provide a package insert listing pertinent warnings and directions for the benefit of the patient. At the same time, steps were taken to require premarket review of all future IUDs.

Mr. Speaker, in 1975, there was no firm scientific or medical evidence to justify replacement of implanted Dalkon shields. However, more recent data indicates that there may be increased risk of pelvic infection if the residence period of any IUD is extended beyond three years.

IUDs, then, have been subject to premarket review since 1976, and manufacturers are now required to recommend explanation or replacement within two years. This matter was reviewed by the health protection branch advisory committee on medical devices only yesterday, May 11, 1981. The contents of a possible "alert letter" to physicians are under discussion. This would review the recent literature and refer to recommended times of removal for each type of IUD.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: A motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock p.m.

At 10.28 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

THE PAPACY

ASSASSINATION ATTEMPT ON LIFE OF POPE JOHN PAUL II

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I am sure that when I make these comments I am expressing the feelings not only of the members of the House but of people throughout Canada in expressing shock and horror at the assassination attempt on the life of His Holiness, Pope John Paul II. Obviously at this stage it is difficult to know the details of this tragic occurrence. It is our hope that we will find as the day develops that the seriousness we now perceive will have been reduced. I should like to tell you, Madam Speaker, and members of the House, that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has been informed of this assassination attempt and has conveyed a message to the Vatican foreign secretary, Cardinal Casaroli.

It is a chilling irony that a man who has given so much of himself to preaching peace and love throughout the world should himself become the target of such violence. All Canadians, I am sure, will be waiting with hope and joining with us in prayer for the life of Pope John Paul II.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I want to associate myself, my leader, my party, and all of my colleagues in the House with the statement that has been made by the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) on behalf of the people of the country.

We reacted when we heard of this assassination attempt, and are still reacting, with a sense of shock and sorrow that a man of his stature in the world should be struck down the way in which he was.

Pope John Paul II has inspired people of every religion, race and culture as he has reached out to the whole world in the search that has been his for peace and justice. He has amazed all of us with his vigour, his great warmth for people and how he has been able to touch them. People all over the world, believers and non-believers, have been moved by his messages of hope in which one theme has predominated, that the human right to a life of justice and security implanted in every human being must be achieved and safeguarded by policies and programs of peace.

We pray that this leader will be spared to a world so much in need of his message of faith, hope and love. I associate myself, my party and all of my colleagues, with these remarks. I hope there will be found a way to convey to the Vatican the messages that will come from this House of Commons today. I join with the Deputy Prime Minister in the fervent hope that, as the day unfolds, the prognosis for a full and complete recovery of this great leader of the world will be good.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, it was with indignation that we have learned the sad news about the assassination attempt on the life of His Holiness, Pope John Paul II. On behalf of my party I extend to him our best wishes for a prompt recovery.

[English]

As has already been indicated, it is tragic that one who has obviously dedicated his life to the furtherance of peace and justice should have been struck down in the worldwide spread of terrorism and violence. I know I speak for all Canadians when I say we wish him a complete and speedy recovery.

THE ADMINISTRATION

STATEMENTS MADE BY MINISTER OF FINANCE AND MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 to seek clarification of divergent statements made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan). The finance minister disclaims all responsibility for high interest rates and inflation, while his colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, has publicly promised relief to farmers and small businessmen to cushion them from the effects, through amendments to the Bank Act. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Elzinga):

That this House demands an explanation of the conflicting statements being made by members of the treasury benches—to wit, the ministers of finance and agriculture. We would like to know if this was an inadvertent slip by the Minister of Agriculture while he opened his mouth to change feet.

INDUSTRY

TRIDENT AIRCRAFT CORPORATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, I hope I shall receive the unanimous consent of the House to a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In light of the outlay of some $6 million in federal public funds to the Trident Aircraft Corporation of Sidney, British Columbia, thereby raising the expectations of the employees of that firm to heights from which they were bound to fall, and because of the casual and covert manner in which the assets of that company have been liquidated, only last week, at a considerable loss to the federal treasury, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie):

That the Auditor General be required to investigate all the circumstances surrounding this unwarranted disregard of the government's responsibility for public funds by committing them, first of all, to a venture that was foredoomed to failure because of the unmarketability of an untested product the unfortunate employees were expected to produce, and subsequently permitting liquidation procedures to be carried out without proper and open accountability.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

BURDEN OF DEBT LOAD ON LOWER INCOME FAMILIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 and seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell), I move:

That this House records its deep concern over the massive load of debt being carried by Canadian families in the lower income brackets, a load that is made unbearable by today's higher than ever interest rates, and this House therefore calls on the government to roll back interest rates on the debts of those on lower incomes, and also to take immediate steps to raise all lower incomes so that no Canadian and no Canadian family will have to exist below the poverty line, a disgrace which must be corrected.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

FISHERIES

BARRIER AGAINST EXPORT OF SWORDFISH TO UNITED STATES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the U.S. law prohibiting the importation of swordfish from Canada with a mercury content exceeding one part per million while permitting the catching of swordfish in U.S. waters is discriminating against Canadian fishermen and will cause an estimated loss this year to Nova Scotia fishermen alone of $10 million or more, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby):

That the Minister of Finance in collaboration with the Minister of Fisheries contact their American counterparts at Washington requesting that this customs barrier be removed.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

TRADE

PRICING PRACTICES OF FOREIGN AUTOMOBILE MANUFACTURERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on an urgent and important matter.

In view of the fact that Soviet-built Ladas are being dumped into Canada at prices below their real value, and because Japanese auto imports, which, by the way, increased by a whopping 71.5 per cent in April, are entering Canada at approximately 20 per cent below their established value—for example, the basic price of a Honda Civic is $937 lower than in the United States, and a Datsun 310 has a basic price which is $863 lower than in the United States—I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn):

That the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce be instructed to initiate, forthwith, an investigation under the provisions of the Anti-Dumping Act into questionable pricing practices of offshore vehicle manufacturers, particularly those of the Soviet Union and Japan.

HONOURS AND DECORATIONS

CONDEMNATION OF PROPOSED SALE OF ORDER OF CANADA AWARD—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Etobicoke-Lakeshore): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The Toronto Star reported on March 28, 1981, that the Order of Canada awarded to the late M. J. Coldwell, leader of the former Co-operative Commonwealth Federation, the CCF, now the New Democratic Party, will be auctioned on May 23, 1981, in Toronto and is expected to fetch $4,000.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne):

That this House deplore the sale of the Order of Canada which was given to the late M. J. Coldwell by the Governor General in recognition of his contributions to Canada and which, as such, should not be used for financial gain.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the presentation of this motion?

COMPENSATION TO FARMERS FOR EMBARGO ON SHIPMENTS TO RUSSIA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Len Gustafson (Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Given the very serious economic situation facing farmers, the government's commitment to reimburse farmers for the grain embargo to Russia, and the fact that producers have lost much needed income, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise):

That the Minister of Agriculture and the government bring an end to their ridiculous stalling tactics and make payment immediately to farmers for the grain embargo.

RELEASE OF DRILLING TERRITORY MAPS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas Petro-Canada has secretly been given at least three million acres and has nominated 14 million additional acres in the Mackenzie valley, and the Dene, the native people who live there, have asked Petro-Canada at least to release the maps showing where the nominated lands are so that they will know if drilling is going to take place in their front yards, and whereas the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development are stopping Petro-Canada from releasing these maps, in keeping with the new dictatorial and colonial attitude as the government moves to "Lalondize" the north, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo):

That this House order those departments to allow Petro-Canada to release forthwith the maps to the native people affected.

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

UREA FORMALDEHYDE HOME TESTING PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, as a result of the pussyfooting of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) over the decision to ban UFFI, on the dangers of which her department was advised as long as three years ago, and because as many as 100,000 Canadian homes may become serious health hazards and, on top of that, very substantial economic liabilities, I move, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Scott):

That the Minister of National Health and Welfare undertake her full responsibilities to the people of this country, whose health may be endangered by UFFI, and launch a thorough identification and testing program to find out exactly what the extent of this problem is, thereby easing some of the anxiety, at least, of a great number of Canadians.

CONDEMNATION OF TERRORISM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Roland de Corneille (Eglinton-Lawrence): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the most basic of all human rights is the right to life, whereas assassinations and terrorism are the most brutal, cowardly and despicable forms of crime and are a radical offence against humanity, whereas the trend to such opprobrious violence has escalated, with assassinations and attempted assassinations, including those aimed at the President of the United States and His Holiness, Pope John Paul II, and whereas the House of Commons unanimously passed a resolution on October 15, 1980, condemning all acts of terrorism anywhere in the world, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Dionne):

That this House expresses its deep grief and revulsion on this day which marks the attack on His Holiness the Pope, expresses our prayers for recovery as well as sorrow and sympathy, calls for all-out international co-operation of security forces to prevent such future crimes, calls for an emergency debate in the United Nations on terrorism, and urges our government to seek ways to convene at once an international conference to mobilize world public opinion, to renounce terrorism, to assist in uncovering plots of violence, and to research new means to control terrorism and assassinations.

QUERY RESPECTING WAGE AND PRICE CONTROLS

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance, and follows some of the questions put to that minister yesterday. Faced with a soft currency, high inflation and high interest rates, all the hallmarks of government mismanagement, the government appears to be sitting rather petrified, not knowing what to do, or alternatively, perhaps having a secret plan. Would the minister indicate if, in fact, the scenario that is developing in Canada is a scenario that he welcomes in anticipation of being able to justify the reimposition of some form of wage and price controls?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I can answer that question quite simply by saying no.

REQUEST FOR INTRODUCTION OF BUDGET

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my question is again to the Minister of Finance who seemed to show so little concern yesterday for the small business people, for the consumers and farmers of this nation, in relation to high interest rates. Perhaps he is a little more concerned this morning after witnessing the deterioration of his own bond issue, floated yesterday, which is down a clear point in spite of the fact that it was yielding, at the long end, over 16 per cent. Would the minsiter indicate if he anticipated such an unsatisfactory bond market as is developing, especially at the long end and, if not, would he at least agree to bring in a new budget at the earliest opportunity so that the scenario we have been referring to may be corrected before it deteriorates still further?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member calls for a new budget at the earliest opportunity. I indicated to hon. members previously that I would, in the normal course, be bringing in a budget later in the year, probably in the fall. If, in the course of debate today and tomorrow, hon. members can bring forward some new, alternative ideas that, because of their validity, would demand immediate implementation, then I would consider doing that very thing.

SUGGESTED COMMITTEE STUDY OF ECONOMY

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, again I direct a question to the Minister of Finance who may be conveniently forgetting that it is only about 14 months since his party told the Canadian public that, if it was elected to power, it knew what to do with respect to the economic affairs of the country.

Would the minister indicate to the House whether he is aware, first, that since the budget was brought in inflation has been running at the rate of 13.9 per cent, and that Dr. Peter Campbell, vice-president and director of Wood Gundy Limited, for example, now predicts that we are heading to a 20 per cent level of inflation? If the minister is aware of this, instead of coming out with this poppycock about this party simply offering some ideas, would he agree to have this matter of the economy referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs so that we can hear witnesses, and we can hear the minister? Perhaps that committee will come up with some solutions if the minister is at a total loss to know what to do at the present time.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, in reply to the questions asked by the hon. member, the first answer is yes, the second answer is no, and the third is that if events justify making a special reference to the standing committee, I will be glad to undertake to do that.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

IMPACT ON SERVICE INDUSTRY

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is a supplementary, to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I think today we have seen a very vivid illustration of the irresponsible approach of the government to the economy in the visit of the members of the oil and gas service industry to Ottawa. These companies, which are all Canadian-owned, estimate that 40 per cent of their number will not be in business in six months' time and that about 75 per cent will not be in business in one year's time, if things are not changed in the energy industry. These companies only represent a small sample of the industry, but they represent over $500 million in sales; they have seen employment in the industry drop by about 30 per cent, and their capital expenditures will drop by over 50 per cent this year alone.

● (1425)

Since energy development is the one area in our outlook where we can see some chance of economic growth in a very, very sick climate, does the minister fully understand the very negative effects of his energy program, particularly in relation to this very important element of the energy industry?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I had meetings with representatives of the service industry last month, and I had the opportunity of exchanges with them again today. I will be meeting other members of that industry later on this afternoon. Indeed it is one sector of the industry that is suffering; many of the smaller firms are facing difficulties. But I am happy to see that their visit to Ottawa followed a visit to Edmonton at which time they impressed upon both governments the importance of reaching a compromise solution to our present difficulties in the energy area.

Contrary to the hon. member, I think these people take a more objective view of the situation and recognize that this is not a matter which is totally dependent upon the federal government, but both the provincial governments, the Alberta government in particular—

Mr. Shields: Who brought in the NEP?

Mr. Lalonde: —and the federal government have a responsibility in that regard. There must be compromise on both parts.

Mr. Shields: Did Lougheed bring in the NEP?

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Athabasca does not have the floor.

Mr. Lalonde: I indicated to the people concerned that I appreciated their representations. I would hope, as we have indicated to the government of Alberta that we were ready to compromise, that there would be the same reciprocal feeling on the part of the government of Alberta.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

POSSIBLE CHANGES IN PROGRAM

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, I think the message these gentlemen left with the minister is that the key is breaking the deadlock. The minister must understand that he was the minister who brought in the program which created the deadlock we have today that is creating the problem.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilson: A related but very important problem that is falling out of the deadlock we have today is the ongoing oil brain drain, the loss of very experienced technically competent people to the United States and other parts of the world who are very important to the development of energy resources in the country and who will be sorely missed if and when the deadlock is broken.

What is the minister doing to assure these people who are leaving the country today, those who left yesterday and those who will leave tomorrow, as a result of the uncertainty here and as a result of the great demand for their talents in other countries, that there will be changes in the program which will cause them to stay in Canada so that we can make use of their talents in the years ahead?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I remind the hon. member, who has been in the House now for a couple of years and who was a member of the previous government, that the deadlock in question has been in effect for over two years. When he was in the government they did not have an agreement.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Nonsense.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss MacDonald: You will have to try harder than that.

Mr. Nielsen: Garbage.

An hon. Member: Where were you for the last year and a half?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, no amount of shouting on the other side will twist history as they are trying to twist it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: The facts are there. I have already had one meeting with Mr. Leitch, the minister of energy for Alberta. I have had discussions with the minister of energy for Saskatchewan. I am planning to have another meeting with Mr. Leitch at the end of this month or early in June. In the meantime our officials have had several meetings. We are making progress. I hope that there will be as much of a willingness to compromise, to arrive at a satisfactory solution, on the part of the government of Alberta as there is on our part.

HOUSING

CALL FOR END TO SPECULATION AND INTRODUCTION OF MORTGAGE PAYMENT ASSISTANCE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, my question is with regard to the negative effects of the high interest rate policy as it affects the ordinary Canadian. My question concerns those who wish to maintain their homes. It pertains directly to the more than 1,000 families a month who are having to give up their CMHC-insured homes because they have been unable to keep up the mortgage payments. Since CMHC is now repossessing these homes and reselling them to speculators who are making a quick buck on the deal, can the minister responsible for housing tell the House why the government does not put an end to this speculation and why, simultaneously, the government does not increase mortgage assistance so that families can maintain their homes?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. It gives me the opportunity to bring to his attention, and to the attention of members of the House, the fact that the industry which was in the doldrums approximately a year ago has picked up. Housing starts in April last year stood at 125,000, and starts this year of 242,000 show that the industry is improving. This shows that there is action in that industry, with the following results: the additional supply of housing should result in prices moderating. Prices have moderated significantly in the metropolitan areas of Toronto and Vancouver. The troubled industry has now rebounded.

At the same time I would like to point out to the hon. member that, although he is concerned about the rate of foreclosures at this time, I am pleased to report that the rate of foreclosures, compared with a year ago, has improved. The number of people experiencing difficulty is declining. I perceive this is related to the general strength and health of the industry.

With regard to providing assistance, we have already taken steps under the AHOP program to provide those people who are pressed with increased payments and interest rates—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, I did not ask the minister to read the whole of his briefing notes. He covered five or six questions that were not asked.

The reality is that the average number of people losing their homes today—not last year—exceeds 1,000 a month. The reality is that the taxpayer is losing up to $20,000 a unit because CMHC is repossessing these houses and reselling them to speculators. One speculator in London ripped off the taxpayers to the tune of $1.5 million as a result of the policy the minister is pursuing. Instead of providing this kind of subsidization for speculators, up to $20,000 a unit, why does the government not come to its senses and enable families to maintain their homes by allowing them to pay a mortgage at a rate they can afford—to keep their homes instead of subsidizing the speculators who do not need the money?

Mr. Cosgrove: Madam Speaker, I should have indicated to the hon. member, in answer to his initial question, that as a matter of policy the corporation from the outset has attempted to resell properties which have come to it by way of default back to families who choose to live in those residences. This has been our primary objective. However, 12 months ago when the market was soft CMHC was finding it very difficult to compete in the market. Some properties, which were good, were let with others which were more difficult to sell. However, since the market has tightened I am sure that the hon. member is aware that in good markets CMHC has not sold to speculators and CMHC is receiving a comparable market price for properties which have come back into the mortgage portfolio.

MEASURES TO SOLVE EMERGENCY

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the same minister concerning the same problem. It is interesting to note that the minister continuously speaks about the market and never about the people who are badly hurt by the housing crisis.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Mitchell: The minister recently said that his housing policy is to stand pat. Mortgage interest rates are not standing pat. Land costs are not standing pat. Speculation is escalating. Families simply cannot afford to spend another $300 or $400 a month on their mortgages. Will the minister tell us what measures, if any, he will take or has taken to cabinet to do something that must be done to solve our housing emergency?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I am sure the comment about standing pat arose out of statements made by members opposite who thought they had identified a weakening of the government's housing commitment in 1981 over 1980. That is not correct. What I was pointing out was that the government's response, for example, to increase by 5,000 units the social commitment of the corporation toward serving people of middle and lower incomes was not repeated this year. As I have indicated, it was not repeated this year because the seasonally adjusted apartment starts for the month of April past are at a five-year high—they have not been that high in five years. We are trying to balance the commitment of the government to the tune of 25,000 units annually in order to solve the social problem and the continuing cost of keeping mortgages down on those 25,000 units to 2 per cent across this country. The government is trying to balance this continuing commitment with the challenge. As I have said, the government responded with 5,000 units last year.

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

STUDY OF CELLULOSE INSULATION

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Can the minister confirm that he has received a report on a two and a half year study into the combustible and toxic nature of cellulose insulation? Has he read it? When can we see it? Can the minister tell the House any specific recommendations made by the review committee which will ease the minds of consumers who have spent many millions of dollars to instal this material in their homes?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, the answers are, first yes, second no, third as soon as possible. Regarding the fourth question, I think the hon. member grossly exaggerates the situation.

[English]

CERTIFICATION BY CANADIAN GENERAL STANDARDS BOARD

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Supply and Services. Can the minister explain why the Canadian General Standards Board began certifying at least one cellulose insulation manufacturer three months before the review board study on the safety of cellulose was submitted to the products safety branch? Is this another case of a product being studied by one arm of government while being certified by another? Will this mean another financial burden placed on the shoulders of the consumer?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, the Canadian General Standards Board studied the cellulose substance in terms of its certification program and was satisfied that it could proceed with the certification from the information it had available to it.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

PLANS FOR FUTURE ROLE

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. We have had some clear indications recently that the government is considering a revised role for the Canada Development Corporation. The Prime Minister, for example, during the 1980 election campaign indicated he foresaw a revamping of the corporation in the mould of the Petro-Canada model in the manufacturing sector. His colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, has indicated some disapproval over the course of the last few months with the autonomous position taken by this corporation. I would like to ask the minister, specifically, whether he is planning to move the Canada Development Corporation under closer government control so that the company's $3.4 billion asset base will be available as a tool for implementing government industrial strategy.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): No, Madam Speaker.

CHAIRMANSHIP OF BOARD OF DIRECTORS

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): I wonder if the minister would indicate why, then, he is moving to have appointed, as the chairman of the Canada Development Corporation, Mr. Maurice Strong, a long-time friend of the Liberal party, who understands very clearly the benefits of such friendship. I want to ask why he is promoting him for the position of the chairmanship of this particular organization, and whether the minister can say in this House that he subscribes to the position of the corporation as indicated in the 1980 annual report, namely, the support of so many investors for the CDC concept shows that increasing numbers of Canadians recognize the need to invest in their own future rather than leaving the job to non-residents and governments. Does he subscribe to that position taken by the CDC, and why is he pushing his friend into the top job?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Yes, Madam Speaker, I subscribe to that position. I should remind the hon. member that the CDC is operating under a statute which has been passed by the Parliament of Canada, in which the objectives of the CDC are established, and that when it is appropriate to change the statute it will obviously have to be brought before the House of Commons. But hon. members and others who have expressed some concern about this matter ought to look at the statute and find out that there is clearly established the functions and directions and role of the directors of the CDC.

An hon. Member: Are you or are you not interfering?

Mr. MacEachen: If there is any concern, I should like to add that it is still my view that the investment decisions of the corporation are still the responsibility of the corporation.

AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

REQUEST FOR IMPOSITION OF QUOTAS ON JAPANESE IMPORTS

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Now that the U.S. and Japan have formally agreed to limit the exportation of automobiles to the United States, and given the integrated nature of the North American car manufacturing industry, will the minister indicate whether he is now prepared to put in place quotas similar to those which have been agreed upon and then to sit down and negotiate an agreement with the Japanese manufacturers and the Japanese government to source and to manufacture those vehicles in Canada?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, my hon. friend alluded to what Japan did with respect to the United States. This step was not taken using the format suggested by my hon. friend. I think it very important that the Prime Minister of Canada and the Prime Minister of Japan, in their recent meeting, agreed on the importance of an early resolution of the question, for increasingly close relationships between the two countries.

An hon. Member: Breakthrough!

Mr. Gray: I would like to think that the Japanese understand sufficiently how important we consider this question and how we believe it should be resolved very soon so that the need for action by Canada, along the lines suggested by my hon. friend, will not turn out to be necessary.

Mr. Deans: It is clear to anyone who would care to read the statistics that there has been an appreciable increase in the numbers of Japanese vehicles imported into Canada this year over last year and that that trend appears likely to continue. How long is the minister going to wait, and make these stupid promises? When is he going to bring in a program?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gray: I think it shows how lacking in understanding of the matter is the hon. member when he refers—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gray: —to an understanding, an agreement between the Prime Ministers of Canada and Japan, as a stupid promise. I think that is a shocking comment which my hon. friend should withdraw in light of the good relationships between our two countries. I believe that action by Japan should be taken very soon in light of the close economic co-operation between our two countries, and I think the Japanese understand this.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE FOR PORK PRODUCERS

Mr. Normand Lapointe (Beauce): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. Considering the serious financial difficulties of pork producers and the great importance of hog production in the Quebec economy, and more particularly in the Beauce economy, can the minister tell the House whether he intends to offer quick assistance to hog producers, cow-calf operators and feeders, through fair stabilization payments so that they may improve their rather shaky situation?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): We met with the Canadian Pork Council representing producers all across Canada. One of their recommendations—

An hon. Member: Change the piggy bank!

Mr. Whelan: —and these were representatives from every part of Canada—was that we should have a national program for hogs and stabilization, and some of the people went so far as to say that we should possibly have a national marketing board for hogs. Programs should be announced for stabilization very shortly, taking their recommendations into consideration.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

CHAIRMANSHIP OF BOARD OF DIRECTORS

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): My question is to the Minister of Finance. The price of the shares of the Canada Development Corporation has gone down in the last several days because of reports of government interference with it and its selection of a chairman. It has 30,000 shareholders who own 51 per cent of the shares. The government only has a 49 per cent interest. I remind the minister that there were two public financings arranged, based on two prospectuses and a selling memorandum that promised that the corporation would be run in the interests of all its shareholders, not in the interests of the government alone as a major shareholder.

Has the minister or has any other minister, to his knowledge, or has his deputy minister of finance, who is on the board of directors, or has the deputy minister of industry, trade and commerce, who is on the board of directors, spoken to any of the directors to suggest to them that Mr. Maurice Strong should be made chairman of the board of directors of that company to replace the present chairman, Mr. Sellers, who has only been there two and one half months? Have any efforts been made by the government at all to insert Mr. Strong in the position of chairman?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): First of all, the hon. member has raised the question of the corporation being operated for the benefit of all the shareholders, including the major shareholder, which happens to be the Government of Canada, and I certainly subscribe to that view.

I would also add that I have had discussions with the management and various directors of the corporation, as is my right as a major shareholder; but I should add that the responsibility for selecting a chairman of the board is the responsibility of the directors, and at this point it certainly would be inappropriate for me to go any further.

Mr. Crosbie: In 1972 the slogan was "The land is strong", and now it is "The land is Maurice Strong".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: The minister has avoided answering this question: has the minister, or anyone acting on his behalf or on behalf of the government, suggested to any of the directors of this company, which is a very successful company to date, led by Mr. Tony Hampson, that this Liberal lackey should be made chairman of the board of directors or given a major role, or that the role of that corporation should change so it becomes the equivalent of PetroCan in the financial and industrial area, "financey can" or something similar? Specifically, has Mr. Strong been suggested as the chairman, and, if he becomes chairman, will their bank account be moved to Switzerland?

Mr. MacEachen: First of all I would like to tell the hon. member, because he has mentioned the name of the president of the corporation, Mr. Hampson, that I have complete confidence in his work as president of the corporation, and will continue to have that confidence because of the success which the corporation has had in carrying out the mandate established by Parliament.

I would also like to respond to the suggestion made by the hon. member that it is the intention of the government to transfer or transform the Canada Development Corporation into a Petro-Canada. Obviously any transformation in the purpose and function of the Canada Development Corporation would require an amendment to the statute, which would require coming to Parliament. That has not happened. Nor has the management been given from the Minister of Finance any instructions or any directives as to a new role for Petro-Canada—

• (1450)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: —for the Canada Development Corporation. If that were to happen, it is obvious that management and others would know.

With respect to the final question which the hon. member asked, I want to tell him that is a matter for direction and decision of the board—

Mr. Nielsen: Answer the question.

Mr. MacEachen: —of the corporation. It is not appropriate, nor will it be appropriate at this time for me to comment in any detail on discussions that I have had with management, with the current chairman and with members of the board. I must say that is my position, Madam Speaker.

Oral Questions

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR ALLOCATION OF ADDITIONAL FUNDS

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In light of the effect that new consumer price increases, rising energy prices and interest rates have on veterans and their families, as well as the fact that over 2,000 applicants are having to wait up to two years for their pension appeals to be processed, will the Minister of Finance tell this House when he will be allocating the necessary funds so that the Minister of Veterans Affairs can bring in a bill providing some financial relief for veterans and their widows at this time of unprecedented need?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I should tell the hon. member that it is not the particular function of the Minister of Finance to allocate funds for the department or for any program of any department. It is the responsibility of the Minister of Finance to make recommendations to the cabinet on the distribution of funds as between the various envelopes of the government. The corresponding committees have the responsibility which the hon. member has assigned to me.

Mr. McKenzie: You are a wealthy old bachelor who does not care or understand about veterans and senior citizens.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PREPARATION OF AMENDING LEGISLATION

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs. There has been much speculation that legislation is now being prepared which would lower the phasing-in period for widows whose husbands were in receipt of less than a 48 per cent disability pension. First, would the acting minister confirm that he will be ready to provide the necessary funding? If not, would he inquire whether this bill is going to be introduced? Second, can he inform the House whether he is going to launch an inquiry immediately into this backlog of 2,000 veteran pension applications which are going to take two years to process? What we have is a national disgrace.

Mr. John Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Madam Speaker, with regard to the allegations made by the hon. member, first I must say that—

An hon. Member: You are not a bachelor!

Mr. Campbell: No, I am not a bachelor!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Campbell: I must say that the backlog is not two years but something like about 11 months.

Miss MacDonald: Shame!

Mr. Campbell: There are not 2,000 applications but approximately 1,200 applications in process.

An hon. Member: That is a disgrace.

Mr. Campbell (LaSalle): The phasing in period of six and one half years has been a priority of the acting minister and I understand that he is to take that proposal before cabinet very shortly. If there is an announcement to make in this regard the hon. member will be one of the first to know.

ENERGY

EXPORTS OF NATURAL GAS TO UNITED STATES

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the government's policy of oil substitution and expansion of the use of natural gas in eastern Canada, is the government prepared to limit any further exports of natural gas to the United States until there is a firm commitment by the natural gas pipeline and distribution companies to provide service to the unserved areas of the country?

Mr. Taylor: Take off the excise tax.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, we have no evidence at the present time that the expansion of services for the distribution of natural gas to Canadians is impeded in any way by the current exports, or even by exports which would be at the authorized level. Therefore, at the present time we are not considering cutting further export permits or authorizations of natural gas to the United States. On the contrary, what we are doing is pressing the gas utilities in Canada to extend their services to as many Canadians as possible.

As the hon. member knows, under the National Energy Program we have also provided subsidies for consumers to substitute natural gas. In addition, we have a program which will help Canadian utilities extend their services to communities which would not otherwise be serviced. This is being done by the provision of a grant for extension of such services.

Mr. Taylor: Take off the excise tax.

TRADE

REQUEST FOR INCREASED CANADIAN CONTENT IN MANUFACTURE OF JAPANESE AUTOMOBILES

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It also has to do with the ailing auto industry.

After more than a year of negotiations, meetings and discussions with the Japanese, one of the minister's officials is quoted as saying the following just this week:

> We have had a telex from our trade mission in Japan saying there was progress made on both sides during the talks . . . There was agreement to hold further talks.

That is what the officials say is progress. Obviously, the minister has failed demonstrably to obtain concessions from the Japanese. First, when will the minister and the government insist that the Japanese increase Canadian content in Japanese imports, something which is very important to the ailing auto parts manufacturers in this country? Second when will he increase Japanese investment in Canada so that all sales of automobiles in this country, be they Japanese, American or European, can compete on an equal basis? When will this happen? We have had enough of meetings. We want action, Madam Speaker.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, having a substantial increase in Canadian content in Japanese vehicles sold not only in Canada but in the United States and in third markets has been a very important priority of this government in its dealings with Japan. I think there has been some progress because there has been some increase in the level of parts exports to Japan. But this increase has been from a very low base, and I for one am not yet satisfied, nor should we as Canadians be satisfied, with the progress to date.

We are continuing these efforts, and the degree of consensus that I see on both sides of the House will be very helpful in making sure that the Japanese get the message and act on it very soon.

Mr. Crosbie: They got the message on you long ago.

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION UNDER ANTI-DUMPING LEGISLATION

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, the question was how much longer must we wait. We have waited for one year and imports increased as of last month by 71.5 per cent alone.

However, I have before me figures indicating that the Japanese are indeed dumping some of their autos in Canada. As I stated in a motion which I moved under the provisions of Standing Order 43, examples are that the basic price of a Honda Civic costs $937 less than in the United States, a Toyota Tercel is $738 less, the Datsun 310 is $863 less, and so on. I consider that dumping.

Would the minister consider initiating an investigation immediately under the provisions of the Anti-dumping Act into questionable pricing practices for offshore imports, particularly those from Japan, which are taking 21 per cent of the Canadian market today?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, the administration of the anti-dumping law is the responsibility of the Minister of National Revenue. I am sure that he will act very promptly and vigorously on any evidence of dumping—

Mr. Crosbie: Dump it on the fishermen again.

Mr. Gray: —because this is a very serious allegation. He will be working effectively to enforce this very important Canadian law as the evidence requires.

SMALL BUSINESS

EXTENSION OF SMALL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BOND PROGRAM

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Madam Speaker, my question is also for the rich bachelor—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Riis: Excuse me, the Minister of Finance.

An hon. Member: You were right the first time.

Mr. Riis: I do not think there is a member in the House who has not been approached in the last few weeks by small business people in their ridings regarding the bludgeoning they are experiencing at the hands of this government and its high interest rate policy.

The government did bring in the small business development bond some months ago in an attempt to provide some relief of the small business community. It did provide relief but only to about 5 per cent of the small business community which actually qualified under the SBDB.

The question I have for the minister is this. In an effort to provide more small businesses with access to the small business development bond, will the minister consider opening up the bond to allow, as the Minister of Agriculture indicated, the opportunity for sole proprietorships to qualify? Will he eliminate the $10,000 minimum that is now on the bond? Will he allow the bond to be used for some forms of working capital?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I responded earlier in the year to the requests of all members of the House, and extended the small business development bond in accordance with their wishes at that time. That was greeted with a good deal of enthusiasm by the representatives of small business in the country because it does represent considerable advantage to those eligible firms.

Mr. Stevens: A good Tory idea.

Mr. MacEachen: New ideas and new suggestions are always made for changes and these will obviously be considered and, if found feasible, introduced at the appropriate time. In conclusion, may I tell my hon. friend that I hope my banker is listening to this epithet of the rich.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, one of the main beneficiaries of the government's high interest rate policy is the lending institutions of this country. Many of us consider that to be a shame. If anyone is going to benefit, it ought not to be the chartered banks and other lending agencies. It is also well known that one of the main beneficiaries under the small business development bond is in fact the lending institutions. Once the rate reaches half prime plus 2 per cent and above, the lending institutions benefit substantially. Recognizing that the banks likely do not need any more help, and that the senior lending institutions do not need any more help, will the minister consider providing the small business development bond at simply half prime so that the benefits accrue to the small business community and not the chartered banks?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows that the inducement for the chartered banks to enter into this market, as I understand it, is because of the advantage which they experience in those instances where they have tax liabilities. It is certainly the intention, as was originally introduced by the hon. member for St. John's West, that the chartered banks should be encouraged by that method to provide this service. That is one minuscule part of his whole approach with which I enthusiastically agree.

FISHERIES

INTERRELATIONSHIP OF AGREEMENTS ON EAST COAST FISHERIES AND BOUNDARIES

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Finance concerning the economic effects upon Canada as a result of the United States unilaterally abandoning the east coast fisheries and boundaries agreements signed by both governments in 1979. In the opinion of Nova Scotia's fishermen, any boundary arbitration without a fisheries agreement in place is unacceptable since an unfavourable arbitration outcome could decimate or wipe out the Canadian offshore scallop fishery, which has the highest dollar value of any fishery in eastern Canada. Since the agreement initialled with the Americans does include a provision for significant adjustments in the allocation of stocks every ten years, and I am sure the minister is well aware of that, I would ask him what he is doing to ensure that no boundary agreement will be signed without a fisheries agreement in place, since this could have the effect of destroying this $75 million to $80 million industry in our province of Nova Scotia.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, obviously over the number of years during which the Government of Canada has been concerned both with the fisheries agreement and the boundary question, I have been involved, but I am not responsible at the present time either for the negotiations on the borders or on the fisheries allocations. Therefore, I will have to refer that question to one of the responsible ministers, either the minister of fisheries or the Secretary of State for External Afairs. I will, however, pick up on the very precise point of the hon. member's question, namely, the economic effects, and I hope to get back to him at a later date.

Mr. Crouse: Madam Speaker, I have one brief supplementary for the Minister of Finance. I thank him for his concern. In view of the importance of the fishing industry to Atlantic Canada's economy, and also the fact that the initialled Canada-U.S. fisheries and boundary agreement represents 18 months of negotiation, as the minister is well aware, and there was considerable give and take before arriving at a balance, will the minister in his capacity as Deputy Prime Minister of Canada assure this House of the government's total opposition to any major changes in the initialled fisheries agreement within at least a 20-year period, for this is the estimated life span of the vessel investment that is required by the industry?

Mr. MacEachen: As the hon. member knows, Madam Speaker, the original fisheries agreement, as I recollect, was, as he has stated, the result of very intensive negotiations between our negotiator, the late Mr. Cadieu, and the representative of the government of the United States, combined with very intensive consultations with the representatives of the fisheries and representatives of the provincial governments. Ultimately there was a consensus on the Canadian side that that was what our position was. Indeed, the result from our side had to be beneficial because it received so much opposition in the New England states.

I can assure the hon. member that in future considerations we will be equally vigilant in protecting the interests of the Nova Scotia fishermen. Also, we will be equally vigilant in conducting the necessary consultations so that all points of view are finally merged at the conclusion.

AID FOR PRODUCERS

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Madam Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Since the minister has indicated he has no plans to help agricultural producers cope with high interest rates at the present time, I would like to ask him whether he considers that Ottawa has some responsibility to help the hundreds of farmers who will be forced out of agriculture at the end, or before the end of this year, because of the high interest rates brought on by the government.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows full well that most of the farmers who are in financial difficulty are those who borrowed money from private banking interests. I believe, and I hope the hon. member believes, that the private banking interests also have a responsibility to these people. They are making good profits and can afford to give some of these people moratoriums on their programs. They can afford to give them longer-term mortgages with a moratorium, and amortizing the program later. We suggested that to The Canadian Bankers' Association. I suggested that to the provincial ministers yesterday.

We are looking at different programs. We will try to adjust the Farm Credit Corporation to help some of these people. It will be impossible to help them all. Those farmers who are in difficulty are outside some kind of orderly marketing system that has a supply management system or a contract system for them. they are the ones in the most difficulty. It is not because they are inefficient, as some people have suggested. They are some of the most efficient producers in Canada, producing products being sold on world markets below cost, subsidizing such rich economies as Japan, Russia and other parts of the world.

Mr. Murta: Madam Speaker, that is a callous, silly, stupid answer to a very serious question, from a Minister of Agriculture who should know better. I again ask the Minister of Agriculture, does the government have any programs in place, ready to put in place, or contemplated, to help agricultural producers through this very serious situation which has developed for farmers as a result of high interest rates? I do not want the kind of diatribe which we heard from the Minister of Agriculture in his last answer.

Mr. Whelan: Madam Speaker, I am sure you know that I may give the kind of answer I feel like, and the hon. member may not like it, but what I told him is the truth about who is in trouble and in difficulty, and who is not in difficulty in Canada. It is those who are unorganized in Canada who are in difficulty.

Those who are obtaining long-term money from us under the Farm Credit Corporation Act are getting it at 14 per cent interest at the present time. Up to the first of October of this year we will have made loans to the extent of over $500 million under that program. We have said this should be geared especially for those who are in difficulty, and that is what the Farm Credit Corporation is all about.

I know this will not supply all the needs, and that is why I am appealing to private lending interests to do their part. They have as much responsibility, or more, in this regard as I do, because they are the ones who lend them the short-term money. They are the ones who lend them thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars in some instances on demand notes and chattels, etc. They are the ones who put them in difficulty more than anybody else.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 1,986, 2,153, 2,154, 2,219, 2,331, 2,333, 2,335, 2,336 and 2,338.

I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

[Text]

TERMINATION OF COMMUNITY SERVICES CONTRIBUTION PROGRAM

Question No. 1,986—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Was the Community Services Contribution Program discontinued and, if so, how many complaints have been received from (a) individuals (b) municipalities (c) other groups, since the announcement?

2. Has the government received representations from Members of Parliament asking that the matter be reconsidered and, if so, how many?

3. Is the government aware of widespread discontent in regard to the decision and will it take steps to see that the matter is reopened for active consideration of reinstatement?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): I am advised by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation as follows: 1. Yes. Since the announcement of the termination of the program on November 12, 1980, up to January 31, 1981, written complaints have been received from (a) 18 individuals, (b) 321 municipalities and (c) 16 other groups.

2. Yes. Written representations have been received from 71 members of Parliament up to January 31, 1981.

3. Yes the government is aware that the decision to terminate the program has met with disapproval in many areas. The government has indicated the program will not be continued.

SUPER ENERGY-EFFICIENT HOUSES

Question No. 2,153—Mr. Herbert:

Will private sector home builders be able to tender on the construction of the super energy-efficient houses to be built as part of the program that will promote design and construction of such houses suited to Canadian conditions and, if so, how and where will the tender calls be advertised?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources reports as follows: All builders who construct a significant number of houses each year will be eligible for the program which will promote design and construction of super energy-efficient houses. Details of the procedure for the program (including applications) are being developed in conjunction with HUDAC (Housing and Urban Development Association of Canada).

SOLAR HEATING

Question No. 2,154—Mr. Herbert:

Will proposals be requested, in the program to promote the commercialization of solar heating, of private-sector project managers by open advertised tenders and, if so, on what date will the tenders be called and how will they be advertised?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources reports as follows: a request for proposals to manage a project in a program of accelerated demonstration of solar domestic water heating was issued by EM&R on February 12, 1981. The proposal was mailed to some 300 companies and other organizations that had responded to earlier announcements of this program in trade journals and in the national press. The address list was augmented by a selection of companies interested in solar heating provided by the science procurement centre of the Department of Supply and Services. Proposals were due on April 9, 1981. They will be evaluated by a panel comprising members from the federal government and the private sector.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE—RESEARCH VACANCIES

Question No. 2,219—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Was there a program not publicly announced by the Department of Agriculture for filling research vacancies in Ottawa and, if so, what are all the details?

2. Are three francophones about to be hired at the top starting salary for a biologist although they will not be working with the department but will be studying for three years at English-language schools for Ph.D. degrees and, if so, will they receive $17,000 annually and, if not, what amount will they receive?

3. Is $8,500 the highest grant an anglophone doctorate student can obtain and, if so, for what reason?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): 1. No. The department uses the normal public service staffing process.

2. A competition is being held to fill three biologist positions designated as French essential. The persons chosen, whether francophones or anglophones, will become employees of Agriculture Canada. After appointment, they will be sent to university to pursue graduate studies on a subject that will allow Agriculture Canada to meet its needs for professionally and linguistically qualified personnel. The choice of university will depend on the background and qualifications of the successful candidates. The salary which will be paid is determined by Public Service Commission and Treasury Board regulations. At the present time, the recruitment rate for a person with a M.Sc. degree is $17,610. This salary may increase slightly depending on the person's related work or research experience.

3. No. For example, the scholarships granted by the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council to students registered in graduate studies are as follows:

Post-graduate scholarships:	$ 8,500
1967 Science scholarships:	11,200

After September 1, 1981, they will be:

Post-graduate scholarships:	$ 9,300
1967 Science scholarships:	14,000

Order Paper Questions

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE—PURCHASE OF MOBILE HOME

Question No. 2,331—Mr. Stewart:

1. Did the Department of National Health and Welfare purchase a mobile home valued at $30,574 from Hill Court Mobile Homes, Thunder Bay, Ontario and, if so, for what purpose?

2. Were public tenders called and, if so, what firms or companies submitted bids and what was the amount in each case?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. A contract in the amount of $30,574 was awarded by the Department of Supply and Services to Hill Court Mobile Homes, Thunder Bay, Ontario, on behalf of National Health and Welfare, for the supply of a mobile home. This unit was delivered to the New Osnaburgh nursing station in Sioux Lookout zone hospital.

2. Requests for proposals were forwarded to the following two suppliers:

(a) Hill Court Mobile Homes Ltd. Thunder Bay, Ontario.	$30,574.20
(b) Altona Homes Headingley, Manitoba.	$35,095.00

POST OFFICE—PURCHASE OF CLOTH

Question No. 2,333—Mr. Stewart:

1. Did the Post Office Department purchase cloth valued at $204,355 from Consoltex Inc., Montreal, Quebec and, if so, for what purpose?

2. Were public tenders called and, if so, what firms or companies submitted bids and what was the amount in each case?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. The Department of Supply and Services awarded a contract for the amount of $204,355 to Consoltex Inc., Montreal, Quebec, on behalf of the Post Office Department for the purchase of 78,000 meters of nylon cloth. The cloth will be used for priority post mail bags, lining for weather jackets and registered mail bags.

2. Since Consoltex Inc. is the only known Canadian company capable of manufacturing this material in accordance with Post Office requirements and inspection standards, no public tenders were called for this purchase.

DND—PURCHASE OF CHEMICALS

Question No. 2,335—Mr. Stewart:

Did the Department of National Defence purchase chemicals valued at $84,495 from Van Waters and Rogers Ltd., Lachine, Quebec and, if so, what were the chemicals and for what purpose were they required?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): The Department of Supply and Services awarded a contract for the amount of $84,495 to Van Waters and Rogers Ltd., Lachine, Quebec, on behalf of the Department of National Defence, for the supply of 1-1-1 Trichloroethane, Technical. This chemical is used for degreasing operations on mechanical, electrical and electronic equipment, when air pollution and/or safety considerations preclude the use of other materials.

DND—PURCHASE OF TIRE PRESSURE GAUGES

Question No. 2,336—Mr. Stewart:

Did the Department of National Defence purchase tire pressure gauges from Patlon Aircraft and Industries Ltd., Toronto, Ontario at a cost of $16,656 and, if so (a) how many (b) what was the cost per gauge (c) were public tenders called?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): The Department of Supply and Services awarded a contract to Patlon Aircraft and Industries Ltd. on behalf of the Department of National Defence for the purchase of tire pressure gauges.

(a) 1,735;

(b) $9.60;

(c) Yes.

DND—PURCHASE OF SCOOTER

Question No. 2,338—Mr. Stewart:

Did the Department of National Defence purchase a scooter valued at $22,365 from Yale Industrial Trucks, Dorval, Quebec and, if so (a) what are the specifications (b) for what purpose (c) were public tenders called?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): The Department of Supply and Services awarded a contract for the amount of $22,365 to Yale Industrial Trucks, Dorval, Quebec, on behalf of the Department of National Defence for the purchase of three "Electric In-Plant Burden Carriers". These carriers are sometimes referred to as scooters in materiel handling applications.

(a) Exact specifications for the model purchased (Taylor-Dunn 1248-B).

(b) These vehicles are designed as indoor cargo/passenger carriers with a capacity for either four passengers or a payload of 1,500 lbs. They will be used in the warehousing operations of No. 7 Canadian Forces Supply Depot (CFSD), Edmonton and No. 1 Canadian Forces Supply Depot (CFSD), Toronto.

(c) Requests for proposals were forwarded to six firms and three replied. Yale Industrial Trucks submitted the lowest bid for a vehicle meeting the required specifications.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—UNPRECEDENTED HIGH LEVELS OF INTEREST RATES

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West) moved:

That this House condemns the Minister of Finance for permitting interest rates to rise to unprecedented high levels and calls on the minister to meet his economic responsibilities or resign.

He said: Madam Speaker, this motion comes forward at a time when the Canadian economy and the people of Canada, the farmers, the fishermen and the businessmen—indeed, all aspects of Canadian life—are threatened by a most serious and unprecedented economic situation, illustrated in particular by unprecedented high interest rates.

It is also a time such as we have never seen before, with a government in Canada which is so unwilling to assume its economic and financial responsibility. This government was elected some 14 months ago on the basis that it could do better than the government which was in power then for a few months, the PC Clark government. It was elected on the basis that it could do better and on the argument that it could keep interest rates down, stimulate the economy and overcome inflation. It was elected on the argument that there was a painless way this could be done.

We have had 14 months of inactivity, 14 months of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) hiding behind the skirts of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on the Constitution. We now see the emperor without his clothes. The emperor has been walking down the street without his clothes, hiding behind his constitutional cloak. Yesterday he came out from behind his constitutional cloak and the people of Canada discovered there was nothing there. He was not wearing a shred, but he was still completely unashamed.

The minister said in a speech last week that inflation has been running at the rate of 13.9 per cent. The present inflation rate is 13.9 per cent. In his budget of October 28 he predicted 10.2 per cent; just five months ago the minister predicted a 10.2 per cent inflation rate for 1981. This points out another serious aspect of this situation: the forecasts of the Department of Finance can no longer be trusted. They can no longer be accepted as anywhere near accurate.

In his budget the minister predicted that this year the Canadian dollar would average 87 cents compared to the U.S. dollar. Today we see it struggling to keep above 83 cents in terms of the U.S. dollar.

We are now seeing a serious unemployment situation, with the adjusted rate being 7 per cent. There are still 886,000 people out of work. The government forecast the unemployment rate would average 7.6 per cent over the year. Statistics Canada has said there are 348,000 persons unemployed in the hidden category. This means 1.234 million Canadians are unemployed. The hidden unemployed are those who have given up looking for jobs because they know there are none there for them to find. That is a very serious situation.

Real wages are down for the fourth year in a row. The Economic Council of Canada says they will be down 2.4 per cent this year. We see productivity down for the fourth year in a row. Real growth last year was one tenth of 1 per cent. The forecast this year by the Conference Board, and I will only give one forecast, is that real growth will be 2.9 per cent if strong U.S. growth continues and if work on the oil sands and the Cold Lake projects—the tar sands and heavy oil—resumes by the end of the year. What is the government's response to that situation? It introduced a new energy policy that stopped the Cold Lake and tar sands projects and energy investment in their tracks. I will come to that later.

We must remember, Mr. Speaker, that for every one cent devaluation of the Canadian dollar, about four tenths of 1 per cent is added to the cost of living index in Canada. We must remember that when people say we should not worry about the level of the Canadian dollar. I may be in the opposition, but I am not going to be completely irresponsible as the government was a year and a half ago. For every cent the Canadian dollar goes down, the cost of living in Canada goes up four tenths of 1 per cent because of all the goods we import. We cannot afford to have the Canadian dollar go down much further. It has gone down from $1.02 in 1976 to 83 cents now; a major devaluation. I will come in a few minutes to the reason it is so important that we cannot have our dollar go into a free fall. This would cause chaos in this country, but I will expand on that in a minute.

The Conference Board says that energy investment might reach a 4.5 per cent increase this year compared to 11.4 per cent in 1979 because of the government's new energy policy. Business investment in plant and equipment is now estimated to be 3.6 per cent for this year compared to an average 9 per cent for 1979-80. These are grim economic facts which the government chooses not to deal with. The government wants to ignore them and forget they are there. The government has no policy.

The government's policy in the budget of October 28 was said to be a gradualist approach. The minister says his approach is gradualist, yet he says he supports the Bank of Canada and Mr. Bouey, and so he should. However, in the annual report of the Bank of Canada for 1980 Mr. Bouey said at page 12:

—Canada has made only limited progress since 1975 in containing inflation. The reason is not that the anti-inflationary financial policies followed were misconceived but that they were pursued with such gradualism that they did not succeed in dominating the influences that were working in the opposite direction.

He looked at the last five years and said that our policies have not succeeded. Why have they not? He says they were applied too gradually. The minister says his policies are gradualist policies. This is an admission that his policies are doomed again to failure, as they have failed for the last five years. So much for the minister's approach.

The minister did not have a gradualist approach, the Liberal party did not have a gradualist approach, and members of the government did not have a gradualist approach when they were in opposition in the fall of 1979. No, their approach then was full of guts and gumption. They had the answers. They decried high interest rates, and I will come to that a little later.

The government says it wants to fight inflation, but then the government shows everybody in the country it is not serious because it will not restrain itself. You cannot convince people that you are out to beat inflation if you will not restrain yourself. You cannot ask a worker to restrain his salary demands or the executive to restrain them or the businessman to restrain his profits if the government itself is a big greedy guts colossus that will not restrain its own spending. And spending this year is up. Officially the government says 12.8 per cent, but it is really up about 20 per cent.

The government's budget deficit is $13.7 billion, and this is the tenth in a row. The deficits for the last ten years total $77 billion. Is that a government that shows itself in restraint? How can they ask us to restrain our demands, needs and wishes in Canada to beat inflation when they are acting in this way, when the money is there to burn, a penitentiary here, another expenditure there, all in Liberal districts and for political reasons. There is no restraint whatsoever.

Mr. Dinsdale: Advertising.

Mr. Crosbie: Advertising, and on and on it goes.

The imported oil subsidy is costing $3.8 billion this year. The government has removed it from the estimates to pretend by a piece of fiction that government spending is less than it is. They removed the $3.8 billion cost of the oil subsidy by saying there is a $3.47 billion Canadian ownership account. They are collecting that from the people of Canada through the new petroleum taxes. They are only showing the balance as an expenditure on the oil import subsidy. They show $530 million spent in that way and not $3.8 billion. That is dishonesty in the accounting of the government in the estimates. That is why the government's spending is up 18 per cent to 20 per cent by any true comparison. There is no restraint.

Before the budget came down the Bank of Canada interest rate was 11.76 per cent. The budget came down five months ago. Today the rate is 18.71 per cent, an increase of 7 per cent. That is the result of this minister's budget. That is the result of his gradualism. That is the result of his do-nothingism.

An hon. Member: Gradually downward.

Mr. Crosbie: The prime bank rate is 19.5 per cent. I looked at the paper today. Mortgage rates are 18 per cent. The minister says to the people who have homes in Canada, the 500,000 who have to renew their mortgages this year, I think the figure is, "You should not be out spending money; you should restrain your demands if there are high interest rates".

How can you restrain your demand if you have a mortgage for $40,000 on your home, you have to renew it this week and they tell you the rate is 18 per cent? The only way to restrain your demand is to give up your house, to sell your house and live in the poor-house. That is the minister's advice to these hundreds of thousands of Canadians suffering through his and his government's lack of attention over the last ten years. The prime bank rate is 19.5 per cent.

I have a letter from a man in British Columbia. He took out a loan with the federal small business development bank back on December 2, 1980. The rate then was 14.5 per cent. On April 8 he was paying 22.25 per cent. This is the bank which is to help small business. This is what the official government bank was charging on April 8, a month ago, before the recent increases, 22.25 per cent interest on a loan to a small entrepreneur in British Columbia who took it out just a few months earlier, in December, at a rate of 14.5 per cent. That is the government's own bank, and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) gets up with his nonsense in the question period about how the private banks are doing this and making profits and they do not consider the farmers. What is the minister's own fat bank doing, the small business development bank? It is charging 22.25 per cent to the small businessman. It has to because it is borrowing money to lend out at rates of 18 per cent, 19 per cent and the rest. That is the way the banking system works. Let him look at the mote in his own eye and not get up with his fat bafflegab about what the banks should be doing, and trying to excuse the government.

The government's economic policy today is to drift, to keep out of view and to hide behind skirts; but the minister is now exposed, and the Canadian people at last are starting to wake up. The constitutional mirage is in the Supreme Court. They are dealing with it, and now we are dealing with the real things that bother people here in Canada, not this constitutional business that is now, luckily, off the political scene for a while.

There is only one area this inactive government has been active in. The new energy policy is their only new creative area, and that has caused the most damage of all. If people want to know why the Canadian dollar is under pressure, why it is in danger and why interest rates have to be stratospherically high to protect the Canadian dollar, it is because of the new energy policy which confiscates 25 per cent of the holdings of the oil and gas industry on federal lands without compensation, which is anti-the private sector, anti-business, anti-American and anti-foreign investment.

That is why funds are not coming into Canada. That is why funds are leaving Canada and depressing the already depressed Canadian dollar. Why is the Canadian dollar already depressed? Because for the last seven years we have had a total of $26 billion in deficits on the balance of payments on our international account. We in Canada are living off the rest of the world. We are borrowing from them. We cannot survive unless they lend or invest in Canada billions of dollars every year to meet these deficits. We are suppliants to the rest of the world. That is why the Canadian dollar is a weak dollar.

The government opposite has been in office for these last ten years, with the exception of a few months, and in those few months they did everything they could to sabotage anyone else who was trying to save the situation. They are afraid to adopt any remedies themselves but gradualism. Well, gradually they have got Canada to the point that the Canadian dollar is one of the orphans of international finance, and Canadian interest rates have to be at 19 per cent, 20 per cent and 21 per cent to get the Americans to send up some short-term money to prop up the Canadian dollar.

This did not happen overnight; it happened over ten or 12 years. There are no quick fixes, no quick solutions. When the press asks, the NDP can give them quick solutions because the NDP has never been in power, will never be in power and lives in fantasy. They have solutions to everything. You wave a magic wand, you freeze prices and you have a commission and all this nonsense. We do not get on with them. We know there are no quick solutions. The minister is bankrupt of solutions. He asks us to give him some suggestions, and I will as I go along, as other members of our party will.

The only active area is the energy policy, and that policy has driven money out of the country, has driven oil rigs out of the country and driven investment out of the country. The government likes to flex its muscles and pretend it is pro-Canadian, anti-American and anti-foreign investment, when really for the last ten years it has been begging the world to lend us money and invest money here. If they do not and if we are not successful, the Canadian dollar will go down the tubes altogether. That is the government's bold policy, the new energy policy.

PetroCan purchases Petrofina; $1.7 billion is the cost to the people of Canada who consume oil and gas. Three and a half cents a gallon was levied on oil and gas and heating products, heating oil, to pay the $1.7 billion required for PetroCan to buy Petrofina, which will not result in Canada having one more cup of gasoline or one more litre or cupful of natural gas. It does not increase the oil and gas assets of Canada at all, and we are paying out $1.7 billion, mostly to people in Belgium. Verily, the patron saint of Belgium must be Mr. Marc Lalonde because he is doing a lot for the Belgians; but he is doing nothing for us. That is another billion dollars depressing the Canadian dollar that has to be paid out over the next two or three years. This is the government's great policy, the only area that they have been active in.

The other damaging area is FIRA. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) is going to supervise all foreign investors in Canada. He is going to amend FIRA. So not only do you now have to pass his scrutiny to invest in Canada, but when you have a business here, he is going to come and look over your shoulder and say, "You are not doing the business as I would do the business" or "You are not doing the right thing" or "I don't think this is in Canada's interest". That is the threat. No wonder the Canadian dollar is at 83 cents U.S. I wonder that it can be kept up at all with the likes of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, with his narrow-minded view, with his narrow, parochial Canadian nationalist view, he calls it, threatening how he is going to change the regulations and explaining how he is going to operate.

Then we see the Canada Development Corporation, a government Crown corporation, doing well, operated properly, a major assistance to Canada, with $3.4 billion in assets, and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce tries to get them to take over the sick. They say they have a policy of helping the successful, and it turns out to be Chrysler or Massey-Ferguson and so on. They try to make the CDC take Massey-Ferguson or Chrysler under its wing when they have 30,000 Canadian shareholders, individuals, small people who invested their money on the promise of the government that that corporation would operate in an ordinary profit-motive manner, concentrating its efforts on developing the resources of Canada. Now we see them attempt to make Maurice Strong, that Liberal candidate who did not even have the fortitude to run after he was nominated, chairman—he started PetroCan—so as to turn this corporation into the new PetroCan in the industrial field, and the hell with the 30,000 Canadian shareholders who were fooled by prospectuses.

Is it any wonder that the investment community lost faith in Canada? It is a wonder that the Canadian dollar is not at 60 cents, much less 83 cents. These are some of the areas where the government has been active.

Just look at interest rates in some other countries. In Germany the central bank rate is 7.5 per cent. The prime bank rate is 12 per cent. France has a 12 per cent central bank rate; Japan, a 6.25 per cent central bank rate; the United States, a 14 per cent and a 4 per cent surcharge for frequent borrowers. Look at the United Kingdom, which these people sneer at and denigrate; they tell them to hold their noses while they send over their dog's breakfast of a Constitution for them to pass. What is the bank rate in England? It is 12 per cent. The inflation rate in England is 12.6 per cent. That is what Mrs. Thatcher has done because she has guts and gumption. She has more you-know-what than all that bunch opposite put together. They have a 12.6 per cent inflation rate.

The U.S. inflation rate is 10.5 per cent; in Japan the inflation rate is 6.2 per cent; in France the inflation rate is 13 per cent; in Germany the inflation rate is 5.6 per cent. This government does not even have the defence that other countries are worse off than we are. The other industrial countries in the world are not. It is just this country, with its sorry, shabby, economically tattered, weary, tatterdemalion government, that is in this kind of shape. It cannot even look to other countries for comfort.

The Bank of Canada and the minister have admitted that the reason for the present high interest rates is more because of the fear of the Canadian dollar declining if interest rates do not keep up with those in the U.S. That was in the bank's news release of May 7. The minister has said that as well.

I want the people of Canada to try to understand this. The fault is not with the Bank of Canada. I am talking to the people of Canada because I know hon. members opposite are not listening and will not listen. They will not listen until the people of Canada shake their fists at them, until the people of Canada send them letters, until the people of Canada phone them, until the people of Canada put the pressure on. That is why, through the medium of television, I am speaking to the people of Canada, not to the tatterdemalion remnants across the floor.

The fault is not with the Bank of Canada. It is not with Mr. Bouey. Forget Mr. Bouey; he has done everything he can in his little sphere of monetary operation but he has had no help from the government in the fiscal area in ten years. The government is responsible for Mr. Bouey's interest rates. He recommends; the government decides. It can give him a letter tomorrow saying reduce the rate, do this, do that; and he has to do it. He has done his best for five years. If he had not done what he has, we would be a lot worse off today with respect to inflation than we are. So do not blame Mr. Bouey, people of Canada; blame the Minister of Finance; blame the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde). Blame the Prime Minister over all.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: The Prime Minister sits in this House and shrugs. He does not care about interest rates; he does not care about you mortgage holders out there; he does not care about you small businessmen. Why should he? He has lived off you for the last 12 years and he intends to live off you for the next 12. He is so pleased with his success and his unexpected comeback of nine or 12 months ago that he no longer cares. The government should say, like Shakespeare, "the fault is not in Bouey but in ourselves". It is not Mr. Bouey. Forget Mr. Bouey—forgive Mr. Bouey. The Minister of Finance is the only man who can help the Canadian people—if he would adopt the right policy.

What should the government do? The government should start the course it stopped on December 13, 1979. This is my advice to the minister. He should take the approach of the budget of December 11, 1979 and practise real restraint. He should show the Canadian public how the government is going to reduce the deficit over four years; adopt a sensible oil pricing policy—

Mr. McRae: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Never mind; it is my turn to speak. The price has to go up to 75 per cent or 85 per cent over the next couple of years.

Mr. McRae: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Don't be so foolish, man; listen and learn!

A sensible energy-pricing policy would give the government the financial relief it needs. It is spending $3.8 billion on a subsidy that should not be spent. It is harmful to the country. That would provide $2 billion or $3 billion with which to assist. Some of that money should be used to help lower income Canadians with an energy tax credit, just as we proposed but which the government stopped. The Canadian people would have had half a billion dollars in their pockets in April if the government had not stopped us. There would have been another one billion, two hundred and fifty million dollars to help the mortgage interest and property tax needs of the householders and mortgagors of Canada, had the government not stopped us. The money is there; it can be done. You can still have restraint and do that.

A true budget, one with real restraint, would show that the government means business. That is why it is needed now. The minister's statement that he is practising restraint, when everything shows that he is not, does not influence anyone. Everyone in Canada today expects that inflation is going to get worse and they are acting accordingly. This itself makes inflation worse.

So I say, Mr. Speaker, start now. That is the immediate thing the government can do. It is a slow process. It took ten years to get Canada into the grim economic shape it is in now, and it is going to take two or three years of proper application of policy and restraint, and of choosing priorities, to get Canada back on a stronger course, to strengthen the Canadian dollar.

What can be done immediately is to reverse the new energy policy; take out the harmful effects of it and retain some of it. Eliminate the anti-foreign investment, anti-private sector, anti-provinces, parts of that policy; make it more attractive to the entrepreneur and the investor. Get an agreement with Alberta now, not tomorrow and not next week but now. Be reasonable. If the government changes its plan and shows it is being reasonable, then the government of Alberta has no choice but to follow suit. So far the government has prevented that from occurring because its proposals are so onerous and so anti-anything that the oil producing provinces could accept that there is no chance they could be accepted. I say reverse that situation.

I say to the government, reverse the FIRA nonsense. Leave FIRA as it is. Take Mr. Gray off the backs and the necks and the legs of the people who want to invest in Canada and help the dollar. Reverse the CDC process and let the government show it is not going to break faith with the people who listened to and believed its representations in the prospectuses issued when it sold 51 per cent of the shares of that company to the public.

The inflation rate is going to be 13 per cent at least in 1981 and 1982. These kinds of high interest rates are not needed to deal with that situation; 15 per cent or 16 per cent you might argue, but not 19 per cent or 20 per cent or wherever the rate is going. Come to grips with the situation now.

The minister has two choices. Start the process now. You are going to have to inflict some pain. People like to see money spent. We all know how politicians get popular. The Liberal party has been excellent at that; it has been in power since 1963 by these methods. Now the consequences have caught up. You have to start the process now; that is one choice. Start the process now and bring in a new budget that really means something—real restraint, a proper oil pricing policy, an energy tax credit, a shelter allowance, as I have suggested. Drop the FIRA and the CDC nonsense.

If the government continues dithering, continues drifting, Mr. Speaker, then within a number of months less than six it is inevitable that the government will go to wage and price controls. It is going there politically because of the outrage of the Canadian public, which will say "You have to do something to stop this inflation; you have to do something about these interest rates". Because there is no quick and dramatic action that they can take—because they would not start the process months ago and they would not start it a year ago—they will bring in wage and price controls. Not because they think that wage and price controls are the answer. They did not solve anything in Canada permanently five years ago in the three years that they were applied. But that is where the government is heading, to wage and price controls, Mr. Speaker. That is a complete waste of time, Mr. Speaker. It is another extension of state power and interference with the lives of Canadians, another major obstacle and impediment to the market economy that this country is strengthened by because of our resources.

If the government does not act now, it is going to wait for the inevitable and we are going to have wage and price controls or some crazy tax-based incomes policy which the minister's own department says is not the solution. The minister is going to do one of those two things within six months if he does not start the painful process now of straightening out this nation's economy.

I am totally against wage and price controls, but if the minister is going to do nothing now but just dither and continue that policy of 14 months, then I say to him he is better off having wage and price controls brought in tomorrow, rather than waiting until there is an extreme emergency in Canada and bringing them in in the midst of chaos. Is he going to wait for the emergency to arise and then bully and dragoon the provinces into going along with him?

That is the choice. Start the process now, as we started it in December, 1979. They delayed the process. They not only damaged us, they damaged Canada and the Canadian people. They put us years behind, they put the energy industry behind, the tar sands development behind, the heavy oil industry behind. They can start now, or we are going to have wage and price controls.

We need new, revised forecasts. The minister said in his speech on May 6 that interest costs alone last year were up $1 billion more than his budget forecast. We need new, revised forecasts now and he should give them to us in his speech today. Here is the government's borrowing. It cost the government yesterday for a $1.2 billion issue 16.25 per cent in interest. The Government of Canada is borrowing and paying 16.25 per cent interest, and the bonds are selling at a discount. How far have we fallen? The long-term bond market is gone. One must be crazy to invest money in the long term in view of what we see today—the government being afraid to do anything. People are not doing it.

We have had 11 increases in oil, gas and heating oil prices since last year. Only three of them gave anything to the producers; eight of them were tax increases. Gasoline today is 49 cents a gallon more expensive in Montreal than it was a year ago. Heating oil in St. John's, Newfoundland is up 40 cents compared to a year ago. It has gone from 75 cents to $1.15 per gallon; this is over a 50 per cent increase from the minister who promised: "Vote Liberal and the price will stay down". That minister has a lot to answer for. The people voted Liberal, and we know where the price has gone and where it is going.

The minister has a new and callous attitude. He tells the people who have mortgages that it would be wrong for him to give advice as to how to manage their affairs, as reported in the Ottawa Citizen. Also he said that the government would not bail out individuals facing mortgage renewals, and he noted that an analysis last year found most home owners could handle the payments resulting from higher rates. That is what the minister says now. About a year and a half ago he did not say it, nor did his cohorts say it. Now interest rates are 5 per cent higher than they were when gentlemen opposite were in opposition. But today, with four safe years ahead of them, they are saying to Canadians, "You can renew. You have the income. Don't be so foolish. Don't come to us telling us your troubles. You have lots of money to renew. We are not going to give you any help".

That is a callous attitude compared to what they said just a year or a year and a half ago. The seven million home owners in Canada have been kicked by the minister and shown that they will get no relief. Then there are the farmers and the fishermen. Unfortunately I do not have the time to go into all these figures now; I think I am getting near the end of my time. Apparently I only have one minute left.

Mr. Evans: You are beyond the end of your rope.

Mr. Crosbie: No, the government is beyond the end of its rope. The people of Canada are beyond the end of their rope.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: If we were not a peaceful, law-abiding country, they would know what to do with the rope. After having somebody tell them, after getting into office on one set of promises—that they are to forget high interest rates and that they have enough income to renew their mortgages—the people of Canada would know what to do with the rope.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Miss MacDonald: They have no shame.

Mr. Crosbie: There is no shame. I say to the Canadian people right now that we will do what we can in the House. Do not forget, Canadian people, the New Democratic Party helped cause all this. They put us out of office and they put these people opposite back in. They stopped the mortgage interest and property tax credit. They stopped the energy tax credit. They brought on the 19.5 per cent bank rate. They helped the government; they are co-conspirators. They are the rump of the government party, so hold them responsible too.

We in this party heard the Prime Minister say that he would manage the economy in such a way that interest rates would in fact come down, as reported on February 10, 1980.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: As reported in The Toronto Sun on February 4, 1980, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce said:

I don't think that allowing the dollar to have some downward adjustment would do as much harm to our economy as our present high level of interest rates.

At that time they were 14 per cent and, as we all know, they are now over 20 per cent.

The minister wants suggestions. It is not our job to run the government. We were put out. Hon. gentlemen opposite had a lot to do with it. We were not politically clever enough. He was more clever then we were politically, but now the minister is the one who is responsible and the chickens are coming home to roost.

My advice to the minister, because he asked for advice, in all due modesty is that he go back and take the approach of the budget of December 11, 1979. The government should make a convincing show that they will restrain themselves; they will still help the needy, those who are the most unfortunate, as we tried to do, but they will restrain themselves after ten years of savage deficits. Give the investors some chance to feel more confident in Canada; make the outside investor feel more welcome. Never mind these other artificial changes in FIRA and the threats which come from the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, who has never run anything, not even a bull's-eye factory, who says that he will tell the Americans, the Belgians and all the rest how to run their businesses. Forget that, but get together with Alberta in the national interest.

Alberta has had a hard time for the last year since it stopped its negotiations with us and had to go on with this government. They had a pretty severe pummelling; they will be in a more reasonable frame of mind. I am a national politician. I believe in the national government. The agreement must be settled in the national interest.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please.

Mr. Crosbie: May I just conclude.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I will accord the hon. member 30 seconds in which to conclude.

Mr. Crosbie: Alberta is ready to be reasonable, but it is the national government which must change its national energy policy. That will let us strengthen the Canadian dollar. In turn it will allow the Bank of Canada to reduce interest rates. That is the immediate thing the government can do. It should act now. Let us have a settlement of the energy dispute by the end of May and Canadians will get immediate relief. That is my immediate suggestion. I have made more long-term suggestions. The government has put Canada in a position from which it will take a long time to recover. The process must start now. Get some courage and some gumption; they have another four years to go before facing an election.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, after that scholarly survey of the issue which perhaps can be summarized as, "Do as I did", I would like to put forward some suggestions to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), since he indicated that he is interested in listening to alternatives. We had a debate in December dealing with the critical situation facing the Canadian economy as a result of the interest rate problem, as a result of the severe problem of undercapacity in the economy, as a result of unemployment, as a result of the housing crisis which is facing so many Canadians, as a result of the crisis in bankruptcy which is affecting small business and farmers, the crisis in costs which is affecting fishermen, and the general increases in the cost of food and the cost of living which are affecting every Canadian.

In the last couple of days and in a speech which he made in Toronto last week, the minister made a very similar defence to that which he gave in December. It is the same defence. Although I do not intend to spend any time dealing with the pot-pourri of suggestions which have come forward from the Conservative party, they have ranged today from advocacy of an immediate introduction of wage and price controls to even stiffer cutbacks and harsher economic policies, than are currently being introduced. Apparently even higher interest rates are being suggested in the short term in order to produce magically lower interest rates in the long term.

Mr. Crosbie: Don't be such a twister, don't misquote me. I never said that.

Mr. Rae: The hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) has had his turn to speak to the House. I did not interrupt him, even though there were many occasions on which I might have wanted to say something. I would appreciate it if he would give me the same courtesy which I attempted to give him. I will not comment on those policies.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have no desire to interrupt the hon. member except when he starts to misquote and put in my mouth words I never said. I did not advocate wage and price controls and I have not said a couple of the other things; I have not suggested higher interest rates. As long as the hon. member quotes me correctly, I have no desire to interrupt him.

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for St. John's West is afraid of the consequences of some of his words. When we read Hansard tomorrow, I am sure we will see exactly what he had to say about wage and price controls. I stand by what I have just described in terms of the effect of what he said.

The purpose of the defence offered today by the Minister of Finance is really twofold. The first is that the interest rate policy which the government is following is necessary in order to support the Canadian dollar. The defence of the Canadian dollar and the relationship between the American and Canadian economies have been the persistent argument which the government and the bank have put forward for many, many years. The secondary defence, which the minister trots out from time to time and has put forward with even greater vigour in the last couple of weeks, is the need to have these kinds of interest rates in order to reduce inflation.

I might remind the minister that this is a significant change from what he was saying in December. If he looks at his remarks in December, he will see that he said that these rates were too high for Canada, but that they were necessary for Canada because of what was going on in the United States.

If I understand him correctly, in the last week he has been saying that these rates are necessary for Canada in order to control inflation, that these rates are not too high or excessive, that in fact they are a necessary part of government strategy.

An hon. Member: And they may go higher.

Mr. Rae: And they may go higher! He has no idea how high they will go. He is not opposed to the policy being followed by the bank and the effect it is having on the Canadian economy.

I want to say to the minister that what I call the domestic justification for the control of inflation is completely without foundation. There is no economy in the western world among the OECD countries which has real rates of 8 per cent, 10 per cent and 12 per cent as a measure of deliberate policy. Canada is alone in this regard. These are the highest real rates in our history. By any stretch of the imagination they are excessive, even for the objective which the government has set out for the control of inflation. I would ask the minister to come clean on this point: What does he think the real rates should be over time? I want the minister to tell us what rate he really thinks should go to lenders of all different kinds and whether he really thinks a rate of 8 per cent, 10 per cent or 12 per cent is required, even if one accepts the premise that the way to fight inflation is by raising interest rates.

The argument the minister put forward on the foreign exchange justification to the effect that we really have no choice is an argument which does many things. If I may say so, the hon. member for St. John's West did the same thing. He underestimated the real strength of the Canadian economy and the Canadian dollar. If we had an independent interest rate policy I do not think the consequence would be that our dollar would necessarily fall to 60 cents, 65 cents or 70 cents, U.S., as was suggested by the hon. member for St. John's West and many other critics who, in my view, have no real faith in the inherent strength of the Canadian economy.

The statement that we have no choice, that we must tie ourselves at every opportunity to the American policy, is an admission of our colonial status. It is an admission that there is no possibility of the government exercising any significant degree of economic independence. It is an admission and a statement that our interest rate policy is not made in Canada in order to respond to the domestic conditions of the Canadian economy but that because of Liberal party policies we have become an economic colony of the United States.

The third approach being taken by the minister, that is, when he talks about wage and price controls and the introduction of a tax-based incomes policy which would have the effect of controlling wages, is one which would create division among the Canadian people. If the minister looks back to the experiences we had under the anti-inflation board, he will see that it limited the ability of the average Canadian worker to keep up with the rate of inflation. It enriched certain Canadians and certain corporations, allowing them to take unfair advantage. It restricted the living standards of the average working person.

The interesting thing about the review released by the minister's department last year was that it showed lower income workers, many of whom work for our largest financial institutions, fell much further behind the increases in the cost of living than did almost all other workers in Canada. The argument put forward from time to time with regard to the 1975 wage controls is that it was an exercise in social justice. It is put forward that it was some kind of incomes policy, which is completely nonsensical. The minister's affection for what he calls, "market forces" and the need to restore what he calls "market discipline" to the economy will result in giving credence to the law of the jungle. The most powerful will receive the biggest increases and the least powerful will receive the smallest, which will simply increase wage disparities. This will increase the sense of unfairness in our society. This will not resolve the fundamental problem of inflation. It will not resolve the escalating prices which we see in so many parts of the economy.

I wish to turn to the alternatives, Mr. Speaker. Basically, the alternatives are fourfold. The first comes under the heading of recognition by the government of the emergency which we are facing. I remind the minister that when the government introduced the anti-inflation legislation in 1975-76 the Supreme Court took cognizance of the fact that there was an urgency and, indeed, an emergency which justified the federal government exercising its ordinary power of control over the economy. The inflation rate at that time was lower than it is today. Indeed, the government was not faced with the out of control situation with which it is faced today. So we need recognition of an emergency.

We need immediate relief—relief for home owners who are caught in a roulette game of time. These are home owners who happen to be renewing their mortgages in one month, who are paying rates two and three percentage points higher than others. Those home owners who renew this year will pay rates four and five points higher than others. Fishermen attempting to buy boats or improve their equipment are facing interest rates which are four to six points higher. Farmers are facing the same absurd situation. We need relief directed to the groups which need it. If we do not have relief we will have not only a reduction of supply—fishermen will fish less and farmers will produce less—but we will face problems of unfairness.

Monetarism represents a kind of roulette, the roulette of not knowing from week to week whether the rate will be up or down. We are creating a nation of speculators. We are making speculators out of the average home owner as a consequence of a policy which needs to be changed. It can be changed through a relief program, under the notion of an economic emergency and urgent situation. For some time we have argued that problems are structural. In a sense, the problems are built into our modern economy. We need a prices commission, not as a temporary measure brought in as a cosmetic device every two or three years but as a permanent feature of the Canadian economy, which will have the capacity to roll back price increases where they cannot be justified.

The provincial governments have a responsibility as well. They have a responsibility to end speculation in housing, to end speculation with regard to farm land. In my view, they have an obligation to encourage land banking and policies which will keep down the price of land for farming and housing. They have a responsibility to see that it is still possible to be able to afford a house in the city of Toronto while making less than $30,000 a year. The minister of housing in the Ontario legislature admitted last week that a person had to make at least $30,000 in order to be able to buy a house in Toronto. That is absurd.

Under the heading of new policies there is quite simply a need to reduce interest rates. There is a need to change the policy. I repeat what I said to the minister: there is no evidence to suggest that any other country is living with rates which are this high and which has no control over those rates. The rates currently being inflicted on the economy are dysfunctional. They do not have the effect of controlling inflation. They have not had the effect of controlling the price explosions which we have seen with regard to housing and, indeed, which we have seen in parts of the food industry. They simply have the effect of contributing to the explosion.

There needs to be a change, a step toward economic independence. There needs to be a determination on the part of the government that Canada's interest rates policy will reflect the domestic condition of the Canadian economy and not the decisions of Congress, the Federal Reserve Board or Wall Street in the United States.

● (1600)

The third heading under which I would suggest to the minister that there needs to be changes is on the tax side. Instead of using the tax system as a way of controlling wages, I have argued many times before in this House and will argue again today that in the context of controlling inflation and of changing our interest rate policy the government needs to introduce general reforms to bring about fairness in the way it collects revenues and distributes tax burdens. If the government fears an explosion in wage demands because it is failing to deal with inflation and failing to give confidence to the average Canadian worker, it could take positive steps to increase the after tax incomes of working Canadians through a redistribution of the tax levels of different groups in society. That is the meaning of the cost of living tax credit.

The minister rejected the cost of living tax credit out of hand in his speech in Toronto, and I think this shows that he did not really understand it. He said he did not want to give blanket assistance to all groups in society. He said he did not think providing everyone with a set of gloves for dealing with the passage of the hot potato that he was talking about would restore what he calls market discipline.

I say to the minister that the government must give the assurance to the Canadian people, particularly those on low and on fixed incomes, that they, too, are part of Canadian society. They too, must be protected. They must not be left to the vagaries of the market. I cannot believe the minister talks constantly of the "discipline of the market". He knows perfectly well that for many people the market is a jungle; the market is an exercise in systematic unfairness. He knows very well that if we leave people subject to that unfairness they will seek their own private solutions which, in many cases, will be inflationary; they will lose hope and will seek private solutions to public problems. The problem of inflation is not a private problem affecting each individual as if they were Adams in society, but is a problem that affects the whole of society. That is the meaning of tax reform and the cost of living tax credit.

However, there are other things that can be done. We need to have tax reform which will deal with the problem of the banks. I see the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) is present. I agree with him. I moved amendments to the Bank Act, I say to the Minister of Agriculture, that would have provided the minister with the power to give the assistance to farmers and small businessmen that he was talking about. Those amendments were rejected by the Minister of Finance. It is a pity I did not have his assistance during the summer when we were putting them forward. They were rejected by the Tory opposition who are now speaking so firmly about their commitment to lowering the rates. So we need to have those amendments. We need to have the government introduce tax changes that would put a damper on international speculation. Instead of rejecting out of hand the whole notion of exchange controls and considering them as if they were an undiluted whole that had to be rejected or accepted holus-bolus, I suggest to the minister that he look at changes in the tax system that would discourage international speculation, that would discourage the transfer of hot money from Canada to the United States, and that would give us a greater degree of independence.

If the minister says those suggestions are unacceptable, I remind him that when Governor Bouey appeared before the committee two years ago, when the rates were at 11 per cent, he was asked, "What if the rates go to 15?" He said, "Then we will have to look at alternatives; at that point we will have to start considering alternatives". Well, now the rates are at 20, and the government is still refusing to consider alternatives which would have the effect of dampening speculative demand in the economy of demonstrating to the Canadian public that the government is really serious, and of giving the Canadian people the sense that they have a government which is prepared to respond with measures that are tough and swift, but measures that, above all, are fair.

My concern about the proposals which have been put forward by the minister and which are being put forward by the government now is that they are unfair; and the proposals which are being advocated by the minister as possible changes in the rules of the game, as he puts it, will be even more unfair to the Canadian people.

I therefore move, Mr. Speaker, an amendment to the motion put forward by the hon. member for St. John's West. Seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) I move:

That the motion be amended by inserting therein, immediately after the words "unprecedented high levels", the following words:

"for continuing policies that not only inflict hardship on the Canadian people but make Canadian economic independence impossible",—

As a result of this amendment, the motion would read:

That this House condemns the Minister of Finance for permitting interest rates to rise to unprecedented high levels, for continuing policies that not only inflict hardship on the Canadian people but make Canadian economic independence impossible, and calls on the minister to meet his economic responsibilities or resign.

As the debate proceeds over the next few weeks—because this is not a matter which can be discussed intelligently in 20 minutes—we will be putting forward additional policies. I think the minister will see we have attempted to provide for a number of years a coherent critique of what the bank is doing, of what the minister is doing and of what the policy of the government is, to show him that there is an alternative, that it is a credible alternative and not, as has been suggested by the hon. member for St. John's West, a fantasy land alternative. In fact, it is a series of concrete and practical measures which will have benefits for the Canadian people. They are not simply sugar-coated pills that will satisfy everyone. They will deal with the problems of inflation, but will deal with them in a way which is fair and will not bring the Canadian economy to its knees. Neither will they reduce our economic independence or diminish our objective of achieving control by the Canadian people of their own economy, so that the policies of the government will eventually reflect the interest of the Canadian people and not simply respond to conditions which are taking place in the United States.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) was kind enough earlier to arrange that the Chair was forewarned of the amendment that he proposes. The Chair has found that the amendment is in order. Shall I dispense?

Some hon. Members: Dispense.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Agreed.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate in this particular debate, and I welcome too the speeches which have been made by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) and the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae).

I am certain, as they are, that the subject matter of the Canadian economy and the problems it faces will be a matter of discussion in the House of Commons for a good period of time, as it has been since the new Parliament was created. As Your Honour knows, most of the time of the House of Commons since the new Parliament has been in session has been devoted to economic matters, including opposition days and government bills relating to the economy. It is also true that a good deal of time has been focused on the all-important question of the Constitution; but nevertheless, the members of the House of Commons have not neglected discussion of the economy. They have discussed the economy on a number of occasions and on a number of important bills, and they have taken numerous opportunities during question period to examine the government on its economic policies. I hope that trend will continue because the problems that we face, especially on the inflation front, are deep-seated and, as the hon. member for St. John's West has suggested, will not be susceptible to magic, quick or overnight solutions.

As I replied yesterday in answer to a question, the inflationary psychology has become embedded not only in the minds of the public, in the minds of the economic actors in the economy, but also deeply embedded in the institutions and the structures of the economy. It has been built up over a considerable period of time.

I am not ready to engage in a debate about the historic causes of inflation in this country. I do know that in the seventies, when the governments of the provinces and the national government, especially in the early part of the seventies, were strongly pursuing expansionary policies and adding to their deficits, the public and all political parties generally supported that type of fiscal policy. I do know that as successive ministers of finance reduced taxes in the House of Commons over the years in the 1970s, probably in the total amount of $14 billion, their actions were widely applauded and never opposed in the House of Commons.

Notwithstanding that, it may be instructive to review the causes of a good deal of this inflationary psychology. It has been reviewed rather clearly in the annual report of the governor of the bank, which I recommend hon. members read. They may not agree with every part of it, but I think it is a useful survey of the background to the current inflationary situation in the country.

The hon. member for St. John's West has focused his motion on the question of interest rates. I have no complaint with that. Interest rates are high; they are worryingly high.

They are a manifestation of inflation in the economic environment, and they will not be significantly reduced until the over-all level of inflation is curbed. That is absolutely clear to me.

Since I took on this job there have been three pronounced incidents of interest rate shocks, so to speak. In the spring of 1980 after I became minister, the rates went up and then down again.

Mr. Nowlan: That was the first shock, when you became minister.

Mr. MacEachen: Interest rates have been so volatile that they went up to about 20 per cent in the United States and they came down to 10 per cent, as hon. members will realize, all in the period since March, 1980. Last December they went up to an unprecedented high. They have gone down in the interim, but not as much. They are now up again. Therefore, we have been confronted with volatility in interest rates over that period of time, which have impacted in the United States on the Canadian interest rate situation. No minister of finance could be indifferent to the uncertainty created by the volatility of the interest rate policy pursued in the United States nor could a minister be indifferent to the impact which these changes have had on the Canadian economy.

I want to discuss those external developments, but I do want to say a word about the Canadian economy. The hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood drew attention to the fact that in the arguments which I advanced in December—I have not read them but I take his word and they do correspond to my own recollection—the main thrust, or the principal explanation, was pressure from the United States. Indeed, I believe I stated that the Governor of the Bank of Canada had said we were running interest rates in Canada which were higher than those required to control the money supply in this country. As I recollect, if hon. members will go back to the statement made by the governor of the bank during the ministers of finance conference in December, and subsequent to its release, he makes that point apparent.

When I brought down the budget last October, hon. members will recall that I was predicting very weak or negative growth in the economy for 1980.

Mr. Kilgour: I cannot listen to this.

Mr. MacEachen: I was also predicting a lower inflation rate for 1981 than has subsequently been the case. But that is something quite different. I believe hon. members who are looking at the economy and at what has happened in the economy since last October and last December will have to realize that we are generating considerable inflationary pressures of our own in Canada. We cannot single out pressures from the United States, though they are important, as the sole explanation because there is pressure on rates in our own country.

Hon. members may have noticed that in the statement made by the governor of the bank last Thursday following the very high bank rate announcement the concluding sentence was:

> In respect of other economic developments, the bank noted that the rate of total spending and the demand for credit in Canada have both remained disturbingly high.

There is a very strong demand for credit in this country. There is a very strong demand for bank loans. There is a booming real estate market in certain Canadian cities, despite very high mortgage rates at the present time, as was pointed out by the governor of the bank in his speech delivered in Moose Jaw.

Mr. McDermid: Who is buying the homes, Allan?

Mr. MacEachen: I have to remind hon. members that in Canada, for example, real output increased at an annual rate of over 8 per cent in the last quarter of 1980. That was quite unexpected. Real output in the first quarter of 1981 ran at annual rates of 4 per cent to 6 per cent. Residential construction in the country was the main area of weakness, especially in the first half of the year. However, the merchandise trade surplus doubled from $4 billion in 1979 to $8 billion. The combined foreign deficit on goods and services fell from $5.8 billion in 1979 to $2.8 billion in 1980. That is on the output side.

I remind hon. members also that in the budget, based upon the projections which had been worked out in the Department of Finance, we projected an unemployment rate of 8.6 per cent, I believe, for 1981. I have not looked up what my predecessor projected, the former minister of finance, but in April of this year unemployment in Canada was at 7 per cent, the lowest unemployment rate we have had in the country since June, 1976.

Mr. Crosbie: You said 8.5 per cent.

Mr. MacEachen: Either 8.5 per cent or 8.6 per cent. In any event, it is the lowest unemployment rate since 1976.

With respect to employment growth, I gave the figure yesterday. I may have said 360,000 jobs were created but I think it was probably about 346,000 for the same month in 1980, or up 3.3 per cent. This is the employment growth created from April, 1980 to April, 1981. I doubt whether there is any industrialized country in the world with a better employment creation record than Canada had in the last year. Therefore, I do not think hon. members ought to talk about the Canadian economy in stagnation or a Canadian economy which has been unable to create jobs. That is not the case.

There is no doubt that, in addition to the greater strength in real economic activity, not nominal activity, there has been a very disturbing tendency for inflation and inflationary expectations to show signs of deterioration. I have admitted more than once that the outlook for inflation in 1981 is worse than it was at the time of the budget in 1980.

The hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood talks about a made-in-Canada interest policy. Whatever validity may have existed for that point of view, and I have at times argued against it, I think we are making our own pressure at the present time in the Canadian economy on interest rates. I refer hon. members to the comments made by the governor of the bank in his speech in Moose Jaw. He talked about the various forces at work in the Canadian economy, providing reasons for the recent tendency of Canadian interest rates to rise. He went on to say:

> Let me recapitulate them: the strength of the current economic rebound in Canada; high and rising inflation and serious fears of still worse inflation to come, a continuing strong demand for credit even with interest rates at levels that normally would have discouraged domestic borrowing; and a persistent weakness of the Canadian dollar that was adding to the upward pressures on costs and prices in Canada.

That is the current situation in the country. The hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood may be right in saying that the explanation given last December has to be supplemented.

The second important influence is the pressure we have had on rates from the United States. There is no doubt about it, this second force from the United States has significantly intensified in recent weeks in the very rapid rise in interest rates which have once again occurred in the United States.

Maybe I should say a word about the situation in the United States because it is useful for all of us to know exactly how we see it. The new administration in the United States has taken a strong anti-inflationary stance and regards monetary policy as an important weapon in dealing with inflation. In the longer run, success in reducing the rate of inflation will help lower interest rates, but at this stage it appears that financial markets are focusing more on the possibility that the confrontation of restrictive monetary policy and the inflationary momentum in the economy may be particularly sharp over the next several months, with continuing upward pressure on interest rates.

Whatever one may say about the expectation of the financial markets or the explanation that is mentioned with respect to a conflict between monetary policies and the inflationary momentum within the economy, there is no doubt that we have had, for example, a two percentage point increase in short-term interest rates over the week, leading to what has happened to the Canadian bank rate.

I ask hon. members, what alternative in these circumstances should the Governor of the Bank of Canada have? Was it a good idea? Up to the present time he has stated, and it is still a legitimate point of view, that when these pressures on the Canadian interest rate situation and the Canadian currency arise from higher interest rates in the United States, one can take some of that pressure in increased interest rates in Canada or a decline in the Canadian currency.

The fact is that Canadian currency at the present time is trading at 83.20. It may be higher. In these economic circumstances, would it be wise to permit a further depreciation in the value of the Canadian currency? A further depreciation in the value of the Canadian currency would be inevitable if there were an outflow of capital from this country, not impeded by higher interest rates in Canada.

Mr. Nowlan: There is a national outflow when you come to the national energy policy.

Mr. MacEachen: I will come to the National Energy Program, if the hon. member wants to talk about it. It is not the problem. It may be part of the solution. I am saying that at the present time, regardless of the National Energy Program, we would have pressures from the United States in the form of very sharp increases in interest rates. How does Canada respond? By a further depreciation in the Canadian currency, a depreciation which would increase the cost to Canadians of all their imported goods, which would bring in a further blast of imported inflation from abroad and would have very little effect on the competitive capacity of Canadian exporters?

There is a great advantage now in terms of the exchange rate given to Canadian exporters. Indeed, it is so great and their incomes are so large that they can afford rather large inflationary wage settlements in the current circumstances. There is no advantage to the Canadian economy, in my view and in the view of the governor of the bank, in further depreciation because it does not give us any competitive advantage and adds to our inflationary problems.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, may I put a brief question to the minister? I agree with what the minister is saying about the Canadian dollar, but my question to him is this. What policies is he going to adopt and implement to strengthen the Canadian dollar so that we can have lower interest rates and will not need to keep them high to protect a weak Canadian dollar? That is what we want to know. How is he going to do that?

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member had asked about policies to increase the strength of the Canadian dollar. He will know that the trade figures have been very strong. Indeed, for the past quarter and the quarter before that they have been very strong indeed. They have been contributing to the strength of the Canadian dollar.

The hon. member advocated in the course of his speech and yesterday that a speedy energy agreement with the oil-producing provinces would relieve somewhat the downward pressure on the Canadian dollar and put us in a position where interest rates could come down. I must say that any uncertainty that exists in the economy is best resolved. There is no doubt about that. The Government of Canada has been eager, as the former minister of finance was eager, to secure an agreement with the government of Alberta to relieve that uncertainty in the Canadian economy. Hon. members opposite did not succeed in reaching an agreement and we have not succeeded in reaching an agreement. Undoubtedly when that disagreement is cleared up, it will be better for the Canadian economy. However, I do not see that it will have very much impact on interest rates at the present time.

• (1630)

If I took the advice of the hon. member for St. John's West I would reach a solution with the government of Alberta which would bring oil prices up to at least 75 per cent of the world level. Indeed, I read the hon. member for St. John's West as having said recently to Alberta: "Hang in there; get your maximum price".

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. MacEachen: That is what he was quoted as having said: "Hang in there and get your maximum price". If that is his advice to me, I want to tell him that conceding to Alberta's price demands would have a very big impact on the inflation situation in Canada. Would acceding to their pricing agreement help inflation very much?

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. MacEachen: It certainly would have a pronounced effect on the CPI, and that is why I was rebuking the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) yesterday, who was complaining about increases in the CPI, when she supported a motion at her convention that would immediately increase the price of energy to 75 per cent of world prices.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I certainly do not wish to interrupt the minister just because he refers to me, but when he makes a statement about me that is totally incorrect, I do feel I have to draw his attention to the fact that what he says is not at all correct. There was no such thing as a resolution passed at our convention which said that the price of oil should go to 75 per cent of world prices immediately. That simply is not true and the minister should not be allowed to make these false statements.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I did not attend the Conservative convention, but I did read press reports which stated quite clearly that the member from Etobicoke had argued against a proposal made by the Alberta Conservatives that the oil price should go up to 85 per cent of the world level, and that he had succeeded, because of the political dynamite behind the proposal, to get his supporters in the hall to agree to 75 per cent of world prices. That was the press report.

Mr. Taylor: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. Whether it be the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) or any other member who has the floor, the Chair has no choice but to recognize an hon. member who stands on a point of order and at least hear the beginning of his comments to determine whether in fact there is a point of order.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I was at the convention, and the Alberta delegates did not argue the way the hon. minister just said. He should not be talking on spec; why not get some facts?

An hon. Member: Why don't you come to one of the conventions and find out what goes on?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Taylor: What are you going to gain by saying these things that are untrue?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I do not have to go to the Conservative convention, nor do I have to read the press reports, because members are rejecting all that has been attributed to them in the press, namely, that they support 75 per cent of world prices.

The hon. member for St. John's West was quoted recently as telling Albertans when he was in the west to hang in there on their pricing agreement; he was telling Alberta to hang in there. I am telling him that the year over year increase in the consumer price index would jump to 16 per cent. That is what would happen. For the year as a whole—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: Hon. members opposite find this very difficult to take. I listened very carefully and intently to all the comments by the hon. member for St. John's West and he is doing the same thing. He is not protesting about the statement attributed to him in Alberta when he said: "Hang in there Alberta and get what you want". That would represent an increase in the cost of living to 16 per cent.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: I want to tell hon. members that the price agreement which they allegedly brought about called for an increase in prices within a four-year term to 75 per cent, and then 85 per cent of world prices. Do they still stand for that?

Some hon. Members: Get the facts.

Mr. MacEachen: Do they still stand for that increase in the CPI? Do they believe that if that is brought about, these increased energy prices would not filter through to the rest of the economy? Will they not concede in those circumstances that in order to restrain the inflation which would be caused by these very substantial energy price increases embedded in the CPI, we would require a very tight fiscal and monetary policy? In my view, an immediate energy settlement along the lines proposed by the hon. member for St. John's West would not have much of an impact on the current high interest rates we are facing in this country. In fact, the hon. member said to me to get an energy agreement with Alberta, but not at any price.

An hon. Member: We don't want it at any price.

Mr. MacEachen: I am telling hon. members opposite that when they make these pricing proposals, they ought to relate them to their concerns about the cost of living and interest rates, because in both cases they will hurt and not help. I want to remind hon. members about that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: I want to assure you, Mr. Speaker, that it is our intention to seek an energy pricing agreement with the province of Alberta—

An hon. Member: When?

Mr. MacEachen: —as early and as quickly as possible, but it will be an agreement that will preserve the interests of all Canadians. It will not be my intention to ransom the future of Canada because of the current high interest rates we are facing in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Your deficits are already doing that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Taylor: Albertans are Canadians and you should remember that.

Mr. MacEachen: Of course Albertans are Canadians, and no one would think of making that comment except the hon. member himself. I certainly would not make it or imply it in any way.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: When I talk about the interests of all Canadians, I am speaking of the interests of the province of Alberta as well.

An hon. Member: Give them a fair deal.

Mr. MacEachen: I agree with all hon. members that an early energy agreement with Alberta would be desirable, but it will require accommodation on the part of the province of Alberta as well as accommodation on the part of the Government of Canada. It will require a constructive compromise between the two governments. As I have said on earlier occasions, it is not a matter of capitulation or surrender on the part of either side because neither side will do that. There will have to be compromise, adjustment and accommodation on both sides, and that is what we are seeking at the present time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: For how long?

Mr. MacEachen: To follow the hon. member's suggestion of going to the price levels he is advocating at the present time, I say, would be even more inflationary than any of the other proposals which were in his budget.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

• (1640)

Mr. MacEachen: I know I am coming to the end of my time.

Mr. McDermid: You sure are.

Mr. MacEachen: I regret that the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands should be so raucous during the course of debate. She has constantly interrupted me from her seat, which is something I never do, and I hope she will stop it so that I can use my time more profitably.

Miss MacDonald: Be serious.

Mr. MacEachen: I just want to make the contrast. The advice given by the hon. member for St. John's West to me was to "bring back my budget". That was his advice. He said, "We had expenditure restraint in the budget". I believe in expenditure restraint because in the expenditure line which I have projected for the next several years there is a clear commitment to expenditure growth within the growth rate of the gross national product and to bringing about from year to year a decrease in the rate of growth of public spending. We are committed to expenditure restraint, but I asked my friend, the hon. member for St. John's West, if he really believes in expenditure restraint, why he does not convince the other members of his party about expenditure restraint so that every day we will not be faced with a barrage of requests from hon. members opposite to introduce new spending programs.

Mr. Siddon: That is not true, and you know it.

Mr. MacEachen: The most notable example was the view expressed yesterday by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands who seemed to be saying to me that I must take special action to protect every particular group in the country. I believe in expenditure restraint, I believe in bringing down inflation, and I believe that in order to bring down interest rates we have to bring down inflation, but we will not bring down inflation if I respond to every request made in the House of Commons for additional spending by adding to the deficit, adding to our financial requirements and putting further pressure on inflation in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wright: Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to what the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) was saying. I did not want to interrupt him, but I wonder if he would entertain a question.

Mr. MacEachen: Sure.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): That would require the unanimous consent of the House, in view of the fact that the time allotted to the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) has now expired. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Interest Rates

Mr. Wright: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) has said on numerous occasions in the House that interest rates in Canada are subject to influences beyond the control of the government. I understand in part what he is saying. If interest rates in Canada are lower than they are in the United States or elsewhere, then money will flow out of our country, and that would have a dramatic effect on our dollar. In part, at least, interest rates must be kept up because of this.

Just recently Premier Lougheed of Alberta made a suggestion to the Minister of Finance and the federal government in general. He said that if they would remove the export tax on natural gas and allow more gas to be exported from Alberta, that would go a long way toward solving the federal government's problem and would allow it perhaps then to decide whether it could reduce interest rates. In fact, he suggested that if the federal government would allow more exports of gas, that would certainly help reduce interest rates in Canada.

Does the minister agree with that statement by the Premier of Alberta, and would he consider taking that action?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker—

Mr. Knowles: Madam?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I think it is self-evident that our trade performance, our sales abroad and our earnings of foreign exchange have a bearing on the strength of the Canadian dollar. There is no question about that, and that is why I cited the very strong trade figures we have already experienced as an underlying strength of the Canadian dollar. Any other action to improve our exports and our trade performance would have the same effect, but in this particular case—and here it is a question of fact—I understand that certainly in recent months we have been sending to the United States under permit as much gas as the markets there can take at the price, but that is a question of fact which I would have to check out.

The hon. member talks about the effect on Canada of American interest rates. Maybe we should remind ourselves that it is not just Canada which is experiencing this impact. The hon. member may recall that just recently the Chancellor of West Germany, Helmut Schmidt, was complaining very loudly and strongly about the impact of American interest rates on the exchange rate of the German currency and about the necessity for Germany to raise its interest rates in order to meet the attraction of the higher rates in the United States, so while there may be differences in the level of rates—

Mr. Crosbie: Six and a half per cent.

Mr. Rae: You can say that again, brother.

Mr. MacEachen: —the pressure arising from the United States is extending to Canada and to every European country, and I think it is better for Canadians to understand that that effect is universal.

Miss MacDonald: Do you understand the difference between 12 per cent and 19.5 per cent?

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to enter into the debate on the important subject of interest rates, but before I do, I wish to note, as the House realizes, that the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) was rushed, and because of that he did not refer in his comments to the fact that of the 11 energy price increases since he took office, eight were the result of tax measures imposed by the Minister of Finance on the Canadian people. I know the minister would want that on the record.

We heard a great number of statistics about international finance from the Minister of Finance. I would like to spend some time this afternoon talking about people because the Canadian people are faced with the monetary policies of the Bank of Canada which decree high interest rates to support the Canadian dollar and to control inflation and a federal government which completely ignores the plight of Canadian home owners, farmers and small business. As a result, the current prime interest rate at Canadian banks is 19.5 per cent. But home owners, farmers and small businessmen do not pay at the prime rate. They are paying over 20 per cent. These people, the backbone of Canada, are being crushed by the indifference of the Liberal government.

In the fall of 1979, the hon. member for Windsor West, who is now the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray), speaking on behalf of the Liberal party, made some comments to the House of Commons Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs about the prime rate at that time. He said it would mean the loss of thousands of jobs, it would mean increases in the cost of living, it would put housing beyond the reach of middle and lower-income Canadians, it would hurt small business which depends upon bank borrowing to operate, and it would hurt farmers who have the same dependence on bank borrowing and therefore add to the cost of food. One does not normally rush to support the comments of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, but these comments were surprisingly accurate. However, if that particular member was upset at that time when he was a member of the official opposition, where is he now as Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce? When he made those comments, the prime bank rate was 14 per cent. One would think he would be beside himself today because of the lack of action on the part of the Minister of Finance when the prime rate is 19.5 per cent. However, he has sat in the House for the past two days smug and satisfied and without a flicker of concern as we on this side of the House have expressed our concerns on behalf of the Canadian people and Canadian industry and commerce.

The high interest rate policy of the Liberals has created chaos in the housing market. On the one hand there are signs of consumer panic in some major metropolitan centres. Supply has contracted, but demand has soared as Canadians strive to own homes. The minister responsible for housing recently stated that a large percentage of Canadians do not prefer home ownership as their style of living. That is nonsense. The 1976 census showed that 62 per cent of Canadian households were owner-occupied. Many tenants want to own a home. Canadians are buying homes at an unprecedented pace. Canadians are afraid that mortgage interest rates and prices will soar even higher. And why not? They do not see any definite action on the part of the Liberal government to alleviate the problem. Therefore, they are buying homes at inflated prices and paying absurd interest rates to carry them because they are afraid that soon they will be out of their reach.

● (1650)

At the same time, there is the tragedy that many Canadians are selling their homes, not because they do not want to own a home but because they just cannot afford to carry the one they presently own, or they see a mortgage renewal at prohibitive rates in the near future.

Home owners who purchased homes with 10 per cent mortgages five years ago are faced with 18 per cent mortgages today. It costs $360 to amortize $40,000 at 10 per cent over 25 years and $590 to amortize $40,000 at 18 per cent over 25 years. That increase of 61 per cent is pretty hard for the average Canadian family to find. So those home owners, discouraged and defeated by the Liberal party's high interest rate policy, are retreating to the status of tenant.

A real estate agent friend of mine in Orillia has suggested that there may not be all that much comfort for them as tenants. When the present mortgage financing of 10 per cent and 11 per cent on rental housing expires, those mortgages will be refinanced at the Liberal rate of 18 per cent. The cost of rental housing is sure to rise in the near future. Many Canadians, unable to sell their homes, are simply walking away from them.

Last year, thousands of Canadians, enrolled in the first year of the AHOP program in 1975, abandoned their homes when the five-year mortgages came up for renewal. This year, the number will increase dramatically because of increased interest rates and the fact that 1976 was the biggest year for the AHOP program. We have suggested that the minister responsible for housing study this problem and beat it to the punch, and so help Canadians to keep their homes, but to no avail.

The minister responsible for housing reported that at a meeting of representatives of banks and trust companies, he was told that the number of foreclosures was down. We can only hope that the minister was wise to their game.

There are two methods by which mortgagees can act to enforce their security upon default: foreclosure and power of sale. Foreclosure is history. Power of sale is now the popular method in Ontario. Fifteen days after default, trigger-happy banks and trust companies are starting power of sale proceedings.

In 1980 CMHC lost $231 million on the sale of repossessed real estate. Despite the comments today of the minister responsible for housing, we are all shocked at the $10,000 per unit loss and the human tragedy that is involved in those repossessions.

Interest Rates

The chaos created by the Liberal party's high interest rate policy has swept away the traditional stability of five-year mortgages. Up until the mid-1960s, some life insurance companies were still lending out mortgage money with 25-year terms. The amortization rate and the term were equal. During the years 1965 to 1979, the five-year term became standard. Now mortgages are renewed for one and two years. There is even talk of a six-month term. Certainty for five years has been replaced with one and two-year uncertainty. Canadian home owners and the Canadian mortgage market have lost stability under the term of the Minister of Finance.

Despite the hardships faced by Canadian home owners, the only action taken by the minister responsible for housing is to continue to reiterate his refusal to act. That is not action. This House does not know the reasons for the minister's apparent lack of concern. It may be his conviction that a large percentage of Canadians do not prefer home ownership as a style of living. This is a conviction which is not shared by members of the Progressive Conservative party or the public. He may be hesitant to act because the minister of housing was the only one of 11 ministries in the social development envelope that had its budget slashed. It may be that the minister is simply embarrassed by having had to reverse previous statements on the community services contribution program, shelter allowances and rent controls.

In any event this House will know that the Progressive Conservative party introduced legislation which would have assisted Canadian home owners faced with today's horrendous mortgage interest rates. Our mortgage interest and tax credit legislation would have met almost one half of the increase in mortgage interest caused by the Liberal party's high interest rate policy. But the Liberal party and the NDP voted against mortgage interest relief for Canadian home owners.

I wish to move on to comment briefly upon the effect of the Liberal party's high interest rate policy on farmers. High interest rates are driving established farmers out of business, making it difficult for young farmers to get started, and will eventually result in higher food prices. Farmers borrow money for seed fertilizer, feed and farm equipment. The cost of borrowing that money and the cost of supplies purchased has escalated. As a result, a well-respected established farmer from Mara Township in my riding, recently told me that last year his expenses had doubled but his income was only a shade higher than the previous year.

How are younger farmers to survive? If farmers have higher expenses, they must, quite properly, increase the price of the food they produce. This increases the cost to consumers. I ask the Minister of Finance how that helps to fight inflation?

A farm implement dealer outside of Orillia recently suggested that if something is not done about the Liberal party's high interest rate policy, there will soon be no inventory left in the country. The average gross margin on all performance implement dealers in Canada was 6.9 per cent last year. That does not leave enough margin to carry inventory over until next year. Farmers cannot afford to buy the equipment and implement dealers cannot afford to carry it.

Is it not typical that, while the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce seeks to rescue Massey-Ferguson, the Minister of Finance makes it impossible for Canadian farmers to buy the product?

While the Minister of Finance ignores the problem, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) has not been idle. His contribution was to increase the interest rate on farm credit loans from 12.75 per cent to 14 per cent effective April 1, 1981. With friends like that, does the Canadian farmer need enemies?

The third group which is suffering from the Liberal party's high interest rate policy is small business. On Thursday of last week, I was contacted by a tourist operator in my riding with a familiar plea: Did I know of any relief for small business from today's high interest rates? She and her husband had purchased the business three or four years ago. They had worked hard together to build up their business and they were just beginning to see the results of their efforts. Unfortunately, their first mortgage was coming up for renewal in June. They had been paying 10 per cent, but now the mortgagee was demanding prime rate plus 1 per cent, or over 20 per cent. This would result in an increase of over 100 per cent in mortgage interest payments alone, and add over $30,000 to their outlay each year. She and her husband were at their wit's end. They would be forced to put their business up for sale or face losing their equity on a foreclosure.

That example is being repeated across Canada. The spirit of initiative, hard work and pride of ownership are being driven out at a time when those qualities should be protected and encouraged. Small businesses across Canada are being driven into bankruptcy through no fault of their own.

Canadian businesses have traditionally used bank financing on a permanent, semi-permanent or cyclical basis. The cost of borrowing money has been budgeted at reasonable interest rates and incorporated into fiscal planning. But now business is faced with the disastrous fiscal policy of this government which disrupts all planning.

Bureaucrats and Liberal politicians who have never had to meet a payroll are creating chaos. Business people who have worked hard, did not go to Hawaii, like the Minister of Finance, and cut every possible corner, now find their expenses escalating because of this government. Business will be forced to increase prices in order to survive. The Liberal party's high interest rate policy does not fight inflation; it fuels inflation and causes bankruptcy. The Governor of the Bank of Canada has stated that the Bank of Canada cannot fight inflation alone. Well, it is not doing so. It has provided absolutely no innovation and no policy.

Home owners, farmers and small businesses are fighting inflation and trying to cope with high interest rates. They are the army. As usual, the Liberal party has not even signed up for the draft. The battle is not being fought on the beaches of Jamaica and Hawaii where the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Finance, both well-known warriors, have spent most of their recess while the rest of us were in our ridings listening to the complaints of little people, Canadian people. We were not on those beaches; we were in our ridings. The battle is being fought in Canada by little people, not on the beaches of Jamaica and Hawaii.

● (1700)

The Minister of Finance has not been silent on the issue; he has been very forthright. In fact, after a lifetime of circumlocution, the Minister of Finance has looked inflation full in the eye and stated with finality:

I am not going to begin to advise individuals on how they ought to conduct their personal affairs. I think that would be presumptuous.

He is correct. Indeed it would be presumptuous for anyone earning $66,700 a year, tired from the rigours of a flight back from Hawaii, to advise us common folk on how to conduct our affairs.

What can the minister tell Canadians about the costs of raising a family, making mortgage payments, meeting a payroll and raising a crop? Nothing. It would be more than presumptuous; it would be downright ridiculous. The Minister of Finance makes the captain of the Titanic look inventive.

The other spectators at the battlefront are the Canadian chartered banks. With all the personnel, with all the economists, M.As and Ph.Ds at their disposal, they have failed the Canadian people in their hour of need. How keen are the banks to put out money on small business development bonds? Are they as keen as they were under the Small Businesses Loans Act? I hope not. Are they using switch and bait techniques to go to conventional loans? Why has the average spread between what the banks pay out on savings deposits, as opposed to the prime rate they charge, increased from 2 per cent in the first two months of 1980 to 3.82 per cent in the first two months of 1981? Who is watching over that on the other side? Why are commercial mortgages almost impossible to get? They do not even look favourably on renewals. Why has the word come down from head office to get appraisals on fixed assets involved in loans to businesses connected with farming? Why are they closing down branches in towns and small villages? Why have bank profits increased dramatically? When will we see some initiative and innovation from Canadian banks? Canada may not have had a bank failure since the Home Bank in the 1920s, but I suggest that Canadian banks are morally failing Canadians every day as they face this crisis.

Our current problems are the direct result of a government which lacks the moral fibre to tackle the problem, led by a leader whose main concern is writing a political epitaph. An uninterrupted string of deficits has caused the federal government to escalate its borrowing; 16.7 per cent of the federal budget expenditure is committed to repaying interest on the government's borrowing, to say nothing of principal. The Minister of Finance blithely predicted a deficit of $13.7 billion in October, based on an inflation rate of 10.2 per cent. Since that time, he has admitted in speeches that inflation is running at 13.9 per cent. If the Liberal government were prepared to make a commitment to living within its means, perhaps we would see an end to escalating deficits which would strengthen the dollar. In addition, a commitment by the government would stimulate action by Canadian people.

At present we have anticipatory inflation in Canada; people anticipate that inflation will continue at rampant rates. They govern their wage demands and buying patterns accordingly. They escalate their wage demands because they know they will need more to buy food, clothing and shelter. They buy on credit because they know they will be paying with cheaper dollars. Another positive step the government could take would be to settle the national energy crisis as soon as possible. It would lead to increased production, guarantee security of supply and, eventually, a reduction in the deficit.

I would like to conclude my remarks by saying that Canada is experiencing difficult times as a result of the lack of action by the Liberal government to integrate legislative action with its high interest rate policy. Home owners, farmers and small businesses are fighting the battle against inflation with absolutely no help from the government. We call on the government to take action on behalf of Canadian people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will have another opposition day, at which time we will look at interest rates as well as some broader factors such as inflation, the growth of the economy and the general government economic policy. Today I would like to restrict my comments to a fundamental analysis of the interest rate situation with which we find ourselves faced today in order to help others understand precisely the causes of that problem and the necessary steps which must be taken by the government. In fact, those steps are being taken.

My interest is not so much in an historic review of why we are where we are, but it is what must be done to resolve the problem with which we are faced. If interest rates are to be reduced, there must be a reduction in the rate of inflation. There are several contributing factors to today's high interest rates, and primary among those is the unacceptable high rate of inflation. As the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) indicated in his speech in Toronto on May 6, inflation in Canada is not only high but it is growing, that expectations are increasing, that we are seeing an alarmingly high rate of inflation which is rising in an alarming way.

Also he indicated in that speech that the inflation rate for the 12 months prior to October, 1980, was 10.9 per cent. For the five-month period since October, inflation has in fact increased at a rate of some 13.9 per cent. This is the fundamental underlying cause of the high interest rates with which we find ourselves faced. It must be reduced if we are ever to see interest rates at low levels once again.

The second fundamental factor involved in this high interest rate condition is the transition through which we are going toward a more appropriate monetary policy for a lower inflation rate in the future. The transition is a combination of a reduction in the growth rate in the money supply, which is being most appropriately followed by the Governor of the Bank of Canada and on the other side, the rising inflationary expectations on the part of the public. The effect of those two factors is that we are finding a reduction in the real lending funds as a result of the reduced growth rate in the money supply. Now we have target ranges from 4 per cent to 8 per cent, coupled with an increase in demand for credit on the other side. With a reducing supply in real terms, and an increase in demand, there are upward pressures on the real rates of interest which are found in the marketplace. As the minister and others indicated earlier, our targets for the increase in money supply in 1981 are 4 per cent to 8 per cent, while demand for credit in April alone increased by 20 per cent.

The third factor which contributes to the present interest rate condition is the external interest rate pressures being imposed on Canada and other nations of the world from the United States. It is a contributing factor; I do not think it is the fundamental factor. The fundamental factor is inflation. Another major factor is the transition toward lower growth rates in the money supply in our anti-inflation policy, and the third factor is the interest rate pressures from the United States. All things being equal, certainly rising rates in the United States will lead to an outflow of funds from Canada to the United States for people to take advantage of the available higher rates of return on money. Short-term money can move across boundaries very easily. In fact, it does move across boundaries very easily. As the minister pointed out, and as the governor of the bank has pointed out, we can take this pressure which we face from short-term capital flowing in and out of the country either through a reduction in the value of our currency as money flows out, causing an imbalance in our current account, or by allowing our interest rates to rise. The governor of the bank and the Minister of Finance have, in my mind, appropriately chosen to take some of the pressure on the dollar and some of the pressure on rising interest rates.

Let me reiterate the third factor, namely, the U.S. interest rate factor. It is but one of the factors contributing to the high interest rates we now face, but it is certainly an important one. It is important to understand that the government and the minister are firmly and unequivocally committed to reducing the rate of inflation in this country. This can be seen if one reads the speech given by the minister last May 6 to the Conference Board of Canada in Toronto. To me this is a fundamentally important policy decision which the government has taken. It is one the government has had to take. It is one that all members of this House and all members of society should support. The reason I believe that this policy is so fundamentally important to the country is not only that inflation has certain obvious ramifications for our society which we all see, but, from a longer term perspective, there are much more deep-rooted, fundamental problems which arise in a society in which chronic inflation is increasing over time. We can see the obvious damage being done to farmers, small businessmen and consumers in the form of general consumer credit. Obviously, these are the damaging effects of inflation.

These problems are the fundamental reason why the government must undertake, and has undertaken, an effective anti-inflation policy, and why that policy must be adhered to, and why we must not back down in the face of adversity. More important, these problems have an effect on the moral fibre of the nation and on the very nature of democracy itself. I firmly believe that. Other scholars who have looked at the historical effects of inflation have come to the conclusion that inflation is a socially debilitating disease which, once it becomes entrenched and if it is not attacked by the powers which can reduce it, causes society to come apart at the seams. I think hon. members will agree with that. The hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis) referred to this concept in his speech.

It is useful to look at the 1950s and 1960s versus the 1970s, when inflation began to get out of control. If we compare what our society was like in the 1950s and 1960s, when we had low rates of inflation, with what it was in the 1970s, and then compare those figures with those in any number of nations—I think of Latin America where there are high rates of inflation and the Weimar Republic in Germany in the 1920s—we find that low inflation societies tend to have high degrees of individual freedom. There tends to be social mobility in those societies. There tends to be a belief in opportunity through hard work, ambition and all of the values on which Canadian society has been built. In those societies people believe in the system; they have confidence in the future. If we look at a high inflation society, we find that the values of honesty, industry and saving tend to lose their virtue. We find there is no perceived assurance that the future can or will be better than it is today.

I think we are beginning to see that kind of attitude emerging in Canada today. It is an attitude which worries me greatly. When we talk to our constituents, we find among them the attitude that the future will not be as good as it is today, or at least it will not be any better. That is a cause for worry in our society. People ask themselves why they should save when the value of their savings made today will be less than what they put down in real terms. People ask themselves why they should invest when the future is increasingly uncertain. If it has one debilitating effect on society and our economic system, inflation increases uncertainty dramatically. We find people beginning to put their money in other stores of value, such as gold or real estate, and not into productive investment which leads to an increase in the wealth of society. We find there is a growing demand for government to intervene, to protect and provide that assurance which the system no longer seems to be able to provide on its own. That assurance is being taken away as a result of inflation.

Let me say in summing it up that you find people undertake a live-for-today policy. They say, "Why worry about tomorrow when tomorrow will not be as good as today? Let us live for today, let us spend today, let us not save or invest, let us not try to make things better for future generations, since future generations will have to face a much worse world than what we face." When that kind of philosophy takes hold in the system, the democratic way of life cannot long stand and tolerate it.

That is why it is critically important for the government to move forward expeditiously and effectively in an anti-inflation program. In the transition period we will all have to adjust. The government will have to adjust as well as the individual. I will show tomorrow that the government is making that adjustment and that it is committed to making it. I will show tomorrow, when we talk about the budget and its fundamental factors, what the thrust of the budget is.

These are the reasons why the government is solidly committed to anti-inflation measures. In the minister's speech to the Conference Board in Toronto, he said:

> The Government of Canada will allow nothing to take precedence over its commitment and efforts to reduce inflation over the medium term.

The minister could not have put it in more firm or unequivocal terms.

I would like to relate these comments on inflation back to the topic which is before us today in the opposition motion which specifically deals with interest rates. I wish to consider the relationship between inflation and interest rates. There is mass confusion going on in our society these days, as well as in this House from certain members, that interest rates cause inflation and therefore we must do everything possible to reduce them. Nothing could be further from the truth. Interest rates do not cause inflation; inflation causes interest rates. We must undertake fundamental policies which attack the root causes of high interest rates. The root causes are high rates of inflation. Interest rates are a function of inflation, just as a fever is a function of an illness, and not the other way around. Inflation is everywhere, it is a monetary phenomenon. I think the Governor of the Bank of Canada and the Minister of Finance realize this clearly. That is why the governor has undertaken the policy of reducing the growth rate in the money supply over time. Some hon. members may ask why the governor undertook this policy on a gradual basis, and I will refer to that in a couple of minutes.

The cause of inflation is excessively rapid increases in the money supply relative to growth in real output, or GNP. That is the fundamental cause of inflation. That is what must be attacked if we are to be successful.

• (1720)

The ramifications of such policies will lead to transition effects, one of which will be higher interest rates. The Bank of Canada is committed not to accommodating increases in the money supply or to use increases in the money supply to accommodate increases in relative prices; relative prices of energy, for example, or relative prices of other basic commodities. There has to be adjustment, there has to be substitution, and there has to be conservation in response to higher relative prices of goods and services, even though they are very fundamental.

The reason the governor and the government have undertaken a policy of gradualism on the monetary side and gradualism on the energy side is that the kinds of adjustments and transitions which must take place in our society in response to rising relative prices of food and energy are difficult. They require capital investment by individuals. They take time to accomplish. If the government did not undertake a policy of transition to allow the individuals in our society the time to make those adjustments, then the disastrous effects would be great. The government has undertaken a policy of gradualism to allow that period of transition and for individuals to make those adjustments as painlessly as possible. That is why we follow a policy of gradualism. So with this as background on the current interest rate situation, as I have indicated, we have an inflation rate which has grown over the last five months. Right now it is a rate of 13.9 per cent.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I thought you were committed to bringing it down.

Mr. Evans: We have expectations in our society. There is growing pressure on our credit markets and an increased demand for loans.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Gradually higher and higher.

Mr. Evans: It is an example, and it is a symptom of growing inflationary expectations. That is why it is so critically important that the credibility of the government's program be clearly seen by the people, because those inflationary expectations have to be broken. The people have to realize that there is an anti-inflation program that is going to be effective, that the inflation rate is going to come down, and that interest rates will be brought down in its wake.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): There is an economist for you!

Mr. Evans: If we look at just the inflation factor at 13.9 per cent, that implies that to get a zero real rate of return, savers, those people who are saving for retirement or a home or for some future consumption purpose, will have to get an interest rate of at least 14 per cent just to break even. No one in our society should expect savers to subsidize borrowers, to take less than 14 per cent if that is the expected inflation rate. No one should expect our savers to take less than the real rate of return. As a result, we have to expect that they will demand higher than 14 per cent on their money.

How much higher? If we look at the situation back in the fifties when the effective rate of inflation was sometimes very close to zero, and ask ourselves what the mortgage rate was when inflation was next to zero—the mortgage rates then ran between 4 per cent and 5 per cent—and if we look at the current rate of inflation and add to that the mortgage rate, which was the rate when there was no inflation, of 4 per cent to 5 per cent, we find mortgage rates of 18 per cent to 19 per cent.

That is unacceptable. It is unacceptable to all of us. But the fact of the matter is that when we couple the inflation reality with the transition effects which I mentioned earlier and, at the same time, the U.S. situation, we find that those factors are putting rates where they are now. Fundamentally, the only way we will see rates come down is to solve the inflation problem. If the inflation problem is basically monetary, it means that we must bring down the growth rate in our money supply to bring inflation under control. The transition period will require interest rates which are higher than we would expect, higher than normal, and higher than we would like to see.

However, I will tell Your Honour—and I firmly believe this to be the fact—that if we renege now on the policy of anti-inflation, if we renege now on the Bank of Canada policy, if we increase the money supply, in the—

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): No one suggests you do that.

Mr. Evans: —unfounded effort or belief that by expanding the money supply interest rates will come down, we will feel inflation, and we will have a worse situation six months down the road. We will truly have an inflationary situation in this country which is out of control and we will be facing interest rates which will make today's rates look low by comparison.

The government has a policy. That policy will be effective. I encourage and urge the government to stick to that policy and to see that in the future Canadians face lower inflation and much lower interest rates.

Hon. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, I certainly welcome this occasion to join in the debate today on behalf of the motion put forward by my colleague the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie). In doing so, I would doubt very much that we have ever faced a more serious situation over the past number of years than we have here today with reference to the government's inability to deal effectively with the economy. We have record deficits, we have record inflation rates, and we have crippling interest rate levels.

Certainly we have had our share of problems over the years in all sectors of our economy. I suppose most people would agree that the agricultural industry has been no exception. In fact, that industry has probably received a greater share of problems in comparison with other sectors of the economy. I am sure that all would agree that we will continue to have these problems in certain commodity areas and in various provinces and regions of the country in the future.

In all seriousness, I can think of no other single problem that is so damaging and so devastating to all of the food producers of Canada, regardless of their location or lines of production, than the present interest rate level. One can think of the fruit producer in British Columbia; one can think of the problems experienced by the grain and livestock producers of western Canada in the prairies; one can think of the problems associated with high interest rate levels as they relate to the dairy farmers in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec; or one can consider the serious problems which face the diversified agricultural industry in Altantic Canada.

However, it is not my purpose today, nor is it really my nature, to promote more anxiety and to promote more fear or perhaps more anger than already exists in this country today as it relates to this government's deliberate high interest rate policy and the continuing high interest rate level which flows as a direct result. Rather, I want to give a few examples of how this serious problem affects the industry and some suggestions to at least provide some relief.

We have to acknowledge the fact that in 1980 Canadian farmers paid $1.5 billion on interest rate charges alone. Agriculture Canada, which is, speaking from my experience, a pretty good source of information, estimated that in 1981 the Canadian farmers will pay at least $2 billion on interest rate charges alone. A bank interest rate of 18.71 per cent and a prime rate of almost 20 per cent are crippling and are absolutely unacceptable levels. They have caused a crisis situation in the agricultural community.

The deliberate high interest policies of the federal government have forced many farmers into bankruptcy or near bankruptcy. For example, on last Monday evening, the CBC news profiled the Gershbakker Brothers of Saskatchewan. They had a $2 million livestock operation, yet they are barely able to scrape together enough cash to meet day to day expenses. Why? One of the basic reasons is the fact that their interest rate charges alone amount to some $43,000.

Again, in the April 15 edition of The Globe and Mail there is an account of a 24-year-old farmer from the province of Ontario, Glen Smith, being interviewed. He said, "Last month the bank gave me one day's notice to pay off $170,000. When I couldn't raise the money, they sent in the trucks, took away the livestock, and they left me with nothing. The farm is frozen today, and I can't even plant a crop this season."

Another Ontario farmer, Don Morrison, was quoted as saying, "I am selling to a businessman in Australia and then I am going to rent the farm back. I don't like it but I have no choice. With inflation and interest rates the way they are—I paid some $30,000 in interest rates last year—selling my land and renting it back is the only way I can keep on farming and possibly make a profit."

Cold statistics add substance to these personal stories. In Ontario, farm bankruptcies increased by 91 per cent last year, compared to an 18 per cent increase for other businesses. The Ontario Federation of Agriculture has estimated the number of bank foreclosures or the number of farmers who have sold out because they were losing money. These numbers are at least ten time higher than the number of bankruptcies in the province.

● (1730)

Other telling facts have been provided by the Farm Credit Corporation. As of March 31, 1981, the number of Farm Credit Corporation accounts or farm operations in arrears ranges from an incredible 33.3 per cent in Newfoundland to 6 per cent in Saskatchewan and British Columbia. In Manitoba there were some 409 farm operations in arrears in 1980, while in 1981, this figure increased by almost 200 to a total of 606 farm operations in arrears, on their loans from the Farm Credit Corporation. In Ontario farm operations in arrears increased by 161, while in the province of Quebec the increase was 108.

These are very disturbing statistics, especially when one considers that there has already been a dramatic decrease in the number of farmers in Canada over the past four decades. In 1941, for example, there were 3.2 million farmers comprising 27.4 per cent of the total Canadian population. In 1976, there were only one million farmers, comprising 4.6 per cent of Canada's population. Of course, with this trend continuing, these figures would be much lower today.

I fear that the government's high interest rate policies will hasten this decline because the young farmers, the future of Canadian agriculture, are the ones who are suffering the most from these policies. If Canada loses its young farmers, it also loses its security of a stable and constant food supply in the future. This affects each and every one of us as Canadians, as well as people beyond our borders.

Canadian agriculture needs the help of the federal government in meeting this interest rate crisis. I have developed a ten-point plan of action to help the farm sector, and we on this side urge the government to give this plan very serious consideration.

First, the government should grant the Farm Credit Corporation immediately an additional $150 million. The Ontario Federation of Agriculture and the Canadian Federation of Agriculture have recommended that this be done. It should be noted that we faced the same problem when we were in government in 1979. Nevertheless, we were able to find an additional $50 million to keep the corporation going.

Second, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) should reconsider his attitude toward farm credit interest rates. One of his first actions upon being restored as Minister of Agriculture in March, 1980, was to increase the interest rate to 13 per cent. He set an all-time record. He was not satisfied with that, and on April 1, 1980, he again raised the rates to an all-time high in the 51 or 52-year history of the Farm Credit Corporation to 14 per cent. By choosing April Fool's Day for his announcement, the minister is only fooling himself if he believes that this record high interest rate will benefit Canadian agriculture.

I mentioned earlier that farm bankruptcies, foreclosures, forced sales and debt arrears have been increasing daily across Canada. The new farm credit interest rate will not help that situation. It will also discourage many young people from going into farming as a career, and it will discourage many established farmers from expanding their existing operations.

Third, the minister should introduce the necessary legislation which would allow the corporation to borrow supplementary funds from the private marketplace. This legislation has been promised for the past three years. Had it been in place three years ago, many farmers might not be suffering to the same degree that they are now.

Fourth, the provisions of the small business development bond ought to be extended to unincorporated farmers. The bond, first made public in the Crosbie budget, offered low interest rates to small businessmen and to incorporated farmers who wished to expand their operations. Extending its provisions would help to reduce the level of demand on the Farm Credit Corporation, because 60 per cent of farm credit loans go toward farm expansion. Since most tax relief measures apply equally to incorporated and unincorporated farmers, the provisions of the small business development bond should be extended to unincorporated farmers.

Fifth, the federal stabilization program should be improved. At present, the stabilization payments come too late to be of maximum benefit to affect farmers. In many cases farmers, who are eligible for stabilization payments, have to borrow short-term money now at rates of 21 per cent or 22 per cent in order to pay for replacement of livestock, feed, seed, fertilizer and other day to day input costs.

The 1979-1980 hog stabilization program is an excellent example of the need for improvement. Some stabilization payments did not reach the hog producers until six months after the date on which they had applied. This has been especially unfortunate because hog producers have been one of the commodity groups hardest hit by the combination of high interest rates and low prices. Beef producers have suffered severely by finding themselves caught in the same bind.

Sixth, the minister should adopt the recommendation of the Ontario Federation of Agriculture which calls for the establishment of an independent review agency to look at each case before the banks could foreclose on a farm operation. This proposal should be extended to include all lending institutions, perhaps even to include the Farm Credit Corporation, although I must say their policy does contain far more compassion, reason and understanding than do those of most traditional lending agencies in this country.

Seventh, the Minister of Agriculture should, together with his provincial colleagues and representatives of the agricultural industry across Canada, develop—not simply get together and have a meeting and discuss the situation which occurred in Ottawa yesterday—a common approach for assisting the farm community in surviving the high interest rate problem. Because of the lack of action on the part of the federal government in solving or alleviating the interest rate crisis, they have no choice but to turn to their provincial governments.

In Ontario, for example, the OFA has called upon the provincial government to set up an interest rate assistance plan covering loans from both banks and farm suppliers to a maximum of $150,000. The plan would be based on a graduated scale. Farmers who owned less than half of their farm would receive 100 per cent of everything that the bank charged over a 12 per cent interest rate. Farmers with 90 per cent to 100 per cent equity would be subsidized at the rate of 20 per cent on everything charged over 12 per cent. Payments would be made quarterly.

My concern about such proposals is that there could be ten different assistance programs across Canada and the result could be highly discriminatory. Therefore, we urge the minister to take a leadership role, together with his provincial colleagues, and develop a national plan of action.

Our eighth point is one of encouraging the Canadian lending institutions to be more responsive to the borrowing needs of farmers. I have noted that the Minister of Agriculture has raised this point with the Canadian chartered banks, and I want to congratulate him for his initiative. I hope he will continue to work in concert, not only with the banks but with all institutions involved in farm financing in order that a loan system can be structured to meet the long-term needs of Canadian agriculture.

The federal cabinet has to be made aware that action with respect to this problem is needed and it is needed now. I am distressed by the attitude of the Minister of Agriculture that the solution to high interest rates lies solely with the banks. In an April 18 interview on CBC Radio, the minister said:

● (1740)

That's why I'm suggesting that I think the banking institutions have a public responsibility to make sure that that production entity for the total good of society stays alive.

I believe the minister is putting the cart before the horse. I always thought it was the banks which responded to government policy direction, not the other way around. Therefore I do not think the Minister of Agriculture can wash his hands of the problem by saying that it is a banking problem, not a government policy problem.

The Minister of Agriculture should be able to have some influence in shaping government policy in relation to interest rates because he is a long-time member of cabinet. He should be able to persuade his cabinet colleagues to bring forward the positive measures which farm groups have proposed and we have proposed in today's debate. However, we recognize the minister's problem: he has no clout in cabinet.

The minister should not hide his head in the sand and complain that the interest rate problem is a banking problem and that its solution lies with the banks absorbing any losses on farm loans. The banks have a role in solving the problem, but high interest rates are a deliberate federal government policy decision. As such, the federal government must take a major responsibility in alleviating the financial hardships which unfairly strike certain sectors of the economy.

As the voice in cabinet for Canadian agriculture, the Minister of Agriculture must recognize that young farmers and some commodity groups like hogs and beef producers are suffering extreme financial hardships because of high interest rates. They deserve help, and they need help now.

In closing, and it brings me to my final point, I again remind this government, and particularly the Minister of Agriculture, that his failure to deal with this problem is not a recent one. Rather, the minister will recall making a commitment to do something at least to help Canadian farmers. He made that commitment here in Ottawa to 1,000 farmers. I was there. That commitment was not made yesterday, a week ago or a month ago, but rather in Ottawa in January, 1980, 16 months ago.

The fact is that interest rates since that time have increased by 50 per cent and the minister has produced absolutely nothing. The agricultural industry is of vital importance to our Canadian economy. One in every four, 25 per cent of Canadians are employed either directly or indirectly in the agricultural and food industry. Agriculture is everyone's bread and butter.

If the Minister of Agriculture continues to simply talk, talk which borders on political mischief, and delivers nothing, if the minister refuses to recognize that high interest rates are a deliberate government policy, if he continues to refuse to accept his responsibility for resolving this problem, then he should do the honourable thing and resign. What the Canadian agricultural industry requires now, more than any time in our history, is not simply a loud voice, but rather some real action.

Mr. Pierre Gimaïel (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, once again it is a great pleasure and an honour for me to take the floor today in the House to debate a subject which affects us all to various degrees; I refer to the interest rates or the prime rate of the Bank of Canada as defined in this country.

The House is now studying a motion introduced by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) who, in a few words, condemns the minister because, it would seem, he shows apathy, fails to hold discussions and shirks his responsibilities. In my opinion it is altogether dishonest to convey such an image to the people. Being a former finance minister the hon. member for St. John's West ought to know that the role of a finance minister is not limited to reviewing the over-all economic situation of a country. He has to know what is happening in every home in every country of the world as a starting point to establishing a general strategy based on several months or several years of observation with a view to solving the major economic problems.

Of course, as the member for the riding of Lac-Saint-Jean, I hail from a region where interest rates are particularly high, since it is one of the most severely affected areas in the province of Quebec. When a small businessman has to pay high interest rates on his bank credit margin and when a company is forced to borrow at such rates, it does affect job creation to a certain extent. But worse still it is again the sales market which by far has to come to grips with the direct consequences of all those problems. In addition, a segment of the population must, of course, pay the costs of high interest rates. The home owner who is facing a mortgage renewal has to expect to pay higher rates than he is doing now. Given current conditions it seems to me there is no way out, that is part of the drawback of having to borrow to make a purchase. Someone who borrows but has the money to buy does not suffer this hardship, but the one who has to borrow to purchase something is at the mercy of the person who makes the money available to him as required.

What I am getting at, Mr. Speaker, is that there are some things which the members opposite seem to have forgotten. Those things are, in my view, of utmost importance, as they are the very basis of our society. It is true that we are faced today with sky-high interest rates. I agree. But there is a much greater problem that has been facing us for years and is still facing us, that is unemployment. There are numerous jobless in this country, especially among the young.

That is the point I wanted to make. Coming from a region where unemployment is almost at 20 per cent, I know that 60 per cent of our unemployed are young people just out of school, just out of university, or who did not have the opportunity to pursue their studies very far, and they have to cope with this problem.

On the positive side of the Minister of Finance's record for the last year and a half, it must be recognized that for the first time in five years the unemployment rate has dropped significantly, that is 0.7 per cent in one year. Those are tangible results. I think that the unemployment problem is a much more serious one than the temporary one of high interest rates. Let me briefly explain why: the young person who is unemployed or on welfare is unable to borrow, whether the interest rate is 10 per cent or 18 per cent. It is simply impossible for him or her to borrow money because, as we all know, to borrow money you must have money or at least some assets. I am not at all surprised to hear my colleagues opposite say that those who have assets or money cannot borrow at such rates. I agree. But for some workers, it is even more difficult. Someone who has been living in a house for ten years and must now renew his mortgage will have to pay a bit more for a little while, probably for one year, and at worst let us say for two years. However, the fact is that most Canadian workers are able to face this problem and tighten their belts a bit.

And I am asking them to do so, not in a masochistic context but because it is the only solution now available to fight inflation which affects the poor, those who must buy coffee or oil or oranges or any one of a vast number of other imported products every day. The worst thing that we could do to them would be to devaluate the dollar. The former minister of finance is well aware that when the interest rates are lower in Canada than in the United States, the value of the Canadian dollar drops, and this means that the people without much money, such as the unemployed, and those on welfare, will have to spend even more for food, for heat, for clothing, for all the basic necessities of life.

It is true that our government has made a choice. And it says here that the Minister of Finance has permitted interest rates to rise. It is true! By doing so, what has the government done? It has taken its responsibilities. Why did it do so? First of all, to stop inflation which affects the most needy, the poorest in our society.

Second, it is true that we are harming to a certain extent one sector of the population, the average income earners, since they will have to tighten their belts for a limited time.

It still remains that as members of Parliament in this country, as a group of citizens, we have to take our responsibilities toward the young people who have been coming out of our schools for a number of years and facing what? Very strong unions who have provided job security for certain employees who are now 55 years old on average. There are very few jobs for young people because they lack experience. Because we wanted to protect the worker, we have created a blind alley which deprives our young people of the same opportunities as their predecessors. We have to realize that these young people are living in a world where ownership is important. In Canada, nearly everyone owns a piece of land, a house, or at least a car, and maybe also a cottage, a snowmobile, a fur coat—I could go on with this list for hours. Very few countries in the world have given this opportunity to their citizens.

We are now saying to one sector of our society: You will have to tighten your belt somewhat because we have to provide for our young people, for the next generation. If we are to prevent those people from being frustrated, it must be recognized now that somewhat higher interest rates will have to be paid so that in their turn things will be somewhat less expensive, because often all they can afford is oranges and coffee. This is about all they get from our society, with some occasional help from their parents in order to make ends meet or to buy some durable good that others can afford regularly. That must be understood.

What must be overcome over the next few years is that kind of unemployment, unless we want to find ourselves in a few years with a class of frustrated people, with two different generations, one living in very small rental apartments, looking at the other class in large homes. If that is what we are looking for in this country, let us keep in mind right now that tomorrow's young people will point their fingers at us and say: The billions you thought you were putting aside for your pension plans, we feel we are entitled to use them now. Because I have a social conscience, I must state that for some time I, as a consumer, will buy somewhat less because of high interest rates. I do not believe people live in misery, because there was a time not so long ago, where interest rates were at reasonable levels, let us say 9 per cent or 10 per cent. Did that help our unemployed buy homes? Did that help people without income to live in luxury? Did it make it easier for them to borrow from the banks? No! They never had any chance with the banks. Because what they need is guaranteed survival, work, an income they can depend on year after year. And this will certainly not be achieved by blaming it on American interest rates.

If Western Germany, considered one of the strongest countries in the Western World, cannot stop inflation nor withstand the pressure of American rates on the German mark, how could we here succeed when so much of our goods come from the United States? Do we want to see billions of Canadian dollars fleeing south to the United States overnight? Is that our goal, the fall of our dollar? If that is the goal, let us follow the suggestion made by the former minister of finance. We could then say we had no choice, we had to assist home owners with their payments. Admittedly they are a burden. But, as a society, should we not at some point take the time to turn and look back at those who follow us? Should we not at some point tell our children: We will try to give you the same opportunities your fathers had. Our fathers could not borrow easily just anywhere. They did not build themselves empires, grand mansions. Nor did they have huge cars. They did not own all the material goods we have. Who benefited from their efforts? Who benefited from the wages they earned? Who benefited from the sacrifices they made unless we did? Who had jobs when they left school if not ourselves? And that is the important point, Mr. Speaker. The future of a country is not built on the present but on what lies ahead, the future. The present is only what we are living. It is the time for action, granted. But those who will build the Canada of tomorrow are those we are preparing mentally. Granted, I am willing to say that in years past the government made efforts to at least help the young to keep their self-respect. We gave them—and some blamed us for doing so—we gave them, as I was saying, $130 a week in unemployment insurance to enable them to at least treat themselves to a beer and a laugh once in a while, and to buy food. That was important, because when one cannot pay for one's food, one loses all self-respect, one feels hurt. It is true also that we have created temporary jobs. I remember quite well when the Clark government decided to get rid of the Canada Works program and other job-creation projects. For what purpose? Supposedly to set up stronger economic structures. But why was it established if not for those young people who with the $100 paid to them every week—which is much less than the average wage paid in Canada—could at least manage to salvage part of their self-respect? It had to be done and it was done, but this scheme could not be expected to last for years. As the government, we are beginning to talk about economic restructuring. We are starting to look ahead to the future with computerized industries, advanced technology, the development of our own energy resources and the full utilization of our millions of square kilometres of territory for the benefit of 26 million Canadians. But in order to reach this goal we need a few months or perhaps a year of small sacrifices on the part of a population which for 20 years at least, more so than any other people in the world, has enjoyed consumer goods and facilities to raise their children and live in this country.

The present generation must be ready today to pay at least a fraction of what our fathers paid to help young people get out of the hole which has been dug for them by union rights given to workers, which was legitimate, by industries that failed to modernize their facilities fast enough because large dividends were paid to shareholders who could be anybody. Finally, for all sorts of reasons, that is quite normal, Mr. Speaker.

This is why I cannot agree with the hon. member for St. John's West when he says that the minister has not met his responsibilities as Minister of Finance. It is quite the contrary. Just as past ministers of finance, the present Minister of Finance, under the leadership of the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), has worked along similar lines to build the future of this country. When the time came to support our young people the Liberal finance ministers introduced legislation to do so. Today we say: Let us follow the American policy of high interest rates, let us pay the price for a while, but let us reduce the unemployment rate, make more jobs available to our young people, give them more job opportunities and especially let us control inflation which always hits the underprivileged harder so that the country will not become a living hell for the poor while the rich people continue to spend. In short, this is what I had to say, Mr. Speaker, and indeed I ask my constituents in Lac-Saint-Jean to do what I am prepared to do myself, that is, to accept for a limited time higher interest rates. I ask them to do so for the sake of those who built our country and who are now retired and often have but the bare minimum to live on, for the sake of those who have left us when their job was done and finally for the sake of our children who will carry on. It would be totally stupid today to continue to concentrate everything on our generation when so much wealth, lands and so many assets are available to all our people. The essential thing is to share with those who will succeed us as our fathers have shared with us.

SMALL BUSINESS

CALL FOR ACTION ON INTEREST RATES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Madam Speaker, the day before yesterday I brought a motion before this House regarding the injurious effects of high interest rates on the canning industry in Prince Edward County. These same rates have now forced a major Ontario apple packer into receivership and are affecting apple growers in this same county. Perhaps this double blow will bring the government to the realization that the primary resource of Canada, food, is in jeopardy.

I again move, seconded by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Hees):

That the Minister of Finance immediately institute reasonable interest rates for small business, particularly those involved in agriculture.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE ECONOMY

SUGGESTED MEETING OF FIRST MINISTERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, in view of the fact the government has now frittered away an entire year of its mandate picking political fights with the provinces and with millions of Canadians over constitutional and energy matters, while allowing the economy of Canada to deteriorate to its worst state since the great depression, I move, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and seconded by the hon. member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid):

That the federal government agree to stop—to stop here and now—its antagonistic, unilateral attack on the constitutional rights of the provinces so that an emergency meeting of first ministers might be held immediately to work in a harmonious spirit seeking co-operative solutions to Canada's grave economic dilemma.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

USE OF FUNGICIDE CAPTAN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Madam Speaker, I rise today under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering that Canadian health officials have known since 1978 of the health hazards, including cancer, miscarriages and birth defects, related to exposure to the fungicide Captan, and considering that Agriculture Canada has ignored the recommendation made by Health and Welfare Canada to ban or severely restrict the use of Captan, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie):

That this House instruct the Department of Agriculture to issue immediately a strong warning to persons potentially at risk of exposure to Captan, and that this House immediately initiate a full parliamentary inquiry into the use of pesticides in Canada.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

S.O. 43

UREA FORMALDEHYDE—SUPPORT FOR HOME OWNERS' ASSOCIATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

Home owners with urea formaldehyde foam insulation in their homes are organizing themselves and holding public meetings because of their concern for their health. Last evening over 400 home owners concerned about this product met in Toronto. The federal government has a responsibility for the health and safety of all Canadians.

I move, therefore, seconded by the hon. member for Cambridge (Mr. Speyer):

That this House instruct the Minister of Health and Welfare, the Minister of Supply and Services, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and CMHC to work with the recently formed "Homes With Urea Formaldehyde Foam Insulation Association" in the interests of the health and safety of all Canadians.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FISHERIES

WEST COAST SALMON FISHING RESTRICTIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, in view of the fact that talks have broken down between Canada and the United States on the Pacific coast fishing agreement, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Wenman):

That the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans inform the United States officials that he is prepared to take action similar to that which he took a year ago on the east coast, that is, to inform fishermen that they can fish without restrictions for Canadian salmon destined to pass through American waters and back to Canadian waters, since it is more proper for Canadians to overfish Canadian stock than it is for Americans to overfish Canadian stock.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NORTHERN IRELAND—MEDIATION BY UNITED NATIONS SECRETARY GENERAL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Restigouche): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the acts of terrorism and the number of lives which have been lost in Northern Ireland—over 500 in recent years—and in view of the fact that the situation in Northern Ireland continues unresolved and, indeed, becomes more critical daily, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Parent):

That the House request the Secretary General of the United Nations to take appropriate steps immediately to endeavour to mediate a peace settlement in Northern Ireland with the Prime Minister of Great Britain and the government of Northern Ireland.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

NORTH-SOUTH RELATIONS

REGULATIONS GOVERNING AID PROJECTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. On April 21 before the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) stated that tied aid is a "minor league issue" and "a red herring", disregarding in the process mounds of evidence from independent researchers, the advice of Liberal foreign policy experts, Maurice Strong and Ivan Head, and the government's own 1975-1980 international development strategy. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Lewycky):

That this House direct the Government of Canada to adopt immediately the unanimous all-party recommendation of the parliamentary task force on North-South relations "that decisions concerning the procurement of goods and services required for aid projects should be made by the Canadian International Development Agency consistent with development assistance objectives. While a significant portion should be procured in Canada, CIDA should be freed from any fixed percentage rule".

POST OFFICE

PROPOSED COMMEMORATIVE STAMP TO HONOUR ST. ALBERT, EDMONTON, ALTA.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I seek the unanimous consent of the House to debate an urgent and important matter.

One hundred and twenty years ago one of the first missionaries of western Canada, Father Lacombe, founded the St. Albert mission in Alberta. That mission has contributed enormously to western Canada's growth over the years. Today St. Albert is a small city in the suburbs of Edmonton. The very identity of St. Albert is now being threatened by proposed annexation to the city of Edmonton. With a view to preserving a part of the historic character of St. Albert, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Elzinga):

That the government issue a commemorative stamp in honour of St. Albert and its founder, Father Lacombe, to highlight the one hundredth and twentieth anniversary of that town, and that the site where the mission was founded, which is now a provincial historic site, be declared a national monument.

Madam Speaker: The presentation of such a motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

THE JUDICIARY

FILLING OF VACANCIES IN NEW BRUNSWICK—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. There are at least three federal judicial vacancies in the province of New Brunswick, with another to come up on July 1. One of these positions has been vacant since July 1, 1979. As a result there is a backlog of outstanding judgments of six months or more, and it is taking members of the legal profession over twice the amount of time it should to get files closed.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince George-Bulkley Valley (Mr. McCuish):

That the House instruct the Minister of Justice to get on with the business of his portfolio and make these appointments so that the judicial system in New Brunswick can get back on the track.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

ABORIGINAL RIGHTS

CALL FOR AMENDMENT OF BILL C-48—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Peter Ittinuar (Nunatsiaq): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The introduction of Bill C-48 has caused enormous anxiety and frustration in the Canadian north. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk-Interlake (Mr. Sargeant):

That this House call upon the ministers responsible for Bill C-48 to include provisions in the bill which provide assurance that oil and gas benefits will be an open topic of negotiation until comprehensive claims in the north are settled.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

THE CONSTITUTION

SUPPORT FOR INCLUSION OF CHARTER OF RIGHTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mike Landers (Saint John): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. As the latest Gallup poll indicates that 62 per cent of Canadians support the inclusion of a charter of rights in the Constitution, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Frith):

That this House petition the premiers opposed to the inclusion of a charter of rights to encourage them to commence to represent the view of the majority of Canadians on this important issue.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

ENERGY

IMPORTATION OF MEXICAN OIL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. This Liberal government is buying Mexican oil in lumps and chunks at more than double the price of Alberta crude. After using a chain saw to get it out of the barrel—because Canadian drilling rigs are not available having left for the U.S.A.—and adding Alberta crude, eventually the mixture can be refined costing 150 per cent more than the cost of Alberta oil would have been now had the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) accepted the offer made by Premier Lougheed on July 25, 1980. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie):

That this House demands that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources responsible for this fiasco immediately resign, and the Canadian government wire Premier Lougheed that his offer of July 25, 1980, will now be accepted.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

REQUEST FOR CHANGES

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance, who will know that he has achieved another record today. The Bank of Canada rate has been announced and it is up again slightly to a rate which has never before been exceeded in Canadian history. The minister knows, and has sometimes had the frankness to admit in this House, that one of the reasons for the high interest rate is the weakness of the Canadian dollar. He also knows that the single gravest threat to the strength of the Canadian dollar, coming from the policy of his government, is the National Energy Program.

In the interest of solving Canada's economic problems, will the Minister of Finance give us an undertaking now that there will be changes in the National Energy Program of a kind that will strengthen the Canadian dollar and begin to bring interest rates in this country back to a reasonable level?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, without agreeing with all the comments in the preamble to the question, may I assure the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition today, as I did yesterday in my statement in the House, that it is the intention of the Government of Canada to secure an agreement with the government of Alberta on the question of energy. Discussions to that effect are under way.

The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition specifically requests that changes be made. I believe my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, has made it very clear that the Government of Canada is prepared to seek an accommodation, to be flexible; and that requires flexibility on the part of the government of Alberta. I believe, when I expressed that sentiment, there was considerable agreement in the House yesterday that there is necessity to have an accommodation and a willingness to move on the part of the Government of Canada and on the part of the government of Alberta. That is what I would like to assure the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition about today.

HOUSING

POSITION OF HOME OWNERS RENEWING MORTGAGES

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, one is tempted to ask the Minister of Finance how high he expects the Bank of Canada rate to be before his colleague is prepared to contemplate the kinds of changes which will result in an agreement. But let me come to another area of economic policy.

On Tuesday of this week in the House, the Minister of Finance indicated that he refused to help Canadian farmers and Canadian small businessmen who are now facing bankruptcy. The minister will know that there are some 500,000 Canadian home owners who are holding 1976 mortgages which are likely to come up for renewal this year. Does the Minister of Finance intend to introduce any specific help for these 500,000 Canadians who will be faced with staggering new costs when they renew their 1976 mortgages this year?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I have gone over this ground earlier in the week.

An hon. Member: Try again. We cannot hear you.

Mr. MacEachen: I would be pleased to repeat for the benefit of the Leader of the Opposition that it is not the intention of the government at the present time to bring in a special new program, which indeed would be very costly.

Yesterday the hon. member for St. John's West made a very vigorous exhortation to me to show expenditure restraint and to reduce the deficit. I have no way of reconciling the desire of the Leader of the Opposition, when he asks me to launch new programs which will be expensive, with the requests of the hon. member for St. John's West to show expenditure restraint in the face of very high inflation. I believe in the long term that it is in the interests of all Canadians, including home owners and farmers, to take the steps now which will bring inflation down. I must say on this point that I tend to agree with the hon. member for St. John's West rather than the Leader of the Opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, the inconsistency of this government is that it is quite prepared to pay high finder's fees to Maurice Strong. It is quite prepared to spend public money on Petrofina; it is quite prepared to spend millions of dollars on advertising indefensible programs. But it will not help Canadian home owners; it will not help Canadian pensioners; it will not help Canadian widows.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

THE ECONOMY

INQUIRY WHETHER MEASURES WILL BE TAKEN TO REDUCE NUMBER OF BANKRUPTCIES IN QUEBEC

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Right Hon. Prime Minister. He must be aware that bankruptcies in Quebec have increased by over 20 per cent during the first quarter compared with the same period last year. Can he tell the House whether he is planning to take corrective action immediately to prevent all the other industries in Quebec from going bankrupt following the disastrous economic policy of the Liberal government?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I am surprised that the Leader of the Opposition would have chosen this specific day to speak about the disastrous policy of the government as we announced earlier today that a contract was being negotiated by the Bombardier Company in the province of Quebec and Mexico. This is the most important export contract ever negotiated in the industrial sector, and I believe that this fact should be taken into account.

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT IS READY TO ANNOUNCE GLOBAL POLICY FOR SMALL BUSINESS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, perhaps the Prime Minister thinks that I can foresee the future. The Prime Minister announced a specific project. I would like to know whether he is now ready to announce a comprehensive policy to help small businessmen in Quebec and in the other Canadian provinces or whether he feels, as does the Minister of Finance, that the problems now facing small Canadian businessmen will not compel the federal government to look for an effective solution.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, as do the Leader of the Opposition and the Minister of Finance, we regret the high inflation rate which affects all Canadians and we believe that this is a disease that we must continue to fight. The Leader of the Opposition has asked for a comprehensive policy. I would like to point out to him that the budgetary measures and the other programs announced by the minister have caused economic growth in Canada, including in Quebec, to reach a rate of 8 per cent in real terms for the last quarter of last year and a rate of between 4 per cent and 6 per cent in real terms for the first quarter of 1981. This is the result of an economic policy which aims at creating employment and at promoting growth, which is not the case of the resolution introduced today by the Leader of the Opposition in the House which maintains that there is no growth in the Canadian economy. Madam Speaker, unemployment continues to go down throughout Canada, and particularly in Quebec the number of jobs continues to increase, and this is an economic policy that we are ready to stand by.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

CHAIRMANSHIP OF BOARD OF DIRECTORS

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, the only real growth in this government has been in interest rates, and they have gone up over 7 per cent since the budget came down.

My question is for the Prime Minister. Yesterday the Minister of Finance could not tell us, or would not tell us, whether Mr. Maurice Strong, the ex-Liberal candidate, was being pushed by the government on the Canada Development Corporation. Today the Prime Minister announced that he would like to have Mr. Strong made head of the Canada Development Corporation. He also said that he would like to see the company play a more active role in federal industrial and economic plans, and provide a window on industry. Yesterday the Minister of Finance said there was no change in the role of the Canada Development Corporation. I can tell the Prime Minister this is a blow to investor confidence in Canada and the Canadian dollar will be under severe pressure after this further evidence of neglect of the private sector of this country.

Would the Prime Minister tell the House whether he intends to persist in forcing Mr. Strong upon the Canada Development Corporation, which is only 49 per cent government owned and 51 per cent owned by ordinary shareholders in this country—nearly 30,000 of them? Will the Prime Minister persist in this course and deal another blow to investor confidence in this country?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, there is a small amount of confusion in the question asked by the hon. member. It is not a question of naming the president of the Canada Development Corporation. I think the Minister of Finance made it quite clear yesterday that he had confidence in the president of the CDC. It is a matter of the major shareholder, being the people of Canada represented by the Government of Canada through shares held by the Minister of Finance, wanting to have a say in the appointment of the chairman of the board. This does not seem like an extraordinary innovation. Our government and the preceding government had shown interest in naming chairmen of boards of Crown corporations in which it held all or part of the shares.

As to the predictions of disaster, no less an authoritative paper than The Globe and Mail this morning described Mr. Strong as a man who has a considerable reputation as a financial wizard.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Just like the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Andre: He got a million dollars for doing nothing.

Mr. Trudeau: I know that reproach is made of Mr. Strong for having at one time been a Liberal candidate. I can understand the frustration of the Conservative party which has no financial wizards in its ranks.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, Mr. Strong is like the Swiss pimpernel—he picked up a million dollars off the Petrofina deal, given to him by the government. That does not take a financial wizard, that takes an influence pedlar. That is all it takes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

QUERY RESPECTING POSSIBLE CHANGES IN POLICY

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, there were two prospectuses which went out to the public of Canada, and a selling statement, in which the government made representations that the CDC would operate like a normal commercial corporation to maximize profits in the interests of all shareholders. Now the Prime Minister announces that he wants to change its role to a more active role in federal, that is, politically dictated, industrial and economic plans, and the other shareholders, the public shareholders, are forgotten.

My question to the Prime Minister is this: does Mr. Hampson, the president, agree with these efforts to push Mr. Strong on him? Does he agree with this new twisted role of this corporation, which is to be changed from its role that it had in these prospectuses? Does he agree with these matters?

My final question is this: is the Prime Minister prepared to buy out, at prices higher than the prices of several days ago when the shares started to drop in value as the result of reports of these interferences with the company by the government—is he prepared to buy out, at a considerable bonus, all of the innocent Canadian people who invested in this corporation on the government's fraudulent misrepresentations?

Madam Speaker: Order.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the former minister of finance is somewhat excessive and incorrect in his various allegations. It is not true that Mr. Maurice Strong made a million dollars in the transaction to which the hon. member refers.

Mr. Blenkarn: How much did he make, Pierre?

Mr. Trudeau: If a businessman does make money in a normal transaction, we in this party are not the ones to blame him for it. I am not asking the minister of finance how he made his money before he came into this House, and I do not think it is quite relevant. I am talking of the former minister of finance. I do not think he would welcome any public accusation by anyone about the way in which he made his money.

Mr. Crosbie: What has that got to do with it?

Mr. Trudeau: "What has that got to do with it?" he asks. I am just saying that he has no right to make allegations of the kind he has against Mr. Maurice Strong.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: The Minister of Finance made it clear in this House that we have no intention of changing the statute governing the Canada Development Corporation. I made it clear when I was asked by the press about this subject yesterday in Calgary that the intention of the government was still to ensure the maximum profits for all the shareholders, including the shareholder which is the Government of Canada. That is still our intention.

We certainly have, as a government and as the major shareholder, a right to expect to be consulted when a chairman of the board is being changed of a corporation in which we are a major shareholder. When the former chairman of the board was appointed some seven or eight years ago, I was involved in that. I was consulted on the person to be appointed from Vancouver. The consultations went on between me and the president, Mr. Hampson.

Mr. Crosbie: There were not any private shareholders then. There is a considerable difference.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member has a right to supplementary questions if he wants to ask them.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Crosbie: I have a final supplementary, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: No, I cannot allow—

Mr. Crosbie: The Prime Minister did not answer it. He has not answered the question, Madam Speaker. The shy, scarlet pimpernel—

Madam Speaker: I cannot allow the hon. member a further supplementary because his questions were really quite long. Order, please.

THE ECONOMY

INCREASE IN INTEREST RATES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): My question concerns today's jump in interest rate levels to a record point, and it is addressed to the Prime Minister.

Mr. Epp: Bring it down two percentage points, right?

Mr. Broadbent: When the Prime Minister was leader of the opposition, he asked this of the Conservative government of the day and of its high interest rate policy, and I quote:

At what point will the government look at alternatives rather than following the American interest rate up to 13 per cent, 14 per cent and God knows how high.

—said the Prime Minister when he was in opposition.

Mr. Epp: Now we know how high.

Mr. Broadbent: At what point will the Liberal government look at alternatives rather than follow the American rates up to 19 per cent, 20 per cent, and God knows how high?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the Leader of the New Democratic Party wants to know at what point we will begin to consider this problem. We have considered it, and the Minister of Finance has given his considered answer to this problem.

ACTION TO HELP PEOPLE MOST AFFECTED

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Finance—

Mr. Hees: Here goes the love affair!

Mr. Broadbent: The Minister of Finance, being one of the Liberal wizards, has, of course, given non-answers to this question for weeks and months in the House of Commons. I would like to go back to one of the few specifics.

An hon. Member: Hit him again, George. He is still standing.

Mr. Broadbent: One of the few specific promises the government made when it comes to interest rates, was in its throne speech last year when the government said it would help those "most affected by unacceptably high interest rates". Well, just today at noon, I heard another report from the Minister of Agriculture who was quoted as saying—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Piggy bank act.

Mr. Broadbent: As bizarre as it may seem coming from a Liberal, the Minister of Agriculture said bank profits are too high, the banks' profits should be reduced, and they should be forced to do something to assist farmers who are having to lose their occupations. Given the Prime Minister's commitment in the throne speech last year to help those most affected by unacceptable interest rates, and given the continuing promises provided by a variety of ministers to do something, when is the government going to put up and bring some assistance to the people of this country who need it?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I did not see the statement by the Minister of Agriculture, but he is a minister who has the concern of farmers at heart, as he should. If he is saying that the banks should show some compassion toward farmers and other small businessmen, I would agree with him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: That was worthy of Madam Pompadour! What expression of sympathy and concern! The people want some legislative action; not pious wishes from the Government of Canada.

HOUSING

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Let me take another concrete area. I asked the minister of housing a question yesterday on behalf of literally thousands of Canadians—and the Leader of the Opposition referred to this today—who own homes and who are forced to abandon them.

An hon. Member: What do you care about them?

Mr. Broadbent: Considering that there are now 1,000 Canadians each month who have to give up their houses because they cannot renew their mortgages, and considering that CMHC has adopted the brilliant policy of buying up these houses and reselling them at a loss of up to $20,000, will the Prime Minister help a specific group and instruct his minister responsible for housing to provide assistance to those Canadians so they can maintain those homes, instead of aiding the speculators in this country?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I do not know where the Leader of the New Democratic Party got his figures, and I do not know how they compare to other periods. I have heard the minister responsible for housing from the federal point of view, state quite clearly, with factual evidence, that foreclosures had dropped in number and that housing starts—

Mr. Broadbent: There are still a thousand a month.

Mr. Trudeau: —this month over the same month last year, had increased some 38 per cent. The Leader of the New Democratic Party does not like to admit it, but there is strong growth in the Canadian economy, including the housing sector.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

POSSIBLE FUTURE ROLE

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, perhaps I could follow up on the questioning to the Prime Minister, in particular, concerning the recommended appointment of Maurice Strong to the chairmanship of the CDC board. The Prime Minister is reported to have said in Calgary that, as chairman of the Crown corporation, Strong would turn the CDC into a "window on the economic activities of certain sectors with a view to Canadianization".

Mr. Andre: Socialist!

Mr. Stevens: Would the Prime Minister indicate if that is a fair reflection of what the Prime Minister said in Calgary or, if he did not say it, does he now confirm to the House that he believes that the CDC should turn itself into a window on the economic activities of certain sectors, with a view to Canadianization? If that is his belief, would he indicate to the House what he plans to do with respect to those minority shareholders who collectively own 51 per cent of CDC and who unwittingly bought into the company, not realizing it was to be his, the emperor's own personal vehicle?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I am not quite sure what emperor the hon. member is referring to.

Mr. Crosbie: The Swiss empire.

Mr. Trudeau: I do not think this is the place to cast aspersions on the monarchy, Madam Speaker, and I am sorry the hon. member is doing that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member asked me if the quote he read is exact. My answer is that it is not, but I did talk about having, and I quote.

—a window on an industry, and we would like to make sure that the CDC has a chairman who will understand and reflect, to a certain degree, the government's priorities.

I went on to indicate what the government's priorities were when I said, and I quote, "—the corporation should be run for the benefit of its shareholders, and take into account broad policy objectives of the Government of Canada."

The statute of the CDC makes that quite clear. That is still the government's objective.

I repeat, Madam Speaker, there is nothing untoward about the government, the major shareholder, wanting to have a say in the appointment of the chairman of a Crown corporation—

Mr. Stevens: It is not a Crown corporation.

Mr. Trudeau: —or other corporation in which it has a large interest as a shareholder.

CHAIRMANSHIP OF BOARD OF DIRECTORS

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my question is again to the Prime Minister. Perhaps he could familiarize the House with exactly what did transpire at the board level in CDC. Who suggested that the chairmanship change? As I understand it, two and a half months ago a chairman was appointed. Why is there now a suggestion that Mr. Strong become chairman? Is Mr. Hampson in agreement with this change and, above all, did the suggestion for a new chairman come from the board or from the government side?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member must understand that in the past the government has appointed members to the board, and there were members of the board being appointed again for the next annual meeting of the shareholders. It is the government's privilege to suggest—

Mr. Crosbie: You don't own it. It is not yours—49 per cent is all that you own.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for St. John's West does not have the floor.

Mr. Crosbie: Oh, if I have the floor, Madam Speaker, as a supplementary question, does the Prime Minister—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member misunderstood me. I said he does not have the floor. The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich.

MANPOWER

SUMMER EMPLOYMENT PROGRAM—USE OF FUNDS

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Is he in a position to comment on a press report from the Richelieu constituency, according to which the local chairman of the subscription campaign for the federal Liberal party, Mr. Marcel Gauthier, took advantage of the launching of this campaign in early May to announce that 32 projects were being started under the federal summer employment program, which will provide jobs for 121 students in the riding, for a total expenditure of $250,000 in public funds, and in the same breath, without the Minister of Communications and the member for Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot, who were both present, even batting an eyelid, he said, and I quote:

In return for those jobs—

And I repeat—

—in return for those jobs, those young people should get involved in the party financing campaign.

Will the Prime Minister tolerate such an abuse of public funds for clearly partisan purposes through blackmail, or is he in favour of such pork-barrel practices in the political life of his own province?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, if I remember well the beginning of the question, I was asked whether I was aware of the information provided by the hon. member. The answer is no, but if the member had given me notice of his question I could have inquired, but I will now do so.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Could the Prime Minister tell us, for instance, whether such practices in the Richelieu riding are consistent with the official policy of both the Liberal Party and this government concerning the public financing of political parties, or does he mean to turn away those who are feeding at the public trough?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, if the hon. member would only listen to our replies instead of rehearsing his own questions, he would know that I answered no when he first asked whether I was aware of this situation. Now, I suggest to him that if he wants his questions to be answered, he should follow the well known procedure which is to have his questions listed on the order paper or to give ministers advance notice of them. But apparently, Madam Speaker, the hon. member is more inclined to cast aspersions than to inform the House of a situation.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

REQUEST THAT MINISTER APPEAR BEFORE STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. The minister knows that Bill C-48, the oil and gas act affecting the north and offshore, is presently moving through committee. He is partially responsible for that bill. The minister has refused to appear before the committee. This has resulted in a further lack of representation of the people of the north who are most affected by the speed-up of northern development. Will the minister assure this House that he is prepared to appear before the national resources committee on this bill right away and, if he is not prepared to do that, will he tell the House why?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I would advise the hon. member that I did speak to the chairman about the possibility of appearing. There was some conflict with regard to timing and the adjournment of the House. I am prepared to talk to the chairman again about the possibility of appearing. As the hon. member may know, Madam Speaker, I am leaving for the territories and the Yukon tomorrow and will be gone for approximately ten days, but I am quite prepared to talk to the chairman about it at that time.

Mr. Waddell: Madam Speaker, I gather that the minister will then appear before the committee.

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT OF BILL C-48

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, let me put my supplementary question to the real minister of the north, as a result of this bill, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Would the minister agree with me that the whole impact of the Berger and Drury reports is that in order to cope with the social and economic impact of increased northern development, as the minister admitted this morning was going to take place in the north, the Government of Canada must give northerners some share of control of both money and the pace of development? Is the minister prepared specifically, not what he has done already, but specifically, to amend Bill C-48 to give northerners a share in the control of the pace of northern development?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the minister responsible for exploration and development north of 60 in the territories is still the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Bill C-48 provides for this very specifically.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REQUEST THAT MINISTER HASTEN SETTLEMENT OF STRIKE

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Gaspé): Madam Speaker, my question is for the hon. Secretary of State and Minister of Communications.

As the minister is no doubt aware, the Gaspé peninsula is hardest hit by the strike of Radio-Canada journalists since the TVA network does not yet broadcast in that area. Since the beginning of the strike the people of the region have been without national and international news. Could the Minister use his good offices, and especially his influence with CBC management, in order that journalists of the French language network be offered the same deal as those of the English network of the CBC and which was accepted?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, in reply to the first part of the question, I would say that we are of course all aware of the hon. member's interest in having the TVA network extended to the Gaspé peninsula. I do hope that this problem will be solved soon, thanks in large part to the hon. member's representations to the Department of Communications and CBC.

As for the second part of the question, this issue was raised during a press conference by some Radio-Canada journalists who wanted to know if management was prepared to offer French-speaking journalists from Quebec, who have been out on strike for six or seven months now, the same conditions it offered the union of French and English-speaking journalists outside Quebec. CBC has always maintained that not only did it make a comparable offer—

I realize the hon. member opposite is not too interested in the answer but we on this side wish to improve labour relations. The answer briefly, Madam Speaker, is that CBC maintains that its offer is at least identical to if not better than the one made to English speaking journalists and that if it could be shown that the offer made to journalists outside Quebec is better than the one made to Quebec journalists, it would be prepared to offer the same level of pay increase.

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

USE OF FUNGICIDE CAPTAN—PUBLICATION OF REPORT

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, in the absence today on other business of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, I will direct my question on a very serious matter to the Minister of Agriculture. The minister will know that on March 31, 1981, the head of the health protection branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare, in an urgent and secret memo indicated that, at least in his opinion, it was essential that the fungicide Captan be banned or severely restricted. It has been reported that the Minister of Agriculture sought, and was successful, in stifling the publication of that report. Is the Minister of Agriculture now willing to make that report public?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I have not told anyone not to make public the report the hon. member mentions. I had some discussions with my officials and they have expressed some reservation about making it public.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: I have not told anyone not to make it public. I am sure the hon. member knows this product is used in many parts of the world. Many of the fruits and vegetables, especially fruit, brought into this country from the United States and other countries have been subjected to this in an uncontrolled fashion, whereas users of that product in Canada are all licensed.

We have no evidence that it is damaging. They suspect it may be damaging, but there is no real evidence. Testing is being carried out. If my officials bring forward to me a recommendation that it be banned and that the release be made public, I see no reason to hold it up. However, at the present time there has been no recommendation one way or the other brought to my attention.

REQUEST FOR CONSULTATION WITH MINISTER OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, the minister is indeed correct that it is—and this is the hard part—probably the most widely used fungicide in North America. The report sent to the minister from the Minister of National Health and Welfare, which she received from the health protection branch, linked Captan to genetic mutation, cancer, congenital deformities, and foetal abortions. That is why in September, 1978, Sweden banned it. That is why the United States has already indicated to producers that they must show cause as to why it ought not to be banned in the United States. This is a serious matter. I ask the Minister of Agriculture to consult with the Minister of National Health and Welfare immediately and have that report made public so that innocent users are not hurt.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows that although our system may not be perfect it is the best in the world. He is creating a fear in the minds of the people. Health and Welfare do not have any real evidence that those countries which have banned it have sound evidence. The hon. member knows that as well as I do. We reacted even when other countries did not with regard to other products we use when we thought they were damaging. Not that much evidence has been brought forward in this instance with regard to Captan. We have given world leadership in banning other products which were not banned in other parts of the world.

Mr. Crombie: Publish the report.

Mr. Whelan: The hon. member says we should ban it. If other countries do not ban it and different varieties of fruit are imported into Canada, it will still be consumed here.

Mr. Crombie: That's a fraud. Publish the report.

Mr. Whelan: For instance, we have a product that we did not allow—

Madam Speaker: Order.

METRIC CONVERSION

REQUEST FOR POSTPONEMENT OF IMPLEMENTATION TARGET DATE FOR WEIGH SCALES

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance who, I notice, has joined the backbenchers on the government side. I wonder if he could return to his seat so that I might ask him a question.

Mr. Crosbie: He's resigned.

Mr. Domm: Added to the burden of a likely consumer price increase which threatens to be the highest inflationary consumer price increase on record when it is announced this Friday, to say nothing of skyrocketing costs for everything from mortgage rates to eggs, Canadian families will soon have to shoulder the costs of an added food bill of some $584 million as weigh scales are purchased in order to convert to metric on Januray 1. Will the Minister of Finance, in the interests of the home budget and in the interests of keeping food costs down, consider recommending to cabinet that the move to metric on January 1 be deferred in order that we might avoid this added cost to the food bill of some $584 million which must be borne by the consumers of Canada?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I take note of the hon. member's representation. I would tell him that it is unlikely I would succeed in making this change at this stage. I would remind him, and I can understand his concern about food costs which have risen quite disturbingly over the last year, that one has to take into account as well the rise in incomes that has taken place in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McDermid: Tell that one to the farmers.

Mr. MacEachen: If he looks at the situation historically and compares what is happening now to ten years ago and 20 years ago, he will find that the proportion of income made up of food purchases is a decreasing portion of total income. I think that point ought to be made in order not to create hostility toward the food producers of Canada, an important part of our economy.

Mr. Domm: The Minister of Finance is well aware that the 100 per cent capital cost allowance for metric scales is useless if (a) there is no profit in the retail business of the food small business sector, and (b), if that is claimed against profits it will represent a half billion dollar loss to the Government of Canada. Has the Minister of Finance allowed in his forecast budget an additional half billion dollars not derived by government but written off by the major foreign multinational companies as they implement weigh scales in the food sector of Canada? Has he allowed for this increase from $14 billion to $14.5 billion in losses by this government by forcing metric, inflationary as it is, on the retail food sector on January 1?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I will undertake to examine the hon. member's statistics and get back to him on how it has been dealt with in the projections in the budget.

CORPORATE AFFAIRS

INCREASES IN SALARIES OF COMPANY EXECUTIVES

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. It concerns the recent report of the Securities and Exchange Commission of the United States on corporate compensation which shows the salaries of several Canadian corporate executives. It shows, for example, that while Massey-Ferguson was burning and workers were being laid off, the president of Massey-Ferguson managed to fiddle his salary up to $390,591. It shows the president and chief executive officer of Inco managed to almost double his salary to some $513,300.

In light of the fact that these salaries have gone up on average 20 per cent to 30 per cent in one year, when the minister was at the Conference Board last week delivering his homily on the fact that workers are making too much money, did he raise the point that several corporation executives are making more than half a million dollars a year? If not, why not? Second, will he make an effort to close the tax loopholes which allow these corporate executives to take even more money in deferred compensation? Will he do something about that to introduce an element of fairness into our economy?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I will give careful consideration to the representations made by the hon. member. I would remind him for the second time that the allegation made in his question about my comments on workers' incomes is not justified. In fairness, he ought not to continue repeating what is not in fact the truth.

REQUEST FOR AMENDMENT OF CANADA CORPORATIONS ACT

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

I should like to ask the minister why it is that we have to get this kind of information on what our senior executives are being paid in Canada from the United States, when a simple amendment to the Canada Corporations Act would allow all Canadians to see what kind of just society we live in, and what kind of a mockery it is when the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance deliver homilies to average workers when their salaries have been following behind increases in the cost of living, and executives are making salaries that are simply obscene in the context of the current difficulties which the average Canadian is facing?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, in my opinion the hon. member's remarks tend to lay emphasis on salaries which would seem much too high. But he knows full well that the matter has nothing whatsoever to do with my department.

McDONALD ROYAL COMMISSION

APPEARANCE BY PRIME MINISTER

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

In contrast to the practice followed with every other minister or any other elected official who has appeared before the McDonald royal commission, both the commission and the Prime Minister's office appear to have deliberately attempted to conceal that the Prime Minister was requested to testify last July, although apparently very briefly. As national security could not possibly be the reason, why was no public announcement made about his appearance at the time, by either the commission or his own office?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I cannot answer, of course, for the commission, but there was no deliberate attempt to conceal, as the hon. member states. I was asked informally to appear before the commission, which I did for one afternoon.

SECURITY SERVICE OPERATION

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is also directed to the Prime Minister.

An important aspect of the commission's mandate, as he knows, is to ascertain the degree of ministerial knowledge of the operations of the RCMP's security service. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he was questioned concerning the authoritative and corroborated evidence, given to the commission early in its existence, that in 1970 when a clandestine security operation was being planned, the Prime Minister stated bluntly that if the circumstances became public he would deny any knowledge of that operation, and was he questioned by the commission as to whether this intention to lie about his knowledge would apply to his testimony before a royal commission?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I have in every other case, when questions were asked about the work of the commission, referred the questions to the commission itself and indicated that as far as we were concerned we would not comment on testimony; we would wait for the report of the commission. That is still our policy.

INTERNATIONAL TERRORISM

INQUIRY WHETHER SUBJECT WILL APPEAR ON AGENDA FOR SUMMIT MEETING IN JULY

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Sherbrooke): Madam Speaker, after the Iranian crisis last January, I asked the Prime Minister whether he intended to bring up the matter of hostage-taking with his western counterparts when they meet here in Ottawa next July. In light of this new outbreak of international terrorism involving assassination attempts, does the Prime Minister intend not only to bring up the question but to put it on the agenda for the meeting of western leaders planned for next July here in Ottawa?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Madam Speaker. I can assure the hon. member that we do intend to discuss this matter, that is, violence and hostage-taking. We will be doing it in conjunction with the initiative we took in Bonn two years ago. I would intend, on that occasion to ask for a progress report on the matter and, at the same time, bring up the problem of terrorism in the world. I thank the hon. member for having brought the matter to my attention.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, might I ask the government House leader the intentions of the government in respect of the business before the House tomorrow and next week? While he is on his feet, could he designate the appropriate allotted day or days in the coming week for the opposition?

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, tomorrow we will be resuming debate on second reading of Bill C-61 concerning young offenders, followed by resumption of debate on second reading of Bill C-58, the Canada Elections Act. This will be followed by discussion of Bill S-10, to amend the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act. If we have time tomorrow after those three bills we will resume debate at the second reading stage of the Two-price Wheat Act.

There is an agreement among us that if any vote arises tomorrow it would be deferred until next Wednesday.

[Translation]

As to the business of the House next week, the Commons will not sit on Monday, pursuant to Standing Order 2(3). On Tuesday we will begin consideration of Bill C-12 concerning bankruptcy and if we complete second reading of that bill before the end of the sitting on Tuesday, or in any event before the end of the sitting Wednesday, we will then take up second reading of Bill C-10, an act respecting Canadian non-profit corporations, and Bill C-11, an act relating to the inspection of electric and gas meters and supplies. Those three bills, C-12, C-10 and C-11 are important, they have been on the order paper for quite some time and, as I see it, they do not appear to be overly controversial. That is why I list those three bills for consideration next Tuesday and next Wednesday in the order I gave, that is C-12, C-10 and C-11. Finally, Thursday and Friday of next week will be opposition days.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, it is rather significant that with the economic circumstances as they exist at the moment the government has chosen among its legislative priorities for next week the Bankruptcy Act. I hope the significance of that is not lost.

While the Minister of Agriculture is in the House I would like to refer to a question put by the hon. member for Rosedale in respect of the release of a report that is apparently in the hands of the minister concerning the use, and the effect upon human beings, of the substance captan. It was referred to in the House and there has been a request by members to have that report, prepared at public expense, made available to the public. Would the government House leader undertake to consult with his colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, in order to have that report tabled next week?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, with respect to the first comment of my colleague, he knows full well that despite its title the bankruptcy legislation is basic statutory amendments which are very significant for both debtors who are in trouble and creditors who need protection. He is not without knowing that this bill has been on the order paper for a very long time and that its study has become urgent.

As to his suggestion that I consult the Minister of Agriculture about the report he has mentioned, I want to assure him that I will do just that within the next few minutes.

[English]

Mr. Knowles: First of all, Madam Speaker, may I confirm that we shall join in the agreement with regard to tomorrow, that if any recorded vote is called for on any measure which comes before the House, any such recorded vote shall be deferred until Wednesday.

I have two questions respecting House business which I should like to put to the government House leader. First, I would draw his attention to the fact that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs confirmed yesterday that the acting minister was just about to take to cabinet for approval a resolution respecting veterans which will deal, I trust, with the widows who were left out of last summer's Bill C-40. Could the minister indicate whether that bill will be on the order paper by next week, or certainly no later than the week after? He could do it with the knowledge, I am sure, that the House will take very little time to deal with a bill of that nature.

The other question I should like to put to the government House leader relates to Bill C-53, which is amending legislation respecting sexual assaults and matters of that kind. As he knows, a number of women's organizations in particular are concerned lest this legislation be delayed and not sent to committee during this session. If the government House leader would like to seek some arrangement for a short debate at second reading, we would be glad to enter into that; but at any rate, can he tell us what his thoughts are regarding Bill C-53?

● (1510)

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I think the answer which was given yesterday to the hon. member by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs speaks for itself and is an indication that very shortly we hope the appropriate bill will be put on the order paper. We hope that this will be done as soon as possible, but we will have to await the decision of the cabinet. I take note of the great interest in veterans shown by the hon. member and, as I just mentioned to him, the answer which was provided to him yesterday is a good indication that we also have great interest in their situation and in the situation of their widows.

Concerning Bill C-53, I will talk to the Minister of Justice and hope to be in a position to be more specific next week about his reaction to the request made by the hon. member. If we can agree in a House leaders' meeting to a short debate, we should try to arrange it so that we could proceed on a Friday afternoon some time before the end of June.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, the gist of the last remarks of the hon. gentleman has brought another matter to mind, and that is—and I apologize for rising again—the small business development bond provisions. There have been discussions and questions in the House about the possible extension of that to unincorporated businesses, perhaps including—indeed including—farmers, fishermen and others. The Minister of Finance has indicated that he is prepared to look at that matter.

As a way of assisting the government in expediting its business, I just want to indicate to the hon. gentleman that we would be prepared to discuss the expedition of a debate on that matter. If the government could produce a bill which we might take a look at in advance, I think we could co-operate, and a broader group of Canadians could have the advantage of that kind of bill, as has been requested in the House on a number of occasions. Would my friend look into that?

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I welcome the generous offer made by the House leader for the Conservative party, and I hope I will be in a position to take advantage of that offer soon.

Mr. Knowles: We make the same offer.

Mr. Towers: Madam Speaker, some time ago the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism suggested that he might be agreeable to tabling the overview report of the committee which examined metrication in Canada. I wonder if the government House leader could give us an affirmative answer today as to when this report might be tabled in the House.

Mr. Pinard: No, Madam Speaker, I cannot give that firm indication today, but I can tell the hon. member that I will talk to the minister concerned and try to get an answer so that very shortly the hon. member will be more enlightened about this.

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, as the government House leader knows, shortly before the House broke for our brief recess members of the steering committee of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments met with his parliamentary secretary to request an answer from the government as to when it would be responding to the fourth report of the standing committee which was tabled last summer. Can the minister indicate to the House when he will be making that response to the committee and to the House and what action the government is prepared to take?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I think the reports in question are interesting and complete. They deserve serious consideration, a fact which I do not deny. However, the hon. member ought to keep in mind the fact that from now until the end of June we have hardly seven weeks left and that during those seven weeks the government must designate twelve opposition days, pursuant to the Standing Orders of the House. In fact we had one yesterday. That leaves eleven. Therefore at the rate of about two opposition days a week the government has barely two or three days left to put its bills through the House and complete this session with the best positive record possible for the well-being of the people of Canada.

In other words, I am saying to the hon. member that the reports in question are important. We do not deny that. But unfortunately the time left at our disposal in the House is too limited for us to devote one day or hours of debate to those reports which warrant debate and explanations and which indeed bear on the structure of the committees of the House. As it happens, I am now working on a draft document for submission to cabinet and I intend to hold consultations concerning a proposal for parliamentary reform in the not too distant future. It will be very difficult to concur in the recommendations of the reports referred to by the hon. member without first considering what we have in mind when it comes to reforming the committees of the House. Consequently we would be putting the cart before the horse if we were to accept those reports before reaching conclusions on the type of parliamentary reform we are prepared to study or consider.

Keeping those two factors in mind, lack of time and the link between the recommendations of those reports and the possibility of a parliamentary reform, I think that the most direct answer I can give the hon. member is that we will be unable to study those reports before the summer recess, but that should not be interpreted as lack of interest on our part. We will take them into account when the time comes to review the changes in the Standing Orders of the House.

PRIVILEGE

MR. HAWKES—RECOGNITION OF MEMBERS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, I rise, I hope briefly, on a question of privilege which arises out of the question period. I think one of the most fundamental aspects of the privileges of members of this House relates to our capacity to be free of obstacles in terms of our attendance upon this House. There is also a second principle which guarantees each of us some sense of equality in terms of our recognition. I think those principles flow from the basic understanding of our democracy, which is that it is our responsibility to represent our voters in this chamber, and that responsibility should not be impeded.

On May 27, 1980, the hon. member for Annapolis Valley-Hants (Mr. Nowlan) rose in this House to ask about Your Honour's interpretation of the rights and privileges of members.

Madam Speaker: Order. The question of privilege should be stated quite early. The hon. member has two or three sentences in which to tell the Chair what the question of privilege is about, I believe the hon. member is referring to valid matters, but what he has to do just now is to tell me immediately what his question of privilege involves.

Mr. Hawkes: Thank you, Madam Speaker; I think I can do so succinctly. On March 24 of this year, at 2.30 in the afternoon, I received a letter from the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan). I rose at that time in question period, and I have risen every day since. That was seven weeks and three days ago. I have been in attendance and risen in this House in every single question period.

As I understand your Honour's interpretation of equal recognition in this House during question period, which flows from your Honour's statement of May 27, 1980, there is a carry-over from day to day. The basic principle is to attempt to recognize, first of all, frontbenchers, and second, those—

Madam Speaker: Order. Yes, the hon. member might perhaps have a legitimate grievance, as do other members who want to be recognized during the question period in this House, but hon. members have to realize that there are 281 members and that questions are often very long, despite my repeated attempts to get hon. members to ask their questions succinctly. I think it is in the interest of hon. members to ask brief questions. Briefer questions are clearer, and to brief questions I think hon. members are likely to receive brief answers.

This is a discipline which hon. members should apply to themselves. I try to assist them in coming closer to asking brief questions, but the time is limited. I simply cannot recognize each and every member who rises.

I think the statistics the hon. member is quoting are pretty strong. According to my recollection, the hon. member is recognized quite often. At any rate, we were not sitting for two weeks, so the number would be five weeks instead of seven. However, that does not constitute a question of privilege, because the right of the hon. member to express himself freely is not inhibited in the sense that he is now attempting to expose this matter on a question of privilege.

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, one short—

Madam Speaker: No, I cannot hear the hon. member. It is quite clear he does not have a question of privilege. I have said there is no question of privilege, and I cannot hear him further.

Mr. Hawkes: On a point of order, Madam Speaker—

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell).

● (1520)

MR. WADDELL—REPLIES OF MINISTERS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which arises from a question I addressed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) today. In my submission, a member is entitled not to be misled by a minister, even inadvertently, as perhaps was the case.

Quite simply the facts are these. I asked the minister whether he would appear before the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works to testify on Bill C-48. The minister indicated that he would but that he was visiting the north on a ten-day trip. Since that answer was given, I have discovered that the minister is not going on an official trip but on a political trip to open up a political office in Yellowknife.

In a supplementary question which I addressed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde), he replied that indeed the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development was responsible for this bill in the north. I found out as a member of the steering committee that the committee is going clause by clause—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I do not believe the hon. member has a question of privilege. It seems quite clear to me that he is not satisfied with the kinds of answers he has received from two ministers. That might be his opinion, to which he is entitled, but because the hon. member is not satisfied with answers given by ministers does not constitute a question of privilege. If the hon. member is not satisfied with the answers, he can seek other occasions to clarify his queries about actions or intentions of ministers.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 1,937, 1,941, 2,043, 2,045, 2,082, 2,236, 2,249, 2,271 and 2,359.

I suggest, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

CAST CONTAINER LINES—BOARD OF DIRECTORS

Question No. 1,937—Mr. Crosby:

1. What are the names of the representatives of the Canadian National Railways appointed to the board of directors of CAST Container Lines and to each related company owned or controlled in whole or in part by CAST?

2. How many board meetings did each representative attend in the year 1980 and in which location was each meeting held?

3. Are the representatives remunerated for their participation in CAST and related companies and, if so, in what amount?

4. How many man-hours did each person spend on CAST related business in 1980?

5. Do CNR investments in CAST or related companies cause a conflict of interest respecting CNR's relations with other shipping lines including Dart Containerline Ltd., Atlantic Container Lines Ltd., Hapag-Lloyd A.G., Trans Freight Lines and Polish Ocean Lines?

6. Does CNR investment in CAST result in favouritism toward Canadian ports serviced by CNR and CAST, thereby adversely affecting Canadian ports not serviced by CAST like the Port of Halifax?

7. What is the dollar value of CNR investment in CAST and related companies and what in form does this investment take?

8. Were the investments taken with full consultation and knowledge of the board of directors of CNR?

9. What return has CNR realized on such investments for each year that the investments have been held?

10. Will the government instruct CNR to divest itself of interest in CAST and related companies and, if not, for what reason?

11. What criteria were used by the government in permitting the investments by CNR and what benefits to the taxpayer are envisioned by the government from such investments?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: the question refers to "CAST Container Lines" or "CAST". This is taken as a reference to Eurocanadian Shipholdings Limited (Eurocanadian) and Intercast S.A. (Intercast), and unless indicated otherwise, the answer has been prepared to refer to the two companies as the "CAST Group".

1. Mr. R. A. Bandeen is Canadian National's representative on the board of directors of Eurocanadian and Intercast.

2. Although Mr. Bandeen did not attend any board meetings during 1980 of the CAST Group, he did attend three meetings of the executive committee of the board. Board meetings normally are held at the head office of the CAST Group in the Intercast S.A. Building in Fribourg, Switzerland.

3. The directors are remunerated, but as these are private companies, and as Canadian National is a minority shareholder in the CAST Group, it would be inappropriate for CN to divulge information concerning the amounts of remuneration.

4. In 1980, Mr. Bandeen spent about seven days on the affairs of the CAST Group, including travelling time.

5. No.

6. No.

7. The book value of Canadian National investments in Intercast is $100,000 in common shares.

The book value of Canadian National investments in Eurocanadian are:

$11,900,000 in common shares

$ 6,225,660 in first preference shares

$ 3,533,409 in non-convertible second preference shares

$39,854,950 in convertible second preference shares

(The preference shares are to be redeemed not later than December, 1985. Eurocanadian may decide to redeem them at an earlier date.)

8. Yes.

9. No dividends have been declared to date on the common shares of Intercast as the shareholders have decided that it is preferable to leave the earnings in the company. CN has received, as dividend on its common shares of Eurocanadian, securities previously held by Eurocanadian, which have since been sold for $10,000,073. Dividends have not yet been declared on any of the Eurocanadian preference shares, which issues are less than a year old.

10. Transport Canada advises as follows: Not at this time. The future of CN's investments in the CAST Group is being kept under review on a semi-annual basis.

11. The primary initiative for CN to enter or terminate any business arrangement with other companies rests with the board of directors of CN. CN's statute permits the board to take an ownership interest in any business which the directors consider to be incidental to, or in the best interests of, the operation of the railway. Although such decisions may be initiated by CN they must be reviewed by the Canadian Transport Commission, which may hold public hearings, and confirmed or rejected by the governor in council on advice from the commission. The principal current benefits to the Canadian public are the attainment of greater integration of multimodal transportation services between points in Canada and overseas markets and a financially sound railway company.

MR. DE MONTIGNY MARCHAND

Question No. 1,941—Mr. Cossitt:

1. What is the detailed government employment history of Mr. De Montigny Marchand including positions held, dates involved, etc?

2. Was there a time during his public service career, within the past 3 years, that he did not work in Canada and specifically was he in Paris and, if so (a) in what capacity (b) for how long (c) what remuneration did he receive during the time involved (d) for what reason was he in Paris (e) who sent him to Paris?

3. (a) Was he ever employed by the PCO/PMO and, if so, what are all the details of the work he performed (b) does he occupy a position with the Department of External Affairs and, if so, what are all of his qualifications for such a position?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs):

1. 1969 Department of Communications

1969 Appointed Director of Research and Co-Secretary of the Telecommission.

1971 Promoted Assistant Deputy Minister (Operations).

1974 Promoted Senior Assistant Deputy Minister (Policy).

1975 Privy Council Office

1975 Promoted Deputy Secretary of the Cabinet (Operations).

1979 On special assignment to Western Europe with base in Paris.

1980 Department of External Affairs

1980 Promoted Associate Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs.

2. (a) to (e)—See question 1,446, answered October 27, 1980. Debates, page 4108.

3. (a) and (b)—See part 1 above.

RAILWAY IMPROVEMENT—SMITHS FALLS TO BROCKVILLE

Question No. 2,043—Mr. Cossitt:

1. With reference to the answer to question No. 1,619, which states in part, that the railway roadbed between Smiths Falls and Brockville which forms part of the Ottawa-Toronto train service, "is adequate for present train operations", what are all the reasons that the government considers the roadbed adequate?

2. With further reference to the answer which states in part, that the roadbed was built in 1854 and that it takes almost an hour to travel 28 miles, what are all the reasons that the government considers this sufficient facilities to meet present day travel demands?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. The roadbed is considered adequate on the basis that traffic over this line is being carried in a safe and efficient manner. This is supported by a good accident record, in that no reportable accidents due to track or roadbed related causes have occurred in the last five years.

2. The fact that the roadbed was built in 1854 does not, in itself, have great relevance to its condition today. The current condition is determined, for the most part, by the manner and extent of the maintenance performed on it. As stated in paragraph No. 1 above, it is evident that the current condition of the roadbed is adequate for present traffic. The relatively slow service on the route is mainly due to the route's configuration (i.e. the number of curves, crossovers, etc.) rather than the condition of the roadbed. As stated previously in response to question No. 1,619, only ten minutes in time savings could be gained by upgrading the existing track. The need to improve railway passenger services in the corridor area is recognized, however, and VIA is currently reviewing a number of strategies for achieving that objective.

Question No. 2,045—Mr. Cossitt:

1. With reference to the answer to question No. 1,619 which states in part, that there are no plans to improve the railway roadbed between Smiths Falls and Brockville but that such plans do exist to upgrade the service and facilities on the Smiths Falls to Napanee route, has this line been out of service for approximately two and a half years and what are all the reasons to upgrade it?

2. Is there a plan to run trains from Ottawa to Toronto through Smiths Falls and direct to Napanee, thus cutting out Ottawa service to Brockville and Kingston and (a) if so, who devised the plan and on what date (b) if not, will the government confirm that the Ottawa-Brockville and through-service westward will continue?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. Even though there is no regular train service on the line between Smiths Falls and Napanee, the line cannot be deemed "out of service". In fact, a maintenance-of-way work crew must ensure that the track is safe for any traffic that it may be necessary to move over it. Any steps to upgrade the service and facilities of this line would be contingent upon the decision on a long-term improvement plan for the Ottawa-Toronto-Montreal corridor.

2. VIA Rail Canada Inc. is currently developing plans to improve the entire Quebec City to Windsor corridor to be able to run passenger trains at 200 km/h. The plans would include a line between Montreal-Ottawa-Toronto going through or nearby Kingston. The future plans do not contemplate going through Brockville as this is not the most direct route, but envisage the construction of a stretch of new line between Smiths Falls and Kingston and the upgrading of service using present route geometry. These plans are still under development by VIA and have yet to be finalized or presented to the government for a final decision. No long-term government commitment can be made on the future of the Ottawa-Brockville service as a decision to continue or discontinue a service in the national railway passenger system is made based on a number of relevant economic and public interest factors e.g. current and projected operating costs and losses, the availability of alternate means of transportation, and the transportation needs of the communities served. A decision on the Ottawa-Brockville service either now or at some time in the future would be made on that basis.

Order Paper Questions

TORONTO INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT—CURFEW PERIOD

Question No. 2,082—Mr. Blenkarn:

1. What are the current curfew restrictions at the Toronto International Airport between 11 p.m. and 7 a.m.?

2. What regular flights are allowed in and out of the airport between 11 p.m. and 7 a.m.?

3. What special arrangements are made for aircraft that come in on an unscheduled basis during this curfew period?

4. How many unscheduled flights have there been in and out of the airport since July 1, 1980, and what is a separate schedule of such flights each day?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. Charter flights, cargo flights or technical flight stops using turbo-jet aircraft may not be pre-planned to operate between the hours of 11 p.m. and 7 a.m. local time. Scheduled air carrier flights using turbo-jet aircraft may not be pre-planned to operate between the hours of 12 midnight to 7 a.m. local time. There are two exceptions to this rule by "grandfather rights":

> Air Canada flight 472, a DC-9 aircraft departs shortly after midnight and Air Canada flight 561, a DC-8 aircraft which departs approximately 1.30 a.m.

2. Exemptions to 1. above may, under extenuating circumstances, be granted by the regional administrator, Canadian Air Transportation Administration, or his designated official, the airport general manager, Toronto International Airport. Such requests are evaluated as to the cause of delay, the number of passengers involved, the impact of refusal and the hour of required operation. Extensions to operate between 3 a.m. and 7 a.m. are not granted except in extreme or emergency conditions.

3. Turbo-jet aircraft, granted an extension of the operating hours, that is, scheduled flights unable to meet normal operating hours by reason of extenuating circumstances, are permitted to depart on runways 23 right, 23 left and 32 only and, except in unusual wind and weather conditions, landing aircraft shall use runways 05 right, 05 left and 14.

4. During the period July 1 to December 31, 1980, there was a total of 301 rescheduled air carrier flights and 279 rescheduled charter/ferry/cargo flights unable to operate within normal hours and which were authorized to operate during the restricted hours. During the same period, there was a total of 414 movements by corporate (business) jet aircraft during the published restricted hours. The information concerning separate schedules of such flights is not readily available.

ICE DAMS—PORT OF MONTREAL

Question No. 2,236—Mr. Crosby:

1. Were ice dams constructed near the port of Montreal and, if so (a) on what date (b) at what cost?

2. (a) Was the investment in the ice dams approved by Treasury Board and, if so, on what date (b) was it included in the estimates of the Department of Transport and, if so, on what date?

3. Were any capital costs of the ice dams recovered from cargo assessments or user fees applicable to the port of Montreal and will cost recovery measures be implemented and continued in the future?

Order Paper Questions

4. Were inquiries made to determine whether ice dues are charged to users for icebreaking services in other ports utilized by worldwide marine traffic, particularly ports of the Baltic Sea?

5. Does the department intend to impose ice dues for icebreaking services on users of the port of Montreal and other ports on the St. Lawrence River?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. No ice dams have been constructed near the Port of Montreal but Transport Canada has constructed ice control works as follows:

(a) An experimental ice boom was constructed in 1967, artificial islands were constructed in 1967 and 1968, and additional ice booms were constructed in 1969 and 1971.

(b) Construction costs were:

(i) $365,000 for the experimental ice boom constructed in 1967.

(ii) $446,000 for the artificial islands constructed in 1967 and 1968.

(iii) $141,000 for the ice boom constructed in 1969.

(iv) $150,000 for the ice boom constructed in 1971.

NOTE: The Laprairie Basin ice control structure was constructed by Department of Public Works prior to the winter of 1966/67 in connection with the development of the Expo 67 site.

2. (a) Under the regulations governing the seeking of Treasury Board approval some of those projects required approval and some did not. Those requiring approval were approved as follows:

(i) The experimental ice boom constructed in 1967 received Treasury Board approval on March 23, 1967.

(ii) The artificial islands were an extension of the experimental ice boom project and an amendment to that submission was approved on August 16, 1967.

(b) The experimental ice boom was included in the Main Estimates for 1967/68.

3. (a) No capital costs were recovered for these ice control structures.

(b) The question of dues for Canadian Coast Guard facilities and services is currently being considered by the government.

4. Yes.

5. See 3(b) above.

CANADIAN POW CAMPS, WORLD WAR II

Question No. 2,249—Mr. Blackburn:

1. During World War II, were there prisoner of war camps in Canada and, if so (a) how many and, in each case, what was the name and location (b) what was the typical daily diet for the prisoners and what was the cost of the food budget?

2. Did Canadian personnel guard prisoners of war and, if so, how many were so engaged and were wounded or killed while on duty?

3. What was the total cost of guarding such prisoners?

4. Were escapes attempted by such prisoners and, if so, how many were (a) attempted (b) successful?

5. How many of the (a) German (b) Italian (c) Japanese prisoners of war later returned to Canada and took up residence?

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): I am informed by the Departments of Employment and Immigration and National Defence as follows: 1. Yes.

(a) 25 prisoner of war (POW) camps including one camp for internees. Name and location of each camp are listed below.

(b) POWs were on the same ration scale as the Canadian Army. Detail of it is listed below. The cost of the diet is not readily available and to attempt to research this would entail a very costly procedure for which the Department of National Defence does not have the necessary resources.

2. Yes. As of May 23, 1945, 5,466 members of the Veteran's Guard of Canada, a corps of the Canadian Active Service Force were employed guarding POWs. None were killed or wounded as a result of guarding POWs.

3. This information is not readily available and to attempt such costing would entail a great deal of research for which the Department of National Defence does not have the necessary resources.

4. Yes. (a) 600; (b) One.

5. The information requested was never recorded by the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission and is therefore unavailable.

NEWFOUNDLAND STEAMSHIP LIMITED—ELIGIBILITY FOR SUBSIDY

Question No. 2,271—Mr. Crosby:

1. Is the Newfoundland Steamship Limited (Company) eligible for a subsidy for a vessel or vessels operating between the port of Montreal and the province of Newfoundland under Article of Agreement, contract No. 75, between the company and the Canadian Transport Commission?

2. Would a subsidy under the contract be paid to the company if the vessel or vessels operated from the port of Halifax and, if not, would failure to pay the subsidy discriminate against the port of Halifax?

3. Are officials of the government, any department, agency or Crown corporation permitted to travel free of charge on vessels of the company under the contract or under any other agreement and, if so, what (a) were the names of any persons who travelled free of charge (b) was the date and time of each trip?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Transport Canada advises as follows: 1. Yes, but this agreement is now administered by Transport Canada.

2. No, the subsidy is for a service operated from Montreal to St. John's and Corner Brook.

3. Yes, in the performance of their duties. (a) and (b) None.

PENSION REVIEW BOARD APPEALS

Question No. 2,359—Mr. Halliday:

1. For each of the past five years for which statistics are available, what was the number of applications of appeal (a) received (b) processed (c) pending decision at the end of the year by the Pension Review Board?

2. For the same years, what was the number of board members working (a) full time (b) part time?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence):

1.

Fiscal year	(a) Appeals received	Withdrawn	(b) Processed	(c) Yearly backlog	Comulative backlog

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the hon. Parliamentary Secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, on December 9, 1980, I placed question No. 1,852 on the order paper. It dealt with the chairman of the Canadian Film Development Corporation and the concern as to how regulations relating to conflict of interest apply to him. You will recall that prior to the Easter recess, on April 23, as reported at page 9436 of Hansard, I brought to the attention of the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council the fact that this question remained on the Order Paper unanswered since December 9, and yet the Chairman of the CFDC had furnished the government with information for reply some weeks before. At that time the parliamentary secretary replied as follows:

> Madam Speaker, following my conversation with the hon. member this morning, I am checking on the matter. I fail to understand why an answer has not been transmitted through the Privy Council office to be presented in the House. I will do my best to have it as soon as we return from the recess.

Question No. 1,852 is still on the Order Paper unanswered. It has been on the Order Paper for five months now. I would appreciate it if the parliamentary secretary could see to it that the House is furnished with an answer.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I shall take notice of the recommendation made by the hon. member concerning his question. I shall consult the parliamentary secretary and ensure that he can provide the hon. member with an answer as soon as possible. There are undoubtedly very valid reasons to justify this delay, and we shall try to give them to him as soon as I have talked with the parliamentary secretary.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—EFFECTS OF HIGH INTEREST RATES AND DOUBLE-DIGIT INFLATION

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition) moved:

> That this House deplores the record high interest rates imposed on Canadians by the Liberal government which together with double-digit inflation and slow economic growth are causing acute hardship and human suffering for Canadians, and demands that the government immediately introduce a budget and implement other economic programs to address these urgent and pressing problems.

He said: Mr. Speaker, for the past several months we in this Parliament have spent our time debating what amounted to the personal priority of the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau).

In the motion we presented yesterday, and in the motion I am introducing today, we are saying that it is now time for the Parliament of Canada to give attention to the priorities of the people of this nation. Those priorities concern the resolution of our economic and energy problems, but particularly they are a means by which the Government of Canada can come to grips with inflation, unemployment and interest rates, problems which are causing very serious and real, human hardship to individual Canadians across the country.

We use question period and we use days like today, the only instruments available to an opposition, to raise issues. However, all that we can do in opposition is to raise these questions. The government alone has the power to resolve Canada's economic problems. By its actions the government has either made those problems worse, by driving jobs and investment out of Canada, or it has ignored the anger and the sense of betrayal which most Canadians feel about Ottawa's refusal to meet its responsibility of economic leadership.

What concerns Canadians are rising living costs that are making it impossible for the average wage earner to make ends meet; record interest rates that are forcing more and more small businesses and more and more Canadian farmers into bankruptcy; mortgage rates that turn the Canadian dream of owning a home into a financial nightmare; and a lack of economic growth and economic direction that has put a million Canadians out of work today and deeply threatens the job security of thousands more tomorrow.

The individual problems are acute enough, but this Liberal government's greatest crime against Canada now is that it is not even trying to face economic issues. The minister's policy is to do nothing. He says that anything he might do would only make matters worse.

Would it be worse for a pensioner to be getting an energy tax credit today? Would it be worse for a home buyer to be receiving a mortgage tax credit today? Would it be worse for a widow living in her own home to be receiving a property tax credit today? Of course it would not be worse. Those people need help and they need it now. The government's excuse that it cannot afford help for suffering Canadians is utterly false. It is an excuse that is denied by the government's own actions. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, I say to the House and I say to the government that if public money can buy an oil company like Petrofina, public money can protect Canadians against high energy costs and high accommodation costs.

Certainly the issue here is not the principle of spending. This government spends money like water. The question is the priority of spending. This Liberal government would sooner pay approximately a million dollars in a finder's fee to its millionaire friend, Maurice Strong, rather than pay $240 per family for an energy tax credit to low-income Canadians. That is not just raw patronage; that is contempt for Canadians in need.

Mr. Lalonde: That is a lie.

Mr. Clark: The minister of energy, who might want to put his seat on the line, says that is a lie. He is saying it is a lie that the Government of Canada paid $942,000 to the good Liberal friend, Maurice Strong.

Mr. Lalonde: To Maurice Strong, that is a lie.

Mr. Clark: He can check the record, because in his own responses to the House he says it is a lie. His accusation is a matter which we will pursue in the House later on when he will be called upon to withdraw that allegation, defend it or surrender his seat.

• (1530)

In field after field the government is prepared to spend money on the wrong things but ignores the needs of ordinary Canadians who are caught in an economic squeeze. They increase by 17 per cent the amount of public money spent on consultants and on services, and they ignore Canadians who are caught with the prospect of bankruptcy or with high interest rates. They are buying Petrofina at a cost to the average Canadian energy user of $60 a year, yet they refuse to use that kind of tax money to help Canadians who are now facing serious economic problems.

They run a propaganda machine which has the government budget up now by $13.2 million from last year; it now stands at $62.8 million. They are prepared to help sell their own case to the people of Canada, but they are not prepared to make help available to individual Canadians in need. It is not a question of the principle of spending; it is a question of the priority of spending. The government put their own interests first and the interests of the people of Canada last.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, we are all aware of the disastrous effects our present economic situation is having. The cost of living is increasing by over 12 per cent a year, which is the worst inflation rate we have had for over six years. The average Canadian who borrows is now paying the unprecedented interest rates of 20 per cent on a personal loan and 18 per cent on a mortgage loan. Commercial bankruptcies increased by 17 per cent last year and by over 20 per cent in the first quarter of this year. Farm bankruptcies are increasing at an even greater rate. Housing starts were low last year and will probably not increase much this year. One now needs a family income of $32,000 a year to get a mortgage on a standard house. Also, if we include those who are so discouraged that they do not even bother to register with the unemployment office, there are at least one million jobless in this country. What is even worse is that we are entering an age where technology threatens thousands of workers most of whom do not have the skills required to go from a job that automation made obsolete to another one which resulted from automation.

Bankruptcy for a small business, Mr. Speaker, is not merely a matter of statistics, it affects men and women who devoted their lives and invested their money to build something and who suddenly see their hopes shattered. When a farmer must give up his land because he can no longer meet his bank payments, not only does this constitute a crime against a world hungry for all that we can produce, but it is also a case where a family becomes uprooted and where often a way of life, handed down from generation to generation, based on the love of the land ceases to exist.

[English]

When a young couple finds that saving every available cent will not get them a home, or where renewing a mortgage means finding $300 more per month that one does not have, it is not just an economic problem. It means that families who came to this country believing that Canada was a place in which they could get ahead if they were prepared to work begin to question the promise of Canada. If you are a telephone operator, an insurance clerk, an auto worker, or a worker in any other industry where technology and machines are replacing people, you cannot avoid asking yourself if your job is next and, even more troubling, what you will do with work skills society does not seem to need any more. Those are the real economic issues of Canada because they are the issues which directly touch the lives of Canadians. Of course the problems are complex. Governments are elected to resolve complex problems. The minister says, "It is so difficult I will not do anything". If the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) were Noah, he would say, "I will not build an ark because it is raining too hard".

The minister is protected against the consequences of his do-nothing policy. He is protected by his comfortable minister's salary and by the complacency of being too long in office. The people he was elected to care about are not protected, and the people he used to pretend to care about are not protected.

The government came into office by being against an 18-cent per gallon increase in the cost of gasoline and they have since raised the price 52 cents per gallon. Now the minister says that Canadians should absorb that increase and pay for it out of money he claims they have. Where does the minister think all this loose money is in the budget of the average Canadian family? It is not in their housing budgets with mortgage rates at 18 per cent. It is not in their food budgets with food costs up 15 per cent from a year ago. It will not come out of rising incomes because the government's own statistics show that incomes have been declining in real terms for the last few years.

The only economic policy to come from this government has been to hurt people who need help. The government's major economic initiative has been the national energy policy, which is driving Canadian jobs and Canadian investment out of Canada. Instead of building on energy, the Liberal government is crippling what could be the single strongest growth factor in our economy.

Its other initiative is to blame it all on Bouey, to pretend that the government is not responsible for economic policy, it is just the Bank of Canada. If the minister were more honest, he would admit that he is only taking half the advice of the Bank of Canada. He accepts that part of the bank's advice which is hard on people, but he ignores that part of the bank's advice which requires sacrifice by his own government. Governor Bouey has often made it clear that it is very difficult for him to dampen credit demand if the country's largest creditor, the federal government, continues to make massive borrowings to finance its deficits. That is exactly what the minister is doing. Canada's economic situation is the following: we have no Minister of Finance and we have only half of Gerald Bouey.

[Translation]

The minister—who, incidentally, has become the invisible man—is faced with two very simple alternatives. He can live up to the economic challenge and start to show the leadership that the nation expects of him, or else he can resign as we asked yesterday. If he stays on as a minister, he must without delay introduce a budget, not in the fall, but before the end of this session. He has held his portfolio for nearly 15 months and he has not yet clearly explained his economic policy to the country.

It is essential that we have a budget, and in this budget the minister must deal with two basic issues. First, he must attack squarely the issue of inflation, especially as concerns the current interest rates, which have reached a record high. If the minister believes that his monetary policy is inadequate, time has come to change it. I say his policy because there is no doubt that, in his capacity as Minister of Finance, he has the last word and the ultimate responsibility regarding monetary issues such as interest rates. He cannot hide behind the Governor of the Bank of Canada.

On the other hand, if the minister believes that his present policy of high interest rates remains the most appropriate for Canada, he must act accordingly and heed the advice of the Bank of Canada, which is to reduce the federal deficit. If he wants to maintain his policy of high interest rates, his budget must provide assistance for the Canadians who are the hardest hit by a double-digit inflation. The minister says that he does not have much room to manoeuvre. We faced the same dilemma when we came to power and inherited the financial mess created by hon. members opposite during the last decade. But we took our responsibilities; we made the hard decisions which were required; the Crosbie budget contained proposals designed to help low and medium income Canadians.

This must become a priority in the Minister's budget. It is about time for him and the government to start saying to Canadians how they expect our economy to develop in the coming decade, and especially how they expect to provide employment opportunities and employment security for Canadians in the eighties.

● (1540)

[English]

Mr. Speaker, three great tasks await us if we want to give to Canadians the kind of economic future that this country is capable of. First, we have to produce enough jobs, at least 1.5 million new jobs over the next four years, if we are to make a reasonable dent in the rate of unemployment, if we are to absorb new entrants into the labour force and if we are to provide alternate employment to women and others who are displaced by advanced technology.

Second, we must create the right kind of jobs. We do not need make-work programs which offer marginal pay today and no future tomorrow. We need jobs in the growth industries of the future, the kind of rewarding jobs which excite people and which they know will exist and grow in the years to come. In this country we have the potential to create those kinds of jobs. We have industries, electronics, transportation, northern development, oceanography, as well as energy and food. These are the kinds of industries where we can be among the leaders of the world if we have strong national leadership and effective programs to support our own companies. It is time we began receiving that leadership from this government and seeing those programs emanating from it.

Finally, we must ensure that Canadians who need jobs have the skills and training necessary to qualify for the opportunities we create. We are facing a mammoth problem in that regard. Among our current unemployed we have literally hundreds of thousands of Canadians who simply lack the skills needed to qualify for anything but the most marginal and menial kinds of jobs. The problem will get worse. A recent conference reported that as many as one million women could lose their current jobs during the 1980s to advanced technology. There are estimates that in the auto industry alone as many as 20 per cent of the existing jobs could be lost to automation.

We are dealing with an economic crisis today which was created over the last ten years. This government can do much more for Canadians in need. Its flexibility is limited by the deficits of John Turner, Donald Macdonald and past Liberal ministers. But just as the lack of economic courage in the past created problems today, the lack of economic courage today will create problems for the future of Canada. The nature of jobs in Canada is changing. Many traditional jobs will no longer exist. Many people now working will see their jobs lost to technology. Much of the training available to Canadians today is looking backward rather than forward. We have to build job security for the future. That must start now, and it can only start with federal leadership.

[Translation]

When we were in power, we made plans for a conference on economic development in Winnipeg to be held in February of last year. I therefore find it most regrettable that this government should not have shown any real interest in pursuing the matter any further. I deplore the arrogant way in which the Prime Minister has turned down the constructive proposal made by the Premier of Ontario that the first ministers meet to discuss the economic challenges of the nation. A responsible national government would not have missed such a great opportunity of finding a solution in consultation with the provinces.

The new budget must come to grips with today's urgent problems, but it must also, and without delay, provide measures capable of guaranteeing Canadians security of employment in the years to come. If nothing is done now, not only will all Canadians suffer but there may also be two specific categories of victims: young people and women. Our young people need new training to be able to tackle the jobs of tomorrow. Women who want to join the labour market or acquire new skills are in need of better opportunities, better orientation and better incentives. We must give priority to jobs which will make it possible for our women, our young people and other Canadians to contemplate with confidence a secure future on the labour market.

We have here, in Canada, the energy, the food and the other resources we need to develop fully. We also have an industrial base which can cope more and more with international competition. Our labour force is young, well trained and dedicated. In spite of their current preoccupations, the uncertainty and the apprehension which they must face today, Canadians still have faith in their country. What they need is leadership and this they expect from their national leaders. They can meet the challenges today if they are assured of a better future.

[English]

The government has been ignoring its economic responsibility. It has been driving Canadians into bankruptcy, despair and anger. It has been abandoning its responsibilities to help Canadians prepare for a future which will be profoundly changed but which can be profoundly promising for this country if we have the wisdom and the courage to seize that future. We have been following the Prime Minister's personal priorities for six months now in the House of Commons. It is time to give the priorities of the people of Canada a chance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: It is time for this government to put aside its preoccupation and to realize that there is a country which wants to build, that there are people who want to be free of the burdens of economic policy placed upon them by this government and that there are individuals who are prepared to go out and work to build a secure future for the country. This must be recognized by the government. The place to start is with a new budget—soon, before the end of June. We must not wait again, ducking behind other elements of policy as was done the last time. We need a new national budget but, most important, we need a new commitment by this government, a commitment which recognizes that the people of Canada have priorities too and that those are priorities which have been ignored. These priorities can no longer be ignored.

Our country was built upon respect for individuals who were prepared to go forward and make a mark for themselves. This government is making that more difficult every day. We live in a country which can become one of the strongest nations in the world if we are prepared to use our resources and take account of the changing world of work. This government must give some kind of leadership. That can come only if there is a willingness on the part of the government to put its personal priorities behind and to adopt and confront the priorities of the people of Canada. That is what this motion urges the government to do. We devoutly hope that it will act on that, that it will bring in a budget, that it will begin to pay attention to the problems and to the immense potential of the people of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, before I make my comments on the motion before us I wish to make one observation. We have before us a motion moved by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) in the Parliament of Canada which deals with an important subject. I have learned that not only will the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) not be replying, but neither will the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) involve himself in this debate. I could understand the situation if one or the other was not participating. In most parliaments of the western world, as a normal matter of courtesy if the leader of the opposition or his equivalent was leading off the debate then the prime minister of the country would be there to participate. If that is not possible I would suggest that at the very least it is incumbent upon the Minister of Finance to reply to the Leader of the Opposition on a subject matter which is of profound concern to the people of Canada.

Mr. MacEachen: I spoke yesterday.

Mr. Broadbent: The Minister of Finance says he spoke yesterday.

Mr. MacEachen: It is the same argument.

● (1550)

Mr. Broadbent: Well, the minister should know. The minister is now saying it is the same argument. I listened to the Leader of the Opposition with care. I want to say on behalf of my colleagues that there is much in what the Leader of the Opposition had to say with which we would agree.

Mr. MacEachen: But the hon. member was not here yesterday. Where was the hon. member yesterday?

Mr. Broadbent: Even the Minister of Finance knows that the argument which he has made is absurd. I am exercising my responsibility in speaking today.

Mr. MacEachen: Don't lecture today!

Mr. Broadbent: I am saying through you, Mr. Speaker, to the Minister of Finance, that if the government had any respect for Parliament, and particularly for the people of Canada, it would be responding to today's question, which is the call for a new budget. That is a serious question and it is not responding to it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: However, it reflects the attitude of the government. I do not object to the concerns which the government has had with the Constitution as that is, indeed, an important matter. However, we in this House all know the Prime Minister has shown no interest or concern with the question of economics since he became Prime Minister of this country. That is demonstrated by his response today, and more particularly by the government's over-all response by having neither himself nor the Minister of Finance enter into this important debate.

I now want to turn to the specific subject matter. At the root of the government's lack of policy is its commitment to the perpetuation of a myth which has been established, at this point in the twentieth century, not only in Canada with the present government but also in the United States of America and in Great Britain; that is the myth that in dealing with inflation a government should adopt a policy that forces up the cost of everything we buy and almost everything we consume.

In short, the high interest rate policy which is being pursued by this government is exactly the same in its effects on people as would be an admonition to a drowning man that he would be saved if we only made the water just a bit deeper. That is the kind of economic brilliance this government is displaying in the pursuit of its high interest rate policy.

The experience of Margaret Thatcher in the United Kingdom, or that of President Carter and his successor, President Reagan, in the United States, and the previous experience of Liberal administrations and that of the Leader of the Opposition, ought to have shown this government that rather than curbing inflation or reducing the cost of living, a high interest rate policy does just the opposite.

I want to come back and deal with some proposals. The kinds of suggestions we are making, contrary to what the Minister of Finance has said in his blanket condemnation about opposition suggestions being inflationary, would have quite the opposite effect. I hope he changes his mind and participates in this debate soon.

Now that we are in a situation where workers are in their fourth year in a row with a decline in the standard of living, when we are now at almost 12.5 per cent inflation, when just this afternoon we heard that we have set a record in Canadian history for interest rates, I would like to ask, when is it going to end?

The general situation has not been described better than in words which were uttered not long ago in the House of Commons, and I would like to quote them as they relate to the effects of this kind of high interest rate policy, because I think that that is the core of the current problem. It is by no means the whole problem, as I will indicate later. This is what was said just a while ago in the House of Commons:

> The present record level of interest rates, ... cuts back the ability of Canadians to buy goods and services of all kinds—cars, homes, food and clothing, everything people need. These high interest rates cut back the ability of factories and businesses generally to expand, to create more production and jobs. These high interest rates limit the ability of business, especially small business, simply to operate at basic non-inflationary levels. Therefore these high interest rates mean losses of production and jobs now and over the coming winter months.
> The Conservative government has been saying that these high interest rates are needed to fight inflation, but they in themselves drive up costs and add to inflation. All this has been demonstrated by the jump in the cost of living—

Then of one full point.

> —obviously incorporating increases in costs due to increases in interest rates. The government has allowed these increases to go into effect in the period since it has been in office.

These words which, as I say, are quite accurate as a general description of the high interest rate policy and its impact on our kind of economy, were uttered by the present Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) when he was finance critic for the Liberal party when they were in opposition. The point is that what the minister said when he was in opposition is just as true today as it was in 1979, and just as the high interest rate policy did more harm than good then, it does so now. Just as it was an inappropriate policy when it was pursued by the Conservatives, so, too, is it an inappropriate policy which is being pursued by the Liberals.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: I want to ask: When is the message finally going to get home to the government? When is it going to abandon an intellectual commitment to an ossified theory—this absurd preoccupation with monetarism which is now as deeply embedded in the Government of Canada as it is in the government of the United Kingdom and in the government of the United States?

Are we going to wait until the number of families which have to abandon their homes reaches 1,100 a month instead of 1,000? Are we going to wait until a record number of small businessmen have to organize and come to demonstrate on Parliament Hill? Are we going to wait until thousands of additional farmers have to abandon their herds because they cannot meet the interest rate level needed to maintain their existence? Workers have become exasperated with the fact that their living standards have declined three years in a row, so that on the average they have lost $35 a week in real disposable income. Will this loss have to increase to $40 or $50 a week before they must literally organize some riots to force the government to act?

Will the poor finally organize? We just learned, in what I consider to be a very moving and deeply disturbing report not many days ago, that the people who are disproportionately affected by high interest rate charges are the poor. As the people responsible for the study indicated, the poor are more deeply in debt, not because they are buying coloured television sets or taking holidays in Florida or anywhere else, but because they are buying the necessities of life. Are the poor finally going to have to get exasperated, come to Ottawa and force this government to act?

The point is that this MacEachen monetary madness must stop; the people of Canada will have to rise up and force the government to abandon this policy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: The motion before the House calls for a new budget, and we agree. The other day and also in the past our financial critic, on behalf of our party, outlined a number of measures which would be appropriate in a new budget, not simply to deal with the question of inflation, but to deal with the long-range structural problem of the Canadian economy which must be dealt with if we are to have full employment.

Today I want to deal with those measures, specifically in the context of dealing with the question of inflation in a serious way. I hope the government will have the honesty today to do what it did not do yesterday in the debate: that is, to reply to the points which are made; not to sit there in arrogant indifference while listening to what is being said on this side of the House, but to take on the arguments. If our arguments are shown to be wrong, we will admit they are wrong. However, we want this serious matter dealt with in a serious way.

Before going to three of four very specific suggestions on how to deal with inflation, I must say that although I have indicated my party agrees with some of the suggestions which the official opposition has made in terms of dealing with inflation, there is one matter on which we frankly cannot accept any criticism from their corner, and that is the interest rate policy itself.

The Leader of the Opposition should know better than anyone else in the House of Commons, perhaps, in spite of his own criticism as Leader of the Opposition before he became prime minister, that when he was in office interest rates not only went up one, two or three times, but more than that. So when it comes to interest rate policy, neither we nor anyone else has to listen to the Conservative Party of Canada. However, I want to put that aside. The Liberal party is the government of the day and it has the responsibility to deal with the important matter before us.

I now want to suggest three or four specific ways of dealing particularly with the pervasive problem of inflation. In so doing, I repeat that I want to see the government put up or shut up today and to respond to the arguments. More than respond to the arguments, I would like to see the government act on them if it agrees with them.

• (1600)

First is the question of interest rates. I have already said that the evidence is overwhelmingly clear to everyone, except someone who gets so rigidly locked into some economic theory that he decides to lock out all the evidence, that the increase in interest rates has not resulted at all in a reduction of the cost of living but has had the opposite effect.

What do we say should be done? We are saying that instead of sitting back and responding in a knee-jerk reaction to what takes place in the United States in terms of interest rates, we should move in the opposite direction. At his regular meetings with the Governor of the Bank of Canada, or by telephone, the Minister of Finance should make it clear that he expects the Bank of Canada to start moving immediately, step by step, in the direction of a reduced interest rate policy in order to bring interest rates down to roughly the level of inflation in Canada. We think that would work.

I want to say to the Minister of Finance that if there is a run on the dollar or if there is a concern about a flow of money south of the border in the short run, then certain action could be taken. We do not withdraw from the suggestion of a form of exchange controls. The minister should know better than anyone else that some form of exchange controls has been put in place by many countries in western Europe and by the United States. In fact, the administration of John F. Kennedy in 1963 and that of Richard Nixon in the early 1970s introduced special measures to deal with the problem of the outflow of capital. They showed a little more imagination than has been demonstrated by the Government of Canada. When President Kennedy was in office he introduced for a limited period of time a special tax intended to discourage the outflow of capital. That practice was duplicated almost a decade later by President Nixon.

I say to the Minister of Finance that it is hardly a radical idea and hardly a profound change. Some countries in Europe and also the United States have done this. I repeat, this party does not back away from a little innovation. If we need a limited form of control to deal with a possible export of capital, then the New Democratic Party says, "Let's do it if it benefits the people of Canada".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: A second area in which the government could act is in the domain of energy prices, on certain aspects of prices. It could consider seriously the government study done over many years which showed that the oil companies had been ripping off consumers from 1958 to 1973 to the tune of $500 for every man, woman and child in Canada. We all know that this has gone on to an equal or greater degree since.

What is an appropriate response to this? I see the Minister of Finance has been joined by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) who obstensibly is going to reply. They are sitting there giggling over the situation. I should like them to consider the argument again. The argument is that if there is a report which shows that the oil companies have gouged the people of Canada by $500 per citizen over that period of time and which makes recommendations on how to lower energy costs, why would the Liberal government not act if it is concerned about the impact of energy prices on the people of Canada?

In our view, the following suggestions are workable. First of all, by a price reduction of a few cents per gallon the government could order a reduction at the retail outlet level in the price of petroleum to compensate the Canadian consumer for that great loss. I speak not only of the consumer buying gasoline for his or her car but also of the consumer buying fuel to heat his home. A price reduction which was aimed at getting back for the consumer that money which has been gouged from him would make sense and would reduce the cost of living.

As the study pointed out, one of the major reasons for the excess profits or charges was the multinational structure which enabled Exxon Corporation to overcharge Imperial Oil which, as the price leader in the market in Canada, in turn passed on excess prices to the people of Canada. There is a solution to that problem as well, and that is to do what other countries have done with state-owned oil companies, and that is in our case to make Petro-Canada the exclusive importer. Prices passed on to all retail outlets in Canada could be passed on at a reduced level. I repeat, that is a practical suggestion that would not be inflationary.

Let me deal with one other aspect of energy costs. We now subsidize the price of energy in Atlantic Canada but we do nothing for people who live in our northern regions. People have to pay higher prices in all northern communities across Canada. We recommend that there should be a slight fuel subsidy for northern Canadians in order to bring the price of gasoline and home heating fuel in northern communities across the land down to the average national level. So much for energy prices, Mr. Speaker. I repeat, I do not think that suggestion is inflationary at all; it is non-inflationary and would help reduce the cost of living.

Now I come to high prices. We have said that the government has constitutional authority to act now to establish a fair prices commission to administer key prices in the economy. This is not a revolutionary idea. The Prime Minister misled the House a while ago when he said that the government did not have that authority. That is absurd. It has the same constitutional authority to do in practice what it did when it brought in a wage control program a few years ago. This time we say that it should do something to act on behalf of workers instead of against them.

A fair prices commission would act in a flexible way. It could force reductions where price increases occurred that were unjustified in terms of reasonable profit margins. It would not take action, obviously, against all price increases. Again, this is not an inflationary kind of government response.

My next proposal is a tax reduction to assist average and low-income people. As I suggested in two election campaigns, and as our finance critic mentioned yesterday in the House and before that in previous debates, if this were complemented with serious tax reform that would deal with the banks' excess profits, tax loopholes for the corporate sector and for private individuals, there could be this kind of tax reduction which would help poor people cope with inflation without increasing the debt of Canada at all.

Another item is housing. Of all the countries in the world that ought to have established adequate housing as a right for its people, surely Canada ought to have been doing that a long time ago. Instead of seeing 1,000 families per month having to abandon their houses, we should be seeing 1,000 families moving into new housing. It is only because of the government's inaction in this regard that we do not see housing established as a universal right, like medicare, in Canada.

What would we do? Instead of CMHC buying up houses that people have had to abandon and then selling them at a loss, we would at least take steps to extend mortgages to enable people to maintain their homes instead of abandoning them. Beyond that, we would say that in a country that produces lumber in the way we do and which still has more than one million workers unemployed, instead of failing to spend the CMHC budget on non-profit and co-op housing, we should deal with the needs of renters in Canada and the needs of people who desire co-op housing by significantly expanding these budgets to ensure that housing is available. That would deal with job creation, and in the not so long run would increase the supply of housing and have the effect of driving down the price of housing as well.

There is something which characterizes these few points I have made. First, in our view they are not inflationary. Second, they would have the effect of reducing costs in a serious, tangible way for ordinary Canadians. Third—and this is the reason I suggest we get no action from the government, from the Liberals and as well from the Conservatives—the kinds of proposals I have advocated here are objectionable not because they are inflationary but because they require, on the one hand, taking action against the banks or oil companies in a tough-minded way, which those two parties do not like to do, or they would require a more activist government in the economy. That really gets at the nub of it.

Whether we talk about a fair prices commission, expansion in the housing sector or the government's having a deepening role in the energy sector, all of these points mean the kind of thing that François Mitterand represents in France today, that Helmut Schmidt represents in Germany today, and Olaf Palme will represent when he is returned as prime minister of Sweden in an election that will probably take place next month. They reflect a social democratic philosophy which says that government activity of itself is not evil. I say to the Minister of Finance that it was government activity which moved this country into medicare, took it out of the market system, and did the same earlier with pensions. We are saying in these sectors of the economy that we need a little more government involvement. That is not bad.

I see, Mr. Speaker, you are getting to your feet. I will conclude in one minute. Just as the people of Canada accepted government involvement in pensions and the government establishment of medicare, so too in dealing with a crisis economy the people of Canada would accept the kind of innovative government action I am advocating here today.

If I have the patience of the House, and I see you are getting to your feet, Mr. Speaker, I will conclude with one observation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I think probably hon. members will accord the Leader of the New Democratic Party the extra moment, but the Chair is in a bit of an awkward position. I have allowed the hon. member to go way past his time. Is there consent for the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Broadbent: I appreciate the extra time, Mr. Speaker; I will not abuse the courtesy.

I want to conclude with the following observation. When the Conservatives were in power for a brief period of time, the Liberals had a saying about the Conservatives. They said the people of Canada had a non-government. With the deception that has been inflicted upon the people of Canada by the Liberals since they have come back to office, with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) and the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin), to name two, promising certain things to the people of Canada and their systematically being denied implementation by the Minister of Finance, we have replaced a "non-government" with what can only be described as a "con government". That is what we have today.

The people of Canada do not want a non-government and certainly do not want a con government. They want an honest and direct government which will deal with their real problems in a way that will be both effective and just. That is precisely what we are proposing.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity to participate in this debate. I feel badly that the Leader of the New Democratic Party has a sense of outrage that his fresh participation is not being responded to by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). I remind him that the Minister of Finance has now spent a full two days in this House dealing with the debate. We are very pleased to welcome the Leader of the New Democratic Party and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) to this debate for the first time. We are very pleased to have them here. It is nice to have them drop in on us like this. It is nice to have them show that for 30 minutes or so they are able to take some time out of their travelling arrangements to drop into the House of Commons to discuss this very important topic.

We certainly share many of the concerns that are being raised in the economic questions that are being posed in this debate. The Leader of the Opposition is a little wrong, as he often is, in describing this as the first time this government has come to grips with the economic issue. If he had spent more time in the House or spent a little more time calculating what went on, he would realize that we have spent more time in this session of Parliament debating economic matters than we have matters concerning the Constitution. His own obsession and preoccupation with his losing cause in the Constitution is no reason to judge other people by what he sees in his own reflection. The fact is we have spent a good deal of time and have taken a number of significant and important initiatives in coming to grips with the economic conditions being faced in Canada.

Unlike members opposite, we do not pretend we have the magic solution, the simple panaceas. That is one of the luxuries that can be afforded by the perpetual state of opposition in which hon. ladies and gentlemen opposite find themselves. They do not have to deal with the responsibility of making tough choices and coming to grips with the realities. They can concoct their own realities and develop their own mythology. They have become the great myth machine in Canada in trying to describe an economic landscape which simply is not there.

This is why it is important that we have the opportunity to try to clarify what kinds of real conditions do exist and the kinds of initiatives that we in this country are putting forward as ways of responding to them. These are real issues and real solutions, not the fantasy-like island which the Leader of the Opposition has been on for so long. It is not the kind of ideological rigidity of the framework in which the Leader of the New Democratic Party exists, with answers or solutions simply being drawn from age old, traditional orthodoxies upon which they solely exist because any sense of innovation is totally lacking.

I remind the Leader of the Opposition that one mythology he would be very wise to overcome is the feeling on his part that he was defeated a year and a half ago. He was not defeated, he defeated himself.

One of the ironies is that we have a group opposite talking to us about how we should be more realistic in looking at economic figures. They could not even add up the number of members they had in the House of Commons on December 13, a year and a half ago. If they cannot add up to 282, I suggest it places in some doubt their ability to deal with numbers that are a little more complicated and perhaps more complex.

We in Canada have to face the fact that the economic landscape is changing. The terrain we have to traverse is not as it was ten years ago, or even two or three years ago. There are a number of significant economic changes taking place. No one has a clear road map as to what the precise direction must be.

Every country in the industrialized world, in fact every country around the world, is searching for those kinds of solutions. I would hope that we would use this debate for a mutual search for solutions, not for acrimony, not for the kind of adversarial nonsense that we hear, but for a genuine attempt to find what kind of leadership can be given, not just from the government sector but from the private sector as well. Because this is a responsibility shared by all sectors of the economy. This is not something which we can provide for the villains of the piece. It does not fit some morality play. It will require the full involvement and contribution of businessmen, labour people, and government officials at all levels to come to grips with these kinds of questions. That is what we are trying to do, to develop a series of signals that will provide the kind of direction which other major actors and players in this economy can follow.

The first thing we have to understand is that there are parts of the economy that we must assess as being at the present time positive, useful and constructive. The Leader of the Opposition is still reading old speeches. He has not quite been able to update his material yet. He is like an old actor who simply repeats the same old lines.

The fact of the matter is that when he concentrates on matters of employment creation in this country there is no doubt, by every indicator that is available, that the economic performance of this country far surpasses that of any other country in the industrial world. We have created 346,000 jobs in one year. To try to pretend that somehow that fact does not exist, that it is not a fact of life, simply means that the Leader of the Opposition has either forgotten to read or refuses to face reality. In fact, they do the economy of this country a disservice by constantly conjuring up these images of 1.5 million unemployed. The figures speak for themselves. They are there in black and white. The unemployment rate is down to 7 per cent, the best record since 1976. The growth rate of employment is 3.3 per cent, which far surpasses that of the United States, West Germany and Great Britain.

Let us talk for a minute about Great Britain. I have heard members opposite talk with a great deal of pride and admiration about the remarkable economic theories of their counterparts in Great Britain. We have heard the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) talk with great enthusiasm about the magic solutions of Margaret Thatcher. I will tell the House what those magic solutions have created. They have created an unemployment rate of 11 per cent in Great Britain, a full four points higher than we have in this country. If we followed the sort of musings of the Conservative party, the kind of admonition they have raised that we should follow the example of Great Britain, then we would have several hundreds of thousands of additional Canadians out of work. In fact, if we followed the admonitions that were put forward in the Crosbie budget, we would have more Canadians out of work than there are right now.

We were not prepared to adopt the savage-like cuts that would have created an enormous sort of recessionary impulse in this country and put Canadians out of work. We were not prepared to follow the kind of exorbitant and extravagant oil prices which again would have thrown the economy out of kilter and created unemployment for Canadians. The fact of the matter is that we all have to face the reality of rising oil prices, but to bring them in in the kind of cold turkey fashion the member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) prophesied a year and a half ago would have given enormous jolts to the economy of this country, something we were not prepared to accept, which in turn led the Canadian people, in their judgment, to adopt our proposals.

If we look at oil pricing—and this really is one of the major inflationary pushes—we realize that if you increase the price of oil by 100 per cent, that will add almost a full 10 percentage points to the inflation rate. What would have happened if we had followed the Conservative oil pricing policy is that we would have had substantially higher oil prices. In our estimation we would have had an additional 100,000 people out of work.

An hon. Member: Don't be so stupid.

Mr. Axworthy: If we were to accept the proposals of the spokespeople on the Conservative side, we know what kind of repercussions would have been created, particularly by their budgetary policies, by the slashing savagery the former President of the Treasury Board was advocating.

While we are on the subject, Mr. Speaker, I know the Leader of the Opposition has a wonderful sort of theory about the community of communities in Canada. He is the great defender of provincial rights in this House. He is the individual who says, let the provinces do it, we do not need an effective national government.

An hon. Member: He never said that.

Mr. Axworthy: Let us give more and more to the provincial governments; let us pass over power, let us transfer—

Mr. Clark: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I recognize the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition on a point of order.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, we can put up with a surfeit of absurdity from the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy), but I think even he will realize that he exceeded his own standards in that last comment. He can find nowhere in the record, nowhere in my conduct and nowhere in any of my public activities in Canada any suggestion that I want anything other than a national community in which there is strength at the centre and strength in the parts. The difference between him and me is that I also want to have a country that is united instead of a country as deeply divided as his government's policies have divided this nation.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Speaker, we understand the tolerance for absurdity in the Conservative party as we witnessed at the last convention just how much absurdity they are prepared to accept and continue with.

An hon. Member: Tell us about your leadership convention.

Mr. Axworthy: I do not know if the Leader of the Opposition is really serious, but if he looked at the Gallup poll that showed 80 per cent of Canadians felt that the proposals in our constitutional position were adding to the unity of this country, he might do some rethinking about his own absurd positions which he has adopted in this House over the past six months.

I would also like to say to him, Mr. Speaker, this great defender of transferring resources to provincial governments, combined with the kind of position taken by his colleagues in saying that it is this government that is responsible, that he should take one look, if he can spend his time away from his defence of his position amongst his colleagues, at the real facts and figures. He might then realize that over the last year the big spenders in this country, the people who added to the growth of government, were not those at the federal level. We had a 1.5 per cent growth rate of public employees. It was those provincial governments which he defends that added 14 per cent to the growth of public employees in Canada. When this government asks for more authority to manage the national economy, it is because we need to provide for a greater degree of control and management of a national scheme so as not to allow that fragmentation, of which he is an advocate, which would permit the economy to get out of shape and out of whack.

I think it is worth talking about some of the positions put forward by the NDP in this area. They talk about their solutions to the problems. Perhaps one of the most inflationary positions we face is that their supply of solutions far exceeds the demand. They are simply out of date on this. They say they are prepared to accept foreign exchange controls. Let us just ask what the result of that might be for a moment. Let us put the case to Canadians as to what the result of a falling dollar and foreign exchange controls might be.

First, there is the whole question of policing. Perhaps the experience the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) might want to examine is that of other countries who have foreign exchange controls and the wide variety of schemes and gimmicks that are used to get around those controls. The fact of the matter is that the primary beneficiaries of foreign exchange controls are the large financial institutions which he does not like. It is the Canadian consumer, the small person, who suffers under exchange controls, because he is the one who does not have the sophistication to find the tools with which they can slice their money.

I think it would be useful for the Leader of the New Democratic Party to examine that particular proposal he is making. I am afraid he would end up hurting the very people he wants to help, and he would hurt them even more by a falling dollar. Because the immediate result of that would not be to cut into the economic growth of this country, because we are already at virtually full capacity; what would happen—

An hon. Member: We are not at full capacity.

Mr. Axworthy: What would happen is that we would import inflation to this country. We would import inflation to this country through the kinds of proposals put forward by the Leader of the New Democratic Party.

An hon. Member: Don't talk such nonsense.

Mr. Axworthy: If that is the kind of proposal he wants, then I am prepared to—

Mr. Broadbent: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The minister, among his continuing series of distortions, even managed to exceed himself by a gross untruth, inadvertent I am sure. He just said we are operating at full capacity. I wonder if he would demonstrate his knowledge of economics by telling us what capacity the Canadian economy is operating at now, and is he defining that as full capacity?

Mr. Axworthy: The fact of the matter is, Mr. Speaker, that if the Leader of the NDP paid less attention to the response of other people and paid a little more attention to the comments we are making, he would realize that we have had in the past year an employment growth rate of 3.3 per cent, amounting to the creation of 346,000 additional jobs, which far exceeds the record of any other economy in the western world.

If he looks at manufacturing, mining and industrial processing, he will find that we are virtually bumping up against our capacity to produce. One of the real discussions we should be having in this House is with respect to the issue of how to deal with the bottlenecks in our economy. How can we come to grips with the shortages of skilled workers which are developing? How do we deal with capital supply? Again what the Leader of the New Democratic Party forgets, with his peculiar economic theory, is that foreign exchange controls would have a very severe repercussion on the capital flows into this country which are required for investment in new mines, new machinery, new factories and new plants. In other words, his particular nostrum or panacea is restricting growth, imposing higher costs on consumers and developing another way of providing advantages to the very wealthy financial institutions in this country which can move their money around at ease. The small, average Canadian cannot do that. That would be the result of the policies put forward by the Leader of the New Democratic Party.

I think it useful in this economic debate that we talk about some of the proposals we have put forward. I think the Leader of the Opposition referred to the areas of employment and training as being areas where leadership is required. I suggest that that is exactly what we have been providing. While the Leader of the Opposition has been involved in the protection and defence of his own political position, he somehow has not been recognizing what has been put forward as a series of initiatives to deal with employment and training in order to provide workers with greater skills and provide greater opportunities for women and native people to obtain the skills they need.

I would like to take a minute, if I might, to talk about leadership in coming to grips with the structural problems of the labour market and responding to the need for new training. We have just finished signing a series of agreements with major industrial groups in Canada regarding aerospace, shipbuilding, mining, coal mining and construction so as to develop planning arrangements, human resource planning and skill training arrangements to enable us to work in total co-operation and in conjunction with major industrial sectors. This will enable us to have a clear assessment of their human resource needs, so that we can apply new training programs to their needs and introduce affirmative action programs to ensure equality of opportunity for those who have been excluded from the labour force.

We signed one agreement yesterday with the aerospace industry. Tomorrow I will be signing one with the shipbuilding industry. We are making those kinds of agreements in order to come to grips with the very problems identified by the Leader of the Opposition.

We have introduced a new training program for women in non-traditional work. That program has been greeted with a great deal of support. It is now providing the opportunity for women to move into fields such as pipefitting, machinery and welding. These are areas from which women have long been excluded. That is a program that is now being adopted across this country.

We have just introduced a new program to help the physically handicapped obtain their first jobs. That is a $52 million program which the Leader of the Opposition has not come across.

We introduced in the budget of the Minister of Finance the industrial adjustment program, which is an innovative way of dealing with the problems of industrial change and industrial obsolescence. We will now provide direct assistance to workers who are displaced from their jobs because the factories at which they were employed no longer produce products which are needed. That program is now available in five communities and will be available in others. That is one way by which we work together with local businessmen, labour people and provincial government officials to come to grips with the problems of industrial change and adjustment. That again is an example of how we are trying to take a comprehensive and cohesive approach to developing better skills in this country.

We have introduced employment programs which have shifted the resources of this government to help those who have the greatest difficulty in the workplace. We have introduced for the first time an affirmative action program in our own public service to provide leadership in the hiring of women, disabled people and native people in this country. We have worked out a number of new agreements respecting large megaprojects so that they will provide greater assistance to natives to find employment and training opportunities. At the same time we have provided an additional native training assistance program.

For one year I think that is not a bad record. It begins to show that we have put into place a number of new programs. We believe those programs in themselves are not enough, and we must take a still much broader approach to the problem. That is one reason this government recommended the establishment of a parliamentary task force, which will be reporting in a month or so. The task force has spent a full six or seven months crossing Canada, consulting Canadians and coming up with solutions to the very employment and training programs the Leader of the Opposition was so concerned about.

My own department has been working and developing new data analyses and will be coming forward with a statement in a matter of three or four weeks putting forward a number of recommendations which we hope to use in consultation with the provinces and the private sector to provide for a full range of new solutions to the labour market problems of the 1980s.

We believe that one of the most effective ways of dealing with inflation in this country is to tackle the bottlenecks in the economy, to look at where shortages exist and to develop responses which are effective and useful. However, we recognize that solutions cannot be adopted unilaterally. We cannot conjure up solutions from a magician's hat. We cannot pull answers out of some old Fabian pamphlet the Leader of the New Democratic Party carries around. The answers must be based on up-to-date analyses and arrived at in full consultation with all the partners in the economy. They must be worked out in conjunction with those partners. We must obtain the co-operation of the trade unions with respect to changing practices and providing for greater mobility of workers in Canada so that they will go where the jobs are. We must work out, in co-operation with the industrial companies of this country, new training programs which provide, for the first time, a much higher degree of support in relation to the introduction of on-site industrial training programs. We must work out with the provinces an understanding of how we must change our training allocations, which are decided by provincial governments' in order to develop more up-to-date and relevant training opportunities for Canadians.

I suggest to this House and to Canadians that we are trying to provide real leadership in coming to grips with the structural problems of labour in this country and in providing the initiatives and innovations which will signal to other major actors in the Canadian economy solutions and answers to those kinds of problems. This indicates that we work in partnership and consultation and that we are prepared to work with all sectors of the Canadian economy in finding the solutions which are needed.

We are not here to pretend that somehow the economy of Canada can be changed overnight. It is a very painstaking and at times very difficult process to bring about real reform and change.

Mr. Stevens: How long do you need?

Mr. Axworthy: The fact of the matter is that in the first year we have put the building blocks in place. We have initiated programs. We have initiated the analyses and the consultations which are required. At the same time, I think it is true to our principles and philosophy that we have been prepared to accept and introduce those programs which would provide a cushion and a support for those in the economy who are hurt by inflation and who are sometimes the losers when other incomes go up. I remind hon. members that ours is one of the few countries in the industrial world which has an indexing of the income tax system. That program costs the treasury substantial amounts of money. It is very easy to point to the United States as an example, but the United States does not have the income tax index we do in this country. That provides a major degree of support for those Canadian consumers about whom we have heard so much. It provides us with the ability to keep taxes in line with incomes on an inflationary basis. I suggest that that is a very important support for the Canadian consumer.

We have also introduced supports in the area of helping older people through income supplement programs. That is a very necessary support for those who do not have incomes which rise as fast as the incomes of those who have unions working for them or those who are organized and have full wage opportunities.

We have provided for a degree of support in other areas in the economy. Individuals are being cushioned. Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation provides a non-profit housing program which is prepared to provide rental housing at interest rates of no more than 1 per cent or 2 per cent at the present moment. If hon. members do not think the minister responsible for housing is not crying about the fact that he cannot do more, he is, but that is a program which is one of the major suppliers of rental housing across Canada. The federal government is putting up capital to supply housing, whereas many of our provincial counterparts simply will not introduce comparable housing programs.

At the same time the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) has introduced programs to deal with price-fixing. He has examined the oil industry. He is providing answers. The Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Roberts) has introduced major programs to increase research spending in this country up to 22 per cent. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) has been able to obtain major advantages for medical research in this country. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) has provided for additional funding through DIP and other means in order to increase productivity.

Over the past year we have been trying to redress some of the serious and grievous errors made by the previous government, a government which cancelled all employment programs, a government which took no initiatives in training or in providing ability to develop new ideas and innovations. On the other hand, we have been trying to do this in the very real recognition that we have fiscal restraint. But we cannot go whole hog, as the Leader of the New Democratic Party wants us to do. We have to provide a balance between what we can spend and what we must do in terms of maintaining some hedge against inflation.

No one on this side has ever tried to say that what we are doing is absolutely perfect at all times. But we are making a good and effective effort. If members of this House would support the Minister of Finance in the kinds of proposals he is putting forward which are designed to cut into that inflationary cycle, to provide the bite for the kinds of cost increases we have, to provide for the kinds of incentives needed to gain the co-operation of the business community and to get the unions to start restraining their own demands, then I think we can begin to beat inflation in Canada.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—EFFECTS OF HIGH INTEREST RATES AND DOUBLE-DIGIT INFLATION

The House resumed consideration of the motion of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark):

That this House deplores the record high interest rates imposed on Canadians by the Liberal government which together with double-digit inflation and slow economic growth are causing acute hardship and human suffering for Canadians, and demands that the government immediately introduce a budget and implement other economic programs to address these urgent and pressing problems.

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) has chosen at this time to vacate the House. I was going to mention it was rather fortunate that three ministers of the Crown were here who I felt hold a tremendous responsibility for the plight in which we Canadians find ourselves. I refer, of course, to the emperor's triumverate. We have the 20 per cent kid, sometimes referred to as the Minister of Finance, who has decided to leave; we have Dr. Doolittle, sometimes referred to as the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray); and then we have old ironclad himself, sometimes referred to as the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde). I hope that the 20 per cent kid will, in due course, read my remarks and take to heart some of the things I am going to say.

I rise to participate in this debate at a time when our inflation level is approaching 14 per cent, when we have a prime interest rate of approximately 20 per cent, and when our dollar is literally limp in relation to the American dollar. I find it most strange that we have such a complacent, rather indifferent attitude on the part of the government to the problems which this nation is facing. In fact, it is worse than that. It is not just indifferent, it is a tendency to want to distort the facts, to mislead the public into thinking that what is in fact true today is somehow not the way it appears. Surely Mr. Speaker, you will recall only yesterday when the 20 per cent kid rose to speak on this subject, and as reported at page 9551 of Hansard said:

I am not ready to engage in a debate about the historic causes of inflation in this country.

Frankly, I do not blame the Minister of Finance for not wanting to get into that debate because I know he would agree how damning it is of his government's own record. Having said that, the minister went on to say the following, talking about governments: —especially in the early part of the seventies, were strongly pursuing expansionary policies and adding to their deficits, the public and all political parties generally supported that type of fiscal policy.

I was not here before 1972 but I have been in this House since 1972. I find it astounding that a minister of the Crown would stand up and mislead everyone, not only this House but the Canadian public, by suggesting that the deficit financing which Liberal governments engaged in during the 1970s was agreed to by all parties, because that is just not true. For four of those years I was financial spokesperson for the official opposition. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, and I know you will agree, that I repeatedly, on behalf of my party, pleaded with the government to come to its senses, to cut back on its spending and reduce its deficit. I did that because the country was falling into a pattern which was going to produce the same inflationary atmosphere in which we are now living.

It is one thing for the government to have made mistakes in the past, to have led us into the bewildering situation that we have today; but for the government now to be trying to create the impression that we did it all together, that we all agreed to the type of economic approach which has led to the present inflationary pressures, is totally untrue. It is not worthy of the Minister of Finance and I would ask him to withdraw that type of comment.

One might say that three years ago it was all right for the government to say, "Let us try this thing called gradualism which has been recommended by our officials. Let us try this process where we are told that if we allow interest rates to rise, somehow or another that will eventually dampen the economy and lower inflation." I can understand the government of the day accepting that kind of thinking. But at some point, surely, we have to ask when the experiment will end.

We should also conclude that if the remedy is wrong then it must be corrected. For example, in April, 1978, the chartered bank prime rate was 8.5 per cent. In fact, it had ranged from the 6.75 per cent to the 8.5 per cent level through November, 1970, to April, 1978. In short, we never had the type of interest rate structure during that period with which we are now living. In fact, right up to May, 1978, the rate was still 8.75 per cent. On May 30 it rose to 9 per cent.

Since May, 1978, under the inspiration of the present government, the prime rates of our chartered banks have risen from 8.75 per cent to the present 19.5 per cent. They have more than doubled. One would have thought that if the spirit or the theory behind gradualism and rising interest rates was to work and curb inflation, we would now be seeing the fruits of it. But we find that inflation in 1977, judged by the CPI, was 8 per cent; in 1978 it was 9 per cent; in 1979 it was 9.1 per cent; in 1980 it was 11.2 per cent; and currently it is running at 13.9 per cent on the minister's own admission. At least, that has been the rate since he brought in his last budget. Notwithstanding the interest rate explosion of rates doubling in that period, we also have an inflation level which has risen more than 50 per cent during the same period.

Can the government not come to its senses? Can it not at least step back and say, "We have become the mad scientists who have put forth a theory which obviously is not working; we must adjust our theory"? In short, economists from coast to coast are now saying that there is a better way, that there should be credit controls or that some type of more direct approach to the entire financial economic system is needed as opposed to this rather arbitrary, "Let's have higher rates of interest in the hope that they will cool out inflation".

● (1650)

The reason I emphasize this is that I feel we in the House somehow become removed from the reality of what we are talking about. It is easy to talk about 10 per cent or 15 per cent per annum inflation, or, as Dr. Campbell of Wood Gundy Limited said, that we are heading for 20 per cent if the government does not come to its senses as far as inflation is concerned. But the reality for the average home owner or average consumer who must shop for groceries is very much more vivid.

Since 1970 I have kept a record of the cost of what we call a shopping basket in my riding which contains 15 different items one might buy when shopping on the week end at a local store. This record is telling of the hardships being inflicted upon the Canadian public. I would like to review how those items have soared in price due to government policy or lack of policy concerning inflation. For example, in November, 1970 the 15 items had a total cost of $9.97. That is what it cost a consumer to buy a 15-ounce package of Special K, a three-quart jug of 2 per cent milk, a one-pound sirloin steak, a dozen grade A eggs, a pound of Maxwell House coffee, two 19-ounce tins of Libby's pork and beans, two ten-ounce tins of Campbell's tomato soup, ten pounds of white sugar, six ten-ounce tins of coke, a 48-ounce tin of Mitchell apple juice, a pound of centre cut pork chops, a pound of centre cut ham, eight eight-ounce slices of Kraft Canadian cheese, a 12-ounce jar of Billy Bee honey, and a one-pound package of chicken breasts.

If one goes down to the local store to buy those same articles—and some of them are now expressed in metric, to make it more confusing—they will cost today $34.65. This is a jump of 247 per cent since November, 1970. Faced with that, surely the government of the day must accept the responsibility for this crisis. It is time that it quit playing political games. It is time for Dr. Doolittle over there to do something to help the poor, downtrodden Canadian who is overtaxed and over regulated, rather than pompously saying, "I am the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce; I am a man of great authority".

I have touched upon the cost of those items, but we must realize that a 15-ounce package of Special K which cost 56 cents in November, 1970, now costs $1.99, thanks to the policies of the government; a three-quart jug of 2 per cent milk which then cost 67 cents, thanks to the emperor who has ruled the country for 12 years now costs $2.97.

Mr. Lalonde: Respect the monarchy.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, do you see how pompous these ministers are? They feel that I have referred disrespectfully to their leader, the emperor, in the House of Commons. I take it they want me to pay tribute.

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The general rule in this House, which has been well-established, is that hon. members should refer to members of the House as hon. members or hon. ministers. The hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) has a tendency to make very derogatory comments about other hon. members. It is clear in the rules that this is unacceptable. I ask that the hon. member be requested to withdraw and mend his ways.

Mr. Kempling: That is not a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Taylor): The point of order is within the rules and I would ask the hon. member to refer to members in the proper way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, certainly I appreciate your intervention and the fact that you agree; I have referred to the various members in the proper way.

An hon. Member: That is not what he ruled.

Mr. Stevens: I was referring to the cost of some of these items. For example, a pound of sirloin steak which could have been bought for 99 cents in November, 1970, now costs $4.69 at the local A & P store; a dozen eggs, which were 42 cents then, are now $1.26; a pound of Maxwell House coffee which was then $1.19 is now $4.08; Libby's pork and beans which were then 54 cents are now $1.94; two tins of Campbell's soup which were then 24 cents are now 84 cents; ten pounds of sugar which were then 96 cents are now $4.07. I could cite each item, but the point I am trying to make is that these are not simply statistics on this rather misunderstood inflation which is up to 13.9 per cent on an annualized basis. It is the reality with which housewives are faced when they go to stores to buy these necessities every weekend.

Mr. Peterson: What about househusbands?

Mr. Stevens: I remind hon. members what we are debating. It is a resolution of my leader which reads as follows:

The Economy

That this House deplores the record high interest rates imposed on Canadians by the Liberal government which together with double-digit inflation and slow economic growth are causing acute hardship and human suffering for Canadians—

Today we are debating what we really believe, that the inflationary spiral, the spiral of rising interest rates and the lack of real growth in the country, do not have to continue. If the government does not change its ways, if it does not do something effective, the prices of those commodities will continue to rise. I should like to refer to what the prices of those commodities will be in 1985. I have not gone back and then ahead ten years; I have simply taken a look at what will be the prices of these various commodities four years down the road if the government does not get a handle on inflation soon. We will find in 1985 that a three-quart jug of 2 per cent milk will be selling for $6.53.

Mr. Peterson: Tell us about Billy Bee honey.

Mr. Stevens: It sold for 67 cents in 1970 and it will be selling for $6.53 in 1985, if the last four years of inflationary price increases on 2 per cent milk continue for another four years. The hon. member for Willowdale (Mr. Peterson), of all places, asks about Billy Bee honey. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that if that hon. member partakes of Bill Bee honey, that is the sweetest thing about him. A 12-ounce jar of Billy Bee honey which sold for 31 cents in November, 1970, will sell for $2.10 four years from now if something is not done. I point out for example, that sirloin steak, which cost 99 cents a pound in November, 1970, and which now costs $4.69, will cost $13.88 per pound by 1985 if we do not halt the price increases we are referring to in our motion. We have a situation now where the apple juice I referred to earlier, which cost 34 cents in November, 1970, and which currently costs $1.13, will cost $1.61 four years down the road. This is why I urge all members to take a serious look at our motion instead of meekly sitting on the government benches accepting what has been told them by their masters. If they cannot take a serious look at this during this debate, then I suggest they do so in the discussions which should ensue concerning the plight facing this nation.

• (1700)

I see, Mr. Speaker, that you are trying to attract the attention of the House. I do not know whether it is because of my time or whether it is because you wish to make an announcement. In any event, I await your words.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Taylor): The hon. member's time has expired.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I notice that the member who just sat down was very generous in his use of nicknames with regard to methods by which he identifies some members on this side of the House. I think he might be interested to know that quite often the Liberal caucus refers to him as the Elmer Fudd of Tory economic policy. So the names do go both ways, in case the hon. member is interested.

I would have thought that the opposition party would have given some weight, if you will, to their motion by at least calling for a vote on it. But what we have is a motion which will be talked out at ten o'clock tonight. The motion will be over. It will not be put to a vote and, in effect, it will die on the Order Paper. I wonder how sincere the opposition is about the criticisms they are making with respect to the actions being taken by this government.

Mr. Stevens: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Because amendments can be made to the motion, it would be most helpful at this point if the hon. member would indicate, if we do call for a vote on this motion, whether he will vote in support of it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Taylor): That is not a point of order. The hon. member for Sarnia may continue his remarks.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I certainly would not vote for such a motion because, frankly, it does not hold up under any kind of scrutiny at all, particularly when one remembers what was done by the party opposite when it formed the government.

I welcome the opportunity to say a few words on this particular subject since I think it is a matter of serious concern to all Canadians, whether it be 1970 or in the present circumstances. We are all concerned about what is happening at the present time with respect to the economy and what the impact will be on us, our children and our children's children. We have a heavy responsibility to do more than engage in what is, in my view, simply condemning rhetoric.

In answer to a question earlier this week, the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) said he would await with interest some constructive criticism from members opposite to help in this fight against inflation. I, too, as chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs would have welcomed suggestions about how the economy might be improved, about what actions we might take to curb inflation and about methods which could be used to bring down interest rates. I would have been happy to weigh those views and suggestions and, where I could agree with them, to press them upon the Minister of Finance of this government. But, Mr. Speaker, I have waited in vain. I heard a great deal of rhetoric and condemnation but very little in the way of positive actions which could be taken to reduce inflation in the country.

I listened to the former minister of finance, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie). I thought he would have given us something a little better and more self-serving than the suggestion that we should reintroduce his budget. His was a budget which was defeated not only in the House of Commons but in the country when put to a vote. What kind of a recommendation is that? It is a kind of stand pat suggestion which was rejected by this House and by the people of Canada.

Listen to this, Mr. Speaker:

> —we wage the battle against inflation, Mr. Speaker. It is to save those and to defend those who are having their savings destroyed; those who are so essential to society that we need to save, and see that their savings don't go down the drain because governments are unwilling to fight inflation. That is what high interest rates are all about, because the world, the western industrialized world, has not conducted its economic and monetary system properly, so that we are in a period of high inflation.
> That high inflation has to be dealt with, and that is our main enemy if we are to have any kind of progressive society in the future here in Canada. That is why interest rates are high. Why are interest rates high? They are high because we have an inflation rate . . . annualized during September of 14 per cent. Because our dollar has fallen in value to 83 cents or 84 cents, those imports are costing us more and adding to our inflation. Therefore, we have to try to protect the Canadian dollar, to protect it from falling much further because of the effect that will have on the inflation we are importing from the United States.
> We do not have high interest rates because this government wants high interest rates. That is not our policy. As politicians we do not want high interest rates. The people do not want high interest rates. Nobody wants high interest rates, so it is not a policy of the government to have high interest rates, it is a condition that the government cannot do anything about at the moment. It is not through choice.

Those are not the words of our Minister of Finance, Mr. Speaker; those are the words of the hon. member for St. John's West when he was minister of finance and responsible for guiding the economy of this country. It was at a time when he recognized the problem and defended the impact of high interest rates.

The people of Canada know that the fight against inflation will be long and difficult. Inflation has been caused by a series of events and the Canadian public, fortunately, are sophisticated enough to appreciate that it is not solely the government which is to blame for the problems we face today with respect to inflation. There have been many who have contributed to inflation. For that reason the fight against it will be difficult.

But it is not a fight from which we can back away. The people of Canada know that the quadrupling of the price of oil by OPEC and subsequent increases have played a major role for the worst in our economy. Canadians who live under the banner of rising expectations make the fight against inflation very difficult. American interest rates impact in a monstrous way and now even Germany, in effect, is saying to the United States, "Cool it!". Germany is telling the United States to watch what it is doing to the economies of the industrialized world. Not just Canada is suffering from this impact, Germany is now speaking out and indicating its concern with the impact of high interest rates on its economy.

Whenever we have unfettered demands for unreasonable wage and salary increases we have trouble of the most serious nature. I am happy to say that union leaders are more reasonable and understanding now than I have ever known to be the case before. However, they too have a constituency. They have an obligation to represent the people who have elected them to a position of trust and to a position of looking after their interests. Those companies which charge what the market will bear, rather than setting themselves a standard where they would get a reasonable return on investments, do great harm to the economy. All of these factors can be shown to have a substantial impact on any attempt to control inflation.

I believe the Governor of the Bank of Canada is right to be concerned about the strength of the Canadian dollar which now fluctuates somewhere between 82 cents and 85 cents U.S.

Those who buy goods from abroad recognize that a weaker dollar would push inflation beyond tolerable levels. I have heard the comment, "Why don't you just say, okay, no more increase in interest rates, or pass a law to reduce interest rates?" Where would the dollar plummet? Who in this chamber charged with the responsibility of deciding would make that particular move? Only someone totally irresponsible or one who does not have to face the music of the plummeting dollar.

Mr. Mayer: That is what Herb Gray said a year ago.

Mr. Cullen: Once, on a visit to the OECD, I asked a couple of economists and two politicians from other countries who were interested in this subject and involved with the finance departments of their own countries: "Tomorrow, if you were named the economic czar of Canada and had the uncontrolled right to take action, what would you do for us, as Canadians, to control inflation?" Not one of their suggestions had practical, political credibility. There were ideas such as closing down all the inefficient industries; to force some corporations to join together to rationalize, to give each a particular share of the market; to do away with unemployment insurance, that without it people would find work because they would have to and they would be satisfied just to be working. Suggestions were made to stop DREE, as it forces corporations to locate where it is economically inadvisable to conduct business; to raise taxes to cover our deficit. I wonder, if that kind of action was taken, raise taxes on whom?

They said we should encourage foreign investment and close down FIRA. They said we should raise the price of stamps to cover whatever it cost to run the Post Office. If management in the Post Office saw that they would lose business by being inefficient, they would work together to become more efficient so that the cost of mail and parcel delivery would decrease. I told those particular advisers that I was thankful they were not the economic czars of Canada. I told them that in Canada, instead of having a revolution of rising expectations, we would have a revolution of a different kind.

Because we are in the Parliament of Canada, we should be making suggestions about what the federal government can do to assume its responsibility in its fight against inflation. Much pleasure has been taken by the opposition in tweaking the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) for saying on one occasion that we had wrestled inflation to the ground. I would like to remind the opposition, and maybe the Prime Minister as well, that wrestling is often, at best, two out of three falls. Maybe the battle is even at the present time and we still have a job of work to do if we are going into that particular ring.

At the present time the deficit is barely manageable, and for it to become much larger is unthinkable. So one area we must look to is reducing our demands on the taxpayers' dollar. Not too often do I hear MPs suggesting we should cut expenditures, or at least in any amount which would have a significant impact on the deficit. I have heard expressions like "a stimulative deficit", "spend more money", "use more money", "do more protecting", to use this money and call it a stimulative deficit. My concern there is that if it does not stimulate, then we have nothing but a larger deficit, again working to the detriment of the Canadian public and certainly of the Canadian economy.

I hear from time to time that certain protections should be put in place, and it has a nice ring to it. But protection costs taxpayers dollars. I was not here at the time the hon. member for St. John's West introduced his mortgage deductibility plan. However, I studied the idea of it and I talked to people who saw it in place in the United States; after all, my riding is a border community. I was very pleased to note that we did not adopt that particular program because there would have been a built-in cost factor which we would have found very difficult to unload at some time in the future. I think it would have been reprehensible for Parliament to have adopted that particular program, knowing the cost of it and knowing that even though it is really basically unacceptable to the government of the United States, now that it is locked into it there is no way that it can get out.

We did take some action in the areas of most vulnerability. The guaranteed income supplement was increased immediately after this Parliament resumed. I think that was an appropriate move. I would like to see the government give some thought to issuing tax-free bonds where money derived from that particular source could be used for government projects. We should be looking at that area, and I have made that suggestion to the Minister of Finance.

I would like to join with a portion of the comments made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan). I do not think they should be forced to do it at the present time, but I think banks and trust companies must look to their social responsibilities in this Canadian society. Mortgages become due, and "boom", immediately up goes the interest rate. A company which has made a substantial amount of money as a result of someone who has paid on a mortgage for five, ten or 15 years should surely let that individual know that he is a good creditor who can be depended on, and that he has given no difficulty because he has kept up his payments. Surely these institutions have a social, moral and, for that matter, should possibly have a legal obligation to see to it that they protect the customers they encourage to come in and borrow funds, and from whom they have made a significant profit. They must face up to that particular social responsibility.

When one is in a one-industry town and there is a major strike, mortgage companies, not because they want to but because they really have no alternative, must find a method not to foreclose on mortgages, giving those who are on strike a little time instead of demanding that the full backlog be paid up immediately. When a strike lasts for six months or a year or some time-frame like that, a way must be found to accommodate those who are on strike. If these companies do not do so, they know that they are acting at their peril because when those people are back to work they will no longer deal with that particular institution. They do it not because they want to, but because they have to.

I think banks must be reminded that it is not a computer print-out with which they are dealing but people. I am not as much concerned with showing a large profit at a time of difficulty as I am with convincing banks and trust companies that they have an obligation in tough times to see to it that they do what they can to help, particularly their steady customers and those from whom they have made substantial amounts of money. This is particularly true when they are trampling on their hopes, dreams and aspirations which are completely shattered for the sake of the few dollars which they could not come up with, even though they have come up with money over the last five, ten or 15 years. There comes a time when the Canadian public says that enough is enough, and they will put pressure on politicians to say that banks must accept this responsibility.

I think the banks should be reminded that in the provinces landlords were too tough on tenants, with the result that the provinces moved in with rent controls and provisions in landlord and tenants acts to protect tenants. I think they have probably gone too far in some instances; but the legislatures and the politicians had to react. I say to the banks and trust companies, be careful; people will only be pushed so far. Then they will push their politicians to do in the short run what they may see as necessary but which we might very well know will be counterproductive in the long run. If they do not recognize their social obligation, they will be acting at their peril.

Naturally, to help the economy we must come to an agreement with respect to the price of oil and gas in Canada. We have to have an agreement between the producing provinces and the federal government. I am happy to see we are prepared to make concessions to try to arrive at some form of agreement on pricing which will not totally decimate the people who have to buy the particular product. At the same time it will give a fair rate of return to the people who are doing the producing and to the producing provinces.

It seems to me that what is taking place now is good, that the officials are meeting, and we are at least talking about the same set of figures. At the federal level we have a tendency to say that the split for a barrel of oil is 45, 45 and 10, and the provincial government says that that is not true because there are other taxes and benefits which we at the federal level derive which makes that figure inappropriate. Let us get the figure down and agreed upon. Surely that is step one.

We should then say to industry, which wants to get back working, which wants to go on exploring, which wants to expand, "You will derive a certain figure from a barrel of oil and that is the bottom line. That money will be available to you." For the balance, let the federal and provincial governments work out some form of agreement but not hold up progress, so that these people can work.

I am proud of the fact that the federal government saw fit to make $40 million available to keep one particularly large project operating until, I believe, June 1, in order to see if some settlement could not be reached prior to that time. The pressure is on; concessions will have to be made. I know that at the federal level we are prepared to do this. I am satisfied with the minister when he says he will move in that direction. I hope we can expect the same kind of co-operation from the producing provinces.

There is one other area of pricing that I should like to deal with. We have already indicated in the case of the tar sands and heavy oils that we are prepared to go to $37 per barrel, plus an indexing factor. That may not be enough but it strikes me that it is a substantial amount of money. Surely that is an area in which there can be negotiation. Maybe that figure is fine at the moment; to my way of thinking it seems to be adequate as the bottom line, given the fact that there is a built-in index.

My colleague from the riding adjacent to mine has indicated that he would like to see a two or three-price system; one price for the heavy oils and tar sands products, one for the ordinary oil, and more funding made available to the marginal wells. That would put a lot of people back to work on those wells because they would then be economically viable.

I note your indication that my time is about up, Mr. Speaker. I should just like to repeat what I said at the beginning, that rhetoric will not bring down inflation. We must all recognize that the solution is with us, that each of us in our own sector has a responsibility to do what we can to alleviate it. We must give protection to vulnerable members of our society, as we have done with the guaranteed income supplement. I think we must also give more money to bodies like the Farm Credit Corporation.

At the government level we must learn to say no unless it can be shown that the expenditure of more money will involve an investment which will be beneficial to the economy of the country and to all Canadians.

I do not envy the Minister of Finance in his very difficult and perplexing role. I know that he is sincere in his concern for his fellow Canadians. He is an individual who has taken on an almost impossible task and is doing what I think is a superb job.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, the government's complacency in regard to economic issues is clearly illustrated by the agenda which it has placed before Parliament since this session began.

The government rejoices when its bad record at job creation in April compares favourably with its worse record in March, but this brings little comfort to the families of 886,000 unemployed Canadians.

The high interest policy of the government, which is now counterproductive and is contributing directly to increases in prices, has destroyed home building and condemned thousands of Canadians to renting expensive apartments with the certain knowledge that the rents will go even higher.

This government stubbornly refuses to bring in legislation to permit Canadians to deduct their mortgage interest from their income tax, as the leader of the Progressive Conservative government did. It will, however, continue to allow the wealthiest industries in this country to deduct their interest payments from their income for tax purposes.

The economic recovery of our nation and the elimination of areas that suffer from regional disparity requires a plan. We need a national industrial strategy, and a piece of the action, at long last, should go to the Atlantic provinces.

The battle with regional disparity in Atlantic Canada will be won or lost on the industrial front. The development of secondary manufacturing is the top priority for the economic recovery of the Atlantic provinces. Secondary manufacturing must be upgraded, more specialized and more efficient. The benefits to the Atlantic provinces and the rest of the country are obvious.

At this point in time the Atlantic account, in terms of federal expenditures, shows that the Government of Canada spends $5 billion more each year in the Atlantic provinces than it recovers in revenues. It is therefore in the Atlantic provinces that a new industrial capacity, in terms of its impact on the totality of the nation, would be most beneficial. If we expand the industrial base, then we expand the revenue base for provincial governments and enable them to become less dependent on equalization and transfer payments. This would require fewer federal dollars and would be of direct benefit to every taxpayer in Canada.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. De Bané) can mount an effective argument in persuading large industrial taxpayers to consider the Atlantic provinces in terms of their future expansion. It is in their interest, indeed in everybody's interest, to develop a broader tax base in Atlantic Canada in order to whittle away at transfer payments.

In terms of development, we have to ask ourselves where we are going to be in 1990 and in the year 2000. I want Atlantic Canada to be standing on its own two feet and making a net contribution to Canada, and I believe it will take strong financial incentives and moral suasion to bring this about.

The 50 per cent tax incentive credit that the government has recently brought in is a step in the right direction, but it has one glowing deficiency in that it does not apply to all of the Altantic provinces. Specifically excluded from the incentive is the area in New Brunswick with the greatest industrial potential for manufacturing plants, and that is the Moncton-Saint John-Fredericton triangle.

Another incentive recommended by the New Brunswick Development Institute and ignored by the government is the 30 per cent tax incentive for labour costs in manufacturing plants for the first three years of operation. This is intended to offset the training costs for employees in new plants at new jobs. The greatest benefit of these two incentives is that they would not cost the federal treasury anything. They would only postpone the tax-paying liability of companies that do not now exist and so do not pay taxes; in fact, taxpayers would be created. This would meet the requirement mentioned earlier by an hon. member opposite.

We need strong incentives and these are important, but so is the element of persuasion.

The government missed the chance to contribute to a more balanced economic growth in western and eastern Canada when it signed the auto pact. The government failed to use the opportunity to persuade the automobile giants of the importance of locating some aspect of their industrial empires in eastern and western Canada.

The social benefits of 500 jobs would have far greater impact in Altantic Canada than anywhere else in our nation. The taxes derived from 500 taxpayers would nibble away at the need for equalization grants and federal transfer payments. Where nearly one dollar out of two spent by governments in Atlantic Canada can be traced back to the federal government, there is a real incentive for an enlightened federal government to look at this proposition very seriously.

Secondary manufacturing plants have a great development impact because they buy goods and services, employ a large number of people and stimulate other service and support industries.

I want to pay tribute to DREE and to those who have worked hard to establish our industrial parks in Atlantic Canada. These industrial parks have made a contribution to development, but regrettably more often than not we find very few manufacturing plants in our industrial parks. Space is taken more by warehouses, wholesale and commercial undertakings which, while they are very important, do not create the number of jobs that a manufacturing plant would. In order to attract manufacturing plants, strong incentives are essential and so is moral suasion exercised by the Prime Minister and the ministers of the Crown.

In order to create a climate attractive to industry and development we need many things. One of them is a sound transportation policy. The maritime provinces through their governments working with DREE and the Department of Transport have taken some good steps in this direction, but there is much yet to be done.

● (1730)

The blueprint for the development of the port of Saint John has to be followed aggressively, and a similar blueprint for the development of the port of Halifax has to be put in place and acted upon. The significant transfer of shipping from Halifax to Montreal is a horror story that should never have been told. It should have been nipped in the bud by the alert ministers of the Crown from Nova Scotia and the Minister of Transport.

The retrenchment of rail and express services in the maritime provinces is a betrayal of one of the fundamental reasons for our entry into confederation. This government of contradictions that, on the one hand, enshrines the principles of equalization in our Constitution and at the same time sets in motion a parliamentary task force to examine federal-provincial fiscal arrangements with a view to reducing them, is now talking openly about putting its contribution to the improvement of the transportation systems in the maritimes in an envelope. It will essentially pass the buck to the maritime governments themselves to decide which mode will get the least. Why? Because the federal government has no policy, it has no strategy, it has no plan, and it will not take the time to sit down with the provincial governments involved and work one out. It would rather bunch its meagre efforts in one bundle than allocate the funds in accordance with a meaningful plan so the cutbacks in its reduced efforts will not be so apparent.

In Prince Edward Island the federal-provincial development agreement is moving ahead like a fly with a wooden leg walking across a saucer of molasses. In New Brunswick, the subsidiary agreement to provide federal assistance for small business incentive programs has expired and not been renewed. The highway subsidiary agreement has expired and has not been renewed. The tourism agreement has expired and has not been renewed. The fisheries agreement has not expired because it has never been completed. These are good programs. They create a climate attractive to industry. They should not have been allowed to expire. We are now two months into the current fiscal year and without the agreements, the funds allocated for the programs cannot be spent. This is not good planning. It is not good administration. The government is not doing its homework and is not operating efficiently.

I would like to identify some individual projects for the government to consider as it contemplates its next budget. Most of these projects will not involve expenditures which have not already been contemplated, but would, I believe, focus them in a more meaningful way.

The forestry complex to be located at the university of New Brunswick would put meaning and purpose into research and development for the vital forest industry in New Brunswick. It is an urgent necessity that has attracted the interest and support of two of the more able ministers of the Crown, and I hope that their enlightenment will soon be shared by the Treasury Board. This project would give industry a window on research that would be very valuable for the whole Atlantic region.

I would like to see the practice of contracting out research and development projects of large magnitude continue, but I would like to suggest that very large contracts in this field could be used as an inducement to our high technology industry to promote a more balanced growth across the country. I realize it is not possible to suggest that an industry should locate in an area in order to get a grant, and then find out that it is unable to sustain its production after that, but I do suggest that it is a factor which, combined with other elements, should be considered. In this regard, I would like to see the appropriate ministers of the Crown set up an interdepartmental committee to address the prospect of giving a development dimension to research and development in our high technology industry in Canada.

I would also like to see the Department of Supply and Services take another look at its procurement policy with respect to foreign aid. Right now the department centres its bidding process on goods delivered to the port of Montreal because it is from that port that it ships its supplies to developing countries. I would like to see this practice varied once in awhile and the ports of Saint John and Halifax used as the gathering point to give a better chance to suppliers in Atlantic Canada to participate in these large orders.

Before closing I would like to touch upon two development opportunities in my riding. In the town of Oromocto we have a large number of vacant married quarters for armed forces personnel stationed at Canadian Forces Base Gagetown. The changing complexion of the armed forces which sees more single persons than has been the case has resulted in the depopulation of the town of Oromocto which was created originally by the Department of National Defence. This model town was originally designed as a combination of civilian and military personnel and for many years operated under the direction of a commission, with a majority of its officers being appointed by the Department of National Defence. Over a period of time it has evolved and acquired the status of a town. It now elects its own government, the same as other Canadian towns.

I feel that the Department of National Defence still has a moral obligation as the largest taxpayer in the town and as its founder to do all it can for the well-being of the municipality and the people who live there.

The depopulation of the town of Oromocto has created a serious problem in the school system, and commercial and professional people in the town do not have the same potential as they had before the population decreased. Strong efforts are being made to attract industry to the town, and I think the government of Canada should do all it can to assist it.

Specifically I would like to see the Department of National Defence give serious consideration to stationing more personnel in the town and make a greater effort to fulfil its obligation, both to the armed forces and to the people of central New Brunswick.

In New Brunswick we have one of the most beautiful natural attractions in the world in the Saint John river which divides the city of Fredericton and is bordered by a very attractive green. I would like to see an in-depth study done of the recreation potential of the river. Environment officials tell me that it is essentially pollution free, although an incident last winter would have to be checked out. Any such study would have to check carefully all the safety factors. The question of fluctuating water levels and its effect on safe swimming, boating and skating would have to be given very careful consideration. The topography and condition of the river bottom and the possibility of moving in sand to locate some beaches are other factors.

Now that the two government wharfs have been removed for the access roads leading to the new bridge, the question of a new wharf to permit boating and river boat cruises has arisen.

One very attractive proposal for the development of river boat cruises along the Saint John river is taking shape at this moment and it has my support. I think the development of natural resources such as the Saint John river for our own people as well as tourists would make New Brunswick a very attractive site for developments of all kinds.

I mentioned this last project because it has a very small federal content and would essentially be developed by two other levels of government. However, it is important for us as members of Parliament to identify projects which can be accomplished with staff and resources that are now in place. It can make our areas in Canada more attractive for development.

The government has suggested that the opposition is using this opportunity just to be negative and to expose the government's frailties. I have chosen to lay before the government some positive suggestions which I hope will attract its attention. They would involve very little in the way of more investment on the part of the government, in fact none that has not already been contemplated in the estimates.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak in this debate on the severe increase in interest rates. In so doing, I would like to address two major points. First, I would like to sum up the facts as they relate to our present economic circumstances. Second, I want to respond to the challenge presented by the Leader of the New Democratic Party to deal in a positive and constructive way with some of the alternatives which have been presented to us, not only by his party but by the official opposition.

First, it must be recognized that Canada, more than any other nation in the world, is dependent for its economic well-being, economic health and economic fundamentals on world trade and international capital flow. More than 25 per cent of our gross national product comes from exports, and this is a higher figure than even for Japan. We are not an isolated nation. We cannot set out to conduct our economic affairs on the basis that we are in watertight compartments, or that we are an island unto ourselves. World economic realities are there and always will be, and the moment we as Canadians ignore those economic realities and start to look inward we will begin to suffer severe economic consequences.

What are some of these facts which relate to our present economic condition? I want to set these forth in the light of the seven major countries in OECD. These are Canada, France, Germany, the United Kingdom, the United States, Italy and Japan. Let us look at the way in which Canada relates in its economic performance to those specific countries. I want to do this within the context of the theory which has been put forward that other countries have had to go to world prices in oil, have gone to world prices in oil and have been able to digest those prices within their own domestic economies.

Yes, they have digested world prices for energy but at what price; what price have they had to pay? I want to look at this because, in looking at the facts, we will see that since 1973 they have digested these higher prices for oil at great cost to themselves. Let us look at this in terms of unemployment rates. Of these seven OECD countries including Canada, Canada is the only one to have had a decline in unemployment every year since 1978. We are the only country with a lower unemployment rate today than in 1978.

Let us look at manufacturing employment, and manufacturing employment is part of what we are promoting through our industrial strategy. Since 1973, of the seven OECD countries, Canada has had the highest increase in the number of manufacturing jobs. Only Canada and the United States have had an increase in the number of people employed in manufacturing.

Let us look at total employment, and I believe it is important to look at this because when we are dealing with employment we are dealing with human beings and the dignity of individuals who have the opportunity to work. Unemployment is more than a statistic. Unemployment is a tragedy when it occurs in the human family. This is why we have to look at these figures.

In terms of total employment since 1973, when the increase in OPEC prices occurred, Canada has had the highest growth rate in total employment of those seven OECD countries. It has been over 3 per cent a year. The next highest was in the U.S. with 2.5 per cent. All of the others have had a growth rate of less than 1 per cent. In fact, Germany, often held out to us as the paragon of economic virtue, had one million fewer workers employed in 1980 than it did in 1973. That is the price Germany has had to pay for digesting world energy pricing.

In terms of economic growth, between 1973 and 1980 all top OECD countries have had a reduced rate of economic growth. We do not like this but it is a fact. We have all suffered, but Canada's decline in economic growth has been less than that of all those other OECD countries.

Let us look at our merchandise trade balance. Canada is the only OECD country to have an increase in its merchandise trade balance in every year since 1978. As a matter of fact, last year Canada's merchandise trade balance surplus was higher than that of Japan.

An hon. Member: Oh, don't be absurd.

Mr. Peterson: The hon. member opposite should look at the figures. I would be happy to give him those figures released by OECD.

An hon. Member: I don't care who released them.

Mr. Peterson: In the last 12 months our merchandise trade surplus was $6 billion, and in Japan it was $4.7 billion.

Exchange rates have come under pressure throughout the world. There has been a decline. The French franc, the Deutschmark and the yen have declined from between 5 per cent to 12 per cent in the last three years, with the rapid increase in OPEC prices, against the U.S. dollar, while the Canadian dollar has remained constant.

Let us consider inflation rates. None of us wants or likes inflation. We all think inflation is too high. This is why we are taking responsible measures to try to bring it down, but all of these OECD countries have had an inflationary increase of approximately 3 per cent. Our inflationary increase has not been out of line with those of our major trading partners. I can say the same for central government deficits. They again have followed that line.

What do these figures indicate to us in the real world? None of us like huge fiscal deficits, none of us like high inflation rates, and none of us like high interest rates, but what these mean is that we have not been using these fiscal deficit tools in a totally unconstructive way. We have been using them to promote employment, create jobs for people and give dignity to families. We have been using them to promote economic growth. None of us is proud of present circumstances, but I think, when we look at them within the context of the real world, we have to say perhaps that we can do better, and we have to find ways to do better. However, our performance has been better than that of any of the other major countries that count in this area.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peterson: Let me accept the challenge put to us by the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) to respond to the alternatives presented to us. The hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) during the question period on Tuesday said that a speedy energy agreement would help us to protect Canadians against downward pressure on the Canadian dollar. That is true, but the question is: an agreement at what price? We are not prepared on this side of the House to accept an energy agreement based on any price. This must be a price that is related to the cost of becoming self-sufficient in energy, and not a price tied to an artificial "X" per cent, whatever that may be.

I was talking yesterday with someone involved in the energy industry in the west who suggested, as a reasonable scenario, that within three years the world price of petroleum energy could be $80 a barrel. That could be the world price, but our price must be a price that is made in Canada, based on Canadian realities and Canadian needs for production. That is the basis for negotiating a reasonable agreement with the provinces which is not artificially tied to some price unrelated to Canadian needs, Canadian supplies and, particularly, the needs of Canadian consumers.

An hon. Member: Tell that to Saudi Arabia.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Would you work for half wages, Jim?

Mr. Peterson: A gentleman across the floor asks if I would work for half wages. In this world there are people who work for 25 cents an hour and there are people who work for thousands of dollars an hour.

An hon. Member: What has that got to do with it?

Mr. Peterson: What that has to do with it is that there are circumstances and realities that exist in every country, and they are different. If the hon. member thinks uniform wages, uniform prices, uniform conditions of work, uniformity of humanitarian conditions can apply in every country in this world, then I say he is living in a Utopia.

An hon. Member: Sell us your cars at half price.

Mr. Peterson: Let us look at what the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) suggested to us this afternoon. He suggested that perhaps our priorities in acquiring the shares of Petrofina were not proper. That is an investment owned by the people of Canada.

• (1750)

Mr. Siddon: A bunch of gas stations.

Mr. Peterson: Yes, as the hon. member opposite says, these are a bunch of gas stations. Let hon. members opposite tell us if they object to having a vertically integrated company in the oil business—

Mr. Siddon: Yes, we object.

Mr. Peterson: —the only one of the top ten which will have stations from coast to coast and which is owned by Canadians for the benefit of Canadians. Have they changed their views on the role of Petro-Canada? Have they changed their views again on how they treat Petro-Canada? Petro-Canada was anathema to them a couple of years ago. Now they accept it. Even their energy critic feels it is a strong asset to Canada to have Petro-Canada. We have strengthened Petro-Canada. We have strengthened the ability of Canadians to invest in their future.

Mr. Kempling: How many more barrels of reserves have you got now?

Mr. Roberts: They don't want Petro-Canada.

Mr. Peterson: I would be delighted to answer all the questions hon. members opposite have to pose to us, but I would also like the opportunity to continue to respond to the particular issues they have raised because I feel that in many cases there is merit in considering what they have indicated to us.

One of these cases is the suggestion made by the Leader of the New Democratic Party that we have the possibility within our hands of pegging the Canadian interest rate below that of the United States and that we need not be tied to it. We have all heard eloquently expressed in this House and, I think, factually expressed the problems this will create in terms of money flows. We have heard about how we are linked to the United States economy and the United States capital markets and about the problems which would result. The Leader of the New Democratic Party admitted quite frankly that there would be these outflows of capital, but he suggested that there was a way to cope with them. What he suggested was a means of exchange controls, and he said that the precedent comes from the United States. He did not mention it specifically but I think he was referring to the interest equalization tax which was introduced by President Kennedy in 1962, to the 1965 voluntary guidelines, and then the 1968 mandatory guidelines. These measures were introduced by the United States to counteract adverse balance of payments problems the Americans were having. The interest equalization tax was designed to penalize foreigners who were coming into the United States to borrow. One had to pay extra interest rates as an excise tax on money being borrowed in the United States at that time. That, quite frankly, is a possibility which I know we have had under consideration. I think we have to look at the example of what is happening in the United States. The interest equalization tax and the two guidelines of 1965 and 1968 were removed in 1972 by President Nixon, having been proved ineffectual. However, I do not think any of us should ignore the opportunity to re-examine new ideas and concepts at this time. I welcome the receptive attitude of our Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and our party toward exploring these new ideas because all of us are engaged in the search to create a better economy for Canadians.

The last area I would like to explore in an effort to look at the new ideas and new alternatives which have been put forward is the whole question of an industrial strategy. I think all of us agree that the real question with respect to bringing interest rates down involves bringing inflation down, and that involves over the long run—and there is only one way to do it—increased productivity among Canadians. If hon. members think there is a magic fix or a quick solution, there is not. We need increased productivity amongst Canadians. We are involved in a long-term search for that.

Mr. Deans: Where is the market?

Mr. Peterson: The hon. gentleman opposite asks me where the market is. Would he please listen? I will come to that. He should not get impatient. He is not yet running for the leadership of the New Democratic Party in Ontario. If the hon. member listens, I will come to that.

Mr. Deans: I am listening.

Mr. Peterson: We have some very critical issues which we as members on both sides of this House must resolve. First, are we going to try to select winners and losers in this area? I present hon. members with one problem. The furniture industry is moribund in Canada. On the other hand, I know of individual furniture manufacturers who have found holes in the international market. They are filling them and exporting aggressively. Do hon. members want to wipe out a whole industry when there is one or a couple of companies in that industry which are doing well? Do we focus on the industry or the company? This is one of the questions we must resolve.

Second, are we going to concentrate on certain types of activities, such as manufacturing? I say yes. High technology? Yes, it is the way of the future, and we have demonstrated in many areas that we can do this. I do not think we should ignore the service industries. After all, more than 50 per cent of people employed in Canada are working in our service industries as white collar workers. Let us not ignore the facts. Let us look at the realities and deal with them. We are not here for pie-in-the-sky solutions.

Mr. Andre: More work for lawyers.

Mr. Peterson: Yes, more work for lawyers, accountants, bankers and insurance people as well.

One of the possibilities we can consider is creating in Canada a world financial centre, the way The Netherlands has, through propitious use of our tax laws. That is one opportunity we should not ignore.

Another major question we must face is whether we are going to benefit under our industrial strategy, foreign owned or only Canadian owned.

Another problem we have to address in coming to a resolution of this question is what type of activities we want to encourage. In this area I suggest we want to encourage export-oriented industries using world product mandate techniques, and I say this in response to the hon. member opposite who asked, "Where are the markets?" Canada's market of 23 million people will never suffice to create the economies of scale we need to be effective competitors. Our horizons are on the world, and our trade minister is demonstrating this in the efforts he is making to find new markets for us.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deans: We have 20 per cent unused capacity now.

Mr. Peterson: The other types of activities it is incumbent upon us to encourage are research and development. Without increased research and development, be it in the white collar area or in manufacturing, we will not be competitive on a world basis.

There is a number of means we can examine in the area of developing an industrial strategy. How are we going to do it? Are we going to have increased bureaucracies in which government officials determine who is a winner, who is a loser, who gets what and who does not? In some areas we might have to. We might find, after consultation, that that is the most effective way, but I suggest we will find that the most effective way will be to pick our winners and look at the Income Tax Act. Who are the people who are making profits and who have demonstrated their ability? What about incentives for those people who have demonstrated ability and want to reinvest in Canada?

In terms of our industrial strategy, we could also look at the utilization of FIRA. FIRA is an instrument by which we can encourage greater use of the world product mandate. This is where we produce in Canada a limited run of goods of one type and of a similar kind. We cannot produce 20 brands of refrigerators in Canada, but we can produce two and sell them around the world. That is the way we get economies of scale. To my way of thinking, that is part of the industrial strategy and part of the forward thinking we are doing.

Let us recognize that under our industrial strategy we can build on the success we have. Such successes are Mitel, ATCO, Dominion Trucks and our resource-oriented companies. We do have opportunities. We need to have co-operation between the government and the private sector. I am not ashamed to look at the example of the minister of international trade and investment in Japan. Japan encourages active co-operation between the private sector, financial institutions and business. This involves the creative use of all the talents of government and the private sector. That is the way we make winners in the capitalist system. That is the way we make winners in our economy based on the free enterprise system.

There are many challenges before us. I wish hon. members opposite had taken more time to discuss in detail positive alternatives because I believe these alternatives are within our grasp. I am proud to be part of a party which is actively seeking out those solutions and dealing with them.

• (1800)

Mr. Kempling: You would make a good president of the flat earth society.

An hon. Member: You are going down with the ship, Jim.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I see the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans), but I do not think I can recognize him because it is six o'clock. In fact, in accordance with the roster, another hon. member may have to be recognized before him. No other hon. member stood up, so the Chair has somewhat of a problem. However, I see the hon. member from Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon) has risen to his feet, and that may resolve my problem. Does the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta wish to have the floor at eight o'clock?

Mr. Siddon: Yes, sir.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Provided the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta is in his place at eight o'clock, he will be recognized at that time.

It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At 6.01 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Mr. Speaker, I regret the circumstances which require me to participate in this important debate that reflects the government's absolute incompetence and its mismanagement of our national economy. We are faced with record high interest rates now in excess of 20 per cent, double-digit inflation in the order of 12.5 per cent and, worst of all, the government has produced no significant programs. In particular, it has not produced its long-promised industrial development strategy in order to resolve the worsening economic crisis.

This evening I want to spend a few moments talking about my understanding of the causes of the problem and to dispel some of the myths we regularly hear from the other side. I want to talk about the impact of high interest rates and inflation upon the Canadian fishing industry, particularly on the west coast. Also I want to talk a little about some of the solutions we in this party see as being essential.

Canada is on a course of economic suicide because of the incompetent economic doodlers, from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on down, who have set the country on a course toward economic disaster which may well be at least as severe as the great depression of the thirties. I believe high interest rates are but a symptom of a national disaster we are yet to confront.

Earlier this afternoon the hon. member for Willowdale (Mr. Peterson) said that higher interest rates are needed to get inflation down, in order to get interest rates down. What illogical rubbish! The hon. member should know better. It just does not work that way. Higher interest rates do not create a situation leading to lower interest rates. In fact, in a situation where taxes are too high, business confidence is low and profit margins are slim, companies, businesses, fishermen and ordinary people in the country have no room in which to manoeuvre. There is no profit margin left, and the consequence is what some technical people might call a synergetic or cyclical effect: the higher the interest rate becomes, the higher the inflation rate becomes, and the higher the interest rate becomes again. Then there is an amplifying headlong deterioration of the economy, leading ultimately to a disastrous consequence.

• (2010)

Last week and again today the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) said that the Canadian worker is to blame, that he earns too much and he expects too much of this country. What nonsense! The minister cannot blame the wage earners; he cannot blame wives, spouses or children; he cannot blame farmers, fishermen, small businessmen, pensioners, widowers, widows or school teachers. Furthermore, the minister cannot blame the Americans or Ronald Reagan. That is the phoniest excuse of them all. I did some checking today and learned that on this very day mortgage rates in the United States are at 16 per cent. Last August they were 12 per cent or 13 per cent. In other words, mortgage rates in the United States have increased by some 3 per cent to 4 per cent since last August. By comparison, mortgage rates in Canada, as of today's hike in the prime lending rate, have increased from 13 per cent to some 21 per cent—an 8 per cent increase in nine months. The increase in mortgage rates in Canada is double that of the United States for the same period. It is neither correct nor honest to suggest the situation is otherwise. In fact, the wide fluctuations in the U.S. prime lending rate bear little relationship, if plotted against time, with the fluctuations in interest rates which represent a progressive rise in this country.

We cannot have a government continuing to misrepresent the truth to the Canadian people. The federal government causes inflation, and it knows as well as anyone else in this country that it does. As a consequence of inflation, we are faced with high interest rates. The Minister of Finance knows that, too. After all, who is overprinting the money supply? Who is incurring massive budgetary deficits of $100 billion plus? Who is borrowing against the future value of our natural resources, particularly those resources in western Canada upon which the federal government is so anxious to lay its hands? Who has tied up all of the people's money in Canada Savings Bonds and government pension funds, and then squandered it to pay ever mounting deficits? Who has forced all Canadian revenues, or at least $300 billion of those revenues, into real estate and housing because a capital gains tax was slapped on everything else, destroying the incentive to invest in business and entrepreneurial ventures, diverting that revenue into the housing market? Who has created a shortage of investment capital in this country by spending someone else's money on unnecessary programs of intervention by government into the private sector, by creating 400-plus Crown corporations, many of them unnecessary, by imposing a National Energy Program which confiscates resources and revenues and the free opportunities which private corporations in this country seek? Who has imposed red tape and overregulation upon the private sector of this country? Who is mortgaging the future and incurring bills which our children will have to pay, and how much does the interest payment amount to on those bills? In the present fiscal year it will amount to not $14 billion but something close to $20 billion which is needed to pay the interest to foreign and Canadian lenders on the deficits which this government has incurred. Why are funds fleeing south to seek refuge from the National Energy Program? Why are these funds fleeing south? Because there is a scarcity of oil and gas in the United States and investors are paid well for investing in oil and gas exploration in the U.S. That is where Canadian, American and other dollars are flooding to from this country.

There is another reason why the interest rates in this country must be as high as the government claims they must be. We are seeing the beginnings of industrial nationalization. As the Minister of Finance hinted this afternoon, there are other corporations which will be the next ones to be subjected to federal intervention. Perhaps banks, food stores, food chains, General Motors, farming and fishing industries will all be subject to nationalization if this government has its way. And the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) sitting opposite smiles. In the Department of Fisheries and Oceans alone there is a pervasive attempt, month after month, to try to take a bigger piece of the action from private sector fishing companies, which is something I will deal with later on.

So we have the choice between propping up the Canadian dollar in order to keep it at an 85 per cent par with the U.S. dollar or our interest rates will have to go higher and higher. The alternative is to allow the Canadian dollar to collapse. Why is the government afraid of a devalued dollar? Because the government must then bear the burden of responsibility for its own economic mismanagement. It must bear it directly instead of forcing that burden upon the backs and incomes of ordinary Canadians everywhere who are innocent in this tragic dilemma which our country faces. We have spent almost 12 months in this House frittering away time debating a constitutional initiative which is dividing our country and creating ill will everywhere when we should have been dealing with these important economic problems.

I submit that the Prime Minister and the government should call a first ministers' conference immediately, tell the premiers that they will put this power play aside and get on in a spirit of co-operation with resolving our important economic crisis.

When will the Minister of Finance admit that our national economic problems are a direct result of a government which spends itself into power and attempts to stay in power election after election by promising all kinds of goodies to the taxpayer who must ultimately pay for these extravagances? The Canadian economy is suffering from this spend-spend-spend mentality, an approach which leads to politically expedient solutions and ideological frivolity which started in the early seventies and which will continue as long as the people of this country allow it to continue.

There are no signs of restraint in the budget introduced by this government a year ago. It is high time a new budget was brought in which would show indications of restraints. If we had been in government in this present fiscal year with the Crosbie budget in effect, the national deficit would have been reduced to 14 per cent of the annual budgetary spending. Instead, it will be more than 20 per cent with the higher interest charges on our foreign deficit. It is now approaching 25 per cent, or a charge of some $20 billion for the interest we must pay on our national deficit. The reasons for this problem really have to do with the wasteful spending habits of this government—the Mirabel airports, the great "metri-Can" boondoggle which will cost small retail businesses across Canada more than half a billion dollars, $600 million, in order to buy new scales from foreign multinational companies. These are scales which will be imported and, therefore, have a negative effect on our balance of payments. We want to buy gas stations to pretend that we are somehow in charge of our own economic energy destiny. We want to print government documents in duplicate, back to back, in both official languages instead of printing half as many documents in two languages. That is an utterly ridiculous waste of valuable Canadian newsprint. We have a great Canada Week put on at the expense of millions of dollars of taxpayers' money, trying to bludgeon Canadians into a feeling of loyalty which should come from inside, not be forced on them by government propaganda. We have the concept of CBC-2 which is absolutely unnecessary at this point in time. We have the minister responsible for culture saying that we should forget about foreign aid and think about a new art gallery for Ottawa since that is more important than getting control of our economic destiny. There are DREE grants to fat cat friends of the Liberal party, and government buildings leased from other fat cat friends of the Liberal party. They leave their lights on all night for which the taxpayers of Canada must pay. We have unnecessary government advertising on television and in our newspapers which costs the people of this country a tremendous amount in tax dollars. We have an unnecessary proliferation of Crown corporations. Mr. Speaker, those are just a few of the tremendously large number of extravagant and wasteful examples of incompetence and inefficient spending by this government. There is one final example which made me laugh. I read that we commissioned an American artist to prepare a design for a Canadian postage stamp commemorating energy. The artist used a U.S. nuclear reactor to depict our Canadian nuclear industry. How ridiculous, and who is in charge? Where is the economic competence in that bunch of bumber-shooting so-and-so's over there? Nowhere is the government's mishandling of this economy more evident than in its mismanagement of the fishing industry. The policies of the government are crippling our fishing industry on both coasts, and there are many who say it will not be able to recover.

I want to illustrate just how these economic policies of the government and the mismanagement by our so-called fishermen's fisheries minister are hurting the fishermen of Canada. The fisheries policy in this country is not a product of a well-thought-out management plan but, rather, a series of haphazard decisions made on a day by day basis in reaction to political pressures from one group or another.

The high interest rate policy of the government is forcing more and more fishermen into bankruptcy. Last June, when we were discussing the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act, I was hard pressed to understand how the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. LeBlanc) wanted to lend more and more money at preferred interest rates to fishermen when there were not enough fish to be provided for the existing fleet. But at that time, of course, fishermen were a good credit risk and, of course, they were borrowing amounts up to $150,000 at one per cent over prime which meant they could borrow at about 13 per cent.

There are now deficits approaching $.5 billion associated with the capitalization of our fishing fleet. Those moneys now carry an interest charge of some 21 per cent. That is creating a tremendous negative impact upon our fishermen. For example, considering a $100,000 vessel, which is not a large vessel by west coast standards, a fisherman would have to pay some $20,000 or $21,000 interest per year merely to service that debt. To make matters worse, the minister is now forcing fishermen on the west coast to restrict their efforts to catch more and more fish each year.

Unlike other industries in Canada, fishermen cannot increase their effort to compensate for higher expenses. The Fraser River gillnet fleet can attest to this. Many of those fishermen made only a few thousand dollars of take-home pay last year, and the dilemma they face this year, in facing the prospect of losing their homes or their vessels, must be placed squarely in the lap of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and the government's indifferent approach to high interest rates.

As mentioned earlier, this House passed legislation last June which guaranteed a fisherman's loan to a maximum of $150,-000 at 1 per cent over prime. The minister at the time indicated that this program would enable the fishermen to retain their independence so they would not have to look to the big fishing companies for financing. The problem now is that the fishermen cannot obtain financing from the processors because they themselves are in tremendous financial difficulty as a result of the high interest policies of this government. Furthermore, that cheap, chiselling Canadian government is garnisheeing the wages of these fishermen through the fishing companies in order to try to balance their budget when the fishermen are faced with absolute bankruptcy.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Shame!

Mr. Siddon: Just recently I received a letter from a constituent of mine who has been a fisherman on the west coast for many years. In April his bank manager informed him that the interest rate on his fisheries improvement loan would be hiked to 19 per cent. Tomorrow, I suppose it will be 21 per cent. I would like to read an excerpt from that letter. My constituent writes:

> Just to give you an example of what we are up against, I just completed two weeks fishing on the west coast during which I was able to get out fishing 3½ days and caught a total of 15 fish worth $308.

He could not even pay for his fuel, let alone the interest on his loan!

> I cannot fish the inside waters where we could do considerably better this time of year due to new regulations introduced this year. I don't think that I have to repeat to you our problems which all seem to be coming to a head this year and will no doubt result in financial failure of some fishermen.

That letter is not an isolated instance. I receive letters like that every day in my office. So I did some checking, and a few days ago we called the Department of Fisheries and Oceans to obtain some information on just how many fishermen were defaulting on their fisheries improvement loans. I was told by an official of the department that to date there have been some 237 requests to rewrite the terms of the loan; that means, to refinance at higher interest rates and longer pay-out periods. One hundred and eighty-six of those loans were to British Columbia fishermen. Of those 186 provisions, the departmental official estimated that between 10 per cent and 15 per cent of those loans to 18 or 25 fishermen had already been defaulted. They were faced with foreclosure.

That sounded bad enough, but I decided to check with a number of banks and credit unions in the Vancouver area. From these sources, the situation turned out to be much worse than that depicted by fisheries department officials. According to bank contacts in Vancouver, many loans were in arrears, and not only those under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act; but the banks have decided to carry the fishermen with the hope that the fishing season will improve from last year's disastrous season, and also because fishermen have historically been good credit risks. However, one official indicated to me that 85 per cent of his loan portfolio to fishermen on the west coast could be called in on very, very valid grounds tomorrow if he chose to do so. Another official at the British Columbia Central Credit Union estimated that 25 per cent of the B.C. fleet is now in serious financial trouble. If the 1981 fishing season does not show a drastic improvement, that percentage will increase substantially.

What frightens me and many fishermen is that this season cannot be any better than the last because the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has imposed tough restrictions on the various gear-type fishermen out on the west coast. If this is the case, it is hard to imagine that the banks will continue to extend credit for another year.

The processing industry in this country is not healthy either. For example, one of the largest packing houses in cannery operations in Canada, the B.C. Packers Company, suffered a $14 million loss last year on a capital investment of $200 million. That is a 7 per cent operating loss. At the Fisheries Council of Canada meeting here this week, we learned that the processors are having a difficult time staying in business because in the last two or three years the percentage of the value of fish returned to fishermen has increased from a traditional average of 45 per cent to some 70 per cent. I am not criticizing that. We want to see the fishermen get a greater percentage of the wholesale value of the produced product. But what we have here is the possibility of a compound failure: that fishermen will have their loans called and the companies which will buy their fish will find themselves collapsing as a consequence. I hope I have made my point very clear. This government has to start to move to cut its spending. It is an absolute waste.

Mr. Pierre Deniger (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Mr. Speaker, it is always an honour and a great pleasure to take part in such a significant debate on the economy. Among other things, the motion introduced by the official opposition party stresses interest rates and the inflation rate. Keeping in mind the short time allotted to me tonight, Mr. Speaker, I will attempt to review the Canadian economic situation as I see it and to suggest five possible and positive solutions to the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), particularly with a view to lightening the burden of inflation for small wage earners.

Oliver Wendell Holmes Jr. once wrote that taxes are the price we must pay for a civilized society. Although Mr. Holmes has lost none of his impressive reputation, his principles do appear increasingly less convincing. Indeed, far be it from us to believe that our civilization is worth all that much, particularly in light of the events of these past few days. Mr. Speaker, the interest rates are very high, they have even reached unprecedented levels. Members opposite and government members as well have given us a whole series of examples of the dramatic effects of those soaring interest rates. Mr. Speaker, certain members on both sides of the House are even standing on the edge of bankruptcy. In my riding of Laprairie on Montreal's south shore, and that includes the cities of Saint-Lambert, Greenfield Park, LeMoyne, Brossard, Laprairie and Candiac, I went to the trouble of sending a questionnaire to my constituents. Over 5,000 took time out to answer and send me the results. Very telling and very significant they are, those results, because to my first question in which I asked my constituents of Laprairie what they thought was the most important topic—and I listed energy, the economy, constitutional reform, international security and North-South relations—out of those five options 57.3 per cent of respondents picked the economy as being the most pressing subject, whereas among the others energy rallied 14 per cent and constitutional reform 9 per cent. Some 57.3 per cent of the people checked the economy as being their first preoccupation and 20 per cent ranked the economy second among their current concerns. It seems obvious therefore that in my riding just as in the riding of all members, the economy is the subject which draws most interest.

Here is a point I want to bring to your attention, Mr. Speaker, because certain members opposite keep harping on it. I asked the people of the riding of Laprairie whether they thought that a price freeze is necessary. Forty-nine per cent of them replied that a price freeze is necessary, against 35 per cent who said no. Surprisingly enough, Mr. Speaker, when I asked about a wage freeze the results were the exact opposite—35 per cent told me that a wage freeze is necessary whereas 48 per cent said that it is not. Therefore, that reflects a certain confusion, a certain dichotomy which now prevails among people about the economic situation, precisely because they hear so many things that they are really wondering who is speaking the truth and who is not.

Mr. Speaker, interest rates are setting the price of money and the price of money, like the price of any other goods, has never been so high. But let us not forget that interest rates are not set artificially, but rather by the market pressures every Thursday. Today, once again, people got together and bid on treasury bills, resulting in a given rate of interest. The forces at play in the marketplace, at least to my mind, are the very foundation of free enterprise, the society we so heartily hope for, the society hon. members of the opposition claim we do not represent.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this interest rate which is set by the market on a weekly basis has now reached a record high. Of course, opposition members keep reminding us that interest rates are rising, that prices are rising, but they forget a carelessness I am quite willing to overlook to mention that the income of all citizens in the country has grown in the last ten years. Lest I am accused of being insensitive, may I be allowed to remind hon. members, and Canadians who are listening to us, that in the past ten years, prices have increased by 90 per cent while the average income of Canadians has easily exceeded those prices by 100 per cent. The increase is therefore considerably greater than that of prices, and this means that we are clearly richer now than we were ten years ago. The fact remains, however, that we have a high inflation rate, and high unemployment.

The cost of money, Mr. Speaker, whether we like it or not, is directly related to inflation, and inflation is 12.4 per cent higher this year than a year ago; if interest rates were not at a higher level than the rate of inflation, no one then could afford to lend money. Money then would no longer have any value. Naturally, no more money would be available because the money lent would not yield as much income as could be earned by borrowing it. The whole economy would crumble. It has often been suggested, as a solution, that the interest rates be reduced artificially, in such an economic situation, to a rate lower than the inflation rate; but that strikes me as an absolutely irresponsible solution.

There is, of course, the problem of the American prime rate which has now reached 19.5 per cent. If the Canadian rate were to be substantially and artificially reduced while the American rate remained at its current level, certain major investors would obviously be seriously tempted to invest whatever money they have in the United States to obtain a higher rate of return. We often praise the wisdom of those Canadians who, every fall when the new interest rate on treasury bonds is announced, sell the bonds they then hold if the new rate is higher and purchase new bonds at the higher rate.

Mr. Speaker, I am referring to the small Canadian investor who has $1,000 or $2,000 invested in these types of bonds. If this small investor can make such a decision, it is easy to imagine what a major investor would do. If there were such an outflow of capital, there would obviously be less capital to invest, and this would inevitably bring about a devaluation of the Canadian dollar and an increase in inflation. Of course, those who would benefit from this devaluated Canadian dollar would certainly be the representatives of export companies, but as we know, Mr. Speaker, these companies are already in a privileged situation and they are making more money than ever before now that the dollar has reached a low mark of 83 cents. And, of course, those who would suffer would be all of us, who would have to pay more for the goods that we import.

Mr. Speaker, in the situation that I have described, there lurks, of course, a tragedy, the tragedy which now affects the small wage earners. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, the small wage earners are the hardest hit by inflation.

Last April, Mr. Jean Poulin wrote in La Presse that, according to the figures supplied by the Quebec Bureau of Statistics, in that province the purchasing power of those in the higher income brackets was constantly increasing as compared with that of small wage earners.

In 1970, for instance, in the mining sector, the average salary was $149.80. In 1980, this salary had gone up to $446.80, a jump of 198 per cent, from which we must subtract a general price increase of 92 per cent, and this gives an actual increase in purchasing power of 106 per cent. This is quite good for the mining sector, which has, of course, known an upsurge. In the business sector, the average salary has increased from $101.68 to $244.70, for an increase of 141 per cent. When the 92 per cent for price increases is subtracted, an actual increase in purchasing power of 49 per cent is obtained.

In the services sector, wages have increased from $91 to $225, or by 145 per cent, minus the price increase of 92 per cent, which gives an actual increase of 53 per cent, and I shall pass by other sectors such as finance, manufacturing, transportation and construction, and simply note that those who suffer the most from inflation are the small wage earners because the gap between high and low wages is constantly increasing.

The unfortunate fact which we must try to correct is the impact of inflation on small wage earners who are the hardest hit by any increase in housing and food costs. A person whose earnings exceed $25,000 may more easily face cost of living increases than a person whose earnings fall between $10,000 and $15,000. I have now come to the point in my speech, Mr. Speaker, where I intend to suggest to the minister tangible and positive action to reduce inflation without penalizing the small wage earners.

Mr. Speaker, first we should stop granting salary increases on a percentage basis; second, we should have a new cost of living index based on the margin between the bare necessities of the small wage earner which take up most of those increases and such necessities obviously include transportation, accommodation and food. Let me dwell on those two suggestions. When I talk about salary increases granted not on a percentage basis but on the basis of a certain amount of money, this is what I mean.

If the total increase in the price of those essential items amounted, let us say, to $1,789 in 1981, it would be utterly unrealistic for a Canadian worker to obtain any salary increase short of the minimum amount actually representing the increase in his cost of living because it is clear that if you earn $40,000 and get a 10 per cent increase, the impact will not be the same as if you earned $10,000 and also got a 10 per cent increase, even though in both cases the same percentage is allowed. It is ridiculous. Mr. Speaker, that the small wage earner who is more severely affected by inflation should get a 10 per cent increase, just like the well-paid worker who has plenty of everything. Mr. Speaker, how could we realistically expect to reduce the gap between the haves and the have-nots in this country unless we develop a new formula for granting wage increases. It is not only the small wage earner who should get that through their heads, but also the unions, the unionized workers, the hon. members of this House, the professionals and a great many others.

Concerning the new cost of living index which I have also suggested, I do not think that including as we do now in the index the costs of luxury items such as new cars and houses makes any sense. It seems to me that they do not represent everyday expenses. It is clear that the price index is altogether erratic and does not really reflect the facts of life. In other words, Mr. Speaker, wage increases should be granted on a dollar basis and not on a percentage basis, and should be tied to the price increase of essential goods and services. The wage increases would therefore be in line with the price increases of our everyday needs.

The haves, the well-to-do, the rich, the higher-income groups would then have to bear the burden of inflation by paying themselves for the higher cost of goods which, I suggest, they are so to speak the only ones to consume, because the small wage earner cannot afford a new car or a new home, Mr. Speaker. When one compares the standard of living of the low-income groups, the have-nots with that of the haves, Mr. Speaker, one finds an absurd and nonsensical situation.

Such anomalies should be corrected once and for all because it is obvious that under that formula, a 10 per cent increase on a $40,000 salary is twice more inflationary than a 10 per cent hike on a $10,000 salary, and this requires, obviously, a new approach in our labour relations, a new method of having a dialogue between labour and management. But if there is no willingness to make new overtures, we will get nowhere in our society.

A third solution, Mr. Speaker, that I want to bring to the attention of the House has to do with a report on regulatory reform on which I had the opportunity of working. The task force was made up, of course, of both opposition and government members and last December we tabled our findings pursuant to our terms of reference. After several months of hearings, I came to the conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that the people who watch us in this House believe that the size of the government must be reduced and that competition among businesses must be encouraged further.

Mr. Speaker, this is exactly what our report deals with, and in my view this unfortunately has not yet been desired by the government, at least to my satisfaction. After numerous hearings we produced a report in which we submitted some 57 recommendations. We urged the minister to give very careful consideration to these 57 recommendations. He gave that commitment, but we have yet to see the results. Although usually patient, I am more and more anxious that the minister give a positive answer to the 57 recommendations in that report. Other solutions, on which unfortunately I cannot dwell this evening for lack of time, deal with something essential in my view, the reduction of bureaucracy in this country and a formal commitment to increase competition and productivity.

I do not share the view that all of our Crown corporations should be sold. But this is a far cry from getting involved into every economic sector. Unfortunately, and I say this in all frankness, often when the government got involved in some particular segment, that segment experienced a slowdown in activity, productivity declined in some cases, and competition suffered because governments have resources that small businesses do not have.

Mr. Speaker, I have proposed this evening five measures that are essential in my view if we are once and for all to tackle positively the problems of inflation. To conclude, let me remind hon. members and all those who are listening today that Canada has no other choice but to fight inflation. Where differences may arise is on the ways of doing this. Hon. members opposite offered some suggestions and we offered others. I for one suggested ways to fight inflation especially as it affects the poorer Canadians, those who are without means as compared to those who are in better financial circumstances. I especially stated the case of the poorer elements of our society because they are the hardest hit by inflation.

Mr. Speaker, I avoided tonight the short-term measures which unfortunately are often proposed in this House by politicians who are more inclined to put forward politically acceptable rather than economically acceptable solutions. There is no easy answer to this problem and the situation will only get worse unless we are prepared today to make the necessary sacrifices. If the Minister of Finance was here tonight I would say to him: Mr. Minister, I would not want your job for anything in the world. But you are doing a great job and you have my support all the way.

[English]

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who preceded me mentioned that if the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) were here, he would make certain remarks. I am sad that he is not here because I would not tell him that he is doing a good job. Interest rates are running at 20 per cent. We have massive government deficits and massive balance of payments problems. I do not see how anyone in his right mind could tell the Minister of Finance that he is doing a good job. I do not see how any Canadian, whether he be a businessman, engaged in farming or running a household, could tell that minister he is doing a good job. That is one of the problems we have with the economy today.

I spent some time in my riding during the past two or three weeks. I had a chance to talk to the people who make this country productive, those who meet the payrolls and talk to their bankers on a regular basis. A feeling of almost helplessness pervades many of those I spoke to. They have the feeling that nobody knows what they are doing. It is incumbent that all of us stay away from the rhetoric of which the chairman of the finance committee spoke here this afternoon and make some real suggestions to the government to help with this situation.

Many people are very unhappy with what they hear from the economists. It makes one think that nobody understands what is going on in the economy. That is the problem with economists, there are too many fuzzy thinkers today.

This reminds me of a story, and if I can have your indulgence I will relate it very briefly. This story involves a man who bought a hot air balloon. I think hot air is something that should not be unfamiliar to this chamber. On a Sunday afternoon, this man decided he was going to fly his balloon. He got a friend to go with him. They got out in the country and found a field from which they could fly their balloon. They got it up and got going. During the heat of the day, some clouds developed. They got into the clouds and could not see the ground. They became very concerned about how they were going to manage this balloon. All of a sudden they drifted into a clearing and there was a man down in a field below them. They hollered down to this man: "Where are we?" The man heard them, looked up at the balloon and said: "You are in a balloon". Just then the two balloonists drifted off into the clouds and they could not talk to the man on the ground. The one friend said to the other: "That looked like an economist to me". The other man said: "Why would that look like an economist? I thought it was a farmer out in his field." His friend said: "Who else could give us such accurate, precise and utterly useless information except an economist?"

I think this is what is happening to our economy. Everybody talks about 20 per cent interest rates, they talk about big balance of payments deficits and they talk about billions of dollars that nobody can comprehend. Yet nobody does anything, or appears to be able to do anything, about our economic problems. This is a very sad situation. I think an admonition can be directed in this respect at the Bank of Canada.

We saw the present Governor of the Bank of Canada at the helm of that institution in the 1973-74 period when the money supply increased at the rate of as much as 20 per cent for no apparent reason. I should not say it was for no apparent reason because it was to help finance increased government deficits created by members opposite who then formed the government. We saw the Bank of Canada maintain our dollar at a premium in the 1976-77 period when we had, for no structural or productive reason, a dollar that was overvalued. They kept the value of the dollar high simply by raising interest rates artificially.

I would argue very strongly that we are making a mistake now by using interest rates to regulate the value of our dollar externally. I do not know who decides on this magic figure of 82 cents, 83 cents or 84 cents for our Canadian dollar, but clearly that is what is going on at the weekly auctions every Thursday that take place at the Bank of Canada. We witnessed it today when, for the first time that I am aware of, 90-day treasury bills yielded the same as 180-day treasury bills, that is, 18.73 per cent. Normally there is quite a spread between the close on 90-day bills and the 180-day bills. This indicates there was massive intervention by the Bank of Canada today in that auction.

To my mind that is certainly not a floating interest rate. It is an interest rate that is regulated in terms of keeping the value of the Canadian dollar at a certain level. There are many of us who would sooner see, if that is an option, and I think it is a real option to some degree, a lower Canadian dollar and, as a result, a lower interest rate. If what I hear from some bankers and some economists is right, when they say they think our dollar is undervalued, there should be no concern about honestly letting the dollar float.

In fact, the real value of the dollar is determined by our international dealings and the demand for our dollars as a result of the ability of our Canadian dollar to buy what Canadians produce. If in fact our Canadian economy is only as productive as a 75-cent dollar, an 80-cent dollar or a 90-cent dollar would indicate, it would seem to me that should be the proper way to determine the value of the Canadian dollar. Let it honestly be determined on the marketplace. To do otherwise is to kid ourselves.

I argued this point in 1976-77 when we kept our dollar artificially at a higher level than it should have been for structural and productive reasons. When the crunch came, we saw the value of our dollar fall lower than it needed to. I believe very strongly that we are making that same kind of mistake today.

The Minister of Finance said in the House yesterday in the course of debate, as reported at page 9532 of Hansard:

> If, in the course of debate today and tomorrow, hon. members can bring forward some new, alternative ideas that, because of their validity, would demand immediate implementation, then I would consider doing that very thing.

I would point out to him that many of us in this House have moved motions under Standing Order 43 to refer the very serious interest rate question to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. I will read into the record again a motion I had the opportunity to propose on Wednesday, April 22, which appears at page 9383 of Hansard. This motion has exactly the same wording as a motion which we accepted when we were the government. It was moved by the now Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) in October, 1979. If the Minister of Finance is really serious about finding some solutions to high interest rates, I would challenge him to accept the reference to the finance committee that we accepted when we were in government.

The motion is as follows:

> That this House immediately order its Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs to undertake an immediate review of the interest rate policy of this government and the Bank of Canada, and that for this purpose the governor of the bank and the Minister of Finance appear before it to explain their actions and what they will be doing to solve the problems which the governor of the bank himself said, regarding interest rates, are now being caused for individuals and business.

As I said, a similar motion was accepted by our government back in October 1979 when interest rates were in the range of 13 per cent or 14 per cent. Today interest rates are at 20 per cent. If there was an urgency about the matter then, which we as the government found legitimate, certainly that urgency is all the more legitimate now when we see interest rates at the astronomical figure of 20 per cent.

When one sees the Bank of Canada setting bank interest rates at 18.98 per cent it makes one think that very soon we are going to have prime rates in this country at 20 per cent. Most lines of credit for prime borrowers from the bank who operate under this kind of a floating rate, have their interest rates calculated monthly, so that on an annual basis they are operating with an interest rate at over 20 per cent. To me this is an astronomical, a killer figure as far as keeping our economy productive is concerned.

I know 20 minutes is not a long time but I would like very briefly, if I may, to relate some of my remarks to agriculture and the way that industry needs to use credit, and to conclude by offering what I think are some positive suggestions to the government that do not imply or indicate increased government spending.

Briefly, agriculture is a very large user of credit. Not only is it a large user of credit, it is a very important sector of the Canadian economy. It is important, I would argue, for three reasons. A productive agricultural economy is the foundation of any developed country. I am proud to point out again, and proud to be part of the agricultural industry, that Canadian consumers spend as small a percentage of their take-home pay on food as consumers in any other country in the world. We in this country are privileged to be able to feed ourselves on something like 18 per cent of our disposable income. This is on an average; I am not talking about many people who are unfortunately unable to get by on their earnings and spend less than 18 per cent on food. On the average, 18 per cent of our take-home pay is spent on food. That means that over 80 per cent can be spent on other things such as colour TV, paid vacations, and still be able to enjoy short work weeks and many other things we take for granted in this country.

In order to accomplish that, the Canadian agricultural industry over the years has had to become very, very productive. In fact, as an industry it has increased its productivity more than any other sector of our economy. As I said, I am proud to be associated with an industry which has that kind of a record.

In addition, over the last number of years not only have we in agriculture been able to lower the amount of the disposable income Canadians spend on food, we have also, at the same time, been able to increase our exports. We as the Canadian agricultural industry, even though we import something like $5 billion worth of food, still export close to $9 billion worth of food. Having regard to the surplus in the balance of payments, the Canadian agricultural industry is responsible for large foreign earnings. This is very important to the Canadian dollar, because as we earn more Canadian dollars, there is less pressure on our Canadian dollar and this helps hold the value of the Canadian dollar at a higher level, and therefore allows the government to get by with lower interest rates.

It seems to me that if the government were serious in some of its long-range economic plans, it should be encouraging this very important part of our Canadian economy, the agricultural industry, to increase its capacity to produce and increase our exports of agricultural products. In the process of doing this, we will be lowering the amount of the disposable income we spend on food, we will also be increasing our foreign earnings and thereby alleviating the serious situation in which we find ourselves today.

I also think we have an obligation to the rest of the world. We as Canadians have under our control something like five times more arable land per citizen than any other country in the world.

● (2100)

We have an obligation in that regard to see that we make use of this land as best we can because, as we all know, we as a global entity are not expanding our food production as fast as the world population is growing.

In terms of the Canadian economy, some 10 per cent of our gross national product is produced by the agricultural industry. One out of four, or 25 per cent of the labour force, is involved in some way or another in the agrifood sector of Canada. This gives us an idea of how important agriculture is, not only to the agricultural community but also to the whole economy.

I would like to talk specifically for a minute about the Canadian beef industry. Many of us have come to rely on beef as a staple in our diets. In fact, on average 2.5 per cent of consumer spending is on beef. The beef industry in Canada is a very large user of credit. It has been stated many times before that as interest rates fluctuate on a daily, weekly or monthly basis, the beef industry in Canada is certainly not able to adjust to higher and changing interest rates.

Very briefly, much of the crop which is in the ground now in many parts of the country is being sown with the idea that it should be consumed by livestock. That means that much of the crop which is being sown will not be marketed for a year or even longer. It might not be marketed through livestock for as long as 15 months. When interest rates change, as they have in the past two or three years, producers simply cannot adjust to short-term interest rate changes. It is the planting season in our country and many producers are now in the process of committing themselves to a year or a year and a half production period, and they are committing themselves not to market much of the crop which is going in the ground now until the summer of 1982. They cannot adjust to short-term interest rates. This is a very large problem for many producers.

A feedlot of 500 or 600 head is not a particularly large feedlot, but it could be considered to be of a size sufficient to be a family operation. Many operators of feedlots of this size are now paying as much as $100 in interest a day. Farmers are met with many uncertainties. They meet uncertainties with respect to weather conditions, rainfall, hail, disease and many other things, but most farmers would agree that the biggest uncertainty they face is government decisions. One of the government decisions over which producers have no control whatsoever is with respect to what interest rates will be. Rather than go through that kind of uncertainty, this year many farmers will choose not to produce at all. With interest rates at the 20 per cent level, one cannot do very much but agree with them. That is one of the very real problems we have now.

The Governor of the Bank of Canada has said many times that monetary policy, or raising or lowering interest rates, and regulating the supply of money is only one factor in fighting inflation. He is fighting it from the demand side by trying to slow down the rate at which people borrow and thereby slow down the inflationary expectations people in this country have. But when we have a 20 per cent interest rate, I argue very strongly that that hurts more on the supply side than it helps on the demand side because, as the example I have just given illustrates, an interest rate of 20 per cent chases people out of the beef industry and thereby puts less beef on the consumer's plate over the next year or year and a half. That will drive prices up drastically because there will not be as much beef available. The supposed cure we are being fed by this government and the Bank of Canada, namely, high interest rates, will actually do more damage on the supply side and thereby make inflation worse. This is something the government fails to realize. That is why many people are becoming very sick and tired of some of the fuzzy ideas and statistics we are being fed. It is time many of us took a look at the real situation in the real world. The real situation is not found in this chamber, and certainly not in offices where paper is shuffled. The real world is out where the real production goes on in this country.

I will give the House another example. Many people have pointed out that in the northern hemisphere we have six months of winter and six months to get ready for it. In many areas of this country that means when you raise cows, you spend half of the year feeding them. That is a direct cost. When interest rates are at 20 per cent, by far the biggest cost of maintaining a cow in western Canada is the interest cost. That cost is greater than the cost of feeding that animal for six months of the year.

We find ourselves in an absolutely ludicrous position. Let us not kid ourselves into thinking that high interest rates will help reduce inflation, when actually they are driving out the very basic business we need in this country, and that is food production.

To quote some figures, last year Canadian farmers paid some $1.5 billion in interest. This year the estimate is that they could pay as much as $2 billion in interest. That is an increase of roughly one third over last year's interest costs. We all know that last year's interest costs were very high. According to the figures I have here, the cost of money has increased two and a half times faster than the cost of any other commodity with which a farmer has to work. It is one factor to have that cost go up, but to have it go up, not to be able to calculate it in terms of budgeting and to have it increase in an unpredictable fashion is even worse. As I said previously, the biggest variable with which any of us in the agricultural community work is the variable which is associated with government because there really is no rhyme or reason for some of the things governments do.

I have five suggestions to make to the government. If the Minister of Finance is serious about what he said yesterday in question period, I challenge him to take some of the suggestions I am about to make extremely seriously. My first suggestion is to make the small business development bond available to unincorporated businesses and to make it available for purposes other than the very limited capital items for which it is now available. I will elaborate on that, if I might. As we all know, the small business development bond has limitations to it. It is limited to $500,000. You can only have it once, and it is limited now to incorporated businesses. Its rate is set over a period of five years. It is a fixed rate, and it is set at half the prime rate plus whatever one can negotiate with the bank, usually between 1 per cent and 2 per cent. At present, if we have a 20 per cent prime rate and if we take half of that, that would be 10 per cent. If we added, let us say, 1.5 per cent, we would be looking at 11.5 per cent as opposed to 20 per cent. That certainly is a very significant reduction in the interest rate. The beauty of this small business development bond concept to me is, first, that administratively we do not create a large bureaucracy. All we have is a very small number of people over in the Department of Finance approving these bonds as they come in. They look at them to see that they fit the categories defined—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am almost sorry Your Honour had to interrupt the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer) because as a general rule he makes a great deal of sense, and I enjoy listening to him because he has productive and useful things to say about the problems we discuss. I was very happy that in advance of this particular discussion he was able to come over and talk to us about some of the things he was going to say tonight.

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I understand that my colleague, the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer) had only two more minutes to go in order to complete his wise remarks. I wonder if the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans) would yield to the hon. member—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. There seems to be a disposition to accord extra time for the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer).

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Mayer: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and I appreciate the indulgence of the House. I did not realize my time went so quickly.

To put it briefly, the small business development bond should be "liberalized," if I can use that word. I think everyone opposite would agree with that.

Second, the Canadian Wheat Board initial payments should be set as high as possible. The Canadian Wheat Board is able to borrow at prime minus one-quarter per cent. When we have high interest rates, cash flow becomes almost as important as price. The government should encourage the Canadian Wheat Board to set initial payments as high as possible. The minister currently responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board decided not to announce initial prices until after seeding is completed. I think that was a mistake.

Third, the Agricultural Stabilization Act is the law of the land. We all know that there will be a pay-out to hog producers this year. That pay-out should be made as quickly as possible. Can hon. members believe that we are a year behind in some of those payments? If use of the Agricultural Stabilization Act could be made with respect to the hog industry, or whatever industry it is to apply to this year, as quickly as possible, that would assist producers significantly with their cash flows.

• (2110)

Fourth, I suggest we have fixed financing for livestock and other farming operations so that a person who has to feed cattle for six months or a year could go into a bank and instead of having his loan rate float, he could fix his interest rate for the productive period of that enterprise, just as is done now for a house mortgage.

There should also be some other way of rationing credit. For instance, at the moment I can get a loan to go to Florida cheaper than I can get a loan to buy a tractor. That is not right. It is a misuse of credit.

Finally, in my opinion, the structure of the Bank of Canada should be changed to have at least two elected members from this House sitting on the bank's board of directors. The Bank of Canada has more to do with fiscal policy than we think it has. That is the basis of our whole parliamentary system to have elected members oversee fiscal affairs. I would argue very strongly that having elected members on the board of directors of the Bank of Canada would be very beneficial to us in the long run.

I thank the House again for its indulgence in allowing me some extra time.

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, I was very happy to relinquish some time to the hon. member for Portage-Marquette so that his recommendations could be put on the record. I can assure him that I will look at them very carefully and so will the minister.

Yesterday I spoke on the motion specifically dealing with interest rates and I tried to deal with the fundamental factors that were underlying the current level of interest rates, why interest rates are where they are and what factors determine interest rates.

Tonight I want to expand into the relationship between interest rates, the economy and economic growth and what the government has done about these things. Today we have heard some criticism of the government's economic policy. Some members from the opposition indicated that the federal government has no consistent economic policy. That is simply not correct. The federal government does have an economic policy which is consistent and, given the appropriate time taken for economic policy to take effect, the government's policy will be effective. It will yield the kinds of results that we all want to have, which are lower unemployment, higher economic growth, greater job creation, going along with lower unemployment, lower rates of inflation and thereby lower rates of interest.

The government's economic policy has three basic thrusts to it. These were laid out in the budget speech which was presented by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). The first major thrust of the government's budgetary and economic policy was to restrain government spending. Hon. members opposite may say that was not a serious proposition put forward by the Minister of Finance, but it was a very serious proposition. In fact, we have done better than was forecast in the budget of last October.

The second major thrust of the budget and the government's policy is the reordering of the government's priorities in expenditures toward greater expenditures in the areas of economic development, industrial readjustment and job creation. There have been a number of programs introduced in the area of job creation by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy). The other day, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) laid out in his speech a very comprehensive framework within which he will be constructing, along with the rest of the cabinet, his industrial policy for Canada. There is a great amount of hope in that framework because it is very comprehensive and one which promises to be workable and to move Canada in the direction we all want it to move. Specifically, Canada has greater manufacturing capability, more growth and more job creation in areas that will enable Canada to have a real economic and industrial future.

The final thrust of the government's economic and budgetary policy is the thrust toward reducing the rate of inflation through a monetary policy which deals with the fundamentals giving rise to inflation.

We have heard members of the official opposition and members of the New Democratic Party calling for a new budget not only today but previously. But let us look at the facts. Let us look at the situation which has arisen subsequent to last October's budget. When I spoke during the budget debate, I spoke strongly in support of the Minister of Finance. Events, I think, will prove that we were right in supporting the Minister of Finance in that budget because it was a good budget and it is working.

Since last October what have we seen? Take the fourth quarter of 1980, at the beginning of which the budget was introduced. In that fourth quarter and in the remaining 1980-1981 fiscal year, the minister forecast growth rates in the economy and he forecast unemployment rates. The minister talked about job creation and housing starts as well. All of those things outlined in the budget were relatively pessimistic. The outlook was not the way we would have liked to have seen it. But everything was presented very forthrightly in the budget by the Minister of Finance. What has happened subsequently? The events which have transpired since then have laid bare the criticism of the opposition. This criticism still arises today, even flying in the face of what has happened over the last six months in Canada. I ask again, what have we seen over the last six months?

In the fourth quarter of 1980 we had an annualized growth rate of 8 per cent. In the first quarter of 1981, we have an annualized growth rate, because the figures are not yet finalized, of between 4 per cent and 6 per cent. Those are very high growth rates by Canadian standards, and they are very high growth rates by world standards. In other words, we have had a very strong record of economic growth in the last six months, much above what was forecast in the budget of October 28.

Let me ask what has happened with regard to unemployment. The Minister of Finance put forward a pessimistic outlook with regard to employment. But instead, as the minister pointed out, for the month of April we had the lowest unemployment rate we have had in the last five years. We have a seasonally adjusted unemployment rate of 7 per cent. What did the budget forecast? It forecast unemployment to be over 8 per cent. Therefore, we have done much better than what was forecast in the budget, both in economic growth and in the area of unemployment. Part of that is as a result of how much better we have done in the area of job creation than the budget forecast. As both the Minister of Employment and Immigration, and the Minister of Finance mentioned, we have created 346,000 jobs in the last twelve months. We have seen employment in Canada grow by 3.3 per cent. That is the highest rate of growth of employment of any country in the industrialized world bar none. In the area of job creation, Canada has consistently had the highest rate of job growth over the last ten years. That pattern is continuing. The government is committed to creating jobs and to giving opportunities to Canadians. It is committed to providing the kind of environment in which the private sector can create opportunities for Canadians as well. The proof is right there in the facts, not in the rhetoric of the opposition but in the facts. The facts are there.

Let us look at housing starts. We do have a situation in Canada in which lower-income Canadians are having difficulty if they wish to buy a house. But to say that the housing market is in a shambles is not facing the facts. Housing starts are well above 240,000 units a year, which is in the upper range of what Canadians have historically experienced in past years. The housing market, as far as new construction is concerned, is picking up. It is booming.

We could go on and on and look at statistics in other areas. I would like to focus on the budget itself and on the government's commitment to fiscal restraint, to restraint of government expenditure and to a reduction of the deficit and financial requirements. Today the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) and other opposition members told us that in fact government spending is out of control, that the deficit and financial requirements are out of control, and that the government is putting excessive pressures on the financial markets. If we look at the budget figures and what was projected in it, we will see that a reduction was projected in the rate of growth of federal government expenditures. Also there was projected a reduction over time of the deficit and, of course, a reduction in financial requirements which is the amount the federal government must borrow in capital markets.

The facts are that we have done appreciably better than what was forecast in the budget. We have not done worse, we have done better. In fiscal year 1980-81 which just finished, expenditures are $300 million less than were forecast in the budget. The budget deficit has been reduced by over $1.4 billion which is below what was forecast in the budget. The financial requirements in 1980-81 were $1.8 billion less than forecast in the budget.

Mr. Beatty: Forecast!

Mr. Evans: I hear the hon. member opposite. In fact, when the budget was introduced, we heard from hon. members opposite that the federal government was fooling people, that the estimates were low and were not realistic. They suggested that we would do far worse than was projected, that those were illusory numbers and far below what the government would achieve. In fact, we have done appreciably better than what we forecast in the budget, yet they were called unrealistic numbers by members of the opposition. This clearly indicates the commitment of the Minister of Finance and the government to the two major thrusts which I indicated regarding the budget: restraining government spending and reordering priorities in the government toward economic development, growth, job creation and industrial adjustment. The commitment is there. The programs are coming forward. The job will be done, and it will be done with fiscal responsibility.

In the last two days most of the attention has been focused on the area of interest rates. Sometimes it is very difficult for individual members of Parliament, who deal with very real and pressing problems of constituents, to see beyond those individual problems to the broader macroproblem. I am referring to the problem of how to reorder the economic situation to make the over-all economic situation better for all Canadians. As is often the case, the way to solve the problem for all Canadians is not by trying to solve the problems of every individual Canadian. In some cases we must try to see the forest as well as the trees. This is the case with regard to inflation.

Today the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) indicated that the way to solve our problem was to bring in expenditure programs to subsidize Canadians who were being adversely affected by high interest rates. All Canadians who borrow, irrespective of whether they are farmers, fishermen, foresters, small businessmen, home owners, or consumers who may want to buy, for example, new cars to drive to work, are adversely affected by high interest rates. Should we bring in a special program to assist one group? For example, if we are to bring in a program to assist farmers, why would we bring in a special expenditure program to assist them in coping with the very real difficulties they face with high interest rates and not do the same thing for fishermen, home owners or small businessmen?

Today the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition suggested a program to introduce a mortgage interest and property tax credit. If we look at the 1979 budget of the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) and ask ourselves how much that program would cost annually when fully implemented, we would be looking at a program which would cost over $2.5 billion per year. If we talk about an energy tax credit, we are talking about half a billion dollars to $1 billion per year. If we brought in an expenditure program to assist all groups which have, justifiably, been identified by hon. members opposite as well as by members on this side of the House, and we say that all of these groups affected by the present high interest rate situation should be subsidized by the federal government, we would find that the only way to do it would be to give way on the expenditure restraint, on the commitment to reduce the deficit, and on the commitment to bring inflation under control. If we give way on the fight against inflation, we will not have lower interest rates; they will be higher. Inflation causes interest rates to be what they are; it is not the other way around. If inflation is at 13 per cent or 14 per cent, the interest rates will be 18 per cent or 19 per cent. If the inflation rate is 20 per cent or 22 per cent, the interest rates will be 25 per cent to 27 per cent.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Evans: If we looked at the inflation rate in the state of Israel and its interest rates, if we looked at the inflation rate in Brazil and its interest rates, we would see that inflation determines interest rates.

Mr. Kempling: I cannot believe this.

Mr. Evans: If the country is to prosper in the future, above all else, we must bring the rate of inflation under control. By doing so, we will bring interest rates under control, we will continue the economic growth of the last six months, continue the job creation of the last six months, and continue the housing starts of the last six months.

Mr. Kempling: You could not run a peanut stand; you would go bankrupt.

Mr. Evans: Some people have told us that the Governor of the Bank of Canada is following the wrong policy. As I indicated last night—

Mr. Kempling: It was the same garbage.

Mr. Evans: Obviously I am speaking the truth and it is hurting hon. members of the opposition because they are coming alive. In fact, the official whip of the opposition has never been more animated for a man of his size; it is quite something.

As I indicated last night, the prime factor in the interest rates we face today is the rate of inflation. It is the prime determining factor of interest rates. The second factor is the transition phase through which we are going in bringing inflation under control. It involves a reduction in the growth rate in the money supply. If the Bank of Canada reduces the growth rate in the money supply, it means the real funds available for borrowing in capital markets are reduced, but at the same time we are facing increasing demands on capital markets for lending funds. So there is an increasing demand for credit at the same time as we are trying to restrain the supply of available funds in order to bring inflation under control. This is causing pressure on interest rates. Also, as I mentioned last night, the last factor is the high rates in the United States which lead to cash flows in and out of Canada as interest rates fluctuate. If our rates drop significantly below the United States rates, funds will flow out. This will mean lower amounts of lending funds in Canada, which means the supply of funds will diminish and, for a given demand, interest rates will go up or the dollar will drop. Some hon. members have said that we should let the dollar drop. We import at the present time 25 per cent to 30 per cent of our gross national product. If we allow the dollar to drop dramatically from its current level, and if we are really concerned about inflation, we should think about the impact of a dramatic drop in the value of the dollar on the inflation rate when 25 per cent to 30 per cent of the cost of what we import immediately rises by exactly the amount of the drop in the dollar. We are talking about food and energy. We are talking about manufactured products and about a great many services and goods which Canadians buy every day in the marketplace. That is not a solution because by dropping the dollar you immediately feed inflation. When you feed inflation, you do not lead the country to lower interest rates. In fact, you lead the country to higher interest rates in the short term. We cannot allow a declining dollar policy. We cannot let inflation go. We cannot follow expenditure programs which will be inflationary and which will lead to increased government expenditures, because that will be inflationary. Inflationary policies like that will not lead to lower interest rates. They will lead to higher interest rates in the very near future. The best solution to our problem is the government policy which is firmly set to do three things: reduce inflation, reduce government deficits in the growth of expenditures and reflect government spending and—

• (2130)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I must say that I listened with interest to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Evans). He certainly does paint a glowing and wonderful picture, does he not?

Miss MacDonald: Marvellous.

Mr. Deans: I returned from Hamilton on the weekend and I wish to share with the parliamentary secretary something which might just dampen his enthusiasm ever so slightly. I had discussions with a number of young families who at the end of this month will not be able to renew their mortgages. I say to the parliamentary secretary that all of your statistics and all of your grand pronouncements pale into insignificance when you look at the effect of this government's policies on people who go out every day and work for a living, who at the end of the year find that the wages they earn have not kept pace with the cost of living. They find that the wages they worked so hard to earn do not allow them to refinance the house they purchased five years ago. I want to put this to the parliamentary secretary: Statistics be damned! I am sick and tired of hearing government members talking about the statistical benefits which flow from this policy which is being pursued, and which is creating great hardships for so many Canadians in every part of this country in almost every walk of life. I find it extremely difficult to contain the anger I feel when I look around the country and when I speak to the people whom each of us in this House supposedly represents. I find that these people are being put into difficult financial positions and that the government shrugs and says "Well, statistics tell us that things are better; we can look forward to happy days." I expect the band to strike up "Happy Days are Here Again" any moment.

Fortunately, or unfortunately, there are those of us who take a look not only at what is written down in a statistical sense but who look at the impact of what has happened. When I was preparing my comments for this evening, I thought I would take a moment to review some of the comments which have been made by other members of the house of Commons in other days about the events of the day. I will take but a moment to do that because I think it is important. I want to say to you, Mr. Speaker, that I find this whole debate frustrating. I find it frustrating because on either side of the House—and I am sure the hon. member for Kingston and The Islands (Miss MacDonald) will forgive me for saying this—I hear a great deal being said. But when I look at the record of events which have taken place over the course of the last few years I can juxtapose the two. I can put the official opposition back in government and the government back in the official opposition. I can hear exactly the same statements being made. A year ago, on October 26, 1979, the headlines read "High rates 'crucifying' Crosbie concedes". Another headline read "Crosbie backs interest hike". Another said "Will keep interest up to beat inflation: PCs". There is another unbelievable one which reads: "We live in tough times: Crosbie". Another reads "Time to tough it out Tories warn Canada as inflation mounts". I think to myself, is it not strange, there they were in government saying exactly the same things that the government of today is saying about the conditions which exist today. I will give the Conservatives credit, things were not as bad then as they are now. Things were not as bad for the people of Canada at that time as they are now.

The interesting thing is that while the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) and others were saying these things on the other side of the House, when the government was in opposition, we had the hon. member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray), who is now Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, saying:

> —in view of the professed desire of the government to see domestic oil prices rise quickly to world levels, are not the acting minister and his government in fact telling the Canadian people that their policy is to have this country move into a recession?

He then goes on to say:

> How can the government continue to justify supporting a policy of following American interest rates so closely, to what are record levels in Canada, when the soundness of the basis of the American policy has been called into question by U.S. experts? Why does the government not act now to prevent our economy from becoming another Three-Mile Island?

There he was in all his splendour in opposition yapping and yipping about what was going on. Then he gets put into government, and what happens? Things get worse.

Then there was the then leader of the opposition, who is now Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), suggesting that the prime minister of the day, the hon. member for Yellowhead (Mr. Clark) was accepting the record high interest rates without doing anything about it. We saw the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) first quoting the then minister of finance saying:

> These people are being crucified with an 11½ per cent mortgage rate—

Those are the words of the then minister of finance. Last week they were being crucified with an 18 per cent mortgage rate. At the time of the 11½ per cent mortgage rate, the hon. member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy) said:

> Would the minister make the judgment now that, as a result of his policies and his government's policies we have the mortgage rate going up to 14½ per cent, the people of Canada are not being crucified but are being drawn and quartered—

Where is the consistency? I could go on and on. It is embarrassing to read these items. I am surprised that members on both sides are not offended and quitting en masse over the positions which they have put forward in the House over the course of the last two years. Then the government has the nerve to get up and tell us, through the parliamentary secretary, that things are getting better.

Let us take a look at how good things are for a moment. I do not know whether the statistics are new or, for that matter, of any interest, because I doubt very much if anything much will happen in the next year. However, let me tell you that the consumer price index has gone up, since March of 1977, by 37.4 per cent. The automobile price index has gone up by 49.1 per cent in the same period. The gasoline prices in Canada have gone up by 75.4 per cent. The prime rate has gone up 140 per cent plus between 1977 and 1981.

It is interesting to note, though, that not everyone was suffering while this was going on because, of course, the profits of the five major banks went up 76 per cent from 1977 to 1980. That was while all of these very high and onerous costs were being borne by the Canadian public. The assets of the five major banks went up by 96 per cent from 1977 through 1980. While that was going on, bankruptcies rose in Canada between 1977 and 1980 by 65 per cent. So on the one hand we are getting higher and higher costs, and on the other hand we are getting wages which are not keeping pace with the inflation level and are falling behind by 1 per cent or 2 per cent a year. The banks are making ever increasing profit margins. People in business and private individuals across this country are losing their businesses and their homes, and yet we are told that things are getting better.

From March of 1980 to March of 1981 bankruptcies in this country have gone up by 29 per cent, and this government sits and twiddles its thumbs and tells us that good things are about to happen. What about those people who have already lost? Who speaks for them? What about the families which cannot find homes to live in because they cannot afford to pay the cost? Who speaks for them? How do we compensate them when things get better? what do we say to them when they have lost $10,000 which they have saved over the course of many years because they could not meet the onerous and usurious rates being charged by the banks? Do we go and apologize, send them a get well card or a sympathy card perhaps? Do we tell them that we are really sorry we did not do anything about it, that it is unfortunate and it is just one of the facts of life? "The statistics are good, so do not feel badly about it. The fact that you have lost everything, we cannot do anything about that." We are just going to sit back and hope that somehow, by some magical, mystical means, inaction will resolve the problem. I do not think inaction can resolve the problem. I have said many times in this House that we have reached a critical point for many Canadian families. We reached it, in fact, about a year ago.

As my leader said yesterday and again today, there are more than a thousand families in Canada which at the end of this month will have to walk away from their homes because they cannot refinance them at the current interest rates. No one can tell me that it is impossible for us in the House of Commons to do something about a situation which has been allowed to occur over the course of successive Liberal and Tory governments since 1975. No one can tell me that it is impossible for us to find a way to bring interest rates down to a level—at least for those home owners who are faced with exorbitant rates today—which can be managed within the income levels of the majority of people. No one can tell me that we must simply sit back and watch while people are left to their own devices, while people walk away and leave their homes or lose their businesses and, perhaps, in the process, lose their homes because they have to go out and mortgage them to keep their businesses going, at a time when the Royal Bank increased its profits between 1977 and 1980 by 94 per cent.

No one can tell me that it is reasonable and fair that the farmer who can no longer make enough money to pay the mortgage will have to leave his farm and go bankrupt, at a time when the Bank of Montreal increased its profits between 1977 to 1980 by 115 per cent. No one can tell me that it is a reasonable thing. We should take a look at the people in this country who are struggling to maintain an economy which is being allowed to be undermined by outside influences, people who cannot get wages which will keep pace with the cost of living. No one can tell me that such a situation is reasonable while the Bank of Nova Scotia has increased its profits between 1977 and 1980 by almost 69 per cent. No one can tell me that the manager of the Toronto-Dominion Bank should have reason to expect an increase of 82 per cent in profits at the same time as he looks families straight in the eye in his office and says, "We cannot renew your mortgage because we have to charge more than you can afford."

Is that the kind of economy and is that the kind of system we live in? Is that what has become of Canada? Is that the level we are at in the House of Commons that we can find no way to rechannel some of that excess profit to provide mortgages for people at a price that they can afford? Is that the level to which we have fallen in the country? Is it now reasonable, is it acceptable, that some should be able to get a usurious return while others are forced out of their homes? Is that the level Canada has reached? I wonder. I wonder, and the government sits and tells me that, according to statistical analyses, things are getting better. Things are getting better! I dwell on the subject of banks because they are, in fact, the beneficiaries of all of this; but they are not the only beneficiaries. I want to make it clear that I understand that for large business there is a much better opportunity for absorbing the higher interest rates because they have access to money that small businesses or individual farmers do not. However, I want to say that I dwell on the subject of banks because we must start there.

It is impossible for a small business to carry the inventory necessary to remain in business at the kind of bridge financing costs that they now face. It is impossible, and we now know that. Do we do anything about it? No, we wring our hands and we walk away and say that statistically, things are getting better. But while we are walking away and while my relative is leaving his small business because it is impossible for him to survive—and I suspect that is true of the relatives and friends of others in the House—the Royal Bank has increased its assets by 79 per cent between 1977 and 1980. That is an increase in assets. However, while the farmer whom I know, who has been struggling for a number of years just to keep his head above water, working his heart out, trying to make sure that he maintains the family farm in order to provide the food that we have to eat, is putting off the purchase of machinery because he cannot afford the additional cost which is levied as the result of high interest rates, the Bank of Montreal increases its assets by the enormous amount of 110 per cent between 1977 and 1980.

I could go on with it because the Bank of Nova Scotia increased its profits by 100 per cent; the Imperial Bank of Commerce, by 85 per cent; the Toronto-Dominion Bank, by 91 per cent. We are not all suffering. We are not all suffering at all. I want to suggest that this House of Commons is not here to protect the banking interest. It is here to make it reasonable to do business in Canada. It is here for the purpose of writing laws which allow people to make reasonable profits. It is here also to represent the views of the 23-plus million Canadians who live in every part of this country and who, today, are asking, begging—they should be demanding—that we stop this nonsense and get on with dealing with what is fundamentally wrong with this economy.

If it is true that the level of the Canadian dollar must fall, then the level of the Canadian dollar must fall! If the outcome of that is that imported products are more expensive, so be it. It is entirely possible, in fact it is probable, that Canadians might then buy Canadian-made products. This would increase the level of productivity and use up that 20-plus per cent of unused capacity that exists in Canada today and it would put more people to work and generate more goods.

When I asked a question today, the hon. member for Willowdale (Mr. Peterson) asked me, "Where is the market?" Mr. Speaker, there are markets and there are ways to do this. I say to the government and to the official opposition and to anyone else who cares to listen, that they will not be able to fulfil their mandate or meet their obligation to the people of Canada if they continue to allow the very soul of this nation to be undermined.

That soul is being undermined as a result of the difficulties that families now face when trying to meet even the minimal commitments that they have. It is an up-hill battle, which they are losing.

I suggest to the government that it stop this preoccupation with the level of the Canadian dollar and if need be, as my leader said earlier today, and as we have said a number of times—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I regret that there is such a short time left to say the things I would like to say in a debate of this nature which deals with the government's shoddy economic performance at this time.

I was interested in the remarks of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Evans). He has learned well from the master. He knows how to take a lesson from the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). He does not have to be taught anything more. The Minister of Finance and the parliamentary secretary, and indeed, everyone who sits on the government benches, do not seem to care or to know what is happening to the hundreds and thousands of people across this country who are suffering day after day from the government's policies of high interest rates. They do not seem to know or care that there are a lot of people in this country who are in real need.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance said that there are times that you have to forget about the trees and think only of the forest. He implied that they cannot afford to think of the individuals who are being hurt. I want to tell him that after you knock down all trees, there is no forest left. That is what we have to think about.

The Minister of Finance made some fatuous promises before the last election in an effort to be re-elected. As the result of those promises, the country is suffering now. Of course, the minister does not give that very much consideration. Safely out of sight in the inner sanctum of the Department of Finance he can play with all sorts of ideas, many of which will bring further distress to Canadians. Remote as he is from real life, he can move from consideration of higher interest rates, which he has already forecast, to the introduction of wage and price controls or to the consideration of a tax-based incomes policy. He can do that while he is safely secluded in the penthouse of Place Bell Canada.

The minister has emerged from his quarters briefly to ask for suggestions. I want to give him one or two in the short time available to me. His comments of the last few days have shown how remote he is from the suffering that is going on across the country.

I want to suggest to the Minister of Finance that while he is contemplating which of the many complicated levers he will pull, he should set up a human misery index—something similar to the consumer price index—which he could read daily so that he could be aware of the hardship he has inflicted on Canadians. I could tell him that he will not be able to read that kind of index from some beach in Hawaii or from Kuwait, but he will be able to read it if he goes across the country talking to business people, farmers, and people living on fixed incomes in one community after the other.

Just the other day the minister accused us of pretending to be sympathetic to the plight of these people. There is no need to pretend about the suffering that is going on at the present time, Mr. Speaker. People are worried, upset, concerned and increasingly anxious. I want to give the minister an example of what is happening and of the kind of difficulties that Canadians find themselves in. I want to tell him about the case of one couple—one of many in my constituency—who have spoken to me. These people have been in the hotel business for a number of years. They worked hard and put their whole lives into it. Two years ago they decided to expand their business and do what many people in Kingston and The Islands have done, restore their building to its original form. They borrowed $650,000 from their friendly bank. The interest rate they obtained at that time was about 12 per cent; last week they were being charged 21 per cent. Their weekly interest payment is $3,000. The irony is that they are now taking in more money than they ever have in the history of their business, but they cannot meet their payments or do the things they want to do. They are being forced into bankruptcy. When they make their weekly deposit, the first thing the bank does is to take off the interest payment. They can meet that interest payment and the salaries of some 40 people but that is all. The cheques to their suppliers are being sent back marked "not sufficient funds".

Last week a cheque came back to them from Revenue Canada for $5,000. To add insult to injury, a $300 penalty was imposed by the very government that put them in this predicament in the first place because of high interest rates. They had applied for a small business development bond some five months ago but their application still has not been processed. They are still being hurt, week after week, by the government's high interest policies.

The other day I mentioned the mental anguish that people are suffering, and the minister laughed at me. It is that kind of mental anguish that this couple in Kingston is suffering. They are going through it because they do not know where the money will come from to pay their staff in the weeks ahead. They do not know whether they will have to lay them off and thus add another 40 people to the number of unemployed in this country. They do not know how they will be able to escape foreclosure or bankruptcy. They would rate very high on a human misery index if the minister were aware of what is happening to human beings in this country.

That is one suggestion that the minister could take into consideration and see if he cannot respond to the suffering that is going on in this country.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

HOUSING—POSITION OF HOME OWNERS

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, in replying to a question on Tuesday of this week put by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) indicated his confusion and ignorance of what is involved in applying to renew a mortgage. My colleague asked if the minister would honour his commitment to assist home owners who are having difficulty with the soaring interest rates. This commitment was made in March, 1980. The minister replied:

—because of the appreciation in the value of their homes they had experienced they were able to bear the burden of these increased mortgage payments. That is the fact.

Because an estimated 500,000 Canadians are renewing their mortgages at crippling interest rates, I sought to clarify the minister's statement on their behalf later in the question period. I suggested that when a Canadian home owner sits down with a mortgage officer and tells him that his home has appreciated, the mortgage officer is simply going to say "so have your mortgage payments". I would ask the minister how appreciation in the value of a home helps the Canadian home owner who has to make out-of-pocket mortgage payments. The minister replied:

—if that is too complicated a concept for the hon. member to understand, I should like to draw his attention to a simpler concept—

The rest of his comments were nothing more than subterfuge, camouflage and confusion to cover the fact that he had no knowledge of the problem. Five hundred thousand Canadians are faced with increased mortgage payments as they renew their mortgages this year. Many are selling or abandoning their homes because they cannot afford the increased payment. A $40,000 mortgage loan at 10 per cent taken out in 1976 could be carried at $360 a month based upon a 25-year amortization. It now costs $590 a month to amortize $40,000 over 25 years at today's Liberal interest rates of 18 per cent. That is an increase of 61 per cent.

It is shocking that this crisis is facing the country. It is even more shocking that a minister of the Crown would confuse the Canadian people and then have the gall to suggest that the concept was too difficult for me to understand. For that reason I want to explain the facts of life to the Minister of Finance.

When a home appreciates in value, the home owner's equity increases. The home has become more valuable, but it does not put any more money in the home owner's pocket unless the house is sold. It does not mean that the mortgage principal is reduced. That can only be done by monthly payments which reduce the principal gradually, made out of the take-home pay of the home owner.

When home owners go to renew their mortgages, the mortgage officer considers the value of the home as security for the loan. If the home has appreciated, well and good. If it has depreciated, the mortgage officer must consider if the value is sufficient security to support the loan. However, the mortgage payments, usually monthly, on the renewed mortgage are another matter. The home owner must prove to the satisfaction of the mortgage officer that he, she or they can meet those payments out of their income or what we call take-home pay.

The point we were making is that increases in the mortgage interest rate from 10 per cent in 1976 to the current rate of 18 per cent as a result of the Liberal party's high interest rate policy result in an increase in the payment the home owner is making on a mortgage. If they can meet the payment, fine. If they cannot meet the payment, the home owner is in difficulty. The security, that is the increase in value which the minister thinks helps, goes by the board because the mortgage officer is only interested in how the home owner is going to make the payment. The mortgage company is then free to demand payment of the principal in full and the home owner seeks a mortgage elsewhere. It is absolute nonsense to suggest that appreciation in value helps to meet mortgage payments. It is unfair to the minister to hold out this hope to Canadian home owners.

I was tempted to pursue this matter as a question of privilege since the minister impugned my integrity and ability as a lawyer who practised real estate law for 11 years before entering politics by suggesting it was too complicated a matter for me to understand. Then I realized that the minister just did not understand what was involved in renewing a mortgage. The minister is an embarrassment to the government. That concept was too complicated for him. I feel the minister will want to admit his error through his parliamentary secretary and apologize to the House and the Canadian people, and I hope his parliamentary secretary will have the dignity and integrity to do so on his behalf. Thank you very much.

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, dealing with this problem of mortgage renewals, which is a very real problem, the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis) certainly has made a case. The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) does not disagree with him one iota in respect of the problem and the fact that there is a problem. I think where the disagreement lies is in the extent of the problem and whether that problem can be coped with by the average Canadian home owner.

The majority of Canadian home owners renewing mortgages this year took out their mortgages in 1976. The average mortgage interest rate in 1976 was 11.8 per cent, or from 11 per cent to 12 per cent, and the current interest rate is about 18 per cent. This has resulted in an average increase in mortgage payments of some 40 per cent for those people who are renewing their mortgages. At the same time we have to ask whether they are able to meet these increased payments. We have shown here an unfortunate increase of 40 per cent in the payments necessary to service those mortgages.

However, in that same time period the average annual wage has increased by 55 per cent, some 15 percentage points more than the increase in the mortgage payments. The home owner is certainly not spending on average a greater proportion of his or her income on mortgage payments in 1981 than he did in 1976 when the mortgage was originally taken out.

At the same time it should be noted that the average house price has increased by some 48 per cent over the price paid in 1976. The hon. member for Simcoe North indicates that the minister did not understand when he said it was a complex problem, and perhaps the hon. member did not understand. In fact that is true because many of the people he is concerned about, and about whom we are concerned, are the lower income Canadians who bought homes at very high loan-to-value ratios in 1976 and did so by not only taking out a first mortgage at 11.8 per cent, but a second mortgage at perhaps 14 per cent, and in some cases a third mortgage. Housing prices have gone up by 48 per cent, which means that the individual who had a first mortgage, a second mortgage, and, perhaps, in some cases a third mortgage in 1976, will be able to consolidate all those in a first mortgage. As a result, the figure I have given here, the 40 per cent increase, overstates the effect on the people we are concerned about here because a second mortgage at 13 per cent or 14 per cent would mean that payments were higher than indicated by an 11.8 per cent mortgage rate.

The fact of the matter is that the minister made an indication to the hon. member for Simcoe North, and the minister was right.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—1. REQUEST FOR ALLOCATION OF ADDITIONAL FUNDS. 2. PREPARATION OF AMENDING LEGISLATION

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Mr. Speaker, I directed a question yesterday to the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) with regard to veterans' legislation. My question was as follows:

> In light of the effect that new consumer price increases, rising energy prices and interest rates have on veterans and their families, as well as the fact that over 2,000 applicants are having to wait up to two years for their pension appeals to be processed, will the Minister of Finance tell this House when he will be allocating the necessary funds so that the Minister of Veterans Affairs can bring in a bill providing some financial relief for veterans and their widows at this time of unprecedented need?

I received no assurance whatsoever from the Minister of Finance.

I posed a supplementary question which was answered by the parliamentary secretary to the acting minister of veterans affairs. Part of my question was the following:

> There has been much speculation that legislation is now being prepared which would lower the phasing-in period for widows whose husbands were in receipt of less than a 48 per cent disability pension.

I received the assurance that this legislation will be brought in soon.

I also asked the government to launch an immediate inquiry into this backlog of 2,000 veteran pension applications which are taking up to two years to process. I called this a national disgrace, and I will call it a national disgrace again tonight.

The parliamentary secretary informed me that there are not 2,000 applications but approximately 1,200 applications in process. There is a conflict here. The Royal Canadian Legion has been keeping very close tabs on this. The legion is not in the habit of printing false information or exaggerated figures. I want to read from an editorial in the legion's magazine for May of 1981 which states:

> In November, 1978, the chairman of the pension commission told a meeting of the standing committee on veterans affairs that the average length of time for a first application to reach a decision was 6 months, an improvement on the 7.8 months taken earlier. It was . . . "almost back to normal."

It was stated at that time.

> However, the average 7 months taken for a claim or 3½ months for a widow in December, 1979—

These are the commission's own statistics.

> —has now climbed to more than 11 and 7 months respectively. A few cases will illustrate: 1. A May, 1980, request for a pension medical re-examination was completed July 30, 1980. The pertinent reports had not reached the commission's head office by February, 1981; the district office was awaiting additional information about the pensioned conditions. 2. An application for attendance allowance was submitted July 25, 1980, and acknowledged in September. The commission's request for investigation went forward to the medical examiner October 31, 1980.

The veteran died in February.

I have statistics here for the last number of years which show that hundreds of veterans died before their pensions were processed. The legion's article also points out the following:

The number of appeals awaiting consideration by the pension review board hovers around 2,000. Now being heard are applications made two years ago. And the number of new appeals is increasing.

I suggest to the minister that he spend some time over at the Department of Veterans Affairs tracing some of these applications to find out why they are taking two years to be processed. I repeat again that this is an absolute disgrace.

The Royal Canadian Legion, Ontario Command helps many veterans with their applications. That command wrote to veterans and told them not to expect any action in a couple of months but that they will have to wait two years. This is the advice the Ontario Command gives to veterans in Ontario:

An assessment board, which due to several factors, will not be held any sooner than twelve to fourteen months, will only consider your condition as it was at the time of the Pension Medical Examination that the ruling was given for. In other words, when a board hears the claim it will be considering a ruling that by that time will be probably two years old.

That length of time is not acceptable, and we have heard nothing but excuses over the last number of years in this respect. The time has come for an end to excuses and for the minister to get over to that department and to find out what is going on there. I have in my hand a list of statistics respecting veterans who are dying before they receive their pension increases.

● (2215)

I have a letter here dated May 11, 1981, from Mr. J. Lamy, who is the dominion secretary of the Royal Canadian Legion. He points out in his letter:

—the delays in pension adjudications are of the utmost concern to us at this time.

Later in the paragraph, he says:

The situation is particularly bad in respect of first applications—

Further on in his letter he says:

We plan to present a brief to the standing committee—

I might say, whenever that is called.

I was very disappointed to read a speech which the parliamentary secretary gave recently to veterans in Peterborough in which I found some misleading information. The parliamentary secretary told the veterans in Peterborough the following:

It is a special pleasure to appear here and be able to assert that the federal government over the past year has improved the economic circumstances of many thousands of veterans and their survivors.

There are 2,000 veterans who have to wait two years to have their applications processed. Some are dying before the process is completed and their widows are having a rough time because of inflation, with the cost of gas having gone up 54 cents a gallon, and all the rest of it. I am sure hon. members know all the statistics, but then the parliamentary secretary tells them their economic lot is improving. That is not very good information to be handing out to veterans' organizations.

Mr. John Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate the House rules only allow me three minutes to respond to the distorted allegations made by the hon. member. However, I want to thank the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie) for giving me the opportunity to clarify the situation respecting the delays and adjudications of applications for disability pensions made under the Pension Act.

There has been considerable talk recently about cases awaiting decisions. It is unfortunate but we must realize that the Pension Commission is unable to deal with all the applications it receives as soon as it would like. There have been some problems besetting the commission, and every effort is made to overcome them as quickly as possible.

At the first decision level, the commission has about 4,200 applications on hand. These cannot all be called backlog, some having been received only a few days ago. Because of the nature of the claims and the investigative work which must be done, it has never taken less than an average of five and a half months to deal with them. About 2,200 of these claims are less than five months old. The suggestion that there are 2,000 claims which will take two years to process, is simply not true.

The chairman of the commission has told me that their oldest claims at the first level are 21 months old and that there are only two in that category, and in both those cases they are waiting for information from another country.

Progress is being made in the time taken to process these applications. It now takes almost two months less on the average than it did at the end of 1980.

As far as the second level is concerned, that of the entitlement board appeal, the situation now is better than at any time in the commission's history. There are fewer than 900 cases to be heard across the country, in which the claimants have advised that they are ready to proceed, and the commission hears about 300 a month. This is less than half the number waiting to be heard a year ago.

In so far as proportionate pensions for widows are concerned, I believe it is well known that one of the acting minister's personal priorities is to try to improve the phasing-in time for widows of pensioners who, under present legislation, will have to wait for lengthy periods to receive their benefits. His success in this area will no doubt depend on the over-all financial picture.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time of three minutes has expired.

Mr. Campbell (LaSalle): May I ask for unanimous consent to continue, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. That is one request which cannot be allowed at this time.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE—QUERY RESPECTING LEGISLATION AND COLLECTIVE BARGAINING RIGHTS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I rise to pursue a question which I asked of the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) on March 31, 1981, relating to the denial of the fundamental right to collective bargaining for members of the RCMP in Canada. At that time the Solicitor General indicated that amendments to the RCMP Act would be brought forward "soon". He stated that as far as most members of the force were concerned, there was a very effective system in effect for dealing with industrial relations within the force.

In the few minutes I have this evening, I would like to point out that the minister promised on many occasions to bring forward this important piece of legislation affecting members of the RCMP right across the country. In the Speech from the Throne, there was a promise that the RCMP legislation would be amended. In May of 1980, the minister agreed that the present disciplinary procedures were unfair. He said that legislation was a high priority and would be brought forward very soon. He repeated that promise on a number of occasions. In the fall of 1980, he stated that legislation would be brought forward within a month. Again on February 23, 1981, in Edmonton the Solicitor General stated that this legislation was a priority for the government and that it would be brought forward within a month. We see very clearly that on many occasions the minister promised to bring forward this important legislation, but to this day we have not seen any results whatsoever.

Perhaps this reflects the lack of clout of the minister in cabinet. One could only hope that in the very near future members of the RCMP would at long last have an adequate mechanism set out in the RCMP Act.

There are several concerns of the force, but the fundamental one is its right to full collective bargaining without the right to strike. They recognize that the right to strike is one they do not wish to receive at this point. They are prepared to have differences settled by arbitration. The right to full collective bargaining and freedom of association should be accorded to members of the RCMP.

In my question on March 31, I pointed out that the freedom of association supposedly granted to all Canadians under the charter of rights in fact is denied to members of the RCMP. On other occasions I have noted in the House that that same freedom of association is denied to employees of Parliament, including members of the security staff on the Hill. What is the effect of this denial of collective bargaining rights? This has meant that the conditions of members of the RCMP in terms of pay and their relative standard has been falling further and further behind. It is the only major police force in Canada which does not have collective bargaining rights. The pay and working conditions of the RCMP have been steadily declining.

The Solicitor General said that there is a system of divisional representatives. Members of the force acknowledge that this simply is not working. The divisional representatives must represent literally hundreds of members and cannot bargain on pay. The bargaining process for pay is a mystery. What the Treasury Board is prepared to offer and what senior members of the force are seeking are mysteries. There is no recognition of the increased costs facing members of the force in certain areas of the country such as my own area in British Columbia.

One effect of this is that senior members are leaving the force and are being replaced by recruits. Of course this has a very serious impact, particularly in areas such as Burnaby and Surrey which are training detachments.

A number of other concerns face the force at this point. They include the fact that the multimillion dollar pension scheme has no significant involvement of members of the force. Surely this must be changed. They are concerned about certain aspects of working conditions. They believe they need improved weapons and ammunition. They are concerned that soft body armour should be issued as well. They are disturbed at the arbitrary dismissal of their request for night sticks by the commissioner's office. They insist that the vacancies which presently occur in a number of detachments—vacant staff positions which result in staff shortages—jeopardize in some cases the safety not only of members of the RCMP but of members of the public. They insist these vacancies must be filled.

It is clear the government has failed to live up to its commitment to members of the RCMP. It took a recent court decision in the federal court to permit members of the RCMP to be represented in disciplinary proceedings by a lawyer. This was a court proceeding initiated by the association of 17 divisions. It was not until that decision—and I understand fortunately the decision is not being appealed—that this fundamental right to counsel was accorded to members of the RCMP in internal disciplinary proceedings.

• (2225)

The concern that I wish to raise this evening, and which I have raised on other occasions, is that the level of frustration within the RCMP is steadily increasing as their pay falls further and further behind. As I said, they want the right to full collective bargaining, a right which is accorded to all other major police forces in Canada. The Solicitor General has refused to act on this right. We will be looking with great interest at the proposed legislation with regard to the RCMP to ensure that it does accord the right to collective bargaining.

To conclude, we will be pursuing the matters which I have raised, including vacancies in various detachments, the concern about the pension plan and working conditions and, most important, the widening gulf in pay as compared with other police forces.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I was glad to note from the concluding remarks of the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) that he retains the faith that the RCMP bill will be forthcoming. In fact, I had hoped that it would long since have been tabled in the House. I can tell the House that I am still working on that legislation. It is still very much in the works and I hope it will be tabled very soon.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): You have been saying that for a year.

Mr. Kaplan: I concede that. I had hoped that I would have been able to bring it forward some time ago. It has not been a matter of clout but a matter of other legislation before the House and other legislation which is in the hands of legislative draftsmen. But the way is now clear for moving it forward. Today I saw material associated with the legislation. I do not claim full responsibility for the long delay which has taken place since the Marin commission in 1976 made the recommendations which led to the commitment of the government to introduce legislation. The Marin commission recommended an improved procedure for complaints from the public and, of equal importance, more formal grievance procedures for individual members of the force. This will permit individual members of the force the right to counsel, and many other advantages in their industrial relations with the force and issues of discipline which are long overdue.

I am glad that the hon. member acknowledges that this legislation will be coming. I hope he will be happy with it. But the legislation will not change, as he indicated he hoped it might, the right to collective bargaining. As the hon. member put it, there is no fundamental right to full collective bargaining in Canadian society. That is a right which Parliament has accorded within the public service. It is something the Pearson government did. It is not a right which has been extended to all units of the public service, as the hon. member indicated. It was not accorded to the Armed Forces, the RCMP, the staff of the House of Commons or to others. He can consult the debates at that time and the discussions in committee for all of the reasons put forward for not according this collective bargaining right. I think the reasons were good ones and they still apply. I refute his claim that he speaks for the force when he says that there is a broadly-based feeling that there should be the right to collective bargaining. There is a divisional representation system which is an effective one.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): A motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at eleven o'clock a.m.

At 10.30 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

RAILWAYS

PENSIONS OF RETIRED WORKERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Due to the fact that Canadian labour relations legislation does not permit the CNR union to negotiate pension rights for former employees, pensioners have had to put up with such measly increases as $77 over 19 years. This amounts to a grand total of $4 a year, or 33 cents a month, resulting in a $265 per month pension rate. A 33-cent increase does not go far against the odds of new record inflation rates of 12.6 per cent, 15.2 per cent increases in food costs, and 54 cents per gallon increases in gas prices. This is just one more Liberal-created national disgrace. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen):

That this House demands that the Minister of Labour immediately introduce amendments to Canadian labour relations legislation which would enable rail unions to negotiate on behalf of retired rail employees.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CALL FOR INTRODUCTION OF BUDGET—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, the government has abdicated all responsibility for controlling the rampant inflation which Canadians are experiencing today. The price of food eaten at home has increased 15.8 per cent. The price of fresh vegetables is up 73.5 per cent. The price of fuel oil is up 39.6 per cent. As always, those hardest hit are single parents, people on fixed incomes, women between the ages of 55 and 64, the working poor; in other words, those already struggling to make ends meet.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald):

That this House calls upon the Minister of Finance at least to acknowledge the punitive effect of these devastating inflation rates on Canadian women and introduce a new budget which will respond to this great tragedy.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADIAN NEUTRALITY

OUTLAWING OF PRIVATE ARMIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Douglas Fisher (Mississauga North): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas some private Canadian citizens appear to have been involved in the planning, organization and financing of a recent plot to stage a coup against the legitimate government of Dominica, and whereas Canada lacks any legislative instrument comparable to the United States neutrality act designed to outlaw such plots and actions, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Hudecki):

That this House urges the government to bring forward legislation to prevent mercenary armies and other private citizens from using Canada as a safe haven from which they can launch armed activities against legitimate foreign governments.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADIAN TRANSPORT COMMISSION

SUGGESTED POSTPONEMENT OF MANITOBA HEARINGS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In light of the fact that the Canadian Transport Commission has given only two weeks' notice of important public meetings in northern Manitoba which will determine the future of rail service in that area, in light of the fact that both VIA Rail and CN have downgraded both the quality and quantity of rail service in the last few years, and in view of the fact that in this region there are areas which are rail locked, that is, accessible only by rail or air, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Lewycky):

That the Minister of Transport instruct the Canadian Transport Commission to postpone the CTC hearings scheduled for The Pas and Churchill and that the CTC be required to force CN and VIA to guarantee adequate and attractive service not only at the current level but beyond, to the extent of providing convenient, comfortable, fast and frequent service.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INCOME TAX

CHILD CARE EXPENSE DEDUCTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In May, 1976, the then minister of finance doubled the allowable deduction for child care expenses from $500 to $1,000, acknowledging that the amount was too low in light of continuing inflation. Since then the cost of living has increased 56 per cent, leaving a 1976 dollar with a value of 64 cents. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That this House direct the Minister of Finance to introduce a new budget before Parliament rises for the summer recess which would allow for total deduction of child care expenses from the income of a working mother or single parent.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CALL FOR INTRODUCTION OF ENERGY TAX CREDIT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Eight of the 11 Liberal government increases in the cost of energy since February 18, 1980, were tax increases. The latest consumer price index shows Canadians are paying record high prices for energy as a result of tax increases. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Scott):

That this House instruct the government to implement an energy tax credit for low and middle-income Canadians.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FISHERIES

NEED FOR LONG-TERM POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. The consumer price rise in April produced the highest year over year rate of inflation in Canada since World War II price controls were phased out in 1947-48. This has caused a rapidly accelerating rise in the entire cost structure of the fishing industry because of inflation, increasing fuel and energy costs, and high interest rates, placing this industry in jeopardy. Since there is today conflict between fishing interests for access to the resource, conflict between fishermen and buyers over price, conflict between government, processors and fishermen, and conflict between federal and provincial governments over control of the resource and the industry, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke):

That the government take steps immediately to establish a clear, long-term government policy for the research, management and development of Canada's fisheries since the lack of a coherent policy imposes severe difficulties for managers and investors in the private sector.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ALICE ARM, B.C.—DUMPING OF TAILINGS BY AMAX—CALL FOR PUBLIC INQUIRY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In light of the malfunctioning of the pipeline constructed by Amax Ltd. to dump toxic mine tailings into the ocean at Alice Arm, B.C. and that two recent accidents have allowed toxic waste to be spilled into the sensitive intertidal zone, contrary to both federal and provincial legislation, and also that the interim report from the scientific review panel confirms that the government and Amax technical studies are inadequate to ensure environmental and health safety; and further, in light of concerns raised by the U.S. department of state regarding pollution of American waters from this operation, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Nunatsiaq (Mr. Ittinuar):

That this House go on record as unanimously supporting the call for a full public inquiry to investigate the health and safety questions raised by the federal government's own scientific review panel.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO DEAL WITH INFLATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity to every Canadian consumer. In view of the fact that the last time the inflation rate was this high, in September, 1948, when half the population of Canada had not been born, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis):

That the government follow the lead of the former and present Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs when he said in 1974, "It is extremely important that we deal efficiently with the rate of inflation".

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

ACTION REQUIRED TO ASSIST RETIRED WORKERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and seconded by the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose), I move:

That the Minister of Transport be urged to make it known to the Canadian National Railways and to the Canadian Pacific Railway that it is their responsibility to take immediate action to increase the pensions of their retired employees and to establish automatic indexation, at least annually, so that all railway pensioners and their survivors will be able to maintain a standard of living commensurate with the service they have rendered to this country.

[English]

THE ECONOMY

INCREASE IN CONSUMER PRICE INDEX—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance who will know that today the consumer price index has gone through the roof. The highest cost of living in modern time means that a shopping basket which cost $100 in 1971 now costs consumers $231.10.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Does the Minister of Finance still subscribe to the statement made by his colleague, the former and present Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, when he spoke in favour of wage and price controls in October, 1975? At that time he said:

I believe this anti-inflation policy to be a wise policy which meets the present needs of the Canadian economy.

Has his colleague expressed similar concerns to the Minister of Finance, in light of today's figures? Since the "wise" anti-inflation policy of 1975 was so obviously unsuccessful, what does the Minister of Finance believe the current needs of the Canadian economy require?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I point out to the hon. member, who is as concerned about inflation as we all are, that he ought to focus his attention on the rate of growth in the CPI for the month of April, which indicates a significant slowdown for that month. The year to year figure which is 12.6 per cent tells us about what happened over the year, but the figure for April indicates that the rate of growth has slowed down from 1.3 per cent last month to 0.7 per cent. That in itself is encouraging, but obviously it is not possible to draw a final conclusion from this particular figure. If that trend continues for the rest of the year, certainly it would register an appreciable drop in the over-all inflation rate.

Mr. Clark: Incredible.

REDUCTION IN REAL WAGES

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, dealing with this Minister of Finance when he is quoting statistics is like shoveling smoke. The Minister of Finance said that Canadians will have to accept lower real wages. Since real wages have been falling since 1977—in February they were a full 1.4 per cent below a year ago—and since we have this rampaging inflation, how much longer will the Minister of Finance put the average Canadian worker through the wringer before our purchasing power is restored and progress against inflation is achieved?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has spoken about real wage increases. I would like to draw to his attention a much more important statistic, namely, real disposable income for the average Canadian. If he looks at that figure, I believe he can draw a contrary conclusion. But I ask the hon. member to consider the situation where we must accept increased energy prices. We are in a situation of declining over-all productivity in the country. Perhaps he could tell me how it is possible in those circumstances to advance the real incomes of all Canadians if, as a society, we are producing less per worker?

Mr. Nielsen: You are the Minister of Finance.

FORECAST FOR SUMMER MONTHS

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, it is a fearsome thought what the CPI will look like when the increased energy prices begin to filter down through the Canadian economy.

My final supplementary question is also directed to the Minister of Finance. Given that each and every month for more than a year now—13, 14, 15 months—prices have been rising at an average of 1 per cent per month, can the Minister of Finance offer consumers any assurance that rates of inflation in succeeding months will not be higher than the seven tenths of a percentage point of the past month? Otherwise, how can he justify to Canadian people that we may have to wait until some time in the fall, in October or November, when he may bring in a budget to give some economic leadership?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member referred to energy price increases. I think it is worth pointing out that the energy price increases included in the National Energy Program, and the energy price increases necessitated by the production cutbacks of Alberta, have been concentrated, for the most part, in the early part of 1981. If it were possible to reach an agreement with the province of Alberta without any further energy price increases, then we would not have reflected in the cost of living for the remainder of 1981 any further energy increases, which have already been absorbed. I draw to his attention the consistent advocacy of his party of additional energy price increases which must be reflected in the cost of living. In any event, I add that if these energy price increases are not absorbed directly, then we will certainly have further pressure on the cost of living index.

• (1120)

MEASURES TO HELP PEOPLE ON LOW AND FIXED INCOMES

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Now that we have record-breaking high interest rates and a record-breaking cost of living index, I suggest to the minister that he set up a human misery index so he will know the effects his policies are having on people on lower and fixed incomes.

The minister knows that the price of food has risen by a whopping 15.8 per cent. If the minister would only come out of his Place Bell Canada penthouse and go to the supermarkets he would find out that some people are having to resort to buying dog food. I would like to ask the minister what plans he has, if any, to ease this intolerable situation?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the language of the hon. member is quite lurid and could only come from a rather agitated mentality. Yesterday her leader was advocating that we should have followed the energy tax credit as a solution to the problem of low income groups. I remind the hon. member that the action which her leader advocated yesterday, and which is still apparently the policy of her party, was not followed by us.

We decided to do something quite different when we formed the government, and that was to increase the guaranteed income supplement by substantial amounts, providing considerably more assistance to the senior citizens of this country than anything proposed by her party. Not only did we substantially increase the guaranteed income supplement but we also indexed it fully against the cost of living. So the hon. member is not making much of a contribution by not realizing that for the lower income groups, particularly senior citizens, there have been substantial increases which are fully indexed and which will continue to be fully indexed against increases in the cost of living.

Miss MacDonald: Madam Speaker, the minister is right on when he says that I am agitated. I am agitated on behalf of the people of this country who are suffering from the policies which the minister has put in place. I only wish that he were agitated.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ADVICE TO SENIOR CITIZENS

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): This afternoon I will be attending a gathering of senior citizens in Kingston and I want to know what the minister suggests I tell that gathering besides the sort of statements he has been making, which simply do not make any sense to senior citizens. Am I to tell them this afternoon that at this point they cannot go out and buy any more fresh fruit or vegetables, which have gone up in price 73 per cent, almost double the cost of what they were a year ago? Is that what I am to tell them, or am I to tell them, perhaps, that they should really tough it out until the minister's high interest rate policy begins to bring the cost of inflation down at some distant point in the future? Quite frankly—

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

• (1125)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has asked me what she ought to tell the senior citizens. I will give her a suggestion. She ought to remind the senior citizens that her party proposed, in their budget, an energy tax credit which, had it been implemented, would provide an additional $40 for senior citizens in 1981—

Mr. Lalonde: Per year.

Mr. MacEachen: —per year, and an additional $80 in 1982.

Mr. Lalonde: Per year.

Mr. MacEachen: That is what would have happened to the senior citizens under her proposals. Under the proposals which we have adopted, each senior citizen will receive a minimum of $420 a year.

Mr. Andre: Tell them they have never had it so good, eh?

Mr. MacEachen: Not $40, and not $80, but a minimum of $420, which, when indexed, will amount to $462.84 in 1981 and, according to projections in the budget, will amount to $506 in 1982.

Mr. Clark: Let them eat Hansard!

Mr. MacEachen: Give that message to the senior citizens, and compare what she was ready to do with what we have done.

ACTION TO ASSIST MAJORITY AFFECTED BY INFLATION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): My question is directed to the Prime Minister. The Minister of Finance has just left the impression that the government is doing a lot for Canadians. I point out to him—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Let us see if they clap after this. The one group that the government has done something about is the poor portion of senior citizens who get the supplement, and the indexing does not come into effect—for that small part of the senior citizens community that gets the index—until five months after the increase has taken place.

However, I would like to ask the Prime Minister, since we now have a record increase in the cost of living, since food prices are going up 14 per cent, and since mortgages are now at 18 per cent to 20 per cent, what is the government, and specifically, the Prime Minister, proposing to do for the grand majority of Canadians who are affected by all of this. Does he still stand by his proposal made some months ago that Canadians should switch their priorities, and, if so, to what, since everything is going up?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Since the Leader of the New Democratic Party is talking about the majority of Canadians, the great number of Canadians, I will give him a figure that will show him that on average the great majority of Canadians are much better off now than they were ten years ago. It is all very well to talk about increased prices, which are regrettable. We would like to keep inflation down. It is because of increased prices—

An hon. Member: Wrestle it to the ground, Pierre.

Mr. Clark: Maurice Strong sure will!

Mr. Trudeau: —that we have indexed old age pensions and many other welfare payments. But at the same time as prices have gone up, real disposable income of Canadians between 1970, when inflation began to become a worrisome phenomenon—

Mr. Andre: The land is strong!

Mr. Trudeau: —and 1980, has gone up more than 50 per cent. That is the real disposable income of every Canadian.

Miss MacDonald: Thanks to you!

Mr. Trudeau: So, when the hon. member laments that prices have gone up, we join in that lamentation, but we say that Canadians are 50 per cent better off, on average, in 1980 than they were in 1970.

INCREASE IN PROFITS OF CHARTERED BANKS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): That is truly remarkable. They are a lot better off now than they were in 1900, as well; but I say to the Prime Minister that the record will also show that the average Canadian worker, for each of the past three years, has experienced a real decline in take-home pay by $35 a week. That is the important record in recent happenings.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: I would like to ask the Prime Minister a question, since there are certain specifics the government could act on if it wanted to help. There is a charming ad which appeared in Canadian papers yesterday which was put in by that poor group of Canadians who own the banks, saying what a wonderful job they are doing. Farmers are going broke in record numbers and Canadians are having to abandon their homes in record numbers because of interest rates which are being passed on to the farmers, or indirectly, as higher mortgage costs to home owners.

Mr. Andre: Herb Gray is going to resign, just like he promised.

Mr. Broadbent: I would like to ask the Prime Minister: just for once, will the government do something for the victims of inflation instead of the villains, and take action against the banks by forcing them to reduce their mortgages on the one hand and to curtail their record-level profits on the other?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1130)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the facts are not as stated by the hon. member. When he says foreclosures are increasing in number, that is not true.

Mr. Broadbent: I did not say foreclosures.

Mr. Trudeau: If he is talking about people abandoning their homes—

Mr. Broadbent: Not foreclosures.

Mr. Trudeau: —there are many reasons to abandon a home.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Trudeau: We know that housing starts have increased some 38 per cent this February over last February. There are new homes being built. People may be moving into new houses. We know that the number of foreclosures has dropped.

Mr. Wilson: That is ridiculous.

Mr. Trudeau: Well, if the hon. member opposite has some better statistic, he could bring it up. The facts are not as stated by the hon. member. The real disposable income, I repeat, of the average Canadian is going up. He can pick one sector of the economy—workers over the last three years, he can take bankers over the last two quarters, he can take farmers some time in the middle seventies, but I am telling him, and these facts are indisputable, that the average real wealth of Canadians has gone up 50 per cent—

Mr. Siddon: Table the facts.

Mr. Trudeau: —between 1970 and 1980. That is an average of plus 4 per cent per year.

Mr. Clark: You think Maurice Strong is an average Canadian?

Mr. Trudeau: I can understand the shouting from the parties opposite, but if they want to know the facts they just have to look at the Bureau of Statistics. They will get—

Miss MacDonald: You have to look at people.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Order.

SPECULATION IN HOUSE PROPERTY

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, this is just incredible nonsense. Of course standards of living have improved over the last decade. They have improved in virtually every country of the world. We are not talking about the past decade, we are talking about the last few years and current trends. I repeat that the average worker in Canada has lost some $35 per week in each of the past three years, and in 1981 that will probably go up to $40 or $45 per year. It is current reality that Canadians are interested in, not the past of this government.

Since the Prime Minister did talk about housing, I should like him to deal with that area. Because of the tax law there is now the possibility that speculators in every city, every metropolitan region in Canada, are buying up houses, which are frequently those being sold by CMHC because people have not been able to renew mortgages, not foreclosure; they simply have not got the income they need to continue. I should like to ask the Prime Minister specifically if he will at least stop that speculating by changing the tax law which encourages it, and which speculation forces up the price of housing for all Canadians. That is something concrete that the government could do.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I will be happy to consider any and every suggestion when the time comes to bring in new tax laws in the budget.

COST OF LIVING INCREASE IN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND AND NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Figures released today reveal that, except for Vancouver which has special and distinct problems because of its housing market, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland have suffered the highest annual increase in the cost of living in all of Canada. There has been a whopping increase of 14 per cent in Charlottetown alone, which is the worst such figure since records have been kept.

Does the Minister of Finance realize that these are the poorest provinces in the country, that they suffer the highest unemployment rate, and that therefore they are the ones least able to cope with the soaring increases in the cost of living in Canada? If so, does he intend to introduce any emergency or remedial measures to help these provinces cope with this terrible crisis?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Yes, Madam Speaker, in reply to the first part of the question, I do realize, and the government realizes, that Prince Edward Island, for example, is amongst the poorest provinces in the country. It is for that reason, through policies developed by this government and former governments under the leadership of the Prime Minister, that at the present time the transfers to Prince Edward Island per capita are the highest in all of Canada and the highest in the Atlantic provinces. We have been able to do that through equalization, through other transfers, and through the Prince Edward Island Development Plan.

When the hon. member asks whether I am aware what the economic circumstances in Prince Edward Island are and have been, the answer is yes; we have supported Prince Edward Island and, as a result, its standard of living has increased quite considerably.

UNEMPLOYMENT IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Finance brags about his record as far as Prince Edward Island is concerned. The Atlantic provinces have the highest unemployment rate in the country, are being crippled by soaring interest rates, and now must face the second highest inflation rate in the country as a result of the very policies he brags about. Is the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, for example, assessing the devastation that the government's economic policies are inflicting on these provinces—on the Atlantic region in particular—with a view to expanding existing DREE policies and programs and other policies to help the region cope with its crisis?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, it seems to me that the hon. member ought to take into account the real facts when he is addressing the problems of the economy. He mentioned unemployment. The fact of the matter is that recent statistics released show that all regions of Canada, including the Atlantic region, showed decreases in unemployment in the month of April.

As the hon. member knows, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion and the Government of Canada have been considering the next phase of the development plan for the province of Prince Edward Island. It seems to me that, if he wanted to be fair, he would look at the very substantial investment that has been made by the Government of Canada, giving evidence of our interest in the welfare of the people of Prince Edward Island. I do not think that, on a comparative basis, any province in this country has been treated better or, indeed, as well as the province of Prince Edward Island.

CHILD CARE EXPENSE DEDUCTION

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance and it concerns the latest CPI figures. Since working mothers, and single parents especially, are suffering from the effects of the latest CPI increases, particularly in Vancouver where they face the highest housing costs in the country and in history, with house prices doubling in the past year and rental vacancy rates at zero, will the minister consider introducing a new budget before the summer recess which will include removal of the limitation on the child care expense deduction?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I know that the question of the child care expense deduction has been under consideration, if we are thinking of the same subject matter, and maybe we are not. It is not my intention to bring in a new budget before the summer recess. Hon. members are enjoying spreading gloom today, but I think they should at least focus their attention on the fact that for the month of April there has been a significant slowing down in the rate of increase in the cost of living index. Just look at the statistics that have come out today. I think that is a matter of encouragement.

Mr. Clark: The highest in history.

Mr. Broadbent: The highest in history.

Mr. MacEachen: Hon. members are quite properly talking about the year to year figure which tells about what happened over the past year. I am asking them to focus on what is happening currently in the economy. Last month, April, showed a significant slowdown in the rate of growth of the CPI.

Mr. Siddon: That happens every April.

Mr. MacEachen: It would be my wish that that encouraging trend would continue.

Mr. Clark: Your wish? What are you doing about it?

Mr. MacEachen: I am not sure that it will. The Leader of the Opposition asks what we are doing about it. We have been resisting the extravagant prices for energy that he is proposing—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The minister might concentrate on answering the question that was asked from the floor, and not across the floor.

LIMITATION ON DEDUCTION

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Madam Speaker, I am sure we are talking about the same thing, the child care deduction. There is only one in the income tax rules, and the limit is $1,000. The minister should be aware that one of his predecessors, in May, 1976, doubled the deductible amount of $500 to $1,000 because of the ravages of inflation. Since 1976 the deduction of $1,000 has shrunk in value to $640. What advice does the Minister of Finance have for working mothers and single parents who are suffering from the government's inflation policies and who are denied an adequate deduction from earned income for this legitimate and necessary expense?

• (1140)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has asked me to modify this particular tax credit. He knows, if I accepted his advice, that it would constitute a revenue loss to the government.

Mr. Crombie: A gain for the mothers though.

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, I agree it would benefit a particular group.

Mr. Clarke: Take it from Maurice Strong and the finder's fee.

Mr. MacEachen: Speaking for the official opposition in the major speech he gave two days ago, the member for St. John's West urged me to reduce the deficit and to reduce expenditures. I ask hon. members opposite how is it possible for me to introduce new measures, and this is not the first one—

Mr. Siddon: What about metric conversion?

Miss MacDonald: What about the $60 million worth of advertising?

Mr. MacEachen: —no matter how desirable it is—involving revenue losses and new expenditures, and yet carry out the advice of the hon. member for St. John's West—

Mr. Clarke: Why? Is Petrofina more important?

Mr. MacEachen: —who is urging me every day to cut down expenditures and reduce the deficit as a way of reducing inflation?

An hon. Member: Take it from the mothers.

Mr. MacEachen: What is obvious from the official opposition is that they have no coherent economic policy, and they are shooting not only from the hip but from divers lips every day.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

THE MEDIA

INVESTIGATIVE REPORTING BY RADIO STATION CFTR, TORONTO

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Communications. It concerns the way in which the Toronto radio station, CFTR, dealt with information it had on a group of mercenaries planning to overthrow the government of Dominica. The radio station claims to have learned about the plot last October, conducted taped interviews with the conspirators, but did not inform any authorities, because, as the station's news director, Robert Halliday, said:

If we'd gone to the police, we'd have had to work alongside them and then we wouldn't have had the story.

Since there seems to be a trend toward manipulated, sensational reporting these days, will the minister direct the CRTC to determine whether such so-called "investigative reporting" is consistent with the commission's regulations? In addition, will the minister ask the Canadian Broadcasters Association to carry out its own inquiry on whether the conduct of CFTR radio station meets the association's professional standards?

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of the question yesterday.

I have asked my officials to examine the facts of the matter which have been brought to my attention by the hon. member for Davenport. At present I have only initial advice which I am asking my officials to pursue because the matter does not really come within the purview of the Broadcasting Act. I will, of course, be pleased to draw the whole matter to the attention of the Chairman of the CRTC and also to the President of the Association of Broadcasters.

ENERGY CONSERVATION

PARLIAMENTARY TASK FORCE REPORT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister of energy who is being replaced in his seat by the government House leader, something which is long overdue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rose: Others have mentioned that the consumer price increase for this April is probably the highest 12-month increase on record. Also within those figures we see a whopping 27 per cent rise in energy prices and a 22 per cent rise in the cost of household fuels. The costs of all consumer items are skyrocketing at unprecedented rates and consumers are suffering. I think that is a fact agreed to by all parties on all sides of the House.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has just received a brilliant report from a parliamentary task force dealing with energy alternatives and conservations. I know it is a detailed and complex report. However, when will the minister be in a position to comment publicly and give support to or rejection of, if he feels so disposed, this report? We, in the NDP, support its recommendations. We are enthusiastic about it. Can the minister also assure the House when he is replying to my question, whether or not he intends to push and get behind this report after he has studied it? Can he assure us too that he will not let it gather dust like so many other parliamentary task force reports have done?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I deplore the increases which have taken place in the price of energy over the past year, as does the hon. member. But those increases have taken place, and this government at the same time has had to resist pressures from opposition parties and from the NDP government in Saskatchewan all of whom would like to see those prices go up even faster.

In terms of energy prices, the position of this government is that we should resist excessive and radical price increases, like the ones being pressed upon us by the Conservatives in particular—

Mr. Clark: Except for Venezuela, Mexico and Saudi Arabia.

Mr. Lalonde: —and the provincial governments of the producing provinces, including the province of Saskatchewan.

As for the question itself raised by the hon. member, I have not had time to read the voluminous report to which the hon. member has referred. I am glad to know that members of the New Democratic Party have already had the time to read the report. I must say that I am not that fast a reader.

Miss MacDonald: You are not that fast a learner either.

Mr. Lalonde: However, I will read this report. I have asked my officials to do a complete examination of it and I have indicated that in a few weeks I hope to be able to comment on it.

I might indicate to the hon. member that we have already set up Canertech, the Crown corporation, to push renewable energy. The government is already supporting research in the area of hydrogen which was recommended by the committee.

Mr. Rose: Madam Speaker, the minister mentions oil price rises. I suggest to him that is all the more reason we get on with the job of energy alternatives and conservation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FUNDING FOR CANERTECH

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): We also support the call for a minister of state, and energy alternatives, conservation and renewables as the cheapest, safest, quickest and most employment intensive way of solving our energy crisis, of meeting the demand curve and meeting self-sufficiency. Can the minister tell us when he will increase the piddling $20 million he has assigned to Canertech to stimulate alternatives? Also, when does the minister intend to spend the $1.2 billion cushion, which he shows at the bottom of page 90 in the National Energy Program?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I am glad that the NDP has at long last discovered conservation in the area of energy.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: Five years after the government introduced a very dynamic program in the area of conservation, and I mention particularly the home insulation program, the NDP is now supporting it.

I want to tell my hon. friend that we created Canertech with an initial budget of $20 million. We have said that if additional funds are required, this being an area of high priority, they would be forthcoming. However, there is no point in providing funds until those in existence at the present time have been used.

We are fully behind Canertech, and I am glad to know that we will have the support of the NDP in this regard too.

Oral Questions

FINANCE

ENERGY TAX INCREASES

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. The government has increased the cost of energy to the consumer 11 times since February 18, 1980. Eight of those increases have been tax increases which have served only to increase the revenues of the federal government. That is the real reason for the inflation rise in the cost of energy.

How many more energy tax increases does the Minister of Finance anticipate, let us say by the end of the year, in order to help Canadians fight inflation?

Miss MacDonald: Scrooge.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I am not proposing to introduce any new tax increases in energy. That would be indicated in a budget, and I have no intention with respect to anything new that has not already been outlined in the budget.

Mr. Lewis: Madam Speaker, I would suggest putting those words on the record is the only thing the Minister of Finance has done to protect Canadians against inflation, at least until the end of the year.

• (1150)

REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE TO MEET HOUSING RENTAL INCREASES

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): I have another question for the Minister of Finance. Mortgage interest rates are at a record high as a result of the Liberal party's high interest rate policy. As multiple unit landlords renew their mortgages at today's Liberal interest rates they are going to be forced to increase their rents or go bankrupt. This is going to impact severely on tenants who are mainly low and middle-income Canadians. How does the minister plan to counter or cushion the impact of these rental increases on Canadians?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, on the first question, so we are absolutely clear and so the hon. member will not be misled by anything I have said, if there are further production cutbacks, obviously the Government of Canada will have to take that into account, but that has already been made known to the hon. member. I wanted to make sure he would not conclude from the answer that I had abandoned that particular approach. Here again I am asked to bring in a new expenditure program. I do not know how one shelters without an allowance, and it is not my intention now, as much as I would like to be able to do it, to bring in new programs.

Oral Questions

SOCIAL SECURITY

POSITION OF SINGLE WOMEN AGED 55 TO 64 YEARS

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

The minister will know that Statistics Canada reported in 1979 that 41.5 per cent of single, divorced and widowed women aged 55 to 64 who did not live with relatives had incomes well below the poverty line. With today's running inflation and the escalating CPI, these figures are now much higher. These women, of course, do not qualify for the assistance available to senior citizens at age 65, and with unemployment at 7 per cent they have little hope of finding employment. My question to the minister is, will she introduce now as a short-term emergency measure special assistance to women aged 55 to 64?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, we are well aware of the problem of special groups of people under 65, and especially of people between 55 and 64 who must unfortunately survive only with provincial welfare benefits. Unfortunately, under the present distribution of federal-provincial responsibilities, the federal government ensures that married couples over 65 have incomes above the poverty line and we hope that we can soon do the same for single people. The provinces must take their own responsibilities. As I have said, with the present jurisdiction set-up, we cannot take direct action for the social welfare of people under 65.

[English]

Mr. McLean: Madam Speaker, the women who are in that age group 55 to 64 will find themselves taking little comfort from the response that it is somebody else's responsibility. To see that these needs are met, and until such agreement can be made and the situation jointly dealt with through consultations with the provinces, will she urge her colleague, the minister responsible for employment, to introduce on an interim basis an employment incentive program specifically targeted for women aged 55 to 64 so they might have some opportunity to get short-term employment? How long are we going to go on saying to these women, "You have to live below the poverty line"?

[Translation]

Miss Bégin: Madam Speaker, I do not think that the hon. member is doing anyone a service by speaking in this way. It seems to me that it is more important to give people information on which they can act and point out that, at the present time, the provinces—and they are well aware of this problem which we have often discussed at joint meetings—can decide to increase their welfare and assistance benefits, in which case we would reimburse automatically 50 per cent of this increase. I think that we should tell people to whom they should apply instead of playing games and pretending that we have certain responsibilities when we do not. On the other hand, as to granting assistance to industry to hire women who have trouble finding employment because they are older and are unfortunately the victims of an unwritten prejudice, I would like to repeat—and I am happy to have the opportunity to do so—that in late January, my colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, established a program which should help to hire immediately and over a period of two years 4,300 Canadians including women in this age group who have difficulty in finding employment through normal channels. Under this employment incentive program, the employer receives 80 per cent at first, then 50 per cent and finally 25 per cent of the salary paid to such people. I invite women to make use of this program by going to our Manpower Centres.

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

UREA FORMALDEHYDE—ADVISORY COMMITTEE'S RECOMMENDATION ON ASSISTANCE TO HOME OWNERS

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

On April 23 of this year the minister banned urea formaldehyde foam insulation, and did so on the recommendation of a report from an expert advisory committee which she appointed in December. On page 11 of that report the committee recommended that the federal government assist home owners who are suffering adverse health effects from formaldehyde exposure. I would ask the minister when she intends to implement that recommendation, and what has she to say to those people who have been so exposed?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): What I can tell my colleagues in the House of Commons today, Madam Speaker, is that I have already the agreement of five provinces, if I recall properly, including New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Ontario—I seem to be missing a few—which have offered to help us to provide assistance. I have instructed my officials to look immediately into existing means of providing technical assistance.

[English]

REQUEST FOR DISSEMINATION OF INFORMATION IN TORONTO

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, the minister may know that the other night in Toronto there was a meeting of a group of home owners, some 400 in number, who organized a new association called "Home owners with Urea Formaldehyde Foam Insulation", or "HUFFI". In statements after that meeting the group indicated it was concerned about the possible health effects and "the lack of assistance, guidance, information" from the minister, which is now becoming an acute problem. It is also known, as I am sure the minister knows, that the board of health in the city of Toronto has indicated it has no information that is useful to it from the ministry which tells at what level it can predict there are difficulties in respect of exposure.

When will the minister provide the municipalities and the provinces with that information in respect to levels, and when will she implement the recommendation to give assistance to the home owners?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I am quite surprised that the Toronto board would not have received that information. We do not deal, because of the Constitution, directly with municipalities in instances like that, of course. My line of communication is with the provincial ministers who received immediately, on the morning of publication, a copy of the report and of the exact situation regarding UFFI. It is not fair to say, in a simplistic statement like that, that there is no information.

We have directed public attention to two booklets, widely distributed, of which copies are available, I am sure, even in the hon. member's riding office. One is from the National Research Council and one is from the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. They contain specific questions and answers on what to do when a house has been insulated with UFFI. This is good material. If the situation persists with the Toronto board in which they need the information, I will contact Mr. Dennis Timbrell and ask him to pass on the information.

HEALTH

STUDY OF STILLBIRTH STATISTICS AND CAUSES IN PRINCE EDWARD COUNTY, ONT.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Madam Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Could the minister confirm that a study of birth defects and stillbirths in Prince Edward County near the Bay of Quinte showed there was a dramatic increase, some 200 per cent to 300 per cent, in stillbirths in the early 1970s over the previous ten to 15 years? Would she also advise the House what ongoing monitoring systems exist to enable the investigation into possible links between health problems and contamination of drinking water and the food chain, particularly in the Great Lakes?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I replied to the same question several times a little over three weeks ago. Unfortunately, I do not have the details of the matter with me today. I am surprised that the hon. member would come back to it. This question has also been asked in the Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs. I said at the time that the study on the Bay of Quinte had been made by a university student, and as such had certain limitations.

● (1200)

[English]

Mr. de Jong: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister. The reason for asking the question is that the student was a Ph.D. working in Environment Canada and just taking a special course.

This is not the first time this problem of birth defects has been referred to the ministry. As early as 1976 this particular ministry promised to undertake a study, with the Ontario government health department, of the high incidence of birth defects, particularly in the Wallaceburg area. The incidence of birth anomalies in that area was 40 per cent higher than the average for the province of Ontario.

What we are interested in is finding out what this study and similar studies are showing, and would the minister tell us what studies are revealing in terms of the connection between environmental pollution and human birth defects and spontaneous abortions in Ontario and in other parts of this country?

[Translation]

Miss Bégin: Madam Speaker, with regard to the specific question about what this study by a Ph.D. student is showing, I shall send a letter to the hon. member. I believe that this is the best way to give the scientific details required in view of the seriousness of his question.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

QUERY WITH RESPECT TO FUTURE CHANGES IN POLICY

Hon. Bud Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Science and Technology. I am sure all of us welcome recent statements that more funding is to be made available to aid in research. Given that Imperial Oil and other companies have indicated an intention to expand their research capabilities in Canada—and Imperial Oil particularly has indicated an expansion probably taking place in Sarnia and in Calgary—and given the fact that these projects are only going to go ahead on the basis of present legislation, particularly capital cost allowances, can the minister confirm that any changes to be made in the research and development policy will not in any way diminish the benefits which are presently available to corporations which are already embarking on building and expanding research facilities?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for the question. As he knows, we have put forward what we think are effective and ambitious plans for government expenditure designed to help Canada's economy reach an over-all figure of 1.5 per cent of gross national product directed to research and development. However, it will not be by government efforts alone that we will be able to achieve our objectives, and we are calling for and hoping to see a very greatly increased expenditure on the part of the private sector. Indeed, we are looking for real growth in research and development expenditures by some 17 per cent per year on the average until 1985.

One of the problems we have identified very clearly in our research is that, on the whole, the record of foreign-owned firms and subsidiaries in Canada has not matched the performance of Canadian companies in undertaking research and development efforts, and I therefore would welcome, along with the hon. member, the indications which he has just given us of increased activities on the part of this company. I would have to say that it certainly would not normally be our intention to hinder such development retroactively but, rather, to applaud them.

EXCISE TAX

APPLICATION TO LIQUOR SALES—PURPOSE OF INDEXATION

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. In his speech on May 6 last to the Conference Board of Canada the minister indicated that he supported Governor Bouey in his indication to Canadians that we can expect even higher rates of inflation. Can the minister tell this House how the indexing of tax to the consumer price index as it applies to commodities such as wines, beers and spirits is not in itself inflationary, and will the minister tell this House how he intends to fight inflation when he states that the real purpose of indexing taxation to the consumer price index is to prevent government revenues from eroding?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member realizes that we will be dealing with this question at the report stage of the bill in due course, but just let me say as a preliminary that the purpose of this particular indexing is to achieve what a normal tax on value as a proportionate value would achieve. It does not in itself add to inflation. It is the equivalent of a tax based on an increased value of a commodity, and there are many of those taxes in our system.

Mr. Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, if the intended purpose of indexing is to prevent government revenues from erosion, then will the minister tell us that he proposes to extend that indexing to other commodities and, if he does not intend to extend it to other commodities, how can he justify the continued discrimination against these products by indexing only excise tax as against wines, beers and spirits?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the reason is that there is a different tax system, an ad valorem tax, on other commodities.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. CLARK—ALLEGED UNPARLIAMENTARY LANGUAGE OF MR. LALONDE

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order arising from an interjection yesterday in debate by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde). On page 9587 of Hansard the following exchange appears:

> MR. CLARK: The minister of energy, who might want to put his seat on the line, says that is a lie. He is saying it is a lie that the Government of Canada paid $942,000 to the good Liberal friend, Maurice Strong.
> MR. LALONDE: To Maurice Strong, that is a lie.

It may well be that the minister is going to tell the House of Commons that the $942,000 payment by the Government of Canada went to Mr. Strong in a corporate capacity, went to a company or went through one of some other covers. The House is not particularly interested in having a review of the one thousand and one variations of Liberal patronage. What we are interested in is a minister of the Crown in this House of Commons respecting the rules of this place.

He knows that the language he used yesterday is unparliamentary and unacceptable, and I would like, on a point of order, to ask him to withdraw language which he knows and which the House knows is unacceptable.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I have already stated in this House and in a letter to the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) that Mr. Maurice Strong held only a very small minority position in the bank called Sogener and, as such, he could not be the beneficiary of the amount mentioned by the Leader of the Opposition.

Indeed, I did interject yesterday, but I withdraw the expression used if it is considered unparliamentary. I will only say that what the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition said is not true.

Madam Speaker: Indeed that settles the matter, and I thank the minister for his co-operation.

MR. HAWKES—RECOGNITION OF MEMBERS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, I rise to seek some procedural advice from Your Honour. Your Honour realizes that for 27 question periods in a row I have attempted to be recognized. I was not recognized again today, probably for reasons respecting long answers as well as long questions. However, my parliamentary responsibilities require me along with several other members to be away from this House in the week ahead of us. In your ruling on recognition in question period of May 27, 1980, you indicated that those who were away from question period or were not able to attend consecutively would lose their place in line. I wonder if I fulfil my obligation—

• (1210)

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I am sure I said no such thing. I did say that attendance in the House of Commons has some bearing on the number of times that an hon. member may be recognized. I think that is simply logical. If you are not here often, you cannot be recognized often.

The hon. member is raising a point of order. He raised the same matter as a question of privilege yesterday. Obviously he cannot transform a question of privilege on which I had ruled into a point of order. I think the hon. member knows what he can do if he wants to be recognized. His case is not unique. A lot of members are seeking the floor and a lot of members do not always get the floor. I try to be fair. I repeat, that is my only rule.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 1,871, 1,872, 1,898, 2,051, 2,052, 2,125, 2,126, 2,309, 2,310 and 2,319.

I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

CADC—MARY LOU McCLOSKEY

Question No. 1,871—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did Mary Lou McCloskey, a former employee of Crown Assets Disposal Corporation, visit the premises of the corporation on the afternoon of December 11, 1980, and, if so (a) did she file with the chief of finance an account in the amount of $60.00 owing to her for work done for the corporation on Friday, August 1, 1980 (b) was she asked by Mr. Michel Bourcier to leave the premises in front of other members of the staff and did he escort her to the exit (c) did Miss McCloskey request to see Mr. Richard Asselin, the chief of finance and, if so, was this request relayed to Mr. Asselin by Marie Laflèche of data control?

2. Did Mr. Bourcier order Miss McCloskey to leave the building before she could see Mr. Asselin?

3. What are all the reasons for the actions of Mr. Bourcier?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): I am informed by Crown Assets Disposal Corporation as follows: 1. Yes, on December 11, 1980, at approximately 2.30 p.m.

(a) No, however, a registered letter was received at the office of the vice-president, finance and administration on December 15, 1980, filing such an account.

(b) (i) Yes; Miss McCloskey did not respect the policy of the corporation with regard to visitors: Visitors should remain at the reception area until escorted to people with whom they are to meet. See also part 3 below; see question 1,872 answered this day.

(ii) No, to the reception area.

(c) (i) Yes, however, Mr. Richard Asselin, C.A., is the vice-president, finance and administration.

(ii) Yes, however, Marie Laflèche is not of data control but supervisor of the data processing section of the corporation.

2. No, Miss McCloskey was asked to leave the premises. See part 1(b)(i) above.

3. Miss McCloskey has not been an employee of the corporation since June, 1980, and on December 11, 1980, had not scheduled a meeting with any employee of the corporation. Since her resignation from the corporation, she had been visiting the office on an occasional basis without appointment, disrupting the work flow of the employees.

CADC—MR. STANLEY JANAS

Question No. 1,872—Mr. Cossitt:

Is Mr. Stanley Janas, chief of administration of Crown Assets Disposal Corporation and, if not (a) who is and what is his/her complete Public Service history (b) did this person advise Mary Lou McCloskey, a former employee of Crown Assets Disposal Corporation on the afternoon of Thursday, December 11, 1980, that she should leave the premises as she was "a disturbance" and, if so, on what grounds was such a statement made?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): I am informed by Crown Assets Disposal Corporation as follows: Yes, Mr. Stanley Janas is chief of administration and Personnel of Crown Assets Disposal Corporation, in a probationary capacity.

(a) Mr. Janas has never been employed in the federal Public Service.

(b) No, she was asked to refrain from disturbing the staff during working hours and, that if there was anyone in particular that she should wish to see, she should present herself to the receptionist and have the receptionist call the individual to see if they were available. See also question 1,871, parts 1(b)(i) and 3 answered this day.

NATIVE PEOPLE'S VISIT TO OTTAWA

Question No. 1,898—Mr. MacKay:

With respect to the recent visit to Ottawa by native people, including the arrival of the Constitution Express, how many approximate hours of overtime were incurred by the RCMP?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): During the recent visit to Ottawa by native people, including the arrival of the Constitution Express, approximately 5,592 hours of overtime were incurred. Of this total, approximately 5,551.5 hours occurred in Ottawa.

Order Paper Questions

CADC—MADAME NADEAU'S CONDUCT RESPECTING MISS McCLOSKEY

Question No. 2,051—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did Madame Claudette Nadeau, president of Crown Assets Disposal Corporation, recently contact Mr. MacSween of the National Arts Centre at any time in regard to the employment by the centre of Miss Mary Lou McCloskey, formerly with the corporation, and did Madame Nadeau recommend that Miss McCloskey not be hired and that if she had already been hired that she be fired?

2. What are all the other details of the conversation between Madame Nadeau and Mr. MacSween?

3. Will a full investigation be conducted into Madame Nadeau's conduct?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): I am informed by Crown Assets Disposal Corporation as follows: 1. If such contact was made, the information exchanged would be of a personal nature concerning Miss Mary Lou McCloskey.

2. Same as 1 above.

3. Not applicable.

CADC—TEMPORARY WORK—MISS McCLOSKEY

Question No. 2,052—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did a Marie Lafleche of Crown Assets Disposal Corporation recently advise former employee Mary Lou McCloskey that the corporation would like her assistance temporarily on certain work?

2. Did Miss McCloskey request confirmation from Marie Lafleche that she would be paid and was such payment approved by Mr. Richard Asselin, chief of finance, and did Ms. Lafleche tell Miss McCloskey to render her account?

3. After rendering her account, was Miss McCloskey informed that she would not be paid despite assurances given and, if so, what is a detailed explanation of the treatment accorded Miss McCloskey?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): I am informed by Crown Assets Disposal Corporation as follows: 1. No.

2. Not applicable.

3. After rendering an account, Miss McCloskey was informed that the corporation did not consider any money was owned to her as no services were requested.

FUNDS ALLOCATED TO COAST GUARD AUXILIARY, WESTERN REGION

Question No. 2,125—Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich):

1. What funds were allocated in the estimates for the fiscal year (a) 1977-78 (b) 1978-79 (c) 1979-80 (d) 1980-81, to the organization and operation of the Coast Guard auxiliary in the western region?

2. How were the allocations distributed in relation to (a) equipment (boats, radios, etc.) (b) administration (c) re-imbursement to members of the auxiliary (d) travel expenses to attend meetings for (i) permanent administration (ii) members of the auxiliary (e) insurance coverage for boats of auxiliary personnel and, in each case, how were they spent?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. (a) and (b) None. See reply to question No. 2,126, Parts 1(a) and (b), answered this day.

(c) $ 176,000—1979 calendar year
(d) $ 158,000—1980 calendar year

2.		1979			1980
(a)		$ 11,000	(a)		$ 10,000
(b)		$ 35,000	(b)		$ 37,000
(c)		$ 7,000	(c)		$ 18,000
(d)	(i)	$ 3,500	(d)	(i)	$ 5,000
	(ii)	$ 8,000		(ii)	$ 22,000
(e)		$ 31,900	(e)		$ 27,837

(e) Minimum deposit premium for national insurance policy.

COAST GUARD AUXILIARY, WESTERN REGION—RESCUES

Question No. 2,126—Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich):

1. In the fiscal year (a) 1977-78 (b) 1978-79 (c) 1979-80 (d) 1980-81, how many rescues were (i) attempted (ii) effected by the Coast Guard auxiliary in the western region?

2. How many involved, wholly or in part (a) auxiliary personnel (b) provincial emergency service (c) other services?

3. What was the average cost per rescue in which (a) the Coast Guard was involved on its own (b) the Coast Guard was involved in co-operation with auxiliary and/or provincial emergency service, including cost of overhead such as capital costs and salaries (c) only auxiliary personnel were involved?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. Records for the auxiliary are maintained by calendar year concurrent with their contract. Search and rescue statistics do not specify the number of rescues attempted or effected by the auxiliary; the total number attended is recorded. (a) and (b) 1977 and 1978 not applicable since the contract was signed in December, 1978.

(c) 1979 calendar year: 261 attended.
(d) 1980 calendar year: 428 attended.

2.	1979	1980
(a)	261	428
(b)	325	397
(c)	3,686	3,217

DEPARTMENTAL PROGRAM EVALUATION PROCEDURES

Question No. 2,309—Mr. Herbert:

1. Are complete program evaluation procedures in place and operative in each department and, if not, which departments still have to complete them?

2. Does the work entail the preparation of a manual applicable to the department and, if so, which departments have such a manual?

3. Is the Auditor General responsible for ensuring that adequate program evaluation procedures are in place?

4. Is the Comptroller General responsible for a critique of the program evaluation made by the department?

5. Do persons outside the Public Service have access to departmental program evaluation reports, and, if so, what are their names?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): 1. The office of the Comptroller General is working with over 30 of the largest departments in terms of spending. In 22 of these, program evaluation procedures are essentially complete and operative. These are: Agriculture, Customs and Excise, Canadian International Development Agency, Fisheries and Oceans, National Defence, Environment, Services, Supply, Veterans Affairs, Employment and Immigration, Energy Mines and Resources, External Affairs, Indian and Northern Affairs, Industry, Trade and Commerce, Labour, Transport, National Health and Welfare, National Museums, Public Archives, Royal Canadian Mounted Police, Secretary of State, and Taxation. Other departments are in various stages of development of the function. Departmental evaluation plans were called for this spring and until these are reviewed it is not possible to confirm which other departments have complete operative functions.

2. Preparation of a departmental manual on program evaluation is not essential to the establishment of the function. However, some departments have decided that it would be useful and are drafting departmental manuals, though none is yet final.

3. The Auditor General is not responsible for ensuring that adequate evaluation procedures are in place. This is the responsibility of the Treasury Board through the office of the Comptroller General. However, the Auditor General may audit the adequacy of procedures.

4. The office of the Comptroller General does assess selected program evaluations but would not necessarily provide a critique.

5. In some cases, non-Public Service consultants would be involved in the preparation of draft reports and therefore would have access to these. Access by other persons would be in accordance with the provisions of Bill C-43, introduced in the House of Commons on July 17, 1980, and now being studied by the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

IMPAC PROGRAM

Question No. 2,310—Mr. Herbert:

1. Under the Improvement in Management Practices and Controls (IMPAC) Program, were programs abandoned on the basis of recommendations from the office of the Comptroller General and, if so, which programs?

2. Were significant modifications made to programs resulting from similar recommendations and, if so, what was the financial impact on the department concerned?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): 1. Under the Improvement in Management Practices and Controls (IMPAC) Program, no programs were abandoned on the basis of recommendations from the office of the Comptroller General.

2. As a result of these recommendations, no significant modifications were made to the programs as defined in the Blue Book. However, many changes have been made to departmental management processes forming part of the programs.

PETRO-CANADA—CREDIT CARD EXCHANGE AGREEMENTS

Question No. 2,319—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did PetroCan recently take steps to terminate its existing credit card exchange agreements with other oil companies and, if so (a) what is the name and job designation of the highest-ranking official who made the decision and what were the reasons (b) was any cabinet minister involved and, if so, what was his/her name and in what way (c) what are the names of all the oil companies with which agreements have been or will be terminated and, in each case, for what reason?

2. Is it government policy that PetroCan should not, in any way, deal on a business basis with private enterprise and, if so, for what reason?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Petro-Canada reports as follows: 1. Yes.

(a) Mr. V. G. Sundstrom, group vice-president, manufacturing and marketing at Petro-Canada made the decision. The reasons are outlined in part (c).

(b) No.

(c) Sunoco, in Canada, British Petroleum, in Canada, Phillips Petroleums Ltd., in U.S.A.

The universal acceptance and increasing use of bank credit cards combined with the extra handling costs of credit card exchanges relative to low usage in western Canada caused Petro-Canada to make the decision to terminate the agreements.

2. No. Petro-Canada is involved in partnership with private enterprise in the overwhelming majority of business dealings.

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

The House resumed, from Tuesday, May 12, consideration of the motion of Mr. Kaplan that Bill C-61, respecting young offenders and to repeal the Juvenile Deliquents Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Lawrence (p. 9497).

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I was beginning to make some remarks the other evening when the bill was called. I would like to extend those remarks to pick up the thread of what I was saying earlier. In that speech I had been referring to the importance of the amendment and my concern that a whole day had gone by without having a response from the government as to the position the government might be taking on the amendment.

For the purpose of framing it, I want to say that the amendment filed by the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence), seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour), is one in which the House is asked to decline to give second reading to the bill at this time because the bill "rejects the fundamental principle of equal treatment of all persons before the law by specifying that the act will apply to different age groups in different provinces".

It occurred to me at that time, and I so mentioned to the House, that the application of the law would vary for offenders depending on where the offence occurred. Government members expressed firmly during the constitutional debate the belief that federal laws and rights ought to apply equally to all Canadians. I am sure my friends remember those vehement statements made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) and others during the constitutional debate; and we ought to consider that if that is to be the ethos of the government, it ought to apply with respect to juveniles and young offenders. This is the opportunity to do that.

The answer from the minister was in the form of an interjection during the debate indicating that that had been the case for a long period of time; that under the Juvenile Delinquents Act there had been different laws applying differently across the country. I know that. That is precisely the problem. Now is the opportunity for the government to move in a way which could bring some uniformity to the law. That is the purpose of the amendment.

This is what we call a reasoned amendment. It is most unusual. You, Mr. Speaker, were in the chair at the time and I commend you on your judgment with respect to that. It is important at this stage to be able to zero in on principles that would apply so that debate becomes more relevant. This is one of those amendments which makes a debate relevant. It is a concern. As I mentioned, and as was mentioned by the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland, the law as it stands, with the exception of that particular matter, has the general support of this and other parties in the House.

When the minister introduced the bill on April 15, 1981, he made an excellent summation of what this bill is designed to do. The minister is in the chamber. I think it would be worth while to quote what he said. I quote:

> The proposed legislation blends three principles. The first is that young people should be held more responsible for their behaviour, but not wholly accountable since they are not yet fully mature and are dependent on others.

That is an excellent, socially mature and socially conscious mixture of principles in arriving at the first principle of the bill, that there is a feeling that young people should be treated as individuals, not necessarily as extensions of their parents, and that the parents should have no vicarious liability for the acts of their children.

I pause to say it is interesting that the Solicitor General, who is introducing this legislation with this principle in it, brought forward as a private member a bill which provided that parents should have vicarious liability. Having been in his portfolio for some time and having looked at the problem a second time, obviously a sober second look with ministerial responsibility made him decide that the principle he espoused in the House at one time ought not to be espoused here.

I agree with the proposition set forth in the bill that to treat young people otherwise, to treat them as extensions of the parents, is to deny them and society the atmosphere of rationality in terms of enforcement of the law. No one in this House of Commons would deny that social conditions, family conditions and other things affect the attitude, and therefore the actions, of young people and others in the community. It moulds their lives. They are subject to the environment. To take the position that the law ought to be cognizant only of those things would be to deny the matter of rationality, the rational decisions made by human beings when contemplating any act, legal or illegal.

In the first principle enunciated by the minister, he has blended those two questions quite well. I again quote the minister:

> The second point is that society has a right to protection from illegal behaviour, even though committed by a minor.

● (1220)

It is important for us to remember that although the bill does away with the Juvenile Delinquents Act and lays on a new ethic, there is still the principle of the responsibility of young people in this particular piece of legislation. Taking into account the question of maturity, young people have a responsibility to recognize that they live within a society which runs by certain rules and broad principles which they must observe as they would expect others to observe when dealing with them.

Also the minister said:

> The third point is that young persons have the same rights to the due process of law, natural justice and fair and equal treatment as adults, and that these rights must be guaranteed by special safeguards.

The minister concluded:

> Thus, the bill is intended to strike a reasonable and acceptable balance between the needs of young offenders and the interests of society.

That third point is very important. The Juvenile Delinquents Act was passed in 1908. There have been a host of attempts to change that old statute. When one reads the section dealing with the offences, one will find that the most insidious and profound offences can be committed. If one is convicted of being a juvenile delinquent, various things flow from it. One principle of law which is denied in the Juvenile Delinquents Act is the right for people to be certain of that for which they are charged. If one reads the old statute, one will understand exactly how vague and wrong it is.

The principle which the minister discussed dealt with the question of due process in an admirable manner. The bill will cover only young persons charged with Criminal Code and other federal statutes and regulations offences. It will not cover breaches of provincial or municipal laws. It covers the law within the federal scheme, particularly the Criminal Code, which I think impacts most heavily on young people. There is provision for a formal type of court proceeding in a different kind of court. As set out in the bill, there is a right to legal representation at all stages of proceedings, and there is the responsibility of the youth court judge to make the right known to the unrepresented youth.

The courts have moved a great deal in the past few years. They have been more conscious of individual rights of the accused person who has not yet been found guilty. He is not guilty, just accused. Most offenders are deemed to be innocent until proven otherwise; there has been a consciousness of that right. This ensures that in the all-important proceeding brought against a person defined as a young person by this statute, the person will be represented and he has a right to be represented.

This bill was dealt with by the minister's predecessor, the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland, when he was solicitor general. Now it has been dealt with by the minister who has the honour of having this bill approved. It is modern, progressive and reasonable with respect to its approach to dispositions. There is a provision for sentencing when offences are found and for absolute discharges. There are very substantial fines if appropriate. Also there is the provision for restitution which has the potential of conveying to the young offender that there has been an offence and someone has been deprived of property. There can be some compensation for the deprivation an innocent person suffered as a result of a wrongdoer through the imposition of this restitution provision. It provides for compensation orders for loss or damage to property, loss of income or special damages which arose because of personal injury to the victim of the offence. It puts an obligation on the judge, when he is considering making such an order, to take into account the ability of the young offender to pay or to earn. There is a good, healthy balance in there. It indicates that when one breaks the rules of society and is so found to have broken those rules, there is some alternative to jail, to a juvenile home or to some other place where juveniles are sent. In the appropriate circumstances, the judge has the right to ensure the young person is dealt with in such a manner that he will have brought home to him the importance of his action and the impact of it upon his victim. Also he will have brought home to him the obligation he owes as a result and, it follows, the obligation which he owes as a citizen in a society which operates by the rule of law.

The provision for the community service order requires the young person to perform a specified amount of work. This is a very progressive and important movement in the law. It can also help the person who by his conduct indicated some lack of responsibility to society and the community, that is, in a situation where it would be adjudged that he could absorb the lesson and the importance of remembering the contribution he should make to the community by being a good citizen. He would not be before the court if he had been a good citizen. The judicial system relating to young people is expanding and opening up to a great degree. There is sufficient scope for a judge to consider additional conditions. All in all, it is an admirable piece of legislation.

I know the minister would not claim complete credit for it. He is the beneficiary of work which was done on it by his predecessor, as his predecessor was the beneficiary of work done earlier by former solicitors general.

In committee it will be the objective of our party to look at this piece of legislation from the points of view of the principle, the clauses and the provisions in it to see if it is possible to improve it. I hope the government will listen to the comments of members of Parliament, because they will be made with those points of view in mind. This is a piece of legislation which is long overdue.

I am honoured to have had the opportunity to speak for a few moments in this debate. I hope someone will follow me who will tell the House whether our amendment is acceptable and, if not, why not. Perhaps he or she could enlighten the House as to whether or not something can be done at committee stage during consideration of the bill which would make the amendment acceptable to the government, if it is not, so that there could be some uniformity in the application of the law.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) would permit a brief question.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Kaplan: My question relates to the remarks he made the other day, which he touched upon again today, concerning a universal upper age limit for the cutting in of the Young Offenders Act. I think the most enlightened age is under 18. I would have wished that the provinces would agree to that age, but the financial implications for provinces which now have a lower age are tremendous. It is by and large a burden which the provinces would have to bear almost completely on their own.

• (1230)

What I want to ask the hon. member is whether he would be prepared to impose on the provinces from this chamber a change in policy in a matter which the provinces have deeply felt views which have such enormous financial implications for them?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am not, nor have I ever been, privy to the discussions which have obviously taken place between the minister, his predecessors and the provinces over a period of years. I knew that those discussions had been continuing, and since there is now an amendment on the floor of the House by one party which proposes to amend the bill, which I gather is in a way that the minister would like, I put it to the minister a few moments ago that we might use a period of time during the course of the committee proceedings to approach those provinces which do not conform with the upper limit to see if there could not be some change of direction, given the fact that after these many years we have arrived at a new statute, which is a new departure and a new situation. It is in that sense that I raise this matter.

I do not think I could answer the minister's question as to imposition until I knew all the facts. I do not have those facts, but the minister does. Perhaps at the committee stage he might bring them forward so that we could deal with them. I do think that the principle is one which ought to be pursued and not forgotten by the minister. It is a principle which I do not think ought to be impaled simply on a matter of cost.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine East): Mr. Speaker, as a former solicitor general I welcome the presentation of this bill, this new Young Offenders Act, which will reform and replace the old Juvenile Delinquents Act. This bill has many good provisions and I will deal with some of them later. On the other hand, it has certain weaknesses which have already been referred to, but I would like to highlight a few of them in the hope that they will be dealt with in committee and corrected at that stage.

As hon. members know, this reform has been in the works since 1965 with the publication of the justice committee report on juvenile delinquency. That was the year I was first elected to this Parliament. In other words, this matter has been around for almost 16 years. The Juvenile Delinquents Act was passed in 1908 and it has received only very minor amendment in all that time, and no amendment at all since 1929. In effect, the Juvenile Delinquents Act that we have today is basically the same act which was passed in 1908. As everyone knows, there have been many social, political and economic changes in that time which have tremendously changed our society.

Following the justice committee report of 1965 the first young offenders act was presented, Bill C-192, which was introduced by a Liberal government in 1970. That bill died on the order paper before the 1972 election, after much debate and controversy. Following that, in the same year I was appointed solicitor general. Since I was extremely interested in the subject, I took steps to move ahead once more with this matter.

After a rather lengthy review with the provinces and interested individuals in the private sector, we published a new draft bill in July of 1975. Unfortunately, that proposal ran into strong opposition, especially from the provinces, and it failed to be enacted. I should point out that criminal law matters are the jurisdiction of the federal Parliament but that the delivery of social services falls under the jurisdiction of the provinces, as hon. members know. Consequently, this is an area of joint jurisdiction.

The criminal law which we pass for young people or which we apply to young people under the Juvenile Delinquents Act or the Young Offenders Act must be administered by the provinces through their social service agencies or through other institutions coming under provincial jurisdiction. As was just mentioned, the costs of delivering these services are rather high. In the circumstances it is desirable that there be close co-operation between the provinces and the federal government on the enactment of any new legislation dealing with juvenile delinquents or young offenders. In any case, my attempt failed.

Other attempts were made by the Secretary of State (Mr. Fox) when he was solicitor general in 1977 and by the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence) in 1979. These attempts were also without success. Consequently, we welcome this bill and urge its passage.

Many private reports and studies have likewise urged such reform. I have before me an excellent book by Elliott Leyton of Newfoundland which is entitled "The Myth of Delinquency". There is also the report by Sharon Moyer with respect to diversion in the juvenile justice system. There are many others. These reforms are badly needed.

Approximately 50 per cent of chronic young offenders go on to the adult courts. In other words, they go on to adult crime. In some cases reforms at the provincial level—and I have in mind my own province of Quebec—are being held up or declared invalid due to the lack of enabling legislation at the federal level. As hon. members know, and as I have pointed out, enabling legislation is necessary at the federal level if the provinces are to go ahead with their legislation, their reforms, which depend on our basic jurisdiction in criminal law.

The basic reforms in this bill, which I welcome, are, first, the increase in the minimum age of criminal responsibility from seven to 12 years of age. It is complete nonsense to consider that a person seven years of age can be responsible for criminal action. It is true that people of the ages of seven, eight, nine and ten carry out behaviour which is anti-social, but it is certainly repugnant to me and many others in this country that they should be treated under the provisions of the criminal law. While we had proposed in 1975 that the age of criminal responsibility be 14, I think that a change to 12 years of age is a good compromise since it has the consensus of the provinces.

The second good provision of this bill is that all young people, from now on, will have the right to due process in the same way as adults. They will have all the safeguards that adults have when they are before the courts; that is, the right to legal representation, their rights being specified, the right to be informed of what sections of the law they have contravened, and the right to appeal. Many of these provisions are not present in the Juvenile Delinquents Act as it exists today.

Another important reform in the bill is the total elimination of provincial and municipal offences and the elimination of the offence of juvenile delinquency, which served as a general catch-all offence. Under this bill only Criminal Code offences and other federal criminal type statutes will be subject to the Young Offenders Act.

Another important reform in the bill which is welcome is that it provides for many alternative sentence measures, a wide range of dispositions which judges can apply to those who are found guilty under the act, including diversion from the system where that is considered to be the best way of rehabilitating the young person. This also includes restitution to the victims of crime. Community service is also included where appropriate.

Another excellent part of the bill deals with the provisions which would automatically destroy the criminal records of the young person who was found guilty under the Young Offenders Act if, after two or five years, depending on the offence, he committed no further offences. There would be no need to apply to the National Parole Board for the setting aside or destruction of those records.

● (1240)

The major weakness in the bill has been referred to before, but I want to emphasize it. It is the variation in ages which will apply across the country. I think we can see the nonsense of this right in the capital area of Ottawa-Hull. In Quebec, under the present law one is considered to be a juvenile up to the age of 18 years; but in Ontario one is considered to be a juvenile only up to the age of 16 years. Consequently, if two young people commit the very same type of offence, one committing it in Ottawa and the other committing it in Hull, the one in Ottawa would be tried in the adult courts and would perhaps be sent to Millhaven Penitentiary, while the one in Hull would be tried before a juvenile court and would perhaps get a probation order, be sent to a juvenile farm, or something of that nature. I think it is completely illogical—and as I say, it is blatantly obvious in this Ottawa-Hull region—that such variations in our dispensation of justice should take place in this country.

This bill proposes that the maximum age be 18 years, and that is the government's preference, but it is subject to be changed down to the age of 16 years if any province so requests. In many cases the reason the provinces give for not changing it to a maximum age of 18 years is the financial one. There were questions on that just prior to my remarks.

I negotiated with the provinces and dealt with that matter. I think the argument based on cost and expense is a red herring, because if one were to increase a maximum age for juvenile crime under the Young Offenders Act to 18 years, a lot of the expenditures for adult corrections in that province could be transferred to the juvenile system where it would have a much greater effect. Every expert that I know of who has worked in the juvenile and criminal justice system will say that if one is to turn around a potential criminal, the time to do it is when he is still young, not wait until he is 24, 25 or 30 years of age. Efforts should be concentrated on that person when he is first apprehended, when he first starts getting into trouble with the law. So far as I am concerned, to transfer money from the adult correction system into the juvenile system, with a maximum age of 18 years, is a much more reasonable provision. I personally have a private bill before this House, Bill C-253, which would bring about that very thing; but I tabled that bill before the minister presented this bill.

It is my hope that we can send this bill to the justice committee, of which I am a member, to explore ways of correcting this weakness in the bill. I know the minister wants to correct it as well. However, I reject the amendment of the official opposition, which would delay the whole process, the whole bill, and delay many needed reforms for a lengthy period of time. I think the better way of dealing with this is to send this bill to committee as quickly as possible and for the committee to deal with it there, attempt to discuss the matter with the provinces and, if necessary, hear witnesses from the provinces and so on. We should attempt to find a solution there rather than delay the bill.

I have seen so many delays with this particular bill. The provisions are all piled here on my desk: "Youth in the Law", Highlights of Proposed New Legislation for Young Offenders", "Legislative Proposals to Replace the Juvenile Delinquents Act", now the Young Offenders Act, and there are other bills that I do not have with me today. However, this review has gone on and on, as has been pointed out, for 16 years. Now is the time to resolve it and to pass the legislation.

There is another weakness that I see in the present bill, and that is the age of transfer to the adult court. In my provisions of 1975, it was suggested that a case could be transferred to the adult court when the offender was age 16 and it involved a serious offence. This bill provides that this should be done at age 14. I personally feel that 14 is still too young an age for one to be tried in the adult court. I know that there is no dogma on this matter, but my preference would be for 16 rather than 14 years of age.

My only complaint against the wide range of dispositions which, on the whole, are excellent is the maximum fine. I think this bill provides for a maximum fine of up to $1,000. I feel that for young people, especially if they are under 16 or even under 18 years, that is too much. Most of them are not working. If the fine is to be meaningful and if they are to pay it themselves, I would prefer a maximum fine of $200, or at the most $500.

I will have more to say on this bill in committee and perhaps at third reading, especially with respect to the situation relating to young persons, their special needs, and why we need special legislation and institutions for young offenders; but I will refrain from speaking on that for the moment. I would urge, however, that the House pass this bill on second reading today, if possible, and that it be dealt with in committee as quickly as possible so we can improve the legislation and pass it this year, after, as I say, a long journey of 16 years.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise to speak on this bill which I consider to be a very important one. I get a chance to speak in this House often on oil prices and economic matters, but very seldom do I get a chance to speak on social matters. That is why I am particularly pleased to speak to this bill today. Often in the House that is the general trend, but that does not mean that the economic matters and those energy matters are the be all and end all of discussions in Canada. Social matters are just as important, especially when they concern young people, because, as we agree on all sides of the House, when dealing with young people and with children we are dealing with the future of our country.

I have a special interest in this bill dealing with young people and crime, having had my house in Ottawa broken into twice in the last two months, and I think juveniles were involved. I can share the concern that many people have in the country with the amount of juvenile crime, petty thefts, breaking and entering and so on. Any member who comes from an urban riding will hear from his constituents about the rather large numbers of offences of breaking, entering and theft which tend to involve juveniles. That is unfortunate.

I also have a longer term interest which goes back somewhat, as the first job I had as a lawyer was as the juvenile prosecutor for the city of Vancouver. I spent some time and learned my law in the family courts of Vancouver. I fondly remember those years. When the hon. member who last spoke, the former solicitor general, refers to all those reports, all the suggestions we have had for reform and change of the juvenile law, I know that frustration goes right down to all the social workers across this country, all the probation officers, child-care workers, clerks, judges, prosecutors, defence lawyers, and all groups involved in juvenile justice in Canada. Indeed, if one could ask them, I suppose the kids would reflect this as well.

This legislation that we have on the books right now goes back a long way, to 1908. That, in itself, shows the difficulty of getting change. It is hard to get change in anything, it seems, in this country. However, it seems to be particularly hard to get change in juvenile and children's legislation. All the people I have previously mentioned and governments are at fault here. We must get our act together and get change. The present Juvenile Delinquents Act goes back to 1908. That was a significant year. I think it was the year the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was born.

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear!

Mr. Waddell: Another event that year which was of importance to was the fact that the present Juvenile Delinquents Act came into law. I say to the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan), who I see in the House, that the law was very progressive for 1908. Why? Before that time was the Victorian age when people, including juveniles, were hanged for petty thefts and crime. The law in 1908, as the Solicitor General knows, the present Juvenile Delinquents Act, dealt with juveniles as misguided children, to use the words of the act, "in need of aid, encouragement and assistance". So that was a very progressive act. I wish I could say the same of this act, and I will tell the minister in a minute why I do not think this is a progressive act for our time. I will offer the minister a suggestion for a really new juvenile system. I think we can set a couple of goals in a progressive juvenile system; we can protect society and the welfare of the child. Those two goals are not mutually exclusive.

• (1250)

There are some progressive measures in this bill, I acknowledge that. There is the end of the status offences and the opening of the juvenile court to the public, thus demystifying that court. There is the change in the age of criminal responsibility. There are some procedural safeguards for juveniles, such as the right to bail, access to counsel—although if counsel is not free, access does not mean very much. There are provisions for transfer of juveniles from juvenile court to adult court if the offence is serious, although those provisions are not adequate, and I agree with the previous speaker that they should be considered in further detail in committee. Having had the experience of going through hundreds and hundreds of transfer applications under the present law, I think that matter should be reconsidered.

The bill has one glaring flaw and the previous speaker put his finger on it. It does not acknowledge equality under the law. We really cannot have different age standards for, say, Hull and Ottawa, that a child be considered an adult and receive the full force of criminal law in Ottawa, but be considered a juvenile and receive the force of juvenile law, which is more in tune with the protection of the juvenile and reform, in Quebec.

I suggest that the hon. member who spoke previously is not only right but wrong as well. This bill should not go to committee; the government should bring amendments in now. As the bill now is written it does not make sense; it clearly violates the principle of equality as set out in the new charter of rights. It is ironic that the government, which argued against checkerboard civil liberties across the country, and the Conservative party, which seemed to favour it, are now on opposite sides. The government is bringing in a bill that will result in checkerboards, with a juvenile being under age 18 in Quebec, under 16 in Ontario and under 17 in British Columbia.

Mr. Kaplan: That is the way it is now.

Mr. Waddell: Yes, that is the way it is now. I suggest the Solicitor General has the power to change it. I invite him to bite the bullet. He knows this is right. He has heard what a former solicitor general had to say so he should do it. Make it a uniform juvenile age across the country.

Before I sit down, I want to congratulate the Solicitor General for funding a program in my riding which is really progressive called the community accountability program. It is carried out in Cedar Cottage, Kensington, which is an area of Vancouver bounded by Nanaimo, Broadway, Fraser and 41st Avenue. I see the Solicitor General nodding his head so perhaps he has acquainted himself with the program. Every politician and bureaucrat associated with juvenile matters visits the program, yet we had trouble getting the money to keep it going this year. I must say, however, that the Solicitor General has been good about continuing funding for the program, and with a little pressure the provincial attorney general also found some money for it.

Under the program, community accountability panels comprised of local citizens deal with juvenile offenders referred to them as a result of minor or summary conviction offences. The panel decides on the punishment, whether it will be restitution, payment of money to a victim, community work, or an apology. The panel, comprised of people from the neighbourhood, finds out what is happening with the family, with the child's education, and why the child is behaving in a certain way. It claims an 85 per cent rate of success and is starting to reach down into the community. This program is progressive and democratic, and it works.

The Bill before us today by contrast is not very progressive. Basically, it provides a criminal code for juveniles. There is some mention of diversion but it is really a criminal code for juveniles, as our NDP justice critic, the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson), said in his excellent speech.

Just before I was elected in 1979, I visited the small town of Sterling in Scotland. As a result of the Kilbrandon report of 1968 which dealt with children in trouble, there is in Scottish law a full system of community accountability panels such as the one we have in Vancouver. Ours in Vancouver is just an experiment and does not have the full force of law behind it. But in Scotland, any juvenile committing an offence or being accused of being a delinquent who pleads guilty—as 90 per cent of juveniles do—comes before a panel. If they do not plead guilty, they go to juvenile court, but if they acknowledge their guilt, they go before a panel.

I saw a panel at work in Scotland. A young boy called Allan had been sentenced to leave his family because there was a permissive grandmother in the family who got him into trouble. He was sent to another home and school out of town. When I was there he was back before the panel asking that his sentence be reviewed. The panel said, "Look, son, we'll give you another six months. You can come back and live with your Grannie in six months if it works out." They got a report from the probation officer and so on.

There was another case of a young girl who had been moved in order to get better schooling. There was a report that she was doing a good job. The uncle and aunt and one of the parents were present. The panel agreed to take her off probation and put her permanently in the home. The family agreed. This was a really progressive juvenile system that was working.

There are some good things in this bill, Mr. Speaker, but it is not progressive in the second half of the twentieth century to go back to a criminal code for children. I would like to see the government examine the experiment in Vancouver and think about establishing it for the whole country. What a new juvenile system we would have then! It is not just pie in the sky, so-called socialist idealism because the system is working in Scotland now. What works in Scotland must work! Being a Scot I can say that. It is an example of bringing juvenile justice back into the community where it belongs.

I want to conclude by quoting from the 1975 report of the National Council of Welfare entitled "Poor Kids" as follows:

> To be born poor is to face a greater likelihood of ill health—in infancy, in childhood and throughout your adult life. To be born poor is to face a lesser likelihood that you will finish high school; lesser still that you will attend university. To be born poor is to face a greater likelihood that you will be judged a delinquent in adolescence and, if so, a greater likelihood that you will be sent to a "correctional institution". To be born poor is to have the deck stacked against you at birth, to find life an uphill struggle ever after. To be born poor is unfair to kids.

It was my experience in juvenile court that we dealt with poor kids, kids from single parent families, kids who never got a proper education or a proper chance.

The way to deal with juvenile crime is to deal with poverty first. The second way is to bring it right into the community and have neighbours deal with these problems; that happens in Scotland and in China.

I would ask the Solicitor General to amend the bill and make the situation all the same across the country, and when he brings in his next bill, to consider a really progressive system based on the Vancouver experiment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Mr. Speaker, it is nice to be debating another piece of legislation for a change. Bill C-61 is a very important bill, the Young Offenders Act, which is to repeal the Juvenile Delinquents Act. I want to congratulate our spokesman on this subject, the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence), who spoke in the debate on May 12, 1981. He has already discovered a number of major weaknesses in this piece of legislation. First, when young people run afoul of the criminal law they are not treated equally across the country. In this respect the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland introduced an amendment in an attempt to correct this, which reads:

> That all the words after the word "that" be deleted and the following substituted therefor: "this House declines to give second reading to Bill C-61, an act respecting young offenders and to repeal the Juvenile Delinquents Act, because the bill rejects the fundamental principle of equal treatment of all persons before the law by specifying that the act will apply to different age groups in different provinces."

It is ridiculous to have a federal law applied differently in each province. I am pleased that the Speaker has ruled the motion in order. We hope this amendment can be added to the bill. It will certainly be a major improvement to it.

I also want to congratulate my colleague the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Reid) for the contribution he made to the debate. As reported at page 9503 of Hansard, he said:

> While I am in large part in support of the bill, I cannot accept the position of the Solicitor General that we must rush through the debate at second reading.

We certainly cannot be rushing the bill through because we have found in it quite a number of weaknesses. We want to highlight these weaknesses first before sending the bill to committee.

The basic purposes of the act are, first, that young offenders are given more responsibility for their actions. Second, they have been given stronger rights under the law. Third, there is greater flexibility and, therefore, a greater chance of rehabilitation under the law.

● (1410)

There are still some very vague points in the bill. Clause 3 makes allowance for young offenders to settle out of court instead of having a day in court, but no guidelines have been set for this process; as an example, there is nothing which states for which crimes this can be done, who deciphers punishment and how it will be enforced. In addition, Clause 20(1) gives a judge ten distinct courses of action in sentencing. Clause 11 is a grandfather clause which allows the judge to do just about anything he wants.

Within the measure there is a uniform minimum age stipulated which has been agreed to by eight out of the ten provinces and all speakers to date. However, there is no uniform maximum age set for young offenders. This creates a checkerboard effect across the country as some provinces will have one maximum age and others another. That is why I hope the motion of my colleague, the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland, will be accepted by the Liberal Party and New Democratic Party. The bill creates inequality throughout the proposed measure.

The maximum fine for young offenders is $1,000, but for people under 18 this is quite a high figure. We would not want to promote more crime to pay for past crime. We are experiencing serious youth crime in the country today, and part of the reason, or perhaps the main reason, is the high unemployment rate for those from age 15 to 24. There is serious concern across the country about juvenile crime. I have received some letters very critical of the government, our jail system, our bail system and the weak punishments we have in respect of many of these serious crimes. I should like to read a portion of a letter from a concerned citizen of British Columbia. He points out:

—a boy is castrated in a public washroom in Clearbrook, B.C. by two juveniles. The juveniles are apprehended and released after questioning. Another boy is castrated by the same two juveniles. What is your answer to this boy and his parents—

He directed that question to me and all other members of Parliament. He wants to know what we are doing by letting people like this out immediately after the commission of a crime as serious as that.

Here is another example this Canadian citizen has written about:

—a sixty year old lady is robbed at knifepoint and later raped by a seventeen year old youth. This man was never even charged for his action.

He points out in his letter:

Our members of parliament are safe and secure and don't give a damn about you. You embarrass the public image of the criminal and we don't want to know about your problems.

That is one example of how some citizens feel about our easy bail laws, letting these people off with light sentences, giving them a little slap on the wrist and what have you.

I have with me a recent article from The Toronto Sun under the heading "Nurses cried at seeing raped girl". It states in part:

Police plan to petition the Wayne County Juvenile Court to have two 16-year-olds tried as adults in the rape-beating of an 11-year-old girl.

Nurses at Children's Hospital cried when they saw the girl, who suffered a skull fracture, stab wound to the chest and repeated slashes with broken glass.

"It was horrible . . . Those guys really wanted to kill her."

The girl, who lived on welfare with her mother and four brothers and sisters, was raped, beaten, kicked, stabbed in the chest and cut with broken glass for two hours Saturday night—

What is happening in the country today when we have youth committing horrendous crimes like this? It is important that we make improvements in our educational system. We must make students aware of how the law will deal with them when they commit serious crimes such as this. I do not know how many schools take their students on visits to jails, but this might help to some degree. It might not hurt to bring the paddle and the strap back to help them understand. Maybe then we will not have 11-year old girls being raped and elderly women attacked.

In addition, I am receiving many letters these days, as I am sure are all members of Parliament, in respect of the government's proposed legislation which would decriminalize possession of marijuana. I think public opinion is changing on this issue right now. I suggest today that if any surveys were taken the majority would oppose decriminalization of the possession of marijuana. Their concern results from so many young people getting on drugs today and committing serious crimes.

I have received a number of letters and documentations from the educational system across Canada, universities and schools. They are very concerned about any steps to decriminalize possession of marijuana. They feel all that will do is increase youth crime. I want to read some paragraphs from some of these letters from our educational directors across the country. This one states in part:

We are expressing the concern of 12 organizations closely related to the education of youth. We believe that if changes are made to this legislation which do not clearly impress upon society that the use of this drug is not condoned, there will be a significant increase in drug use, particularly by young people.

This letter goes into detail about the use of cannabis by students and young people. It states:

The use of cannabis by the students and young people of our country is a matter of urgent concern.

Representing, as we do, 12 provincial organizations directly involved with education and supervision of adolescents, we are perhaps more aware than most other groups of the harm already inflicted on our society by cannabis and other street drugs.

We are discussing the new Young Offenders Act and the difficulties we are having with youth in our courts today and in society, and our educators who are living with these problems at first hand in the schools, the people who can advise us better than anybody, suggest that if we go ahead with the decriminalization of marijuana we could be opening up a real hornet's nest in Canada. If the government is planning to introduce such legislation in the near future, we will certainly have to call these educators as witnesses to advise us on how this measure will affect Canada's youth across the country.

In addition, I have received a resolution of the Nova Scotia Federation on Alcohol and Other Drug Problems which opposes the decriminalization of cannabis. I would just like to read one or two quotations from this document. They point out under the heading "Increased hazard to the young":

—marijuana is particularly dangerous to young people, as their bodies are not fully developed. A great many young people use marijuana, and it is only now that the dangers are becoming apparent. The full consequences may not be seen until our next generation, as was the case with Thalidomide. There are numerous other dangerous effects, such as chromosome damage, reduced defence against brain and liver damage.

This organization then presented a resolution to us as parliamentarians as follows:

THEREFORE, BE IT RESOLVED that the Nova Scotia Federation on Alcohol and other Drug Problems requests the Department of Justice of the Government of Canada, and other appropriate bodies concerned, to take whatever necessary steps are appropriate to ensure that the current legal status regarding the use of cannabis remains unchanged, and that the Government of Canada and other concerned bodies seek the introduction of measures which will decrease the use of cannabis in Canadian Society.

We are dealing with a young offenders bill and at the same time the government is talking about decriminalizing marijuana. These documents received from the educational system point out that this will create nothing but problems for us. It seems that once a young person develops a drug habit it becomes an extremely costly habit, and so many of them have to return to crime, robbery, rape and what have you.

● (1420)

Since we have a very serious problem on our hands, we will not be able to rush this bill through, as suggested by the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan). That suggestion indicates to me that the minister does not understand the magnitude or the seriousness of the problem. This bill is a 90-page document, and we will have to go through it with great care because of the serious problems we have today with respect to juvenile delinquents, young offenders, drugs and crime. We shall have to go into a great deal of detail in the committee in dealing with this bill. We shall have to call in the police, the medical profession and so forth, which could contribute greatly to the improvement of Bill C-61.

[Translation]

Mrs. Céline Hervieux-Payette (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, first of all may I say to the House what a great honour it is for me to comment on a significant piece of legislation, an act respecting young offenders and which will repeal the Juvenile Delinquents Act. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, as the member for the riding of Montreal-Mercier, I have had the opportunity to make frequent visits to the institutions where juvenile delinquents are housed, institutions such as Boscoville, Mont Saint-Antoine and the Cité d'accueil de la Rivière-des-Prairies.

Mr. Speaker, those institutions in my riding have enabled me to be in regular contact with youths in trouble with the law and with the professional staff responsible for helping them rehabilitate and become worthy citizens. I want to salute those professionals and I hope that the new bill will make it possible for all offenders, particularly the young, to turn over a new leaf and, finally, to enjoy a better life in a country such as Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to reply to some of the remarks made by members opposite, particularly by the former solicitor general, the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence), who said that the House had been waiting long for this bill. If I may, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a slight correction and point out to hon. members that Bill C-61 received first reading last February 16 and was given second reading consideration on April 15, May 12 and again today. Therefore, less than a year after the election, the Liberal government introduced this important social measure and I am proud to take part in the debate on this bill. The hon. member for Huron-Bruce (Mr. Cardiff) as well said that the bill had been long in coming. Again if I may, Mr. Speaker, I would point out that the previous government had not introduced a bill as such in the House, all it did was to draft a policy statement. Having drawn inspiration from all existing documents, from reports prepared by government officials and from discussions held with the provinces, we suggest that perhaps this bill reflects the closer agreement between the provinces and the federal government since the provinces are partners in the administration of this legislation. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I take the liberty of reminding my colleagues that there would be no future for this statute without the participation of the provinces, for its administration falls under their jurisdiction.

[English]

I would like also to provide a clarification for the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Jarvis), who was asking the government about the difference between responsibility and accountability, two words we see in clause 3 of the bill. Perhaps I can offer a small explanation by saying that responsibility relates to capacity to form the intent to commit a criminal offence. According to the proposed Young Offenders Act, a young person would be responsible for his or her illegal behaviour, but she or he would not be held accountable in the same degree as an adult. That is why there will be different courts and different procedures for young offenders than for adults, and that is why we can say that responsibility and accountability are two different things under this bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, my colleagues have made several comments on alternative measures. I would like to explain in detail the avenues open to a youth in trouble, to a young offender. On the first offence, if it is a minor one the police officer can simply reprimand the young person and point out that his behaviour is reprehensible, and the procedure can stop there. On the other hand, at a later stage, perhaps for more serious offences, section 4 points out that alternative measures may be used. These measures are voluntary and the young offender can call on a lawyer at this stage to determine whether or not he can agree to the alternative measures. Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out that at no time is there a question of pleading guilty to make use of these voluntary measures, and that moreover, the act specifies that even the statements made at that time cannot be held against the young person.

A later stage, Mr. Speaker, which is somewhat more serious, will allow law enforcement authorities, that is the provinces, to refer the young person to a youth court. At such a time, as my hon. colleagues have pointed out, the young person must have the assistance of a lawyer, and in fact, this right is clearly recognized in the legislation.

On the other hand, many means are available to the court to determine, if the young person is found guilty, what measures should apply to him, and I believe that several of my colleagues have noted how these measures or provisions will allow the young person to mend his ways.

However, Mr. Speaker, in extremely serious cases, or at the last stage, for a really hardened young offender, for a young person who may have committed several offences, our bill provides for the possibility of referral to an adult court.

Mr. Speaker, for the information of the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro), and especially of my colleague for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen) who spoke about remission or the state of mind that a young person must have concerning his offence and the possibility of restitution of the stolen or damaged goods, I would like to point out that we have included in sections 20(c) and 20(f) provisions through which the young person will have to compensate any person who may have suffered damage, loss or injury, or to pay a fine, as provided in paragraph (c).

However, what is important to point out to my colleague is that this legislation provides for restitution, but not necessarily with the parents' money, and thus may force the young offender to face his responsibilities. One of the major principles of this legislation is to force the young offender himself to make some type of restitution according to his means by services to the community.

My colleague mentioned earlier the possibility of paying back that money. I believe that it is not the intention of the legislator to force a young person to pay back the amounts in question which he may not have or to force him to commit another offence to do so.

[English]

Some hon. members, such as the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) and the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour), talked about vicarious liability. This is an option that was examined very carefully. However, we have concluded that it would be difficult to adopt this option within our law. Civil law is the responsibility of the provinces. The application of this concept would involve great difficulty in terms of jurisdictional responsibility between the provinces and the federal government.

If I may give an example, a young person may be involved in a crime, such as a fire. The young person or the parents could be held liable for $100,000 damages, for instance. I do not think it is the intent of the legislators to be so extreme. I think the bill covers most cases in terms of restitution, or at least ensures that the young offender fulfils his responsibilities.

The hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) stated that clause 56(3) made the bill too lax with regard to evidence. I wish to clarify this point. It may be a misunderstanding that will be clarified at the committee stage. It is not the intent to collect evidence in a fashion which will place the young offender in a worse position than an adult. I refer to the situation where a young person may say to an arresting officer at the scene of a crime that he is guilty. It is not the intent to ignore such facts, but to recognize that later the young person should have the full protection of the law.

The hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Wenman) was concerned about the destruction of records. He said that if these were computerized, it would be difficult for the young offender to ensure that the records are destroyed. The bill does not provide that the information be sealed after five years but completely destroyed. The bill provides that when a young person becomes an adult he may make a special request for destruction of his records. He or she is probably the best person to know where the records are held and to ask that they be destroyed. It is very clear in the bill that it will be an offence for anyone to use the information. That is a safeguard to ensure that no records are used against the young person. This section, which was not in the previous act, can be improved and will be discussed at the committee stage.

The hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes) said that the rights and freedoms granted to the young person in the bill do not balance the responsibilities of that person. I remind the hon. member that the first principle of the bill is to see that the young person has the responsibility for his or her offence and will be held accountable before the court. This bill does not in any way remove the responsibility from the young person. Under this bill there will be more responsibility than under the previous legislation.

With regard to the family, clause 3(g) provides that the parents will be requested to appear before the court. However, the family is recognized as having the first responsibility in caring for the young person and should be there when the young person has some difficulty.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I would like to add some comments as several colleagues have spoken of the problems related to the financial provisions of legislation. We do indeed recognize the fact that the addition of new rights, such as the right to counsel, will add to the provinces' expenses.

We are in fact negotiating with them at the present time and there will be a federal-provincial conference in June, which will be a follow-up to the round of negotiations which were held with each individual province. We do believe that, as a result of these discussions, financial arrangements for the new services will be worked out and also that an agreement will be reached between the provinces and the federal government. Therefore, I do not think there is any need to be overly concerned about additional expenses as discussions are well under way. I also think that so far none of the provinces has appeared overly concerned about the federal contribution to the new service.

[English]

I now wish to address some of the main objections of the opposition. Their position was set forward in the amendment of May 12. Most members who addressed that issue talked about the principle. The hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie) talked about equality before the law. Let me state a few facts. First, the situation is that there is no uniformity in the application of the Juvenile Delinquents Act. This was outlined by some members.

The bill states that a young offender is a person of at least 12 years of age and not having reached the age of 18 years. There is provision for the provinces to lower the age. We agree with members opposite that the ideal situation would be a uniform age. However, as stated previously by the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan), there are cost factors involved. Certain services should be available, and at this time it might be a burden the provinces could not take on in order to implement the new act. The fact is that the age would be 18 in terms of uniformity. Upon request by a province to the federal government, it could be lowered. If no provinces were requesting a change, the age would be 18 across the country.

I would like to talk about the principle in terms of age by referring to a neighbouring country which has a federal system. The jurisdiction over juvenile delinquents lies with the state government in the United States, while our jurisdictional position is a mixed one, with the provinces having the right to administer the bill and the federal government having the right to apply this bill based on the Criminal Code. Recently in the United States there were 33 states using 17 years of age, 12 states using 16 years of age and some using 15 years of age. On April 9, 1981, the state of Illinois described the word "minor" as meaning a person under the age of 18 years. So one of the latest pieces of legislation in the United States refers to 18 years of age.

Also I should like to refer to the state of the international law. New Zealand uses ages 14 to 17; Australia, from 10 to 16; Japan, from 14 to 20; in Belgium it is under 18; England is from 10 to 18.

Clearly it is not a matter of principle. If it was a matter of principle, how could a country such as the United States with its first amendment, which is equivalent to our charter of rights, permit the young offenders bill to apply to 16-year-olds in some states and to 18-year-olds in other states? The point is very clear; it is a matter of administration by the provinces. Some provinces have indicated very clearly that they would prefer 16 or 17 years of age. Others are indicating that 18 years of age is a prerequisite to the adoption of this bill.

By stating its position on 18 years of age, the federal government is actually following current international law and showing some guidelines which could perhaps be followed in the future. There might be a period in which the provinces would adjust themselves to the 18 years of age principle. There will probably have to be some negotiations in terms of implementing an older age in some provinces. As we know very well, the treatment of juveniles and older persons before the adult court is quite different. It is a sociological fact that some provinces want a younger age and others want an older age. The amendment cannot be accepted based upon the question of principle; it is an administrative question.

By enacting this bill, we are taking a step in the right direction. We are tabling a bill for which the people in the milieu have been waiting some time, and I am proud to have participated in its debate.

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to have an opportunity to participate in the debate on this bill. In its form, it is much similar to the one tabled on October 26, 1979 by the then solicitor general, the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence). If I may, I want to indicate my concurrence with the theme of the bill and its direction, that of ensuring young people are held more socially accountable, and are seen as individuals and not just as extensions of their parents.

In light of my experience in community relations and counselling, I welcome the thrust of a number of the proposals of the bill, such as the increase from seven years to 12 years for criminal responsibility. It more accurately reflects the maturing process of young people in educational theory. Also I welcome the right of due process of the law in the same way that adults have today and the elimination of a criminal record if after one offence a young person, as is often the case, finds himself rehabilitated and there are no further violations. Also there is the option of alternative sentences. In a day of rising expenses and when a great deal is spoken about the perpetuation of crime by criminal institutions, this is a very humanizing and responsibility-building mechanism.

In supporting the thrust of the bill, I also wish to indicate my reservation, as indicated in the amendment of the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland, that this matter of a uniform age for young offenders across the country must somehow be dealt with. In the processes of government, when things are left to be dealt with administratively, all too often we find that these things are perpetuated in the form in which they were passed.

As I look after the representations in the similar area relating to family law and the representations across the country in terms of support payments in divorce situations, I have found that women's groups have repeatedly indicated that they cannot accept the matter of each province making its own rules. We are looking at the reality of mobility in Canada, not only of spouses who may avoid support, but of young people moving across the country often in search of work. When they are unemployed, all too often they fall afoul of the law. The amendment correctly addresses the situation of the mobility of our young people at the moment.

Therefore, it is an important principle that there should not be different rights in different parts of the country, but that there should be uniform rights for all young Canadians across the country.

I would like to add some supportive and interpretative comments on one specific clause of the bill, Clause 22. It is closely connected with a number of initiatives that have taken place in my constituency. It is the provision for the option of a community service disposition in lieu of incarceration. This option has been used for over two years in the Kitchener-Waterloo area, beginning as an experiment under the guidelines of Sections 662 and 666 of the Criminal Code respecting probation orders, to the point where there are now some 280 community service orders being carried out in my region. Ranging in terms of 100 to 150 hours, the community service orders provide an invaluable learning experience for young people as an alternative to a jail sentence. These have proved especially effective for first-time offenders, since the emphasis of these community service orders is on the development of responsibility for one's action as opposed to gainless punishment.

● (1450)

Community service orders have been used frequently in the case of young people since with rising unemployment there have been more and more young offenders coming before the courts. Many cases involve breakdown in family life where parental guidance is lacking. This option is an extremely important part of this bill because it changes the emphasis from an isolated individual against the community, someone who is in a sense shaking his or her fist at the community, to someone who is in support of society and working on its behalf. This is accomplished through a positive contribution to the community, providing a service which would not otherwise be available in the community, which results in an exercise of socialization or reconciliation.

This option has been received into the cultural mosaic of Waterloo county, where there has been a tradition of community service. Therefore, this concept can be understood. Under community service orders services have been rendered to municipal governments, school boards and social agencies. In many cases they provide for the development of new skills. In a sense they provide training in trades. They prepare individuals to be able to offer something to the employment market while not competing with existing jobs at the same time. That is to say, community service orders are for volunteer work, an area of endeavour on which people in my riding place a great deal of importance.

One of the agencies which has benefited from this option is the victim-offender reconciliation service which has been pioneered by the Mennonite community in my area. This program encourages an individual to accept responsibility for his or her action, not with patronizing treatment for young people but by stressing reconciliation over punishment through the direct confrontation of the victim and offender. This service brings these people together to discuss their feelings and what must be done in order to close the gulf which has been created.

The John Howard Society in the Waterloo region is the agency which monitors the terms of a community service order. The society stresses that the terms of a CSO must be very clearly set out so that the offender understands that it is not a reprieve but rather an opportunity for that young person to regain a responsible and respected status in the community. These projects range from parkland clean-ups to giving assistance in senior citizens' homes. Again, the importance is that the service can only be provided by voluntary agencies, if at all. The effect of these orders is to get the community involved in corrections. They educate the community as to who, and not what, an offender is so that the community sees that it has a stake in its parts. Indeed, in a sense it is a socializing exercise. There is another agency called Youth in Conflict with the Law which was formed to try and bridge this gap. It has been seeking to socialize the whole tragic experience.

We are all familiar with a war situation where the aim is to depersonalize the enemy so that he or she can be seen as "it". This is done so that somehow the obliteration of the person, the dismissal of them, can somehow become more conscionable. The idea of a community service program is rather to personalize the offender, to somehow show that he can make a contribution to society. In December I received a letter which reads as follows:

> We the undersigned are a group of political science students at Wilfrid Laurier University presently studying Canadian government. As part of our course assignment, we are required to prepare and try to get introduced a piece of Private Members' legislation.
> The legislation which we are interested in is an amendment to the Criminal Code creating community service orders as a separate option for a judge to use in sentencing an offender. The enclosed information will explain our idea more clearly.
>
> It is our hope that you will be sufficiently interested in our idea to introduce this legislation into the House for us. We will prepare the bill in principle and do all of the necessary research for you. In addition, we will try to create a favourable lobby for the bill by contacting groups such as the John Howard Society. These groups will be supplied with our research information in hopes that they will help us in publicizing this proposed bill.

These students, under the direction of Professor John McNenemy of the political science department, have begun to address the issue as young people themselves. They are addressing the issue with respect to the welfare of society. I am pleased to have been in touch with them and to have heard their ideas. I hope the government will incorporate into this bill the amendments the students are seeking. If it is not possible for that to be done in this bill, I hope that I will have the opportunity to introduce a bill based on the theme which they have presented in order to fully accomplish the aim they have so wisely and rightly identified in their studies as one which would lend itself to the well-being of our community, not only the community of Kitchener-Waterloo, but the Canadian community as a whole.

In conclusion, I wish to indicate there is an important flaw in the age of majority clause to which my colleagues in the official opposition have repeatedly drawn attention in order to make this as effective a piece of legislation as possible. Therefore, although I want to register my concern and support for the amendment, I also want to register my wholehearted support for the concept of reform embodied in Bill C-61.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, speaking on this bill takes me back many years to when I was practising law. Although I did not specialize in the field we are discussing today there was always great discussion among practising lawyers about many of the difficulties in dealing with young offenders. At that time the circumstances were much different from what they are today. The mere fact that it has taken this long to present this bill makes us realize just how much difficulty there has been in agreeing on some changes. It is not a subject which has necessarily been dilly-dallied with; there are honest differences of opinion.

I can say that I do not share all the views of my colleagues on this question with regard to uniformity of age. I would have preferred to see the age limit set at 16. One should consider crime statistics today and the activities of young persons aged 16 and 17. Read your newspapers. What are they guilty of? They are guilty of some of the most violent crimes. They are not crimes which are, as suggested by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell), induced by poverty. Not a bit of it! There are any number of reasons why these young 16 and 17-year-olds are engaging in this level of crime. One reason, I suppose, is the dropping of the age of majority to 18 years. It was always said, when 21 was the age required to get into the beer parlour, that one saw 18-year-olds and 19-year-olds trying to get in. Then when the age was dropped to 18, the 16-year-olds were trying to get in, something that they could not do before.

• (1500)

Young offenders have no particular preponderance at any level of society. There are just as many young punks—and that is all they are, vicious-minded young punks—coming out of the best homes as out of the worst homes. The reasons that they have become like that are a reflection on today's society.

Rather than say that young offenders are the result of poverty, I would say that they are primarily the result of the lack of parental supervision and guidance. This is found particularly in the higher income groups where attention or participation in raising teenagers is limited to giving them $20 to $50 on a weekend whilst the parents go off on their own to do their own thing. How many homes do hon. members know of where the way of dealing with their youngsters—as the father and mother are too often pursuing their own pleasures—is to turn over the keys to the family car, give $50 and say, "Have a good time this weekend, son. Just go around our high schools and find out how many kids, unfortunately, have that poor level of parental upbringing. That is where you get the start; but it goes on. Kids, from muppets to adolescents, have been watching television, with violence at all levels, even in the cartoons. In the pictures at which they look there is nothing but more and more violence. They become inured to it. They think it is great. After all, it is a reflection of society. They think, as they grow and see this continue, that this is society.

Naturally, at all times there are those who, because of poverty, go out to get a few dollars. However, I would say that they are, by far, the infinitesimal minority today. This leaves the further group, and I think it is the biggest one. These people, in order to satisfy their appetites for alcohol and drugs, go out on hold-ups, thefts, break-ins and purse snatching. Oh, of course, as my colleague, the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) says, there is also the thrill of taking someone's car, just borrowing wheels, to see who has the fastest and raciest car, to see how much rubber can be burned and to see if someone else can be made to look like a chicken on the street. I suppose, in the end, in the words of the social worker, it really comes from peer pressure to be more outstanding than the others.

Those are the motivations, the reasons we have young offenders. It seems to me that to say that all persons under the age of 18 and over the age of 12 shall be lumped together as young offenders is totally wrong. I say that I would favour those attorneys general of the provinces who would opt to have those under age 16 put in the group of young offenders. With respect to the others, one only has to go in the courts to see whether the 16-year-olds and 17-year-olds are any different from the 18-year-olds or the 19-year-olds. I regret to say that in the great majority of cases, this is not the case.

Having said that, I do not think that the present penal system in this country is the one which will deal with this particular problem. We can go through legislation that we pass in Parliament, bill after bill, and say, "Jail for the offender". My goodness! There are offences with regard to agricultural chemicals where the penalty is jail. There are all sorts of offences for which jail is the answer. It is not the answer in these cases, and I appeal to my colleagues here. If we are going to spend money wisely in the administration of justice, then we should spend it on the prevention of crime where it arises, that is in the early years. That is where we should spend our money.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert: That is where we should spend our money with social workers and parole employees. We should not put first offenders into jail. They should be put on probation after a period of good behaviour during which they report to a parole worker.

Several hon. members suggested community work, the parliamentary secretary among them, and our colleague, the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. McLean); alternatives where these young people can be put to work. There are so many things. I do not mean to suggest raking leaves, cleaning streets, or demeaning work of that nature. There are all sorts of good community work which they can be given to do.

I fully subscribe, too, to the principle of restitution wherever it is possible. I do not believe a fine should be paid to the state. What will the penalty do? What about the dear old lady whose purse has been snatched and most of her cash taken? A young punk is picked up, and there is no doubt about his guilt. Then he is fined rather than sent ot jail. The state benefits as a result of the compensation it receives for apprehending him. A law-abiding citizen has a right to be protected by the state—she has that right, that is all she has; she gets nothing out of it. It is an empty letter. The same applies to the elderly couple or any person who finds their home broken into and things stolen. They may be covered by insurance or they may not.

I am glad that judges in young offenders courts will now have the opportunity to use alternative methods of dealing with such situations. But we are really going to have to provide them with a framework that is well thought out and well administered so that young people can be put on their good behaviour—on a leash. How tight or loose that leash shall be, will depend on the skill of the parole worker.

There has sometimes been a problem with the place where young offenders are held prior to their court appearance. All too often it has been the overnight tank of the local police station. In large cities, many are found in the nightly run in the bullpen or in the remand centre where hardened criminals and young first offenders are put in all together. Sometimes the young ones glory in this because they are close to the feet of hardened professional criminals; it is something they can boast about to their peers in later days. The money must be spent where it will do most good.

A similar instance in recent times was the recycling of scores of thousands of public servants into second language training. That was like spreading a thin film of water on a desert. Had that money been spent wisely on teaching our children a second language, we would have had some brighter prospects for the future.

It seems to me that it is wrong to spend so much money every day on incarcerating thousands upon thousands of hardened criminals. Surely a lot of those people would not have become hardened criminals if they had been handled differently at the outset of their unfortunate careers.

I was struck by some particular features of this bill, Mr. Speaker. I should like to refer to clause 3 in particular, the declaration of principle. Some people claim that there is a lot of "do-goodism" in this and that a lot of it is a cliché. Some of it is obvious, but I think that as a general body of policy for this country to adopt toward its young offenders, it is a step in the right direction.

One thing is badly lacking, however. In subclauses (1)(d), (1)(e) and (1)(f), the reference to the rights of young persons is repeated. Mr. Speaker, all my studies in law were predicated upon the basic principle that every right had a corresponding duty. I have the right of ownership of property, but I have a duty not to use my property to the detriment of my neighbour. I have an absolute right to my life, but I have a duty not to injure my neighbour. All the way through, there is no right without a corresponding duty.

There has been mention of a charter of rights to be included in the new Constitution. I was particularly struck by the absence of any mention of duties or obligations in that; it is all take and no give. In this particular instance too, every one of the rights that those young people have, carries a corresponding duty, and those duties should be included in the bill. To that extent I would say that clause 3 of the bill should be revised.

The parliamentary secretary spoke of some difficulties in recognizing the principle of vicarious liability and suggested that this was introducing the question of civil liability into criminal law. I believe that a young offender is not necessarily there; there are some nine, ten and 11-year-olds who are the greatest little vandals you could meet. This brings up the question of the vicarious liability of parents.

If parents are so negligent in the care of their children and in giving them guidance that nine and ten-year-olds, and sometimes children younger than that, will break into schools and homes and vandalize them, then let the parents be responsible. We would see a lot of dressing up then. This may be a little old fashioned but I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that parents would shape up a lot better. There is no excuse when parents tootle off to the beer parlour or the tavern and leave the kids running the streets until ten or eleven o'clock at night, as we often see nine or ten-year-olds doing. If those parent were responsible and were held responsible and were not allowed to come crying, as we see on television, like sob sisters about their darling little kids, those mischievous little kids who do not mean any harm, things would be different. What would happen if those parents had to face up to the music of liability for the harm those children have done? Why is it that the victim, the defenceless public, the man whose car was legitimately parked outside his friend's house who comes out and finds it vandalized is the one who has to pay? And if it is the neighbourhood ten-year-old who has done that, why shouldn't the parents of the kid who is responsible be the one who should have to pay? Why should the victim suffer? Are we afraid of the words discipline, obedience and good conduct? Those are bad words in today's lexicon. We are told that we will set off repressions in children. It seems to me that we have to look at that too within a young offenders bill.

I think this bill does make considerable progress, but I do not think it makes enough. As I have said, I think more money should be put right across the board into the provision of supervisory social workers. If you do not want to call them parole officers, you can find any other words you like, but they should be the ones who will take in hand a far greater volume of young first offenders. These young first offenders should be segregated from older criminals. In the appropriate cases where we find vicious young thugs, then they should be treated in adult court. There are no two ways about it. We have to look to the protection of society. The state has a duty toward its citizens. Citizens have a right to live their peaceful lives uninjured. It is not a hazard of my life that I must run the risk of being robbed, of being mugged, of my life being taken or having my property being vandalized. That is not the role of our citizens. It is the duty of the state to protect them. It is the duty of the remaining citizens not to inflict those damages upon their fellow citizens.

I hope this bill will receive further attention in committee. I hope that the government's mind is open to amendments. The bill has taken a long time getting here. There have been changes. I hope the government can be flexible enough to accept suggestions that will improve the bill. After all, with whom are we dealing? We are dealing with people who are valuable to us, namely, our young people.

I used to think I was a lot more valuable when I was a young person than I am now. But surely this is something we, as legislators, must think about. We must not shut our minds to the fact that because the government has produced a bill, that is the end of the story in so far as sagacity and wisdom are concerned. We should never think because a bill is produced, it is the end of the story. No one loses face by accepting amendments. Not at all. I think one only betrays intelligence by doing so.

I would like to see this bill either deal generally with young offenders under age 16, or that we leave the option open so that those provinces who are, to my mind, enlightened enough to proceed on that basis of the younger age for young offenders may do so without any difficulty.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. My colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) tells me I have five minutes. I will do the very best I can to accommodate that time limitation.

First I want to recognize some people who work very hard in the family and youth field in the Hamilton area. I have long admired the work that they do. There are two who come to mind, and although I may miss others, I do not intend to offend them by not mentioning them. Both Judge Steinberg and Judge Van Duzer in Hamilton have devoted a lifetime to family and juvenile matters. They have been recognized over the years as having made substantial contributions. They have been innovative and understanding. In dealing with young offenders, in particular, that surely must be the way we should approach any misdemeanor or criminal act that is undertaken.

The subject of young offenders is a very puzzling topic. I want to say at the beginning that this legislation can be supported. I am not arguing against the legislation but I am expessing a frustration over how one deals with a topic which has so many different facets to it and a topic which has to take into account so many different circumstances. Dealing with young offenders is a very delicate matter in most cases.

Let us be fair about this. We are speaking about a small minority of young people. By far the vast majority are good, hard working, sensible, reasonable young people who grow up to be just like we are—whatever that is. However, even among the small minority who fall into the category of young offenders, there is an overwhelming majority of them, too, who break the law once and who then recognize the folly of it and go on to live useful and constructive lives.

What we are doing is trying to write a law, presumably to accommodate that majority of the minority, and at the same time write a law which will enable us to deal with the smaller minority who may turn out, as years pass, truly to become criminals of one kind or another. That almost defies logic.

I want to talk now about parents. Much of the responsibility for the way a child grows up must always remain in the lap or the hand of the parent involved. You cannot be the type of parent who rolls into the driveway dead drunk but expects his child will not drink and drive or suffer the attendant consequences thereof. You cannot constantly berate the police inside your home and on the streets and then expect your child to grow up to respect and support law enforcement and understand the difficulties encountered by the people in that line of work, a difficult line of work at the best of times. You cannot beat and physically abuse children or, for that matter, children and adults in the home, and expect that, by some mystical, magical means a child will be able to differentiate between that method of admonition—the commonly used method within their own home—and what is acceptable in society outside when they have to deal with other children. If violence is the order of the day in a child's home, then violence will be the order of the day outside for that child. When that child is met with frustration, he will respond in the same way as his parents respond. You cannot move into a new subdivision and decide you need a roll of tarpaper or some wood to build a rec room and just nip out the back door in the dead of night, pick it up and expect that your children will appreciate that somehow this is not stealing and, therefore, they ought not to do such things. You cannot plead for leniency when for years you have known that your child was bordering on anti-social behaviour, when finally the chickens come home to roost, so to speak. You cannot go in teary-eyed and ask that you not be held responsible in one way or another for the fact that you did nothing to try to change the anti-social behaviour the child was showing.

I think we all have to accept as parents and people in the community that we have a joint responsibility in the raising of children. We have to accept that the parents have a substantial responsibility, but the rest of us in the community also have a responsibility in the raising of children. We all have to show by example, by effort, by word, by deed and by involvement the kind of guidance that will allow those children to see that society can only survive if we all attempt to live within the law, and if the law is not just, you change it, you do not go around breaking it. I have always been concerned that we have not been able to instil in our own society the kind of sense that children belong to all of us, and that while we may have the child physically or adopt the child, the child is a child of all of us, and we all have to be cautions and careful.

Let me say that there are a number of factors in my judgment that influence a child's behaviour. I do not think it is nearly good enough to intrude yourself into the life of a child after the child becomes a teenager. Respect for an understanding of the law and the parameters that are allowed for behaviour within society are things which begin in the very earliest years, and from that point on a child learns what the rules are, how they are made and how they are changed, and that society is a democratic place and we change our rules in a democratic way. We do not go charging up to the Speaker screaming at him, for example, when we do not like what he does.

One of the things that is most influential in a child's behaviour is peer pressure, and, since children spend most of their time with other children during their school years, it is that arena to which we have to devote a considerable amount of time and money to make sure there are people there who are able to provide the kind of individual guidance children require. This is obvious, as I say, since they spend a great deal of time there. We must try to break down the unacceptable peer pressures and replace them with acceptable and useful peer pressures. We must hold up as examples people who have done useful and worth-while things as opposed to people who have lived on the fringe of the law.

I am not putting these in any particular order, but I think another important thing is parental guidance. I have mentioned that. There has to be an example set by all of us, both in the school and in the community, to make sure that the rewards that are given out, are given, and the recognitions that are made, are made for things that have been seen to be good things in society. We must stress the worth-while things while downplaying the others.

Let me say a word or two about jails and correctional institutions. My experience over a number of years has been that in correctional institutions in particular, since I do not have quite the experience in jails, the subculture from which the child comes to that correctional institution exists within the correctional institution. There is no doubt in my mind, borne out of any number of examples, that there is a subculture within the correctional institutions which inflicts and imposes the kinds of pressures which are the very opposite pressures to those we would like to see for rehabilitation. It is for that reason in a way that I want—and I meant to do it at the beginning—to commend the member for Waterloo (Mr. McLean) for his comments. I thought he made excellent sense. He showed by example in his own community the kind of work that can and should be done in every community all across the country. I hope copies of his remarks will be made available, and I know they are available, of course, in order that we can perhaps encourage that sort of thing to happen all across the country. I think it is in that area that we are likely to make the greatest strides and have the most success.

I do not want to downplay the fact that there is a growing violence in the community both at the adult and juvenile levels which is totally unacceptable. I want to say it is for me, and I am sure for most members of Parliament, a source of considerable worry how to deal with this growth of violence for its own sake. What do you do about it? Obviously the people involved have no particular fear. They generally organize themselves into groups and terrorize other people. I think we are going to have to devote more of our time and effort to infiltrating, if you will, those communities in an effort to try to break that up before it reaches the point where these people end up in Kingston, if it lasts, or some other institution.

I see my colleague looking over his shoulder at me. I have two minutes left. I was thinking about violence, and not only about violence committed by children but also about violence to children. Violence to children comes in many forms. Violence to children can be neglect, and violence to children can and is increasingly more apparently taking the form of incest and brutality. I think on balance society has not yet wakened up to this fact. The House of Commons might, at some more appropriate time, set aside some time to look at what I am sure may not be a new phenomenon, but certainly this phenomenon is coming more and more to the fore.

I do not want to leave the impression that I do not know or think that organizations which are offsprings of organized crime do not make themselves known to and involve themselves in the affairs of young people. The entire distribution for soft drugs is structured through the upper levels of organized crime, working its way down through a number of clearly visible organizations into the playgrounds, hallways and front yards of the schools, at least in the area I represent, and I think probably in many others. Young people are drawn in by the lure of money and the little bit of power they get. Once in they cannot get out because they do not know how to break away.

We have to support efforts to undermine that, get them out of there so we do not have a further deterioration of that growing up process which will hopefully turn out a better place and society in which to live.

In any event, to keep it brief, I say simply this. I want to stress that this can only be the beginning of the debate. This must be an ongoing debate. We will have to isolate many of the facets of juvenile misbehaviour and juvenile anti-social behaviour and of the pressures which are put on some people who are considerably younger than we, and we will have to provide support in society so that we can try to cope with this because it is not good enough to say that if we just give them all a good whipping, they will suddenly respond positively. We used to do that, but we still had crime.

● (1540)

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton South): Mr. Speaker, while this piece of legislation seems to deal with a narrow subject, it actually speaks to the larger question of our society, our values, our family life, some of the things which are closest to hon. members, and the way in which we transmit values to the next generation. I think that is why this debate has provoked a number of speeches. We just heard a good one from the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans).

I will start by indicating my support for the amendment introduced by my colleague, the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence). This is an important piece of legislation dealing with young offenders. The many amendments contained in this bill, among other things, actually repeal the Juvenile Delinquents Act. If we have to have as a cornerstone of the new act a variation in the maximum age across Canada, that is not acceptable.

That is not to say that most of what is found in Bill C-61 is not acceptable, for it is. It is well known that our party launched a similar process of legislation. Many of the points in Bill C-61 are what we ourselves advanced, so our quarrel is confined.

However, speaking as a member of Parliament from Alberta, I must say that I find it hard to understand why the government is proceeding on a piece of legislation which will allow for a diversity of the maximum age among young offenders. It is hard to understand why we have not waited until we could secure provincial agreement. Is it a question of money? Is it a question of philosophy? I do not believe this problem is insurmountable. I cannot understand why we are proceeding with such haste to bring in a law which will permit someone to be tried under the proposed Young Offenders Act in one province at age 16 and in another at age 17.

I am not particularly concerned about which age should be the maximum. I believe the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) was correct when he said that a person of age 16 today has sufficient maturity, given the over-all rapid maturation of young people today. I would hold to the age of 16, but I could live with the age of 17. Indeed, if it were the wisdom of the House to set the age at 18, I could live with that too. What I cannot live with is a variation from province to province.

If the government felt free to impose a charter of rights on all provinces regardless of provincial feelings—which have been made clear, and they are a source of great contention and controversy in the country, as we know—what is holding the government back from saying we will have a piece of legislation which will set a uniform age for young offenders across the country? That is the beginning of my approach to this subject.

I want to make two or three other points, if I may, in the brief time remaining this afternoon. First, I think we ought to take just a second to underline a point which needs to be underlined now after a debate centring on young offenders, as if all young people were offenders and we had to spend an inordinate amount of time dealing with the offences of the young. In fact, most young people today are individuals in whom all of us should have immense pride. I certainly do. We should be proud of the way young people today are coping with the level of frustration in our society and with all those factors which are wrapped up in the phrase "future shock". We should be proud of the way they are coping.

I have five children of my own, and I try to stay close to young people, as close as an aging man can. Only this week two groups of young people came to Parliament Hill. One group was made up of the young people chosen for the program "Adventures in Citizenship" sponsored by the Rotary Club. I believe you yourself, Sir, participated in meeting them. The second group was made up of students brought here by the Commonwealth association from across Canada. They may be special students, to be sure, but to my mind—and I met both groups—they represented young people in whose values we ought to take great pride. We ought to give them a little boost and not create the impression that all young people need to be put into the category of young offenders.

When we do talk about young offenders, we cannot be naive and just slide over the fact that offences by juveniles are increasing. We have to live with that. That is a sad comment on our society, but it illustrates the need for a comprehensive piece of legislation. It places on such legislation a special imperative today. Senator Florence Bird recently said the following:

> What is particularly scary—

Senator Bird was speaking about violent crime statistics in Canada.

> —is the 60 per cent increase in violent juvenile delinquency from 1974 to 1978. Most shocking of all is the increase of violence by the young against themselves. In the past decade the suicide rate increased 59 per cent for young people aged 15 to 19.

That is just one indication of the need to take a good hard look at the best ways for society to handle young people, who for one reason or another, find themselves in trouble with the law. I want to return in a moment to some of the reasons for this, which ought to be at the real heart of this debate. We have to look at some of the reasons why young people find themselves in trouble with the law.

Bill C-61 deserves some praise, even though we are opposing the aspect of it which does not provide for uniformity of the maximum age among young offenders. The legislation blends three important principles. The first is that young people should be held responsible for their behaviour but not wholly accountable, since they are not fully mature. Second, society has the right to protection from illegal behaviour. Third, young people have the same right to due process of law and fair and equal treatment as adults. These rights must be guaranteed by special safeguards.

Bill C-61 is a rather long piece of legislation, but that quick overview demonstrates why on the whole the bill merits the support of hon. members on all sides of the House.

● (1550)

We would be remiss if we did not look more deeply at the situation of young people in trouble with the law rather than just looking at how we are going to deal with them more effectively. It is the old question of whether to apply band-aid treatment or to get at the cause of the disease. Bill C-61 is more than a band-aid. Perhaps it is not able to do so, but it does not go deeply into the causes of crime by young offenders. I believe we have to look into this much more deeply. If we spend a little while in this debate and if the committee is able to call witnesses who can speak to the causes, we will be performing a service not only for the parliamentary process, but for all Canadians.

The reason I take this tack in my contribution to this debate was that I recently saw a report of the Carnegie Council on Children. The council said the following:

> Today virtually the last question we ask of any public policy is how it will affect children. It should become the first question.

Who speaks for the family today in the legislative halls? Young families have the least time, energy or financial resources to organize and make their voices heard. Indeed, how can they be self-sufficient when they are so deeply influenced by broad social and economic forces over which they have little control; unemployment, inflation, advertising, television, increased housing costs and inferior education systems. There is a whole range of factors that come into the spotlight when we start to look at the question of a family life that spawns for good or bad children who grow up in an atmosphere where they are loved and cared for or in families which allow undue influence from the outside, factors that hurt the transmission of true family values. I will speak of one of those in a moment.

If we are really serious about the problems of children who get into trouble with the law, we have to look collectively at such factors as child abuse statistics, the mental health picture, the divorce rate, the reasons for teenage suicide, the results of the Senate's examination of the relationship between crime and the criminal's early years. All of this helps us to have a growing knowledge of the character and personality development in the early years. When I speak about the early years, I want to talk about something I have come to learn in my life. I now see it reflected in many professional journals in the field of social sciences.

The most crucial period in the life of a human being is between the ages of three and five. That is when the whole range of factors that give the person a sense of self-esteem need special attention. This is usually when the parents themselves are feeling the strongest pressures of a competitive society. The father is often totally immersed in the economic circumstances of his family. Often he is transferred. The family moves. We have a kind of tradition that as long as the child gets enough to eat and there is no manifest abuse or something terribly wrong such as a disease and ill-treatment, no one worries about it.

The fact is that survival is not enough. Many of the young people at whom this bill is aimed become young offenders because of an earlier period in their life when all they did was survive. A stable and secure atmosphere for children ought to have a top priority. Many aspects of our disjointed society come into play here. That is why the Carnegie Council on Children said that when we make public policies, the last thing we seem to think of is their effect on children.

The Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) is very conscious of the future aspects of the policy of his government. He would probably agree with what I am saying. When we look at questions of the environment, we are trying to protect all the physical manifestations of society for future generations. He has to have his mind on the future.

I hope that that example of the environment will be seen more widely in all of our policies, particularly our economic and social policies. I fear they are not. More attention ought to be paid to daycare and the provision of services for single parent families. In most single parent families, it is often the mother who has the responsibility. However, there are a growing number of instances where it is the father. They need services as well. It is not just a question of providing services but a question of society understanding the need to highlight and accent much more the values of family life.

I said I had one particular concern about outside influences. If we did a study, we would find that the television which a lot of young offenders have seen over the years has contributed to the venom which is reflected in them by their criminal conduct. We make sure that a child drinks pure water. We have laws to that effect. Why do we not have the courage to force the television industry to stop putting garbage and poison into children's minds with the ceaseless parade of murders, violence and seduction as so-called entertainment? That is on the minds of many parents. Why do we not pay more serious attention to these kinds of factors that have unquestionably been an influence in the formation of an important minority of our young people who have become offenders. I just have a moment left, Mr. Speaker.

The deeper we go into the question of children, the bigger the problem appears. In fact, in an address on children's rights, Justice Marcel Trahan of the Social Welfare Court, Montreal, emphasized the human interplay between society, the family and the child. He said:

> When we talk about reforming the law, when we condemn certain institutions, we must be prepared to rethink the entire system.

I see you are anxious to move on to the next proceeding, Mr. Speaker. May I call it four o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being four o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions, public bills and private bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[English]

Motions Nos. 33, 38 and 40 allowed to stand by unanimous consent.

NATIVE RIGHTS

POLICY RESPECTING NEGOTIATION AND SETTLEMENT OF NATIVE CLAIMS

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine East) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should amend its policy of August 8, 1973, respecting the negotiation and settlement of all Indian, Inuit and Metis claims based on the traditional use and occupancy of land and any other aboriginal right not specifically extinguished by legitimate treaty or agreement, and in particular, to delete from the policy that condition that it will not negotiate claims superseded by law.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this motion is to amend, improve and correct the government's present policy for negotiating and settling native claims.

According to the present policy of the government adopted by a cabinet decision on August 8, 1973, the government will negotiate and settle claims according to the policy in the annual report of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development which can be found elsewhere as well. It indicates that the government will negotiate settlements with the Inuit and Indian people who have not entered into treaty relationships with the Crown and that these settlements would be based on the loss of their traditional use and occupancy of land in those parts of Canada where any native rights based on traditional use and occupancy have not been extinguished by treaty or superseded by law.

As far as I and many others who have worked in this field can see, there are three failings in that policy which my motion strives to correct. First, according to the policy, the government will only negotiate and settle claims based on land and the occupancy of land. As many hon. members know, aboriginal rights go much beyond the use and occupancy of land. During the lengthy sittings of the constitutional committee, we asked various Indian, Inuit and Metis groups what they meant by aboriginal rights. Although they hesitated and in many cases refused to give an exact definition because they did not want to limit themselves, they indicated that aboriginal rights included not only land and the rights to hunt, fish and collect on those lands, but all their social, economic, political and cultural rights before the Europeans came which they never gave up. In other words, aboriginal rights include all the rights of those people before the Europeans came. They had societies, economies, languages and cultures. In some cases they hunted and fished; in other cases they raised crops and traded with other aboriginal peoples on the continent. They had a complete way of life. All those things are part of their aboriginal rights, to the extent that they have not given them up.

As I point out in my motion, I want to change the present policy of the government so that negotiations and settlements go much beyond land. In part, my motion reads:

—to the effect that it will negotiate settlement of all Indian, Inuit and Metis claims based on the traditional use and occupancy of land and any other aboriginal right—

So I want to include all aboriginal rights in the negotiations and settlements which will be concluded. That is the first goal of my motion. It is based upon the first failing of the present policy.

The second failing of the present policy is that it indicates that the government will negotiate the loss of traditional use and occupancy of land where these rights were based on traditional use and occupancy which have not been extinguished by treaty. What happened and what is still happening today is that when the government negotiates a land claim settlement with Inuit or Indian groups, it insists aboriginal groups give up all their rights, any rights they may have had in the past or will have in the future of which they may not be aware at the time. They want them to extinguish all their rights, not just the rights which they are giving up in the treaty or in the settlement in exchange for other rights, which is the way it should be. They want them to extinguish any potential or possible right whatsoever. I say that is wrong. In my motion I have suggested the policy should be that they settle "claims based on the traditional use and occupancy of the land and any other aboriginal right not specifically extinguished by legitimate treaty or agreement."

In other words, a right would only be extinguished if it was specifically referred to in the treaty or in the settlement agreement and if the Indians themselves agreed to extinguish that particular right in exchange for another right. That was the second failing I attempted to correct in my motion.

The third failing is the most shameful condition. Presently the government indicates that it will only negotiate and settle claims which have not been superseded by law. The government is saying that even if, from time immemorial, certain Indian or Inuit groups had aboriginal rights in certain parts of Canada, if a federal or provincial government passed a law of its parliament or legislature which took away those rights, then they are taken away and the government will not negotiate them.

This was the basis upon which the aboriginal claim of the Nova Scotia Indians was rejected by the office of native claims. They made a claim for certain lands, certain hunting and fishing rights, and certain other rights in Nova Scotia, Cape Breton and elsewhere. The government indicated that the government of Nova Scotia had passed statutes in various years and that the Government of Canada had passed other statutes in various years which divided the land into townships and took control of it. They had passed hunting and fishing laws and mineral rights laws, so they had exercised jurisdiction over the land. Despite what is right in principle and in justice, the government is saying that if a majority in a parliament or legislature passes a law that a right does not exist, it does not exist. Of course legally that might be correct, but morally it certainly is not. So in my motion I indicate that the government should remove entirely from its policy of negotiating and settling claims this business that it will not negotiate claims where they have been superseded by law, because I think it is wrong.

I drafted my particular motion last summer or fall before we became involved in the constitutional discussions and before the constitutional proposals were tabled in the House. This was well before what I believe to have been a historic day in January when, on the initiation of the government, after much lobbying by Indian and Inuit groups in this country, the government and all the parties sitting on the constitutional committee agreed to that section, part II, "Rights of the Aboriginal Peoples of Canada". Section 34(1) under that part reads:

● (1610)

The aboriginal and treaty rights of the aboriginal peoples of Canada are hereby recognized and affirmed.

By putting that section into the Constitution, much of my motion will no longer be necessary since later on in the constitutional proposal section 59(1) says:

The Constitution of Canada is the supreme law of Canada, and any law that is inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution is, to the extent of the inconsistency, of no force or effect.

This means that once the provision is passed by this House and by the British Parliament, which I hope will happen soon, the land claims settlement policy of the government will be, to a great extent, of no force or effect in accordance with section 59(1). It will have no force or effect because the laws which are referred to in the policy which superseded these claims are ordinary laws of the Parliament of Canada and ordinary laws of the legislatures of the provinces. Because they are ordinary laws, they give way to whatever is in these constitutional proposals. Since in these constitutional proposals we have a recognition of aboriginal and treaty rights, they will prevail over any cities and towns act any provincial fish and game act, any provincial mining act, any federal oil and gas act or any national energy board act which are all ordinary laws. So once the aboriginal group, whether it be Indian, Inuit or Metis, reaches agreement by negotiation with the government, or through the courts if the government will not settle with them, then those rights prevail over any policy of the government with respect to claims. Consequently, it is my belief that this policy which I am attempting to amend, improve and change through my motion, will fall down completely once the Constitution is adopted in Britain.

I would like to deal with a recent case where the National Energy Board approved the construction of a pipeline from Norman Wells in the Northwest Territories up the McKenzie River to the Alberta border and through Alberta. The Board approved this pipeline over territories which are claimed to be part of the territory of the Dene. The Dene have claimed much of that land as theirs in accordance with their aboriginal rights. Without this constitutional proposal, the government might say that, because of the National Energy Board Act and its decision, that is a statute of Parliament and that it is a legal decision of the National Energy Board. They may say that it would prevail over the rights of the Dene, if they wanted to rest their case on purely legal grounds. But with the passage of this section it is my belief, as a trained lawyer, that this constitutional provision will prevail over any decision of the National Energy Board, and as section 59 (1) says "any law that is inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution is, to the extent of the inconsistency, of no force or effect."

Although I prepared this motion to correct the three failings I referred to in the negotiation of our native claims policy, I still wish it were done by the government on a voluntary, unilateral basis. Even though it may not be done today, the provisions in the constitutional proposal will do it in any case. Even if the constitutional proposal is passed this year, I hope that the government will not force our native people to test these matters in the courts in order to resolve them, that it will not put them to considerable expense in terms of time and money. Who knows, matters like this can take two, three, four or five years to go through the whole court system. The government agreed to put these provisions in the Constitution. I believe it did so with good will and it was supported by all parties on the constitutional committee. Therefore, it is my belief that the government should voluntarily change right away the provisions of this policy for negotiating claims. It should not wait until the court forces changes to the policy.

This week in the Indian Affairs and Northern Development Committee I asked the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) if he had set up a small group within his department to determine what the effects the new constitutional proposals relating to aboriginal and treaty rights would have on all the laws, regulations and policies which he administers. He said that he had set up such a small group under one of his assistant deputy ministers and that they were attempting to determine where the laws they administered were ultra vires or of no force and effect. He said he believed that it was right that they should not put ordinary citizens of native groups to great expense in the courts. He said that where it was clear that their laws and policies were ultra vires, they should be changed by immediate agreement, or as soon as the constitutional proposal is passed.

My main point in presenting this motion was to correct the failings and inadequacies in our present policy for negotiating claims with our native people in this country. I said that the present policy was wanting in that it only dealt with land and matters related to land, for example, hunting and fishing. I said that it did not deal with the wide range of aboriginal rights. Second, it insisted on complete extinguishment when that was not really necessary or fair. Third, a claim would not even be considered if it were felt that it had been superseded by some ordinary provincial or federal law. All of these failings should go. They should go on the basis of justice and moral right. But since the governemnt has agreed to the provision which it has placed in its constitution proposals, I think that in virtue of that provision they will go. I ask the government to give immediate attention to my submissions. I certainly would be pleased if the government would agree to this motion today.

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words on this matter because it illustrates one of the causes of concern of our native people. I have in my hand a copy of Indian News for April, 1981, put out under the Indian and Inuit Affairs program. The heading there is "Bill C-48 snuffs Aboriginal Rights". I want to deal with some of the points which are certainly of concern to the editor of this paper who is speaking for a large number of people. But before doing that, I would suggest that if the government is really sincere in its desire to give aboriginal treaty rights to our Indian people, it should withdraw the legislation which is in conflict with that particular section.

The hon. member who just spoke has given three very definite items which are in conflict, in my view, with part 2 of the proposed Constitution. One of the things which has bothered me throughout this constitutional talk is that we are raising the hopes of people without even defining what the aboriginal treaty rights are. When that is done, the whole matter could be involved in weeks, months or years of litigation. When Indian or native people have to compete against the government, the largest corporation in the country, with relation to lawyers and paying for the costs arising out of litigation, then it does not give people an equal chance even though we say they are equal. They certainly are not.

In Section 33, the proposed Constitution says, "the aboriginal treaty rights of the aboriginal peoples of Canada are hereby recognized and affirmed", but it does not say what they are. Is it the aboriginal right to own land? Is it their aboriginal right to social life? Is it their aboriginal rights to learning, hunting, fishing, or carrying out their own economics as they did before the white man came? No one knows. So no wonder our native people are concerned about this, because when it does not say what it is specifically, then we can hope all we like but it will go to the courts. There will be conflicts, it will go to the courts and then it will be ruled on by those who are sitting on the bench.

Again, in subsection 2 of this act, it says, "Aboriginal peoples of Canada includes the Indian, Inuit and Metis peoples of Canada." It states there who is included; but it does not say what the rights are. That is one of my major objections to this. If this is put in simply to appease our native people at this time, then it is a terrible thing indeed. It would be trickery of the worst kind if that is the objective. If that is not the objective, the government should show its good faith now by withdrawing at least legislation which is in conflict with those aboriginal and treaty rights.

I again agreed that these should not be confined only to land. The aboriginal people lived on this continent long before we did. We say that they were conquered. Maybe they were conquered by kind words and by arrangements rather than through actual warfare, although there may have been some warfare too. However, they were guaranteed, as long as the waters run and as long as the sun shines, rights that they had before the white man came.

Now, the government has set out in its policy at least three rights. Referring to the one on land, it is not only land which is involved with relation to aboriginal rights, as the last hon. member to speak so aptly said. The second right as spelled out is even worse. It says, "Not extinguished by treaty or agreement". "Treaty or agreement", again is not defined. We celebrated the 100th year of Treaty Seven out on the plains of the Blackfoot just a couple of years ago. The Prince of Wales was there and so were ministers from provincial and federal governments. It was a tremendous "do". The Indians came from far and wide. There was a great celebration on the very plains where the treaty was signed. However, would we have to tell them, if this Constitution becomes law, that they have their rights in the Constitution, but that the policy which was on the books before is still on the books, and that it extinguishes their rights because their forefathers signed the treaty? These are the worries of our native people.

The third one is even more serious. It states: "superseded by law". Already, since we put the provision in the Constitution guaranteeing the aboriginal treaty rights, we are taking their rights away by law. Look at Bill C-48. As the editor of this Indian News says, "Bill C-48 snuffs Aboriginal Rights". Let us just read one or two items from this particular article, and I quote:

The bill has no environmental protection worthy of the name. In fact, in environmental terms, it may well be the weakest single statute of its kind ever to come before the Parliament of Canada.

The environment is almost an Indian's whole life. The Indians live amongst the trees, they live with the animals, they learn from the animals. They have a closer kinship with nature than the white men have ever had and they want to retain it. Then the story goes on as follows:

The bill implicitly extinguishes—

Notice the word "extinguishes".

—Aboriginal Rights by utterly ignoring them. So-called Canada Lands in the Territories are in reality Aboriginal Lands. The Bill extinguishes precisely those rights which the Charter of Rights pretends to guarantee.

So, even before the Constitution becomes law, we are passing other laws and taking away the rights that we are leading native people to believe they will have if and when the proposed Constitution becomes the Constitution of Canada.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Duplicitous.

Mr. Taylor: I would like to read one other passage from this story:

> The Bill jeopardizes any coherent evolution toward responsible government by taking away in advance the access to resource revenues—which would constitute the fiscal base for such a government and secondly, it makes a mockery of the aboriginal claims process by pre-empting all resource revenues for the federal government.

It has been said that if one wants to make an independent man a slave, one deprives him of his bread and his water, and that when he gets hungry enough, he will sell his rights for bread and water in order to survive. Some will and some will not; but a great number will. Here we have a section in Bill C-48 which says that the natural resources are going to belong to the federal government, denying for all time the chance of our aboriginal people in that part of our country to ever become an independent people with a buoyant economy. We take away their means of becoming a buoyant citizenry which could be proud and make a contribution to the country.

● (1630)

I think the government now has a chance to show whether it is sincere in putting this section in the bill about aboriginal rights. A few weeks before it was inserted in the bill, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said in this House something to the effect that, "If you will tell me what aboriginal rights are I will agree or disagree." A few weeks after that, the clause was put in without those rights being defined in any way.

As an individual I support the bill, Mr. Speaker. If the government is sincere in its desire to be fair with the native people in regard to aboriginal rights, it should show its hand by withdrawing the policy we are discussing today.

Mr. Peter Ittinuar (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, I should also like to speak to the motion proposed by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine East (Mr. Allmand) and to commend the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) for his comments.

From our perspective, this policy on land claims is somewhat anachronistic in light of the recent constitutional steps taken by Parliament as a whole.

After eight years, the 1973 land claims policy is a document which is outmoded in the context of the recent constitutional recognition of aboriginal rights.

The 1973 policy required the extinguishment of "native interest" in certain lands in exchange for some kind of compensation. It further limited negotiations only to areas where native title had never been extinguished by treaty or superseded by law.

The policy's provisions had the effect of smoothing the way for resource developers in the north by extinguishing aboriginal title, and in the south by precluding negotiations in areas where resource developers were already established.

The kind of settlement this policy offered native people was loss of political and economic control in exchange for their assuming full responsibility for their own well-being.

In a paper on the 1973 policy statement on native settlements, Murray Angus discusses the advantages of this policy for the federal government. He says:

> The type of compensation, particularly the large cash payments, served to legitimate the government's over-all handling of the native problem and also exonerated it from much of the responsibility for their future welfare.

The problems with implementation of the James Bay agreement—with all due respect to James Bay Inuit and Indians—demonstrates quite clearly how the federal government abrogates responsibility in native communities after it has reached a "compensation for extinguishment" settlement, as was the case in the James Bay agreement.

The 1973 policy also had the effect of moving questions of aboriginal title out of the courts in order to facilitate the negotiations process. Even though court cases are time-consuming and costly, native people have demonstrated over and over that they are patient. This was very evident in the Baker Lake court case. Perhaps it is fair to say that federal government and resource developers are not patient, but there has been increasing pressure to settle "claims" in order to speed up development. Bill C-48 is such an exercise.

The reformed Constitution which recognizes and affirms aboriginal rights and aboriginal title, has important implications for the settlement of comprehensive claims. Constitutional rights cannot be extinguished by any legislation or policy statement. Everyone knows that the idea of extinguishment is not only anachronistic, but will shortly be legally impossible.

Comprehensive claims are not simply a way "to remove the sense of grievance and injustice which impedes the relationship of the Indian and Inuit peoples with the governments concerned and with their fellow Canadians," as the 1973 policy statement suggests. Comprehensive claims provide a mechanism for defining aboriginal rights for the first time in Canadian history.

The present policy, based on the 1973 policy statement, prejudices the process of defining rights through comprehensive claims negotiations. For example, the present policy prohibits negotiations on land which contains oil and gas reserves. This certainly prejudges the issue of whether aboriginal title includes rights to oil and gas benefits on land subject to aboriginal title. We know the value of the buck as well as anyone in Canada. It also explains the apprehension expressed by northerners about the proposed oil and gas act.

The Inuit Tapirisat of Canada and the federal government are now involved in comprehensive claims negotiations. It is not known, however, whether the Inuit Tapirisat can negotiate on those lands which contain oil and gas and on those lands on which Bill C-48 will increase development. Last summer the Inuit Tapirisat of Canada addressed the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I quote Thomas Suluk, the chief negotiator for the Inuit Tapirisat as follows:

A land claims settlement between the Inuit of Nunavut and the federal government should reflect an awareness that the days of trinkets and tiny reserves are over; an awareness that a people cannot retain its self-reliance and self-esteem if the power to shape its future is appropriated by others.

Implicit in this statement is the realization that for Inuit, land claims negotiations and political development issues are inseparable. Self-reliance and self-esteem do not result from transfers of money, but rather from the management of one's own affairs within the greater society in a way which integrates the cultural pride of a people with political and economic structures responsive to the people.

The Inuit of Nunavut have proposed the creation of a new Territory in the Eastern Arctic. The Nunavut territory is supported not only by those who, like their ancestors, were born in the north, but also by those who have chosen to make Nunavut their home. This includes many people from the south.

The legislative assembly of the Northwest Territories passed a number of resolutions last November which address the question of division of the territory. These resolutions include recognition of the present geo-political structure of the Northwest Territories as an interim arrangement and commitment in principle to the divsion of the Northwest Territories into eastern and western portions, subject to the expressed will of the people, by plebiscite.

In 1974, Dr. Lloyd Barber of Regina University, in his role as Indian Claims Commissioner for Canada at that time, stated, in relation to Dene rejection of the notion of "extinguishment" of aboriginal rights, as follows:

I cannot emphasize too strongly that we are in a new ball game... We've been allowed to delude ourselves about the situation for a long time because of a lack of political power in native communities.

Seven years after this statement was made, the constitutional package recognized and affirmed aboriginal rights. It has been a long and tough battle, and one which, in many ways, has only just begun. Perhaps the recent constitutional amendments are a beginning.

Political power in native communities may be growing. The evolution planned by the Northwest Territories government may reflect that. Perhaps this growth will foster changes in attitude among the politicians and bureaucrats who handle native claims.

We await with interest the forthcoming comprehensive policy of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) and we fully expect it to reflect the change in official government attitudes which the constitutional revision process began. I have spoken in support of the motion of the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine East.

Some years ago the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) stated that he would never see the north attain provincial status. He also said there were no aboriginal rights. Perhaps his changed in attitude toward aboriginal people, with his commitment to constitutional recognition of those people will reflect changes in his attitude or political awareness of the north as well as of other parts of the country.

[Translation]

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand) and thank him for his interest in the cause of the native people of Canada, not only in this House, but also in the Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development, especially as the motion which he introduced today gives us an opportunity to review the situation of the native people of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, history tells us that several attempts have been made to meet more adequately the concerns of the Canadian native people. The federal government has recognized the validity of this objective. On August 8, 1973, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development announced the policy of the government concerning the claims of the Indians and Inuit.

On the one hand, this policy reaffirmed the principle long recognized by this government that legal obligations towards the Indians would be met; for this purpose, the government would continue to hear such grievances as the Indians might state concerning its administration of Indian lands and other property under the provisions of the Indian Act and Regulations, as well as such claims as might be made concerning the negotiation and interpretation of treaties with the Indian people or agreements and proclamations concerning the Indians and the reservations. In this statement of policy, Mr. Speaker, the claims based on these grievances were called particular claims.

On the other hand, the government of Canada stated that it was willing to negotiate the settlement of claims with native groups in the regions of Canada where, in keeping with traditional use or occupation of the land of these regions, these groups had acquired certain rights which had never been cancelled by a treaty or an act. While this interest was never conclusively recognized or defined in Canadian law, it ensues from the traditional utilization and occupation of lands in these regions, which include the Yukon, Northern Quebec, the major part of British Columbia and the Northwest Territories. The government recognized that occupation of these lands by non-Indians had not taken this right into account, that the Indians had not been offered compensation for the gradual erosion of their rights, and that generally, this had prevented the native people from taking advantage of the development which could have resulted from the settlement of these lands.

The claims which would be based on that principle are called "over-all claims". I think the summary I have just made of the policy concerning aboriginal rights in 1973 may be of some use. However, to appreciate its full import it would be advisable to read the statement made by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development on August 8, 1973. Several Indian bands in Canada Maintain relationships with the federal government which are symbolized in the treaties they have made with the Crown in the course of history. Since the government committed itself a few years ago in the case of Indian claims and treaties, the legitimate rights of the Indians must be recognized. That still remains the basis of government policy.

The commitment of the government of Canada to abide by the treaties has been reaffirmed very recently by Her Majesty the Queen when she spoke to Alberta's Indian representatives in Calgary on July 5. Among other things, Her Majesty the Queen said, and I quote:

> You may rest assured that the government of Canada acknowledges the significance of fully observing the treaties, both in the spirit and in the terms of those agreements.

That declaration and the present policy statement testify to the fact that pursuant to the provisions of the British North America Act, the government acknowledges and accepts its continuing responsibility for the Indians and the territories which have been reserved for them. In that respect the government considers that its position results from a historic evolution which dates back to the royal proclamation of 1763, which remains a fundamental declaration of the territorial rights of Indians in this country, regardless of the differences that may have surfaced in its legal interpretation.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, as a result of a court ruling, the jurisdiction of the federal government over the Indians has been extended so as to include the Eskimos and the Inuit. If we are again drafting new premises at this time it is because we want to point out that the ensuing policy statement is not meant to make amendments to it. The government wants to reaffirm to the native people involved and to the people of Canada generally that its policy in that respect is nothing less than an attestation of its responsibility.

This policy is concerned with the claims and the proposed settlements of already old grievances. Those claims originate from Indian bands which have not signed treaties with the Crown. According to them they are warranted under various titles: Indian title of ownership, title of aboriginal ownership, aboriginal title of ownership, native right of ownership or right of usufruct. Essentially, the native people seek to obtain compensation by filing claims based on the loss of traditional enjoyment and occupation of territories in certain parts of Canada where the property title of the Indians has never been abolished by treaty nor replaced by statute. Ever since it came to power in 1968 the government has accepted those claims and provided funds as well as other forms of assistance to the Indians and the Inuit so as to enable them to do the research necessary to establish their traditional territorial interests.

● (1650)

The government has now received official requests from certain native groups and knows that others will follow suit. The lands involved are in British Columbia, Northern Quebec, the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. In reviewing its approach to Indian and Inuit claims, the government has considered and taken into account the briefs presented by various associations and the opinions expressed both by those groups and the members of the Standing Committee on Indian and Northern Affairs, on which I sit as well as recent court proceedings dealing with Indian claims. The government is well aware of the fact that the claims do not involve mere land and money issues but that they are related to a way of life. Therefore, any settlement must, in a positive and durable way, help solve the cultural, social and economic problems which for far too long have maintained the Indians and Inuits as second-class citizens in our society.

Basically, the government's view is that these claims must be settled and that the best way to do so is through negotiations. These negotiations should result in agreements with the various Indian and Inuit groups involved and such agreements should be enshrined in legislation voted by this Parliament so as to have force of law. I heard the hon. member for Nunatsiaq (Mr. Ittinuar) of the Northwest Territories a moment ago express his pleasure at the fact that since aboriginal rights would be included in the Constitution the settlement of land claims would no doubt be speeded up, and I think that it is a credit to members of this House that they passed the amendment that was put forth during the constitutional debate.

Mr. Speaker, this government is now prepared to negotiate with the official spokesmen of these groups on the principle that if the traditional rights to the lands claimed can be established, native people will receive just compensation or benefit for these interests. The lands that are in litigation do not fall under federal jurisdiction. In the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, the government has the power to use Crown lands after consulting with the territorial governments. With respect to the claims involving lands in the provinces, provincial powers and the rights of Canadians living on those lands have to be so considered. So as to reach satisfactory agreements with the Indians and Inuit residing in the provinces, the latter, together with the federal government, must get involved in the negotiation and settlement process. It is in the interest of these provinces and their residents that these land claims be settled and it is reasonable to say that the provinces are prepared to offer compensation. The government has made its position clear to the provinces involved and has strongly urged them to participate in the proposed negotiations. There are differences between some of the native claims and other differences are bound to come up in the future. They stem mostly from the settlements that have been proposed and require a flexible approach which the government is willing to take.

About a year ago, the B.C. Indian Chiefs Union demanded compensation based on the traditional loss of enjoyment and land occupation in that province. Since then, the courts have answered the Nishga claims relating mostly to lands under provincial jurisdiction. The government is now ready to negotiate those Indian claims in British Columbia and considers the provincial participation as essential to a satisfactory settlement.

As for New Quebec, most important legal cases related to Indian claims in that area are now before the provincial courts. Once again, the federal government believes that negotiation is the best method of obtaining the results hoped for by all parties concerned, and it will spare no effort to find a solution. However, as those questions are now before the courts, it would be improper for the Canadian government to say more on the matter.

The government has already agreed with the representatives of the Yukon Indians to start negotiations concerning their claims. Those dealing with the proposed settlement have already started. The government is also ready to negotiate with the associations of non-treaty Indians and Inuits from the Northwest Territories. The government has made clear for quite some time that it is willing to fully meet its obligations, show flexibility and hold consultations with the interested parties. Like the Indian groups of Canada, the Northwest Territories Eskimos have obtained funds to help them carry out studies on land claims. In all cases where it is acknowledged that traditional land interests have been disregarded, the government has been willing to look into them and it recognizes in principle the need to compensate any loss resulting from such neglect. It agrees that the best way to achieve the proposed objectives is to reach a freely negotiated settlement with all parties concerned.

Mr. Speaker, in some parts of the country, such as southern Quebec and the Atlantic provinces, there are no treaties dealing with transfer of lands. In this regard, the government is of the opinion that territorial claims in those areas are different in nature from those we spoke of a while ago. The Indians submitted claims concerning their interests in those lands which the government is now in the process of studying. It has also provided them with funds to pursue their necessary research. The policy of the government with regard to the claims of our native peoples fits into the context of other policies intended to alleviate the feeling of bitterness and unfairness that dampens good relations between, on the one hand, the Indians and the Eskimos, and, on the other, the governments concerned and the other Canadians. I see, Mr. Speaker, it is almost five o'clock. Once again, I wish to say how pleased I was to take part in this debate.

This policy has been the mechanism used throughout the study of the claims mentioned by the first speaker. Now that it has been suggested that the rights of our native people be entrenched in our Constitution, the settlement of land claims will no doubt be speeded up. There is no reason to stop negotiations already under way for that purpose and wait for final patriation—

Mr. Knowles: Question.

Mr. Cyr: —nor is there any reason to put through a waiting period those groups who have certain claims when they are ready to negotiate now.

Mr. Knowles: Question.

Mr. Cyr: The entrenchment of ancestral rights in our Constitution is in itself official recognition of the status of the native people of Canada.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hour provided for consideration of private members' business has now expired.

THE ADMINISTRATION

MINISTERIAL TRAVELS ABROAD—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 as a surrogate for the millions of Canadians who are suffering social and economic misery because of a bankrupt administration which is bereft of ideas and solutions, and indeed is unaware of and insensitive to the chaos it has created in the economy. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That this House deplores the actions of the Prime Minister and the Deputy Prime Minister in junking Parliament and the Canadian people before junketing abroad at such a critical period in our economic plight and, furthermore, that the estimates for travel for the aforesaid gentlemen be reduced to $1 so that they will stay at home and apply themselves to finding solutions to the serious problems they themselves created over the last 12 years.

Their facade of helping other nations is disgustingly presumptuous when they cannot even help Canadians.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SMALL BUSINESS

CALL FOR REASONABLE INTEREST RATES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Madam Speaker, last week under this order I moved two motions asking for the reduction of interest rates to assist the farmers in my area. I am now aware of a small machine shop and crane rental firm which, due to the unreasonably high interest rates, is forced to reduce its staff from 30 to eight and sell off seven of its ten mobile cranes, adding to unemployment in the area and reducing available services.

I again therefore, move, seconded by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Hees):

That the Minister of Finance immediately institute reasonable interest rates for small business.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

IMPACT ON SERVICE COMPANIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, over the past several months, has failed to heed the warnings of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gustafson) as to the drastic effect his national energy policy has been having on the supply and service industry in Saskatchewan and Alberta; and in light of the visit last week of representatives of the industry, and the belated outcry on the weekend by the sole candidate for leadership of the Liberal party in Saskatchewan who, up until this point, has been an unquestioning supporter of the government energy policy; I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn):

That the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources make a statement on motions indicating what changes he plans on making in his energy program to assist the small service and supply companies in order that they will not end up in bankruptcy or be forced to move to the U.S.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SUGGESTED COMMEMORATIVE STAMPS TO HONOUR THE DISABLED AND THE HANDICAPPED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Since 1981 is International Year of Disabled Persons and Canada has been in full support of this international declaration, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

S.O. 43

That this House requests Canada Post to print at least two stamps during 1981 to commemorate the International Year of Disabled Persons, with one stamp depicting the logo of the international year and the other exemplifying the contribution made by Terry Fox in his Marathon of Hope that clearly showed that disabled and handicapped Canadians can and should be recognized for their abilities rather than their disabilities, a design for a Terry Fox stamp having been approved by the Fox family.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

THE ECONOMY

GOVERNMENT POLICIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Last week the Prime Minister indicated that he appears to believe that Canadians should be more grateful for the apparent 50 per cent improvement in real wealth over the last decade. During that decade the tax grab of the government has increased by more than 100 per cent. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke):

That the House inform the Prime Minister that it totally rejects his policy of "one for Canadians and two for me", that the government should begin at long last to leave more in our economy for Canadians, and that the House believes that the Prime Minister should at the very least apologize to Canadians for his economic stupidity.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for such a motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

APPOINTMENT OF DIRECTORS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The large number of Liberal party hacks vying for nomination to the board of directors of the Canada Development Corporation has created confusion in the ranks of the unemployed. It may well be that there will be no more room for spouses of cabinet ministers. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince George-Bulkley Valley (Mr. McCuish):

That the Minister of Finance be instructed to hold a lottery for laudable Liberals to determine which will be accommodated at the public trough as directors of the Canada Development Corporation.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

THE CONSTITUTION

SUGGESTION THAT GOVERNMENT WITHDRAW PARLIAMENTARY RESOLUTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Strathcona): Madam Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to deal with a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the Quebec Liberal leader, Mr. Claude Ryan, has stated during the weekend that the defeat of his party in Quebec was due to the fact that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has stubbornly ignored the will of the provinces in his attempt to patriate the constitution unilaterally, and considering the relevancy and truth of such a statement, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Don Valley West (Mr. Bosley):

That this House publicly reassert the will of the Canadian and Quebec people under the circumstances to object to this unilateral action, and that the government withdraw its totally unacceptable project in the best interests of all Canadians.

Madam Speaker: The presentation of such a motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

THE ECONOMY

EFFECT OF HIGH INTEREST RATES ON HOME OWNERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whether or not the government believes it, there are people in Canada who will suffer immeasurably as a result of high interest rates. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the government table in this House the reasons why it has decided that Canadian families should be forced to abandon both their homes and investment therein as a result of usurious interest rates, while the banks enjoy record profit margins and, further, that the Minister of Finance should arrange public hearings across Canada to enable him to understand the magnitude of this problem.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE CENSUS

APPOINTMENT OF ENUMERATORS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, in view of a recent admission by census manager, Mr. Edward Pryor, that candidates for positions as census enumerators are nominated for each position by the local Liberal party organization or a Liberal member of Parliament, and whereas Mr. Pryor said, "It's not easy to find qualified people and if the party organization was not used, some other structure to find candidates would be needed", I therefore move, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 and seconded by the hon. member for Don Valley West (Mr. Bosley):

That this House insists, as a matter of principle, that the 1981 census be carried out in a manner free of political influence or favouritism and therefore instructs Mr. Pryor and his boss, the minister responsible for Statistics Canada, to meet immediately with the Minister of Employment and Immigration so that qualified and deserving census enumerators might be selected on an impartial basis from those thousands of qualified Canadians presently seeking employment through Canada Manpower Offices.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

AGRICULTURE

SUGGESTED INTRODUCTION OF FARM BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BOND PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, in the first quarter of this year farm bankruptcies were up 70 per cent from the same period a year ago because of the unconscionably high interest rates being condoned presently by the Government of Canada. At the same time the Small Business Development Bond program has proved to be a great help to small business; indeed, according to the Federation of Independent Businessmen, it has been a lifesaver to them. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis):

That the government consider applying the same principles of the SBDB to the agricultural sector and create a farm business development bond. In this way the government will go at least some way toward relieving the very high pressure being exerted at this time on this important and vulnerable sector of our Canadian economy.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CALL FOR LOWER INTEREST RATES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Inflation caused and aggravated by lack of production, along with higher interest rates and taxation like the excise tax on natural gas, means that farmers must pay more for heat, fertilizers, credit and machinery. Thus being unable to cope with these skyrocketing costs, they have no alternative but to cut production, which aggravates inflation bringing still higher interest rates, which again lowers production, all of which is already bankrupting our producers. Whereas the policies of the Liberal government are responsible for this vicious cycle, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper):

That this House demands that the Minister of Finance immediately lower interest rates for producers and eliminate the excise tax, which will start this country back toward economic sanity and stability, which will mean increased production, which will lower interest rates and inflation, which will again increase production, which will mean further increased production, which will lower interest rates and inflation, which will again increase production, and thus bring prosperity and happiness back to this depressed country.

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

HOUSING

ASSISTANCE FOR HOME OWNERS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister, who will recall that in the Speech from the Throne the Government of Canada solemnly promised that it would:

—act to assist those unable to bear the burden of renegotiating their home mortgages in the present abnormal situation so that the spectre of foreclosure will be avoided.

That was the solemn promise given by this government in the Speech from the Throne. The other day the Prime Minister indicated that the government intended to break that promise and that it would not help Canadian home owners who are faced with foreclosures.

The Acting Prime Minister will know that the government is spending $1.5 billion on the acquisition of Petrofina. He will also know that the government is spending some $480 million, which it does not need to spend, on oil import subsidies because it cannot come to an agreement with the producing provinces. Will the Acting Prime Minister tell this House and the people of Canada why the government prefers to spend billions of dollars on buying oil companies and on subsidizing the oil economies of OPEC nations rather than using that money to keep its promises to help Canadian home owners who face foreclosure?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, the statement quoted by the right hon. gentleman must be seen in the context of the whole Speech from the Throne. I would draw to his attention, and to the attention of members of the House, the next sentence in the Speech from the Throne, which was to the effect that the ministers of the government were convinced—and this was in April of last year—that the objective of this saving feature referred to by the right hon. gentleman could be achieved without the government embarking upon a major subsidy program. Indeed, subsequent to that, the Prime Minister requested that I meet with the leaders of the lending institutions, which I did. We encouraged and urged them to attempt to assist home owners faced with these problems on a selective and individual basis. I would submit, in fact, that has been the case, since in this month the number of foreclosures is down compared to the same period for last year.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, unwittingly the minister has given very good advice to the people of Canada. He says that you should always read the next sentence in what any Liberal says. The next sentence in what any Liberal says is that they will break the promises they solemnly give to the people of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

THE ECONOMY

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES ON OIL COMPANIES AND OIL IMPORTS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. I hope he will not shuck this one off to some other junior minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: My question has to do with the priorities of this government, which has refused to help Canadians who are facing foreclosures on their homes. It refuses to help low income Canadians who are dealing with the extraordinary costs of inflation; it refuses to help small businesses and farmers who are facing bankruptcy, yet it is prepared to spend $1.5 billion to purchase an oil company and $480 million on an oil import subsidy, which it does not need, since it is too stubborn to come to an agreement. We know that the government is prepared to spend billions of dollars. Why does it prefer to spend billions of dollars on oil companies in foreign countries rather than spending them to help Canadians here at home in a time of serious economic crisis? Can the Acting Prime Minister explain those priorities to us? Why do oil companies receive more priority than widows, home owners, and the victims of bankruptcy?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Acting Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the first question raised by the hon. gentleman had to do with housing, so I thought the proper minister to answer the question would be the minister in charge of housing.

With regard to the statement by the Leader of the Opposition about the acquisition of Petrofina, I think most people in Canada are in full support of that acquisition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: No!

Mr. Pepin: If the Leader of the Opposition asked questions with respect to what the people of Canada want, I think he would find that they are more in agreement with the acquisition of Petrofina than they were in agreement with his position on Petro-Canada.

INCREASE IN FARM BANKRUPTCIES

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): I at least give the Acting Prime Minister credit for not trying to defend what is indefensible, and that is, to spend Canadian taxpayers' money, to raise the taxes of Canadians, to put it into the hands of large oil companies and into the hands of OPEC rather than to put that money into the hands of Canadians who need help in meeting mortgage interest payments or in avoiding bankruptcy or in meeting any of the other domestic economic crises which this government's economic policy has caused.

The Minister of Agriculture heard his Prime Minister say the other day, before his Prime Minister left the country, that Canadians, including farmers and food producers, are ahead of the game and that their real disposable income has gone up by 50 per cent during the period 1970 to 1980.

If the Minister of Agriculture agrees with that, will he explain to us how it is that in Ontario alone, in the first three months of this year, farm bankruptcies have gone up 76 per cent over last year? Will the Minister of Agriculture also tell us, if farmers are having it so good this year, why are there all these farm bankruptcies, and what does his government intend to do to help Canadian farmers who are facing bankruptcy as a direct result of the policies of his government?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I am aware of what the Prime Minister has said. It is true what he said about farm income; but there are certain sectors in the farm productive industry which are in deep trouble. Those are the ones in the pork and beef production entities, the red meat production entities. However, the others have enjoyed what the Prime Minister has said, that kind of living. They have looked after themselves to a certain extent. They have looked after themselves in a better marketing establishment for themselves, better marketing entities for themselves.

All one has to do is to check the grain industry, if one wants to see this, where interest-free advance payments are made to them. If one looks at the grain-year that ends in July and starts again in the first of August, one will see that they have applied for less this year, so far, than they did the year before, because they are delivering their grain and they are getting reasonable prices for it. So, those production entities are doing well in agriculture; but the bankruptcies are in the two areas which are doing so badly. Speaking of bankruptcies, when one uses the terminology of 70 per cent more, one has to be realistic and realize that there were only 124 in Ontario last year, and there have been slightly over 200 registered so far this year.

But I am sure that the hon. Leader of the Opposition also knows that that does not show the true picture because many of the people are losing their—

Mr. Epp: Their shirts!

Mr. Whelan: —their farms, etc., and not really declaring bankruptcy. They are being put in a form of bankruptcy by banks, etc. So, even the figures which we are both using do not show the true picture.

Mr. Hees: You are Paul Martin's boy, Gene.

THE ECONOMY

GOVERNMENT PLANS TO ASSIST HOME OWNERS AND LOW INCOME CATEGORIES

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Acting Prime Minister who will remember that last week the Prime Minister stood up in the House and boasted that Canadians never had it so good. What is more, on the CTV "Question Period" the Minister of Finance said: "individuals are pretty adaptable and they are now prepared to live with the inflation rates and the mortgages rates." That shows just how far he is removed from ordinary people who, indeed, are not prepared to live with the government's high interest rate policy. They want to know what the government is doing.

I would like to ask the Acting Prime Minister, because I think that he is probably more sympathetic to the plight of the ordinary income earner than either of his colleagues I have mentioned, what the government is prepared to do to relieve the problems of those who are losing their homes or who are being forced to exist on less than adequate diets?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, like the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance, I am quite confident that the average Canadian has a much better understanding of the situation facing the Canadian society than the hon. member. Indeed, if we refer to the basic principles of the budget as expounded by the Minister of Finance, we can see that there were two main objectives: first, fighting against inflation, and the current situation demonstrates that the inflationary pressures are still with us; second, achieving autonomy in the field of energy. As regards inflation, both the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance have reaffirmed our position, namely, that it remains enemy No. 1 and that we have taken steps to cushion its impact on those who were most vulnerable in our society, and the average Canadians understand and follow that policy.

EFFECT OF INCREASE IN FOOD COSTS

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): It is easy to see, Madam Speaker, that even though the Minister of Finance is out of the country, his cabinet colleagues have the albatross of the Minister of Finance hanging around their necks.

I should like to direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs who surely must be shocked by the tremendous increase in the cost of food. The over-all consumer price index is up 12.7 per cent, but the price of milk is up 48 per cent in the past year, butter 37 per cent, potatoes 148 per cent, and fruit and vegetables 73 per cent, to name just a few.

I should like to ask the minister what he is doing to see that consumers are not being gouged. What recommendations is he making to his cabinet colleagues to see that the burden of these high food costs is not falling heaviest on those who can least afford it?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, it is obvious that rising prices, particularly food prices, must be of great concern to all Canadians. Of course, as consumer minister I am very much interested in that question, but I support the efforts made by the Minister of Finance to settle the problems created by inflation. I do not believe we can isolate the question of food prices and turn it into the exception. On the contrary, I would suggest that anyone who cares to examine the situation in the field of food prices will realize that very fortunately food prices in Canada are still much lower than those which prevail in most industrialized countries.

SOCIAL SECURITY

QUERY RESPECTING AID FOR SENIOR CITIZENS

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the serious repercussions of high interest rates and high prices as far as senior citizens are concerned, does the government plan anything at this session on an emergency basis to come to the aid of senior citizens? I ask the minister not to give the stock answer that there was a $35 increase last year and that it has been fully indexed because, as a matter of fact, the maximum guaranteed income supplement today is only 8.8 per cent higher than it was when that $35 was given, whereas the cost of living is rising at a rate of 12.5 per cent on an over-all basis, and even more with respect to food. Is the government going to do something on an emergency basis for senior citizens right now?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I would like to be able to give a positive answer to the question asked by the hon. member, but unfortunately I cannot do so for the very reason that we are now trying to get through a rather difficult economic period. The hon. member does not want me to speak about the indexation of the old age pension supplement. I must still tell him that we have seriously considered the possibility of using a different index for senior citizens according to the cost of a food basket and a model of budgetary spending applicable to their particular way of life. All the advice that we have received in this regard was to the effect that over ten years, the difference would represent a total of only 1 per cent, or .1 per cent a year, which cannot justify exceptional measures. Apart from this measure, we cannot incur further major government expenditures at this time, I am sorry to say.

● (1430)

REQUEST FOR EMERGENCY ACTION

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I did not ask the minister not to refer to the indexation of pensions. I asked her not to allege that the $35 given last year was being fully indexed, for it has not been. With respect to the point she has raised about a separate index amounting to only a 1 per cent difference over ten years, may I ask if she is not aware of the fact that at the present time food prices are running at 16 per cent and 18 per cent or higher on an annual basis, and that rental and energy costs are rising beyond reason? Is there not now, in her opinion, a case for an emergency measure—never mind the ten-year period—to keep senior citizens from falling too far below the poverty line?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I regret to have to mention the matter of cost when dealing with the problem of senior citizens, especially—and I do emphasize this to the House—that of single people who receive the income supplement and many of whom are women. We do not usually say that they receive a sufficient number of special privileges which are not taken into account in the indexation and which are of course not deducted, such as senior citizen residences which clearly cost less. There remains one problem of which I have often talked with my colleagues in the House, and which would cost us $730 million to solve.

As for the other senior citizens, I refer to the couples, all of them are now over the poverty line, and this is why we often speak about the $35 a month, which makes $480 a year, to which quarterly indexation applies. The next indexation of the old age security pension and supplement is due in five weeks. It will amount to several dollars. It is worked out to take into account—and I regret that it cannot occur at the same moment as prices increase, but everyone knows that this is impossible. In five weeks, there will be an increase of several dollars in the amount of the pension and the supplement.

[English]

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, as the minister must well know, that indexation she talks about is always behind. By the time a pension increase comes, there is another rise in the cost of living leaving pensioners still further behind.

REQUEST FOR LEGISLATION TO BENEFIT WOMEN AGED 55 TO 65 YEARS

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, my final question has to do with the very good speeches the minister makes around and about the country, in which she keeps saying that one of her priorities is to do something for single women, especially those between the ages of 60 and 65, who are not included in the spouse's allowance, and those between the ages of 55 and 60, for whom there is nothing under federal auspices. Is the minister prepared to make recommendations at this session of Parliament to do something to remove this discrimination against women between the ages of 55 and 65?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Before the end of this session.

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Unfortunately, Madam Speaker, I have not spoken about this problem for quite a while, except to recognize its existence when it is specifically discussed, and this for a good reason. I have examined repeatedly the priorities of my department and the available budget, not only in my own department, but for the government in general, and it is impossible for me to recommend such action as a priority before we have placed the people over 65 above the poverty line. This is still our first priority, and unfortunately, I have always said that this could not be done immediately, but rather as soon as the economy would permit.

[English]

REQUEST FOR EXAMINATION OF IMPACT OF HIGHER PRICES ON POOR AND ELDERLY

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. The food component of the Consumer Price Index, that is the food eaten at home, showed a 16 per cent increase. Our current rate of inflation is one per cent per month. Today we are told by Agriculture Canada that we can anticipate a faster increase in the rate of the price of food. Given these factors and the fact that the minister is not prepared to act to protect old age pensioners, those on fixed incomes and the working poor, against rising food prices, and rising energy prices in terms of home heating fuel, is the minister prepared at least to authorize a thorough examination into the impact of the Consumer Price Index, particularly the food price increases on the working poor and on the elderly, and is she prepared to do that now?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I have explored thoroughly, with officials of the different departments concerned, and with my provincial colleagues, the components which make up our indexation and the way it is passed on to people through all the social programs. Concerning the working poor, it is true that the child tax credit which mothers are receiving right now, amounting to $238 a year, is indexed annually and it does take time to catch up with preceding years. However, it is supposed to catch up quite closely to the cost of living.

As for pensions and supplements, they are indexed every three months. Because of that they are much closer to the exact additional burden placed on people's shoulders. For that reason I do not accept accusations like that from the hon. member. The hon. member should ask those provinces which have not even passed on the $35 to all seniors who needed it why they have not done so. Instead of asking these types of questions which raise expectations, when the member knows full well there is no more money for big expenditures, and it is immoral to do that.

Miss MacDonald: What about Maurice Strong?

SUGGESTED ADVANCE INDEXING

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, one thing the minister said made sense, that the poor and the old age pensioners of this country cannot expect any sympathy from this government. That is obvious.

The minister referred to indexing of the child tax credit which takes place on an annual basis. Indexing with regard to the Canada Pension Plan also takes place on an annual basis. Indexing with regard to the OAS is done quarterly. In each case though people have to fall either a year or three months behind. Given the economic situation in the country today, surely it is possible to be able to anticipate the rate of inflation on a quarterly basis so that people would not have to fall behind. When people's incomes fall behind the rate of inflation, it is obvious they have to go without. There is no consolation waiting for indexing to catch up when they probably get only $2 more in their old age pension cheque.

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I suppose the question the hon. member asks is whether the government agrees that a monthly or quarterly indexation for all social programs, other than pensions, is apropos. I did not quite understand the question which the hon. member asked.

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker, my question is very simple. Why not index three months ahead instead of for the three months that have just passed? That is what I am asking. It is very simple.

Miss Bégin: Madam Speaker, my answer is as simple. Could the hon. member send me his list of forecasts and we will study it?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

HOUSING

NUMBER OF FORECLOSURES

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for housing. Earlier in the question period the minister trotted out the same old defence that the number of foreclosures is down. The minister will know that foreclosure is legal history and that banks and trust companies are now using power of sale.

However, my question deals with repossessions and defaults which come into the hands of the mortgage insurance fund. In 1978 the mortgage insurance fund acquired only 2,900 units; in 1979 it acquired 14,800 units. In 1980 it acquired 14,500, an increase of 500 per cent for each of the two years. When the government states that the number of foreclosures is down, does it mean down in comparison to 1978, or down in comparison to the horrendous record of 1979 and 1980?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I agree with some of the statistics used by the hon. member in the introduction to his question. It is quite true that it was during the Conservative government period in 1979 that defaults first dramatically increased. The figure of 14,000 is correct.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): You have missed the point.

Mr. Wilson: Can you keep a straight face?

Mr. Cosgrove: As a result of that, the former government authorized the corporation to borrow funds from the government in order to meet the strong demand against the mortgage insurance fund. There is no question but that the strong demand continued into 1980. I thought that I had said earlier in the question period today, and on other occasions when I spoke about foreclosures and the foreclosure rate, that I was comparing this year against last year. After all, it was March of last year when the Speech from the Throne to which the right hon. gentleman first referred was made. It is that period we were addressing. It is that which I used as a benchmark in my response.

DECLINE IN REAL WAGES

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): I reiterate, Madam Speaker, foreclosure is legal history. I want to ask the minister of housing something else. The Minister of Finance has suggested that Canadian home owners renewing mortgages taken out in 1976 have more disposable income with which to meet today's high mortgage interest rates. However, in the 1980 annual report the president of CMHC states that "the increase in real weekly wages dropped from an average of 2.5 per cent in the first half of the 1970s to .5 per cent" in the second half of the 1970s. That is cited in the report as a reason for the heavy volume of mortgage defaults in 1980. My question to the minister in this. Who is correct, the Minister of Finance who states that Canadians have enough disposable income to take care of higher mortgage interest payments, or the president of CMHC who cites a slowdown in the increase of real wages as the reason for mortgage defaults?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I do not have a clear recollection of the Minister of Finance making the statement just attributed to him by the hon. member. To compare those statistics is probably not very useful to any householder, man, woman or family faced with the prospect of the large increases they have to pay in shelter costs.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): They just want help.

Mr. Cosgrove: That is a real problem for them. My point today was to say that, compared to last year, thank heavens there are fewer people, whatever the reason may be, faced with that choice, the real prospect of being faced with foreclosure. Therefore they are ahead.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

AMENDMENT SOUGHT TO AID PART-TIME WORKERS

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. In view of the fact that Canada's part-time workers, who are mostly women with family responsibilities, do not usually have access to fringe benefits or opportunities for promotion, can the minister say what steps he is taking to ensure that those part-time workers who come under the Canada Labour Code can receive pro rated salaries and benefits, and that barriers to unionization are removed?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, the question is a very pertinent one in today's society, and to a greater degree in view of the developments that appear will be occurring in the work force in the coming months and years. There are some companies which today hire, for certain classes of jobs, only part-time employees. Part of the reason for that may be the fact that they escape pension responsibilities. They are often able to hire those people at lower rates of wages, and there are other absences of benefits. As part of our review of the Canada Labour Code, my department is reviewing that situation and will be coming up with recommendations for legislation which might recognize in a more realistic manner what is happening in the work force today and what sort of protection might be provided for part-time workers, particularly female part-time workers who are a large part of that work force.

EMPLOYMENT

OVERRULING OF RECOMMENDATIONS MADE BY MANITOBA COMMITTEES ON SUMMER YOUTH EMPLOYMENT PROJECTS

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. In the case of several Manitoba constituencies, local advisory board recommendations for projects for the summer youth employment program were overruled at the ministerial level and new low priority projects were funded. In view of the fact that the local advisory board concept was a means of ensuring that local people who understood what was going on in their community had a lot of input, can the minister explain why he believes that his knowledge of all the communities is so great that he is able to overrule the recommendations of locally appointed people?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I want to point out to the hon. member that in the vast majority of cases the recommendations of the local advisory boards were followed. If the hon. member has more precise concerns that he would like to raise, I will be glad to deal with them on an individual basis. However, under the present terms, that large generalization just does not hold true.

Mr. Murphy: The minister asks for a precise list of my complaints. In one constituency the sponsor of a project who received money even though it had a very low priority from the local advisory board, was the president of the Liberal party in northern Manitoba. In another constituency it was a relative of Senator Roebuck. In another constituency in Manitoba it was someone from the minister's own constituency who received money to go into Selkirk-Interlake. That is the problem. Will the minister explain to us why he is using the student youth employment program as a political pork-barrel?

Mr. Crosbie: Right on.

Mr. Axworthy: The hon. member misinterprets the purpose of the program.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Axworthy: It is to provide employment for young people in this country. As hon. members will know, each constituency, regardless of political affiliation, has the right to have an advisory board. We have followed the recommendations very dutifully of most members in most cases, and are prepared to listen to their recommendations and consult with them, which is the purpose of that. The fact that there may be some additional funds available which are allocated to where there are projects of real need is a discretionary judgment that must be retained by the government.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

DOWNTURN IN DRILLING ACTIVITY

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the minister of energy I will direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. The May 4 edition of Oil Week shows that oil drilling activity is now down over 50 per cent, land sales of petroleum properties are down over 70 per cent, and 139 drilling rigs have left the country. The downturn that was so widely predicted about the Liberal energy program some months ago is now with us in spades.

Since two of the taxes which are the most controversial in the program, the excise tax on natural gas and the 8 per cent production tax, will be before the House shortly, and since these are the main subject of the deadlock between Alberta and Ottawa, will the government consider deferring these taxes until the negotiations are completed with Alberta to indicate its willingness to be flexible, to unwind this deadlock and to bring an end to the very serious downturn that is with us in this industry?

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the hon. member's memory seems to be somewhat confused when he speaks of a downturn resulting from the NEP only. The hon. member may recall that prior to the National Energy Program there were many indications in the journal he cites, as well as in newspapers and other media, of the adverse impact on drilling activity of the gas glut or gas surplus in Canada. We saw a downturn in those drilling activities prior to the tabling of the program.

With regard to the second part of his question, there will be ample occasion to debate the taxes as he suggests.

Mr. Wilson: I will direct my supplementary question to the parliamentary secretary. Since between 500 and 1,000 producing wells have now been capped as a direct result of the energy program of the Liberal party, and since Bill C-57 will be before us shortly, is the government considering any amendments to ease the impact of this legislation on the marginal producing wells, wells that have been producing some oil but are now going out of production? We will now be paying twice the price for oil from countries like Mexico and Saudi Arabia. Will there be any amendments to Bill C-57 which will address that problem?

Mr. MacLaren: Madam Speaker, any amendments to Bill C-57 will be brought forward at the appropriate time.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

CHAIRMANSHIP OF BOARD OF DIRECTORS

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance, who has fled to Gabon, his only positive contribution to Canada's economy this year, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, whose department is also concerned with CDC. I refer the minister to the original prospectus for share sales to the public in 1975 of that corporation, and also the information memorandum I have in my hand of September, 1980, which says this:

> CDC is not a Crown Corporation... CDC does not require government approval in the conduct of its affairs and the government has publicly indicated it will not interfere with the directors in the exercise of their business judgment.

In light of those representations made to the public on behalf of the government that it will not interfere with the business judgment of the directors of that corporation, on the basis of which shares were sold to 50,000 Canadians, will the minister now confirm that the government will cease interfering with the business judgment of the directors of CDC, will cease putting pressure on for the appointment of Maurice Strong as the chairman of the board of directors, and will call off Mr. Coutts, Senator Davey and the Minister of Finance, who have been telephoning and harassing directors and trying to pressure them to make these appointments? Will the government now carry out its representations to the public?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, as far as I am aware the government, through the Minister of Finance, is acting in ways totally consistent with the law passed by this Parliament creating the Canada Development Corporation, its role as a shareholder holding some 49 per cent of the shares on behalf of the Canadian people, and is generally operating in a manner consistent with the interests of all the shareholders.

Oral Questions

PROPOSAL TO BUY GOVERNMENT'S SHARES

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, the minister will know that the CDC repudiated the minister's attempt to interfere with it a few months ago. The minister attempted to force the CDC to go in on some kind of proposal with Massey-Ferguson or Chrysler. The CDC was carrying out its proper function then, and the minister and his people since then have been attempting to bully the CDC and to stop it from taking its independent course.

My supplementary question is this: will the government accept an offer which was sent to the Prime Minister in a letter of May 14 by Burns Fry Limited? Burns Fry Limited was one of the investment dealers involved in the Canada Development Corporation share issue. Burns Fry Limited therefore feels its responsibility. Having been misled into deluding the public, the 50,000 shareholders who contributed some $400 million, Burns Fry Limited has made an offer to purchase the government's shares in the CDC so that the CDC can remain committed on its present course, and the government can go ahead and create a new vehicle to be an instrument of its public policies in the field of investment and business.

Is the government now considering that proposal from Burns Fry, or will the government give it positive consideration, and is the government prepared to sell its shares in CDC and to stop this unwarranted interference in breaching the securities laws of the country?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, the details of this letter have not been brought to my attention, beyond my reading a report in the press, and I would be very happy to check with the Prime Minister to see what further information I can provide to my hon. friend, or he could direct his question to the Prime Minister himself when the Prime Minister is in the House tomorrow.

PURPOSE OF CORPORATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It is supplementary to the questions asked by my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's West.

In October of 1980 a leaked cabinet document from the minister's department indicated that the minister was anxious to recast the corporation as a government policy tool. He suggested two options, from friendly persuasion of board members to changing the act. In light of the recent speech made by Mr. Anthony Hampson, the president and chief executive officer of CDC, who said that the CDC is not a buy-back investor, oversized mutual fund saviour of sick companies, employment agency, or regional disparity eliminating machine that some people have talked about, I wonder whether the minister can confirm or deny that he is attempting to change the CDC into something of the nature of a Petro-Canada in the manufacturing and industrial sector. Is that his intention? Is that what he is promoting through cabinet argument?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, the purpose and form of operation of the Canada Development Corporation have been set down in a law passed by this Parliament and, as far as I am aware, the government is not doing anything inconsistent with the direction of Parliament in this regard. If and when there are any decisions by the government to change what is set out in this act, obviously amendments will have to be presented to Parliament, and they will be dealt with in the ordinary way through the full parliamentary process.

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, the political meddling on the part of the government thus far has meant that there has been at least a 10 per cent drop in the value of the shares which were purchased in good faith by the citizens of Canada. The minister will know that Mr. Hampson came out very strongly in that same speech to which I referred, with respect to political interference. He said that the CDC has grown as a corporation designed to operate in the private sector of the economy under the guidance of a board of directors who are free of political intervention and who hold written assurances from both the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance to that effect.

I would like to ask the minister whether he is prepared, on behalf of the government, to table the letters which have been given to the board of directors indicating there would be no political interference, and whether he will indicate on the floor of the House of Commons that an attempt to have Mr. Paul Martin, Mr. William Mingo, and others who are well-known Liberals, appointed to the board of directors will be discontinued, or is he trying to make this another St. Maurice Gas Company?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, the minister responsible for the CDC is the Minister of Finance. I will be happy to draw my hon. friend's question to his attention. I was very interested to hear him mention the names of two outstanding business leaders, but I think any further information should come from the Minister of Finance.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

ALICE ARM, B.C.—DUMPING OF TAILINGS BY AMAX—REQUESTS BY BRITISH COLUMBIA MEDICAL ASSOCIATION

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. At the weekend the largest medical association in western Canada, the British Columbia Medical Association, passed a resolution making two specific points. The first called for a full public inquiry into the marine dumping of tailings from the Amax mine at Alice Arm. The second called for the cessation of dumping until a detailed study of bio-accumulation of heavy metals in the food chain has been completed.

Will the minister support the B.C. Medical Association in either of those calls?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I have not had a briefing on the meeting of British Columbia doctors which took place during the weekend. As soon as I have, I will report to the hon. member.

TOXIC WASTE SPILLS—POSSIBILITY OF LEGAL PROSECUTION

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. He has been in Vancouver recently. There have been two spills of toxic waste from the Alice Arm mine into the intertidal zone. The minister indicated on Thursday in Vancouver that he was considering charges. Could he tell this House whether charges will be proceeded with, or can Amax expect in the future always to be immune from prosecution in the same way it gets special orders in council during elections?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, as usual, the hon. member confuses the two issues. The spills are being examined by officials of the Department of the Environment and my department. If they recommend charges, charges will go ahead. There will be no harsher treatment or softer treatment for Amax than there is for any other organization which is involved in this type of situation.

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

UREA FORMALDEHYDE—TESTING OF INSULATED HOMES

Mr. Peter Lang (Kitchener): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that urea formaldehyde foam insulation is definitely causing health problems for some Canadian home owners and forcing some home owners to leave their homes, will the minister indicate whether the government will take responsibility, through her ministry or any other government department, for testing all homes with urea formaldehyde insulation so that people will know whether their health is endangered and, second, if homes are found to have an excessive urea formaldehyde level, will the government take responsibility for compensation for removal of that insulation?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, with respect to the first part of the question, where technical assistance may be needed, I said to the House last week that I have asked my officials to discuss with the provinces what help can eventually be provided to people who want to know the levels of UFFI fumes in their homes.

As to compensation, I am not aware of any plans of the government to accept legal responsibility or to provide further compensation.

IMMIGRATION

ACCESS OF CANADIAN CINEMATOGRAPHERS TO UNITED STATES MARKET

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Now that the mantle of leadership has been lifted from his shoulders, I would like to ask him a question about immigration. American cinematographers with travelogues have been given free access into Canada and they travel the country giving their shows to Rotary Clubs, etc., which is very fine; however, Canadian cinematographers have not been afforded the same privilege in the United States.

Would the minister use his influence to ensure that Canadian cinematographers receive the same privileges in the United States as the Americans receive here?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, the hon. member may be aware, because I believe the announcement was circulated to all members' offices last week, that we are working on an arrangement where we will meet with each of the constituent groups in the arts and culture field, cinematographers, people in the theatre, dance and so on, to look at each of the regulations as they apply to the admission of offshore workers or technical people. So we will be developing new guidelines for the admission of foreign workers in each of those areas and once we have those we will be in a position to discuss them with the American authorities.

Mr. McDermid: That is fine and dandy for down the road, but I ask the minister what he is going to do about Canadians who have confirmed bookings in the United States now to present their travelogues on Canadian scenery and trips. What are you going to do to assure them that they can fulfil their commitments in the United States within the next few months?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, we will certainly take that matter up with the American authorities, but that is a judgment that they have to make. We can only bring that to their attention, as it has been on several counts. However, I will discuss the matter further with my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and we will see if further representations can be made to our embassy in Washington. As I said, we are in the position where we are revising our own regulations as they apply to non-Canadians in the cultural field.

PRIVILEGE

MR. NICKERSON—NOTICE OF QUESTION TO BE RAISED

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, I gave you notice of a question of privilege earlier. It involves certain improper, partisan actions by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro), and because he is not in the House to answer these charges, with your permission I would like to have this matter held over until such time that he is in the House.

Madam Speaker: It is not necessary for the minister to answer any so-called charges the hon. member might make. If he does want to expose his question of privilege I can hear it and see whether there is a foundation for it. However, if he prefers to wait until such time as the minister is here, I can hold it over for a few days.

MR. MURPHY—ALLOCATION OF PUBLIC FUNDS

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, my question of privilege arises out of what happened in today's question period, and if the minister would come from behind the curtains I would like to raise the issue.

I raised the matter of funds being used not as recommended by the local advisory board, but being used in some cases as a political pork-barrel. The minister responded that I did not understand the nature of the funding. If he means by that that it is being used for political pork-barrelling, I accept that answer; but he also said that what was happening was that he was using additional funding to give money to these programs where he seems to have a few friends within the province of Manitoba.

That is not correct, Madam Speaker. According to the information that came from the minister's office, he has cut money that was allocated by the local advisory board, for projects in South Indian Lake and one of the projects in The Pas and used that money to fund another group which has asked for funding for their organization.

Now, it is not my purpose today to try and raise an issue over whether or not the minister has the right to intervene; what I am referring to is the role of the MP. The minister asked members of Parliament to do two things: first of all, he asked us to appoint local advisory boards; secondly, he asked each of us to make our own personal recommendations as to what that money should be used for. And that should have happened after the local advisory board had made their recommendations.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that the hon. member does not have a question of privilege but a grievance about the way in which a minister has proceeded in the allocation of public funds. That is quite legitimate; he may have that grievance and he may want to discuss it or have a press conference about it but it certainly does not form the basis for a question of privilege. Unless the hon. member has other points to make concerning this particular question, I will have to tell him that I cannot hear him further.

Mr. Murphy: Madam Speaker, I may accept the suggestion to have a press conference, if that is your wish. However, if I understand what the minister asked us to do as MPs and what he did in response to what he asked us, then I do have a bona fide question of privilege.

He had asked us as members of Parliament to make recommendations to him as to how that money should be used in the riding, but what happened in my particular case, and it may have happened to other MPs, is that on May 12 I sent my recommendations to him; on the same day, even before the minister's office had received my recommendations, I received his decisions. So why did he go through the facade of asking for MPs' input?

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I can see there is no change in the direction of the argument the hon. member is now presenting. I am quite certain that this is a good matter for debate and the hon. member may take some other opportunity, such as the adjournment proceedings, to debate this specific question.

THE ECONOMY

TABLING OF 1980 ANNUAL ECONOMIC REVIEW

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 41(2), I am pleased to table, on behalf of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) the Economic Review for 1980, a general review of recent economic developments.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 1,058, 1,935, 2,071, 2,072, 2,073, 2,185, 2,267, 2,270, 2,297, 2,460 and 2,496.

I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

PROFESSOR PAUL LIN

Question No. 1,058—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did the CBC at any time in the past use the services of Professor Paul Lin of McGill University for commentaries on Asian affairs?

2. To the knowledge of the CBC or the government, did Professor Lin work for approximately 17 years as an assistant to Chairman Mao and the then government of the People's Republic of China?

3. To the knowledge of the government, was Professor Lin on return from a subsequent trip to the Far East searched by the United States customs at San Francisco and was it discovered that he had on his person approximately $20,000 in small bills and, if so, for what purpose was this money to be used?

4. Is the RCMP security service aware of the incident in San Francisco and, if so (a) on what date did they become aware of it (b) have they a file on the matter (c) to their knowledge, what was done with the money?

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the Solicitor General as follows: 1. Yes. Paul Lin, professor of East Asian Studies at McGill University, has participated on occasion in such programs as "Sunday Morning" and "As It Happens."

2. The CBC is aware that Paul Lin worked in China for some time, but not of his specific position there.

3 and 4. It is not considered in the national interest to answer these questions as it would tend to confirm or deny the existence of national security investigations into the activities of particular individuals, groups or organizations.

SPACE RESEARCH PROGRAMS

Question No. 1,935—Mr. Herbert:

1. In the fiscal year 1979-80, were contributions made by the government to space research programs at Canadian universities and, if so (a) in what amounts (b) which departments made the contributions (c) to which universities were contributions made?

2. Are there any long-term commitments continuing through the current year into the next fiscal year and beyond?

Mr. Roger Simmons (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment):

1. (a) In 1979-80, the government contributed to Canadian university space research programs through: 27 research contracts administered by departments, which amounted to $469,700; logistic and material support (balloons, rockets, instruments, accommodation, etc.) provided by NRC, to eight universities and to the Canadian Corporation for University Space Science, amounting to $2,337,388; 30 grants to individual university researchers awarded by the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council (NSERC), amounting to $675,000;

(b) and (c) The list below is a breakdown of contracts and grants given to each university, as well as the corresponding amounts and sponsoring departments.

2. In most cases, the duration of research contracts and projects is more than one year, extending in many cases to two or three. There can thus be an implied multiyear commitment when support for a given project is given. However, there is no long-term commitment in the sense of having to maintain a given level of annual support by replacing expired contracts with new ones.

MR. YVON GARIÉPY

Question No. 2,071—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to the answer to question No. 1,036 which states in part, that Mr. Yvon Gariépy, Master of the Royal Canadian Mint, travelled to Stratford, Ontario, on or about June 3, 1979, in a car rented by Madame Claudette Nadeau, President of Crown Assets Disposal Corporation, for the purpose of his meeting with a marketing consultant (a) what was the name of the marketing consultant (b) what are all the details of the consultation (c) where did the consultation take place and on what dates and during what hours?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): I am informed by the Royal Canadian Mint as follows:

(a) Mr. K. H. J. Clarke, President of Kaysea Consultants Ltd., Toronto.

(b) Disclosing details of the consultations could be materially injurious to the financial interests of the corporation.

(c) Stratford, Ontario, during the morning and the afternoon of June 4, 1979.

Question No. 2,072—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to the answer to question No. 1,267 which states in part, that Mr. Yvon Gariépy, Master of the Royal Canadian Mint, met in Athens, Greece with certain persons, what were the names of all such persons and their positions?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): I am informed by the Royal Canadian Mint as follows: see question 2,071, part (b) answered this day.

Question No. 2,073—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to the answer to Question No. 1,250 which states in part, that Yvon Gariépy, Master of the Royal Canadian Mint, met in the Netherlands with certain persons, what were the names of all such persons and their positions?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): I am informed by the Royal Canadian Mint as follows: see question 2,071, part (b) answered this day.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Question No. 2,185—Mr. Cossitt:

1. With reference to the answer to question No. 2,025 which lists the names of those engaged in working on questions on the Order Paper, how many have (a) English (b) French, as their mother tongue?

2. Is each of the official languages balanced and, if not, for what reason?

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance):

1. (a) None.

(b) Nine.

2. The language requirements of each position vary by position but are equal in the competence required in each of the two official languages in the two instances. In five of the nine positions, including the most senior positions, the language requirement in both languages is of the highest degree. Three of these positions require a professional level in both languages which is attainable only through special training but which cannot be attained in 12 months' continuous language training. In two of the skills, listening and speaking, inasmuch as each of the employees meets if not, in fact, exceeds the language requirements of the position, the requirements of the official languages policies are being met. Based on the tested language competence of every employee in this office, the competence in both official languages is balanced even though the first official language of each employee is French. The representation of both linguistic groups is for the moment not balanced. In staffing the positions with the exception of three of the nine positions requiring professional levels in both languages, candidates of either official language extraction are equally considered. The unbalanced representation which now exists could eventually be altered through attrition and appointments of replacement staff.

AFRICAN TRIP BY MINISTER

Question No. 2,267—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did the Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment authorize the rental of an aircraft on or about January 29, 1981, to fly from Serengeti National Park in Tanzania to Nairobi and, if so (a) what was the cost to the taxpayer and what are all the reasons justifying the cost (b) what were the names of all the persons on board?

2. Was the aircraft used to transport the minister and his associates to Nairobi to have a dinner with a friend, Mr. David Macuk, an American diplomat, and did the minister have dinner with Mr. Macuk?

3. Did the minister turn down the opportunity (a) for dinner with the Canadian high commissioner (b) of conferring with a second-ranking United Nations environmental program official while in Nairobi to have dinner with Mr. Macuk?

4. Did the Tanzanian government offer an aircraft free of charge to fly the minister and his group out of Serengeti National Park to connect with an Ethiopian Airways flight from Kilimanjaro Airport to take the minister to Nairobi and, if so, for what reason was this offer not accepted as an alternative to renting the aircraft at the taxpayer expense?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): 1. No. The minister flew in a rented aircraft from Lake Manyara, Tanzania to Nairobi.

(a) The cost of renting the aircraft, allowing for differences in currencies at the time the invoice is paid, will be approximately $1,300. The rental of the aircraft was essential as the only possible means of connecting with commercial flights to enable the minister to return in time for important speaking engagements in Canada.

(b) Mr. A. Cooke, Mr. N. Lynch, the Hon. John Roberts, Mr. J. Watts.

2. See 1. Yes the minister did have dinner with Mr. Macuk.

3. (a) Yes. The minister however, did meet with the Canadian high commissioner and conferred with him on United Nations environmental programs.

(b) No invitation was offered.

4. No.

PAIT

Question No. 2,270—Mr. Herbert:

With reference to the Program for the Advancement of Industrial Technology (PAIT) (a) how many years has it been in operation (b) what was the budget for last year and what is the estimate of expenditures for next year (c) how many (i) companies (ii) persons were assisted in the last year?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned:

(a) The Program for the Advancement of Industrial Technology (PAIT) began in fiscal year 1965/66 and continued until March 31, 1977, a period of 12 years. On April 1, 1977, it was replaced by the Enterprise Development Program (EDP).

(b) EDP budget 1979/80, $47 million. Estimated expenditures 1980/81, $46 million.

(c) (i) In 1979/80 contributions were approved for 443 projects—all to companies. (ii) None.

PROGRAM "SELF-SERVICE"

Question No. 2,297—Mr. Neil:

1. (a) What department operates the program "Self-Service", a trailer detailing government programs and services (b) is the program carried out in all provinces (c) for how long has it been in existence and what is the cost to date?

2. (a) Are the units owned and operated by the government or are they leased and, if leased, what are the details (b) in each province (i) how many units are in operation (ii) how many persons are employed under the program?

3. Is the program a continuing one or is it limited to a certain period?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development):

1. (a) The "Self-Service" program is operated by the Canadian Unity Information Office.

(b) Yes.

(c) The program has been in operation since October, 1978. The cost to date is $1,242,126 with a visitor attendance of 1,154,650. Based on a per capita cost, this would amount to $1.07 per visitor. It should be noted that capital costs have been amortized over a six-year period.

2. (a) All units are owned and operated by the Government of Canada.

(b) (i) British Columbia, one unit, 3 exhibit attendants; Alberta, one unit, 3 exhibit attendants; Saskatchewan, one unit, 3 exhibit attendants; Manitoba, one unit, 3 exhibit attendants; Ontario, two units, 3 exhibit attendants; Quebec, one unit, 3 exhibit attendants; Atlantic Provinces, one unit, 3 exhibit attendants; and six attendants on a rotational basis throughout the entire program.

(ii) All 30 road personnel supporting the "Self-Service" program are hired regionally under contract for a period of one year.

3. This is part of a continuing program designed to bring information on the services and programs offered by the Government of Canada to Canadians.

ANNUAL REPORT OF COMMISSIONER OF OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Question No. 2,460—Mr. Wenman:

What was the total cost, including printing, publication and distribution, of the 1980 Annual Report of the Commissioner of Official Languages and how many copies were printed?

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): The Commissioner of Official Languages reports directly to Parliament and not through a minister. Questions can be put directly to him.

HOUSE OF COMMONS APPOINTMENTS

Question No. 2,496—Mr. Cossitt:

Since the answer to question No. 1,491 was prepared, were any further House of Commons appointments made by order in council and, if so, in each case, what was the name, position and date of appointment?

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): No.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BANKRUPTCY ACT, 1980

MEASURE RESPECTING BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General) moved that Bill C-12, respecting bankruptcy and insolvency, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

He said: Madam Speaker, the bill on bankruptcy and insolvency whose second reading I have the honour to move today has indeed a long history behind it. It is the fifth such bill introduced before Parliament. Before explaining to the House the philosophy and substance of the bill perhaps it might be useful to make a brief historic summary.

Back in February 1966, therefore over 14 years ago, the then justice minister who was responsible for the administration of the bankruptcy legislation ordered a full review of our statutes on bankruptcy. He requested a committee made up of public officials and experts to study the existing legislation and make recommendations about amendments which seemed advisable to them.

● (1510)

The current bankruptcy legislation dates back to 1949 and is in fact based on our 1919 legislation which in turn stemmed from the English statute of the last century. Of course the act of 1949 was amended to a certain extent in 1966. Those amendments were then made to fill an urgent and specific need, but an in-depth revamping of the bankruptcy legislation was postponed to a later date. That in-depth revamping is the object of this bill. Five years ago, in May 1975, when I was Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs I introduced the first version of this bill. Far was it from me to imagine that five years down the road I would again be called upon to introduce another version of the same bill.

It is obvious, and this has to be said, that protracted parliamentary procedures—the impossibility of a quick passage through the House of those bills deemed urgent but not necessarily priority items—did not help the implementation and adoption of this bill. Since the House of Commons had been unable to undertake consideration of the first bill in 1975, at my request the Senate banking, trade and commerce committee made an exhaustive study of the substance of the bill. After a number of study sessions during which many organizations made their views known, the Senate committee published in December 1975 a report recommending changes to many provisions of this bill. In light of that report, the first bill was substantially amended so as to include most of the amendments suggested by the Senate committee. Since then the bill has been reintroduced in the Senate, each time practically unchanged.

There was Bill S-11 in March 1978, Bill S-14 in February 1979, and Bill S-9 in November 1979, this time introduced by the minister of justice of the former government. The bill now before the House is identical to Bill S-9 of the last session that was brought in by the minister of justice in the Conservative government. It goes without saying that the act must meet the needs of the day, otherwise it is an inadequate tool that does not meet the objectives it was assigned or meets them inadequately. I need not insist on the fact that today's world of business and credit is not that of yesteryear and that, as a consequence, the Bankruptcy Act, as we now know it, was meant for days gone by, that it is not the instrument we need today to settle financial failures or regulate the rights and duties of the various parties involved. Let us remember merely that the credit traditionally limited to the world of business and used by the ordinary citizen almost exclusively for the purchase of his home has now become commonplace for almost every citizen and to meet all sorts of needs, I would even say all sorts of whims on the part of the consumer. Consumer credit alone has shot up from $835 million in 1947 to almost $40 billion today.

It is no surprise then that in the face of that real credit explosion, the Bankruptcy Act should be resorted to increasingly and that it should become that much more imperative and necessary to bring it up to date. Any legislation on bankruptcy attempts to reconcile interests that are divergent by definition. It endeavours, on the one hand, to help the insolvent debtor or the overindebted find a way out of his financial difficulties. On the other hand, it seeks to protect, as it must, the interests of the creditors as equitably as possible, whose interests are contrary not only to those of the debtor but also to each other. Essentially, then, it is a special legislation with regard to normal legal relations between borrowers and lenders that provides for readjustments in legal relations between debtors and creditors. Those legal relations then are the ones this bill attempts to redefine more fairly and equitably in a context that is extremely different from the one in which the original act was passed many years ago.

I certainly cannot deny that this is a voluminous bill. It contains 420 clauses. In fact, it is a separate code which will contain, after future regulations are incorporated into it, all the provisions dealing with bankruptcy and insolvency. The first of the bill which I would like to underline is the distinction it makes between the way to deal with the ordinary consumer who is crippled with debts and the way to deal with business situations. Until now, there was no such distinction under the legislation except that a summary proceeding was allowed for small bankruptcies where the assets involved did not exceed $500. Under the proposed legislation, there would be two separate systems, depending on whether or not we were dealing with the insolvency of a consumer, which would allow us to deal adequately with two entirely different situations, the protection required in a commercial bankruptcy being different from what is required in a personal insolvency. I believe this is quite important because a very clear distinction will be made based on whether a consumer is involved or whether it is a company in financial straits.

Another aspect of the bill which I would like to draw to your attention is that it gives preference to arrangements over ordinary bankruptcies. Especially in the case of consumer bankruptcies, we prefer that an arrangement be made, whenever it is possible, rather than resorting to bankruptcy which, no matter what, is simply a confirmation of failure with all its implications. The proposed legislation contains twelve parts of different length, of course, but of equal importance. I would like briefly to deal with each one of these parts. Part I contains a great many definitions which serve to clearly establish the scope of the legislation and to standardize some legal concepts. It establishes the prevailing importance of the act over any other act in cases of insolvency. Part II of the proposed legislation, which deals with the administration of the bill, establishes the administrative structure required for the implementation of such an act. The office of Superintendent of Bankruptcy, which has existed since 1932, will continue to do so, and will issue the licences to act as trustees to those persons who have the required qualifications. I would also like to mention that this Part contains provisions on conflicts of interest which constitute a code of ethics for trustees and inspectors.

Part III deals with arrangements for consumers. By definition, a consumer debtor is an individual who is insolvent, who may or may not be a businessman and whose debts, excluding a mortgage on his residence, do not exceed $20,000 or any other amount that may be prescribed in the future by regulation. This part establishes a simple and accessible system which would allow an individual who is burdened with debts to reach an arrangement with his creditors stating which portion of his debts he will repay. The next part deals with commercial arrangements. It consolidates the various procedures which are now found in many acts. The present bill is flexible in the sense that it allows a corporation which is in financial trouble but which is viable and worthy of being saved to file a proposed arrangement as circumstances allow.

The most remarkable change and undoubtedly the most interesting clause of the bill is the one which makes it possible for a debtor to file a notice of intention. Debtors more often than not do not think about submitting a proposal to their creditors when they are about to go bankrupt. We suggest that the debtor who is in trouble has neither the time nor the peace of mind needed to carefully work out a proposal likely to prove viable and acceptable to his creditors. That is why we have developed this concept of a notice of intention to file an arrangement. Under this clause, upon submission of a notice of intention to file an arrangement, there will be a 10-day stay of proceedings against the debtor, who will then have the respite he needs to draw up an arrangement at leisure. Another aspect of the commercial arrangements I should like to deal with is the new right which the courts enjoy to file a proposed arrangement where the debts of a corporation exceed one million dollars and where the proposed arrangement filed in respect of a debtor has not been accepted. As far as I know, the purpose of this clause is to do the utmost to save a corporation the folding of which could prove fatal to a community, a given area, a village or a town, if it is humanly possible to save it.

I admit that it is sometimes impossible and often economically undesirable to try to rehabilitate a corporation which is in trouble. Part V, I should say, deals with bankruptcy proper. I must say that we have seriously reconsidered the concept of bankruptcy, that we have maintained several elements which have proved useful in the past, but that we have brought about many changes. We are trying to set up a system which will be consistent, self-contained and suited to the needs of today. All bankruptcy proceedings will begin with the filing of a petition either by the debtor himself if the bankruptcy is voluntary (which will replace the current voluntary assignment) or by one or more creditors if the bankruptcy is not voluntary (which will replace the current petition for receiving order). In the case of voluntary bankruptcy, the debtor's insolvency is the sole condition. Where it is not voluntary, the existence of admissible debts of at least $1,000 will have to be established.

When the petition is filed, all proceedings against the debtor by ordinary creditors are stayed and when the bankruptcy order has been made by the court, the exercise of the rights of secured creditors against the property of the debtor subject to the security interest is deferred for a period which may extend up to 40 days from the date of the bankruptcy order, depending on the date of the first meeting of creditors. However, the secured creditor can take the required remedies to protect his security. I have already noted that the bill aims at simplifying proceedings for the consumer. Part V of the bill includes section 163 that spells out special provisions for small consumer bankruptcies which exclude several proceedings required in a business context, but which are completely useless or at least unproductive in the case of a consumer, without, I repeat, depriving the creditors of their right to control the administration of the bankruptcy.

I would now like to say a few words about the effects of a bankruptcy on the directors and the officers of a corporation under this bill. The first effect is to declare the bankrupt unable to be a director or an officer of a corporation. The second is to make the directors and officers personally responsible for the debts of the corporation if its unsolvency was caused or aggravated by them or if they have mingled the property of the corporation with their own. The third effect is to make the directors jointly and severally responsible to employees of the corporation for unpaid wages at the time of the bankruptcy up to a maximum of $2,000 per employee, except if they establish their good faith. Finally, this part of the bill deals with the setting aside and review of certains transfers, whether they are entered into by persons who are or who are not at arm's length. In this area, the bill extends the application of the present legislation and promotes the fairest possible distribution of the debtor's property.

The next part, or Part VI of the bill, contains provisions applicable to arrangements and bankruptcy. The only provision in this part of the bill that I want to emphasize is the one which determines the order of priority held by each creditor in the distribution of the amounts produced when the bankrupt estates are realized. Except for funds collected on its behalf by a bankrupt, the Crown will become an ordinary creditor and will take its place among the other creditors and be paid at the same rate. This will increase the dividend of ordinary creditors, and we hope that it will prompt them to become more closely interested in the administration of bankruptcies.

I would like to revert to an aspect I mentioned briefly when I dealt with Part VI and which concerns the treatment given to unpaid workers. The first bill introduced in 1975 contained a provision which granted absolute priority for unpaid wages on all the property of the bankrupt employer, including that subject to a security interest held by a secured creditor. This was an exceptional provision which went against the traditional rights of secured creditors, as of course several pointed out, and which, according to many, went too far and would not necessarily bring about the desired results. That is why it was suggested during the hearings of the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce that the creation of a special fund to compensate wage earners for wage losses caused by the bankruptcy of their employer would provide a more effective, a more practical and even a fairer solution.

● (1530)

The provision creating the foremost priority of the wage earner was then removed from the second version of the bill introduced in March of 1978. The ministers who presented each successive version of this bill have all stated their intention to have the issue of the timeliness and the desirable provisions of such a special compensation fund considered. Unfortunately, up to very recently this has never been undertaken. Accordingly, in order to be able to choose the best way of protecting the worker at the lowest possible cost without interfering with the financing structures of private business, I have decided to set up an inquiry committee to consider all the aspects of the issue and to report to me as soon as possible. This committee is currently considering the matter. It is chaired by the Dean of the Faculty of Law of the University of Ottawa and its other members are Mr. George Hitchmen, Vice-President of the Bank of Nova-Scotia, Mr. Ronald Lang, Director of Research for the Canadian Labour Congress and Mr. Raymond Dufour, a former high official of the Ministry of Industry and Commerce of the province of Quebec.

This committee of four which is made up of supporters of practically all viewpoints will have to proceed with great dispatch and report to me on what should be the best procedure possible. They will be given the chance of thoroughly studying the advantages and disadvantages of creating a special fund as the Senate committee seemed to advocate. They will naturally have to study the impact of such a fund on the already existing policies and legislation in those provinces which are concerned by this issue. I therefore expect to get that report this summer, by the end of June or early July. Then I will naturally be in a position to deal with the issue of the protection to be given to salaried workers in bankruptcy cases, an issue which I know is of some concern to members on both sides of the House and which, I hope, will find a solution before this bill gets through the third reading stage.

I think that this bill ought to be referred to the committee very shortly so that consideration of its 420 clauses may be undertaken and some progress accomplished so that we may benefit from the findings of this committee before proceeding with its final stage. At any rate, I think that the committee members who will study the bill in detail, clause by clause, will want to call Dean Landry before the committee in order to hear his opinion, his suggestions, when we come to the clauses dealing specifically with wage earners who are not paid in the event of a bankruptcy.

I have just skimmed through the bill. In conclusion, I would like to say this: Parts VII and VIII of the bill specify the rules to be followed when securities firms or insurance companies go bankrupt. They were developed in close co-operation with experts in that field, and we have retained all the suggestions, all the recommendations they made in order to improve the present bill. Part IX deals with receiverships. The bill does not intend to restrain unduly the exercise of the rights of a secured creditor or of a trustee, but in cases of insolvency, it aims at subjecting them to a minimum of requirements to ensure that the rights of subordinate creditors are protected.

The three last parts of the bill deal with offences, the courts and evidence, and the transitional period from one act to the other. Mr. Speaker, I have given a brief overview of a bill that I will admit is very technical, but also very important. It is an attempt to reconcile interests that are not only different but conflicting. It does so as fairly as possible in my view. It is the result of endless hours of consultations and discussions with people associated with bankruptcies. Although not perfect, I am convinced it is as perfect as can be in the circumstances.

I commend this bill to the co-operation and support of honourable members from both sides of the House, so it may pass second reading and be referred as soon as possible to a standing committee, where honourable members can examine every aspect of the legislation and make a more detailed study of its various provisions. It is my hope the opposition will resist the temptation to score political points with the bill. This is a legal matter and it should be treated as such. It is not an economic matter at all and should not be related to the current economic conditions, I am aware that it would be easy to try to link consideration of the Bankruptcy Act with today's economic problems, but I suggest to hon. members opposite that the Canadian economic situation will not be solved by the Bankruptcy Act or any amendments to it. What we have before us is not an economic matter but a legal matter and it is my hope that those who speak after me will keep this in mind, and will postpone their criticism of the government's economic performance until some other time.

I believe that bankruptcies are one of this century's evils that in some respects may result from inflation. This bill however will not solve the problems of inflation. Indeed, it has nothing to do with today's inflation. The updating of the Bankruptcy Act is desired, it is called for by all parties concerned with bankruptcy, the administration of bankruptcies and legal matters pertaining to bankruptcy because amendments have long been overdue. And Canadian Parliament finally has an opportunity to study the act in the House of Commons; it has been amply studied in the Senate, in the other place, but finally it is considered here in Parliament and it is my hope that the discussion will indeed deal with legal matters rather than endlessly delving upon economic considerations. We must act expeditiously to send the bill to the committee of the House, where it will be scrutinized clause by clause so that finally we may have a modern Bankruptcy Act in Canada as early as next summer, the summer of 1981.

[English]

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my remarks, I cannot help but comment that the persistently impoverished economic performance of this government should compel us all to act promptly with respect to this prospective legislation, as a record number of Canadian businesses and individuals within the next few weeks or months will be seeking the relief contained in this bill.

The bill before us today is, in fact, a culmination of more than 15 years of hard work with respect to our insolvency laws. It is necessary that we modernize commercial practices in terms of bankruptcy legislation. We must balance the priority of creditors. It is important that we streamline the administration of insolvency and bankruptcy legislation. It is important, also, that we correct the defects that exist in the present legislation.

● (1540)

The bill before us today has many excellent features and they are welcomed. Unfortunately, there still exist important aspects of the legislation which are totally unsatisfactory, such as the priority given to wage earners in a bankrupt estate and which must be rectified. I will have further comments with respect to this later in my remarks.

Bankruptcy is but one aspect of business failure. In addition, many companies that cannot meet their liabilities as they come due are put into receivership by their creditors. Still other companies exist as living corpses, unable to survive and they have to close their doors. I believe that it is important to recognize that in a free market economy there will always be failure; the weak and the inefficient will be weeded out.

What is of concern to me and to other members on this side of the House are the unnecessary business failures caused by the inept and ruinous economic policies of this government which crush the spirit of small businessmen, farmers and others who have a sense of commercial enterprise. I am not talking about the failures caused by management shortcomings or by overexpansion of a business or by fraud within a company; I am talking about the failures caused by high interest rates. In terms of today's rates, we formerly thought of these as being extortionary or unconscionable. I am talking about the inability of this government to create an economic environment which is conducive to investment and to commercial risk.

On the one hand, we have a Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) who tells the people of Canada that high interest rates are necessary in order to dampen consumer spending, while on the other hand his government has been the most profligate of all, consistently running up deficits, the accumulation of which has been the major source of inflationary difficulties in this country.

I think the Minister of Finance should make it clear to the people of Canada, while he tells them to curtail their consumer spending habits, that this government has borrowed money on their behalf. We now have a gross national debt of $122 billion, of which each taxpayer's share is $13,700. If countries were run like companies and if individuals managed their finances in this way, you could bet your bottom dollar that this government would have been petitioned into bankruptcy a long time ago.

In my view, one of the problems with the economy is that we have a Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and a Minister of Finance neither of whom have any expertise in, or concept of, what it means to take a commercial risk. Neither has a tittle of personal knowledge of what it means to borrow in order to create and build a company or to take a mortgage in order to purchase a home. They have not chosen to build a business or had to mortgage a home, so it is small wonder that they are impervious to the anxieties of those who are on the edge of business failure caused by high interest rates, or to the frustration and concern of the man and wife who have to walk away from their home because they cannot afford to pay the interest on their mortgage, which has soared from 9 per cent or 10 per cent to 18 per cent in recent months.

Consumer and commercial bankruptcies are on the rise and, as and when this incredibly high interest rate is further absorbed into the economy within the next few months, we will see a toll of failures and tragedies such as we have not witnessed since the days of the depression.

Attitudes toward bankruptcies have changed dramatically in the last two decades, as is demonstrated by the record rate of increase in bankruptcies between 1960 and 1980. They have increased by a whopping 758 per cent. I wish to say more about the actual number of personal and commercial bankruptcies in a few moments, Mr. Speaker.

The point I want to make now is that the economic and social stigma formerly attached to bankruptcy has all but vanished. Formerly the disgrace of bankruptcy, more than the legal sanctions, kept many people from declaring bankruptcy. It is not only individual or consumer attitudes which have changed with respect to matters of insolvency; the credit system in particular, the explosive use of consumer credit in the past 20 years, has made possible the immediate purchase of goods through the instalment payment plan. By contrast, in 1960 the average consumer debt of every, man, woman and child was $224; in 1980 it stands at $1,532 per capita. The relaxation by government of laws insisting on minimum amounts of down payment and restricting the period of time over which the debt could be financed have contributed to this phenomenon.

It is also important to have a proper appreciation of how commercial lending habits have changed significantly during the past 15 years. Formerly, when a businessman went to a bank for the purpose of starting a business, as security for the debt the bank would take an assignment of the accounts receivable and a pledge with respect to the inventory of the business pursuant to Section 88 of the Bank Act. It was only when default occurred on the loan that the bank was permitted by law to require further security. In many instances the debtor would be unwilling to pledge, for example, his machinery or his land.

As a result of the amendments to the Bank Act in the mid-sixties, banks are now permitted to take as security floating charge debentures which effectively form a charge on all the assets of a person's business. The commercial institutions own the debtor lock, stock and barrel. The real change is that when the banks call a loan and realize upon their security, they send in a receiver pursuant to the provisions of the debenture. Although the banks still take Section 88 security, common practice is that they realize under the terms of the debenture. That is an important point.

This has two practical effects. First, under the Section 88 security, banks are compelled by law to pay the wages of those who earned the wages. Under the floating charge debenture, there is no such obligation. Though it is the normal practice of banks to pay wages as a matter of policy, there are in some circumstances mutterings by persons who hold second or third charges behind the banks that the banks are spending their money.

The second consequence of the banks or other lenders realizing upon their security is that there is virtually no control over the duties and rights of the receiver. In a bankruptcy, a secured creditor is virtually untouched with respect to his legal rights. Although there is presently in the existing legislation the power of a trustee to request a stay of proceedings and the right to inspect goods, practice has demonstrated that the legislation is woefully inadequate in protecting the rights of both unsecured creditors and the debtor himself.

One of the most important aspects, in my view, of the bill is the provision delaying the ability of the secured creditor from realizing upon his security for a period of from ten to 40 days, depending upon the circumstances, so as to give the trustee an opportunity to inspect the goods, ascertain their value and decide whether or not he wishes to redeem the debt. What this prevents is receivers selling the security for bargain basement prices without some type of accounting to the unsecured creditor. The new bill further provides for the trustee to make a summary application as to the fees and disbursements of the receiver. This gives the trustee some practical control over the exorbitant charges that can be and are made in some circumstances. These provisions are important and are welcomed.

On the other hand, the treatment of wage earners in circumstances of a bankruptcy remains, under this bill, virtually unchanged. The wage earner is still a preferred creditor and ranks behind secured creditors and the cost involved in paying a trustee to administer a bankrupt estate. I am aware that under the proposed legislation a wage earner is now eligible to collect, if he can, a maximum of $2,000 instead of $500, and I am also cognizant of his ability potentially to collect up to $500 in pension contributions. Furthermore, there exists the right to sue directors for back wages. However, in my view, his position is inadequately protected. The history of the Bankruptcy Act has always been weighted in favour of the secured creditor. I believe that a much higher priority must be given to the man or woman who has earned wages at the time that insolvency occurs.

The minister will argue that the right to sue a director for wages is an important new right, but I point out to the minister that similar and even more onerous provisions already exist both in the Canada Business Corporations Act and most provincial business corporations acts. The point is that they are very rarely used. When the doors of a business are shut as a result of either receivership or bankruptcy, an employee wants and needs his wages then. He does not want to engage in costly litigation over a protracted period of time and where the chance of success is problematical, to put it at its highest standard.

Another method which is presently being considered and which has been under active consideration is the notion of establishing a wage earners protection act whereby both the employer and employee might contribute to the bankruptcy fund held by the government. I must say that I reject this method on a number of grounds. First, I am frightened by the prospect of the cost and the administration which would be necessary to make such a scheme viable. Second, it is foreign to me to imagine an employee contributing from his weekly or bi-weekly pay cheque to insure himself against the potential bankruptcy of his employer. I do not want to see any further creation of another layer of bureaucracy to administer such an insurance scheme.

Finally, what we could do is to give a real priority to the wage earner over the rights of the secured creditor. I know it will be argued that by doing so the banks will increase the cost of borrowing to the small businessman, and there is a fear, in some circumstances, that banks may not ever advance the money at all. However, I remind members that in every province west of the Ontario border there exists today a super priority legislation to protect the wage earner over the secured creditor. I do not believe that the cost of loans has been significantly affected in the western provinces. I believe the appropriate method is to take the suggestion of the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants that such wages be paid out of current assets of an insolvent estate not out of the machinery or land. Banks and commercial lenders have had the law weighted in their favour too long. Now is the time, in my view, to provide increased fairness to the wage earner specifically, and to unsecured creditors generally.

I want to direct some remarks to the new area called consumer arrangement. The bill contains provisions for the establishment of a government administrator whereby an individual whose liabilities are not in excess of $20,000 can make a proposal to creditors. This is a method designed to permit a debtor to pay a portion of his liabilities without going bankrupt, at the same time ensuring that his creditors receive more than they would under a bankruptcy.

There are some attractive features to this concept. There is no need to hire a private trustee. There are streamlining provisions to do away with mandatory meetings with creditors and there are further provisions for bankruptcy in the event of a three-month default in the payment of moneys called for under the arrangement. The intention is good because the cost of bankruptcy has long been a serious concern to all of us in the House.

However, I suspect that when these provisions become well known and are publicized there will be an enormous flood of applications seeking this type of relief. The question which I pose to the minister today is whether or not there have been effective consultations with the provinces to administer such a scheme. My information, certainly as it relates to my province, is that there has been no agreement between this government and the province. More importantly, if my suspicion is correct, what is the cost going to be to administer such a scheme?

All of us in the House hope that this bill will reduce the cost of legal fees and administration fees in commercial bankruptcies. As it exists, trustees will not move in areas which are legally unknown; they seek the opinion of a solicitor or the advice of a court. But this need for their own protection, for legal opinions or the views of the court eats into the moneys that might be available to the unsecured creditor. One of the problems of the present act under which we now operate is that it is silent in so many areas. This new bill, with all of its 424 clauses, at least simplifies and gives direction to both trustees and claimants alike.

I am pleased to see the streamlining of administration which again avoids costs. For example, the provision that a discharge is automatic after six months, save where a caveat might be filed by an administrator, is an excellent feature of this bill. The legal costs of making a formal application for discharge, which is almost automatically granted except in circumstances of fraud, are thereby avoided.

I must say that since 1967 most of the major insolvencies are not by way of bankruptcy, they are by way of receivership. Therefore, I am glad to see that under the new bill some statistics will be kept with respect to the number of business failures. It is important to understand that in all cases the superintendent of bankruptcy does not have the power to compile statistics with respect to receiverships. In view of the fact that most major insolvencies, such as Atlantic Acceptance and the Come-by-Chance insolvency in Newfoundland, are by way of receivership, it is important that we know how many business failures exist. I welcome the feature that statistics in this regard will be kept by the minister's office.

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, the bankruptcy bill before us, as the minister has outlined, has had a very long history in this House. His presentation today indicated that this legislation was largely a housekeeping measure of putting a bill in place which had been under consideration for some long period of time and that it is really an amalgamation of old legislation and hopefully new procedures. The minister was very careful in his admonition to the opposition not to make this bill political or relate politics to this legislation. However, I submit that the situation with bankruptcy is political. There are other ways to examine this bill and maybe the issue of politics or making a decision by a group of people in public is the proper way to examine it.

There are two sides to this bill. The first side is housekeeping. My colleague who preceded me did an excellent job of pointing out certain strengths and weaknesses in this technical piece of legislation. The second side is important because it concerns the victims of bankruptcy.

I listened to the minister answer a question in the House today concerning the long-term causes of bankruptcy. He said that food in Canada, although extremely expensive and people are having difficulty coping, is much cheaper than in other places in the world where such things as starvation and infant mortality reign free. But the question is, how do the policies which this government is putting forward impinge on this legislation? I suggest that in bringing this bill forward at this point in time the minister and the government have their priorities crossed. For a long time this House has been asking for something that will deal with the causes of bankruptcy. We should not be doing an autopsy after the fact. The hon. member who preceded me and the other opposition party have pointed that out already.

This bill should probably be withdrawn immediately and the government should be dealing with the causes of bankruptcy. What we have before us is a piece of legislation which will deal with a situation which is largely being created by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and the government, as the hon. member who preceded me has already pointed out. The Minister of Finance put forward to us an economic scenario showing the number of people who are suffering as a result of the economic situation. I want to delve into this for just a moment. It is a Catch-22 situation. The minister said the government recognized that interest rates are causing hardship and great difficulty but that the long-term benefit of high interest rates would be to bring down prices. However, they certainly are not doing that. Prices in this country are not coming down. The cost of goods and credit is being driven up higher and higher. The Catch-22 which the Minister of Finance set up was essentially put up for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) in this bill. The high interest rate policy and the economic policies of this government will not bring down prices; they will increase prices and will continue to increase bankruptcies. It is amazing what this kind of logic creates. You can go back to the Irish potato famine which was a product of this kind of logic. I suggest to the minister we are not playing politics in this situation; we are asking for some basic common sense.

● (1600)

The government perceives this bill as a priority. It is not a priority; it is the conditions which create bankruptcies which are a priority of this House and the Canadian people. I suggest it is the government that is creating the bankruptcies. They should be looking at an economic policy which will prevent them, rather than put this legislation before the House at this time in an attempt to deal with the victims of bankruptcy.

There is one other aspect. Before we begin to look at a piece of bankruptcy legislation and resolve the problems for those involved, this government should be developing an interest rate policy more in keeping with the needs of the people of this country. If the minister had any sense of priority about what is important in our economy—and Lord knows who made the decision to throw him into the breach and spend time on this bill—he would be bringing forward the competition legislation which has been promised since time immemorial. When the first competition bill came out in 1971, there was a commitment that we would deal with it in the spring. Now we are waiting for the fall and we will wait on and on.

One of the key problems in bankruptcies is the amount of corporate concentration in Canada. How does a small businessman compete against corporate supply control, market control and various other controls? We know the names of the individuals involved.

The hon. member who preceded me spoke about the increasing number of bankruptcies. This is because we have lost the environment for small business, with individuals being able to function in a free economy. This government has created a situation where there is a lack of competition. More and more businesses are being forced into receivership and bankruptcy. They are closing their doors and saying they cannot compete against the Thomsons and Southams and the kinds of corporate control we have in this economy. If the minister had any real sense of priority, instead of the Bankruptcy Act we would be dealing with competition legislation today.

The Bankruptcy Act is an important piece of legislation. It cleans up a lot of problems and expedites bankruptcy procedure. I wonder whether we are trying to deal with a principle or a priority?

With regard to the question of rising interest rates, it was mentioned in the House today that last year 14,000 people gave up their homes. Will there be another 14,000 giving up their homes this year because they have run into great difficulty? The minister should be dealing with the exorbitant credit charges which are causing bankruptcies. People are literally shutting down because this economy has put them under.

It is strange that the minister would today ask us not to play politics with this legislation considering the delays and sheer incompetence of this government in dealing with the real problems facing Canadians today. Those are the problems we should be dealing with. I would like the minister to explain to us why we have this bankruptcy legislation before us today. In our opinion, this bill is not a priority. Great relief would be expressed if the minister would withdraw this bill and submit legislation or policies to deal effectively with the problems facing Canadians today.

I next want to deal with the prevention of bankruptcies. Nowhere in the bill is the question of prevention of bankruptcies dealt with. In 1960 there were 1,000 personal bankruptcies. In 1980 there were 21,025. That does not include all the people teetering on the edge, those people who will go down when the interest rate goes up on Thursday as a result of following the American plan.

The number of bankruptcies is increasing dramatically. In 1980, 6,600 Canadian businesses folded up because of bankruptcy. That figure does not include receiverships and all the rest. They left behind debts totalling roughly $1.2 billion. Price Waterhouse estimated that the loss to Canadians last year was between $5 billion and $10 billion. Neither the policies developed by the Canadian government nor the provisions in this bill deal with the whole question of prevention. There is a serious lack of logic in that approach.

It may be worth while to move on to another question and deal with some of the main problems. One of our most serious concerns is the matter of workers' wages. Possibly this legislation was put before us to fill an embarrassing gap in time rather than deal with something more productive. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has left, the Minister of Finance has left, and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is left holding the bag, so he threw in this piece of bankruptcy legislation.

I wonder why the minister brought this bill forward before it was rounded out and developed. The committee studying workers' wages has not even prepared an interim report. It is an ongoing committee. How can the minister place this legislation before the House when it does not even address the wages, benefits and pensions of workers? How can he bring the bill forward for second reading without dealing with that question? The government assumes they will have an interim report by this summer. The summer is virtually upon us. I suspect we will be looking at a recommendation in the fall.

Why are we dealing with this bill before that important point has been resolved? With the nature of the economy and the continuing high number of bankruptcies, Canadian workers will be put in a tremendously difficult situation. Before bringing forward this bill, the minister should have had something to offer the people of Canada in the form of protection. The responsibility for the increase in bankruptcies will be laid directly at the doorstep of the government. Increased bankruptcies will come about as a direct result of the government's high interest rate policies and the fact that the government has failed to bring forward competition legislation. This country does not have an industrial strategy which emphasizes support for Canadians. Because of that, Canadian workers and businesses will end up holding the bag.

I suggest to the minister that, rather than finish this exercise on Wednesday, he hold off to see what further developments there will be. Possibly the minister could bring forward meaningful suggestions to the House of Commons about how we could deal with the question of bankruptcy, or he could urge his cabinet colleagues to do that. He could await the report of the committee which is studying the whole question of the priority of workers' wages.

● (1610)

Last week in the House we had a substantial debate on economic affairs in which the policies of the government were soundly criticized. The Minister of Finance, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and all hon. members opposite support programs leading to bankruptcies and weaknesses in the Canadian economy, yet on Friday the Prime Minister of Canada said at his press conference that in reality he did not think the high interest rate program is working. As a matter of fact, it appears that the government is not really committed to dealing with the problem of people going bankrupt or the problems of the workers affected. How did we get into this position in the first place? Is the Prime Minister putting us on again as he did in 1975 with respect to the AIB? For three years the country was in absolute chaos, and then the Prime Minister finally came forward and said, "Sorry, friends, it was a good try, but it is not really working," and everyone said, "We told you so."

The economic policies of the government today are creating a large number of bankruptcies. If this bill ever goes through, it will be relied on to a very large extent. Even the Prime Minister thinks his high interest rate policy is not working. When will we give up and change the situation? When we will begin to adopt proper priorities in this House? When will we look to the prevention of bankruptcy and the protection of people who suffer most from it? I refer to families and working people whose wages, pensions and benefits accumulated over time and from long service are lost. Those services to companies and also to this country are rewarded by this government's leaving those people out to dry.

Another thing about which people have written is the ease of bankruptcy. Let us consider the plight of small credit unions when several people in a small community go bankrupt. Let us use the example of the community of Alert Bay. The big banks left there in a hurry because they could see what was happening during the fishing season, largely because of bad government management. Fishing activity was down and people's incomes were down. When several people go bankrupt, the only ones willing to serve communities financially are small credit unions. When people go bankrupt and leave debts and when there is no hope of returning the money to the community, credit unions suffer tremendously. They are not in the position of many of the larger institutions. On one day a fishing boat can be taken for collateral, but because of the market, the fishing industry and the way the government handles matters, the value of that boat can drop to virtually nothing the next day. Small credit unions are very seriously concerned about the ease with which people can go bankrupt. They are concerned about the loss of the funds they lend in good faith.

There is one other matter which concerns me. I have asked the minister about what he is doing to control credit. When people go into the Sears store, they are not asked to pay cash; people are encouraged to use credit. Gas companies and retail stores encourage people to use credit rather than pay cash or restrain purchases. Tremendous pressure is placed on people. People are being overburdened with charge cards, yet interest rates are jacked up from 18 per cent to 21 per cent and then to 24 per cent. This encouragement to use credit still goes on. It almost becomes a way of life.

The minister is not interested in controlling credit and exorbitant gouging which persistently goes along with it, to the point where people go under. They go bankrupt. The minister and the government appear to want to control credit by means of bankruptcy. If people can declare personal bankruptcy easily and speedily, that will affect the economy and will not restrain the desire for credit. I submit that that is probably the wrong way to proceed. What we should really be doing is finding means of prevention, getting our priorities straight and looking seriously at controlling the tremendous blossoming of credit. According to the figures used by my colleague previously, over the last decade and a half the amount of debt has grown from roughly $200 to $1,500 per family. The amount of debt carried is enormous, and as high interest rates continue and as more people renew mortgages at these high rates, this will put many people under.

I know speakers from the prairies will deal with the small business proposals, but we nevertheless must protect small businesses from bankruptcy. We must deal with prevention. Not too long ago a group of farmers in Saskatchewan purchased some equipment in good faith from a dealer. When the dealer went broke, it was discovered that the farmers did not make their payments to the appropriate party. The farmers either had to pay twice for their equipment, turn the equipment back or, in some cases, close their doors and quit farming. That was a very serious situation. Small businesses will have to be protected from a government which seems determined that the easiest way to control inflation is by placing an enormous burden on Canadians and Canadian businesses.

There are three main areas of concern with respect to this legislation. One is the protection of employees' wages. If the minister had waited for that provision, the anxiety of many of us with respect to this bill might have been eased. This bill might have had a chance of going to the committee fairly soon. If the minister had dealt with the question of the ease of bankruptcy and its effect on small communities and if he had dealt with other subsidiary problems communities have, then perhaps the bill could have gone to the committee sooner. If some attention had been given to the question of protecting small businesses from government policies, perhaps the bill could have gone to the committee much more rapidly.

I suggest, in summary, that putting this bill before us today was a political decision of the government. It was a callous, calculated decision of the government. Hon. members opposite did not want to talk about the matters which were raised last week in this House. Those matters are of serious concern to Canadians who live out there in the real world. This government has talked about the Constitution and anything but the real, gut issues affecting the people. The government has avoided dealing with the prospect that more bankruptcies will occur this year. I suggest that the bringing forward of this bill was a calculated, political manoeuvre in order to avoid dealing with the issues that are important to us. This bill is premature and ill-conceived.

The second priority should be the prevention of bankruptcies. An enormous number of people will have to renew their mortgages this year. Instead of renewing at 10¼ per cent, they will be renewing at 18 per cent, or perhaps 19 per cent or 20 per cent, who knows? Certainly the government does not know.

What will that do with respect to personal bankruptcy? Small businessmen are now trying to operate at interest rates of 19 per cent and 20 per cent on their revolving credit. What will that do with respect to summer employment? We have a very serious problem. The priority should be prevention of bankruptcies, and we should be dealing with the key problems.

Other people will be speaking about this in the House today, tomorrow and the following days while this bill is before us for discussion and about other bills we may be considering while the government fills the gap before talking about the real issues.

I see that my time has almost expired, Mr. Speaker, so I will allow someone else to speak at this point.

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I thought the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Evans) was going to give us his words of wisdom at this point.

Mr. Evans: You could certainly use them.

Mr. Andre: I share the feelings of the hon. member of the New Democratic Party who expressed surprise and anger at the bringing forward of Bill C-12 at this particular time, given the state of the economy in Canada. I differ with the hon. member, however, when he suggests that the government should withdraw it. Goodness knows, if they are not going to do anything about the deplorable economic situation these incredible interest rates are going to cause, then perhaps doing something to cushion the fall for those victims of the system is marginally better than doing nothing. In fact, Mr. Speaker, the timing of this particular bill is almost a cruel joke.

● (1620)

Last Thursday many of us here were visited by about 125 businessmen from the energy service industries of Alberta and Saskatchewan who came to Ottawa to try and explain to the government and members of Parliament the difficulties they were having maintaining and sustaining their companies in view of the impact of the National Energy Program. The feeling among the 125 different companies represented in this delegation was that if this program is not amended drastically within six months, 50 per cent of them would be out of business. Within a year, 75 per cent would be out of business and perhaps bankrupt as a result of this government's energy policy.

So what we have, Mr. Speaker, is some very concerned Canadian businessmen, in most cases proprietors of their own firms, small and medium-size firms in the energy service industry, coming to Ottawa and saying: "Look, stop what you are doing, you are driving me into bankruptcy; I have to lay off employees now". On average, those firms had already laid off 25 per cent of their employees. They said: "Unless you do something, unless you straighten out your act in regard to energy policy, we will be out of business and bankrupt in six months". The response of the government is to bring in amendments to the Bankruptcy Act to make it easier for them to go bankrupt, rather than looking at the root of the problem. Indeed, in today's question period the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. MacLaren) still denied the problem exists, which is the most insane form of myopia that we have seen from this government for some time.

According to a document issued by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the background paper on the bankruptcy and insolvency bill, during the 1970s the number of bankruptcies in Canada, essentially static, commercial bankruptcies, was around 5,000 a year. This represented the number of companies which, perhaps for reasons of poor management or too fast growth, or perhaps due to circumstances beyond their control, went out of business.

In the last three years that situation has changed dramatically. In 1980, for example, there were 6,595 commercial bankruptcies, up 17 per cent over the 5,600 in 1979. In the first quarter of 1981 bankruptcies are up 20 per cent over the comparable period in 1980. This is tremendous growth. Indeed, the only thing growing in the economy today seems to be the jobs of accountants and lawyers specializing in bankruptcies; they experienced a 17 per cent growth last year and 20 per cent so far this year, and we have seen nothing yet compared to what is coming unless something dramatic is done, and done very soon, about interest rates.

Clearly the number of commercial bankruptcies this year will be well in excess of 8,000, more likely 10,000, and yet as the spokesman for the New Democratic Party pointed out the reaction of the government is to say to the people, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said the other day: "But you are way better off; you are 50 per cent better off than you were ten years ago." Now, I am sure that is a lot of comfort to the 8,000 or 10,000 businesses that will be going bankrupt this year, not to mention the employees who will lose their jobs as a result and the creditors who will not receive the money owed them. In fact, the only ones who will be cheering are lawyers and accountants specializing in bankruptcy.

As an aside, Mr. Speaker, I would like to see some political scientist do an estimate of the impact of our activities in this House, because I figured out that I spend about 50 per cent of my time here making work for lawyers and accountants. I sure wish we could change that a little bit and perhaps spend some part of our time creating opportunities for Canadians, making life better for them rather than making work for lawyers and accountants.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, the human costs of bankruptcy are incalculable. As my colleague the hon. member for Cambridge (Mr. Speyer) pointed out, there is no question there has been attitudinal changes occurring in our society over the last few years whereby the stigma attached to bankruptcy perhaps is not what it used to be. We no longer have debtors prisons. Nonetheless, the stigma is still there and it affects those who should least be affected.

Granted, because of changes in our society there are people who in the normal course of conducting their personal affairs are not perhaps as prudent as we might like, or as may have been the case in days gone by; but the thought of going bankrupt is not greatly feared, and many people do indeed declare bankruptcy on a personal basis without losing a great deal of sleep over it and seem to start up again. However, to the prudent and responsible kind of person we would probably describe as the backbone of our country, bankruptcy represents a horrendous personal defeat. In many cases it represents loss of self-confidence and self-esteem, the costs of which are incalculable. It leads to family break up, in some cases to suicide and to all kinds of tragic human loss. As a nation we certainly cannot afford the loss of jobs and potential growth that will result from these commercial bankruptcies.

In addition, in the first quarter of this year there have been 75 farm bankruptcies. The cost of that to the country is inestimable. It is certainly tragic to have a government come forward and say: "Well, what we really have to do, people, is take a look at this Bankruptcy Act; we have to streamline it after 15 years. Do not worry, the question of the economy, of interest rates and business activity is not something we should discuss right now; we can do it another time." Well, we wonder when that other time will be, Mr. Speaker. We wonder when we will get some action out of the government with regard to the economy, and we wonder when the question of the causes of bankruptcy will be addressed in the way it should be.

I should emphasize, Mr. Speaker, that when I talk about bankruptcies I mean formal bankruptcies, not the insolvency that comes as a result of receivership which ends up leaving a financial corpse at the end. As the hon. member for Cambridge pointed out, the vast majority of business insolvencies is through receiverships, not bankruptcies, as a result primarily of the banks and other financial institutions imposing receiverships upon commercial enterprises through floating charge debentures which are now a standard part of the banking business. I will have a little more to say about that later, but in looking back I think the Parliament of Canada made a tragic mistake in its amendment of the Bank Act which allowed the banks to employ floating charge debentures as a method of financing business enterprises. The abuse in that area has been tremendous. While there are some steps in the proposed legislation to prevent perhaps some of the abuses which have occurred, I do not think they go far enough. In any case, we will want to examine that matter very closely at committee stage.

I read with interest the background paper on the bankruptcy and insolvency bill prepared by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. I noticed that the process started in 1966 with an internal study committee which perhaps put forward most of the proposals which are now incorporated in this bill, although they have been augmented and amended as a result of various studies of its earlier manifestations as Senate bills.

The study committee made one recommendation which was not accepted by the government, that is, the recommendation that the private sector trustees be replaced with public sector ones. I find myself in a bit of a quandary, not being a great fan or believer in the efficiency or effectiveness of government as opposed to that of the private sector in conducting business. I am concerned about the use of private sector trustees because there is very little incentive for efficient, effective and speedy performance by public trustees, whether in bankruptcy or in receivership. Private sector trustees are in the business of providing a service. They get paid when they provide the service. In most commercial cases the trustee is, in fact, a corporation which employs professionals such as lawyers and accountants for whom a per diem or a fee of anywhere from $75 to $200 an hour is necessary.

An hon. Member: To make it last.

Mr. Andre: Consequently, when they are assigned as trustees of an enterprise or an estate with significant resources, there is all the incentive in the world to make it last, as my colleague points out. There is an incentive to keep it going and to justify the $200 per hour fee for lawyers and accountants; it is a very lucrative business. I do not see any incentive in the proposed legislation for the trustees to do anything else but to sit there and collect fees. Ultimately the estate or enterprise is bled dry and runs out of resources, in which case there is no longer anyone to pay the fees and it is wound up very quickly. It is regrettable that we do not have firm data on this, but from the talk one hears from people on the street and those visiting constituency offices who have been victims of such situations, one gets the impression that many trusteeship situations are wound up precisely at the time the last dollar has gone.

In many situations, a speedy and efficient transaction of business at the initial stages of the insolvency could have resulted in there being left a viable entity, albeit diminished, to carry on business. It almost never happens, once a trustee becomes involved, that after a few weeks or months there is an ending of the trusteeship or receivership in a manner which leaves in place a viable, ongoing enterprise.

In the case of formal bankruptcy trusteeships, there is the provision of the supervisor of bankruptcy of the bankruptcy branch of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Also there is a licensing provision in regard to trustees. Presumably the supervisor can weed out incompetent trustees or keep an eye on their behaviour. At least he could listen to complaints and perhaps do something about them. As I pointed out, from the things I hear on the street it does not happen very often.

In the case of a receivership where a bank moves in by virtue of its floating charge debentures to seize the operations of a commercial enterprise, the incentive to ensure there is not a nickel left is overwhelming. The only recourse of the estate or a debtor for inefficient, ineffective or for that matter illegal or immoral behaviour, is through the civil courts by launching an action. Therefore, once a receiver gets his hands on an estate on behalf of a bank, it is in the interests of the bank and the receiver to ensure that nothing is left in order to provide the resources for launching a civil suit against the bank or the receiver by the proprietors, directors, owners or whoever had an interest in the estate.

I am not suggesting that this is the way it always happens or that every bank or receiver has that motive in mind, but I am suggesting that this is the incentive which is provided in the current situation. I think it is bad law to have a situation which provides such an incentive. Instead, we should be looking at law which provides an incentive for a receiver or trustee to be as efficient and effective as possible, to recover for the creditor the moneys owed as quickly and painlessly as possible, and to leave in place as much of the assets as possible for other creditors or perhaps to maintain an ongoing entity.

It is unfortunate that we do not have hard evidence in this regard, but I can relate at least one anecdote of a fellow who came into my constituency office to complain. The man was in the seismic business. He had a very substantial seismic operation, including offshore seismic equipment and a ship. He employed 30 or 40 people. He owed the bank a certain amount of money, as does anyone who is in business or in current operation. The bank had the loan secured under a floating charge debenture. In this case, again as a result of government policy changes, he had some contracts cancelled very quickly which left him in a liquidity crunch. The assets of his company exceeded his liabilities by a substantial amount, but the assets were tied up in a ship and in high-priced seismic equipment. He told me the banks demanded payment on a Friday. Obviously, on a Friday afternoon he could not raise any funds and later that afternoon he was in receivership. Within the month his equipment had been sold at fire sale prices. The bank recovered the funds owed to it and he was out of business. He saw his life's work and several million dollars blown out from beneath him. The purchaser of the equipment and the boat did very well, but that was of small comfort to my constituent.

I do not know whether this story typifies what happens to others, but according to the Canadian Federation of Independent Business this kind of situation happens more often than they would like to see. Apparently the federation's membership has experienced similar circumstances to the ones outlined by my constituent. I understand the federation is conducting a study of bankruptcies, and perhaps representatives of that organization will be appearing before the committee to offer their advice.

In any case, this legislation is welcome. As a result of it data will be collected on the different kinds of insolvencies so that we will know what costs are involved. We need to examine ways in which we can provide an incentive to trustees or receivers to act with some dispatch. Public declarations of the fees collected and declarations of the transactions involved in terms of the disposal of assets are two incentives which come to mind. Perhaps more cases should be allowed to go to arbitration. As matters stand now, the receiver really becomes God when he walks into a commercial establishment. Perhaps there should be a check on the receiver's behaviour by the creditors, the proprietors or the management with the possibility of some sort of arbitration to resolve matters, rather than the trustee or receiver having the last word at every stage. I do not know the answers, Mr. Speaker, but I do think there is a problem here which should be addressed. Complaints have been too widespread to dismiss them as lacking any substance.

I commend the proposed legislation in regard to its emphasis on the ability of a debtor to make arrangements, whether it is a consumer debtor or a commercial debtor. Without having any hard facts before me, it strikes me that the Americans, through their chapter 11, as they call it—which is basically a reorganization similar to the arrangement proposed in this legislation—seem to avoid major commercial bankruptcies in a way that heretofore we have not done. It seems to me that if the banks and financial intermediaries would agree to arrangements, as opposed to receivership, we would see fewer devastating ends to commercial enterprises, something which is becoming all too common.

We have been treated to several news programs on television of late showing that banks send trucks on to farms early in the morning to haul off the livestock to slaughtering plants. They have sold breeding stock for bacon at prices from ten to 50 times lower than its real value. Hopefully this kind of behaviour, which is permitted under the current legislation, will be curtailed through the use of the measure before us. The arrangements under the legislation before us will ensure that the banks get their money back, but it will also ensure that the debtor is not punished unduly.

The provisions in the proposed legislation vis-à-vis wages of employees is welcomed, although, as my hon. friend pointed out, we might well wish to strengthen this provision in committee. We believe that people who have earned salaries should not be placed in secondary positions to banks and financial institutions or, for that matter, other creditors.

In conclusion, I must say again that I am constantly amazed by the crust, if you will, of this government in choosing to bring in an amendment to the Bankruptcy Act, at a time when we have record high interest rates which are almost unfathomable in terms of size, at a time when businessmen are wondering how in blazes they will be able to pay the interest on their debts at 20 to 24 per cent—these MacEachen rates are astronomical—at a time when bankruptcies in the first quarter of this year have increased 20 per cent over last year, when farming bankruptcies have increased by 73 per cent in the first quarter of this year as compared to the same period last year, at a time when Canadians fear for their economic future.

I must admit that the gall of this government is something to behold. There seems to be no limit to its arrogance or its crust. The feeling seems to be that it is the natural governing party, that it knows what is best and that the rest of us should keep our peace. We are being told that we are better off than we were ten years ago and that farmers are doing better now than they were before. According to the Prime Minister, everything is hunky-dory and the government will set its own priorities. Never mind that you cannot afford to renew the mortgage on your house, never mind that the bank has just seized your farm, never mind that the company you work for may go bankrupt; never mind all these things, we are just to follow the government's agenda because it knows best. I do not think it does.

As long as the government House leader sets the agenda in this House we have no choice but to debate what he puts before us, and we will continue to debate the government's priorities. We hope that this legislation will not be unduly held up. It is an improvement to the existing legislation, and it can be further improved. The government can be sure that it will receive co-operation from this party in order to make it a better measure for all Canadians.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn)—Canada Development Corporation—(a) Plans for future role. (b) Chairmanship of Board of Directors; the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm)—Metric Conversion—(a) Minister's responsibilities to small business. (b) Request for repeal of enforcement order; the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis)—Energy Conservation—(a) Abuse of Canadian home insulation program. (b) Involvement of local organizations in certification process.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BANKRUPTCY ACT, 1980

MEASURE RESPECTING BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Ouellet that Bill C-12, respecting bankruptcy and insolvency, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, we are finally getting a new bill respecting bankruptcy. I know that this has been a subject of discussion for several years. I have been sitting in this House for 25 years and I remember that the representatives of the provinces have been negotiating with the federal government in order to come to some arrangements such as those provided in this bill.

[English]

At one time bankruptcy did have a very serious stigma; but events have taken place over the past 60 years which have changed the public's conception of bankruptcy. Prior to and during the 1920s the man who went bankrupt was a total failure. It was a disgrace. In fact, I can recall that at that time a farmer could not be made bankrupt. This provision that a farmer could fall under the Bankruptcy Act only came about in 1949. During the 1930s we saw introduced the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act which had great application during the 1940s and 1950s. As a young lawyer, I inherited a whole portfolio of files dealing with foreclosure. That is where I cut my teeth, on foreclosure practice, when I was dealing with old FCAA files.

There was a great deal of tragedy involved in many of those files. I recall what was told to me by my then senior partner who had a great deal of experience and was a very kindly man, and some judges and trustees who had dealt with farmers and, as well, not only small businessmen but business as a whole during the 1930s. They said bankruptcy was the best thing that these people could go through because it took a mountain off their shoulders, one which they would never have been able to shed, and gave them an opportunity for a new start. So far as farmers were concerned, many a time was an arbitrator, usually a judge, named to supervise adjustments of debts, whereby land debts, overdue grocery accounts, twine accounts, oil accounts and what have you were all written down. It was a proposal much as we see in section 3, the consumers' section of this present bill. Many a farmer had an insurmountable load taken off his shoulders. Prior to the arrangement, the wall he faced had seemed sky-high, but now he could begin to see over it. With changing economic conditions, these people were able to continue and get out from under, but something had had to be done. I think, to that extent, the old FCA Act was a good piece of legislation, certainly so far as farmers in western Canada were concerned. That is where my experience came from, even though I came on the scene late. It was the only answer.

How about businesses in the 1930s? I know that in the province of Alberta some of our leading corporations went through the wringer of bankruptcy in 1933, 1934 and 1935. They got rid of their debts caused, in many instances, because they had done work but had not been paid. There were many construction firms which had done the work but they could not get paid. Why could the owners of the buildings not get paid? Because they could not rent them. There was no revenue coming in. The whole economy as we knew it had almost come to a grinding stop and something had to be done. It is no pleasure for bank managers to contemplate ledgers where notes are piling up interest which will not be collected. There is no way a wholesaler can continue giving credit to a merchant who can sell but cannot get paid; and it goes on, all the way down the line. So I think the 1930s taught a lot of people about bankruptcy and compilation of debts and arrangements.

We are talking about consumers in section 3, those whose debts outside of a family residence mortgage do not exceed $20,000. Many of those people cannot be put through a bankruptcy proceeding. They do not have the money or the assets to pay trustees or lawyers. However, do not think for one moment that this is a new-found gem or that the people in consumer and corporate affairs have come up with a brilliant idea within the last while. A section of this kind was in place and operating in the province of Alberta in the early fifties.

I forget the precise name of the legislation, but strangely enough a good friend of mine is a director of that section of the attorney general's department which administers this legislation. He was then also in that position. He had a great deal of experience. In my early years in Ottawa, I do not know how many times he came down to discuss with the federal authorities the incorporation into federal legislation of some of the principles and regulations of the legislation with regard to consumers. Thank goodness it has come!

We will see, when we are in committee and able to discuss the precise regulations, just how it is proposed that we deal with what I consider to be a vast horde of people. Incidentally, I think their numbers would increase if they knew they could go to experienced counselling officers under a debtors' assistance board so that their affairs could be examined, they could be advised, and they could be kept to arrangements made with their creditors. In the main, creditors are honourable people who have not necessarily lent any money but who may have advanced credit for the sale of goods and services. They are unpaid vendors. True enough, there may be some finance companies, banks or other retail credit organizations that have assisted in furnishing credit.

Today we have massive international credit cards which become almost a temptation for people to go out and spend. We are in an economy that depends upon buying and selling for the production of goods and services so that salaries may be paid and people may then purchase other goods and services. This is part of the economy. If you have ever heard a big truck come to a grinding halt or slow down as the result of shifting into a much lower gear, that would be nothing compared to the noise of the North American and western European economy if credit cards and credit buying were eliminated. When looking at the money supply today, one should not only look at the cash that is in circulation, at demand deposits and at cash on hand in the banks, but also at the total amount of goods bought and outstanding credit purchases.

If hon. members have money in a bank account, it matters little whether that money is there as a result of deposit or whether they borrowed money and put it in the account. Master Charge, American Express, Visa and the credit cards of the major oil companies and department stores are all the same; one card is as good as $300 in the pocket at any time.

Mr. Peterson: Never!

Mr. Lambert: The cards can buy goods at quickly as cash can. As a matter of fact, it is easier to buy with a credit card than with a personal cheque. They should be part of the money supply. When we look for reasons for inflation, the total amount of the wherewithal on which our economic machine turns should be considered. Credit cards are a relatively latter day phenomenon. People are indebted to the credit card companies as a result. This is not the fault of these companies nor of the banks which issue the credit cards, however; the purchase is made by the individual. John Citizen has to accept the blame for a lot of his own problems with overextended credit.

There are all sorts of reasons why consumers overextend their credit. They may have made a mistake; perhaps the payments were too high; perhaps there were two breadwinners in the family and for one reason or another one lost a job or had to resign. In any event, the income is not sufficient to meet the monthly payments. Then there are those who want to live higher than their income would permit. That is also a mistake in judgment. They are the people who play around with credit accounts, paying two months out of three, or three months out of four, and never asking the same creditor to absorb two delays in a row. You cannot call that kiting; they are playing a game of roulette with their creditors. That is all right if they do not become involved in more debt, but that type of individual can rarely resist the temptation to get into debt. They buy today in anticipation of paying with tomorrow's inflated dollars.

It is a very simple psychosis that a man who buys merchandise on credit today that is too expensive for him anticipates having it paid for in two years when he expects to be earning 25 per cent or 30 per cent more than he is earning today. He does not content himself with buying on credit, however; next year he goes on a holiday. That is the type of individual who ends up as a consumer debtor under this particular legislation. I am not going to cry crocodile tears for that individual.

Having said that, we must ask how we can deal with the situation. We cannot ignore those individuals because there are tens of thousands of them in the country. Their situation is almost like that of a doctor who would say that he is going to neglect all cases of measles or the common cold. It cannot be done. Instead, he must try to eliminate measles and the common cold. In this particular case, the solution is not up to John Citizen who owes $20,000. Actually, I do not think that is enough and I hope there is provision for increasing that amount by way of regulation, because with inflation as it is at present, $20,000 will be out of date by the time this legislation is passed. Let us be satisfied that we can convince this individual that he should go to see the equivalent of a debtor's assistance board run by the federal government, not the province. I see that there is provision for this in the act. The thrust seems to be that this board will be under provincial administration. That is the way it should be. It should be done with as little formality as possible.

• (1710)

My colleague the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) spoke about trustees and receivers. We know about those. I am reminded of when I was a young lawyer. Someone presented me with an old British cartoon showing two lawyers on the chancery side of an estate. Both of them were talking over a particular estate saying that it would be a pity if any of the beneficiaries got anything. Outside of perhaps priority creditors, such as the Government of Canada with its claim for unremitted income tax, unremitted unemployment insurance and unremitted Canada Pension Plan deductions, we have seen commercial and industrial bankruptcies where the creditors have received very little. But if you looked at the trustee's fee and the fees for solicitors who were acting on behalf of the trustee, you would see that was where the money was wrung out. But those men are entitled to do the work and to get paid for it.

I do not share all of the views put forward by my colleague from Calgary, because it seems to me we have been able to protect some very complicated bankruptcies. As a lawyer I used to do a certain amount of that work on behalf of creditors. If there were a sensible judge who knew something about a business, one who could be reached in a minimum of time who could give decisions and understand proposals, perhaps a proposal for the bankrupt concerned to continue operations but with supervision, this might be beneficial. I think that should be the case in many so-called bankruptcies today.

I see there is provision in the act for commercial arrangements and the possibility of a trustee being appointed by the court to work along with management on behalf of management's interest and on behalf of the creditors. After all, a going business is the only one that has a chance of making any money and of keeping people employed. On the other hand, a padlock on the door means the end of the road to a great many people. I think far too many padlocks get used. Perhaps there should be an opportunity for continued operation of businesses. They do it in the United States. If my memory serves me correctly, under what they call Section 11 multimillion-dollar concerns are able to make proposals, along with trustees appointed by a court, for operations to continue. There have been many cases where, in the end, creditors come to some sensible arrangement. Perhaps they are prepared to accept 75 cents, 80 cents or even 50 cents on the dollar knowing that is as good as they will ever get from their previous commitments. If a company gets rid of a heavy debt load it may yet be in a business whereby new owners with new ideas and more capital would be interested in taking over. There are many possibilities.

If anyone wants to take a good look at this act, it represents over an inch of paper in thickness. This act is complicated. What is more, the back sections, which include the schedules and the annexes, create some of the difficulties and confusion because they amend other legislation. We see that the Bank Act is going to be amended. I do not think it affects Section 88 but it may affect the banks' secured position. I am not aware that there is a great deal of change in the priorities of creditors except perhaps in so far as employees having claims for unpaid wages are concerned. They do not rank ahead of secured creditors. Their ranking is among preferred creditors, but behind Crown Canada.

In situations where there were unremitted income tax deductions, the Crown has said that money was held in trust by you, the firm, on behalf of the Crown with respect to tax owed by Mr. X or Miss Y. The same may be said about unemployment insurance, Canada Pension Plan contributions and federal sales tax. These are all preferred claims ahead of unsecured creditors.

Now comes the question of wages not paid to employees. There is mention of a sum of $2,000 with a further sum of $500 in certain circumstances. If my memory serves me correctly, in priority $2,000 was the maximum in wages an employee could claim for something like four to six weeks, I forget which. That provision was in the 1949 act and wages were much less then than they are now. Wages were not defined in a maximum amount. I would think it would be advantageous if in the committee hearings we changed this provision from $2,000 to a weekly salary. Within three or four years, $2,000 may be totally inadequate. It would be better to say simply that an unpaid employee shall be entitled to four or six weeks' full salary, whatever the decision is, after the appropriate deductions have been made from that salary for unemployment insurance and so on. Incidentally, they would have to recover enough money to pay income tax, CPP and other statutory deductions from those salaries so that the employee can get full credit.

There is another area in which there has been a lot of criticism of trustees and receivers, as though they work behind curtains, away from the creditors and debtors and as though there was something mysterious about their operation. I am not satisfied with the way trustees were named previously. There always seemed to be an element of political patronage which I did not like. Over the years, it was often easy for a Liberal to come here and be named a trustee in bankruptcy but very difficult for anyone else. I suggest that lends some credence to the suggestion that the trustees and lawyers would divide the estate and the creditors and owners would get what little was left over, if anything.

I would prefer that every bankruptcy be supervised by a properly educated judge, someone who knows something about business, to whom the trustees would have to report fully. In some jurisdictions, through an arrangement with the provinces we could have a bankruptcy court or division, if the volume merited. At least there would be supervision. Anything that is supervised and out in the open has much less chance of being unfair.

One example is the construction business. If an apartment building goes blouey part way up and no more money is available, the mortgagee may refuse to extend further credit. All too often the major creditor is in a position to arrange new financing for the continuation of the project, having squeezed out the others. There is a sale by the trustee to a nominee of the major creditor or to an affiliated company. The small creditors get squeezed out. This may mean an awful lot to them. All too often it is the mid-range creditor, those involved to the tune to $50,000, $75,000 or $100,000, who take the brunt of these failures. These people must be protected as well.

I admit there is no way that everyone can come out of a bankruptcy with no loss. If the employees have been careful and have insisted upon being paid up to date, they will be covered by the statutory protection. A secured creditor will undoubtedly be protected, unless there is some great misfortune. However, that secured creditor should not be able to sell the property at a distressed price; it should be at a reasonable market price so there is some residue. What I am saying is that there should be justice as far as these people are concerned. To that extent, I hope this act will improve matters; it has been a long time coming. I also hope to be able to participate in the committee hearings on this bill.

Bankruptcies involve far too much dirty laundry. We hear about thousands of people going bankrupt. Nonsense, they are not going bankrupt; there are some who have overextended themselves. They make conscious decisions. If they modify their spending policies and tighten up in certain areas, they may be able to ride out the storm. These people were not guaranteed a safe and smooth passage. They have to stand up to the realities of the decisions they took.

There is no doubt in my mind that there has been a lot of foolish spending and investment. People get carried away with the inflation psychology which is so prevalent today. The government is up to its neck in it. All the way along we have seen government proposals in legislation which accepts 10 and 12 per cent inflation as though it was going to happen. The proposal in the Judges Act was for an increase in salary in excess of 7 per cent, and this to be checked every three years. What is that but an acceptance of inflation?

One of the side benefits of the exceptionally high interest rates today will be to draw people away from this inflation psychosis so that they accept the idea that tomorrow is not necessarily the day when Santa Claus will come around with higher salaries. At the present time, they are hooked all the way through. In more than one government proposal we have seen indexing all the way along. That is an acceptance of the fact that inflation is as inevitable as the sun rising tomorrow somewhere in the world, and that is wrong.

However, having said that, it is no relief to those people who have made mistakes to say to them, "Tough luck, old boy, but you made the mistake, you have to get along with it and lump it." I hope that through this act ordinary debtors, the so-called consumer debtors, commercial debtors and industrial concerns, will have flexible enough legislation for honesty and good will to be allowed to—

• (1730)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired. Nevertheless, he may continue if there is unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lambert: I was just on my last sentence.

Mr. Peterson: Carry on. Keep going.

Mr. Lambert: I invite the hon. member to make a contribution. He has enough to say in the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs at times about matters of this kind, but we do not receive the benefit of his knowledge and his experience here in the House. Let him come forward instead of speaking from his seat—

Mr. McCauley: He is not speaking from his seat.

Mr. Peterson: It is not my seat, Mr. Speaker. I will be happy to return to it.

Mr. Lambert: He has been heckling in an underground, half-heated way all afternoon, but not enough to be understood, and that is nothing new, but I would like to hear him make a speech on this particular subject.

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Lambert: I have the floor, if the hon. gentleman will please resume his seat.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is the hon. member seeking the floor on a point of order?

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I just ask the hon. member if he wishes me to carry on his speech for him or if he wishes me to make a contribution to this debate. I would be very happy to accede to his wishes because I have always respected his advice.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, I will terminate on that. I expect tomorrow I will read Hansard and see the speech of the hon. gentleman and a contribution to the resolution of the problem with which we are faced in handling this legislation.

I hope we have a vehicle here and that appropriate arrangements can be made with provincial authorities so that as much flexibility can be introduced into the administration of the act as possible so that we can deal with this problem of excessive indebtedness.

Excessive indebtedness is not necessarily bankruptcy, but I hope we can eliminate formal bankrupty in as many cases as possible. True enough, the public does not attach the same stigma to the word "bankrupt" today as it did 50 years ago, but I think it is still something we should understand, even though some hon. members opposite who sit and just mumble and grumble may be bankrupt of ideas on the subject.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I was moved to speak earlier when I listened to the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre), and I am moved even more so now as a result of listening to the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert).

When the latter hon. member was dealing with the priorities which are set in the bankruptcy legislation, I was reminded that income tax funds stand in a preferred position. As a matter of perhaps some little interest, when I was first elected to the House of Commons, the very first motion I put on the order paper was to the effect that the government, in collecting income taxes, should rank on an equal basis with other creditors. Believe it or not, I was successful in getting that particular motion through private members' hour and to the committee. At the committee I ran into a bit of opposition from, of all people, the financial critic of the New Democratic Party, who indicated that where other individuals had extended credit, they had made the conscious decision to extend that credit, and the government was really in no position to do so. On that basis, that member argued in favour of the proposition that the government should maintain its preference. I was not able to dissuade the committee, and by the time I got back to the committee again, the decision had pretty well been made.

Mr. Peterson: Putting business ahead of the public good.

Mr. Cullen: I want to commend the minister for being able to convince his cabinet colleagues that this particular piece of legislation should be brought forward. We have heard much rhetoric and there has been much wringing of hands about the suggestion that many other subjects should be discussed, given present interest rates, as well as the energy policy which is now being discussed and bills such as Bill C-48 and Bill C-57, but this particular bill is not brought forward in isolation. I understand there are some six different committees meeting this afternoon to discuss a whole series of subjects. Part of those discussions will involve the estimates of particular departments. If parliamentarians have an obligation, it is to go over those estimates with a fine-toothed comb and in that way act in the better interests of the constituents they serve. So I think the minister should be commended for being able to convince his cabinet colleagues that this was the time to bring this particular piece of important legislation forward, rather than be the butt of the wrath of some hon. members.

I was somewhat appalled—that is the only word I can think of—when I listened to the hon. member for Calgary Centre condemning in a broad way trustees in bankruptcy. I do not know the trustees in bankruptcy with whom he has dealt, but I can say that it has been my experience that trustees are very dedicated individuals. In many instances they are members of the chartered accounting profession or the legal profession, and they perform a yeoman's service on behalf not only of the estates for which they are trustees in bankruptcy but also on behalf of a myriad of creditors, many of whom would not understand their rights if it were not for the trustees in bankruptcy who quite often go the second mile to explain those rights to ordinary creditors. In many, many instances trustees have seen fit to keep operations going so that creditors or debtors would not be left without any money at all. As the hon. member for Edmonton West pointed out, quite often they have been able to arrange settlements whereby creditors get 70 cents, 80 cents or a certain amount on the dollar so that everyone has an opportunity to share in whatever assets are available.

To suggest that trustees milk estates until the last cent is gone so that they can discourage anybody from taking civil action I think does a disservice to trustees in bankruptcy who have served this country in a very admirable and conscientious fashion.

There will be bad ones, of course, in every profession, but I think the vast majority of trustees do a yeoman's service on behalf of the people who run into difficulty, who are endeavouring to secure at least some of their money back and who look to the trustee in bankruptcy as their last hope of collecting at least some cents on the dollar.

The hon. member for Calgary Centre indicated that the service people who came to Ottawa to speak to us last week put all the blame for their problems on the national energy policy. I must say that they were much more honest in their presentation than was the hon. member for Calgary Centre this afternoon. They indicated that they had seen not just our government but also the government of the Province of Alberta and the government of the province of Ontario. They were endeavouring not to be political, as the hon. member for Calgary Centre was in this instance. They were endeavouring to point out their difficulties. Some pointed out that in six months they would have to close up. They pointed out that many of them will have to go bankrupt unless an agreement is reached between the producing provinces and the federal government.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I believe the hon. member said that the members of the contracting industry were much more honest than was the hon. member for Calgary Centre. If the hon. member were to look at those words, I think he would want to retract them and be a little more accurate.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I was indicating that those people had been more honest in their presentation. The hon. member for Calgary Centre indicated that these people were blaming everything on the national energy policy. They were not blaming everything on the national energy policy. They said there was fault on the part of the Alberta government, which is participating in this. They felt there was a role for the province of Ontario to play. They were concerned that we were not, in their view, working as effectively as we might in bringing about a settlement with the producing provinces. I am not saying the hon. member is dishonest. I am saying that his presentation was not as honest as the presentation we received from those individuals.

They did express concern about what their plight would be down the road. In some cases they were talking about the short term and in others about as long a time as six or seven months, but they wanted to see a settlement effected, or they would be facing bankruptcy and have to rely on the provisions of either the old act or the new one. They were honest enough to indicate that drilling rigs were leaving before the national energy policy was ever introduced. They were honest enough to concede that there was an oversupply of oil drilling rigs in Canada and that on that basis there was not the market in Canada they would like to see. Many of them were going south for that reason. Others were moving because they had other obligations. They had taken up leases. They were moving because they had to do some work on those particular leases if they were to maintain their right to drill in those particular areas. So in the presentation they made these individuals did not blame the national energy policy for everything that took place.

An hon. Member: Just 90 per cent.

Mr. Cullen: The hon. member opposite says 90 per cent. They did not say anything about 90 per cent at all, they indicated there was an obligation, and I agreed with them, on all parties to sit down and endeavour to arrive at a settlement that was acceptable right across the country so that those who were producing would get adequate compensation for their work, that the province would receive adequate revenue and that, as every one of them who spoke to me indicated, the federal government was entitled to more of the revenue from a barrel of oil than it is receiving at the present time. The other point they made is that the price of oil really is the determining factor. Once that decision is reached, many of the other problems, they felt, could be overcome.

The hon. member from Edmonton West quoted a former principal of his who indicated that a bankruptcy was a natural and necessary tool or weapon, or perhaps opportunity is the best word, for people in business in the private sector in a capitalistic system. In this way people have extended credit to them, have taken that particular risk, sometimes securing the risk by floating debentures or mortgages or some other means, and in some instances they simply lent that money or performed the work, knowing they can protect themselves through the filing of mechanic's liens or things of that nature.

However, in every instance of a bankruptcy the individual or corporation has overextended itself, possibly by expanding too much, possibly by not rationalizing the machinery it has in its enterprise. There are many reasons for bankruptcy and I think Canadian society today does not look down upon bankruptcy in the same way it did many years ago. I think it is now accepted, and people who extend credit recognize that they are taking a risk and that it is their obligation, as the hon. member for Edmonton West said, to determine to what extent they should be prepared to advance goods or money or to allow someone to use a particular enterprise when the individual who needs it cannot pay cash for it on the spot.

So business decisions are made by people who extend credit, and people build up reputations for receiving credit, using that credit, making a profit and paying back the loan. In that way they set a pattern so that in the future when they enter other enterprises or develop their own, they will have built up a credit rating so that people will have some confidence in them and advance them credit.

It is always a tragic time when an individual or a corporation faces bankruptcy, and what we have to do at that particular time is at least to have legislation in place that will make it as easy as possible for people to overcome the trauma, to see if they can get some money out of the particular operation or to see if they can keep the operation going. Good trustees in bankruptcy will do that, if they can arrange a settlement that will be equitable for all concerned, and that is not only the trustee's responsibility but certainly is that of the individual or the corporation to the people who have extended credit.

All of us in this House are concerned about the ordinary wage earner, the individual who has no choice. He works for a particular corporation and is supposed to be receiving a salary, but he is put off so that at some point down the line he has to make a decision as to how long he is going to continue to work there in the knowledge that he may never receive the money. He has no particular priority. And I think the method the minister has endeavoured to put into this particular act is one that faces up to that particular problem. Maybe there is a better way and maybe someone will come forward at the committee stage with something that is better than what is provided for in the act, but I commend the minister for the fact that special attention has been given to the ordinary worker employed by a particular corporation who has not insisted upon payment of his wages in the interest of helping that corporation to continue.

There is one other area that I find particularly invidious, and that is the individual corporation that knows it is going bankrupt, continues to seek out credit and secures it, in some instances, from gullible people, and maybe we should not feel too sorry about them. Those companies convince people in construction, for example, not to file mechanic's liens because in doing so they will stop the flow of capital. Quite often a bank or a trust company will move in, advance more money than should be advanced and thus obtain a large advantage over all the ordinary creditors because these individuals have not filed mechanic's liens. When a construction subcontractor reaches a stage where he feels it is necessary, in order to protect his interests, to file a mechanic's lien, it is my view that unless he has something very solid from the contractor or the owner, he would be well advised to pull the plug, as it were, and call the bluff of the contractor to see if he can in fact proceed.

Now you cannot generalize on a subject like that, Mr. Speaker, because there are instances where an individual knows that if mechanic's liens are filed, the bank will not advance the money he needs to pay salaries and things of that nature. However, somehow we have to find a way to aid those who have been stuck as a result of companies and individuals going bankrupt. I hope that in the passage of this particular piece of legislation, as long as it is—and at 430 sections it reminds me to some extent of the Bank Act—we will have the same kind of co-operation. I hope we will have witnesses appearing before us who will have an idea about how we might protect the ordinary worker and if this is not the best system, whether there is a better system that could be implemented.

I thank the House for its attention. I know that others want to speak, but I hope the bill will be referred to committee soon so we can have witnesses before us and give the bill a very close scrutiny in clause by clause reading. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to address a few remarks to the House during this debate. Before doing so, I cannot help but remember the time when I asked my father, a chartered accountant, why he did not do any trustee work. His answer was: "Well, Doug, I have never seen a happy bankruptcy". After several years in business I have to echo his remarks because I know that when we are dealing with bankruptcy legislation, we are dealing with something which touches people in very difficult circumstances.

Before dealing with the provisions of the legislation itself, I cannot help but comment on the irony of the Liberal government bringing in the legislation at this time. The House knows that Canadians are facing record high interest rates and record high mortgage rates as a result of the Liberal government's failure to address the economy since it took office in 1980. The deficit continues to rise, the economic prospects of Canada continue to plummet, and the government does nothing as far as an industrial strategy or long-range planning is concerned. We are left with a government which says that it will come to the rescue of the Canadian people with improved bankruptcy legislation.

An hon. Member: Broken record.

Mr. Lewis: Yes, you have broken many records. As a result of this inaction by the government, more and more Canadians are making use of the Bankruptcy Act and this is the only reason that any concerned Canadian can see at the present time for the introduction of this legislation.

The House will know in 1980 there were 224 farm bankruptcies compared to 125 in 1979. In the first quarter of 1981, there were 75 farm bankruptcies compared to 44 in the first quarter of 1980. The number of business bankruptcies was 6,595 in 1980 compared to 5,648 in 1979, and 5,646 in 1978. Business bankruptcies in the first quarter of 1981 were 2,044 as compared to 1,706 in the first quarter of 1980. The number of personal bankruptcies in 1980 was 21,025 compared to 17,892 in 1979 and 15,938 in 1978. Personal bankruptcies in the first quarter of 1981 were 6,152 compared to 5,238 in the first quarter of 1980. The Liberal government continues to set records.

It is also interesting to realize that this basic legislation has been in the works in finalized form since 1975. I understand it has been introduced in the House by three different ministers at three different times over the past six years. In fact, it has taken the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) since last year to present a bill which is basically the same as the one presented by the Progressive Conservative party when we governed in the fall of 1979.

The lack of ingenuity on the part of the government is superseded only by its lack of speed. Rather than dwell on the intricacies of the legislation and the procedures for handling bankruptcies, I turn my attention to the provisions of the act which govern secured and unsecured creditors, especially with respect to the position of commission sales people and wage earners.

I am sure the government, in consultation with receivers and trustees, has done its best to streamline the procedures under the Bankruptcy Act. In any event, we can deal with those refinements in committee; we should not occupy the time of the House. Later I will comment upon the suggestion that the bankruptcies superintendent surveys trustees and receivers to determine the feasibility of establishing a funded plan to insure wage earners against loss of wages and other benefits caused by the bankruptcy of their employers.

I should like to deal with the question of preference. Traditionally preference has been given to wage earners vis-à-vis other unsecured creditors. The act proposes to continue that preference. I would suggest that we look very hard at the suggestion that wage earners should be granted priority over secured creditors for wages and commissions owed, as well as any deduction the employer has made for employee benefits, group insurance, income tax, etc.

Wage earners and commissioned salesmen are always hardest hit by a commercial bankruptcy. The loss of wages strikes at the pocketbook of the wage earner and his or her ability to feed and clothe a family and put a roof over their heads. These are not usually the sophisticated players in the business world. The sophisticated players are the banks, trust companies, finance companies, insurance companies and large businesses. They can sustain a loss; they know how to protect themselves. These are the people to whom salary cheques at the end of the week or every two weeks are all important. For that reason we should consider giving wage earners and commission sales people a priority over secured creditors. The hon. member for Dollard (Mr. Desmarais) was in the House a moment ago; he is also a chartered accountant.

At this point I would like to refer to the minutes of the Senate Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce of Tuesday, June 3, 1980 in which Mr. Biddell, a well-respected trustee in bankruptcy, made some remarks with respect to the possible preference or security which could be given to wage earners. He spoke on behalf of the Institute of Chartered Accountants which presented a brief to the committee. He said:

—we think it is the secured lenders who should be required to contribute out of their security the amount required to pay the outstanding wages, because the employee's work has gone into enhancing the value of their security, for the most part, and the secured lender is the person best qualified to determine, not only his position but whether or not the company can continue to survive, what its chances are, and when, if it must, be terminated. This is the way commercial practice is going in Canada, and I think that this legislation should follow it.

The Institute of Chartered Accountants suggested that this security should be attached to current assets such as inventory and accounts receivable, not so much long-term fixed assets such as land and equipment. They suggested the money in cash which the trustee would have coming in from which to pay out secured claims of wage earners. This makes good sense; I hope the House and the committee consider it.

My next question concerns whether there should be any limit on the amount of salary and wages an employee may claim as either a secure or preferred creditor. I want to review this matter briefly and then make a special reference to real estate sales people on commission. The limit of $2,000 was presumably set with some principle in mind. I do not understand why there should be any limit on the wages and commissions payable which rank as either secured or preferred claims. It is the people who are working, whether they are commissioned sales persons or wage earners, who make the economic world go around. The very least we can do as members of Parliament is to protect their salaries, wages and commissions.

There may be any number of reasons why the amount owed to an employee at the time of bankruptcy may exceed $2,000. The employee may be a highly paid employee. The employee's pay dates may be monthly or at even longer intervals. If the employee is employed in the far north and only draws down his full pay at the end of a contract date, the amount owing could exceed $2,000. The employee may be on a bonus or incentive which normally results in large accruals of salaries or wages. In any event, I see no reason why there should be any limit on what is paid in a bankruptcy to an employee who is either a preferred or secured creditor.

Real estate sales persons are at a very distinct disadvantage under the Bankruptcy Act. First, the amount of commission on any one real estate transaction can very often exceed $2,000. Second, real estate sales persons do not receive their payment or commission until the transaction closes. This can mean a real estate sales person can work very hard in the month of May and sign up, for example, in five transactions which close in June, July and August. The work of the commission sales person has been done, the transaction is finished as far as they are concerned, but if anything happens to the financial stability of the broker during the period from the time the agent completes the offer to purchase to the time the commission is paid to the broker and thence to the sales person, the real estate sales person can find himself in difficulty. He can find that commissions receivable have been assigned to the bank or to other creditors and they are scooped before the real estate sales person is paid his commission.

If it is argued that the rationale for a $2,000 limit on wages and salaries is that an employee is expected to protect himself or herself, this does not ring true when we are talking about commission sales people. They cannot do anything about the commissions owed to them. If one is working on the line, is paid every week, and does not get paid on one Friday or the following Friday, perhaps there is some responsibility on his part to say, "Hey, wait a minute, I will not work until they pay me." But real estate sales people and other commission sales people do not have that protection. They may not even be on the premises where the business takes place. Their part of the business may be to go out and make sales; they are not there to see day to day the financial stability of the company. I would suggest that we look at that, and if we maintain a preference system, we should consider whether $2,000 is high enough.

May I call it six o'clock, or do you wish me to continue?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, when my time ran out at six o'clock I had just finished dealing with what I felt were inequities in placing a limit on the amount an employee could recover as a preferred claim on a bankruptcy. I would like to extend my comments one step further and talk about the provision in the legislation relating to a $500 limit on pension and health and welfare contributions. It seems to me that when an employer makes deductions from an employee's pay for group insurance benefits, health and welfare deductions and pension plans, the employer takes on a position of trust. The funds which are held by the employer for payment to the benefit of the employee are trust funds. The employee has no method of ascertaining that the funds have or have not been paid out on his or her behalf by the employer under the terms of the trust. No employee, no matter how diligent, can protect himself against an employer who, when faced with financial difficulties, decides to borrow from his employees in effect, and pay other creditors to the detriment of pension funds and health and welfare plans.

It is for that reason I wonder why there should be any limit on the trust moneys deducted by employers which are held, in effect, to be paid out under these plans for the benefit of the employees. It seems to me that the federal government has a responsibility under the terms of the Bankruptcy Act to enforce the terms of that trust.

The last thing I wish to deal with is the suggestion that the bankruptcy superintendent be empowered under the act to survey trustees and receivers to determine the feasibility of establishing a funded plan to insure wage earners against the loss of wages and other benefits caused by the bankruptcy of their employer. My first thought was, that in setting up such an investigative board, the Liberal party had run out of positions to which it could appoint Liberal politicians and party faithful. I thought perhaps Maurice Strong had another idea. Then I went on to imagine the management consultants and economists who would be needed to produce such a study. I imagined the endless forms, the questionnaires and the paperwork which we would be loading on the Canadian business person who is trying to make a living. Then I started to contemplate who would be included in this favoured group of wage earners who will pay into a fund which will pay salaries when the employer goes bankrupt.

The first group of employees I thought about was federal government employees because, at the rate this government is running up deficits, they are prime candidates for bankruptcy. It can be seen that very soon civil servants should be paying into such a fund. I then went on to think about Crown corporations which would probably also be absolved from the payment of such premiums, despite the fact that organizations such as the CBC would never produce a profit, nor could they ever be expected to. I then wondered how an employer would explain to his employee a further deduction from his rapidly diminishing pay cheque. There would be a box on the pay slip which would read "bankruptcy deduction". I thought about my son who recently landed his first job. I could see him going to his employer and asking him what this bankruptcy deduction was all about. The employer would say that it was a fund from which my son would receive his wages when the employer went bankrupt. I do not see how this engenders any confidence in the system, to be deducting money from people's pay cheques right off the bat and telling them how they will be paid when their employer goes broke.

As I suggested earlier, it seems to me eminently more sensible to adopt the suggestion of the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants and give wage earners and commission sales people a priority over secured creditors from the remuneration or recovery on current assets.

• (2010)

I am also concerned as to how we would administer such a plan, the number of people that would be needed, and simply whether it makes sense; because although we are dealing with bankruptcies and we are definitely having more than we have had in the past, based on my 25 years of experience in business, I do not see that a fund and all the problems that go with such a fund are necessary to solve this problem. I think that if the Canadian government wants a survey, surely that questionnaire could have gone out to trustees and receivers without our asking for the approval of the House of Commons. With all of the things that the government does without our approval, one would think that surely a simple questionnaire such as this could be set up.

So, those are the remarks that I wanted to make on the Bankruptcy Act. We on this side of the House dearly hope that the government will get on with the legislation, that we can get it into committee, that we can solve this matter, and we will not have the hon. Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs bringing in this legislation once again.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): I would like to participate in the debate this evening. There are a number of things I would like to point out. I have some concerns for my own constituency, which is affected by this bankruptcy legislation or certainly should be affected by it. I would like to start off with a quote that goes back to 1923. It is from a statement by J. S. Woodsworth, who was one of the founders of the CCF, the forerunner to the New Democratic Party of which I am a member today in this House. In speaking on the amendments to the Bank Act at that time, he said:

> Let me say, as has been said elsewhere, that either we, as a people, must own and control these great financial institutions or they will absolutely own and control us.

Woodsworth was talking about the banks and the legislation put forward by the government. It seems the prophecy that he made at that time has been proven to be right. I wonder quite often why this is so, after so many people have made representations to the government of the day and the former government, the consecutive Liberals and Conservatives who have ruled this country, that wage earners and consumers, small business people and farmers should have first right to any money that is owed to them when a bankruptcy actually does occur. It puzzled me why that takes place. But when one looks at who really owns the Liberals and who owns the Conservatives, it is no wonder. I look at the contributions that are made to the political parties from, say, the five major banks in Canada.

An hon. Member: How about the unions?

Mr. Anguish: For example, the Toronto-Dominion Bank donated $90,000 to the Liberal party between 1977 and 1979. Also, the Tories were given not $90,000, but $90,095 from the Toronto-Dominion Bank.

An hon. Member: What did you do with the $95?

Mr. Anguish: We have the Royal Bank which wants to treat both of the old line parties equally so that each was donated $100,000 in the years from 1977 to 1979.

An hon. Member: What did the teamsters give you?

Mr. Anguish: The bank of Nova Scotia donated $94,000 to the Liberals and $90,098 to the Conservatives. The Bank of Commerce donated to the Liberals during that period, $100,-194, and to the Tories, $100,747. The Bank of Montreal gave $101,500 to the Liberals and an even $100,000 to the Conservatives.

Those totals to the Liberals during that period of time from the five major banks came to almost $.5 million. The Liberals received $485,694. To the Progressive Conservatives, they gave $480,940. The Tories on my right ask, "How much did they give to the NDP?" They never gave one cent to the NDP.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Anguish: It is the people of this country who control the New Democratic Party, and not the major financial institutions of this country.

The Bankruptcy Act has some changes in it to clear up some of the problems with which we are faced, but not nearly enough. I really do believe that the small business people, the farmers, and especially the wage earners of this country, should be the ones to get the first crack at any money that is left over when a company becomes insolvent or has to declare bankruptcy.

The banks are the first ones to shout, though. They have everything secured. They keep in touch through political contributions and strong lobbying techniques that the average consumer does not have at his disposal. For example, early last year there were 50 employees from Lewis Motors (Ottawa) Ltd. right here in Ottawa. Did they all receive their money, or did Clarkson Gordon get its money first, or did the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce get its money first? And what was left over for the employees? I suspect there was very little left once the banks got through with them, because the banks, especially during high inflationary periods like this, get consumers, small businesses, especially farmers, into a situation of indebtedness with which they cannot cope. They have them secured and they end up with everything after the company or the farm has become insolvent or declared bankrupt. I do not think this is right.

The government actually introduced legislation in 1975 to clear up this situation but did not really pursue it. It was dropped at that time. Then the Senate pursued the matter. It felt that the banks should receive priority. I will quote Senator Hayden who summed it up by saying: "The committee took a strong view in relation to that proposal," talking about wage earner priority, "fearing that it would upset the whole business of commercial lending and commerical financing if secured creditors were deprived of their position." Deprived of what position? I wonder, when we are talking about the banks, these financial institutions.

About a month ago I saw an article in the Winnipeg Free Press headed, "Bank profits zoom". In the first quarter of 1980-81, the profits of the eight top chartered banks were up by $459.8 million. For that quarter, that means they were up 60.8 per cent over the previous year. Certainly they do not need that money as do some of the small individuals who are caught in the squeeze of high inflation and high interest rates which have been created by the Liberals in co-operation with the Conservatives before them, and who set the legislation to give priorities to the banking institutions to grease their political wheels. I think it is a disgrace.

I wonder how the interest rates affect Senator Hayden. I wonder how the interest rates affect some of the members of Parliament here. Certainly not as much as they affect the small consumers out in the constituencies which we are supposed to represent. It seems strange that it is the people who elect us, who put us here to run the country and set the rules of the country to govern in fairness and in good order, and yet we come down on the side of the banks and not the common, everyday individuals out there who need our help, who do not have the resources at their fingertips to be able to manipulate the systems as well as the banks and larger corporations do. I think it is much more important to have the money put towards feeding a family than to put it into running a banking institution or financial institution which already has, as I have said, zooming profits, increased profits, year after year in this country.

The banks should be equally happy, I think, with the Tories as they are with the Liberals who are giving them this. I think that a good way of summing it up is that the Conservatives chopped the hole in the boat; but now that the captain is a Liberal, they are screaming because the water is getting in. It seems a very strange situation to me.

There are not many rich bankers in the constituency which I represent in northwestern Saskatchewan. The people there work very hard to make a living, as do people anywhere else in this country. They do not have the resources available to them that might be found in some of the larger centres, nor do they have some of the job opportunities that might be available there. A number of other members represent constituencies similar to mine where the people depend on small businesses which employ the vast number of people in this country. They depend on agriculture, and bankruptcies among small farms are increasing at an alarming rate. I understand that business bankruptcies have increased by close to 30 per cent. Some 697 businesses went bankrupt in March alone. That does not just refer to those small businesses where people have lost the work of a number of years or in some cases of their entire lifetime; it does not mean hardship only to them but to their employees, people who depend on those small businesses for the income with which they feed their families. This has a spin-off effect in the community.

The situation of the farmers is worsening, Mr. Speaker. In the first three months of 1981, farm bankruptcies increased 70 per cent over the same period last year. This does not take into consideration those farms where there was foreclosure or those farmers who had to sell out because they may have been too proud to declare bankruptcy and had to get out with some of their personal effects. These people lost everything. When we are passing legislation which relates to bankruptcy, I think it should help those people and not the banking institution.

I agree that the banks should have the ability to secure credit, but they should not have first call on it, Mr. Speaker. The people I have mentioned should have first call. When those people are paid off, there is usually something left but when banks and financial institutions have the first secured line of credit, there is very seldom anything left for the consumer or wage earner in the company involved.

I am quite concerned about what is happening in the area of agriculture. Bankruptcies may drive us into an agricultural or food crisis in this country within a few years, if they continue at the present rate. People are being driven out of cow-calf operations and out of grain farming because of the bad economic conditions that face them. Perhaps the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) should turn his green cowboy hat in for a green poker visor because this government is playing poker, which is a high risk game, with the farmers, business people and wage earners of this country whose lives are adversely affected during these times.

We have a very serious problem in this country today. Rather than dealing with who should have priority when a company goes bankrupt, perhaps we should be dealing with legislation to keep businesses and farmers from falling into such a bad situation. In times of spiralling inflation, it is very difficult for them to carry on.

I should like to turn for a few moments to a matter which took place in the constituency of Battlefords-Meadow Lake. A short time ago, 27 farmers in northwestern Saskatchewan purchased some very expensive farm equipment from an implement dealer in North Battleford. The implement dealer agreed that the farmers would put down a small amount and pay the rest after a set period of time. Unfortunately, he ran into some financial problems and did not pass on all the money paid to him for the machinery purchased by the farmers. Instead, he saw it as a cheap source of interim financing that he could use to get his business back on a good footing, at which time he would pay the money back. He never passed the money along to the trust company which held the notes for the cost of the equipment, however, and his business got into a worse situation. His indebtedness spiralled and he found himself unable to honour his commitments to business. Rather than declare bankruptcy, he sold the business to another implement dealer. This was not really a case of bankruptcy, but if he had declared bankruptcy the outcome would have been the same.

When he sold the business, the trust company became interested in his financial situation. It wanted its money for the equipment that had been sold to the 27 farmers in the Battlefords area. The man who owned the company said, "I am sorry, I cannot pay you." He signed a promissory note to the trust company saying, "Yes, I owe you this sum of money", which actually amounted to $246,694.88. He said, "Yes, I owe this, but I cannot pay it." He sold a car he owned and gave that money to the trust company. He sold a house he owned and gave that money to the trust company. The courts were not even able to find out what had happened to the money that had come in when he sold his business. So he was unable to pay this almost quarter of a million dollars to the trust company which said, "We want our money." The implement dealer said, "I cannot pay it." The trust company said, "Well, we want the equipment." The implement dealer said, "I cannot give it to you. The farmers have it." The trust company went to the farmers and tried to seize the equipment, which they needed to carry on their farming operations. As far as the farmers were concerned, they had already paid for their equipment, but the trust company still wanted it.

One of the farmers said, "Lookit, you can't have my equipment. I need it to carry on farming and I need to farm in order to feed my family and pay my taxes to this great family." He took the trust company to court. The final court decision was that the farmer had to pay for the equipment again. The farmer had to pay the trust company twice! Twice for the same equipment! That is wrong, Mr. Speaker.

There are several things wrong with this situation, some of which relate to federal legislation and some to provincial legislation. Part of the problem with the provincial legislation concerns the bonding of implement dealers. The provincial government of Saskatchewan has been very responsive and is introducing legislation this session to ensure that such a situation will not occur in that province again. The federal government should be doing something about it as well. No one should have to pay twice for the same material. The farmers paid in good faith to an implement dealer who unscrupulously used the money for his own benefit to try to put his company back on a sound footing. He thought of it as low interest money and did not pass it along to the trust company. That should not be allowed to happen.

The same situation would have held true if he had declared bankruptcy. The courts would still have ruled in favour of the trust company which wanted its money—which seized the collateral or asked for double payment.

It is situations such as the one I have outlined which point out that wage earners and the people of this country who are least able to afford the loss when a bankruptcy occurs should have first recourse against the assets, not the trust company.

Can you imagine what it does to 27 farming families in one area who in some cases have to pay as much as $30,000 or more for the same piece of equipment, and to pay for it twice? In times of inflation, just as now when equipment is already overpriced, when interest rates are out of sight, when fuel prices are creating hardship and adding to the inflationary spiral, I say it is wrong to give these companies first priority over those funds and to turn private individuals out into the cold. That is not being a very responsive government. I do not think the government appreciates what some of the people have to put up with in constituencies outside of Ottawa.

Ottawa is not the real world, Mr. Speaker. I am sure you are aware of that, even though your constituency is in Ottawa. Ottawa is removed from the real world. I think some members of Parliament, especially Liberal members of Parliament, should be keeping in closer touch with their constituents and listening to what they say when it comes to who should have priority in cases of bankruptcy. Almost every lobby and organized group, outside of Ottawa and the banking and financial institutions, recommend that it is the individual, the wage earner and the small business person who should have first chance at recovery of assets in cases of bankruptcy.

We should examine what other countries do, instead of just listening to what the banks have to say. For example, the Swedish government has a wage guarantee law. In this respect employers pay into a fund. I do not know that anyone from the Liberal government has looked into that aspect to see if it is feasible in Canada. It sounds good to me. But as a member of Parliament I certainly do not have the resources or the research staff to look into something like this. The government should do such research when it is introducing a bill like this.

In France the government helps employees of a bankrupt firm to find work. The government guarantees pay for a year if those employees cannot find work. Why does Canada not think about doing that? Does the federal government not have control of the economy? Have we lost total control? Do we not care any more? It seems that we are in a firefighting situation most of the time. We react to a crisis situation, instead of planning ahead. We should plan an industrial strategy. More important, we should plan an economic policy to ensure that hardships, which certainly do and will occur over time, are spread over as large a base of the population as possible. This hardship should be spread around, especially on those with the economic resources, such as financial institutions. They should absorb some of that hardship, instead of forcing some farmers into a bankruptcy or into having to pay twice for equipment that they could hardly afford in the first place.

Many members of Parliament, especially Liberal members, because they are the ones who are introducing this bill, have to hide their heads in the sand and choke back the injustice which is being created by legislation like this being put into place. They have to hold their noses to put it through because it reeks of paying the piper and calling the tune. I am referring to the money given to the old line political parties by the financial institutions of this country. It is almost unbelievable that something like that could happen in Canada at a time when we are trying to draw up a Constitution to govern the country in fairness and equality for all people. Much of the legislation we bring in is firefighting legislation. It is reactive legislation. It is reactive to the heaviest pressure groups, which include the banks. The banks pressure individual members of Parliament to introduce legislation which will be advantageous to the banks. The banks grease the wheel by giving contributions to the old line political parties. That is a terrible way to set laws in this country. If the same thing is happening with respect to our Constitution, then I think this country is in real trouble. We should be looking at the very base by which we govern ourselves. We should be listening to the people from firms such as Lewis Motors. We should be listening to the farmers who bought implements from dealers who handle their funds unscrupulously. We should listen to the way some of these people have been treated by the unjust laws that we have created in this chamber.

I can be even more critical of the Senate which has spearheaded this bill. Senator Hayden has argued that it will upset the financial balance of this country if the first line of retrieval of assets is given to employees or to individuals and not to the financial institutions. The Senate is even more removed from the real world than some members of Parliament. I wonder how long it has been since any senator has had to deal on credit? I am sure some of them deal with credit because many of them are in business. Business evolves around credit. Senators, however, have financial reserves so they do not have to depend for their very living on credit, as many of the people out in the work place do, out on the small farms and in small business. Some of these rights should be taken away from the Senate and maybe some of the senators would declare bankruptcy from time to time. They would know what it feels like to be down and out bankrupt. They are not bankrupt in terms of financial assets, but they are certainly bankrupt in terms of the ideas and the morals they have to bring forward and recommend legislation such as this which gives the first crack at bankrupty assets to the financial institutions of this country.

If this bill cannot be changed to protect those people who need to be protected most, I feel somewhat ashamed. I would never be able to give my support to a piece of legislation such as this which does not protect the people we are here to represent.

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, in rising to participate briefly in this important debate, I gave quite a bit of thought to the word bankruptcy. Most of us in this chamber have run across people who are morally bankrupt. I am not pointing my finger particularly at any hon. members on the government side of the House at this time. We politicians may even accuse each other of being intellectually bankrupt from time to time.

Originally, the word bankrupt was only applied to fraudulent persons. The first bankruptcy act in Great Britain was directed against such "persons as do make bankrupt." These people were defined as those:

—who craftily obtaining unto their hands great substance of other men's goods do suddenly flee to parts unknown or keep to their houses not minding to pay or restore to any of their creditors their debts and duties.

Miss MacDonald: That is Allan MacEachen.

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Clearly and thankfully the interpretation of the word "bankrupt" has become somewhat more lenient since the days of Henry VIII, although those responsible for the economic situation that we are in, and which is leading to so many bankruptcies, have been known to flee to parts unknown. Again, no names will be mentioned.

● (2040)

It is when you examine the word "bankruptcy" as an individual, as a small businessman, that its definition makes it the most fearsome word imaginable when it comes to a person's economic well-being, not to mention self-esteem. Bankruptcy is indeed a hurtful, demoralizing thing. This is how Funk and Wagnall's Standard Encyclopedic Dictionary defines bankruptcy:

1. Law—One who is judicially declared insolvent, his property being administered for and distributed among his creditors, under a bankruptcy law.
2. Any person unable to pay his debts, or without resources.
3. One ruined and unproductive in some way.

The adjective "bankruptcy" is:

1. Subject to the conditions of a bankruptcy law; insolvent.
2. Destitute; lacking.

Some of the previous speakers in this debate dealt with the technical and the political aspects of this bankruptcy legislation. Let me take a more personal people view of this issue. As a small businessman, and especially the small business I was operating before I entered politics, the spectre of bankruptcy was always there. Mine was an innovation in the electronic communications business and certainly in the parliamentary Press Gallery. It was to provide coverage of Parliament to some 20 individual television stations across Canada, feeding them news film clips of their local MPs on an almost daily basis.

While the idea was a sound journalistic principle and filled a real gap before broadcasting entered this House of Commons, such a venture require many thousands of dollars of capital investment in terms of camera equipment, film stock and, above all, people. During my ten years of operating the company, I employed or contracted 12 to 15 men and women, reporters and cameramen alike, with a total staff of seven people at one time during peak periods.

That may not sound like a very big operation when compared to other businesses such as farms and smaller industrial operations, but I can tell you about the vagaries of the broadcasting industry, about the unpredictability of the news business and, most certainly, about the uncertainties of the economy. Interest rates then were 9 to 10 per cent, one half of what they are now, but they were high. I can you tell especially about the exceptionally fine talents of the upwardly mobile young men and women who gained experience in my small company to move on, inevitably and justifiably, to larger and more lucrative employment in regional and national networks. All of these factors made life in my small business at best uncertain. I am proud of those former employees who used my company as a training ground. Several are major names today in the field of electronic journalism.

The turnover of reporters and technical personnel, and the ever-present fuse that was to lead to the explosion in technology in the news business—especially the conversion from film to videotape tranmission—along with increasing competition from the network giants, made it imperative that my accountant and I keep looking over our left shoulders to the very real probability of being forced out of business. For me, such a prospect of increasing corporate control could have meant that awesome possibility of bankruptcy.

Fortunately, thanks to the diligence of my company secretary-treasurer, who, by staggering coincidence, happens to be my wife, and thanks also to the good people of Hamilton-Wentworth, my little company survived. That is as close as I ever want to come to being, as the definition says, "without resources" or "one ruined and unproductive in some way".

It is also a reason that I can understand, and sympathize with, the agony that so many small businesses, some a lot bigger, some considerably smaller than mine, must endure under the present economy. I understand the helplessness these good, entrepreneurial Canadians must feel as they are forced to declare bankruptcy, largely because, as was pointed out many times today, of unconscionably high interest rates and an increasing lack of sensitivity to free enterprise initiatives in this country.

Let me point out as an aside, but not entirely unrelated to the question of bankruptcy, that it is an insidious thing that is creeping into our society where government is permitting its own government operations to take over small business. There have been more and more takeovers. I think it can be safely said that the only businesses that are sure to survive in this country are owned by the government and supported by tax dollars.

Earlier today the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) asked that members participating in this debate restrict their discussion to legal matters and not get into economics. That is like saying that if you go to Florida these days, you should ignore the sinkholes and just count the number of houses and trees which tumble into them. It is little wonder that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs does not want to discuss the economy. I must point out to the minister that the number of business bankruptcies were up in the first quarter of 1981 to 2,044, compared to 1,706 in the first quarter of 1980.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): That is increased productivity.

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): The total number of bankruptcies in 1980 was 6,595. Surely we can expect this number to increase in 1981 in light of this government's economic policies, or lack of them.

I want to address a very important issue which several of my colleagues signalled should be discussed when dealing with this legislation. The proposed legislation before us, Bill C-12, grants the first claim on the assets of a bankrupt firm to the secured creditors. These secured creditors take precedence over the wage earners who have lost their jobs through the bankruptcy. This bill maintains the same priority on the claims of wage earners as does the present act.

This aspect of the bill is one which greatly affects many of my people and indeed, many of all our constituents. In these days of more and more bankruptcies, it is a problem we will undoubtedly be hearing more about.

When a company, whether it be large or small, goes bankrupt, the claims of the secured creditor to the firm's assets are to be fulfilled first. If there are any assets left after these claims, then Bill C-12 makes provisions for the wages and commissions of the employees, but only after the secured claims have been dealt with.

Members of this House know that there will be very little, if anything, left to pay the wage earners of the company. The preferred credit status as outlined in section 265(4)(d) of the act almost ensures this inequity. This section sets a maximum of $2,000 in unpaid wages, and an additional $500 for pension plan and other employee benefits. As other speakers have pointed out, there is no question that these provisions must be given careful review by the committee which studies this bill.

I would like to comment on two aspects of this section. It would appear that the average wage earner, should he not be receiving his salary, or choosing not to draw it in the hopes that the firm will find a way out of its financial crisis, will be severely penalized for not collecting or demanding his or her wages immediately. There is no incentive for the wage earner to attempt to help the firm through a difficult period.

I would also point out that the maximum amount of wages as outlined in section 265(4)(e) will be quickly outdated in these days of increasing inflation.

The Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, studying Bill C-12, received a great number of representations concerning the protection of employees whose employer has gone bankrupt. This committee reported that under Bill C-12, if there are sufficient assets of the bankrupt firm, then the wage earners will not be paid. I quote:

Your committee is of the opinion that this result is unsatisfactory.

They go on to list the three alternative solutions to remedy this problem. This can be found at pages 16:16 and 16:17 of the Senate banking, trade and commerce committee minutes:

1. The granting to the wage earner of a statutory priority for arrears of wages that would rank in priority to the claims of all secured creditors.

That is called super priority.

2. The granting to the wage earner of a statutory priority for arrears of wages that would rank in priority to the claims of the secured creditors holding security on the current assets of the bankrupt.

That is modified priority.

Such current assets would consist of cash, temporary investments, inventory and receivables provided that such priority would only extend over receivables which have been created by the supply of goods or services.

3. The creation of a Wage Earners Protection Fund out of which the claims of employees for unpaid wages would be paid immediately after a bankruptcy has occurred.

Each of these alternatives must be considered in order to determine whether the following objectives are achieved:

A. Certainty of payment to the wage earner.

B. Promptness of payment to the wage earner.

C. Ease and simplicity of administration.

D. Maintenance of the ability of a borrower to obtain financing for his business operations.

The committee felt that only the establishment of a wage earners' protection fund would fully protect wage earners in a bankruptcy. The committee suggested that this wage earners' protection fund be financed, as recommended by the Senate committee, by monthly contributions from all employers in the nation. This would mean a nominal amount paid per employee. It would only be required from employers with more than six employees. Technically, at one point during my company's operations that would have applied to me if this provision had been in effect. If an employer went bankrupt, the employee would be entitled to his claim for wages paid out of the fund, whether or not the employer was required to make contributions to the fund. The committee recommended that this type of fund be established in Canada to protect the interests of the wage earner.

I find a great number of problems with a wage earners' protection fund, but I do believe it deserves serious study. Mind you, any fund would have to be controlled more tightly than anything we have seen so far. We do not need another Unemployment Insurance Commission. Indeed, if the wild abuses of the UIC were even remotely approached, I would be the first to be scared off this idea of a wage earners' protection fund.

However, I would like to commend the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs for establishing a committee to study wage protection of some kind under the guidance of Mr. Raymond Landry. It is both an admission of the shortcomings of the bill as well as a concern that wage earners should be taken care of. I will be particularly interested in hearing representations and reading the testimony of those appearing before the committee as to why a wage earners' protection fund should be put in place as opposed to the position put forward by the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants, which zeroed right in on the fact that the administrative problem in collecting wage funds would be a very great one indeed. Representatives of the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants, appearing before the same Senate Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, said the following:

—we think it is the secured lenders who should be required to contribute out of their security the amount required to pay the outstanding wages, because the employee's work has gone into enhancing the value of their security, for the most part, and the secured lender is the person best qualified to determine, not only his position but whether or not the company can continue to survive, what its chances are, and when, if it must, be terminated.

There are two distinct and differing points of view, but the important point I want to leave with the House tonight is that the protection of the wage earner should be considered and studied by the kind of committee the minister has recommended.

Let me underline two points which previous speakers touched on this afternoon. The first one is somewhat political. This indeed may be housekeeping legislation, but in the context of today's economy it does seem like band-aid stuff. The government takes advantage of the absence of its two architects of Canada's economic illnesses, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), neither of whom have ever had to meet a mortgage payment or face a bankruptcy in their lives, and brings on this debate on bankruptcy legislation after the fact, after the damage has been done to businesses and to individuals because of the economic policies of this government.

That being said, as has also been pointed out, there are many technical provisions in this proposed legislation which are well drafted, well merited and deserve the support of all sides of the House. I do hope that when all 420 clauses of this bankruptcy and insolvency legislation are examined in committee, hon. members once again will safeguard the rights of employees more than they are safeguarded now. Speaking personally, I want to see some action taken to protect those who are abused by sharp operators who intentionally set up or take over a company and then bleed it to death and escape scot-free, if hon. members will pardon the expression. My colleagues and I will be watching the progress of this bill through the committee with interest on behalf of many thousands of Canadians who face the spectre of that awful word "bankruptcy".

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak about Bill C-12, respecting bankruptcy and insolvency, I am aware, of course, that there has been a great deal of consultation already in relation to its 420 clauses since its predecessor was first introduced way back in 1975. It is a pretty hefty document and one which indeed merits much consultation and study. However, in looking at the minister's press release which came out when the bankruptcy bill was first tabled in the House of Commons back on April 16, 1980, I note that in the press release it is stated, and I quote:

Mr. Ouellet added that once the bill is enacted, it will establish a comprehensive, workable and, above all, a fair bankruptcy system.

The bankruptcy system this bill seeks to establish may be fair, but there is nothing fair about the way that hundreds of small businessmen and farmers and individuals are being forced into bankruptcy by high interest rates and the high interest rate policy of this government. I look again at the figures, which came to my attention just recently, with regard to bankruptcies in the first quarter of this year. In the first quarter of 1981, there were 75 farm bankruptcies compared with 44 in the first quarter of 1980. There were some 2,044 business bankruptcies in the first quarter of 1981, compared with 1,706 in the first quarter of 1980.

With regard to personal bankruptcies, there were 6,152 in the first quarter of 1981 compared with 5,238 in the first quarter of 1980. In every case—farm bankruptcies, business bankruptcies and personal bankruptcies—the number is up very considerably.

● (2100)

These bankruptcies are not confined to any one sector or any one region of the country. By looking through recent press headlines, we can tell that bankruptcies are spread out across the country and that people are suffering because of bankruptcy everywhere. The headline in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of April 17 says "Bankruptcy . . . and the consumer". The headline in the Charlottetown Guardian of March 9 was "Bankruptcies increase". The headline in the Winnipeg Free Press of March 20 was "Bankruptcy liabilities highest in ten years". The headline in The Globe and Mail of March 7 is this: "Alarming rise in bankruptcies viewed as only tip of iceberg". Finally, in the London Free Press of April 23 of this year the headline was: "Farm bankruptcies rise, interest rates blamed". And from today's edition of the Kingston Whig Standard, a newspaper in my own constituency, this is the reaction of small businessmen who are having to face the increasing fear of bankruptcy. It reads as follows:

If there's one thing all business people agree on it's that the high interest situation can't go on indefinitely. They can survive in the shorter term; it's the longer term they fear.

Many businesses are running on such narrow margins that they're only paying the interest on their loans.

This bodes ill for the future. A business with nothing left over to plough back into the operation will, in a few years, find it has no capital when the need comes to refurbish or to expand.

And one of the businessmen in my constituency says this:

I've never in my life in 30 years in this business seen anything so ridiculous as what we're going through right now.

That is the way that Mac Amey, an American Motors dealer, sums it up. He claims that unless the federal government puts a ceiling on interest rates for small businesses and farmers, he can see 50 per cent of the people out of business within a few years. He also says:

High interest rates and low returns are deterring people from putting their personal money into business.

Nobody, as he puts it, "is going to put his money into a dead horse." Eric Bolton, who runs Boyd and Corkey Furniture and Appliances expresses the same view. He says:

Eventually this (high interest rates) will put us out of business . . . You can only find so many corners to cut and then eventually you're at the end of the road.

Now, that is an article which appeared in tonight's edition of the Kingston Whig Standard, and in all of these newspapers all across the country we are reminded over and over again of the interrelationship between bankruptcy and high interest rates. I was interested, Mr. Speaker, in a quotation from The Financial Post of last week in a front page article which reads as follows:

The breathtaking switchabouts in interest rates over recent months, have left so many forecasters beached with wildly wrong predictions, and created so much confusion, that the public is increasingly wary of assertions from economic soothsayers . . .

There is indeed wariness, Mr. Speaker, indeed suspicion on the part of the public about the soothsayers who sit on the government benches. The government has been all wrong in its projection in the last budget and ever since, and Canadians are not only wary of what they are doing, they are getting very weary of it as well.

The economic situation in the country, Sir, is chaotic. Interest rates are at an all time high, just under 19 per cent as of today. Rates being charged by the chartered banks are about 20 per cent, and bankruptcies are at an all time high. The government's own Federal Business Development Bank is charging 22 per cent on its loans; inflation is running at just under 13 per cent. Almost one million people are unemployed, no matter how the government boasts of its back-to-work record. We now have to deal with the worst economic situation that Canada has faced in 50 years. But is that, Sir, what the present cabinet ministers said while they sat in opposition? Oh, no, it was then that they boasted that they could cure all the ills of the country. In the Toronto Star of February 10, 1980, the then leader of the opposition, the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), was quoted as follows:

I would want to manage the economy in such a way that interest rates would in fact come down . . . because the economy would be administered in a sounder way.

Well, whatever he may have wanted, Sir, he certainly has not been able to manage it. And then there was the hon. member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray) quoted in The Toronto

Sun of February 4, 1980, and I see him standing just outside the curtains and he may remember this, as having said:

> It is my belief we can manage the economy in a way that would allow us to have lower interest rates than we have now and I think we can have greater independence in interest rate policy.
> I don't think that allowing the dollar to have some downward adjustment—

I hope the minister is listening.

> —would do as much harm to our economy, as our present high level of interest rates.

I wonder if the minister remembers that. I wish he had carried that message to his Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). And again the same minister speaking in the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs on October 30, 1979 said this to the then minister of finance:

> Mr. Minister—your high interest rate policy—

It was a lot lower than the interest rate is at the present time, but he said:

> —will put housing beyond the reach of most middle and lower-income Canadians. It will hurt small business, which depends on bank borrowing to operate. It will hurt farmers, who have the same dependency on bank borrowing and will add, therefore, to the cost of food.

I am sure we can all say amen to that, and I wish the minister were saying those words today. But what he was saying and what others were saying at that time when they were in opposition, Sir, was that a high interest rate policy will lead to bankruptcies all across the country, personal, small business and farm bankruptcies.

Yes, the Liberal opposition was then concerned about high interest rates which were running at about 12 per cent, 13 per cent, 14 per cent and how those rates would lead to an increasing number of bankruptcies. However, once back in office their concern vanished. They could not care less about the root causes of bankruptcies, all they are concerned about is the way in which they were handled. In opposition the Liberal spokesmen promised goods that they could not deliver and they knew they could not deliver, and now they are beginning to be caught out and people are beginning to vent their anger against what the government has done, because you see, Sir, people really do not like being cheated and outsmarted and duped, and eventually made to pay the price.

The government, and particularly the Minister of Finance who some would say has led a charmed political life, is now under attack and he does not like it, and so the government stutters and stumbles and staggers its way through a barrage of criticism of its own making. Yes, they weave and they bob and they duck and they blame the situation on everybody but themselves. We have the minister saying that he cannot control our high interest rates because the American rates are too high. He says he cannot make a dent in inflation because people's expectations are too high. It is the Minister of Finance who is bankrupt as far as any ideas of improving this situation are concerned, and so he turns to hon. members on the other side of the House and pleads with them: Tell me what to do. He forgets that he is the Minister of Finance and that the present Liberal cabinet while in opposition made the fatuous promise that if the Liberal party were re-elected they would know exactly what do do.

Well, these days, Sir, safely out of sight in the inner sanctum of their departmental buildings, remote from real life, they move from consideration of higher interest rates to consideration of wage and price controls or to a tax based incomes policy. You can do that sort of thing if you are safely secluded in the penthouse of Place Bell Canada, but it shows that the government is bankrupt of ideas, of dollars and of any sense of responsibility.

However, in their distress they cry out for ideas. I offered one to the Minister of Finance the other day, that he set up a human misery index, something like the consumer price index but one which he can read daily so he will be aware of the hardship that he and the Liberal government are causing people. He will not be able to read that index on a beach in Hawaii, in Kuwait or even in Gabon where he is at the present time, but surely he can read it if he goes across the country and talks to small businessmen, farmers, individuals and people on fixed incomes. He will find out then what the human misery index is all about.

The other day we on this side were accused of pretending to be sympathetic to the plight of these people. In the situation which now confronts us, there is certainly no need to pretend. The suffering is there, the hardship is there, the uncertainty and the insecurity are there. With them there is a growing feeling that somehow the economic situation is running completely out of control. Many, many Canadians are beginning to consider their own situations as hopeless.

If that is lurid language, as the Minister of Finance said the other day, let me give him and the government an example. I started to elaborate on this the other night when the clock reached 10 p.m. Last weekend I received a call to visit and talk with two of my friends. They are a husband and wife team who are in the hotel business. I have known them for 15 years. I know how hard-working they are. I know how committed they are to providing their customers with the very best service they can possibly offer. Because of the way they have run their business, it has always been well patronized. Some two years ago they decided to restore their building to its original lines and decor, to go back to the time when it was first built in Kingston 150 years ago. It is a big undertaking, but it is one which will enhance the historical reputation of Kingston.

The decision to restore their building certainly was not taken lightly. They did so after much thought and consultation with their banker, architects and friends. When I went over to see them that afternoon, I found them deep in despondency. I knew the situation was very serious for them. They told me that two years ago they borrowed some $650,000 in order to carry out this restoration. At that time they were paying 12 per cent interest on it. After the latest increase in the government's bank rate, they are now paying 21 per cent; an interest payment of some $3,000 per week.

What is so heart-breaking about their case is that they are working harder than ever and they are taking in more money than ever before, but when they put their weekly deposit into the bank, $3,000 is immediately grabbed off to pay interest rates. They have only enough left over to meet the salaries of their staff. Their cheques for supplies are being turned back. Their payment of $5,000 to Revenue Canada was returned the other day marked "NSF". To add insult to injury, government officials had slapped a $300 penalty charge on that cheque for non-payment. The reason they could not pay it in the first place was because of that same government's high interest rates.

This couple has always done everything on their own, as have so many other small businessmen across the country who make up the very backbone of our economy, and they end up being forced into bankruptcy. They applied for a small business development bond some five months ago, and it still has not been processed. So, they have to continue paying high interest rates week after week after week. Now they find themselves on the verge of despair, not knowing when they will be forced out of business, not knowing how to break the news to their 40 employees that they may no longer have jobs. That couple is but one facing a very bleak future.

I can cite another example of a small businessman who combines running a small business with a farm operation. His small business is in the farm industry sector which means he must stock up in inventory of farm machinery. As everyone knows, he must borrow against that inventory. That is normal, that is usual. But also, as most people know, the farm machinery business is slow. Its pace has become very slow. Anyone who has been following the trials and tribulations of Massey-Ferguson is aware of that, but the difference between Massey-Ferguson and the farmers and small businessmen in this country is that the government steps in to help out Massey-Ferguson massively. But, there is no help for the farmer or small businessman caught in the same situation. This man of whom I am speaking is now liable to have all or part of his farm seized to pay for the farm machinery loan. This farm has been in his family for generations. He too is feeling an overwhelming sense of despair and hopelessness. He would have a high rating on the human misery index.

What am I supposed to tell these people when they come to me for advice. Am I supposed to tell them to hold on for a few more weeks or months, absorb the increase? With what? Am I supposed to tell them what the Parliamentary Secretary to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. Evans) told the House last week? He said:

> The fundamental factor involved in this high interest rate condition is the transition through which we are going toward a more appropriate monetary policy for a lower inflation rate in the future.

In that barrage of words which add up to nothing what am I to tell my constituents who are losing their businesses and family farms? That kind of thing just does not register on the human misery index; that kind of gobbledygook just does not wash with Canadians who are suffering. I challenge the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance to use that line on any one of his constituents to see if it calms their fears about the future.

Fear for the future is very real among Canadians, especially those who are the hardest hit by the interest rate-inflation spiral in which we are now. As high interest rates fuel inflation instead of bringing it down, as the minister projected, it becomes more and more difficult for those on fixed and low incomes to keep food on the table.

The problem will get worse before it gets better. Even the governor of the Bank of Canada has acknowledged things will only get worse, when he said last week that the disease the country has contracted is not just a high inflation but escalating inflation. Does the government not realize what escalating inflation really means, apart from adding decimal points to our cost of living figures? Does the minister not realize what it means when prices for essential goods and essential foods have skyrocketed since interest rates started spiralling? I have mentioned before how basic food staples have gone up and up and up in the last year. All of these items, as they go up, add to a grocery bill which more and more people cannot afford. Many of them are being forced into personal bankruptcy because of the high interest rates. So we are caught in a vicious circle with inflation fueling high interest rates and, in turn, high interest rates fueling inflation. As the circle tightens, the small businessman and the consumer are strangled in the middle. The number of bankruptcies might be high now but I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that the number will grow before it diminishes if the government's present policies continue.

We need good bankruptcy laws; but more than that we need to stop the cause of bankruptcy. More than anything else we need preventive medicine, which means an interest rate policy that does not crush the small businessman before he has a chance to carry out his business. If we do not do something to attack the root of the problem, then this bill which we are considering will end up being the same kind of after-the-fact band-aid measure which the Liberal government has had to use over and over again to try to patch up a mess of its own creation. Bankruptcies are there because they have a cause. In Canada, many of these bankruptcies are being, and will continue to be, caused by the irresponsible monetary and fiscal policies of the government.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I intend to carry along on the basis of the principle and philosophy behind bankruptcy legislation, following the closing remarks of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald). I think all members of this House recognize that legislation covering bankruptcy is a federal measure which has been in need of reform for at least 15 years or longer. Great efforts have been made in the House, as well as in the other place, to come to a practical way of handling this necessary business adjustment, both in the personal profits of people as well as commercial operations. But we should also keep in mind, with regard to the question of debt, that the provinces have a long experience in this type of matter. I would like to mention a couple of items which need no explanation. They are well understood.

I am talking about the mechanic's lien act, in which the working man always receives first right in the case of any kind of debt not paid. This applies in all the western provinces. I am talking about threshermen's liens, which in the east are called subcontractors' liens, where the worker has preference over federal legislation and everyone else, including banks. Naturally, as I look at this bill, I search for this same kind of protection. There has been some forward motion in this regard, but the man who produces the wealth, the labouring man and the subcontractor, is still not placed in the highest priority position, where he should be.

I hope that in committee there will be some amendments which give equality of right to the working man who produces the wealth, as well as to the subcontractor who organizes the various streams of operations which go into the production of goods. I will not spend a great deal of time on this aspect, since it is indicative of the fact that this legislation is necessary. It can be improved. This is where the common sense and experience of members of Parliament close to their constituents can be very helpful.

I would like to go on to the history of one incident which struck me many years ago. We have had great collapses in parts of Canada on previous occasions. There is no one in this House who remembers the collapse of 1919 when farmers simply went bankrupt holus-bolus, banks closed down and refused to give credit to farmers because of the disastrous drop in prices after the Kaiser war. The second major experience which we have had in our history on this matter of credit delinquency occurred in the 1930s. Once again Parliament came through with fairly sensible legislation, the 1933 Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. This was a hallmark in social philosophy applied to a financial situation. It is no wonder that this was legislation drafted by westerners, but it was accepted by Parliament. Under the legislation, creditors and debtors would sit down with a government representative working under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act and look at the potential and real value of a farm. The first step was to scale down the debts to that potential, making it possible, with the expected hypothetical earnings, for that farmer to continue farming without going into bankruptcy. That legislation, which was extremely acceptable and well received by everyone, including the banks, enabled them to collect the money owed by the farmer and allowed the farmer to hang on to his farm. As far as the banks were concerned, it saved them cutting of their noses to spite their faces.

The second measure taken by Parliament was in 1934 when amendments were passed to the farm loans legislation which accompanied the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. In some cases the farmer could borrow money at low rates of interest, which were then the economic rates, to pay off certain types of debtors who could not, for their human and social interests, take their money over long extended periods. I mention these two items to remind the House that this situation, which was so vividly described by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands is not a new phenomenon. Past parliaments have coped with these problems in a practical and sensible way. Not everything was solved, but at least the tremendously dangerous effects that we all foresee with this high interest rate policy were cushioned.

I will not make my remarks purely partisan. I will try to be constructive in putting forward some proposals which I think are within the structure of the government to meet and which, at the same time, will not entail any subsidy by the government from the people it is trying to help. Let us learn from the experience of previous parliaments which had to grapple with a similar situation. As we know today from quantitative analysis, in heavily capitalized industries—and many of our industries fall within that category—the biggest single cost over an extended period of time is the amount of money which goes to interest. These are called capital intensive industries. For the very large industries with long pay-outs, 75 per cent of the total costs are due to capital repayments and interest charges. The average figure for the oil industry in Alberta from 1922 until 1957 was 75 per cent. Oil prices were low at that time, as were costs, and the industries were still able to make out because even at $1.50 at the wellhead, the costs of actual out-of-pocket money were only about 25 cents per barrel. The interest costs were around a dollar. The industry survived. It had to pay a little more money in royalties to the provincial governments and money in taxes to the federal government.

As a statistic, 75 per cent is frightening. But if you thought it was frightening from 1922 to 1957, just take a look at the costs today. When you add on the interest rates of today, suddenly there is disaster. What can we do in the long term loan pay-off situations with a high proportion going to interest rates? Let us take a very modest situation today. A home mortgage of $50,000 at an interest rate of 10 per cent—which you will never get—over a 30-year period, which was common ten years ago, would result in the home costing $202,000 if it were paid off over the 30-year period. So, $152,000 of that $202,000 was interest and only $50,000 was capital repayment.

● (2130)

My point is very clear. One can visualize it by buying one's home. Then apply it to a farmer. When a farmer goes out to expand his production, he finds that the latest rig in many of the farms in the east and west are these new modern harvest systems where the feed is handled in one monstrous system. These things cost about $250,000 to $400,000. The farmer no longer borrows $3,000 or $5,000, or sums like that. He knows that if he puts that $250,000 into that type of investment, it will increase his income by about $50,000 to $60,000 a year, that is, 20 per cent to 22 per cent. With that type of potential return, he can afford to borrow money at 6 per cent, 8 per cent or 10 per cent. I am going to use the figure of 8 per cent in this explanation to keep it constant. Eight per cent would mean that he would be paying $20,000 a year; but because he would have enough left over, he could pay off that $250,000 in eight to ten years. Then he would have interest and capital payments together. He would then have the use of that equipment for 15 to 20 years, with a return of $50,000 or $60,000 a year, which would be very useful to him, and he could go ahead.

However, if the interest rates were to rise to 20 per cent, which they have, 20 per cent of $250,000 is $50,000 a year. The interest rates alone then match his increased income. He will never pay off his capital costs and he will have nothing left over for depreciation, repairs and maintenance. So obviously it is a "no go" situation. Any farmer who is foolish enough to take out a loan at 20 per cent on a productive type of enterprise like that with the hypothetical cash flow that I have described, is going into clear bankruptcy, I would say, in three or four years, before all his creditors close in on him.

Here there is a situation where the cause, as the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands said, is the key issue. Bankruptcy is a legal technique of trying to make adjustments in credit indebtedness. However, here we have a government policy in the interests of a theory that has been proved, quantitatively, over 10, 20 years, to be wrong. Interest techniques are still being used as an interest of monetary policy when we can show, quantitatively that it does not work. That does not mean that all monetary theory is flying away. It simply has a little bit of interest, and we do not know how much, but it has some. We are willing to listen to thoughtful proposals from the bank governor about how far we should go in using this. But we should not use the interest rate component as a technique of using the monetary policy.

When the committee of finance met with the bank governor, I asked him three questions on this subject. In each case he said that he did not have any evidence that the three reasons he gave for having this high interest rate policy were working. He knew that I was sitting there with the figures I obtained from his own shop showing just the opposite to be true. He could do nothing else but agree with me. He agreed to sit and listen to practical proposals from ordinary members of Parliament at how he could get around this.

Tonight is not the night, under this act or bill, to talk about monetary theory. I want to talk about those matters which deal with government policy, the fiscal side, that do have some chance of drastically reducing the number of bankruptcies.

These suggestions I am putting forward are not new. The philosophy is based on things that I have learned from watching events in the last 20 or 30 years and seeing those things work and from looking at other countries where they have worked. I have four proposals which are really proposals for lower interest rates on the fiscal side, and would not in any form take away ownership or attempt to subsidize. I would like to put forward a rational proposal under which one divides the costs at a fixed interest rate, the interest either going to the lender or the equity going to the company.

These four proposals are based on this principle. Massey-Ferguson let itself borrow to such a degree that the interest on its borrowings was greater than its income. This proud private company had to struggle mightily this last year or so, even to bending its knees and asking the government for help. It begged the banks for help. It made a tremendous shift from a small equity portfolio of 18 million to 20 million shares up to about 220 million shares. It required a tremendous dilution of equity to get enough money to pay off part of that debt and to reduce its interest payment to a point where it could begin to have more income than the interest payments so it could pay off more of the capital or principal.

This thinking could be applied to all companies that use inventory based on loans. General Motors, Chrysler, and Ford are all going to go down the skids unless they adapt and do what Massey-Ferguson has done. The handwriting on the wall is clear for these large companies which followed the custom in the last 20 or 30 years of using the interest rate approach to give them leverage, to make money, using someone else's money at a lower cost than the income they will get. When interest rates rise beyond a certain point, that leverage is gone and instead it becomes the ruination of the whole financial structure.

I am going to make these four proposals one at a time in the hope that government members particularly will carry back to their committees—whether they be on agriculture, small business, trade, export—how this can be done, with the assurance that other people are succeeding in this technique and are actively going on to expand and carry out business. They can get away from this high interest rate threat which is imposed on us by theoretical approaches to the monetary system of keeping inflation down.

The first proposal, obviously coming from me, deals with farm credit. During the Diefenbaker administration, we tried to modernize farm credit by setting up the Farm Credit Corporation with great flexibility in the form of lending and repayment. To my sadness and regret, these techniques were not used too much because both the lenders, who were used to the old farm loan act, and the borrowers, who were used to the same type of lending on assets rather than on financial income, followed the old system. Because of that, they do not realize that in the legislation which allows us this flexibility one does not have to change the act to do what I am proposing. It is sufficient simply for the minister in charge of the Farm Credit Corporation, who is supposed to be the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), but I really do not know who is in charge, to use his initiative. He could go out and say that the type of interest rate we are now charging under the Farm Credit Corporation will destroy every farmer who uses it and destroy the act, and that is not the purpose of that act. He could say there is a proposal which will work, there is lots of evidence one can get that it does work, and that is it. One could simply tell a man on farm credit to come to the farm credit supervisor—and there are many scattered over the whole of Canada, well skilled in the costs of input going into farm production, well skilled in knowing the prices and returns—and put a hypothetical cash flow chart in front of him. With this type of investment we can demonstrate how much income he needs each year and how much he can afford to pay in interest and capital and still have something left.

• (2140)

An 8 per cent interest on a $250,000 loan will come to about $20,000 per year. The farmer will have enough left over to pay that interest and a big chunk of the capital each year. He can see the debt being paid off in eight or ten years. To get that kind of money without a subsidy requires a sweetener, and "sweetener" is the right word. We must hold this out to the lender, in this case the Farm Credit Corporation which has looked at the hypothetical cash flow and the corporation then agrees on a percentage that is paid off after the debt, a percentage of that new profit, not the old profit, on this new investment yielding a new return of $50,000 to $60,000 per year. The Farm Credit Corporation might put down the figure of 5 per cent; 5 per cent of $50,000 is $2,500 per year and 10 per cent would be $5,000 per year. If the farmer is getting, with all his debt and interest paid off, say, 10 per cent and is turning this over to the Farm Credit Corporation, even though he has paid them back the capital, he thinks, "I can easily afford $5,000 or $6,000 per year for the next ten or 15 years." He finds that for five or ten years, with the total amount of money received and the total amount invested—remember the money has been returned and the Farm Credit Corporation has already reinvested it—that could be a point where there is no subsidy, and at the same time you have not put that burden of front-end loading on the farmer, the burden of paying from the very beginning. You take the earnings half out of fixed cost or 8 per cent, and the balance after he has finished paying his debt for the period of the useful life expectancy of the equipment, that is 15 or 20 years at, say, 10 per cent. If you work out the mathematics and try them out at various rates, you will get a rate and a time period within which both sides are treated fairly. The Farm Credit Corporation will show no loss after a few years and the farmer will be way ahead of the game.

When you have a deal that is mutually beneficial to both parties, it is a good deal. When you have a deal where one side is always the winner, you can guess who the loser will always be in debt-credit relationships.

I put this forward in this House again in all seriousness, hoping it will get through to the farmers that an idea has been proposed that will remove the tremendous fear of the future that weighs on them like a ten-ton load. Instead of seeing all that they have fought for and built up over two or three generations being taken away because of high interest rates, they can see a way through where there is no subsidy from the public treasury over the long period but where there is an increase of wealth and productivity, which means more people are working and more taxes are coming in for the government.

The second proposal is roughly the same, and it is for small business development. Just like the Farm Credit Corporation, we have a business institution in the Bank of Canada which deals with small business loans. The idea of the Small Business Development Bond was put forward in the Crosbie budget. It was turned down in the MacEachen budget but was restored, as we all know. We are very grateful that members on the other side listened and restored it, even if it is only to the end of this year. But we hope that it can be extended for another few years.

The same principle would apply as I suggested should be applied to the farmers. A small businessman can bring before the authorities a hypothetical cash flow which shows that if he borrows $500,000 and puts it to work, he can produce $60,000, $80,000, or $90,000 of revenue per year. If he is building on to something that he has already, this is quite possible. The same mathematics apply to determine what interest rate can be charged to make sure that he pays it back quickly.

I know of five or six instances in my riding where businessmen are choosing this route over the route followed by the small business development bond. The bond was not a bad idea, but this one is even better as we consider its implications. There is no loss of ownership. I am thinking of the areas of expansion in Manitoba and Saskatchewan around the potash mines and the uranium mines and the development of the cities of Saskatoon and Regina. In those cities the small businessmen who supply the mines employ the larger work force than do the mines. We need this type of thing to keep our development going; to get something going that we can sell and make money on; to employ more people and to provide more taxes. The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) should be very happy. No subsidy would be called for but new money would be coming in. It would reduce costs, bring in more revenue to the government and help balance the budget for these various proposals.

The third proposal is for export companies. This Parliament has been busy trying to figure out some way to build machinery to help the export industry. We have been thinking about legislating an international trading company run by the government. Quite frankly, I am very dubious that this is the best way to go. I think the better way would be to make it a sort of financial operation. Money for that long lead time that export companies need before they get a cash flow could be provided at a low interest rate and a big share could be taken as the sweetner. In other words, defer the take until the money comes back because there is no industry in the world at the present time that yields higher returns than the export business. A return of 25 per cent or 30 per cent is quite usual, but there is a delay factor involved. It is during this delay, which is necessary for building up the business and before the money comes in, that they have to be financed. Canadians are very good at this. We have the technical know-how; we take it with us; we teach and practise, but we make money out of it at the same time. I think that if export companies had access to a low interest rate or even a large proportion of shares for the government, then using the share approach of equity or by the sweetener approach plus a loan, by using the same hypothetical cash flow approach that I used in the case of small business and farmers, a great deal could be done to increase the wealth, not only of Canada but of all the nations we work with. Trade is beneficial to both sides. This should have the highest priority in terms of a worldwide sense of responsibility. I have watched what is being done in France, Germany, the United Kingdom, the United States and Japan using these principles.

I would think that we are smart enough to do this too. These enterprising businessmen who take an awful beating over the two or three-year loss period in order to get their business going, would be glad to share 25 per cent or 30 per cent of their business profits when they come, if they knew they were getting this money at a low rate of interest. The federal government has the machinery in the export legislation to do this.

The next proposal affects more people, and that is the matter of homes. I think the social revolution of the last 50 years has definitely included homes as a social need and a social necessity—not only health care, but homes. I believe all parties have accepted that homes are a part of the quality of life, of mental security, raising a family and all the rest of it. I think we should apply this same reasoning to a home. However, a home is slightly different. This proposal I want to put forward now is not new or original, it was made by leading businessmen. It lacks one thing, as hon. members will soon realize.

If you want to encourage young people to marry and live in a single dwelling so as to get away from the mental health problem associated with high rises and crowded ghettos, I would think money should be put out at about 6 per cent. You say to people that the government is part owner with you. In other words, the individuals own the home but the government has an interest because the government is lending the money at 6 per cent. However, if the individual sells the house in ten years, making a big capital gain in return for having that money at 6 per cent, the capital gain is shared 50-50 with the government.

Let me cite some statistics. Over the last 20 years, how long have people stayed in the same homes in the new industrial urban centres? It is not very long, there are even people making a living out of buying and selling homes, and living on their capital gains. There are ordinary individuals who buy homes, sell them and repeat the process. People have found out that this is one way to keep ahead of inflation. I am saying that in trying to help all the people a 6 per cent charge could be put on loans by the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. This corporation is a very efficient agency. We would say to them that by living in their homes for longer than ten years, they could make these homes their own. The stipulation could be that the money has to be paid back very quickly, as quickly as possible, in order to reduce the subsidy. But if this money was repaid within ten years, then half of the capital gain must accrue to the government. If that situation were put onto a hypothetical cash flow chart for the whole industry, you would find that the government—Canada Mortgage and Housing in this case—would make much more money from a 6 per cent charge plus the capital gains than it would ever make charging 15 per cent interest. A person making a big capital gain can afford to pay that a lot easier than he can afford to pay a 15 per cent or an 18 per cent mortgage. Paying these high interest rates is killing. It is front-end loading for 20 years of a person's life. The insecurity and the fear which comes from that heavy mortgage and its high interest rate is not good for the mental health of Canadians.

To the persons who have not heard those four proposals before they may sound a little unique. But every one of them is based on old-fashioned principles of borrowing and lending. The principle of sharing in the profit from a common investment goes back long before the time of Christ. There is a human side to this which is very important to our modern industrial society.

In these proposals, export companies, small business and farm credit, big sectors of our economy, could be getting money at 8 per cent or whatever rate is decided, and money could be lent for housing at 6 per cent. There is no subsidy, and when you think of the things that are happening with expansion, you will see that the big winner in the whole thing is not the individual from whom you have taken away fear, having added tremendously to his income, it is the government because the individual is now paying more taxes with his big income. This would make the Minister of Finance and all the civil servants who think of nothing else but getting more money happy. I would think acceptance of this proposal would be found among the civil servants who must be concerned about what is happening to the country, and among the politicians who have some desire to come back here again.

If this interest rate question is not settled, it will not be just western Canada that will move, but the whole country. Not only will the farmers of Quebec and Ontario be rallying behind us, but the small businessmen from Newfoundland to British Columbia to the Yukon. The Liberal government is facing political disaster of the kind that will take the Liberal party, if it does not listen, out of existence for 50 years. It is not that I would not mind that happening, but in the interests of the country the government must start to think about the needs of the people.

Mr. Huntington: Think, not study.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): You do not sit in the House and applaud when hon. members make statements that people are better off today. The first thing taught in politics is that you never tell anyone he is better off. A politician has only one function, and that is to remind everyone that the poor guy is not making out so well. That is the first political rule. But to go out and say that the farmers are making so much money that they do not mind paying these interest rates or that people are so well off that, as we heard the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) say, their income is up 52 per cent, is political immaturity of the highest order. It is not the sign of a competent national politician who should be sitting in this House.

I say to the government, for heavens sake, if you can get either a proposal or a series of proposals on which there is no subsidy but, by an analysis of these hypothetical cash flows, you head off all these bankruptcies, create more productivity, more money for the tax collector, a balanced budget, more employment, and reduce social costs, then I would think that all these tweedledum and tweedledee arguments that we have been hearing in this House the past week should be forgotten. As a Canadian I certainly do not want to see or hear people who are professional politicians applauding when someone says that people are so well off they can afford these interest rates. First, it is naiveté of the highest order and second, it is not true.

I would think that without saying any more, I have done what I could under the principles of this bill to head off the cause of these bankruptcies by putting these proposals forward. They can be acted on with existing legislation, and as long as you have the will to make sure ministers pass on these proposals to the civil servants, there would not be any opposition from them because they know what the people of Canada are thinking. We do not want to see a repeat of early history. After World War I, in 1919, people from the rural areas of Canada rose up with might and main and threw every Liberal and Conservative out of every seat they could and brought the progressive movement here. They settled the situation. They simply saw to it that the Bank Act had limited interest rate to 6 per cent. We have now got rid of that limit in the Bank Act on the promise that the banks would reduce interest rates. Now, by Jove, we had better get busy and save our own skins by coming up with some positive ideas and putting them into effect.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege for me to have the opportunity to rise tonight to comment on Bill C-12, an act respecting bankruptcy and insolvency. I suspect, by looking at the clock and seeing what time it is, that it would be appropriate to call it ten o'clock.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION—(A) PLANS FOR FUTURE ROLE. (B) CHAIRMANSHIP OF BOARD OF DIRECTORS

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Mr. Speaker, I rise this evening in connection with questions I have been raising on the floor of the House of Commons in concert with my colleagues, relating to the attempt on the part of the government to interfere in a political way with the operation of the Canada Development Corporation. We raised this question on a number of occasions. We were met with evasiveness and an attempt to circumvent the question on the part of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) who professed ignorance of the point we were making. At the same time that he was professing ignorance in this House, at which he is so adept in terms of parliamentary debate, he was being undercut by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in Calgary who at the same time admitted quite candidly that a direct attempt was made to influence the selection of a new chairman of the board of directors. The Prime Minister admitted that the government did want their very good friend, Mr. Maurice Strong, to be the chairman of the board of directors of the Canada Development Corporation.

• (2200)

It subsequently developed and was learned that the government was not only satisfied with trying to promote Mr. Strong, a friend of the Liberal party and confidant of this government, the Prime Minister and his staff, for the top position in the Canada Development Corporation, but they were more ambitious than to simply want Mr. Strong as the chairman. They wanted to intrude into the board of directors a number of prominent Liberals, including Mr. William Mingo, from Atlantic Canada, who is active in Liberal party circles, and Mr. Paul Martin Jr., son of a former Liberal cabinet minister and leader of the government in the Senate, former high commissioner to the United Kingdom and a well known Liberal.

It is important to understand the consequences of exactly what is happening as a result of the government's heavy-handed, ham-handed attempt to harass each of the existing directors with regard to the government's wish to garner control of the board of directors of CDC. It is no secret that they have contacted each of the directors, putting pressure on them in a number of ways to convince them that they would be well advised to have certain people in certain positions on the board of directors, indeed to have certain members added to the board of directors.

This is quite contrary to the spirit and, in fact, the letter of the law passed by this Parliament creating the Canada Development Corporation. I went back into the record. I thought it would be appropriate at this time to review exactly what was said at the time the bill setting up the Canada Development Corporation was before the House of Commons. The then minister of finance who introduced and brought the bill before the House made a number of germane and pertinent statements with regard to the role of the CDC and the provisions of the bill. I quote from page 3639 of Hansard for February 22, 1971 where Mr. Benson stated:

> But the CDC will also pursue profits, a word that apparently dismays the New Democrats, and the CDC will operate free of pressure by departments of the federal government . . .
> The high quality of the board and the chief executive officer will ensure the corporation of the degree of independence in its operations which it will require to carry out its objectives effectively.

I underline the word "independence" which apparently now is not part of the government's thinking in terms of this corporation. I am glad to see the parliamentary secretary to the present minister here because his predecessor in that position, Pat Mahoney, whom he will recall, also spoke in that debate. On June 4, 1971, as reported at page 6391 of Hansard, speaking with respect to governmnent policy and government intentions regarding this legislation, he said:

Some critics of the CDC concept believe that any government participation in the corporation will be synonymous with interference in its operation. The best protection against such interference is a strong and independent board of directors chosen from the private sector. The bill explicitly contemplates their independence. I am confident that as soon as the CDC is incorporated a strong board will be readily formed and will assert its independence.

The word "independence" keeps coming up over and over again in the course of the debate. He went on to make reference to the fact that there had been some suggestion that the Canada Development Corporation could have some of the similar down sides and pitfalls experienced by the General Investment Corporation of Quebec. He pointed out that in the case of the General Investment Corporation of Quebec there was a situation in which investments were made by that corporation for what were regarded as national or social priorities in the province of Quebec. He said that the experience of that institution was one of the reasons why the Canada Development Corporation would be placed in the hands of a very independent board of directors and that when social or political objectives intervene in business decisions, business judgment suffers. I do not think anything could be clearer in terms of the government's position when the Canada Development Corporation was established. There was to be no room at all for any political interference with respect to the operation of that body, but now, without the benefit of a change in the legislation, without any attempt to change the act itself and by virtue of attempting to control the board of directors, the government is attempting to change the direction in which that corporation is going.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) has been critical of the corporation. The Prime Minister has been critical. I could quote statements made over the course of the last few months in which they have indicated that they want to change the Canada Development Corporation to make it the same kind of corporation as Petro-Canada. There has been a very substantial loss in the value of those shares. Canadian citizens, having invested money in good faith, are now finding that their investment is being prejudiced by the action of the government. I would like to hear the parliamentary secretary respond to this question.

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, questions have been raised in the House concerning the role and responsibilities of the Canada Development Corporation and its relationship to the Government of Canada. The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) indicated rather clearly to the House in response to questions the principal factors which govern this relationship and which derive from the legislative mandate of the corporation.

Hon. members will recall that the CDC was established by a special act of Parliament in 1971 with a mandate expressed in the purpose and objectives of the corporation.

As stated in section 2 of the CDC Act:

The purpose of this act is to establish a corporation that will help develop and maintain strong Canadian-controlled and managed corporations in the private sector of the economy and will give Canadians greater opportunities to invest and participate in the economic development of Canada.

The corporate form established pursuant to the act provides for an investment company with responsibility for investment decision-making and managerial functions assigned to the corporation.

Hon. members will be aware that the successful investment activities of the CDC during the 1970s have led to a situation where the corporation is now a relatively large-scale holding company with a significant presence and developmental role in a variety of sectors of the Canadian economy. While the Government of Canada continues to be the largest single shareholder, the level of non-government ownership has substantially increased. The fact remains that the CDC continues to operate under the federal statute, and, as the Minister of Finance noted in the House, "The investment decisions of the corporation are still the responsibility of the corporation".

The corporate form adopted pursuant to the CDC Act provides for the affairs of the corporation to be entrusted to the board of directors and officers of the corporation who are accountable to the shareholders as a whole, both the public shareholder and the private shareholders. The act requires that the objects of the company shall be carried out in anticipation of profit and in the best interests of the shareholders as a whole. I should add that the act explicitly places responsibility for the election of a chairman of the board with the directors of the corporation.

In short, the nature of the relationship between the government and the CDC has been established by, and is subject to, legislation of the Parliament of Canada. The success of the initiative taken by the government in establishing the CDC is a matter of record. It has given Canadians greater opportunities to invest and participate in the economic development of Canada, and the government's confidence in the corporation has been shared by the large number of individual Canadians who have acquired shares in the CDC.

METRIC CONVERSION—(A) MINISTER'S RESPONSIBILITIES TO SMALL BUSINESS. (B) REQUEST FOR REPEAL OF ENFORCEMENT ORDER

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I rise as a result of an answer received in the House of Commons on April 13 of this year, as reported at pages 9198 and 9199 of Hansard. The question asked of the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism (Mr. Lapointe) was this:

Would the minister responsible for small business advise this House whether he will or will not speak for small business, and address the concern of small business about forced metric conversion in Canada?

The minister responded in part:

As for me, I am convinced that I speak also for Canadian small businesses, and my contacts in the small business sector do not lead me to the same conclusions as the hon. member.

Obviously, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism is not aware of what is going on in the small business sector. As reported in the Peterborough Examiner of May 11, 1981:

If the government goes ahead with the legislation, it will be against the will of the public.

That is the statement of the president of the Canadian Federation of Retail Grocers who surveyed 4,000 independent grocers in Canada and found that 85 per cent were opposed to forced metric conversion at this time in the retail food sector. The reason for this is the fact that the United States has now decided not to proceed with metric conversion in their retail food sector for at least ten years and perhaps never, and in Britain they have abolished the metric commission and have gone back to pints and quarts and miles per hour and Fahrenheit and pounds of meat when you purchase it at the store.

• (2210)

The minister is not speaking for either consumers or the independent grocers. Further, as reported in the Ottawa Citizen of Saturday, May 9, 1981:

Retailers on the Metric Commission's own working group on retail scales are upset about a government plan to introduce metric weights in food stores starting next January.

That is January 28, Mr. Speaker. The article goes on:

The group represents the views of retailers responsible for about 85 per cent of food sales in Canada . . .

At a meeting of the group in Vancouver April 28, a "consensus" was reached that food retailers in the group strongly recommend a delay in metric conversion.

They recommended that the conversion should take place closer to the time the United States makes the switch. At present, the U.S. has no plans to go metric in the sale of food by weight.

To date the following organizations have condemned the costly and unjustified program to convert the food stores to metric in Canada: the Canadian Federation of Retailer Grocers, the Canadian Organization of Small Business; the Retail Council of Canada; Loblaws Companies Ltd; the Oshawa Group; Cooper Market Incorporated; the Independent Grocers' Association and Loeb Limited of Ottawa, to name but a few.

Thousands of letters of protest from concerned citizens, responding to the opportunity afforded them in The Canada Gazette where they had 60 days to make representations with regard to the order in council, have inundated the desks of the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet), all stating very definitely that they do not wish to go metric at this time in the retail food sector.

The cost of conversion in the food stores will be astronomical and far in excess of any benefits that might result if in fact there are any benefits. According to the government's own 1974 study on the question, there are over 116,000 separate food scales that must be converted in Canada. The average conversion cost is $5,000, therefore the total cost for Canada will be in the region of $564 million to purchase metric weigh scales manufactured in foreign countries by multinational companies, and not one of those imported weigh scales is creating jobs here in Canada.

The metric advisory board in the United States made its recommendations ten years before the implementation of metric in the retail food sector. The United States Congress listened and decided to defer metric in the retail food sector for at least ten years and maybe never. In 1980, Canadians imported $1.78-million worth of imperial weighed food from the United States, our major trading partner in fruit, vegetables, fish and meat. Not one pound or one ounce of that product was imported from the United States in metric.

Our next largest trading partner is Britain, with 16 per cent of our food products. Britain has abandoned its metric program as counterproductive, confusing and a waste of tax dollars. According to the 1970 Canadian government white paper on metric conversion prepared by the present Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin), the whole spirit of conversion in Canada was to be voluntary. Why then is the retail food sector being victimized by the threat of fines of up to $5,000 and jail terms of up to two years for non-compliance, for simply publishing the price in imperial or carrying on trade in a measurement system which is perfectly familiar to our citizens?

In light of the foregoing which clearly indicates where the minister's duty should lie in responding accurately to the wishes of both the business sectors and the citizens of Canada, will the minister report to the House as soon as possible, because a six-month lead time is required for conversion by the food sector in order to implement metric in the retail food sector, on the results of his having looked into the possibility of this ill-advised program as he promised in the House of Commons? Will he finally admit that metric conversion is still ill-advised, counterproductive, hopelessly expensive, totally inconvenient and utterly against the wishes of the people of Canada?

Mr. Ralph Ferguson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the minister said in the House on April 13 that the Canadian small business sector benefits from metric conversion in Canada. This statement was based not only on statistical data but on direct accounts from small business people and organizations such as the Canadian Chamber of Commerce which represents all kinds of businesses, large and small.

First of all, I would like to point out that shopping habits will not change drastically when retail scales are converted to weighing in grams and kilograms. When consumers buy by sight, as they often do when they select a store wrapped roast, that fish or four pork chops, they will continue to shop exactly as they shopped before. The only change is when they actually order a specific quantity in grams or kilograms. A great deal of information is already available to help us adjust to ordering by kilogram. There are posters illustrating normal buying quantities in metric units, such as "a 500-gram steak for two".

Mr. Kempling: Have you ever gone into a restaurant and ordered a 500-gram steak for two?

Mr. Ferguson: These posters are displayed in stores. There will also be posters and pamphlets comparing price per pound with price per kilogram. During the transition period, prices per pound, as well as per kilogram or per 100-gram, will be shown both on in-store signs and in newspaper ads. This will permit shoppers to assure themselves that they are getting the same value for their money, whether priced by the pound or by the kilogram. Retailers can continue this practice until the end of the conversion period.

In a 1979-1980 review, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce explicitly stated that any move to halt or curtail the change to metric measurement in Canada will be "retrograde and excessively wasteful of the many resources from both the public and private sectors that have been devoted to the conversion process". Many companies have provided Metric Commission Canada with details of their increased productivity and market penetration as a direct result of metric conversion.

Some hon. Members: Name one.

Mr. Ferguson: A small company in Manitoba which contracts, processes and markets dry peas and other speciality crops is an example of a company which has gone metric. Albert Roy, owner of the company, said that conversion to metric has helped maintain good relations with important customers and to keep large accounts in foreign markets that deal only in metric. As well he said that it is administratively more efficient to use metric throughout the operation.

Going metric for another company, namely La Cidrerie du Québec Ltée, which exports its ciders to the United States, has meant not only increased exports but a reduction in the number of sizes and the standardization of its containers, resulting in reduced production and inventory costs.

A large percentage of the approximate 500,000 small businesses in Canada is made up of farmers and fishermen. Thus, it is important to know that total Canadian agricultural exports have surpassed $8 billion per year, which represents approximately 50 per cent of the cash receipts of farmers. Over 80 per cent of these export products are shipped to metric countries. This means that more than one third of the cash income of the farmer is dependent upon exports to metric countries.

One particular company that I checked on a week ago today which manufactures copper tubing and other specialty products converted to metric over two years ago. The company advised me that it is not able to keep abreast of its export orders.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

ENERGY CONSERVATION—(A) ABUSE OF CANADIAN HOME INSULATION PROGRAM. (B) INVOLVEMENT OF LOCAL ORGANIZATIONS IN CERTIFICATION PROCESS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, on April 1 I asked a question of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) regarding the Canadian Home Insulation Program. While recognizing that the program is essentially a step in the right direction in terms of energy conservation, and also recognizing that most of the contractors, firms and individuals involved are doing a first rate job, one must recognize that the program is being seriously abused by some unscrupulous entrepreneurs.

I have personally witnessed what can only be described as misleading advertising on a number of occasions, which gives the impression to the householder that the opportunity is free of charge, essentially with the exception of a nominal sum. What is often missing from the ads is a note that the grant received from the federal government will be considered taxable on next year's return. What must be said of the unscrupulous entrepreneurs is that they are defrauding citizens by asking them to sign blank application forms, giving the story that it is an application form which will be used in the next household. In a variety of fashions it is implied that these unscrupulous entrepreneurs are really an extension of the federal government, an arm of a particular government department.

Perhaps most serious of all is the incorrect information which is filed with the government department concerned. For example, entrepreneurs are possibly using six bags of insulation material in the home while charging the federal government for 30 bags. In some instances, where a very small house is being insulated, more insulation than is actually used is being charged for. The insulators may be charging for three hours of labour at the rate of $37.50 per hour, which is supposedly a very reasonable rate, while actually they are spending only 20 minutes on the job. As one would expect, some of the major offences are occurring in the major metropolitan areas of Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver. While the entrepreneur indicates to the home owner that he will be sending out a copy of the invoice eventually, seldom are these invoices ever received.

As I indicated, I have personally witnessed a number of examples of this fraudulent activity. The police and the government department have been notified, yet very little is being done. What is being done? The government department indicates that where a situation is reported by a home owner and fraudulent activity is suspected, an investigation takes place. In many cases the unsuspecting home owner is not certain whether 6 or 30 bags of insulation were used. In many cases he is not sure whether 20 minutes or 3 hours of work was done. What is being charged is never made known to the individual home owner because of misrepresented information and the invoice not being returned to the home owner. The minister indicated that certification would take place some time this fall. In the meantime, these fraudulent activities have occurred and, presumably, they will continue throughout the summer and into the autumn.

The minister also indicated that in terms of providing some inspection, the Royal Canadian Legion would be involved across the country. I am not suggesting that the Royal Canadian Legion is inefficient. I am certainly not saying anything against the legion. However, one would have to ask what is their expertise when it comes to inspecting home insulation and things of that nature.

It seems to me that a much more reasonable approach would be to take advantage of the local inspection infrastructure which presently exists in Canadian communities across the country, and at least ask them to conduct spot checks to identify where certain firms are carrying out these fraudulent activities. Thank goodness they are few in number! Why are more firms not being prosecuted when, in fact, they are being brought to the attention of the department and the RCMP?

As this program is bound to continue in one form or another, I would like to suggest that the government consider involving various community groups and organizations where the opportunity would exist to provide local work for people in various communities. Labour would be provided locally as opposed to that on a national or, in some cases, multinational basis. The people involved would certainly feel more accountable. In other words, as the home owner would be approached by someone from his community, perhaps a community agency or group which would be identified, the possibility of fraudulent activities would certainly diminish. Again, it would do a great deal in terms of creating a sense and a need for conservation and for making our homes more energy efficient. It would do a great deal toward that by keeping the work itself within the communities across Canada.

In closing, I would suggest that the idea is certainly a good one, but it has been introduced in haste, without having been prepared with thought.

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, in responding to the hon. member's earlier question, the minister stated that the overwhelming majority of insulation contractors are honest and are doing a good job. Where there have been abuses reported of the types outlined by the hon. member opposite, there have been investigations and, when required, prosecutions.

More specifically, since 1977, when the government first introduced the Canadian home insulation program, almost one million grants have been made. This has led to significant savings in Canadian home owners' heating costs, regardless of the fuel used, and it has helped to move our country toward its objective of oil self-sufficiency.

Since the CHIP program was introduced, some 70,000 units have been selected for inspection across the country. As a result of those inspections, 36 contracting companies are presently under investigation. In addition, a further 17 companies are under police investigation, with charges having been laid against 11 companies. Here is clear evidence that the government has been monitoring the industry in order to protect consumers from possible abuse. By inspecting homes which have been insulated and by investigating abuses reported by consumers, the government is keeping this situation under review.

Further, in collaboration with the industry, the government has instituted a certification program which requires insulation contractors to pass examinations before being approved under the CHIP. As hon. members may be aware, the Royal Canadian Legion, as the hon. member has noted, is assisting the Canadian General Standards Board in providing the necessary facilities for the examination of insulation contractor personnel. The CGSB national certification program has already listed 900 of the total of over 2,000 contractors in its certification program. The mandatory date for the use of certified contractors will be November 1.

I should like to remind hon. members that the National Energy Program has a goal to upgrade insulation in 70 per cent of Canadian homes by 1987. The certification program contributes in a real way to the effective administration of the CHIP.

These facts are indicative of the careful supervision being given to the home insulation program and of the government's determination to ensure that Canadians are guaranteed good products and good work. It is a large program and it is one which will pay large dividends in terms of energy conservation and fuel savings for home owners.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

PARLIAMENTARY APPROVAL OF APPOINTMENTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I rise to seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In light of the dismissal of Robert J. Bertrand, Assistant Deputy Minister of the Bureau of Competition Policy and Director of Research and Investigation under the Combines Investigation Act, by the Liberal cabinet, and as a result of questions recently raised by interference with the Advisory Council on the Status of Women by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy), I move, seconded by the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence):

That the House request the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to make a full statement on motions setting forth in detail the reasons for Mr. Bertrand's dismissal by cabinet, and that the matter be referred to a parliamentary committee whose mandate will include examining the present reporting relationship to cabinet of these officials, advisory councils and agencies, with a view to respecting the principle that all future appointments be approved by Parliament to ensure that the power of the executive is limited and the role of Parliament is enlarged.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

DUMPING OF CHEMICAL WASTES INTO NIAGARA RIVER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter which I think all fair-minded members of the House will view as urgent and pressing under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

The SCA Chemical Services, hazardous waste disposal company of New York State petitioned that state to relax restrictions on the amount of chemical industrial pollution it is allowed to discharge into the Niagara River. Since millions of gallons of such waste are to be pumped from the SCA site through a five-mile pipeline into the river less than two miles upstream from the source of drinking water of literally thousands of Canadians, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm):

That this House goes on record as vigorously opposing any relaxation of New York State permit standards which will cause the Canadian environment to be polluted or the health of Canadians to be harmed.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

WORLD HEALTH ORGANIZATION

CANADIAN POSITION ON SALES OF INFANT FORMULA TO THIRD WORLD COUNTRIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that in the Third World 10 million babies suffer and one million die from starvation and disease due to bottle feeding every year, and that this situation has led the World Health Organization to introduce an international code to curb promotion of infant formula in developing nations, and in view of the fact that the United States government is on record as being opposed to this code, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell):

That this House send a message to the U.S. government, informing it that Canada intends to support the international code, and asking that the U.S. government reconsider its position and vote in favour of the code in recognition of the fact that the World Health Organization is aiming to protect infant lives.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

S.O. 43

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

PENSIONS PAID TO WIDOWS AND ORPHANS OF FORMER MEMBERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Each day Liberal and NDP policies make it more expensive to eat and live in Canada. At the same time there are 39 widows of RCMP personnel who have pensions of less than $100 a month, a total of 193 receive less than $300 a month, and there are 216 children who are orphans and receive an average of $69.12 a month. Liberal policy has made it impossible for them to live on these amounts. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen):

That the Solicitor General immediately take the necessary steps to ensure that the widows and orphans of members of the RCMP who have served this country be given pensions which make it possible for them to live with dignity in the country.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

PRICE OF SYNTHETIC CRUDE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas the government indicated its desire to settle the current oil pricing impasse with the producing provinces and its strong support for the continued development of Canada's oil sands resources, vital to Canada's energy future, and whereas the Suncor operation at Fort McMurray receives approximately $17 per barrel for its synthetic production, while Syncrude Canada across the road receives world prices, creating a situation where prospective oil sands investors might quite legitimately wonder if they too will be given the "Suncor shaft", I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor):

That the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources establish immediately a pricing structure for synthetic crude production which will eliminate this discriminatory pricing practice and encourage stabilization and development of the oil sands industry.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HUMAN RIGHTS

ABOLITION OF MANDATORY RETIREMENT AGE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Madam Speaker, I seek the attention of all hon. members of this House on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Considering the fact that Mr. Fairweather, the Commissioner of the Canadian Human Rights Commission, in his fourth annual report dated March 31, 1981 to the Minister of Justice and the Attorney General of Canada, recommended to this Parliament that Sections 9(2) and 14(C), sections allowing for the imposition of mandatory retirement, be deleted from the Canadian Human Rights Act; and in view of the fact that the same recommendation was made by the Special Senate Committee on Retirement Age Policies on April 15, 1980; and in light of the reality that non-discrimination rights based on age have been written into the proposed Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cardigan (Mr. Campbell):

That the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada introduce, before July 1, 1981, an amendment to the Canadian Human Rights Act which would end the imposition of early mandatory retirement.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AGRICULTURE

EFFECT OF HIGH INTEREST RATES ON FARMERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Len Gustafson (Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, I rise on a very urgent matter under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Given the very serious situation which faces the farming economy with regard to record high interest rates, and an increasing number of bankruptcies among farmers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields):

That the government take steps immediately to deal with the very serious situation of high interest rates to farmers.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

METRIC CONVERSION

SUGGESTED EXTENSION OF CONVERSION DATE DEADLINE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 in an effort to obtain the unanimous consent of the House on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Recognizing that the government is proceeding with unnecessary haste with its metric conversion program, and also recognizing that the government has failed to take the necessary steps to ensure that the hundreds of millions of dollars required by small businesses to be spent on new metric scales will go to Canadian manufacturers of weighing and measuring equipment, and not to swell our balance of payments deficit on finished manufactured goods, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the government extend the easing-in deadline to ease the adjustment for small businesses and to enable Canadian manufacturers and suppliers to prepare themselves in order to supply this government-initiated demand, rather than foreign suppliers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

OIL SUBSTITUTION PROGRAM INFORMATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In the October, 1980, budget the Liberal government announced the creation of the Canadian oil substitution program. At that time the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources promised that the program would start on April 1, 1981. Since it is now May 20 and the program is still another broken promise, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Jelinek):

That this House direct the government to make available immediately application forms and information for the oil substitution program to those Canadians who have been patiently waiting for seven months.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

TRANSPORT

VANCOUVER RAIL TASK FORCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Madam Speaker, the Vancouver Rail Task Force, formed as a result of the 1977 Report on Grain Handling and Transportation in western Canada, is threatened with immediate extinction because of lack of funds, even though it still has important work to complete for the Vancouver terminal area. The government committed funds to this task force last September, yet Treasury Board has not yet released these funds. The money the task force has on hand will run out in 11 days. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon):

That this House declare its commitment to the continued work of the Vancouver Rail Task Force and that it call on the government to give immediate approval for the release of the funds which were committed to the task force last year.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

MINISTERIAL CONSULTATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, since the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is presently engaged in traversing Yukon and the Northwest Territories, ostensibly to find out what northerners think of Bill C-48, and the issue of the special terms of a whole host of oil and gas leases to Petro-Canada, as well as about proposed pipeline construction, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince George-Bulkley Valley (Mr. McCuish):

That this House congratulates the minister on his new-found sense of responsibility, but requests that in future he undertake the process of consultation before, not after, the relevant decisions have already been taken.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

AGRICULTURE

IMPACT OF INTEREST RATES ON FARMERS

Hon. John Wise (Elgin): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture, and the subject is the government's deliberate high interest policy and the devastating results on all food producers in all regions of the country. The minister knows full well that bankruptcies are on the increase. Bankruptcies in the province of Ontario have increased 90 per cent. Forced sales, general dispersals, and the farm property listings for sale have increased, it is estimated, by ten times the normal rate. The minister simply talks about this problem. Canadian farmers cannot substitute the empty words of the Minister of Agriculture when they are required to pay interest rate charges. I want to ask the minister now, when can Canadian farmers expect to receive at least some relief and some action? He knows it is a serious problem.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, first of all I disagree with the preamble to the hon. member's question when he suggests that all farmers are facing this devastating experience because of high interest rates. That is just not fact, and he knows it is not fact. There are many sectors of the agricultural economy which have systems which take interest rates into consideration in the cost price formulae that they use for selling their product. The letters that I am receiving, and I am sure that he is receiving, are from two main sectors—the pork producers and beef producers of this nation. Ninety-nine per cent would be letters from those people.

We do think it is serious for this other sector of the economy in production, a very efficient and productive group. We did call a minister's meeting across Canada seeking suggestions, etc., for them. We do find there is a great amount of disparity which exists between the programs of the provinces which are creating more inequality and economic disparity between them.

For instance, in Ontario they spend about $200 million on agriculture. The federal government spends $263 million in Ontario, which is substantially more than the rich province of Ontario spends. All one has to do is check the budget brought into the provincial House in Ontario last night and see how much they are going to give to agriculture in that province, as far as that goes, and see how sincerely they take it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Turn the page.

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr. Whelan: When he talks about the number of bankruptcies that are taking place, the number of bankruptcies is from about 78—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

MINISTER'S ADVICE TO FARMERS

Hon. John Wise (Elgin): Madam Speaker, I am not so sure that I am alone in this House, but I have some difficulty understanding the minister's answer. I think the minister continues to talk out of both sides of his mouth—

Mr. Nielsen: Talks out of the top of his green hat.

Mr. Wise: When he's out in the country, he talks about the seriousness of the problem. However, when he is in the House and in the presence of the Prime Minister, he continues to defend the government's deliberate high interest rate policy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wise: The minister has made a commitment to do something. The minister made that commitment, not just recently and not just a month ago or a few months ago, but, rather, he made this very same commitment in January of 1980, about 16 months ago. That commitment remains unfulfilled today.

Is the minister telling the Canadian farmers today to expect the same thing that he told them they might expect back in January, 1980, namely, nothing?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): The hon. member and his government of that time, when he was minister of agriculture, had the opportunity to do something—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: —and what did they do? Nothing.

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

Mr. Whelan: So, when the hon. member talks about what we are doing and what we have done, all one has to do is check the record and see the different programs that we have put into force. We have put 14 new programs into force since I have been Minister of Agriculture, to help the farmers in Canada.

Miss MacDonald: Tell us about interest rates.

Mr. Whelan: So, when the hon. member talks about what we are doing and what we are not doing, we have recognized the seriousness of this problem.

Some hon. Members: Hooray, hooray!

Mr. Whelan: We have, as I said, met with The Canadian Bankers' Association; we have met with the farm organizations—

Some hon. Members: Hooray, hooray!

Mr. Whelan: —and we have outlined to them the former government's policy, which was ridiculous.

Some hon. Members: Hooray, hooray!

• (1420)

Mr. Whelan: They also said so themselves, that it was ridiculous.

Some hon. Members: Hooray!

Mr. Whelan: I met with the Secretary of Agriculture for the United States of America.

Some hon. Members: Hooray!

Mr. Whelan: One of the things was to try to undo the ridiculous poultry import quota that he, the hon. member, negotiated, Madam Speaker, and which is causing the depressed prices for the poultry industry in Canada. Madam Speaker, the Secretary of Agriculture for the United States of America and I have agreed to work together on this to try to solve the problems we face today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REQUEST FOR MINISTER'S RESIGNATION

Hon. John Wise (Elgin): Madam Speaker, the quality of the minister's answers certainly continues to deteriorate. Why does the minister not level with Canadian farmers? Why does the minister continue to hold out false hopes? He knows that the future of food security in this country is in serious jeopardy. Why does he not do the honourable thing and tender his resignation? He has produced absolutely nothing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, over all, the agricultural industry, as the hon. member well knows, is one of the healthiest in the whole world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: It has been recognized, if he wants to be honest—and he is one of the few over there that I think can be—that there are certain economic production entities in agriculture which need assistance at this time. We are doing our darndest to help them. I want to tell the hon. member that I say the same thing in this House as I say any place else, regardless of what he says, whether the Prime Minister is present or not present. The Prime Minister knows that. The Prime Minister has the prerogative, if he wants to use it, to change that in any way he wants as far as I am concerned.

Some hon. Members: Hooray!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FARM INCOME STABILIZATION POLICY

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. This exchange would be humorous if it were not so tragic in its consequences for farm families and low-income earners. Yesterday in his reply the minister indicated that a number of farms were being forced out of business by the banks, in addition to the regular bankruptcies. I want to ask the minister what he is doing as the Minister of Agriculture to put in place a food policy that would have the effect of stabilizing income for farmers and controlling farm inputs and stabilizing, at least in some way, prices to consumers which would help ease the burden on low-income earners in this country.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows full well that the parts of agriculture that I did not mention have a stabilized economy, a stabilized income. They are not the ones writing the letters. I appealed for those letters and that is how I know what is going on. If he wants to come to my office I will let him read until midnight some night so that he will understand who the real people are who have the financial problems.

Miss MacDonald: Try it yourself.

Mr. Whelan: When he refers to food that is produced in Canada, I would point out that some of the producers are from his part of the country but I have not seen him defend them. I am not receiving any letters from the people in marketing boards. The price of food produced by marketing boards has stayed well below the inflation rate, averaging about 8 per cent, while the inflation rate for food that we import and produce outside the marketing boards is, as he knows, about 15 per cent. Let him face those facts.

There is no shortage of food in those areas where there are marketing boards; indeed, there is a surplus. The people who are in trouble in Canada today—for instance when you can buy a ham for 88 cents—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nowlan: You get it cheap here!

Mr. Whelan: I can tell you, Madam Speaker, no matter what they sold those hams for over there, they would not sell anyhow, no matter what price they put on them!

When you can buy ham for 88 cents per pound in one of the big chains in this city today, and for the next five days, it is like giving it away during the depression. When you consider that you can buy a dozen eggs for ten minutes of an hour's work time when it used to take an hour and a half at one time to buy a dozen eggs in this country, I ask who has become more efficient, who has become more proficient, who has produced food in a better fashion and put it on the market shelf in a more economic fashion than we have?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker, the trouble with the minister is that he has read too many of Paul Martin's speeches. I will have to wait to read Hansard to see what the minister said.

SOCIAL SECURITY

MEASURES TO HELP LOW-INCOME FAMILIES

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, I want to put a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. The fact is that with farmers going out of business because of high interest rates, food production in this country is decreasing. Yesterday the minister talked about the child tax credit as being one of her solutions to ease the burden on low-income families. She talked about indexing on an annual rate being able to catch up with the rate of inflation. That does not square with the fact that the latest report from Statistics Canada, "Income Distribution in Canada" shows that an additional 100,000 families in this country in 1979 fell below the poverty line. That is tragic.

● (1425)

Has this minister, who has the over-all responsibility for welfare in this country, discussed with her colleagues in cabinet, and with the Prime Minister, putting in place some kind of food policy for this country and re-examining the child tax credit to see if it can be used at least as an instrument to ease the burden of high interest rates on the poor and low-income families of this country, and to lessen farm bankruptcies?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, the hon. member raises the general issue of fighting against poverty in Canada and bridging the gap between the average Canadians and those who are below the threshold of poverty. As a matter of fact, we are fully aware that the child tax credit has enabled us to earmark hundreds of millions of additional dollars for the category of very low-income workers known as the working poor.

[English]

We are presently working on ways to improve the child tax credit as the best means of redistribution of money. I am sure that mothers below a certain level of family income, who are right now receiving $238 per child, are conscious of that fact. We may need the approval of the House for further improvements to the tax credit. We have, however, reduced the level of poverty from 20 per cent of the population to 12 per cent over the last decade in this country.

NORTH-SOUTH RELATIONS

PREPARATIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS FOR SUMMIT MEETING

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Right Hon. Prime Minister. It concerns the North-South question and the dialogue between the industrialized nations and the poor developing nations. As the Prime Minister has just returned from a trip to Algeria and Italy, is he now ready to tell the House in what state the preparations are for the summit meeting which will be held in Ottawa two months from today? What positive policy recommendations has Canada prepared to put to that summit?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I am not sure that I can give a satisfactory answer to the hon. member. The member knows that of the seven participants, four of them will be new. Indeed, five of them will be new if we include the eighth member of the economic community. My purpose until now in visiting as many of them as possible was to try to ensure that there would be a united front by all of us, not only on the North-South question referred to by the hon. member but on other important subjects, such as international trade, and the macroeconomic policies of the respective countries.

The hon. member asks about the state of the preparations. I think there have been some five or six meetings between personal representatives of the participants to the summit. Some of them have changed because of recent political events in other countries. The preparations, however, are well along. Each country has prepared a paper in one area or another to be the subject of eventual discussion by summit members. I hope the further meeting to be held, I believe in Vancouver in a couple of weeks, will continue to accelerate the state of the preparations.

IMPLEMENTATION OF PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Madam Speaker, at this particular time concerning north-south, which I believe is a top priority of the Prime Minister at the summit meeting, Canada and the Canadian government are very key to formulating and bringing off that question properly. Can the Prime Minister tell the House now when the government will put into effect the 38 recommendations of the all-party unanimous report on North-South, so that we will go to the summit with credibility, which means more than just taking trips?

● (1430)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I believe I had occasion to say previously that the committee of the House of Commons produced an excellent report. It has inspired the government in drafting precisely some of these documents to which I referred earlier. As to unilateral adoption of them, the hon. member knows that many of the measures recommended would be impossible of adoption or ineffective if they were only adopted by one country. That is why our objective at the North-South item discussion in July, at the further meeting at the Commonwealth summit, and eventually at the further meeting in Mexico in October, will be to ensure as much progress as possible by all participants on many of the actual recommendations made by that committee.

QUERY RESPECTING CANADIAN SUPPORT FOR UNITED STATES POLICIES

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Will the Prime Minister tell the House of Commons what he and the government have been doing in relation to the United States which has taken a very assertive type of approach to the whole question, has dropped the Law of the Sea, and yesterday proclaimed a vote at the World Health Organization that probably will amount to the death of a million children around the world. Is Canada's policy going to be uniquely different in this question of North-South from the American policy, so that we do not have to get caught in another El Salvador question by backing a policy that finally turns out to be anything but good?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, it is inevitable at a summit such as we will have in July that different heads of government will come to it with a reflection of their own political philosophies and priorities. We know from the statements made by the U.S. administration that they are more keen on bilateral aid and perhaps aid from the private sector than on multilateral and public aid. This is not the point of view of Canada or of other summit countries. The summit will be an occasion to try to convince the United States that the world is very much in need of its generous participation in international aid. We have already expressed these views. I have expressed them to President Reagan. When I met Mr. Clausen, the new American designate head of the World Bank, we discussed these questions at some length.

It is impossible to predict at this stage what final position will be taken by the President at the Ottawa summit or, for that matter, at the Cancun summit.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPORTED STATEMENTS BY MINISTER ON NATO AND MIDDLE EAST COMMITMENTS

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. At the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence last Thursday, May 14, the minister said that "Canada has made a new commitment to deploy its NATO forces outside the normal NATO treaty area". He has also been quoted in the Montreal Gazette and the Ottawa Citizen as saying that Canada is willing in principle to contribute to a United States rapid deployment force in the Middle East. Can the minister verify to the House that he has made these statements, and will he explain who authorized such commitments without parliamentary approval?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, the hon. member should know better than he just stated, because I corrected that yesterday at the SCEAND in front of him. At the time I read the statement at the SCEAND on May 14, I said that Canada had made no new commitment to deploy its NATO force outside the normal NATO treaty area. That is what I read. It is possible the transcript did not show that. However, I wrote to the chairman of the committee to correct that. The hon. member knows very well because at the committee yesterday I was asked about that twice, and I told the hon. member there was no new commitment. I think it should be clear enough.

PARLIAMENTARY APPROVAL FOR USE OF CANADIAN FORCES ABROAD

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): I received my written transcript of those minutes yesterday and they certainly show exactly what I quoted here. I would like to go to the minister's further statements about helping the U.S. rapid deployment force in the Middle East. The minister sometimes seems to confuse peacekeeping and the RDF which in no way can be considered to be a peacekeeping force.

I would also like to question why Parliament is not consulted before he makes these statements. Is he not aware of the principles set out by the Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson in 1964 when he said:

> —if a request is made involving the use of substantial numbers of Canadians abroad, we would bring the matter before Parliament before any final decision is made.

Can the minister assure the House that any such commitment to reinforcing or helping the United States rapid deployment force will be first approved by this Parliament?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I can assure the House that any action of this kind will certainly have to be approved by the government and this House, as was said by Mr. Pearson. I suggest the hon. member read what was distributed to all members of the committee, which is a communiqué from the DPC NATO meeting in Brussels. I will not read it here. It is a communiqué on the possible actions of some members of NATO. The commitment was that consultation would have to be carried out by NATO first. It would then be up to individual countries to decide on their own what they want to do. However, there is no commitment to action outside the area of NATO, and even collectively there is no commitment of that nature.

Oral Questions

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

DISPUTE OVER OWNERSHIP OF EAST COAST OFFSHORE RESOURCES

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister respecting the federal-provincial dispute over ownership of offshore resources on the Atlantic coast. In April, 1981, his government approved exploration permits for over three million acres of submarine lands claimed by the province of Nova Scotia. He knows also that the same ownership dispute threatens the development of the Hibernia oil fields off Newfoundland which are claimed by that province. What is he prepared to do now to resolve this dispute?

Also, I want to know why he publicly chastises the Premier of Nova Scotia and the Premier of Newfoundland who are making these legitimate and honest claims for the benefit of the people of their provinces.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I certainly have not publicly chastised, to use the expression of the hon. member. The situation is that the Premiers of Newfoundland and Nova Scotia are claiming that the offshore out to the 200 mile economic zone belongs to the provinces and is within provincial jurisdiction. We, supported at least prima facie by a judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada in the British Columbia reference case, claim that the offshore is under federal jurisdiction and is in the ownership of the federal government. There is a difference of opinion. We have proposed repeatedly throughout the last decade that we set aside the question of ownership, that both parties cease to claim ownership, and on the contrary we seek administrative arrangements and division of revenues which would be acceptable to both parties.

There was an acceptance of that by three of the maritime provinces in 1978, but this was rejected when the Premier of Nova Scotia came into office under his new mandate. Therefore the management arrangement was set aside and negated by him. We are now back to the original question of who owns it. We have proposed that that be settled by a reference to the Supreme Court. In both cases, and particularly in the case of Newfoundland, they have refused to co-operate with a reference to the Supreme Court. That is the situation as it lies now. I would be grateful if the hon. member would use his influence to bring the provinces either to accept an administrative arrangement or a reference to the court.

REFERENCE TO SUPREME COURT OF CANADA

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): The Prime Minister knows, and it should be stated for the record, that the 1978 agreement was not an agreement but merely an arrangement to explore a resolution of the dispute in that manner. I ask the Prime Minister why, if the government is not prepared to refer the matter to the Supreme Court on its own motion, the National Energy Program contains a statement to the effect that the government is anxious to refer the matter of ownership quickly to the Supreme Court? Why does he place the burden on the provinces? As a constitutional scholar, surely the Prime Minister realizes that this is essentially a constitutional question to be decided by political action? But, if he will not take the step to decide it by such agreement or political action, why does he not take the step himself to refer the matter to the Supreme Court of Canada and have the dispute resolved for the benefit of all Canadians, both those in Nova Scotia and in Newfoundland?

● (1440)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, in so far as the hon. member says it is originally a political question, certainly I have indicated my agreement with that, and since 1969 I have been seeking a political agreement with the provinces. I repeat, in the British Columbia reference the Supreme Court decided the offshore was Canadian. I do not know if it would decide the same thing on the Atlantic coast. But I said, "Never mind. We are the owner according to the Supreme Court, on the west coast, but we are prepared to seek political agreement." We sought one for ten years. We finally reached one in 1978. I am not sure what the point the hon. member made about that 1978 agreement was, but I will be prepared to hear it again.

We sought agreement for some ten years. We would still prefer a political agreement. That not being possible, I am now told by the hon. member that we should do the honourable thing and refer it to the Supreme Court. My fear was that we would be accused of unilateral action, provocation, and so on. But, if I sense it is the view of the opposition that we should refer it to the court, Madam Speaker, I am prepared to do that tomorrow. I see the hon. member nod his head indicating yes. I hope he is speaking for his party, but I would like confirmation of that, perhaps from his House leader.

CORPORATE AFFAIRS

PRICING PRACTICES OF OIL COMPANIES—ROLLBACK OF INCREASES

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The Bertrand report not only showed a rip-off of $12 billion by the oil companies against the Canadian consumer, but it indicated that the rip-off was continuing. The minister of energy admitted in this House that in the recent increases there was a six-cent increase per gallon which was piggy-backed on the increases by the oil companies. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has just fired Mr. Bertrand. He told me in the House he would refer my inquiry and my demand for a roll-back of these illegal increases to Mr. Bertrand. Now that he has fired Mr. Bertrand, what does he propose to do about rolling back these illegal increases?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, first I would like to say to the hon. member and to his colleagues that, contrary to the hon. member's statement, Mr. Bertrand was not fired. I find that remark altogether unfortunate and out of line. Mr. Bertrand was a senior official who served Canada very well. He has been appointed to another post, in fact it is a promotion for him, and I find it regrettable that anyone should want to insinuate that he was fired.

As to the issue raised by the hon. member, namely, whether there has been an unwarranted and illegal price increase by the oil companies, I have already said in the House that I had referred the question to Mr. Bertrand. He completed his study and gave me a written report on the subject, advising me that there was no need for him to investigate any further into this latest charge which the hon. member has just made. With respect to this latest accusation, he believed that the oil companies had not acted illegally.

[English]

FURTHER INVESTIGATIVE ACTION

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, Mr. Bertrand did, indeed, serve his country well. He was probably and still is a breath of fresh air in the civil service. The minister was spineless and gutless in moving him from this important position.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Waddell: It is the same old Liberalism. My question is this. I see the Minister of Energy smiling. He pretends he is progressive too. What happens now that Mr. Bertrand, who helped put this landmark report together, is removed from the scene and cannot implement the further investigation? What is going to happen to the investigation, and will the consumers of Canada ever get their $12 billion back?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, again I would remind the hon. member that Mr. Bertrand has completed his assignment. His new appointment is one which he himself has accepted. I am told that several positions were offered to him and he himself accepted his new appointment. In other words, Madam Speaker, there can be no question of Mr. Bertrand having been fired. I suggest that the use of that expression in his case is insulting. His investigation has been completed, Madam Speaker, and it now stands referred to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission. The hearing will be held during the coming months and the Department of Justice will appoint lawyers who will argue this case before the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission.

HUMAN RIGHTS

AIR CANADA POLICY ON EARLY RETIREMENT OF AIRPLANE PILOTS

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport and it grows from my Standing Order 43 motion for which I could not receive unanimous consent.

On April 10 of this year I wrote to the minister regarding Captain Ross Stevenson of Toronto, a pilot with Air Canada, who is being forced to retire on September 1, 1981, at age 60, while other airline pilots are allowed to work until age 65. Considering the fact that mandatory retirement is an obvious violation of the Canadian charter of rights and freedoms in the proposed constitution resolution which is before the Supreme Court of Canada, and in light of the reality that the working binding agreement between Air Canada and the airline pilots was not signed until April 3, 1981—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member please ask his question?

Mr. Flis: Madam Speaker, would the minister please tell this house whether he would consider an order in council in this case to allow Mr. Stevenson to work past September 1 until the issue of early forced retirement with Air Canada is resolved?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the regulations of my department on this subjet of age of retirement for air pilots do not specify any particular age. The regulations are essentially based on fitness and capacity to perform the job.

Some hon. Members: Resign!

Mr. Pepin: The pilot in question works under an agreement between CALPA and Air Canada, and the position found in the agreement is one that is very much willed by the pilots of Canada. This age limit is of their own making and I would not dare, at this point anyway, go against an agreement reached between an airline and its employees.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

SURVEY OF PAINT HILLS CREE INDIAN RESERVE, QUE.

Mr. Lorne Greenaway (Cariboo-Chilcotin): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare and it concerns the poor health of the James Bay Cree. I am sure she is still having nightmares over the mess she left up there when she pulled out federal health services at the end of March of this year.

I have here in my hand a report by one of her officials. It is the Sanitary Survey of the Cree Indian Reserve of Paint Hills, dated January 26, 27 and 28, 1981. What this report says is that the water supply to the village of Paint Hills is heavily contaminated by bacteria and is dangerous to drink. I also have a letter here from the interim director of specialized health services for Quebec, a Mr. Turcotte, dated March 3, fully 34 days after this other report was brought down, informing the chief of Paint Hills that this water was contaminated and should not be drunk.

In view of the fact there were a number of deaths last summer due to gastro-enteritis, and that there is an outbreak of gastro-enteritis in Paint Hills right now, how can she explain that a member of her staff sat on this report for 34 days, yet it was April 3 before the chief got the letter from this official telling him how dangerous this water was to drink? Can she please explain that to this House?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I certainly could have explained if the hon. member had had the rather elementary good sense and courtesy, this being a very special case, to call up and advise us that he wanted a reply to his question. I have no idea whatever of what he is talking about. I hope he knows, because last week he dared bring accusations, which were reported in every Canadian newspaper, against the Regional Director of Medical Services who, being absent, was unable to defend herself, claiming that she had failed to carry out her duties at Fort Rupert, which is one of the reserves under our jurisdiction, when on the contrary she had carried them out fully and had not lied. She had informed the committee members that the work had been done and that the health facilities had been restored. Once again, I do not know what the hon. member is talking about, as he has not given me advance notice of his question. I will inquire, however, and report as soon as possible.

TESTING FOR TUBERCULOSIS

Mr. Lorne Greenaway (Cariboo-Chilcotin): Every time I get up in this House I get the same runaround from this minister. She accuses me of having my facts backwards and forwards. This was brought up in committee last night—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member does not have the floor to argue but to ask a question.

An hon. Member: The answer was provocative.

Mr. Greenaway: You have continuously told us there was no epidemic of tuberculosis in Mistassini, and yet there is. You told us in April in committee that only 900 people out of a population of 2,200 have been tested for tuberculosis in Mistassini, and yet ten days ago in Petawawa we had an outbreak of tuberculosis and 6,000 or 7,000 people have been tested in a matter of ten days. Now, why in Mistassini, where they have had tuberculosis for three years, perhaps only a third of the population has been skin tested? Please answer that question.

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I repeat, Madam Speaker, that I do not find constructive at all the line of questioning—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

Miss Bégin: I wish I could answer the line of questioning of the member who is not familiar with the facts and figures. It is quite obvious. I repeat that the statistics I gave are true. I checked all these facts myself with the Director of Medical Services for the Indians of the province of Quebec, Dr. Jean-Paul Fortin, and the member has just put together a situation in Petawawa with the situation that he suggests exists, or existed a few months ago in the Indian reserves of the James Bay area. This is unacceptable, and is not a way of improving the health of Indians.

I repeat, on the first question I will look into the specific accusation he made.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

PROPOSAL TO BUY GOVERNMENT'S SHARES

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister who will know that the meeting of the shareholders of the Canada Development Corporation is taking place tomorrow in Winnipeg and there are many small investors who are very upset with the government's political meddling in its attempt to get members of its particular persuasion on the board of directors. The Prime Minister will have received the letter from the president of Burns Fry Limited in which he suggests that the government put up its shares, within the constraints of the legislation, and they are prepared to put together a package to sell those shares, thereby allowing the government to use the proceeds, if it sees fit, to set up any other organization as a tool of government policy.

I want to know from the Prime Minister whether he is prepared to accept the proposal put forward by Burns Fry Limited, reducing its interest to 10 per cent in the CDC, and if ministers want to change the concept of the CDC they can create a new vehicle for that particular purpose and leave the CDC alone.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I have not read the details of the particular offer the hon. member is talking about, yet it seems to me he is suggesting we divest ourselves of the shares of the CDC. Is this a recommendation on behalf of his party?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): There has been an offer made.

Mr. Trudeau: Or is it the hon. member who thinks this? Well, I am trying to understand the seriousness of the question. I remember that the hon. member and his party had certain views on the government divesting itself of Petro-Canada, and then they waffled on that and changed it several times. I am not sure they are not on the same course on this one.

APPOINTMENT OF DIRECTORS

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): I can tell the Prime Minister has returned from Italy because he is doing some fast footwork in his new Gucci's. If the Prime Minister had taken the time to read the act setting up the CDC he would understand what I am talking about.

There are now reports of additional Liberal hacks being proposed to the board of directors, and I wonder if he can tell the House whether or not the government is proposing, recommending or harassing the other directors and shareholders involved to put on the board Joel Bell, of Petro-Canada, and David Beatty, a close confidant of Mr. Jim Coutts of the Prime Minister's office.

Is he prepared to indicate whether in fact an attempt has been made to bring these two people on the board of directors, and whether he will not now cease and desist from this attempt to persuade the shareholders as to who should be on their board of directors?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I want to point out to the hon. member he does not know the difference between Gucci's and Roots, and he does not know the difference either, I think, between one good director and a bad director.

EMPLOYMENT

TRAINING AGREEMENTS WITH INDUSTRIAL ASSOCIATIONS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. In the last couple of weeks the minister has announced agreements with the aircraft industry, the coal association and the mining association for the training of workers to meet their shortage of skilled workers. Given the repeated assurances by various government ministers that they would consult on major questions with the unions concerned, I would like to ask, in connection with these three recent agreements, why the unions were not consulted or questions discussed with them before the agreements were announced.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has pointed out what I think is one of the more important initiatives we have taken to establish effective planning of human resources in these key industrial sectors. We signed four of these agreements in the past three or four months and are continuing to negotiate with the construction industry and others so that we can have, in each of the major industrial sectors of Canada, an arrangement whereby we can undertake serious planning of the skilled labour needs in those areas, and develop the appropriate training programs.

In this case we have been negotiating with the associations representing those industries and it is obviously their responsibility to deal with the individual companies and unions within each of those industrial sectors. Through the commissioners of our department, one of whom represents labour, and one business, they have been keeping both those primary sectors informed of the development of these planning and training agreements, and we would certainly hope for the co-operation of labour in developing future programs.

At this stage what we are interested in doing is having the agreements signed with the companies themselves so that they will undertake the affirmative action and planning programs in their own companies and negotiate with the unions on the shop floor for the implementation of these programs.

NEED FOR CO-OPERATION WITH LABOUR UNIONS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Last January the minister and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce announced an industrial training program of $350 million for areas that were hard hit, and they listed Windsor, Sept-Îles, and one other city. In those three cities the steel, auto and paper unions which have all those industries organized were not consulted until long after the agreements were signed, if at all, and I am asking the minister is he going to continue to ignore the unions as he has up until now, or he is going to work with them and get the co-operation of labour as he ought to do if he is serious?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Well, Madam Speaker, once again the hon. member for Winnipeg North points to an important innovation of this government in developing new policies in the labour field, because the development of the industrial adjustment program began through a long series of discussions and negotiations between officials of my department and officials of the UAW, beginning last summer when the auto industry began to experience a downturn. It was those negotiations and discussions on how we can bring to bear additional labour programs in the city of Windsor which gave rise to the industrial adjustment program.

In each of those programs committees are being set up in the four communities named, representing business, labour, local government and provincial authorities, to represent the interests of all those key sectors, and in the committees that are being established, certainly in the case of Windsor, labour is a chief participant and player in those areas. So frankly, Madam Speaker, the hon. member is not describing what in fact is taking place, that we are consulting with the unions in this very important program.

TRADE

EXPORT OF AUTOMOBILES FROM JAPAN

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. In his meeting with the Prime Minister of Japan a few days ago, did the Prime Minister of Japan assure the Prime Minister that, in future, Japan agrees to cut back on its export of automobiles to Canada in the same manner in which it has agreed to cut back on its exports of automobiles to the United States?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, we did not ask the Prime Minister to give that particular undertaking because there were meetings in the days preceding our meeting at the prime ministerial level. There were meetings between our officials and the Japanese officials in Tokyo. We sensed that they were progressing in the right direction, toward the end wished by the hon. member and by members on this side. So the Prime Minister gave an undertaking that there would be an early resolution of the difficulty.

Mr. Hees: Madam Speaker, at the end of his meeting with the Prime Minister of Japan, did the Prime Minister feel that the assurances of progress he received were of any more substance than the snow job which was put over on this government and this Prime Minister by the President of the United States when he visited here a few weeks ago?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, it is obvious, when listening to the hon. member, that he is not really dealing seriously with this question. I do not think if he were sitting, God forbid, on this side of the House, that he would accuse the United States government and President of putting a snow job over on Canadians when they gave assurances in good faith.

Mr. Hees: That is what he did.

Mr. Trudeau: But the hon. member is never too serious when he makes his accusations. I understand the spirit in which he is joking today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SUPPORT FOR PARTICIPATION IN MILITIA TRAINING

Mr. Stanley Hudecki (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. It is well known that reserves are of great importance to the defence of the nation, by developing leaders among young Canadians and enhancing Canada's war deterrence capability. It has been brought to my attention that there is an inherent flaw in the militia structure of the Canadian Armed Forces, since some employers will not allow employees time off work to take part in the training and educational activities which are an integral part of the reserves program. Can the minister, in consultation with the Minister of Labour, study this matter with a view to establishing either policy or regulations which would facilitate continuance of this most worth-while program?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, we have already set up a committee of several businessmen to look after this matter, to encourage other employers and to see that military people who want to serve temporarily in reserves have all the facilities to do so. But I will take that question very seriously under advisement and consult with my colleagues to see if we can improve that committee and the facility for some of our Canadians to serve in reserves.

REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question. I assure the Minister of National Defence there is an interest in that important question on both sides of the House of Commons. Given that expression of interest, would the minister undertake to consult with the government House Leader to see if any further reference to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence is required, so that this matter could be studied in depth by the committee, on the understanding that with respect to this kind of reference there would be some discussions as to a limitation of debate, so that the committee could get to work on this very important matter?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I am glad the hon. member is stressing its importance. I assure him that I will consult with the House leader on the matter, and probably consult as well with the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence to see if we can follow up on the suggestion of the hon. member.

PRIVILEGE

MR. OBERLE—ACCESS TO DREE DOCUMENTS TABLED BY MINISTER

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, I gave you notice today of a question of privilege which I intended to raise respecting a matter which affects not only my privilege but the privileges of every member of the House.

I come directly to the point. On March 19, 1981, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) tabled in the House a number of documents relating to the development and the export of coal from northeastern British Columbia. Also he tabled a list of over 100 studies on the project conducted by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and the British Columbia government. In his remarks when he tabled the documents, the minister said that these studies were available upon request from the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. The reference to the tabling of these documents appears on page 8411 of Hansard of March 19, 1981.

I have attempted to take the minister's advice since that date and procure these documents from the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. I have met with nothing but stalling and frustration.

Now I have finally been told that the only way I can procure any or all of these documents, the titles of which were tabled in the House on March 19, would be at my own cost which was estimated at $8,000. I will be very brief, but it is important—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The substance of this question of privilege is to obtain certain documents which the hon. member feels are indispensable to the carrying out of his duties. He indicated that he has not been able to obtain those documents. He has a recourse. He can put a motion on the order paper for the production of documents. That is the recourse of the hon. member, and I invite him to do so.

MR. DOMM—WEIGHTS AND MEASURES ACT—NON-OBSERVANCE BY GOVERNMENT WITH PROVISIONS OF THE ACT

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, my question of privilege, of which I served notice today, stems from the fact that an act of the House is not being fully observed by those charged with carrying out its provisions, and that the duty and privileges of individual members of Parliament to inform citizens of their rights with respect to an act of Parliament and proposed amendments to it are being nullified in the eyes of the country. Members have informed citizens in good faith of certain rights to representation they enjoyed under the act, when in fact these rights were not and are not now being observed.

My question of privilege refers not only to the circumvention of my privilege as a member, but also to the privilege enjoyed and expected by the House of Commons. Erskine May indicated at page 67 of the nineteenth edition:

> The distinctive mark of a privilege is its ancillary character.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I know Erskine May by heart. Please tell me what is the question of privilege.

Mr. Domm: This House was pleased to pass an act in 1971 entitled: the "Weights and Measures Act". Chapter 36, subsection 10.1. Paragraph (1) of the act indicates:

> Subject to subsection (2), the Minister shall publish in The Canada Gazette a copy of each regulation that the governor in council proposes to make under paragraphs 10(A.1), (H.1), (K.1) and (K.2) and a reasonable opportunity shall be afforded to interested persons to make representations with respect thereto.

Chapter 2, paragraph (G) of the same act indicates:

> "Minister" means the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

On February 28, 1981, the minister was obliged to fulfil Chapter 36, subsection 10.1 of the act and had published in part II of The Canada Gazette at page 1289 the following order:

> Public notice is hereby given, pursuant to subsection 10.1(1) of the Weights and Measures Act, that the governor in council proposes to make the following regulations under paragraphs 10(H.1), (K.1) and (K.2) of the weights and measures regulations. Any interested person who wishes to make representations with respect to this proposed regulation may forward such representations to the Assistant Deputy Minister (Consumer Affairs) . . . Ottawa, within 60 days of the date of the publication.

This is from what my question of privilege stems. It was signed by Henri Chassé, Assistant Clerk of Privy Council.

All members of the House of Commons well know what Wiktor and Tanguay state at page E-47, Volume 2, of their Constitution Act of Canada. It reads:

● (1510)

> (The Prime Minister and, at various times, parts or the whole of cabinet) form the essential component of the Queen's Privy Council mentioned in Section II of the BNA Act . . . members of the cabinet—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member's question of privilege that the dispositions of the act have not been followed? At this point it is not necessary for me to know what happened or what the documents are that the hon. member would like to invoke in argument. We have not come to the point at which we are discussing the question of privilege; we only want to know whether there is a prima facie case of privilege. I would appreciate it if the hon. member would limit himself to telling me of any other point of privilege he has to raise. I understand that the hon. member is complaining that the disposition of an act has not been followed.

Mr. Domm: During the course of the 60 days following publication of the proposed order in council, which I have just cited and which was extended to interested parties who wished to make representations with respect to it, I and several other members of the House urged the citizens of Canada, both directly and indirectly and in good faith, to fulfil their democratic right to make representations with respect to this order in council. In this I believe I was fulfilling the prerogative of Parliament and furthering the wishes of Parliament as is set out in section 10.1.

Furthermore, on noting the preamble to the proposed order as published in the Gazette, where 60 days were allowed for representations, I believed that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) was fulfilling his responsibility to Parliament according to his constitutional duty as set out in Wiktor and Tanguay, and to the country, as set out in the act. However, it came to my attention recently that these representations, which were made during the allowable 60-day period by concerned and interested citizens of this country—as was their right—were not being received by the minister. Rather, the assistant deputy minister charged with receiving the representations of interested persons chose to forward such correspondence as she received to the chairman of the Metric Commission, who has no direct constitutional, statutory or legislative responsibility to Parliament whatsoever and who is in no way involved in repealing, amending or carrying through an order in council. Indeed, as the Commission itself wrote me recently:

> It is . . . a fact that the decision to make metric conversion mandatory in this sector was made by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and the cabinet . . . Metric Commission Canada is an advisory commission.

Madam Speaker, my point of privilege is twofold: first, that an act of this House is not being fully observed by those charged with carrying out its provisions, that is, that a right extended to the citizens of Canada allowing them to make representations to the minister respecting proposed changes to the act is being circumvented.

In this case, as Erskine May states "The privileges of Parliament are rights which are absolutely necessary for the due execution of its powers", and these rights are not being truly fulfilled.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I asked the hon. member not to quote Erskine May to me unless he is really making a point directly related to the question of privilege. He is telling me over and over again what constitutes a question of privilege. I think it is fair for hon. members to assume that I know what constitutes a question of privilege and that I need not have Erskine May quoted to me every time a question of privilege is raised.

I have heard what the hon. member has had to say. I feel he is asking the Chair to interpret legislation, to determine how it should be applied and whether someone who is responsible for applying that legislation has done so in the proper way. Now that I have put it this way, the hon. member knows that it is absolutely impossible for the Chair to interpret legislation or the way in which it is applied.

The hon. member may have a grievance about this matter, but he certainly does not have a question of privilege. The Chair is in no position to interpret legislation. I think the hon. member does not have a prima facie case of privilege. He might have a very important grievance, but he should find other ways of bringing it to the attention of the House.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. WADDELL—OIL PRICE INCREASES—REQUEST MINISTER TABLE BERTRAND REPORT

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, in answer to a question I put to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) during question period he referred to a report, which was apparently given to him by Mr. Bertrand, the former director of combines. This matter about alleged overcharging by oil companies in the recent oil price increase was raised by me twice before in the House. Since the minister referred to the report in answer to my question, I wonder if he would table in the House of Commons a copy of that report.

Madam Speaker: I am not sure that the minister quoted from the report. He referred to it. At any rate, I have no authority to force a minister to table a document. If he quotes from it in the House, then his obligations are different. The minister referred to the report, if my memory serves me correctly.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): If I may, Madam Speaker, I should like to clear up this point. I would like to say to the hon. member that when the Director of Investigation and Research makes an inquiry under the Combines Investigation Act, at the end he mentioned three options: refer his file to the Department of Justice; refer it to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission; or write to the minister to say that he has completed his investigation and has no intention of investigating any further. It is obvious that in this instance the director, Mr. Bertrand, selected the third option. In other words, in his annual report he will describe this investigation he has made and completed at his own discretion. When the time comes for me to table the annual report of the Director of Investigation, the hon. member will find the answers to the questions he has in mind.

[English]

MR. WADDELL—POSSIBLE WITHDRAWAL FROM PARLIAMENTARY LIBRARY OF REPORT "CANADA'S OIL MONOPOLY"

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): I must accept what the minister says because I have no choice.

I need some direction from you, Madam Speaker, since you are responsible for the Library of Parliament. I wanted to obtain a copy of the Bertrand report on the oil price fixing. There is a report in the Library called "Canada's Oil Monopoly." It is published by James Lorimer and Company. I am told that the government has just obtained a writ, I believe from the Supreme Court of Ontario, but I stand to be corrected, suing the author for publicizing this book and asking all stores to recall it. I wonder if the Library of Parliament will be subject to the same recall so that members of Parliament will not be able to obtain a copy of it. I think this is shocking, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: I am afraid I cannot help the hon. member. I have not seen the writ. I can look into the question raised by the hon. member, but I really cannot commit myself to either having or not having the book withdrawn.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, if the hon. member or some of his colleagues want to have copies of the Bertrand report they simply have to contact my department and we will send them free copies. The document just shown by the hon. member is a book which has been published without the agreement of Mr. Bertrand or of the Department of Supply and Services, which is responsible for publishing and distributing government documents. That company acted on its own when it published that document without any approval from government authorities and that is why this case is now before the courts.

However, if the hon. member wants to have original copies of the Bertrand report, I will be glad to send him one free of charge, whereas he undoubtedly had to buy the other book or obtain it in the Parliamentary Library. In any case, it is not an official version and does not contain the full Bertrand report.

Madam Speaker: Now I think this settles the matter and the question of the member's access to the report referred to by the minister. As far as the book is concerned, it is, if I am not mistaken, a book like any other. It was published by a private firm and I can assure the hon. member that there is no Index at the Library of Parliament. We have all the books that are published and can be of interest to members of Parliament.

● (1520)

[English]

Mr. Waddell: With great respect, Madam Speaker, perhaps that is not the point. The point is that this book is being withdrawn from Coles book store in Toronto. I understand the government has attempted to withdraw it from Smith and Sons book store. It has attempted to withdraw it from all the book stores. Your Honour promised to look into it, so I will make it perfectly clear, as one politician said. Would Your Honour look into whether this book is going to be withdrawn from the parliamentary library? It concerns me because I gather, from what the minister said, it is going to be withdrawn. It is very important that it not be withdrawn from the library.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member wants me to cause a book to be withdrawn when the case is still—

Mr. Waddell: No, Madam Speaker, the opposite. I want Your Honour to stop the government from withdrawing this book from the parliamentary library because we believe in freedom of speech.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Waddell: Unlike the government, we want this report published and spread around, and we want access to it. The government is withdrawing it from all the book stores in Toronto.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Do I recall correctly that the hon. member has procured this book from the library?

Mr. Waddell: Yes, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Therefore, as I said in French—

[Translation]

There is no Index at the Library of Parliament.

[English]

—that is to mean, we do not censure. We buy the books we think are important for the members to have access to. The book the hon. member is referring to obviously was in the library. He did have access to it. I do not understand what he is complaining about.

Mr. Waddell: I will not prolong this any more, but the complaint is simply that the government has withdrawn the book from all the book stores in Toronto and the other parts of the country, and I do not want it withdrawn from the parliamentary library. That is dictatorship.

An hon. Member: Keep it.

An hon. Member: Give it back.

Madam Speaker: The book has not been withdrawn. I think that should satisfy the hon. member.

MR. MacKAY—CLARIFICATION OF MADAM SPEAKER'S RULING ON QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE RAISED BY MR. DOMM

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): I rise on a point of clarification, if I may, Madam Speaker. I did not quite get some of Your Honour's words. With respect to the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Peterborough, (Mr. Domm), I understood Your Honour to say, if I am correct, that the hon. member had no question of privilege but he had a grievance, and that there was some other recourse. I am just wondering if I heard correctly, and I am not reflecting on your ruling, Madam Speaker. Essentially, did Your Honour say it was a legal matter, or what did you say? I am sorry. I did not quite understand.

Madam Speaker: Yes, that he did not have a question of privilege and that he could use other means of bringing the question to light. I am sure the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm) has lots of imagination and knows the rules and means at his disposal in this House to do so. I give him full marks for imagination and creativity.

JUSTICE

TABLING OF FIRST INTERIM REPORT ON FIREARMS CONTROL

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 41(2), I have the honour of tabling in the House, in French and in English, the first interim assessment report on legislation dealing with firearms control.

Order Paper Questions

THE CONSTITUTION

TABLING OF PETITION FROM STUDENTS SUPPORTING PATRIATION OF AMENDED CONSTITUTION

Mr. Marcel Roy (Laval): Madam Speaker, under Standing Order 67 and on behalf of Mr. Vincent Quinchon, president of the Youth Committee of the Federal Liberal Association of Laval, I am pleased to table a petition bearing the names of 1,000 Laval students, in support of the patriation of the Constitution with a Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and an amending formula. This is an expression of faith in the future of Canada which will have the most progressive Constitution in the world, and the gesture of these young Canadians was commended by all members on this side of the House.

PRESIDENT, CROWN ASSETS DISPOSAL CORPORATION

Question No. 1,874—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Was Madame Claudette Nadeau, President of Crown Assets Disposal Corporation, in her office during business hours on December 11, 1980 and, if so, what were the exact hours?

2. If Madame Nadeau was not in her office on December 11, was she away on business for the corporation and, if so, where?

3. For the three week period prior to December 11, was Madame Nadeau in her office and, if so, on what dates?

4. If Madame Nadeau was not in her office for the three week period prior to December 11, was she away on business for the corporation and, if so, where?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): I am informed by Crown Assets Disposal Corporation as follows: 1. On December 11, 1980, Mrs. Nadeau was performing her functions as President of Crown Assets Disposal Corporation.

2. See reply part 1 above.

3. During the period Mrs. Nadeau was performing her functions as President of Crown Assets Disposal Corporation. On November 25 and 26, 1980, Mrs. Nadeau was in Toronto on official business.

4. See reply part 3 above.

PROTECTION OF CHILDREN FROM SEXUAL ABUSE

Question No. 2,139—Mr. Lawrence:

1. Was a committee announced on February 16, 1981, to recommend improvements in measures for the protection of children from sexual abuse and, if so (a) what remuneration will be paid to the members (b) how often is it expected to meet (c) will it occupy permanent premises and, if so, in what location (d) will it be empowered to travel?

2. What process of recommendation and/or referral was followed in the selection and appointment of members of the committee?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): 1. Yes. On February 16, 1981, the Minister of Justice announced that he, in collaboration with the Minister of National Health and Welfare, had appointed the Committee on Sexual Offences Against Children and Youths to inquire into the incidence and prevalence in Canada of sexual offences against children and youths and to recommend improvements in laws for the protection of young persons from sexual abuse and exploitation.

(a) The members of the committee, excluding the chairman, will be paid only their expenses for travel, accommodation and meals for meetings of the committee. No honorarium or other remuneration is to be paid. The chairman is on leave from the University of Toronto to the extent of two thirds of his time which has been committed to the committee. The government has undertaken by contract to pay for that portion of his time. His travel expenses will be paid according to Treasury Board guidelines.

(b) The committee is expected to meet three or four times a year or more if deemed necessary by the chairman and members.

(c) The committee will occupy premises in Toronto provided by the Department of Supply and Services.

(d) The committee may hold its meetings from time to time in other Canadian centres.

2. Officials in the Department of Justice and the Department of National Health and Welfare were asked to submit the names of judges, lawyers, physicians, nurses, journalists and persons experienced in the field of social welfare and health, as well as the names of persons active in community service for the consideration of the Ministers of Justice and National Health and Welfare. The members of the committee were appointed by the Minister of Justice and the Minister of National Health and Welfare from names submitted.

SOCIAL SERVICES—GOVERNMENT FUNDING

Question No. 2,155—Mr. Herbert:

1. In (a) 1977-78 (b) 1978-79 (c) 1979-80, by province, what amount was paid by the government for the funding of social services?

2. What amount is estimated for the year 1980-81 and what amount is budgeted for the year 1981-82?

3. What are the estimated changes to these figures that would have resulted from the passage of Bill C-55 in the Third Session of the Thirtieth Parliament?

Mr. Doug Frith (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1 and 2. Please see list.

3. Please see list below.

STACKING OF DREE AND IT&C GRANTS OR LOANS

Question No. 2,172—Mr. Herbert:

Can a company receive loans and/or subsidies from the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and from the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and (a) if so, under what conditions (b) if not, what determines to which department a company should apply?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply for Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: yes, it is possible for a company to receive for the same project financial assistance from the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce (IT&C) and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion (DREE), for example, a loan guarantee from IT&C and a regional development incentive from DREE.

To receive such assistance, the project must qualify under and meet the objectives of each department's programs. In addition, it must be demonstrable that the project needs both forms of financial assistance in order to be viable. In cases where only one form of governmental assistance is considered necessary to satisfy the financial need, then only the relevant department would make that assistance available.

PCO—PURCHASE OF BROCHURES AND BOOKLETS

DND—PURCHASE OF ENGRAVING MACHINE

Question No. 2,337—Mr. Stewart:

Did the Department of National Defence purchase an engraving machine from Mikon Engineering, Downsview, Ontario at a cost of $37,017 and, if so, for what purpose and were public tenders called?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): The Department of Supply and Services purchased for the Department of National Defence two engraving machines for a total of $37,017. The machines are intended to (a) replace a condemned item, and; (b) to meet a weapon shop requirement.

Requests for proposal were issued to 29 firms listed on the approved Department of Supply and Services source list.

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES AND OCEANS—PURCHASES

Question No. 2,339—Mr. Stewart:

Did the Department of Fisheries and Oceans purchase precious metals from Georgetown Shipyard, Georgetown, Prince Edward Island at a cost of $27,890 and, if so (a) what were they (b) for what purpose?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): The Department of Supply and Services awarded a contract to Georgetown Shipyard, Georgetown, Prince Edward Island on behalf of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans. The contract was for the purchase of steel rods, reinforcing bars, washers, nuts and bolts, and was valued at $27,890. Our records indicate that these supplies were to be used to repair small wharfs.

BANKRUPTCY ACT, 1980

MEASURE RESPECTING BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY

The House resumed, from Tuesday, May 19, 1981, consideration of the motion of Mr. Ouellet that Bill C-12, respecting bankruptcy and insolvency, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure for me to have the opportunity to rise this afternoon to share some thoughts with the hon. members of the House of Commons on Bill C-12, an act respecting bankruptcy and insolvency. I suspect that at first glance many hon.

members thought that we should be paying particular attention to this bill before us, recognizing the experience of the government in areas of bankruptcy, its success over the years in bringing us to the brink of bankruptcy and, as some people would suggest, its bankrupt policies in respect of a number of programs and perhaps even some principles.

I want to recognize the very excellent presentations made by a number of people on this side of the House in the last number of hours in reference to some of the details in Bill C-12. I am specifically referring to the hon. member from Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly); the hon. member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake (Mr. Anguish); and, indeed, the hon. member for Cambridge (Mr. Speyer) and the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald). Rather than repeat a number of the fine points they made in their presentations yesterday, I want to focus my comments today on matters of economics and speak on Bill C-12 within an economical or political context, contrary to the comments of the minister who mentioned in his introduction of the bill that it had nothing to do with economics and little to do with politics. Having listened to a number of hon. members speak to this particular bill, that is certainly anything but the truth when one considers the very obvious economic and political overtures attached to it.

In an effort to present a historic pattern regarding bankruptcies, one would immediately recognize that over the last number of years bankruptcies have certainly been on the rise. Business bankruptcies, just to identify one category, numbered 3,905 in 1977. In 1980, business bankruptcies numbered 6,600. Over a three-year period there was an increase in excess of 40 per cent. Of course, if one were to look at the first quarter of 1981, one would see that in absolute numbers, the number of business bankruptcies, farm bankruptcies, personal bankruptcies and other is indeed higher in some cases than in previous years. Between 1975 and today, the number of bankruptcies has more than doubled. When referring to the number of bankruptcies amongst farmers; businesses and individuals, we are speaking of a phenomenon that exists from one end of Canada to the other. It is found in virtually every region, every subregion, every municipality and village. Bankruptcies are occurring at rates that not many years ago would have been considered unacceptable and even unbelievable.

I suggest that this is only the tip of the iceberg, Mr. Speaker. In discussing Bill C-12 and bankruptcies, we are just dealing with what we can see above the water, so to speak; nine tenths of the situation is kept from discussion by this particular bill.

If one were to look at the businesses that declare bankruptcy, one would find that there are many others that simply find the struggle not to be worth while, that pay off their debts and close their doors. Other businesses, of course, would simply be put into receivership. From the record it would appear that for every small business bankruptcy, between three and six small businesses, depending on the province and region, would be placed in receivership.

Each year, Mr. Speaker, approximately 8 per cent of small businesses in Canada die for one reason or another. During prosperous times, they are replaced at a rate of 9 per cent, 10 per cent or more. In other words, during healthy times there is a growth in small business in Canada, but at the present time, with interest rates well above 17 per cent, 18 per cent, 19 per cent, 20 per cent and, for many small businessmen, 22 per cent or 23 per cent, the rate of increase is cut back significantly. This leads to a phenomenon that draws the concern and ire of many, if not most, members of this House and that is the phenomenon of economic concentration in Canada. Already, Canadian businesses are the most concentrated of any of the western industrialized nations while our merger and monopoly laws are the weakest.

In a recent issue of Maclean's magazine, in an article on mergers and the growth of monopoly practised in Canada, there appeared the following passage:

> This is at a time when the annual number of corporate mergers has doubled in five years, and when the 100 largest non-financial companies control just over half of all corporate assets.

The most recent figures for other industrialized nations show that the 100 largest manufacturing companies in the United States, hold 25 per cent of total assets, 33 per cent of the total in Japan, 47 per cent in West Germany and 46 per cent in the United Kingdom. In Canada, the 25 largest control 30 per cent of assets, while the 50 largest control 39 per cent.

The rise in the number of bankruptcies in this country is a not so subtle indication that small businesses are failing and that business concentration is continuing and, in the last three or four years, at an accelerating rate.

Any discussion of Bill C-12 begs the question of the impact of bankruptcies on the country. What do bankruptcies do to Canadian industry, Canadian commerce and to Canadians? If one were to simply identify the direct impact of bankruptcies, one would first of all have to recognize that the small business sector has been the major source of all new jobs created in Canada in the last decade. Job creation has been highest in this sector of our economy. Some of the major creativity is occurring in this sector which is finding new and fresh ways of developing our resources, of taking advantage of our location and expertise in the work force.

A rise in bankruptcies contributes to unemployment. When a business closes its doors, of course opportunities for employment with that firm no longer exist. It is important to recognize that this is occurring when we have an unemployment rate in excess of one million persons. To that we must add a category that is often ignored, the handicapped, the disabled—those people who do not show up on the unemployment rolls. Something in the neighbourhood of 600,000 or 700,000 Canadians are not taken into consideration in the calculation of the number of unemployed, yet perhaps 60 per cent or 70 per cent of the disabled are unemployed. When speaking of a serious unemployment situation with more than one million people unemployed, we must consider that close to two million people could be working in Canada.

When referring to bankruptcies, we also have to recognize that they threaten our standard of living and certainly threaten the security of thousands of people. Many small firms are struggling from dawn to dusk, with bankruptcy just around the corner. The employees wonder whether the pay cheque will be forthcoming at the end of the month and this has social consequences. It puts pressure on many Canadian families.

Bankruptcies also threaten the fabric of our towns, cities and municipalities. The local tax base is affected at a time when the federal government is drawing back from programs which it had developed and which provided infrastructure for local communities. This places the burden on the local taxpayers. Bankruptcies remove a portion of the tax base and as a result, the level of local services and the development of necessary lands for further population growth are affected.

Those of us who have the opportunity to travel around Canada today will notice communities where every fourth or fifth business is boarded up. What does that do to the vision that Canadians have of our country who are trying to be optimistic? What does it do to the atmosphere in those communities where the feeling of failure is so prevalent? It creates a very depressing environment in many communities and drains the creative and innovative life-blood from them.

One advantage that Canada has over so many other nations is the feeling of vitality in the communities with their different personalities and characteristics. Unfortunately, the increasing level of bankruptcies does a great deal to erode that positive feeling.

As the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands indicated in her remarks yesterday, there is a feeling of despair and hopelessness across the land. More and more people are talking about the beginning of the end. Surveys which ask if people are as optimistic about their children's future as their own at the same age, respond almost universally, that they are not. More and more Canadians are beginning to feel that we are sinking in a quagmire of economic difficulties.

There is an old Hindu proverb which says: "Where there is no dream, the people perish". I suspect that unless the government sits up and takes notice of what is going on across Canada and refocuses its attention, not so much on bankruptcies, but on the cause of bankruptcies, that dream will slowly be extinguished.

Another direct problem attached to increased bankruptcies in the country is that we are seeing the transfer of millions of dollars in assets from individuals and small businesses accruing to the banks and other corporate lenders. Who are the beneficiaries of the bankruptcies occurring across Canada? As happens so often during difficult economic times, during times of high interest rates, it is the banks and the lending institutions which are the main beneficiaries. Who are the beneficiaries during bankruptcy proceedings? Once again, one finds that the corporate lenders are the ones who benefit the most. Surely we have our priorities in the wrong place. If one wanted to identify the indirect impact of bankruptcies, most often not taken into acount, one would see that for every business officially declaring bankruptcy, there are many unsecured creditors who suffer losses which may, in turn, threaten their own business. How many of us have been approached by small businesses in our own communities which themselves have been dragged down by bankruptcies of neighbouring firms within that same community? Although a bankruptcy heralds the demise of one business, again it simply accelerates and adds to the process which causes economic strain on a variety, and in some cases on a wide variety, of suppliers, contractors and so on. Each year these losses, which small business by and large has to accept, run into the hundreds of millions of dollars, and that is only in the case of bankruptcies.

Receiverships raise a potentially more serious problem. I say potentially because the government does not bother to collect adequate data on the number and impact of receiverships in Canada. It is estimated that for every single business bankruptcy, between three and six businesses are placed in receivership. If one considers the multiplier effect of this process on the unsecured creditors of businesses placed in receivership, the damage itself becomes absolutely staggering.

Last year, 1980, it is estimated that over $550 million in assets were seized from Canadian businesses placed in receivership by banks and other corporate lenders, including the Federal Business Development Bank. A recent study carried out at Western University by a scholar named Russ Knight showed that 90 per cent of all receiverships are initiated by the chartered banks of Canada. Of all the assets disposed of through receiverships, who is the main beneficiary? Again, 80 per cent of assets go directly to the banks of Canada. It is estimated that 40 per cent of these assets should have gone to unsecured creditors. Many of these are other small or medium-sized businesses which, under the present law, have no recourse, and will not have their position significantly improved under this proposed Bill C-12.

When you consider the devastating effect of receiverships on Canadian businesses and the fact that so little protection is provided in this area, and when you examine Bill C-12 clause by clause, you will notice that only six out of the 420 sections even mention the phenomenon of receivership.

A look at the record provides some insight into this government's failure to provide fair and even-handed treatment to small businesses having difficulty in a hostile economic climate created by what can only be called inept Liberal economic policies. I use that term hesitantly because it is difficult to identify what a Liberal economic policy is other than to say it is from band-aid approach to a knee jerking attack on some of the problems facing Canada today.

The present law that we are debating which does not even mention receiverships, has not been substantially improved for 30 years. Surely that in itself must tell us a great deal about the concern of the Liberal government regarding the problems associated with small companies experiencing bankruptcy. Five draft bills on bankruptcy have been tabled since 1975. Unfortunately, that is as far as they went. As the MacEachen-Trudeau policy of stagflation drives the Canadian economy further into a quagmire, the number of bankruptcies and receiverships mount weekly. But increasingly, corporate lenders are resorting to the use of receivership to cover client debt.

Receivership occurs when a company's assets, which have been pledged as security for a loan or credit, are seized because the borrower cannot make the agreed upon payments. The secured lender is invariably a bank, and because it calls its loans as soon as the borrower's liabilities exceed his assets, little or nothing is left for the hundreds of unsecured lenders, which are mostly suppliers and other small businesses. Once again, under due process, it is the small entrepreneur who gets it in the neck.

Federal officials with the finance department admit there are almost no government controls on receiverships, and the field is extremely confusing. Under legal requirements for bankruptcy procedures, there is at least government supervision and protection of the law. But that protection does not exist in the case of receiverships.

Bill C-12, an act respecting the bankruptcy and insolvency, received first reading on April 16, 1980. Today, more than a year later, it has returned to the House for second reading. Mind you, what is another year when you have been introducing bankruptcy legislation since 1975 but never getting around to passing it? I am sure the Canadian people are impressed with the speed and efficiency with which this government moves, particularly in this area. But the problem is that Bill C-12 deals with post-mortems, in other words, with the bodies left in the wake of this government's economic policies.

The real bankruptcy we should be debating here this afternoon is the bankruptcy of a federal government which has allowed inflation to get so out of hand that it is now running at nearly 13 per cent, and a government that has increased interest rates to record levels, the highest in Canadian history, and that is determined in the weeks ahead to sacrifice even more small businesses, farmers and home owners with its bankrupt monetary policies.
