The Debates of the Senate

OFFICIAL REPORT

THE SENATE

Thursday, February 28, 1924.

The Parliament of Canada having been summoned by Proclamation of the Governor General to meet this day for the despatch of business:

The Senate met at 2.30 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

NEW SENATOR INTRODUCED

Hon. Jean Léon Côté, of Edmonton, Alberta, introduced by Hon. Mr. Dandurand and Hon. Mr. DeVeber.

OPENING OF THE SESSION

The Hon. the SPEAKER informed the Senate that he had received a communication from the Governor General's Secretary informing him that His Excellency the Governor General would proceed to the Senate Chamber to open formally the Session of the Dominion Parliament this day at 3 o'clock.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

After some time the sitting was resumed.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

At three o'clock His Excellency the Governor General proceeded to the Senate Chamber and took his seat upon the Throne. His Excellency was pleased to command the attendance of the House of Commons, and that House being come, with their Speaker, His Excellency was pleased to open the Third Session of the Fourteenth Parliament of the Dominion of Canada with the following Speech:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of The House of Commons:

I am glad to be able to congratulate you upon the many evidences of increased prosperity. Though the general economic situation still reflects the consequences of the World War, the records of production, trade, transportation, employment and public finance have been uniformly increasingly favourable throughout the Dominion. The state of general employment has been distinctly better. The volume of business has steadily increased. Especially has the country reason to feel gratified at the expansion to a notable degree of its public revenues and decline of its expenditures.

I am persuaded that a reduction in taxation, and in production and transportation costs, such as will encourage the investment of capital in industrial enterprise and attract settlers in large numbers to our Dominion, are all that are necessary to effect an economic development hitherto unparalleled.

My Ministers are strongly of the opinion that a reduction of taxation is of first importance, and that to this end the efforts already put forth to combine strict economy in the administration of the public services with rigorous retrenchment in public expenditures, should be furthered in as many directions as may be possible. This is the more imperative, in that the margin of controllable expenditure within which economies can be effected is necessarily restricted.

My Ministers believe, however, that in virtue of economies already effected they will, when the present financial year closes, be able to announce to the country that for the first time since 1912-13 the national budget has been balanced. They are further of the opinion that when the budget for the ensuing fiscal year is introduced it will be found that the relation between public revenue and public expenditure is such as to justify some immediate reduction of taxation.

In the opinion of the Government, such reduction of taxation as it may be possible to effect should aim primarily at reducing the cost of the instruments of production in the industries based on the natural resources of the Dominion, thereby aiding materially in the development of our natural resources, and, through cheapened production, effecting a diminution also in the cost of living.

Legislation will be introduced making provision for consolidation of the revenue collecting services of the Government under one administrative head. With a view to simplifying and improving the existing system, it is also proposed to constitute a Board to investigate and study the various modes of taxation.

National unity, not less than national prosperity, depends upon the surmounting of those barriers which have tended to separate Western from Eastern Canada and to discourage permanent settlement upon the land. Foremost in this regard are the problems incidental to tariff readjustments and to the marketing of agricultural and other natural products.

The stabilization and control of freight rates on grain from the head of the Great Lakes to Canadian ocean ports and thence to Liverpool, are receiving the closest attention. It is hoped that the Report of the Royal Grain Inquiry Commission authorized last Session to inquire into the subject of the handling and marketing of grain will be available for presentation to Parliament this Session, and that legislation based upon its recommendations may be offered for your consideration.

REVISED EDITION

The further development of our magnificent inland water transportation routes, which will result in lower carrying charges for the products of the farms of the West as well as for the products of the mine, the forest, and the diversified industries of the East, is of vital importance. To aid in the accomplishment of this purpose work on the new Welland Ship Canal is being expedited.

A further interchange of correspondence has taken place between my Government and the Government of the United States with reference to the St. Lawrence Waterway. In the opinion of my advisers, the importance of this question is such that further inquiry should be instituted before a final decision is reached upon the proposals which have been under consideration.

The important subject of Marine Insurance as affecting our ports; the permanent equalization of the rate on Canadian flour, and the removal of discriminations in ocean rates on other Canadian products are receiving attention.

As a stimulus to stock-raising in the Dominion, and of direct benefit to agriculture, the Government has been endeavouring to obtain a lower carrying charge on all shipments of Canadian cattle.

Every effort will be made still further to develop the policy of Canadian trade via Canadian ports.

Particularly satisfactory and promising is the material improvement which has taken place in the financial condition of the Canadian National Railway system.

The Dominion Fuel Board has been created to study and make recommendations in regard to the development of our fuel resources with a view to making Canada independent, so far as possible, of foreign sources of supply. The investigations carried on by this Board have already been productive of important results, and legislation to encourage Canadian production will be submitted for your consideration.

The amendments made to the Bank Act in the last decennial revision of the last Session provided better guarantees for the public in banking operations; their wisdom has already been abundantly apparent. The depositors in the Home Bank have asked that they should be recouped the amount of their losses, and in their petition made representations which my advisers regard as so important as to warrant full investigation. To that end a commission has been appointed to inquire fully into the allegations made by these petitioners.

The Redistribution Bill of last Session respecting the representation of the House of Commons will be reintroduced at an early date. Among amendments to be proposed to the Dominion Elections Act will be one providing for the use of the transferable vote in single-Member constituencies.

Bills will again be submitted, with respect to the construction of Canadian National Railway lines, the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, and racetrack gambling. Your attention will also be invited to amendments to the Government Annuities Act, to provide additional encouragement in the promotion of thrift and self-help, and to amendments to the Militia Act with respect to the calling-out of the Militia in aid of the civil power.

The Imperial Conference and the Imperial Economic Conference held in London in the months of October and November last between representatives of the Government of the United Kingdom and of the British Dominions and India, dealt with many subjects with which the Empire at large is interested. The reports of the proceedings of both Conferences will be presented to Parliament.

Members of the House of Commons:

The public accounts for the last fiscal year and the estimates for the coming year will be submitted at an early date.

Hon. Mr. SPEAKER

You will observe that in the preparation of the estimates my advisers have felt the necessity of continuing the policy of rigid economy with respect to public services and public works, and of postponing until such time as a reduction in taxation has been effected some undertakings the early consideration of which are obviously in the public interest.

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

The prospects of an exceptional harvest, so bright at the close of the last session, have been more than realized. Final information as to the crops of 1923 indicate that they were the most bountiful in Canada's history. In again inviting your careful consideration to the important matters which will engage your attention, I pray that the Divine Providence, which has thus favoured our land, may guide and bless your deliberations.

His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire, and the House of Commons withdrew.

Prayers.

CONSIDERATION OF HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH

On motion of Hon. Mr. Dandurand, it was ordered, that the Speech of His Excellency the Governor General be taken into consideration on Tuesday next.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday next at 3 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, March 4, 1924.

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

CIVIL SERVICE COMMITTEE

MOTION

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved:

1. That a Special Committee of this House be appointed to inquire into and to report from time to time upon—

(a) The efficiency of the Civil Service;

(b) The number of persons employed in each branch of the several departments of the Civil Service, and the places where they are so employed;

(c) The possibility of reducing such number so as to effect economy without impairment of efficiency;

(d) Generally, all questions, matters and things arising out of or incidental to the foregoing.

2. That the said Committee be composed of the Honourable Messieurs

3. That the said Committee be empowered to send for persons, papers and records, and to employ such clerical aid as may be necessary to carry on properly the inquiry to be made.

He said: Honourable gentlemen will remember that, in the last hours of the last Session, in the discussion which took place in this Chamber on the Supply Bill, reference was made to the probable overmanning of the Government departments. I stated that I had uttered certain opinions which, if they had not been uttered by others, had probably been held by them. I said I thought it was our duty to investigate this matter, and I gave notice then that I would move for the appointment of a committee of inquiry at the next Session. Since that time I have notified every Deputy Minister that such an inquiry would be held, or at least that I intended to propose to the Senate that it should be held, and that they would be asked to present statements showing the number of officers and employees in their departments for a certain number of years past, and, if there were increases in the numbers, to explain them and justify them.

I have received answers from most of the Deputy Ministers informing me that they had prepared or were preparing statements in answer to the inquiries that might be made by the Senate.

Since that notification was given the announcement has been made to the public that the Audit Commission which was created by the Act of Parliament last year would be asked to examine into the working of the Civil Service generally with a view of reducing the staff and consequently reducing the expenditure. This announcement might be considered a justification for sitting back and awaiting the work of that Commission, but after mature consideration I have decided to ask the Senate to proceed to the inquiry.

If the Committee is appointed I do not know to what extent it will carry its research. My present impression is that it might be limited to the question of the overmanning of the departments. I think that itself will be a sufficient task to begin with. I am afraid that if we attempted to go into the question of salaries we might get beyond our depth for the moment. However, that is for the Senate or for the Committee to decide. It seems to me that the question of pay involves the classification of the work done by every individual and the question of what would be fair remuneration for that individual to receive. I have no objection to fair salaries being paid to the men who are doing our work throughout the land—I mean salaries which would compare favourably with those paid for similar work outside the Service.

My first concern is whether we have thousands of men on our pay-list who ought to be dispensed with. I know that the announcement of this inquiry and the statement that the number of officials will be reduced has created a certain uneasiness throughout the Service. It will be for the Audit Commission to report on the method of reducing the staff. There is an announcement that a Superannuation Bill is to be presented. This Committee of the Senate and the Audit Commission may find that some of the older members of the Service could be superannuated, and they may find also that many of the junior officers and employees could be dispensed with and would be able to find other employment.

I have prepared, in conjunction with my honourable friend who sits opposite (Hon. Sir James Lougheed), a list of proposed members of the Committee. I had at first included my own name in the number, but I have since struck it off, for two reasons. Members of this Chamber well know the work which devolves upon the representative of the Government in this House—the heavy task which he is obliged to perform in studying Bills for presentation to this House, most of which come in the last two months of the Session. I feel that I shall perhaps be unequal to the task of following closely the work of this Committee and doing it justice. Then, too, it is perhaps better that the recommendations made by the Committee to the Cabinet, of which I am a member, should not be addressed to a body one of whom is a member of the Committee. The Committee may feel freer in its action if it has not at its elbow as a member of the Committee a member of the Government. The names of the members that I would propose to form the Committee are as follow: Hon. Messrs. Béique, Belcourt, Bennett, Black, Bradbury, Calder, Hardy, McCoig, Pardee, Robertson, Ross (Moosejaw), Ross (Middleton), Turgeon, Watson and White (Inkerman).

I may just add that the Senate Committee will have an opportunity not only of examining and cross-examining the Deputy Ministers, but of obtaining information from other sources if they judge proper, and it is my belief that the information gathered by the Committee may be of considerable help to the Audit Commission which will have its work to do later on.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Honourable gentlemen, I should like to refer to just one point that the Leader of the Government has stressed in presenting this motion, and that is the desirability or otherwise of a member of the Government being a member of the Committee. I feel that that is a rather important point by reason of the fact that the mover has seen fit to include my name on the Committee, and having been a member of a Government that made some efforts toward Civil Service reorganisation, I feel that the present Government should not entirely divorce itself from any and all responsibility in connection with this inquiry of the Senate by not having any representative on the Committee.

I very well recall that an honest effort was undertaken by the former Government and some progress was made toward a readjustment along the lines of economy and greater efficiency in the Civil Service, and very serious exception was taken to the action of the Government. Some of the things done—perhaps they should never have been done—were undone. This investigation may prove that to be the case. But I do think that there should not be members of the late Government on the Committee unless there are members of the present Government on it also, and I would respectfully suggest that either my name and that of the Hon. Mr. Calder be withdrawn, or that some representative of the present Government, preferably the honourable the Leader of the Government in this House, should be added to the Committee.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have given the reasons which prompted me to remain off the Committee, but it is not my intention to shun any responsibility. I believe that we should all put our shoulders to the wheel in the effort to reduce the expenditure of Government, and although I may not be able to follow the Committee very closely, I am quite willing that my name should be added if it is thought desirable.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I should like to ask the Leader of the Government whether the Committee will have the right to examine into the utility of any institution with a view of having that institution abolished. For instance, scattered over this country there are offices connected with the Receiver General's offices. In Halifax there is one of these offices with two or three clerks. The greater part of the work that used to be done by that particular branch is done now by the chartered banks, and I think that practically all of those offices should be wiped out of existence.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: That will be for the Committee to deal with.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: Can the Committee inquire into that matter and make a recommendation that those institutions be abolished?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I can certainly answer in the affirmative.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I presume, honourable gentlemen, that the Committee may from time to time report to this House and ask that its scope be enlarged. That is, I think, invariably the practice of committees of this nature.

As to the question of salaries, it is very desirable that the Committee should be permitted to inquire into the cost of the different branches, or the salaries paid to the different members of the Service to whom the Committee's attention may be drawn. It is necessary, for this purpose. Probably the most burning question to-day before the country is the reduction of expenditure—not the reduction of the strength of the Service, but the reduction of Civil Service expenditures; and while it is not desirable to pass upon the question whether the salaries are too high or too low, or whether they should be adjusted to circumstances, yet the standard by which the public judge the service that is being rendered in any branch of the administration is based upon dollars and cents, and it seems to me that unless the Committee have power to make inquiry into the cost of that particular branch of the Service which we may be examining into at the time, the result will be unsatisfactory and it will be impossible to form a proper judgment as to the expenditure. I suggest that to my honourable friend for his consideration, without moving any change in the form of the motion which is before the Chamber.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The motion is large enough to cover the question of cost. It will simply be for the Committee to decide as to its policy.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: I look upon this Committee as perhaps one of the most important that the Senate has appointed for some time, and I trust that it will have power to take evidence under oath. I make that suggestion because otherwise it will be very difficult to obtain the information desired by the Senate from departmental officials still in the Service. For instance, Deputy Ministers have told various committees that their own Department was not overmanned; consequently it will be very hard for a Deputy Minister who comes forward to admit now that his Department is overmanned. It may be necessary to call outside witnesses, men who have been in the Service. I submit that every witness examined should be examined under oath, so that the inquiry may be fair to everybody.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The Committee will have power to send for persons and papers.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: The Clerk has pointed out to me that it is not quite clear whether Hon. Mr. Dandurand is going to sit or not.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have declared that I am ready to allow my name to be included. I would rather have my name added and be sure that my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Robertson) will serve and give the Committee the benefit of his experience.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: Then it is understood that to the names as I have read them out will be added the name of Hon. Mr. Dandurand.

The motion was agreed to.

MEMORIAL TO THE LATE LIEUT.-COL. BAKER

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: With the leave of the House, may I draw the attention of honourable members to a function that took place on Friday last, in another part of this building —the unveiling of the monument to the late Lieutenant-Colonel Baker. As a member of the Committee on the memorial I have been asked to bring this matter before the House. Owing to the shortness of the notice and also to the fact that the Senate was not sitting, many honourable Senators who would have liked to attend were not present on that occasion. It was a historical event. It has been thought that perhaps the House would allow the Committee of last Session to sit again, in order that it might prepare either a report or a booklet setting forth the action that has been taken, and perhaps containing also a picture of the monument. This would be a further mark of appreciation and would give every member of Parliament an opportunity of knowing what has been done. I understand that part of the record was to be inserted in Hansard of the House of Commons, but how many people will think of looking for it there? If there is a pamphlet issued containing the speeches and perhaps a picture of the monument, it will show that a grateful country does not forget those who have laid down their lives for it.

Hon. Mr. L'ESPERANCE: Honourable gentlemen, I am entirely in accord with the proposal of my honourable friend from De Lanaudière, and I feel certain that this honourable House will cheerfully agree to the Committee completing its work, so that we may have a full record, not only of its proceedings, but also of the eloquent and inspiring speeches which were delivered at the unveiling of the monument to our heroic friend the late Lieutenant-Colonl Baker.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Is my honourable friend going to make a motion?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I shall be very glad to move the motion, if it is the pleasure of this House to waive the notice. I have the honour to move, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Belcourt, that the Committee be re-appointed and be authorized to publish a booklet or pamphlet, and report to this House.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Honourable gentlemen, there is another matter that I think might be referred to the same Committee. You will remember that in the disastrous fire which destroyed the Parliament Building, a member of the House of Commons, Mr. Law, lost his life, and no trace of him was found. I suggested to this same Committee before that they should take some action; but they did not have instructions to deal with this matter. I think a tablet ought to be erected in memory of that honourable gentlemen. It would not cost very much. The Committee might take the matter up and report upon it. Mr. Law has no grave beyond the foundations of this building. Although his remains were not found after the fire, there is no question that he was burned to death, and it would be but fitting to erect a tablet to his memory.

The motion, amended as proposed, was agreed to.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the Session.

Hon. F. F. PARDEE: Honourable gentlemen, in considering the Speech from the Throne delivered by His Excellency at the opening of this Session, one cannot but be struck by the fact that it contains much that is good. It is full of optimism and if all that is therein set before the Houses of Parliament and this country is carried out, it will redound to the credit of Canada and its people, and to the credit of the Government. There is no doubt—and it is superfluous to say it to honourable members of this House—that for some years past Canada, like all other countries, has been passing through a period of reconstruction. We have had our troubles following the war, and, like other countries, we have laboured under disabilities. It was only in the latter part of 1923 that Canada began to find her feet again—to settle down in a normal condition—to feel, after all she had undergone, that she was able to take up and carry along those measures that were best for the people as a whole.

I cannot help thinking, in connection with the Speech from the Throne, that it embodies a very healthy idea of Canadianism. It appears to me, if I may be permitted to say so, that if there is one thing that this country needs more than any other at the present time, it is that the spirit of Canadianism be instilled into our people. We ought to imbue ourselves and imbue others with a wholesome Canadian spirit and develop it to a considerably greater degree than it has been developed up to the present time. There ought to be, in my opinion, more pride of nationality than we now have; there ought to be more of our own history taught in our schools to our young people. Indeed, Canadian history should be taught not merely to our young people, but even to men who sit in this or in the other Chamber. Consider how glorious has been the history of Canada. In reading the works of Parkman and others dealing with the development of this Dominion, one cannot but be impressed with the fact that it is a great history, a romantic history. It would be to the advantage of every man, woman and child in this country to learn more of the history of Canada than the history of England or that of ancient Rome. The more we are imbued with the spirit of Canadianism, the better will it be for our country, and the sooner shall we be a great people.

I do not intend to take up much of the time of this honourable House with what I have to say. There are great questions confronting us. Canada is on the verge of great development, and it will be achieved if we have enough faith in ourselves and our country to take up our task and carry it along to fruition.

The first question that comes to mind is the question of taxation. At the present time, in this as in all other countries, taxation is a vital matter. Some hope is held out in the Speech from the Throne that we shall have some relief from the present heavy burden we have to bear. All Canadians should be glad that such is the case. In the first place, it will afford relief to us as individuals. Everyone must recognize that the United States, under the Mellon scheme, is bringing about a great decrease of taxation. The tax on incomes is to be considerably lightened. Canada is in a position similar to that of the merchant: she must put her goods in the front window. Like any other country that is to-day heavily burdened with taxation, she must show that it is her intention to reduce the taxation and thus lighten the burden on the people. We must show that intention to the world, for the simple reason that the country that shows the least taxation is the one that will get the people and be the most prosperous. So it is with feelings of relief and of hope that we see foreshadowed in the Speech from the Throne the intention to provide some relief from taxation, that thus the cost of living may be reduced.

Involved in that to a considerable degree is, of course, the question of expenditure. Both of the leaders in this House have touched somewhat upon that. My honourable friend the leader of the party opposite (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) said, if I understood him aright, that it was not so much a question of reducing the expenditure upon the number of people employed as it was—and I stand to be corrected if I am wrong—that the amounts that were paid should be decreased.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, the contrary.

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: Whichever it may be, all I have to say is that I am delighted to see that the Government have taken steps to initiate just such a decrease in expenditure as the people of this country have been desiring for some time. I am bound to say that any Government that does that has my extreme sympathy. There must be sympathy for a Government which is compelled to take such drastic measures, and for those upon whom the results of such measures must fall. It is a case of "Be damned if you do, and be damned if you don't." The country at large is clamouring. All sides of politics—I make no invidious distinctions—have but one cry, which, if I understand it, is that our expenditure upon public works and the services of the Dominion of Canada is above and beyond and out of all proportion to the population and the work to be done. Therefore the Government must of necessity undertake the disagreeable task of reducing its staff and reducing salaries, thereby in the first place effecting economies, and in the second place relieving the people of this country to some extent of the burden of taxation.

Canada has a population of about 9,000,000, and a debt of over $2,000,000,000. Our expenditure in the past has not been curtailed to any perceptible degree, and it does appear to me that if there is one thing any Government ought to do, it is immediately to get down to a business basis in carrying on the business of the country. The present Government or any other Government should get down to the same basis as any manufacturer would, and he would absolutely cut his coat according to his cloth, and endeavour to pay dividends. I grant the millenium will have come when that time arrives, but there is no logical reason, no business reason, why this country, or any other country, or any province, should not be run on as strict a business basis as any business or manufacturing concern in the Dominion. If that is done, I feel satisfied that, so far as the future of this country and the people of the country are concerned, there will be a vast saving, that taxes will be lighter, that the cost of living will come down, that we shall be in a far more prosperous condition than we have been in for many years.

I think we are all glad to know that the Canadian National railways this year will show a surplus of approximately $20,000,000 on operating expenses. For many years—and we know well the cause of it without going into ancient history—the roads which to-day comprise the Canadian National system were a source of tremendous drain upon the pockets of the people of this country, and after the many and varied opinions as to public ownership, everyone must view with the greatest satisfaction the gains which have been made by the Management of the Canadian National railways. The claims of those who advocated public ownership as the best way out of the railway situation in Canada have been proven. Those railways have been a very material success so far. Last year this House in its wisdom or unwisdom defeated the Bill for the construction of branch lines on the Canadian National railways, and it does appear to me that the railway question is to a very large degree interwoven with the question of immigration. If there are two things this country needs, they are, first, population, and secondly, capital. A country which has those two things is bound to be prosperous, provided it has natural resources which can be developed. In the West to-day we have many miles of railroad, some graded, some with tracks laid, but without ballast, others with the location staked out. During the war, and just prior to the war, it was all very well to say that as money was dear and labour scarce those roads could not be gone on with. That was perfectly logical and reasonable, and I feel quite satisfied that the people of the country were quite content to put up with the situation as it existed. Since that time, however, many people have gone into that country and settled in the sections where those roads or contemplated roads are located, and to-day they find themselves without transportation. That being the case, we can scarcely with one breath shout: "Come to our country; we will give you every advantage; we have one of the greatest wheat-growing districts in the world; come and reap;" and at the same time say, as we did last year: "Even though you come and raise great crops there is no certainty that you will be provided with transportation to get them to market."

May I read a few figures showing the situation? There are to-day 238 miles of graded line without steel; there are 259 miles of newly-laid track without ballast; there are ten locations to lay tracks, and eleven locations to ballast. In all, as I understand, there are in that country about 898 miles of railroad or pseudo-railroad ready to take care of the wants of the settlers in those districts. There has been already expended on the locations and roads that I have mentioned $10,000,000, and the Government asks that there be granted $28,307,900 to complete the work. It does appear to me that the objection that the Government is given a more or less free hand to go on and spend the money, and that it should be voted from year to year is not a reasonable one, and will not allow the work to proceed satisfactorily; and this House takes upon itself a very grave responsibility when it throws out legislation that is intended to inure to the benefit of many people who are in this country and many others who will come to this country by reason of those railroads.

Hon. Mr. POPE: How many people would they serve?

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: I do not know. But the country is thoroughly populated, as the honourable gentleman well knows.

Another important question, one which has been discussed in this House and in the other House to a considerable extent, is that of the coal resources of this country; and I put forward this suggestion, whether it is feasible or not, as it runs in my mind that it might at least be given a trial. We know to-day that a great part of the Dominion of Canada is very largely dependent upon the United States for its supply of coal. We know also that in the West we have practically unlimited supplies of coal. The great difficulty in the way of getting this coal from the West to this part of the country is the heavy freight rate. Now, the Canadian National railway is the people's railway, and has been taken over by the Government wholly and solely for the benefit of the people. Might it not be reasonable to say that, if that railway were to haul the coal from the West, even at a rate that would not pay, that if sufficient coal were brought to supply the needs of the people here to-day and for all time to come, that it would be a benefit to the people in not being dependent upon the United States for their coal supply, and that the extra cost, if any should be charged to the public debt of Canada? I cannot see why we should continue doing as we are to-day—paying exorbitant prices to the United States for coal when we have an illimitable supply in our own western country. When we can bring that coal here on railways owned by the people themselves, I do not see why the railways should not give up the satisfaction of saying "we have a surplus of $20,000,000," and content themselves instead with saying "we have no surplus, but we have supplied coal to the people of Canada, coal which is as necessary as bread or light, and they are not dependent in any way upon the United States." It seems to me honourable gentlemen, that this suggestion might be considered in attempting to solve the difficulty so far as that commodity is concerned at the present time.

Let me for a moment touch upon the question of the St. Lawrence waterway. That is a much-mooted question, and one which is more and more being brought to the attention of the people of Canada every day. It is settled now, I think, that that work is purely a Dominion work, and a matter for the Federal Government here and the Federal Government in the United States. The question of power is simply incidental to the question of navigation. There is no doubt that such a great waterway from the Gulf of the St. Lawrence to the head waters of the Great Lakes would effect a vast saving in freights, and would be of tremendous benefit to people all along the route. All of which comes down again to the fundamental principle of reducing the cost of living. Although I have no word to say against the great good that the St. Lawrence waterway would do yet we in this country know pretty well what such an undertaking would involve. If we do not, we ought to, before entering upon an orgy of expenditure, a thing which always brings misery in its trail. All I have to say in that regard is that before the project is taken up, great though the benefit accruing from it might be, it should be most carefully looked into from every point of view, and we should know just where it is going to take us before we start, and just exactly where it is going to let us down. And I say that no Government should undertake it, and I do not believe any Government will undertake it, until it knows exactly what it is going to involve in the way of cost.

I am glad indeed to know that the Government is going to appoint a Commission to look into the affairs of the Home Bank. The Home Bank failure is perhaps one of the greatest scandals that ever took place in this country. Think of it, honourable gentlemen, that a very few men were enabled, under the law as it then was, to gather in millions upon millions of deposits and to sell to shareholders thousands and hundreds of thousands of shares of stock, while they were allowed to take the money and practically without let or hinderance invest it in what? Not in legitimate banking business, but in speculation to bring to themselves individually, not as directors of the bank, the profits arising from the speculation of that money. I say that when the state of the law is such that hundreds and thousands of people can be swindled in that way, it is quite time for the Government of Canada and the Bankers' Association to get together and draft stringent laws, laws even so stringent that they might curtail the operations of the other banks, so that no band of speculators could get together and perpetrate another such swindle on the public of the country. When we realize that there will be a shortage of $7,000,000 and upwards, and that thousands of shareholders will be liable for the double liability, that thousands of depositors will have lost every cent they had, we must admit that it is time something was done. I am told—I do not say whether the authority is good or bad, but I am decidedly of the opinion that it is good—that not more than two months before the bank closed its doors—

Hon. Mr. POPE: Two days.

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: —that the directors themselves sent out to their various agents in the different parts of the country instructions to get in all the deposits possible, and that they would be paid an extra commission on the deposits they got. When that sort of thing is perpetrated, I am not a believer in too much paternalism being exercised in either House of Parliament. Perhaps we have too much of it now. But when any government takes a corporation under its ægis and grants it a charter to do business, and that charter advertises to the world that the corporation will receive deposits and make payments on them, the idea prevails that it will carry on business in a reputable way; and when that implied promise, or implied contract, has been entirely shattered, has been blown to the four winds of heaven, then it is quite time that somebody should step in—it is quite as much if not more in the interest of the Bankers' Association themselves to step in—and see that such safeguards are imposed on these institutions as shall prevent a recurrence of what has happened. I sincerely trust this will be done.

I will not further delay the House with any views I may have regarding the matters set out in the Speech from the Throne. As I stated in the beginning, when these various measures come up I may have an opportunity to discuss them and expresss my views upon them. I have only this to say, in conclusion, honourable gentlemen, that once more I plead —and I shall never grow tired of preaching it—that there should be more and more unification. People talk foolishly about the separation of the East from the West. Can it be imagined for one moment that one part of Canada can serve without the other, that either alone is sufficient, that the East is not as necessary for the West as the West is for the East? We must build up a stronger nationalism, a stronger Canadian spirit, and if we inculcate this spirit among our people there will not be the outgoing that there is to-day and Canada will be, as she must be, one of the great nations.

Hon. J. L. COTE (translation): Honourable gentlemen: It is not without diffidence and much feeling that I rise for the first time in this Chamber to second the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, which has been so eloquently moved by my honourable colleague from Lambton (Hon. Mr. Pardee). In these precincts, made illustrious by the presence of men chosen from among the most eminent in our country, I recognize that my good-will alone can compensate for my lack of talent, and I rely entirely, honourable gentlemen, upon your indulgence while I briefly, very briefly, acquit myself of the task which my leaders have entrusted to me.

Permit me to say in the first place that my previous occupations, together with a recent serious illness, have not been the best preparation for parliamentary eloquence. Leaving in youth the province of Quebec, the cradle of my family, I was in turn surveyor, pioneer, explorer, following in the mountains and on the prairie the footsteps of the first discoverers, each day adding to my knowledge of my country and my love for it. In this respect I was but imitating the example set by eight generations of ancestors who had laboured on Canadian soil, and even shed their blood in its defence at critical moments in our history.

In the course of time I ceased my wanderings to establish a home in the heart of Alberta, that vast province situated on the summit of three of the great watersheds of North America, whose soil is immeasurably fertile and in whose subsoil lie immense deposits of coal and other minerals.

Our numerous rivers, fed by the snows of the Rocky Mountains, will furnish unlimited energy and a system of natural transportation which is destined to be of the greatest service in the economic distribution of our natural products, as well as in the maintenance of national unity.

Geographically the province of Alberta is situated 768 miles from the Pacific and 2,168 miles from the Atlantic. Its distance from the two oceans imposes upon its producing population high transporation costs, levying burdensome fixed charges on all property and cultivated land. In a word, it is a tax on every producer, a tax on every citizen in that vast area. This tax, known as the freight rate, has been considerably increased by the ill-advised expenditure of an enormous amount of capital. It is earnestly to be hoped, therefore, that the Government will do all in its power to reduce the serious inconveniences to us in the West due to the great distances which separate us from our markets.

Honourable gentlemen, I was lately rereading the wonderful report of Sir Sandford Fleming and his colleagues on their explorations in the Northwest Territories at the time of the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and I was astonished to observe that all the most optimistic predictions contained in that report have since been realized to the letter. That eminent engineer at the time pointed out the great fertility of the soil from the 49th parallel of latitude to the Peace River, and this is demonstrated to-day by the many fine farms established in that territory in Alberta. These farms last year yielded agricultural products to the value of about $250,000,000, notwithstanding that prices were ridiculously low.

The report I have just mentioned called attention to the splendid quality of our cereals, and of this I cannot give you better proof than by quoting the prizes obtained by Alberta farmers at the last annual competition at the International Cereal Exposition of North America, held in Chicago. These may be summarized as follows:

1919—5 or 6 prizes.

1920—19 prizes, with 2 Grand Championships, one in oats, the other in peas.

1921—30 prizes, with 3 Grand Championships, one in oats, and one in each of peas and alfalfa.

1922—35 prizes, with 3 Grand Championships, one in each of oats, barley and peas.

1923—44 prizes, with 3 Grand Championships, one in each of wheat, oats and red clover.

Hon. Mr. GASGRAIN: How many prizes were there altogther?

Hon. Mr. COTE: They won as many as they could win of Grand Championships, and they won more than any other Province of the Dominion or any State of the Union.

Finally, Sir Sandford Fleming recommended that the C. P. R. line be built through the Yellowhead Pass. It is difficult to understand why so excellent a recommendation was not carried out, but was apparently obliterated with a stroke of the pen. It can well be imagined that if the Canadian Pacific Railway had been constructed in accordance with Sir Standford's proposal, the Company would have saved millions and millions; the Western Provinces would have been settled much more rapidly, and at the same time, I believe, it would have prevented a great deal of subsequent railway construction, undertaken not so much in the public interest as for private gain. I do not mean by this that we have too many transportation lines, but we have too many that run parallel, close to one another, and lack feeders. These lines, not being self-sustaining, proved in consequence to be too heavy a burden on the taxpayers of the West and could not but fail ultimately, at the expense of the state.

The Speech from the Throne announces that the Government hopes this year to balance its budget. I am pleased to observe that it has realized the necessity for economy in all public affairs. In the last dozen years, particularly on account of the war, taxes have considerably increased. It is therefore desirable to give as much relief as possible to the taxpayer. I believe it is likewise important to make a careful revision of the tax-scale in order to remove certain inequalities which weigh more heavily in a period like the present, when taxes are high and hard to bear; remembering always that the agriculturist cannot adjust his taxes by adding to the selling price, but must pay in real money.

Agriculture being our most important industry, being indeed the very foundation of our economic life, I hope that the Government will decide to remove the duty on implements required for production. This would greatly facilitate the development and progress of the great provinces of the West, at the same time creating new or larger markets for the manufacturers in the eastern provinces. There would result a stronger feeling of unity among the different provinces, and the entire country would benefit.

The world war, the ruinous effects of which are still felt throughout the world, struck us at a time when our progress was at full tide, when our population was rapidly increasing, thanks to the vigorous policy of advancement and expansion carried out during the fifteen years of energetic and wise administration by Sir Wilfrid Laurier. The great catastrophe brought us to a sudden stop and has long delayed the realization of our hopes. I like to think, however, that the vigorous and wholesome policy of immigration, and especially repatriation inaugurated by the Government, will bring to us the labour we need for a great increase in our agricultural production, which will contribute to the prosperity and development of Canada as a whole.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable gentlemen, it is customary on an occasion like the present to extend our congratulations to the mover and the seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. My honourable friend who moved this Address has been for so many years associated with the political activities of this Dominion that it is entirely unnecessary to address to him any words of encouragement from this side of the House. Suffice it to say that what he has said this afternoon very largely coincides with the situation as viewed by most of us, except the position which he has taken upon the Branch Lines Bill.

My honourable friend who has seconded the Address comes from my own Province, and I not only extend to him our congratulations upon his becoming a member of this Chamber, but would also express my satisfaction at his appointment. For a great many years he has been prominently identified with the development and progress of the Province to which we both belong. He has been not only an active member of the Legislature of that Province, but was for some years in its Government. I am sure that my honourable friend's presence in this House will be an acquisition to the Chamber.

I have read with considerable interest the Speech from the Throne. Certainly, one arriving here from another sphere and entirely unacquainted with the affairs of Canada would, from the Speech, regard the situation as one of the most satisfactory and prosperous that the human mind could conceive. It seems to me that this Government is entirely under a misapprehension as to the real condition of the country generally. That may be attributable to two causes: one is that it is unaware of the public sentiment prevailing in the country, particularly among business men and farmers, on the two very important questions of expenditure and taxation; or it is just possible that, since honourable gentlemen have taken office and occupied the seats of the mighty, they have been so removed from public sentiment as to be entirely out of touch with the necessities of the present moment, so far as the administration of public affairs is concerned.

I am not going to charge the present Government with the entire responsibility for the situation as we find it to-day. My desire rather is to direct attention to the condition of affairs which we have found developing in Canada for a great number of years, and which should occupy our attention for their improvement. Since the cessation of the war, we have heard a great deal on the question of reconstruction. The late Government may be said to have been a war Government. There was scarcely time, after the cessation of the war, seriously to take up a comprehensive policy of reconstruction and to deal with the many institutions growing out of the war which badly required the strictest investigation. Before that Government went out of office, as an earnest of its sincerity and of its intention not only to improve the public service but to reduce the public debt and the burden of taxation, it entered upon a comprehensive programme looking toward that end. The question of the reorganisation of the Public Service was seriously entered upon, and the two or three Departments that were overhauled and reorganised demonstrated beyond any question that a substantial amount of money could be saved through the reorganisation of the Service. There was considerable criticism as to the particular individuals or corporations placed in charge of the work; but, notwithstanding the adverse criticisms which were advanced from time to time, both in the press and by the public, no others were mentioned as capable of assuming the work, and I think I can say with a degree of confidence that it was impossible for the Government to secure anyone else who had special qualifications to enter upon that very important undertaking.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Would my honourable friend allow me to ask him what was accomplished in the way of reducing the public expenditure on the occasion he speaks of?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: There was, for one thing, a reorganization in the Printing Bureau that saved this country nearly $1,000,000 a year; there was a reorganisation of the Customs Department, I think; and when my honourable friends came into office, they proceeded to undo the work which we had accomplished, and that added to the burden on the country. A reorganisation of the Post Office Department was entered upon, and had the Government been permitted to proceed with that work, or had my honourable friends, when they acceded to office, taken up that very important responsibility, there would have been saved to this country, I venture to say, another $1,000,000 annually. Speaking of the reorganisation of that particular Department, I understand that it was said that 50 per cent of the employees of that Department might be dispensed with and the public service not suffer therefrom. So I might say that there was evidently a desire on the part of the late Government, a desire which was demonstrated by some practical work, to enter upon the reformation and reorganisation of the Public Service.

As I have said, since the cessation of the war reconstruction has been in the air. The late Government was fully aware of the fact that this responsibility devolved upon it if continued in office, or would devolve upon its successors. This is the Third Session of Parliament under the administration of the present Government; and yet until Parliament was actually summoned we heard nothing about a reduction of expenditure or of taxation. The present Government sailed along with its head in the air apparently entirely unaware that there had been a great war, that there had been an inflation of the public services, that expenditure had been pyramided upon expenditure, and taxation pyramided on taxation, and it was not until the great commercial bodies of Canada, made up of Chambers of Commerce and Boards of Trade and Bankers' Associations and Manufacturers' Associations, and municipal and other representative bodies, rose and protested against the onerous taxation which was being imposed upon the people from month to month, that anything was done. I am unaware of any sincere step taken by the present government until two months ago with the object of reducing expenditure and thus reducing taxation.

I need hardly point out to my honourable friends what our Allies in the late war have done, as they are probably as familiar with it as I am; but, with a view of directing attention to the activities of other governments, more particularly those of our Allies, may I refer to a few figures in dealing with this very important question? Let me instance as an example the statement made by the late Prime Minister of Great Britain, Mr. Baldwin, who, before going out of office, said:

Those in charge of the public purse since the first year of peace have reduced the expenditures of the country from over £2,000,000,000 a year to but little over £800,000,000. The staff in the Government offices have been so greatly reduced that there are now only ten per cent more officials at work than before the war.

That is to say, it was reduced from war-service establishment to within ten per cent of pre-war conditions.

And here it must be remembered that the work of the public administration has been enormously increased owing to the pensions and other services introduced during and caused by the war. Though nearly half our income goes to the payment of interest on debts, we have in three years out of income reduced our debt—

And honourable gentlemen will have noticed the activity of the British Government three years ago.

—we have in three years out of income reduced our debt by £450,000,000.

Which represents over $2,000,000,000.

Since the Armistice we have nearly halved the floating debt. It was £1,500,000,000. It is now only £800,000,000. We have paid off in addition all our foreign debt, except to America, we have balanced our budget, and we have established a sinking fund. These things have been hard to do, but we have maintained the credit of the country.

Now, may I point to what the United States has done since the cessation of the war? And may I preface this statement by some sentiments expressed by President Coolidge upon the importance of dealing seriously with this particular subject?

For seven years the people have borne with uncomplaining courage the tremendous burden of national and local taxation.

These taxes must both be reduced.

The taxes of the nation must be reduced now as much as prudence will permit, and expenditures must be reduced accordingly.

High taxes reach everywhere and burden everybody. They bear most heavily upon the poor. They diminish industry and commerce. They make agriculture unprofitable. They increase the rates on transportation. They are a charge on every necessary of life.

Of all services which the Congress can render to the country, I have no hesitation in declaring this one to be paramount.

To neglect it, to postpone it, to obstruct it by unsound proposals, is to become unworthy of public confidence and untrue to public trust.

The country wants this measure to have the right of way over all others.

Now let me point out to you what the United States has done:

The United States last year reduced its liabilities by nearly two thousand million dollars. When the war ended the American Government appointed a non-political commission to investigate the then existing expenditures, and to bring in an economy budget. War-time staffs were cut to peace-time proportions and savings were put into effect in all spending departments. Consequently last year the United States treasury showed a surplus of $323,000,000. The American Secretary of the Treasury is now proposing to give this entire sum of $323,000,000 back to the people in the form of relief from war-time taxes. He has announced a reduction of income taxation, repeal of amusement tax, of certain stamp taxes and other taxes.

I need not enlarge upon the necessity of Canada marching in step with the United States. My honourable friend from Lambton (Hon. Mr. Pardee) has stressed that point, and it is obvious to everyone present that, if Canada is to keep abreast with the United States, if our people are not to be absorbed by the Republic on the other side of the line, living in this country must be made as cheap as it is in the United States. And just here may I refer to the debt reduction of the United States?

The public debt of the United States has been cut more than $4,800,000,000 in the four-and-a-half years since the Great War indebtedness was at its peak, August 31, 1919.

Figures made public to-day by the Treasury show that at the opening of business Saturday the national debt was $21,781,966,852. It has been reduced $933,000,000 in the last year.

And, again, may I quote in reference to the proposals of the United States in regard to the reduction of income tax. Anyone who has the breath of patriotism in him, and who desires to see Canada make progress and hold its own with the United States, must give most serious attention to problems of this nature. On an income of $3,000, the Canadian scale is $40, the American scale nothing. On an income of $4,000 the Canadian scale is $80, the American scale $15.75. On a $5,000 income the Canadian scale is $120, the American scale $38.25. On an income of $6,000 the Canadian scale is $150, the American scale $72. On a $7,000 income the Canadian scale is $270, the American scale $99.

Now honourable gentlemen, this is a serious problem. This country cannot maintain the rate of taxation under which we are labouring to-day, a taxation which has to be paid by the people in middle life who constitute the masses, and yet compete successfully with the United States.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: How do they go when they get into big amounts?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The United States proposes cutting the super tax by twenty-five per cent.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Thirty-three and one-half per cent.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is the reduction proposed. It may be increased.

There is a phase of income tax which amounts practically to confiscation. We in Canada held up our hands in holy horror when it was suggested that if the Labour party came into office in Great Britain there would be a levy on capital. In the case of the larger incomes the income practically becomes capital because many of the wealthier classes may not spend more than ten or fifteen per cent of their income, and thus add to their capital, which goes into the many industrial activities of the nation. But immediately we bring that money within the compass of the income tax you cannot expect the capitalist who thus has his capital confiscated to become interested in the industrial activities of the nation. He says at once: "No, I will not take chances on going into the development of natural resources or the building up of the industrial resources of the nation; I will put my capital in Government bonds and that class of security which is non-taxable." For instance, honourable gentlemen, I venture to say that most of the war-bonds which we have issued in the Dominion of Canada as non-taxable are held by the wealthy men of Canada, and instead of their incomes going into the development of our resources they are locked up in the vaults of the various banks and trust companies of the country.

Another consideration is this—and I have only to mention it, I fancy, to impress upon honourable gentlemen the truth of the statement: There is no development going on in Canada to-day for that reason. Go into our cities and you will observe that any building, or any development whatever, is most exceptional. Are there any new industries being built up in Canada? If there are, I am not aware of them, and I have been from one end of the country to the other.

Hon. Mr. POPE: They are shutting them up.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: They do not come under one's observation. On the contrary, one is shocked by the great number of industries which are being closed up. And it is all due to the fact that we are following a most suicidal course in practically confiscating the capital that should go into the activities of trade and industry.

I have read, honourable gentlemen, what Great Britain has done, and what the United States has done. Let us consider what Australia and New Zealand have done along the same lines. Australia is using an annual surplus of revenue over expenditure to reduce her public debt, which in 1922-23 was £335,000,000 or less than two-thirds of our own. And here is what Prime Minister Massey, of New Zealand, writing in the Nineteenth Century, says about what his own country is doing:

> For the year ending March 31st last, the Government was able to announce a surplus of £1,315,638. Last session it became possible to reduce the income tax by twenty per cent; to reinstate penny postage; to remove the income tax from farmers, and leave them subject only to the land tax; to assist ex-soldier settlers to the extent of probably two millions sterling; to increase soldiers' pensions in the aggregate by about eighty thousand pounds per annum; to abolish the amusement tax on admission on all tickets not costing more than one shilling, and also the duty on tea.

May I add to what I have already mentioned, that in this evening's Journal appears the following cablegram, which will illustrate what further efforts are being made by the Government of Great Britain to reduce expenditure and taxation:

> London, March 4.—A saving of £37,000,000 is shown in the estimates for the Civil Service and Revenue Departments for 1924-25, now available, the figures being £289,874,727, as against £327,212,872, the previous year. The principal reductions are £7,500,000 for the colonial services; £6,750,000 for the Ministry of Pensions, nearly £3,000,000 for the middle eastern services, and $2,000,000 for the Ministry of Labour.

I would commend to my honourable friends' attention the efforts that are being made by those nations to reduce their debt. The burden is crushing us in Canada. It is strangling industry, paralyzing trade, and will destroy our national future if some immediate change is not made.

So that honourable gentlemen may not think that I am moved to make this criticism by the statements which have appeared in the press and the resolutions which were passed by commercial bodies during the past summer, may I remind you that at last Session I directed the attention of this Chamber to the situation; and, if the House will pardon my repeating what I then said, I shall read a short extract:

> This is not an exaggerated statement. We are imposing taxation to such an extent as to throttle business, prevent development and progress, and bring about final collapse. The Government of the day is not showing the slightest interest or intention of grappling with this very important problem. We have taxing bodies multiplied throughout the Dominion. We have the Federal Government imposing taxation; we have the Provincial governments imposing similar taxation, such as the income tax; and many of the municipalities have power likewise to impose income tax. The provinces to-day are imposing a direct tax upon property as the municipalities are doing; and, unless some intelligent effort is made to deal with this very important subject, Canada will be taxed to a condition of disaster.
> There certainly should be some organization of experts to take up this matter with the provinces and the municipalities so that there will not be this multiplicity of taxing bodies imposing similar taxes. I say this, honourable gentlemen, not with a view of criticizing the Government, but simply to point out the duty of the Government at this particular crisis.

Apparently we are still bent upon the same course; for the so-called reorganization of the Public Service amounts to very little. It will at best effect an economy of only about $20,000,000 annually. The unfortunate effect of our present course is that in our expenditure and our taxation we are setting the pace for the provinces and the municipalities. There is scarcely a province or a municipality in the Dominion that is not in the running with the Federal Government in increasing its expenditure and its taxation, so that we now have three taxing bodies in the Dominion, triplicating the tax imposed by the Federal Government.

Honourable gentlemen may ask in what way this can be prevented. Well, if it is permitted without any effort on the part of the Federal Government, it will in my judgment result in national disaster. It is bringing about that result to-day. One hesitates to speak about this, honourable gentlemen. I have no desire to refer to the great loss of population we are suffering. I agree with what my honourable friend from Lambton (Hon. Mr. Pardee) says about the maintenance in Canada of a patriotic spirit and a feeling of optimism which will result in the development of the magnificent resources and potential wealth which this country possesses. But, honourable gentlemen, we cannot live upon this kind of sentiment. Canada has demonstrated probably better than any other nation its patriotism and its pride in itself. During the late war no other nation representing nine millions of people performed such prodigies of service and of valour as did Canada at that time. It is needless to repeat that Canada, as an earnest of its patriotic spirit, sent to the front 500,000 men and spent two billions of dollars upon war, and that 60,000 of her sons lie buried on the battlefields of France. The people of Canada cannot demonstrate their patriotism more than they did during the late war. But, honourable gentlemen, this has become an entirely different matter. We can best show our patriotism to Canada by cultivating a proper attitude of mind in facing our financial responsibilities, and as I have already stated, unless we take up this problem seriously it will result most disastrously for Canada.

Those of us who come from the West have some knowledge of the effect of the situation upon the development of that western country. There is no part of the world with greater potential wealth than the Northwest of Canada. We have to-day in those three Western Provinces, at least 200,000,000 acres of arable land, only 18 per cent of which is settled. But, it is estimated, there are to-day in those three Provinces fewer farms than there were five years ago. Our last decennial census establishes the fact that between 1901 and 1921 this country brought in about 3,700,000 immigrants, but by 1921 our increase in population had fallen short of that number by 160,000. It simply means that we have been standing still during that period, and that many of our people have gone to the United States; That is to say, that notwithstanding what we have gained by natural increase, we have lost the entire volume of our immigration. I know of no more patriotic work, honourable gentlemen, than for the people of Canada to give more serious consideration to the rectification of the many abuses from which we suffer to-day.

As I said in the beginning, it is not my intention to direct this criticism against the Government. I say it is a condition that has prevailed in Canada for many years. Unfortunately we have an antiquated system of governmental administration. I do not speak of our parliamentary system, but I say that the administration of the affairs of Canada is antiquated, is archaic. We have no machinery by which public affairs may be administered properly, or as efficiently as business is transacted by the large corporations of this or any other country. Honourable gentlemen know that most government business is transacted departmentally. We have not in any of our Departments of Government the proper means for the solution of important problems involving great economic questions, or having to do with the development and progress of our country, or the successful administration of its affairs.

Let me illustrate what I mean. I will take three or four subjects to show the futility of our machinery in dealing with important matters. Take for instance the agricultural situation in the West. We know that for years there has been throughout the Northwest a seething discontent. We know that an outward and visible sign or expression of that discontent was given on the eve of the last election, when a new political party sprang up in a night and extirpated the two old-line parties. You could not have anything more significant than that. Yet nothing has been done and apparently nothing can be done by the Government with its present machinery to investigate the many reasons for this discontent and this failure of development. It cannot be done departmentally. The Government, as a Government, cannot do it satisfactorily with its present machinery. Yet I am satisfied, honourable gentlemen, that if this country were being administered by the men who manage our great railways, our banks, or other financial corporations, they would investigate the situation and determine what is really the difficulty. We are at present helpless to deal with it. I say that if the Government had proper machinery for examining into great questions of this kind so that a pronouncement could be made, that pronouncement would be accepted by the people of Canada as conclusive. But no pronouncement on the subject can be made to-day. True, we appoint a Royal Commission and place upon it three or four men who are absolute strangers to the problems to be investigated. They are gentlemen of leisure, or they are gentlemen in need. They are sent out through the country, at the expense of the Treasury, for the purpose of examining into something about which they know nothing, and about which, when they conclude, they will know less than when they began.

The futility of the machinery which we have in dealing with large questions may be demonstrated also in this way. During the war, when large questions were under consideration, when great problems had to be solved, did the Government of Canada, or did the Government of England, rely upon departmental machinery to solve them? No. The Government of Canada called in boards of experts for nearly every phase of the war which had to be dealt with. They were business men; they were experts in the particular subject under consideration. They were not military scientists, but business men with a comprehensible knowledge of business problems. When the United States wished to cut down expenditure what did they do? Did they have their departmental experts make inquiry? No, honourable gentlemen; they appointed a non-political body, and that non-political body cut down expenditures in accordance with what I have read. What was done in England? When Great Britain recognized that her expenditures had to be lopped off, had to be cut to the bone, so to speak, did she leave the task of investigation to governmental machinery which has been in operation so long that memory runneth not to the contrary? No. Outside experts were called in and instructed to deal with the situation just as in the case of a financial or commercial company. And, honourable gentlemen, that is what should be done here. I say it is impossible to curtail expenditure unless the authority dealing with the matter is specially charged with doing it. I say that a Government, Members of Parliament or Deputy Ministers, by means of the machinery we have, in Parliament, in the Government, or in the Departments, cannot do it, because everything is against it. The pressure which is brought to bear by constituents and by all parties concerned is entirely opposed to reduction of expenditure. Let me instance the case of a Minister who attempts to cut down the expenditure of his Department. What immediately confronts him? His constituents protest against such a reduction. They must have patronage. If the proposed reduction relates to the Civil Service, the friends of the men who are going to suffer by the curtailment at once attack it. A Deputy Minister cannot cut down the expenditure of his Department; at least, it is exceptional for him to be able to do so; because every man under him is protesting against the reduction of that expenditure, and he must depend upon the loyalty of his staff if he is to administer his department successfully. Consequently the entire pressure is along the line of expenditure. If in the House of Commons the Government should attempt to cut down the pork-barrel distribution of prestige or of patronage, members are up in arms; they are not going to stand for it; their constituents insist upon this; and so on. Fundamentally, honourable gentlemen, it is all wrong. Unless we have properly constituted boards appointed for that purpose, who have nothing to gain and who are answerable to Parliament, satisfactory curtailment will not take place.

My honourable friend has alluded to the Audit Board being charged with the cutting down of expenditures. While the Audit Board has probably done most excellent work up to the present time, it is not at all adapted for this particular purpose. The Audit Board is made up of gentlemen who are accountants. That Board is not made up of men familiar with organization and with the carrying on of great constructive and administrative work. This Government could constitute a Board of the best experts to be found in Canada, borrowed, if necessary, from the railways and great financial institutions, to re-establish the Departments on the principles of the great institutions from which these men come.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: May I ask my honourable friend if he has any reasonable hope that a Government of either complexion would follow the recommendations of those special Boards, of which he speaks? Does not the pork barrel exist pretty nearly everywhere where there is party government?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: There was never a more opportune time than the present. I do not believe that in the history of our civilization there has ever been a time when the public and governments have been so impressed as at present with the fact that the old system must be radically departed from.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Is it not a matter which is more for governments than for boards?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We of course have a strange conception of government. Government has been handed down to us traditionally. We have associated it with the periods of autocracy when the Sovereign appropriated the revenues of the Crown to himself irrespective of the voice of the people. Government as we know it to-day was finally wrested from an autocratic sovereign, and the will of the people prevailed, and to-day we quote it with authority, and look upon it as an Ark of the Covenant on which our hands must not be lade. But, after all, government is only a human institution. It is as human as any institution we have, and there is no reason why business men, not only in this country but in any country should not revise their system of government. We have the same antiquated, archaic system to-day that we had at the time of Confederation, although our debt to-day closely approaches $3,000,000,000 and our revenue will closely approach half a billion dollars, whereas at the time of Confederation our Supply Bill did not exceed $20,000,000, and it is doubtful whether the revenue of the country exceeded the same amount. Yet, we have not readjusted ourselves. The world has grown since that time. The greatest war in history has been fought since then, and has revolutionized every institution of civilization. But still we go on applying the old machinery without any attempt at readjusting. I say that the time has arrived when the intelligent men, not only in Canada but elsewhere, should apply business methods to government exactly as they apply them to the business organizations to which they belong.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: May I be permitted to ask this question? My honourable friend points out—and I am not prepared to entirely disagree with him—that this government's expenditures ought to be subject to inquiry by special boards. May I point out to him the signal failure to produce the results he hoped for in a very notable instance?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Would not my honourable friend do very much better by making a speech? I should like to hear my honourable friend expatiate upon that subject. It is one worthy of my honourable friend's thought, and I hope he will give the House the benefit of his views.

We have already confessed to the weakness of our departmental machinery by appointing a Railway Board. We entirely eliminated the administration of that very important utility, the Intercolonial Railway, from the Railway Department, because we said the Department could not administer it. We did the same thing with the Grain Board. We placed upon the Statute Book a confession that it was impossible for the Government to administer properly the great wheat crop of the West.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: May I point out that notwithstanding the reports made by experts we have not been able to get our Government to follow their advice. Take the Hudson Bay railway, for instance, and the deepening of the Welland canal for the benefit of the Americans.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Even the present Government has outlined a Board for rectifying those abuses which I point out, so my honourable friends may follow the operations of this Board.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: My trouble is that I do not think the Government will follow the recommendations.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If this Government is too obstinate to do this, the only thing to be done is to replace it by another. I can only say that I know a Government that will carry out its advice along this line.

I was going to refer to many other matters, but I have kept the House much longer than I intended, and I have exceeded my time. I must say that it is very gratifying to learn from the Government that they are so deeply interested in the many large problems foreshadowed in the Speech from the Throne, and we shall look forward with a great deal of anxiety and interest to the crystalization of what is proposed into legislation, and I would suggest to my honourable friend the leader of the House that the Senate should be kept busy in the earlier months of the Session by giving due consideration to the many measures which, as I have said, are promised. They all deal with large questions, national questions, which enter not only into the future of Canada, but into the everyday lives of our people, and I express the hope—and there is no reason why we should not look forward to its realization to some extent —that the legislation which has been promised so abundantly in the Speech from the Throne may be prepared with due regard to the promotion of the best interests of Canada.

Hon. RAOUL DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, it is with great pleasure that I join with my honourable friend opposite (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) in expressing our appreciation of the interesting speech delivered by the honourable member for Lambton (Hon. Mr. Pardee), a gentleman who has had a brilliant career in the other House, and who will continue to help us with his good advice and experience in this Chamber. With my honourable friend I welcome the honourable gentleman from Edmonton (Hon. Mr. Coté) who has seconded the Address. He has given us a splendid picture of his own adopted Province, Alberta. He has told us of its prosperity and immense possibilities in natural resources, and I am sure that he, in conjunction with the other members who come from that province, will keep us well posted as to the needs of that part of the country.

My honourable friend who represents in this Chamber the Conservative thought of this country, although coming from the West, which seems to be tainted in some spots with radicalism has given satisfaction to those Conservative elements in the East that have been awaiting for some time a true leader representing a true and undiluted conservatism. I am always happy to hear him, because he has given thought to the many questions which come before us. He has had the responsibility of ministerial office, and he knows the difficulties of administering this country; and although he has not in his time brought about the millennium, he does not ask from his successors the same idealism which would bring us to that high level. He has indicated that the departments of the Government were started towards reorganization after the war, and has told us that the Printing Bureau and the Post Office Department were overhauled and that their personnel was reduced before his Government went out of office. Now he tells us in so many words that if he had remained at the helm with his friends, he would not have waited for the year 1923-24 to bring about a complete readjustment, but that his Government was fairly on the way to attain that object in 1921-22.

I would like to draw the attention of my honourable friend to the fact that in 1921-22 the total disbursements amounted to $463,652,436; and that in the following year, which was under the care of the present Administration, the total expenditure was reduced to $434,452,340, or by nearly $30,000,000. I would also draw my honourable friend's attention to the fact that the incoming Administration had to face an item of $308,324,903 of uncontrollable expenditure, which leaves but the sum of $126,127,437 of controllable expenditure.

If my honourable friend will bear that figure in mind, it will be easy for him to realize that in the compression of the budget we could not look beyond this controllable amount. What was the controllable expenditure in the few years which preceeded the war? In 1910-11, if we deduct the uncontrollable expenditure, we find that the controllable expenditure was $97,676,377: for 1911-12 it was $106,696,920: for 1912-13 it was $117,597,232; and for 1913-14 it was $158,627,828. So in 1922-23, the present Government had reduced the controllable expenditure to $126,127,437, which was well below the controllable expenditure of 1913-14.

But my honourable friend says we have not gone fast enough, that we have waited to be stirred by an aroused public opinion. I draw the attention of my honourable friend to the fact that to-day, after two years of administration, we are able to come before Parliament and make a statement which surprises not only this Chamber but the public at large, namely, that when this fiscal year is over we will have balanced the budget. This statement was so little expected that quite a number of honourable gentlemen around me and elsewhere can hardly believe it. Let them wait and see.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Will you reduce taxation substantially, may I ask?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: We will; but we could not reduce taxation until we had balanced the budget.

Now, how do the Civil Service and the other services under the Crown in Canada stand to-day? The Civil Service stands with a reduction of 3,959 persons. That reduction has not been accomplished in a day.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Compared with when?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: With the first of January, 1922. The reduction went on to a certain extent during the first year, and has been continuing to the present time. In speaking of this reduction, I am not referring to salaries, but merely to the number of individuals. I have asked to have produced before the Senate Committee statements of the personnel of the different Departments as of the first of July, 1910, 1914, 1918 and 1922, and we will later bring them up to 1924. The reduction which I have mentioned will be verified, and I am convinced that we shall find that considerable further reduction can be made. I may be in error, but I believe, and am in hopes, that the work of the Senate will help the Audit Commission, which will pass upon the activities of the various departments.

My honourable friend claims that business men should be called upon to examine into the Departments and into the expenditure of the Public Works Department and the Railway Department. Whatever commission is appointed, whatever body of business men is called upon, their work will have to be accepted by the Government and by Parliament. I draw the attention of my honourable friend to this situation: during the many years when he sat in the Government he must have done similar work, but his time was mainly during the war period when money did not count. There was an orgy of expenditure. Everybody went wild. We must sober up, now that we have to pay the bills. My honourable friend has sat in Council considering Estimates and has weighed the items one by one, week after week. On that Board were business men who could bring their experience to bear upon the problems which they had to examine and solve. I may tell my honourable friend that for many weeks this Government has examined into the Estimates and weighed every item of expenditure, and he will judge of our work when the Estimates are brought down. He will find the reductions quite to his liking.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I am glad to hear that.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Now, we could not have balanced the Budget, except by a reduction in expenditure. But there are expenditures which seem to be important and are being called for everywhere. I have laid down for myself the rule that at present they must be either essential or remunerative. My honourable friend knows that a Cabinet composed of fifteen or sixteen members representing various Provinces and in close touch with the people may not always see eye to eye with the representative from this Chamber. There are requirements which they know better than does the representative from this body. There are obligations upon them which they feel must be met. One has but his limited view of things. The representatives from the Commons in the Cabinet have their local knowledge of affairs, and of the needs of their respective provinces.

My honourable friend has said that there is considerable uneasiness throughout the land. Yet he will recognize that general conditions in the country are good. Production during the past year has been large. Our trade expansion, our foreign business has increased. Our transportation system has shown better results. Employment has been plentiful throughout the land. There have been times this year when there was even a shortage of labour in some centres. Public finance is better. The announcement which we are able to make shows that. We have an increased income and a decreased expenditure. My honourable friend must of course take that statement without having the Estimates before him. I am desirous of having him look minutely into the next Estimates to be brought down. I know that there are shadows in the picture. I know that we have an emigration problem, but this problem is easily explained. Wages in the towns and cities of the United States have been double those of our own people. There is a temptation for the wage-earner to cross the line and obtain that larger wage. On our farms, in our rural communities, both in the East and in the West there has been uneasiness, there has been discontent. The reason is not difficult to find. In many places production has been greater, but the prices have been low. Our people who have crossed to the south have not been going to the farms. Had they done so they would have found on the other side as bad a condition in the rural parts as existed in their own neighbourhood in Canada. They have been going to the towns and cities.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: And to the manufacturing centres.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend says to the manufacturing centres, but he must not forget that there has been cause for a labour shortage on the other side of the line. That labour shortage is due to the practical prohibition or considerable restriction of immigration from European countries, but not from Canada. Canadians have therefore had an opportunity which has been denied to wage-earners from Europe. There is in some rural communities in Canada a certain amount of dissatisfaction because during the war the people enjoyed higher prices and lived more comfortably; but to-day the prices are normal or at pre-war levels, whereas the things they buy have not come down in proportion. It is very easy for anyone to increase his personal or domestic budget, but we all know how hard it is to reduce it. One of the fundamental reasons for the present disturbing elements in our economic field in this country has been the wage paid to labour in towns and cities and on our railways. I am not recriminating. By reason of war conditions they obtained a considerable increase in wages, and they have refused to let go of that increase. I merely state a fact. They claim their right to retain what they have, because the cost of living has not decreased; but they have failed to realize that it is mainly because of the high wage they receive that the cost of living remains high. Why should I reproach them with their desire to maintain their present wage? Do we not see throughout the world evidences that one thinks first of himself? The wage-earner who has been able to double his pay thinks he should look after himself first and retain that high wage. The real trouble has been that farm labour is given very meagre recompense as compared with the wages of labour in towns and cities. Hence the complaint from the farmer particularly against the high cost of manufactured goods. The farmers have been complaining that while their own products were being sold at a reduced figure, manufactured goods which they had to buy were at a high level. Strange to say, we now hear some of our manufacturers also complaining. But, happily, both on the farm and in the towns and cities, all have been at work, and, as I have said, there is less unemployment than heretofore in Canada, and our country is in better condition, I would say, than any other country in the world.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: What about the conditions in the West?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Conditions in the West have been improving, and, except in a certain part of Manitoba, they have had a splendid crop. It is true, they have not sold that crop at a very high figure and we hear them still complaining of their lot; and I sympathize with them. They are passing resolutions and asking for remedies. In their demands they also want reduced expenditure, but at the same time they ask for the construction of the Hudson Bay Railway. It is evident that they want a reduced tariff.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: You are going to give it to them too, are you not?

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Certainly.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: They believe that the tariff as it stands, in regard to most things, tends to keep prices too high. They find that the selling price of their own products is governed by world conditions, and they clamour for a reduction in the cost of living. At the same time I recognize that, while they are asking for a reduced tariff, the manufacturers' association is clamouring for an increase. It is in the Parliament of Canada that those conflicting interests meet. It is for the Government and Parliament to try to hold the scales evenly between those two big contributors to our wealth, the agricultural interest and the industrial.

I have said that the manufacturers were clamouring for a higher tariff. Those who have been either in public life or in business know of the difficulties of tariff adjustment. It is no easy matter to make a tariff that will suit everyone. It is difficult even to get the beneficiaries of a tariff to agree among themselves as to what is equitable. I remember that in 1903, 1904 or 1905 the Manufacturers' Association tried their hand at the preparation of a scientific tariff. They set their various sections to work—the iron, steel and textile industries and all the various other branches—in order to try to reconcile the interests in those different sections. They found the work so difficult that they abandoned it. They never concluded their labours, because the difficulty of harmonizing different interests was insuperable. The raw material of one industry was the finished product, or part of the finished product, of the other. There was such pyramiding in preparing a tariff that would satisfy the raw-material man and the subsequent users that the work had to be abandoned. I recognize that the revision of a tariff, or even the mention of a tariff, in the Parliament of Canada, frightens the manufacturer. When the right honourable the junior member for Ottawa (Right Hon. Sir George E. Foster) tried his hand at readjusting the tariff, I remember what alarm he created among the manufacturers of Canada, and the recriminations which resulted from the slight alterations that he made. Again in 1897 the manufacturers were—I will not say scandalized, but they were frightened at the first preference which was given to Great Britain. They gradually perceived that, although they had been fearful, no harm was done, as they prospered under that tariff. In 1911 they went into a frenzy when Mr. Fielding, after his negotiations, brought back the proposed treaty for reciprocity in natural products. They were not affected, yet it seemed as if the temple had been shaken down upon their heads. They cruelly, selfishly, banded together to close the door of the United States to the Canadian farmer.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: The United States farmers did that.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No, no. Congress passed the law and it remained on the Statute Book at Washington up to last year. Perhaps it is still there. But it was the vested interests in the East who succeeded in raising such a storm that the reciprocity proposal was rejected.

My honourable friend (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) said that overnight the West had banded together and formed a third party, rejecting the other two. I verily believe that that organization started from the day that the East denied the West the American market which was at its door.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Dandurand, the debate was adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at 3 p.m.

CIVIL SERVICE HOLIDAYS

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. G. H. BRADBURY: Honourable gentlemen, I desire to draw the attention of the Government of the day to a matter to which I think their attention ought to have been drawn some time ago, and that is the custom of this Government, and the late Government, in defying an Act of Parliament. In 1918 Parliament passed a law declaring what should be the public holidays in Canada, and ever since that Act was passed it has been systematically ignored. I will place on record the statutory holidays in this country. I read now from the Statutes of Canada, 1919-20, Chapter 41, clause 6:

The Civil Service Act, 1918, is hereby amended by inserting therein, immediately after section thirty-three, the following section:—

"33A. The following days and none other shall be the holidays to be observed in and by the Civil Service:—

(1) Sundays;
(2) New Year's Day;
(3) Good Friday;
(4) Easter Monday;
(5) Victoria Day;
(6) The birthday of the reigning Sovereign, or the day fixed by proclamation by the Governor in Council for the celebration thereof;
(7) Dominion Day;
(8) Labour Day.
(9) Christmas Day;
(10) Any day appointed by proclamation by the Governor in Council to be observed as a general fast or thanksgiving or as a holiday."

I presume, honourable gentlemen, that it is in view of this last clause that the Government assume that by Order in Council they may declare a public holiday for the Civil Service of this country. I submit that if the present Government has declared to-day a public holiday under this statute, it is absolutely illegal; that it is not within their rights to declare this a holiday, in the face of this statute. This practice has been going on year after year. To-day is only one of four or five days which the Government have been illegally declaring as holidays, notwithstanding the law. When it is remembered that each of these holidays is costing the country between $200,000 and $300,000, perhaps you will realize how serious the matter is. We have in Canada, in round numbers, 40,000 civil servants, and every one of these is entitled to the holidays provided by this statute. Perhaps it is under paragraph 10 of the clause that the Government declares this day a holiday. That paragraph reads as follows:

Any day appointed by proclamation by the Governor in Council to be observed as a general fast or thanksgiving or as a holiday.

I submit, honourable gentlemen, you cannot read into this clause any power conferred on the Government to declare a holiday for the Civil Service. It simply means that if the Government desired to declare a general fast day throughout Canada for all the people, they would then be within their rights; but I wish to point out to this honourable House that it is illegal and unjustifiable to declare this day a holiday.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, I do not know that my honourable friend has the right to raise this question as one of privilege.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: It was a question raised on the Orders of the Day. I presume I have a right to raise it in that way.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: On the Orders of the Day there are of course certain questions that may be raised, but they are limited in number. They are questions that are so pressing as to justify their being brought up without notice. Now, my honourable friend has failed to observe that he is condemning the House of Commons for their action in this matter. It is not the Senate, because we are sitting to-day. Apparently the Commons have in their wisdom deemed it proper not to sit to-day. I do not know whether the holiday which they have taken for themselves has been extended to the civil servants in the various departments.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: It has.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It is possible. However, as my honourable friend states, this legislation has been honoured rather in the breach than in the observance, because since the Act was passed various holidays have been claimed—rather, they have been enjoyed without any special proclamation. It will be for the Commons to examine their conscience and see how they can square themselves with that which has just been read.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: I refer not so much to the House of Commons as to the Government, who have declared this day a holiday in the Civil Service. So far as the House of Commons are concerned, I admit that they have a perfect right to declare a holiday for themselves whenever they like. I submit, however, that the Government of the day have no right to override the statute as they are doing.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech on the opening of the Session, and the motion of Hon. Mr. Pardee for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. R. DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, when the Senate adjourned last evening I was speaking of the inexplicable and unjustifiable attitude of the manufacturers in 1911. I feel that they then disqualified themselves to teach goodwill and fair play to the farmers of this country. Their attitude and action in 1911 preclude them from judging others on that score. The farmers will never be able to equal them in the field of selfishness.

In the midst of these conflicting interests stands Parliament as the supreme arbiter. We have to lay down a just and fair policy in the interests of the whole of Canada. What is the present grievance of the manufacturers? I stated that the farmers at large were asking for a reduction in the tariff and the manufacturers were now being heard in their demand for an increase in the tariff. What is the present grievance of the manufacturers? It is the increased preference to Great Britain. I desire to lay down the principle that the Canadian tariff is made for Canada's benefit alone, and that the preference to Great Britain has been given for our sole advantage. In this rigorous country we must see to it that the people are properly clad at a minimum of cost. The tariff must be so arranged as to ensure a fair price to the consumer as well as to the producer. Where can we draw the line? It is a difficult problem indeed. There are great variations in conditions both periodical and geographical. The costs of materials vary. Commercial depressions occur inside and beyond our borders. There are the fluctuations in exchange; there are the differences in wages. Consideration must also be given to the domestic market and its limitations, to the foreign market and the possibility of our manufacturers competing, and what not. All kinds of conditions may intervene to vary the situation. The conditions under which a tariff is fixed to-day will not be the conditions of to-morrow. I am of opinion that a certain inflow from outside is a sure indication and guarantee of fair conditions in the country. It makes for healthy competition; it keeps the manufacturer on the alert and develops his spirit of initiative.

What should be the imposition, tax, duty or protection? All these words are synonimous. The manufacturers have two main grievances against the British preference. They point to woolens and to footwear. Let us take woolens. Men's clothing and overcoating, tweeds, cassimeres, doeskins, and other cloths appeared to be affected by the tariff. The preferential tariff levied was 27½ per cent, the intermediate 35 per cent, the general 35 per cent. There has been a reduction of ten per cent in the duty on British goods imported through Canadian ports, which brings the duty down to 24¾ per cent. There was in 1923, it is true, an increase in importations of woolen goods over those of 1922; but was that increase due to this increase in the preference? I doubt it very much, and I think the figures which I will quote will disprove it. In 1921 the total importations into Canada of manufactures of wool were $61,928,975; in 1922 they were cut practically in half, being $32,048,615; in 1923 they came up to $40,655,452. Honourable gentlemen will notice that even with that increase in 1923 the importations were less than they were in 1921 by one-third.

Now, is the increase in importations in 1923 over 1922 due to the preference? I have a statement giving the importations per month of dutiable woolen goods from Great Britain in 1922 and in 1923. What does it show? The first preference came into effect in May, 1922, and could only affect the entries after June, 1922. The figures for the first five months, before the preference, were as follows: January, $2,173,298; February, $2,295,000; March, $3,494,000; April, $1,682,000; May, $2,834,000. And now come the months after the preference; June, $2,197,000; July, $2,155,000; August, $3,028,000; September, $2,- 901,000; October, $2,677,000; November, $2,378,000; and December, $2,387,000. There is practically no difference as between the months that followed the increased preference and the months that immediately preceded it.

Now we come to 1923, the first five months of which come under the first preference. What do we find? We find the following figures: January, $2,652,000; February, $2,924,000; March, $3,777,000; April, $2,281,000; and May, $2,175,000. Now we come to the second increase in the preference, and what de we find? Here are the figures: June, $2,504,000; July, $2,986,000; August, $3,362,000; September, $2,780,000; October, $2,381,000; November, $1,945,000; and December, $1,828,000. From these figures honourable gentlemen will see that the importations from Great Britain under the preferences granted have hardly altered.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Then what is the advantage of increasing the preference if the effect is to reduce the revenue of Canada under those conditions?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Now I will give the total figures for those two years. The total imports from Great Britain in 1922 were $29,905,768; in 1923, under the second preference, they were $31,600,856. From these figures honourable gentlemen will see that the difference was very slight indeed, and it practically represents the decrease in importations from the United States. That being so, we have hardly any change in the importations under those two heads during those two years, except that we have transferred our clientele from the United States to Great Britain.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But you have lost in the collection of duty.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I do not see that we have lost any considerable amount of duty. There was a slight increase in the importations, but the result has been to increase our purchases from Great Britain to about the same proportion that we decreased our purchases from the United States.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: Has the preference had the effect of decreasing the cost of woollen articles?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would say that the effect was to decrease the cost to the consumer not only of the goods thus imported but of the goods manufactured in Canada, because the competition from outside makes it necessary for the producer here to reduce his price in order to maintain his sales.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: But, as a question of fact, had the preference that effect?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have no data on that score, but, reasoning logically, I would judge that it would produce that result.

Now, the imports of similar goods from the United States in 1921 amounted to $5,081,040; in 1922 to $3,195,958; in 1923 to $2,561,314. This bears out what I said a moment ago, that the decrease in importations from the United States just about corresponds with the increase in importations from Great Britain.

I would like to elaborate this point a little further, giving some details, and examining some special items. I will take the item of "overcoating, tweed, women's dress goods unfinished, and serges." In 1921 there were imported 6,509,587 yards, at a value of $8,351,920. In 1922 there were imported 10,876,404 yards, at a value of $11,112,458. In 1923 there were imported 10,377,817 yards, at a value of $10,685,894. There was a smaller importation in 1923 than there was in 1922.

Cassimeres, clothes, doeskin, etc.—of these I have not the quantities, but I have the values. In 1921 these goods were imported to the value of $1,116,996; in 1922, when the first preference came into effect, to the value of $1,521,268; and in 1923, when the second increase in the preference was established, $1,621,657.

Now I take "socks and stockings." In 1922 the imports amounted to $2,165,938, and in 1923 to $2,379,887.

All these figures indicate that there has not been a very considerable increase all told, and that in certain lines there was none.

In that connection I may say that neither was there a decrease in the number of men employed by the woollen manufacturers of this country during 1923. I have a statement for that year which shows the average number of men employed in 30 manufactories of woollen cloths and yarns. I will not give all of them, but will simply give the monthly average, which in 1922 was 4,052 and in 1923 4,144. This shows that there was not any appearance of a slackening off of the work of these manufacturing establishments.

Hon. Mr. POPE: Have you a list of the factories that have been obliged to close up and go out of business?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: A certain number have not maintained themselves, but it would be interesting to have a statement covering a number of years. Undoubtedly in 1922 and 1923 a certain number of these institutions were running behind, but in order to see what has been the situation of the woollen trade in Canada from that angle, we would need to have the figures for a number of years.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: May I ask the honourable gentleman whether the figures just quoted are in his opinion quite correct? Are the reports complete, and has the department received full returns as to the number of men employed in that industry?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have this statement from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, which has been put into my hands with the knowledge that I would make use of it, so I take it for granted that it will stand the test.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Only a few days ago the woollen manufacturers filed a brief with the Government in which they represented that more than seven thousand employees had been removed from service owing to lack of employment within the last twelve months.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My statement covers the activities of 30 manufacturing establishments.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I think we should have the full returns.

Hon. Mr. SMITH: That does not necessarily cover all of them.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Now I come to the footwear industry. The first item covers "boots and shoes, stitched or wire-fastened, with unstitched sole, close edges." The preferential tariff on these goods is 15 per cent, the intermediate tariff 22½ per cent, and the general tariff 25 per cent. This preference came into force in May, 1922, when the rate of duty was decreased from 17½ per cent to 15 per cent. There was no reduction in 1923. The imports from Great Britain for the nine months ending the 31st of December, 1921, amounted to $2,591; the 31st December, 1922, $3,546; the 31st December, 1923, $3,719.

The second item, "boots, shoes, slippers and insoles of any material," are liable to 17½ per cent under the preferential tariff, 27½ per cent under the intermediate, and 30 per cent under the general. In 1922 the duty was decreased from 20 per cent to 17½ per cent; in 1923, 10 per cent was cut off if the goods were imported direct into Canada, thus making the rate 15¾ per cent.

The boots and shoes reaching this country from all sources, during the nine months ending December 31, were as follows: 1921, $983,706; 1922, $855,030; 1923, $1,105,632. There was an increase in the importation of 1923 over those of 1922 which amounted to $250,602. From the United Kingdom we received in 1921 $283,049 worth of footwear, in 1922 $404,828, and in 1923 $652,083, an increase of $247,255 in 1923 over 1922.

In the 12 months of the fiscal year ending March 31, 1923, the total imports of boots and shoes were $1,633,087 (excepting rubber shoes), which is 2⅓ per cent of the value of all boots and shoes produced in Canada and imported into Canada. We produced and imported into Canada during the fiscal year ending March 31, 1923, $70,200,000 worth of boots and shoes.

The United States in the last three calendar years furnished us with footwear as follows: in 1921, $1,021,356; in 1922, a reduction to $815,193; and in 1923, about the same figure, $835,982.

From the United Kingdom we received in 1921, the calendar year, $292,012; in 1922, $391,080; and in 1923, $604,472.

If the complaint is made that 15¾ per cent is not sufficient protection against British goods, how much would be sufficient? Twenty-five per cent? Well, we have 25 per cent against American goods, yet they still come in, though not to a considerable extent. All that the Canadian manufacturer stands to lose is 2⅓ per cent.

Our total importations in 1921 were $799,478,483; in 1922 they were $762,409,309; in 1923, $903,530,515.

Exports were: in 1921, $861,694,281; in 1922, $898,177,851; and in 1923, $1,028,319,123. The imports from Great Britain in 1923 were $154,492,420, and from the United States $610,374,804.

Our exports to Great Britain were $360,819,518, and to the United States $422,041,789. Our exports to Great Britain are 35.6 per cent of our total exports, while our imports from Great Britain are 17.1 per cent of our total importations.

Apparently we have no reason to complain of the treatment we are giving the United Kingdom, when we are selling them more than 35 per cent of all exports and buying from that market but 17.1 per cent. Thus, I repeat, the importations that we receive from Great Britain under this lowered duty are for the advantage of Canada and not primarily for the advantage of Great Britain.

I must add, in order to show that there has been no let up in the manufacture of woollens in Canada, that gradually in recent years our raw wool has increased annually, and the increase was larger in 1923 than in the two preceding years.

In looking at the profits made by some of the woollen industries, which are well conducted, I find that their annual statements show large profits, quite satisfactory to the shareholders. I think I have demonstrated by the figures given that the boot and shoe manufacturers have no cause for complaint regarding the importations under the preference to Great Britain. The increase has been but infinitesimal and represents in the total, as I have said, with the importations from the United States and elsewhere, only 2½ per cent of our total production and importation.

Before closing these remarks I desire to draw attention to the increased business we have done with France. In the nine months ending December 31, 1922, our exports to France were $10,634,448. Our exports for the nine months ending December 31, 1923, were $13,865,022, an increase of $3,230,574. Our imports during those two periods were: in the nine months to December 31, 1922, $9,354,566, and to December 31, 1923, $11,749,515, an increase of $2,394,849.

Under the treaty, which came into effect in September last, the imports for consumption into Canada from France amounted to $4,351,148 during the months of October, November and December, being an increase of $869,943 in comparison with the same period in 1922.

The exports to France of Canadian produce amounted to $6,240,493 during the same period in 1923, being an increase of $2,083,431 in comparison with the same months in 1922.

This increase in our exports is all the more commendable because of the present depreciated French currency. I may say that I attribute a good share of this increase of our exports to France to the splendid work done by an honourable member of this House, the honourable gentleman from Montarville (Hon. Mr. Beaubien), who gave five months of his time, from July to November, in travelling through France with the Canadian exhibit and explaining the advantages of our Canadian market. I am sure that when the franc moves back to normal, or even before it is half way back, our trade with France will be of considerable benefit to our manufacturers. I desire, in the name of the Government to thank our colleague for the commendable, devoted work which he has done in the interest of Canada.

Hon. G. D. ROBERTSON: Honourable gentlemen, may I join in expressions of congratulation and felicitation to the mover and the seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech which His Excellency was pleased to read to Parliament. I think the Government too are to be congratulated upon their sagacity in selecting an experienced parliamentarian to move the Address in reply, in view of the difficulty which anyone must encounter in endeavouring to justify all that is contained in the Speech.

To the seconder of the Address may I extend greetings. We are always glad to welcome to this Chamber gentlemen from different parts of Canada who by their ability and by the esteem which they have won from their fellow citizens in the province in which they live, have received merited recognition by promotion and appointment to the Senate. I feel that the Government are to be congratulated in the selection of the gentlemen who moved and seconded the Address.

It is not to be expected that all men should agree on all subjects. If we all agreed this would be, I suppose, a very humdrum sort of world. But seldom have I found myself in such acute disagreement with the statements of public men as in the case of the opening sentence of the Address prepared by the Government and read by His Excellency. In that opening sentence reference is made to the many evidences of increased prosperity in Canada. Looking back over the past year and over the entire country, and endeavouring to discover some particular thing that might be regarded as prosperity or evidence of prosperity in Canada, almost the first thing that impresses one is our financial condition. How is our balance sheet as compared with what it was a year ago? When we realize that our national debt is approximately $100,000,000 in excess of what it was when this Government came into power, one can hardly conclude that that is an evidence of great prosperity.

The next thought that occurs to one is perhaps the question of taxation, and when we recall the additional burdens of taxation that have been laid upon the people of this country during the past two years, we can hardly satisfy our consciences with the reply that those have been evidences of prosperity. When one remembers the solemn pledges made by the present Government not long ago that the burden of taxation would be lifted from the people and the cost of living reduced, and realizes that during the past two years the cost of living has advanced, one feels that there is not much reason for gratification on the part of the humble citizen who has felt more than any other member of the community the additional burden of taxation the country is bearing. None of these things seem to indicate any great prosperity.

On the other hand, a country, especially a young country like Canada, sometimes feels that it is prospering if it has a substantial growth in population and can look forward to development. When we look at the facts with respect to immigration and emigration during the past two years, what is the conclusion to which we are forced to come? Is it not that our emigration has exceeded our immigration? Is it not true that we have been losing good Canadian citizens, their wives and their children, born in Canada and educated in our public and high schools? When they were on the eve of budding into full manhood or womanhood, they were forced to leave Canada for lack of opportunity, and they took with them those advantages for which Canada has paid, to exercise their talents and abilities and give their labour and industry in a foreign land. In their place we are receiving a fewer number of people, who have not been educated under our systems or according to our standards, and many of whom do not even speak the language that is generally used in Canada, and have to be Canadianized.

The Speech from the Throne a little later stated that unemployment has been greatly curtailed. I agree that that is perhaps true because of the tremendous exodus of our working population. About a month ago—I think it was a month ago to-day—I had an opportunity of discussing some public questions, particularly the question of protection, and I mention incidentally that during the past year approximately 200,000 Canadians had emigrated to the United States. I noticed that shortly afterwards a Minister of the Crown took occasion to deny absolutely my assertion. He referred to my statement in language that was quite unparliamentary, though, as he was outside of Parliament, he is not to be criticized for that. He said that no such number of people had left Canada during the past year.

May I call the attention of the House, and of the gentleman referred to, if he should happen to see it, to a statement on this subject which I think may be accepted as authoritative. One of the leading newspapers of Canada has made an investigation into this very matter and has obtained official statements from American authorities as to the number of people who have gone to the United States during the past year, and the conclusions of that authority—I refer to Mr. J. J. Short, of the United States Department of Immigration, at Detroit—may be summarized by stating that:

Nearly a quarter of a million Canadians entered the United States by way of Windsor and Detroit, therefore, during the year, 1923, and Mr. Short and his associates estimate that from 150,000 to 200,000 entered at other points, making a grand total for the year of more than 400,000—people from Canada. I therefore apologize for the mistake I made a month ago in my public utterance in Toronto. I said that the number was only 200,000. I stand corrected. I will accept the statement of the United States official.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: What is the statement? What is the difference?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: The number is double what I said it was. Now, honourable gentlemen, that does not appeal to me as an evidence of prosperity. But if only unemployed workmen had gone to the United States and everybody now in Canada were employed, perhaps the Government might feel that we were in an easy position and that nobody was suffering at the moment. But I direct the attention of the House and of the Government to the fact that it was only a few days ago that the Ottawa papers regretted the fact that the official report from the Ontario Labour Department showed that there were 800 unemployed men registered at the bureau on Queen Street in this city, and on the same day, I think it was, one of the Montreal papers stated that there were 25,000 known to be out of work in Montreal.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Twenty-five thousand?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: That was the report last week. And it is only a few days since the Chief of Police in the city of Toronto forbade a parade of the unemployed men in Toronto who, with their families, are in want. I say to this House and to this country that unemployment is rife in Canada to-day, as it has been during the last three years, notwithstanding the emigration of 400,000 people in twelve months. If a census were taken to-day it would be found that there are substantially fewer people in Canada to-day than there were in 1921. Are those evidences of prosperity? If they are, then my judgment is certainly in error.

Apart from all that, however, if Canada was prospering if there were such glorious hopes ahead, would our agricultural interests be complaining as they are to-day? Is not the fact that the value of property of all sorts—crops, live stock, and everything our agricultural people own—has so seriously decreased in value, as well as in the selling price, is the cause of their serious discontent and disillusionment as to the promises made to them some two or three years ago? The hopes they then entertained have been dashed. These cannot be called evidences of prosperity.

Now, may I ask who it is that sees these evidences of prosperity? Is it the farmer? I do not think so. Is it the manufacturers whose factories are running half-time or are closed down altogether in many instances, and who have been coming here through their organizations and making representations to the Government as to the desperate situation they are in? Is it the employees who are out of work and who cannot get employment in Canada, or those who have had to go to the United States in order to gain an existence? I say it is not the wage-earner, it is not the manufacturer, it is not the farmer. And I do not believe it is the taxpayer. Then, who is it? Honourable gentlemen, I have come to the conclusion that this sentiment and this expression was born in the mind of the man who penned the Speech, and that it was simply born of a desire, and not because of any existing facts. I fear that his head was in the clouds, that his wish to have Canada prosperous blinded him to the real situation; and I think he can find throughout the length and breadth of this country very few citizens who will agree with him that there are evidences on every hand of progress and prosperity.

I want to congratulate the mover of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, the honourable member from Lambton (Hon Mr. Pardee) because of the splendid note he struck yesterday, namely, pride of nationhood. There is too little of that sentiment abroad in Canada to-day. This, perhaps, is not to be wondered at, because our population grows more and more cosmopolitan as our Canadian-born citizens are forced to leave their homeland to maintain the standards of living which they think they are entitled to enjoy, and which they can obtain elsewhere, and we exchange them for people from other lands who have not the same inspiration as Canadian-born citizens to regard Canadian nationhood as important. But I cannot agree with the suggestion of the honourable member as to the method which should be pursued to bring about that desirable situation, and to bring about the realization of a real Canadian national feeling. I do not think that feeling is to be attained through any tariff adjustment such as the honourable gentleman, the leader of the Government, was planning a few moments ago. He built up a splendid case which leads one to a conclusion which is definite and clear. The conclusion I would draw from the honourable gentleman's presentation of the tariff argument is that the greater the British preference is the less the importations will be, and that therefore, if the duty were removed entirely, there would probably be no importations from Great Britain at all. That is the logical conclusion to be arrived at from his argument, because he showed us that as the preference was increased and the tariff reduced the quantity of goods imported declined. I think there is another reason for that situation, honourable gentlemen, and in my opinion it is the fact that the purchasing power of the Canadian people has become so diminished during the past year or two that they are no longer able to purchase or to use the quantity of goods that they would have used had their purchasing power been maintained at the level of a couple of years ago. That may be said to be merely an opinion; but I am bound to point out that there is ample precedent for reaching that conclusion. May I point out that in England in 1922 the revenues derived from taxation through customs was £119,000,000 less than in 1920, while the population increased approximately two million souls; during that period. Because there had been during that period a million and a half workmen deprived of employment, and probably five million more women and children dependent upon them, their purchasing power was so decreased that they were unable to purchase the necessities of life. That very same situation exists in Canada to-day. The textile manufacturers, to whom my honourable friend referred, only about ten days ago filed a brief with the Government in which they pointed out that more than seven thousand of their workmen were now out of employment; that more than ten per cent of that number, especially the highly skilled men, had gone to the United States; and that forty per cent of the equipment of the woollen mills in Canada was to-day idle because of this situation. And in the face of that we get this Speech from the Throne forecasting further tariff reduction.

The leader of the Government referred yesterday at some length to taxation, and told us with great assurance that the Government would during this Session of Parliament take steps to substantially reduce taxes. Well, that is a splendid expectation, but I feel that before the Government can be given very much credit for tax reduction we ought first to know whether or not they propose to bring taxation back even to the level of 1921. If they go far beyond that, then we may begin to feel that they are making some honest effort to decrease taxation; but if they are only going to take off a part of the additional taxation which they have loaded on the people during the past two years, I cannot see that any great credit is due to them. However, we will wait and see what is in store for us, and hope for the best.

The honourable gentleman from Lambton (Hon. Mr. Pardee) made reference to the phenomenal success that has accompanied the operations of the Canadian National Railways System during 1923. I entirely agree with the honourable gentleman that the Canadian National Railway was operated successfully during last year. I would further point out that the situation of the railway has been steadily improving for four years past, and rapidly since the actual consolidation of the Canadian National Railway and the Grand Trunk Systems. I submit, honourable gentlemen, that the progress made in 1923 ought to have been made in 1922, and that if the Government had not delayed the actual consolidation of these systems for a year after it came into power the benefits to be derived from consolidation would have been enjoyed by the people a year earlier, and the $20,000,000 surplus, to which they refer with considerable pride might have been enjoyed a year ago.

The Canadian National System is bound to succeed if it is left alone and not interfered with. It was said in another place only a day or so ago that there was absolutely no Government interference in the operation of the railway. So far as I know, that is true in the main, but not altogether. There has come to my knowledge evidence of such misuse of the Canadian National Railway in the by-elections of Halifax and Kent as would merit the strongest condemnation and censure of the officials of the railway who were responsible. I do not believe the executive head of the railway is responsible for it, because if he were, similar tactics would be indulged in on all parts of the system.. Honourable gentlemen know that it is the custom of all railways to enlarge their staffs for maintenance of way and building construction during the summer months and to lay them off at a later period; but do honourable gentlemen know that in the constituencies of Halifax and Kent these additional staffs were put on again in December and maintained during the election campaign, and then immediately afterwards taken off? Do they know that there was a request some little time ago to put in an additional siding just outside of Halifax, about a mile and a half from an existing station, at a place where they had declined a number of times to put a station because there was no necessity for it? One week before the Halifax by-election a gang of men went down there and proceeded to put in the siding; and up to the 16th of January last not a train had stopped there to pick up a passenger, nor had a car been put into the siding. That sort of thing ought to be condemned, and I am making mention of it in the hope that my remarks may come under the eye of the President of the Canadian National Railways.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I will see that he gets a copy of the honourable gentleman's speech.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: But the election is over.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But it will serve for the next one.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Will you take the siding up?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I will consult with my colleagues from Nova Scotia.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: Maybe that is an evidence of prosperity.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Some reference was made to the action of this House last Session in dealing with a certain Bill proposing certain branch lines which the Government desired to have built, and giving a blank cheque to the Government or the Minister of Railways to construct 1,011 miles of line at an estimated cost of $28,000,000, or $30,000 a mile. $30,000 a mile was the cost of building the Transcontinental Railway in 1903, as estimated by the then and present Minister of Finance. The Transcontinental cost $89,000 a mile, and was finished by 1911. It is obviously impossible to build railroads at this time on the estimated cost of 1903, or for one-third of the actual cost of building a railroad by the Government between 1903 and 1911. The Bill to which I have referred was in the hands of the Department of Railways more than three months before it was submitted to Parliament during the closing days of the Session, I think within a week of prorogation. This House wisely refused to be stampeded, and refused to put the Bill through in its existing form, realizing the tremendous consequences that would undoubtedly follow. We are informed in the Speech from the Throne that that Bill is to be reintroduced in its former shape. So far as I am concerned, Honourable gentlemen, I am in favour of the building of a number of those branch lines in Western Canada, but I am so unalterably opposed to the construction of certain other lines—lines which Governments for the last thirty years have refused to build, because they knew they could never begin to pay the cost of operation, and for which there is no necessity—that if the Bill comes before this House again in the same old form, I intend to oppose it just as forcibly as it was opposed a year ago. On the other hand, if the Government will bring down in its Estimates proposals for the amount necessary to make certain extensions in Western Canada, especially where the lines are already graded, I shall be the first to hold up both hands in their favour.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Would my honourable friend prefer to have the amounts for the building of those lines placed in the Estimates, and thus deprive the Senate of any chance to deal with them except by throwing out the whole Supply Bill?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I will take my chance on that, and for this reason: That I know the Government cannot get appropriations for some of these branch lines through the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But the whole Bill passed the House of Commons last year.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: It did in its blanket form, but not item by item.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The members of the Commons could have done as we did they could have raised their voices in protest against the building of some of these branches; but they passed the Bill unanimously. I never suggested that we should pass it unanimously in this House.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I desire to call the attention of my honourable friend to a proposal that was made only yesterday by the member for Swift Current, and with which I am in entire accord. The member for Swift Current was referring to the Branch Lines Bill that was discarded last year. After it had been argued that it was a three-year programme and that it must go through in that form he pointed out that the Government each year was voting from eight to eleven million dollars, the amount that was required for the succeeding year's work in constructing and carrying to completion the Welland Canal project. Then he proceeded in these words:

> They have asked us to pass eight or seven or eleven million dollars from year to year for the maximum amount of work that can be carried on that year. Why cannot we deal with the branch lines in the same way? Let the government come down with an appropriation in the railway estimates for branch lines and ask for a sufficient amount to carry on the maximum amount of work that can be done this year. I am quite sure that if that were done this parliament, every part of it, would vote the money gladly, and even though it may take three years to finish the work once it is begun, there is no reason why this parliament should not vote from year to year sufficient money to carry on the programme. For that reason I sincerely hope that instead of prejudicing the case by bringing forward a three-year programme, or trying to reform the Senate if it needs reforming, the government will bring in a programme for one year that will appeal not only to members of the House but to members of the Senate as being constitutional in procedure, and then I believe that the West and the East will get our much needed railways.

With that I am in entire accord. I will say nothing more on the Branch Lines matter at the present time.

The honourable member for Lambton (Hon. Mr. Pardee) implied by his remarks on the railways that the Government ownership of railways was proving a success. I do not think we have yet reached the stage at which we can come to that conclusion. I hope nobody thinks that the late Government, in adopting the policy with regard to railways, did so because it believed absolutely and solely in the nationalization of public utilities, particularly railways. Everybody must know that it was because of the necessities of the time. No other course was open. I am hopeful, indeed confident, as things are going now, that if the Government, not only the one now in power, but all those that may be in power in years to come, will follow strictly business methods, as the honourable member from Lambton suggested yesterday, in the administration of the National railways, they will ultimately succeed as Canada develops and its population and business increase. We have in Canada to-day enough railway mileage for double our present population. All our railways need is increased business to make them all profitable; but unless they get that they will still be faced with years of struggle. And the Canadian Pacific is no better off than the Canadian National so far as business outlook is concerned. Perhaps its outlook is even not quite so good, because there has prevailed in the past few years a sort of public sentiment on the part of the shipping people, who say: "If we must pay through taxation for the deficits of the Canadian National, we may as well send our business that way and help to make the thing self-supporting." That sentiment has done more to increase the business of the Canadian National railways than all the solicitation of all its agents or travelling representatives in the country.

In addition, the Canadian National has given good service. I do not think anybody can complain of the service. But how has it been able to give the service? Because from 1918 on to 1921 the Government that conceived the consolidation plan provided the means and carried on the work which enabled the railways to render that service. They provided the necessary equipment and put the roadbeds in shape, so that when the present Government and the present Management took hold of affairs they had everything necessary to work with and success was assured. But if Parliament now passes a Bill such as was submitted to this House and turned down last year, proposing a capital expenditure of probably $100,000,000 and adding millions to the deficit of the Canadian National railways, the day when they will be out of their difficulties must necessarily be postponed; and it behooves Parliament, in my opinion, to scrutinize most carefully the proposed programme. Parliament should see to it that the programme is carefully examined by the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, and that that Committee is given full information respecting the necessity of every piece of construction which it is desired to add to the National railways, before it is finally approved by this House.

The honourable member for Lambton referred to another very important matter, namely, the transporation of coal from the West to the East and the use of Canadian coal by Canadian industries. That was part of his suggestion with regard to the encouragement of the spirit of Canadian nationhood, which as I have already stated, I consider to be entirely commendable. In 1919 this matter was at first urged and some investigation was made regarding the cost. While many reports have been given to the public, officially and otherwise, as to the cost of bringing Alberta coal to Ontario, I see no reason to alter my original opinion, formed in 1919, after some investigation, that via the Canadian National railways coal can be transported from Drumheller and laid down in Toronto for $7.50 a ton, without making any money perhaps, but without loss, and that if a permanent trade could be worked up it would keep in use thousands of cars and hundreds of locomotives, and provide work for hundreds of employees at seasons of the year when railway equipment is lying idle.

In view of these facts I agree with the honourable member from Lambton that there is room for a very careful survey of the possibilities, in the hope of bringing about some arrangement whereby we may very largely use our Canadian coal for Canadian industry. But I go further. I do not think, honourable gentlemen, that it is desirable to bring coal from Alberta to manufacture a binder in Toronto, and ship that binder back to Alberta. I think that the day should come, and will come, when there will be smelters placed on top of the coal fields in Alberta. Perhaps the iron may have to come from the Belcher Islands over the Hudson Bay railway. Then the wishes of our people in the West will be realized. But the Province of Alberta is destined to become an industrial province. It may be twenty-five it may be fifty years hence, but that development is bound to come. When a smelting industry is established there, as it will be, then every other industry of which coal and steel form the base, will grow up in that Province, population will flow in, and it will have a balanced population. Then the complaints that we hear to-day will begin to vanish.

How can this country go on for another thirty years as it has done in the last thirty, calling every year more and more upon the outside world for thousands of harvesters to reap the crop in Western Canada? In years gone by it was possible to obtain a sufficient number of men in Eastern Canada, and they went West for a few weeks. Some of them never came back, but settled in the West. Others returned, but they were probably a distinct loss to the Eastern Provinces, from which they had gone during the busy season of the year. Nobody complained about that. Everyone was glad to see the Western farmer helped to get his crop reaped. During the last year or two, however, the labour has not been available within the country and last year it was necessary to bring several thousands of harvesters from England—

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: Twelve thousand.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: —to reap the harvest in the West. Twelve thousand, the honourable member from Boissevain says. Now, how can the Western farmer ever expect to get labour at a reasonable wage if the labourer has to come so far and pay his expenses to obtain a couple of months' work? A man ought to have $20 a day for the days employed if he comes from England at his own expense to work for two months in the harvest fields of the West, and the Western farmer, of course, would not tolerate or even think of that for a moment. But does it not all come back to this fact, that the population of any country must be balanced? There must be a proper relation between the urban and the rural residents. The needs of one must be supplied by the other to a great extent. Is not Western Canada now passing through exactly the same difficulties that Ontario and Quebec experienced forty years ago? In those days nearly all the farmers in Ontario—I know Ontario more intimately than I do Quebec, although I have lived in both provinces—looked with longing eyes to the markets of the United States and thought, "If we only had free trade we would be well off." Time went on, and after 1878, when the National Policy came into operation and industries began to be built up in the various towns throughout these two provinces, home markets became available for the products of the farm, and the articles that the farmer required were being produced in the factories of his native province. The urban and the rural populations were balanced, and the tide turned. There is to-day a strong sentiment in favour of protection, regardless of political considerations, in those two provinces—why? Because the farmers of Ontario and Quebec have come to realize that it is better for them to sell their products at home than to be obliged to ship them several thousand miles away and to make their purchases in that far-off market, paying the transportation cost both ways.

We should encourage the bringing in of coal from Alberta to Ontario if it is possible to do it, but that should not be done with a view to making Ontario or Quebec, or both, the centre of manufacturing activity in Canada, because the day is coming when that idea will be abandoned.

Honourable gentlemen, I fear I am taking too much of the time of the House, but there are a few other matters on which I would like to touch briefly. One is the lamentable catastrophe that occurred last August, when the Home Bank was forced to close its doors. I do not intend dealing with this subject in great detail at this time, but it is an important matter in the minds of a great many thousands of people who were interested in that institution as depositors, and in the estimation of many thousands more who are depositors in other banks and whose confidence in our banking system and the stability of our financial institutions has been sadly shaken as a result of the failure of the Home Bank. The Government in its wisdom has seen fit to adopt the suggestion of a committee representing the depositors to investigate certain specific matters. I take serious exception to the proposed investigation unless it is extended and begins at the genesis of the whole affair. It should cover the whole period from the time when the Act incorporating the Home Bank was passed in July, 1903, up to the date when the Bank closed its doors; and I will tell you why.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: The Prime Minister promised that yesterday.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I am glad to know that. I will tell you why it should be done. There was a large meeting of depositors held in Massey Hall, in the city of Toronto. Apparently considerable excitement prevailed at that meeting, for one lady dropped dead during the discussion. A committee of 22 men was selected at that large meeting of shareholders to represent the shareholders' interests, and to make representations to the Government with a view to obtaining some relief for them. I was not present at the meeting, but my name was mentioned and I was put on that committee. I very soon observed the trend that matters were likely to take, and naturally I declined to serve on any such committee, because I felt it would interfere with my liberty of action in Parliament. I am just as satisfied as I can be that from the beginning there has been an intention on the part of certain gentlemen on that committee to make political capital out of this affair, to the detriment of the late Government and especially the late Finance Minister, whose actions are entirely creditable, and will be proven so, and at the same time to whitewash perhaps the real culprits from the Governmental standpoint. Therefore I am glad to hear the honourable member from Tignish (Hon. Mr. Murphy) say that the Prime Minister committed himself yesterday to an enlargement of that investigation.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I may inform my honourable friend that there was never any intention to limit it. The idea was to investigate the allegations, but when it was pointed out that there might possibly be a feeling that the investigation was limited for certain reasons, not divulged, then there was no Minister who was not ready to have it enlarged.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: As a gentleman once said to me when I attempted to make an explanation, I accept the apology.

There is one other matter I want particularly to deal with, and then I will conclude. The honourable leader of the Government, in his address of yesterday, made some observations to which I wish to call his attention. I am sure he made them in good faith, believing them to be true, for it is not his custom to do otherwise. But, because of the importance of the points involved, I will state the facts, and I trust he will accept the correction. The honourable leader said, in the course of his remarks:

> One of the fundamental reasons for the present disturbing elements in our economic field in this country has been the wage paid to labour in towns and cities and on our railways. I am not recriminating. By reason of war conditions they obtained a considerable increase in wages, and they have refused to let go of that increase. I merely state a fact.

That is the quotation. I desire to point out to the honourable leader of the Government that he is mistaken in his assertion that labour in Canada, especially railway employees, have adhered to or even been able to maintain the high wage levels. As at least some honourable gentlemen know, I happen to be the head of one of the railway labour organizations in Canada, and represent the station agents, train despatchers, telegraph operators, etc., on our railways. I say to you, as a statement of fact, that the wages of the telegraph operators and station agents on our railways in Canada have been decreased more than $2,000,000 in the last two years, by agreement between the representatives of the men and the railway companies. But I do not ask the honourable leader of the Government to accept my statement. I would refer him to the Toronto Globe, an authority which I hope he will accept. Under date of October 30 some person, I do not know who, styling himself "A Student of Railway Finance," has an extensive article in the Globe on this very question, and quotes statistics to show that the total wage bill on railways in Canada in 1920 was $290,510,518; that in 1912 it was $247,756,158; and in 1922, $225,864,428. I would point out to the House that in two years' time the wages paid railway employees in Canada were reduced by 65 million and odd dollars. Do not overlook the fact that during that time the business handled by the railways in Canada increased, and necessarily the number of employees increased. So I want to correct any misapprehension that may rest in the minds of honourable gentlemen as to the facts. It is not correct to say that the employees on railways have refused—let me quote the exact words—"have refused to let go of that increase;" that is, the wage increase they had received up to 1920.

Now let me give the House one further point of information on railway wages. I would refer you to the Grand Trunk Railway's report for the year 1922, recently issued by the Department of Railways and Canals. It is compiled in a manner entirely different from the reports of all the other railways in Canada. I do not recall the page number, but you will find in that report a page on which all the employees are classified, the classification showing the number of employees in each branch, the total number of hours that all those employees work, and the total amount of money earned by them. If you will look at the totals, you will see that there were something like 29,000 employees on the Grand Trunk Railway System in Canada as it then was, and that they worked some sixty million hours, and received some $42,000,000. At any rate, you will find that the average wage of all the employees, from the call-boy up to the president himself, including both, was 64.4 cents per hour.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Has the honourable gentlemen got the percentage cuts from the peak?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: No, I have not, but they can be obtained. The impression I want to leave is that there has been a misconception in the minds of the Canadian people that railway men have been receiving wages far in excess of what is really the case—and I refer you to the official record of the Department of Railways and Canals to prove the statement which I have just made.

There are one or two other matters that I would like to refer to, but I have already detained you too long. Summing this all up: Where are we going? Where are we drifting? As my honourable friend from Prince Edward Island (Hon. Mr. Murphy) suggests. We are told at the opening of the Speech from the Throne that there are distinct evidences of prosperity. I have tried to find them, and I am sorry to say that I have not been able to do so. What can we look forward to in the future? We apparently can look forward to a decrease in the tariff, which will have the effect—just as the slight tariff tinkerings during the past two years have done—of further strangling industry and stimulating unemployment and emigration. That is not a very bright outlook.

In my humble opinion, we cannot expect very much from the present Government, although I am satisfied that there are many gentlemen sitting on the Government benches—in the other House at least, and perhaps in this—who in their hearts feel that the time has come when this sort of thing cannot go on much longer. The Government is helpless because of its pre-election pledges, which it is in duty bound to carry out. It has not, however, a working majority, by which it can carry into effect any part of its programme or platform. It is dependent upon a third political party which has for its object what? Not exactly tariff reduction, but rather tariff extinction. The Government which we now have is in a minority in the House of Commons, is in a minority in this House—which is not so important, perhaps—and for its continued existence is dependent upon another political party. It will find it impossible, in my opinion, to do anything constructive under the circumstances. Furthermore, the Prime Minister finds himself hopelessly embarrassed. He cannot open constituencies to reorganize the Cabinet. His Solicitor General is somewhat embarrassed, two other Ministers are under a cloud, his Minister of Finance is sick, the Minister of Justice has resigned, and the Postmaster General is incapacitated, or partly so. The Government is in a very difficult and delicate position, and I hold that the Prime Minister ought to turn back to page 11 of the Hansard of 1921 and refer to his own utterances there, and ponder in his own mind as to what is the proper and honourable course for him to pursue.

Hon. J. G. TURRIFF: Honourable gentlemen, in rising to discuss for a few moments the Speech from the Throne, I wish first of all to extend my congratulations to the mover (Hon. Mr. Pardee) and the seconder (Hon. Mr. Côté) of the Address. Those of us who sat for many years in the other House with the honourable the mover of the Address knew what to expect: we knew he would handle the subject with great skill and great ability. I am sure we all had great pleasure in hearing our latest addition to the Senate, the new member from Edmonton. I was pleased to hear him give a very lucid report regarding that great province of his, sunny Alberta, and am sure that he will prove a worthy successor to the late Senator Forget. In referring to the late Senator, I might say that those of you who saw him in recent years in this House, when he was incapacitated, could hardly realize the sort of man he really was. My honourable friend from Moose Jaw (Hon. J. H. Ross) and myself sat in the old Assembly in Regina some forty years ago, and we knew what he could and did accomplish. He was one of the finest men that I have ever met, and I am confident that his successor will prove worthy of the position which he now occupies.

The first item in the Speech from the Throne, as my honourable friend who has just taken his seat (Hon. Mr. Robertson) has said, refers in glowing language to the prosperity that exists on all sides. I think perhaps the Prime Minister painted that picture a little too brightly; perhaps he accentuated the prosperity too much. I think probably he was referring to the prosperity that is to come. At all events, he did not augment the Speech nearly so much as my honourable friend who has just taken his seat (Hon. Mr. Robertson), and my honourable friend, the leader on the other side of the House (Hon. Sir James Lougheed), who gave a pretty fair exposition of the case yesterday. They, however, have gone in the other direction and, in my judgment, have painted a picture of blue ruin.

There is one thing I would like to point out to honourable gentlemen opposite. If the country is in such bad shape as my honourable friends claim, if there is such a lack of employment and such stagnation in the country that the manufacturers are not making any money, and are closing up, the situation is one that has come about under their own policy. From the time the present Government came into power, a little over two years ago, up to the last two months, they have practically carried out the policy of their predecessors. They have made no great change, and what has been the result? If the result has been as my honourable friends have depicted it, then it is because of the policy of high protection, and of the legislation that they brought in during their term of office.

My honourable friend the leader on the other side (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) spoke yesterday of what had been done in Great Britain and in the United States by way of reducing debt. He claimed that this Government had not done much. But I remember perfectly well, as every honourable member of this House remembers, that between the end of the war and the time when my honourable friends opposite went out of power they did not reduce the debt at all; on the contrary, they kept piling it up. The Government that is now in power continued in pretty much the same way, and the debt has been increased, but not to the same extent that it was increased during the previous three years. This being so, I do not think it is open to my honourable friends opposite to claim that nothing has been done by this Government.

However, honourable gentlemen, what pleases me is that the present Government has, I think, learned a lesson. I think they have learned that a Liberal Government cannot parade the country in Conservative clothes and meet with any great success. They have found that the popularity that carried them into power with a big majority two years ago is waning because they have not carried out certain things they promised to do. This was brought home to them very strongly last fall down in Halifax and in Kent. I believe, honourable gentlemen, that the loss of those two seats is the best thing that could have happened the Government. It wakened them up to the fact that they had not carried out their promises, that they were not giving a Liberal Government, and that they were losing the confidence of the people. But, to their credit be it said, when they realized that, they decided to mend their ways and to adopt their own policy. They are now proposing to adopt the policy which they advocated before the last general election: and, honourable gentlemen, if they do that, I believe that they will rehabilitate themselves in the good will of the people of Canada.

My honourable friend, the ex-Minister of Labour (Hon. Mr. Robertson), said that the Government was dependent upon the third political party. I just want to say that if it carries out what has been outlined in the Speech from the Throne, and carries it out fairly and reasonably and honestly, it will have the support of the West.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: And what about the East?

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: The Government did not get a great deal of support from the East; it did not get a great deal of support for its railway policy last Session from honourable gentlemen sitting near my honourable friend. It did not get very much support from my friends from Montreal.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: No.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: No. And does my honourable friend mean to say that if the Government now carries out the policy laid down it is going to lose the East?

Some Hon. SENATORS: Sure.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: Does my honourable friend say that?

Hon. Mr. DAVID: It depends upon how far they go.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: I can show my honourable friend that the Western party do not expect everything on earth, but they expect the Government to carry out the policy that my honourable friends on this side supported two years ago.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: I?

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: All of you.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: What policy is that? There are so many of them.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF. The reduction of expenditures—

Hon. Mr. DAVID: Oh, yes. All right.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: —reduction of the tariff, lower freight rates, and several other things. My honourable friend says that if the Government carries out that policy it will lose support in the East. I do not believe it. There are members of the Liberal party in the House of Commons, including members occupying Government benches, who in my judgment ought to be sitting on the other side of the House. Their policies and their ideas are just as "high-tariff" and just as "big-interest" as those of any honourable gentleman sitting in opposition in either House, and they ought to be sitting with them.

All that the Western party want is a fair deal. The leader on the other side of the House, in his very fair and moderate speech of yesterday—a speech which I enjoyed very much—spoke of what had caused the third party. He drew attention to the fact that the three great western provinces which are now entitled to over fifty seats in the House of Commons returned only two members of the old parties—why? I can tell you why. First of all, it was owing to my honourable friends opposite defeating reciprocity in 1911, and, secondly, because the Liberal party, which was fairly prolific with promises—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: And is yet.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: —when it came to carrying them out fell down rather badly. That caused the rise of the third party, or the Farmers' party. The members of the Liberal party are now coming to their senses, and are realizing that during the last two years they have been in bad company and have been following a poor policy. In order to have the Western party right behind them, all they have to do is to carry out what they proposed.

My honourable friend the ex-Minister of Labour is wrong when he states that if the Government has the support of the Western party it will not be able to do anything at all, that the Western party want to wipe out all protection. I venture to say, honourable gentlemen, that my honourable friend cannot point to a speech of any of the leaders of the third party in the House of Commons, since they have been members of the House of Commons, that would bear out that idea in any shape or form.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON. Read their platform.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: The members of the Progressive party are common-sense, level-headed men, and are just as much interested in getting good government for Canada—not only Western Canada, but Eastern Canada—as any other class of men in Parliament; and they are prepared to give their support not only to the Government but to any party that will bring forward measures that are fair and reasonable to the people of Canada.

My honourable friend the Ex-Minister of Labour spoke of the condition that the textile workers were in, and someone over there interjected the remark that factories were closed. Who closed the textile factories? Who closed the woolen factories in the last few years?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: The increase in British preference.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: Who brought it about? It was the combine of the woolen manufacturers themselves. They are the men who closed the woolen factories, and if the woolen factories are not able to make money to-day under the high tariff they have had, what is the good of putting on the high tariff? They made combines and what was the result? They gave old obsolete mills—

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: May I interrupt my honourable friend to point out to him that the present Minister of Labour recently announced that there were no combines in Canada; that he had made a very thorough investigation and found that there was no such thing in existence.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: Well, I would not expect anything else from a labour man. When the woolen manufacturers wanted to make a merger or a combine, what they did was to take in a number of obsolete mills and issue bonds for what would be the full value of the plant if it were new; then they issued a big block of preferential stock to them for the good-will of the business; then they issued a big block of common stock; and what did they do with the mills of the poor class? They closed them up, and they have been closed up ever since. And the good ones? They have kept running and have fixed the prices so that everybody in the Dominion of Canada had to pay a very much higher price for woolen goods than was at all necessary. And many of those woolen factories to-day are making money on stock that does not represent 25 cents on the dollar. That is why some of them have been closed up.

Hon. Mr. STANFIELD: Can the honourable gentlemen tell me what woolen factories are making money to-day?

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: How about the textiles?

Hon. Mr. STANFIELD: The Dominion Textile Company—

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: They are all in the same class.

Hon. Mr. STANFIELD: Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: If the woolen mills are not making money I am very sorry. If they cannot make money under the high protection they now have, what do they want? Do they want higher protection? Do they want, then, to make it impossible for people to live at all? Do they want to be able to put the price of woolen and cotton goods up so high that the farmers and the workingmen will not be able to buy even as much as they are buying at the present time?

To my mind, honourable gentlemen, the manufacturers of Canada are reaping the harvest that they sowed in 1911. In that year the proposition was made that there should be reciprocity in natural products with the United States. That would have brought in extra hundreds of millions of dollars to the farmers and labouring men of Canada. Through the combined action of the manufacturers and those connected with them, that agreement was defeated, and we have suffered every day since on account of that, and we shall continue to suffer until we get our farming population and our labouring population into better condition. What do the manufacturers want? Mind you, that reciprocity agreement did not hurt them at all. There was only two items in the whole list that affected the manufacturers, and those items did not amount to much. There was a proposed reduction of 5 per cent on certain classes of farming implements and 2½ per cent on others; and salt was put on the free list, whereas there had previously been on it, I understand, $1.50 per ton duty. Those are the only two points at which the manufacturers were at all touched, and they spent their money by the hundreds of thousands to beat the proposition. If it had come into force we would have had a farming community from one end of the Dominion to the other prosperous and making money. And what is the best market for the manufacturer? The manufacturer is quick to say that the home market is the market for the farmer, but what about the home market for the manufacturer, when you have millions of people who are prosperous and making money? Who are going to buy the goods of the manufacturers? It is the farmers and the labouring men who buy the great bulk of them, after all, because they represent a vast majority of the people of Canada. However, the manufacturers were able to beat that reciprocity agreement, and they have had their high tariff ever since. Yet my honourable friends opposite say that factories are closed up; that the workingmen are leaving the country, that there are 7,000 textile workers idle to-day. That is the result of the policy that these honourable gentlemen themselves brought about. I congratulate the Gov rnment that they have changed their views and are going to bring about a better state of affairs.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Apparently they have not changed their views on textiles.

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: We do not know yet.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Only agricultural implements of production.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: I do not know yet; but, talking of that, honourable gentlemen, I want to say that I was pleased with that clause in the Speech from the Throne, because it says that not merely agricultural implements but the instruments of production are to be put on the free list. So I expect that not only will something be done regarding agricultural implements for the farmer, but that the miner, the fisherman, the lumberman, all these people, will also get cheaper machinery for carrying on their business. What will be the result? It will mean cheaper production, and the cost of living will come down, and the manufacturers will get the benefit of that.

My honourable friend the ex-Minister of Labour gave us a dissertation on our loss of population from what we had a few years ago. Well, I think that perhaps my honourable friend has had as much to do as anybody else in Canada with keeping people out of this country. The labour unions, from one end of the country to the other, have been all the time protesting that we should not bring any people into Canada. I take this position on immigration: assuming that men, women and children are strong and healthy of body and sound in mind, I do not care what their trade or profession is; there is room in Canada for them, and they can make good, and they will get along, and this will tend to the general benefit of the Dominion of Canada. But if you keep arguing and protesting all the time that labour must not be brought in because there is no work, you keep labour out.

Let me draw my honourable friend's attention to one little instance that occurred a year ago. A friend of mine who had a small house decided to make some renovations. It was only a small job. He bought all the necessary material—paint, oil and paper—and that material cost him $32 and some cents. I do not remember the exact amount, but it was under $33. He hired a man to do the papering and painting in his house. What do you think his bill was? The bill for the labour was $132—for putting on $33 worth of material. In the face of such facts as this, people would say, "you must not bring men in to work."

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: They were progressives, I suppose.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: They were protected. You have got the wrong word. They were protected. No, we want more people in Canada. As some of you know, I had something to do, years ago, in connection with the settlement of Western Canada, and I must confess that in those days it was somewhat easier to settle people than it is now. At that time we had an almost boundless open prairie country, and wherever a man alighted he could take up a homestead and ninety-nine times out of a hundred would have a good farm. That condition has changed somewhat. To-day there is not much open prairie, but I want to say this, honourable gentlemen, that in the province of Quebec along the Transcontinental, in the province of Ontario along the Transcontinental, in the northern parts of Manitoba, in the northern parts of Saskatchewan, in the northern parts of Alberta, and in certain sections of British Columbia there are hundreds of thousands of acres of first-class rich soil with a light covering of timber, on which men can be put. There is no use in putting an English-speaking man from the old country on that land. He will not do any good. He cannot. Conditions are altogether different from those to which he has been accustomed. Life would be rougher for him, and in the course of a year or two he would leave. But there are hundreds of thousands of good people in Northern and Central Europe who are ready and eager to come out to this country. I say that if the Government would adopt the policy of spending a few hundred dollars —not much—nothing like the money that has been expended on soldiers' re-establishment—but if $500 to $800 were spent on a homestead of a quarter-section in Quebec, Ontario or the Western provinces to build a shanty or small house in the bush, and build a stable, and provide the settler with a cow or two cows to start with and if there were from three to five acres roughly cleared, providing the right class of European were put on those lands, you would be able to place 10,000 a year, and you could not pry those men and women off that land—not with a crowbar. They stick to the land. I venture to say my honourable friend from Edmonton will bear me out. I remember in the year 1899 or 1900 spending a month inspecting a settlement at Victoria, about 65 miles north of Edmonton. There was in that district a settlement of Galicians, brought in by the Hon. T. Mayne Daley when he was Minister of the Interior. They had been settled on the dry lands around Medicine Hat and had not succeeded. They then moved up in a body. I saw them two or three years after they had settled on the land. I visited dozens and dozens of their homes. There were men, women and children working on the land, clearing it. It was a part of the country which was so covered with scrub and woods that the ordinary white man would not go on it.

Hon. Mr. TESSIER: Are they there still?

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: They are still there, and I venture to say they have one of the wealthiest settlements in the whole Western country. They have done remarkably well. We can get tens of thousands of families like those if we can put them in Quebec or in Ontario. Do not run away with the idea that the advance of $500, $600, $700 or $800 would be a loss. They would pay that money back, honourable gentlemen. I have always claimed that men of that description can do better in Quebec or Ontario than on the Prairies; for this reason. They can get work in the winter. They can sell pulp wood off their land as they clear it up. Everything they grow in the way of hay, oats and potatoes they can sell right there to the mining community and to the people engaged in the pulp and lumbering industries. The carrying out of such a policy would redound to the welfare of Canada and of those people. No matter how rough the conditions of their life might be—and this is where the advantage comes in—they are better than the conditions in which they lived at home, and that is what makes them stick to the land. I hope that the Government will adopt a policy along that line and carry it out. We must have more people in this Dominion if we are going to make it a great country and also lessen the burden of taxation.

If our burden of taxation cannot be lifted, we shall lose more people than even my honourable friends opposite have said we are losing. I know we have lost a great many. The honourable gentlemen may be right in their figures; I am not in a position to contradict them. Unless we can reduce the burden of taxation, our young men and young women will not stay in this country, because they would have to pay twice as much taxes as in the United States. Therefore, in order to keep our people, we must reduce taxation. I have always taken the position that one good Canadian family, born and brought up in this country, and knowing our laws and conditions, is better than half-a-dozen families brought in from some foreign country—although many of the foreigners are very good settlers. I do not make any objection to them, but I say that none of them come up to our own people. The object of the Government ought to be, and I think that under the present proposals it will be, to keep our people at home and enable our country to prosper.

I am very pleased, honourable gentlemen that the system of taxing incomes has been introduced in Canada. It is the only thing that would ever make you and me and thousands of others realize or look after what the Government are doing with the money they collect. When it comes to putting your hand into your pocket and paying out $100 or $500 or $1,000 in taxation, then you begin to sit up and take notice. I observe that my friends the manufacturers do not bother very much about what is paid by the common people in taxation on their goods, or on goods imported, but when they themselves have to pay a good, stiff income tax, they are sitting up too. That is right, and for the future, honourable gentlemen, I expect to see every Government—not only this Government, but the Government of my honourable friends opposite if it comes into power, or the third party if it comes into power—I expect to see every Government from this time forward criticized more, their work more closely inspected and their expenditures kept down to the level of economy.

I have come now to one of the last clauses in the Speech from the Throne. In preparing a document as long as that there is usually at least one joker, and I thought there was one item that savoured a little of a joke in the Speech from the Throne. My honourable friend the leader will pardon me if I read it:

> You will observe that in the preparation of the estimates my advisers have felt the necessity of continuing the policy of rigid economy with respect to public services and public works, and of postponing until such time as a reduction in taxation has been effected some undertakings the early consideration of which is obviously in the public interest.

I would like to remark to my honourable friend the leader of the Government here that if the "rigid economy" of the last two years is a sample of the rigid economy of the years to come, it will not be very great. But I believe that was put in just as a joke, and I think that it is not the intention of the Government in any way to carry out that idea. I notice this, however, that during the last two months the Government has taken well to heart what happened in Halifax and Kent, and that there is in operation to-day a system of retrenchment and economy the like of which we have not had in Canada for many years. It is in the right direction and I am sure nearly everybody in the Dominion will wish the Government Godspeed in the work they are doing, until we get a balanced budget, as the honourable the Prime Minister has stated.

Now, there is one point in reference to the balanced budget on which I am not just clear. I imagine the Prime Minister must be right, and I certainly hope he is. But I was under the impression that during the past couple of years we had borrowed money for the railways—I will not say indirectly, but in such a manner that I doubt if it is included in the balancing of the budget. I hope it is, but I do not know of my own knowledge. My own impression is that it is not. If I am correct in my impression, I do not consider that it is a very well balanced budget.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I understand that with the deficit on the railways figuring in the debit column the budget will balance.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: You won't let the Supplementaries disturb that.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: I hope that is so.

Now let me deal for a moment or two with the branch lines. We all remember very well what happened the Branch Lines Bill last year. I supported the Branch Lines Bill last year, and I intend to support it again; at the same time, I am convinced that the subject was not dealt with in the best manner possible. I want to say, further, that this country cannot afford to go on building branch lines unless they are necessary and will pay for their operation and bring in some revenue. If I did not believe that the branch lines in the West, even those in the province of Saskatchewan, would not only pay for their operation, but would help to pay something in addition for the benefit of the whole system, I would vote against them. I do not believe there is a single branch line on the prairies that would not pay from the very start, and in addition help to make the main line pay.

If the Government is going to present the Bill again this Session, and wants to have it passed, it will have to see that its own followers support the Bill. Last year, while no doubt it was the majority on the other side of the House who threw out the Bill, still they were helped very materially by members on this side of the House. If the Government wants to pass the Bill it had better see to it that its own members support it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: What do you suggest they should do?

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Vote for the Bill.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend lived for a long time in the atmosphere of the House of Commons, and he speaks of followers. I do not recognize any followers of the Government in this Chamber.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The honourable gentleman himself has not been a very steady follower of the party of which he once formed a part.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: I do not think my honourable friend had better bring up that subject. If I were he I would leave it strictly alone. I have a streak of independence in me, and would not follow any party. My honourable friend has the right to do as he thinks fit.

What I want to refer to is this. The Liberal press from the Atlantic to the Pacific have been putting the whole blame for the throwing out of the Branch Lines Bill on my honourable friends opposite. I do not think that is exactly fair. I think honourable gentlemen opposite were guilty, all right, but I think there were others on this side of the House who were just as guilty. Of course, my honourable friend the leader of the Government here voted for the Bill—he introduced it—but unless I am greatly mistaken I think he would have liked to vote the other way. There are branch lines mentioned in the Bill—I have a list of them here—that I do not think should ever be built; and if they are built there are some that I do not think will ever pay half the operating expenses; and millions of dollars will be sunk for roads which every Government since Confederation has refused to build. It looks to me as though some of those branch lines were tacked on to the western lines that would be paying lines in order to get them through in blanket fashion.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: That is, last year's Bill.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: Yes.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: You voted for it last year, did you not?

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: Yes, I voted for the Bill because I know something of the difficulties of pioneering, as my honourable friend does. Forty-five years ago I was pioneering on the prairie, 60 miles from a railroad, and I know what that means; and I could not find it in my heart to vote against extending the railroads to the hundreds and thousands of settlers who had settled along those branch lines. Had they not every right to settle along those lines? The lines were surveyed, and in many cases they were graded and were just waiting for the rails. In the old days when things were cheaper the pioneer could make a living; but to-day no farmer can grow wheat and make a living at present prices if he is thirty or forty miles from a railroad. I voted for the Bill, knowing that there were some branches included in it that should not be there. I hope my honourable friend the leader of the Government will use his best efforts to see that those lines that the old Governments refused to build—the Laurier Government, the Borden Government, the Union Government and the Meighen Government—should not be tacked on now, because the people of Canada are anxious to see those branch lines on the prairies built where they will pay. If there are any branch lines in the East that will pay, by all means build them.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Why not ask the Government to bring in individual Bills?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I draw attention to the statement that I made last year, that I think was very fair. I did not know much, if anything, of the merits of some of those branches, and I suggested that without binding ourselves in any way we should take the second reading of the Bill and examine it in Committee.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: It was too late.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I appreciate the argument of my honourable friend. I did not ask the Senate to accompany me any further than to go into Committee to examine into the different branch lines.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: But the Government is now threatening to send the Bill back in the form in which it was last year, and, if I know anything about this House, I think it will deal with the Bill branch by branch.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I suggested to my honourable friend that he should do that. The junior member for Moose Jaw (Hon. Mr. Calder) was a new member here, and questioned our right to amend a money Bill. I said that under the Ross resolution we had unanimously declared our right to amend a money Bill—to reduce, not to increase. But my honourable friend from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) says it was too late. My honourable fried from Middleon (Hon. W. B. Ross) says that if the Bill comes here again we will go into it and break it up. I stated last year that every branch in the schedule stood as an individual Bill and could be treated as such.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I would like the honourable gentleman to advise the Government of which he is a distinguished member not to send that Bill back as an omnibus Bill. There are 11 roads. Let them send up 11 Bills.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: There are 30, I think.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Twenty-nine.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Let us have the proper information, the terminus ad quo, the terminus ad quem, and the property alongside. There are men who can come here and tell you in half an hour whether or not those roads should be built. We should lay down some principle. If a district already has one road or has water communication, it should not get a new road.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have asked my colleagues to hurry up the presentation of the Bill in the House of Commons so that when it reaches here, in whatever shape or form it may be, we may send it to the Standing Committee on Railways; and then we can call the President of the National Railways, and his engineering staff, to enlighten us as to the merits of these branches.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: There is one feature of the Bill that I approve of, and that is the voting of the amount for three years. My reason is this. The chances are that it will be July at all events when we get through this Session, and the moneys voted this Session would not be available in time to do any good. Harvesting operations would be on in the West, and it would be difficult to get labour.

That reminds me that the ex-Minister of Labour criticized us for having to go to the Old Country to get farm labour. That fact hardly runs parallel with his statement that there was unemployment in Eastern Canada. If there was unemployment in Eastern Canada we would not have to go to the Old Country to get harvesters.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I would like to know the opinion of the honourable member on the building of the Hudson Bay Railway under present conditions.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: I will say to my honourable friend that the road has been largely built by his friends, and I say it ought to be completed.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: We in the West today are suffering from the combines. When we were allowed to ship cattle into the United Kingdom, what did the steamship combine do? They immediately raised prices until they were almost prohibitive.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: What combine?

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: The North Atlantic Ocean Shipping combine. I remember the time when thousands and tens of thousands of cattle were carried from Montreal to Liverpool for $7.50 a head. The shipping combine immediately put the price up to $25 a head, they made up their minds that they were going to take every dollar of profit there was in raising an animal. If that were allowed to continue the result would be that the farmer would have to go out of the business of raising cattle. The same thing was done by the combine that controlled lake freights. When we got the Crows Nest rates restored, that combine immediately put up the prices on the lakes, so that the farmer did not get one cent of the advantage he should have gained. That is one point in favour of the Hudson Bay Railway. Even if it is not suitable for the grain trade, it is open during the four months when the cattle are in prime order for being shipped. And let me tell you, honourable gentlemen, the money spent in completing the Hudson Bay Railway would not be wasted half as much as many millions of dollars that are spent in other things—Halifax Harbour, Courtenay Bay, buying railroads in Quebec, that would never pay, building the Welland Canal long before it was needed—the Hudson Bay Railroad is a much better investment than any of those undertakings, and I propose to stand for its completion.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Put it in the Branch Lines Bill.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: One other thing that I would like to say a word about is the deepening of the St. Lawrence waterway. In my judgment you cannot deepen a channel so as to take ocean going boats right up into the center of the continent without that development being of great advantage to both Canada and the United States. But if the people of Canada come to the conclusion that the St. Lawrence should be deepened, no half-dozen or dozen capitalists in Montreal will be allowed to prevent it being done. But before it is done, I want to say that I am quite in sympathy with the stand of the Government that we should find out something about what it is going to cost. For my part there are two things that I would insist upon before the work is undertaken; one is that we should be in a financial condition to carry it on, and, second, that before one shovelful of earth is turned on it, a complete agreement should be reached with the United States in regard to the diversion of water for power purposes in the Chicago canal. Why should we undertake the deepening of the St. Lawrence just now because all of a sudden the United States want it done? Another thing that I would insist on would be that not one single horse-power of electrical current developed on the Canadian portion of the Canal should be allowed under any circumstances to go across the line to the United States. Why should we let the current flow over there? Do you think we would ever get it back?

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: Never.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: Nine millions of people against 110 millions. There would simply be war if you tried to get it back. I agree altogether with the statement made by Sir Lomer Gouin the other day, that all the horse-power in Canada should be kept in Canada. I believe that if the St. Lawrence is deepened and develops great horse-power it should be kept for Canadians, and if it is, the result will be that inside of twenty-five or fifty years that power will be all used in Canada and will develop strong manufacturing centres, and the manufacturers will not need the high protection they have, because with our cheaper water power in Canada and with our good working people they will be able to compete, and do more than compete, with the whole world. But those are some of the things I would want to see done before we entered into any agreement.

Just another word on that subject. I do not believe for one moment that the deepening of the St. Lawrence would affect the rate on wheat coming from the West. I do not believe an ocean vessel can be taken up to Port Arthur or Fort William, loaded with wheat, and brought down to Montreal, nearly as cheaply as wheat can be brought down in lake vessels, because you can transfer 300,000 bushels of wheat from a lake vessel to an ocean vessel in a few hours and at the cost of a fraction of a cent per bushel. These are points that have to be considered. A group of capitalists want to make money out of the power and leave the Government to pay all the cost of deepening the channel. We are not going to let them have just all their own way.

Honourable gentlemen, I apologize for having taken so long. In conclusion, let me say to my honourable friend the leader of the Government, go on in the way that you have outlined in the Speech from the Throne, carry out those ideas, and you will have the support of the West, you will have the support of the East, and when you go before the country again for judgment you will find that the people, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, will say to you, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant, enter into the seats of the mighty for another five years."

On motion of the Right Hon. Sir George E. Foster, the debate was adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at 3 p.m.

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech on the opening of the Session and the motion of Hon. Mr. Pardee for an Address in reply thereto.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: Honourable gentlemen, in asking the attention of the Senate for a little while this afternoon, I desire, as is the common and pleasurable custom to associate myself with other members who have congratulated the mover and the seconder of the Address, and I do that with special pleasure in both instances.

My honourable friend who has moved the Address in reply was an old colleague of mine —not on the same side of the political fence— in the House of Commons, and we have there exchanged views, in an atmosphere which sometimes was a little warmer and a little more boisterous than the calm and temperate climate in which we live in the Senate. I am sure that all the contests that may have taken place between us never diminished our respect and regard for each other, and I am confident that the same pleasant relations will subsist during our intercourse on the two sides of this House.

With reference to my honourable friend the new Senator (Hon. Mr. Coté), I noticed with a great deal of pleasure that he vindicated the right of a member to use the French language in the Senate of Canada, and made good his claim in that respect. One of these days I am going to vindicate the right of an English-speaking member of the Senate to use the French language if he chooses, even in the Senate itself, for the expression of his opinion.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Do not delay our pleasure: do it now.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: It is as much the right of the English-speaking as of the French-speaking member of the Senate.

The observations that I purpose making are casual and not at all in the form of a set speech. I do think that the situation in Canada at the present time is one which demands the most careful and earnest consideration of all classes of the people; and I have been especially thinking that the Senate of Canada has its responsibilities in such a time as this, and cannot very well divest itself of them. The Senate is, as we all agree, a constituent part of the Government of this country. As such it has its responsibilities, and these will be measured very largely by its qualifications. I do not know that there could be gathered together in the Dominion of Canada a body of eighty or ninety men who from their experience in various matters, of business enterprise, of public and corporate work, and even of legislation, would be superior to those who are assembled in the Senate. They come from all parts of Canada. They have cognizance of and acquaintance with the conditions in every part of this country. I have listened, and should be glad to listen still more, to the views of members of the Senate thus qualified, from widely-distributed portions of our country, as to the present situation and the best means of bettering it.

The situation, I think we all agree, is a grave one, if it be not vital. We have come to a time in the history of Canada when we are, I think, brought down to very serious and earnest consideration, not only as to the present condition of the country, but as to its future as well. There is a vein of discontent and of pessimistic feeling which is quite apparent as one travels through the country or listens to speeches that are made in the two Houses of Parliament. There is also a buoyant and optimistic feeling, conditioned somewhat by the circumstances of the time, but which refuses to lapse into pessimism or a feeling that the future of Canada may not be assured if proper action is taken and proper conditions are made to prevail. I am an optimist by nature, I think, and I am probably even more so by practice; but I believe the only advantageous optimism, the only useful optimism, is that which is framed upon conditions which are sufficiently well based to carry the optimistic feeling. I think that we are not simply to follow optimism as a trade or profession, but to use our hope and our optimism as based upon conditions which justify it. If there are conditions which do not justify it, it is but frank and proper for us to lay bare those conditions and suggest improvements for them which may justify a feeling of hope and optimism.

What is the situation in Canada to-day? Evidently it is a situation which is taking hold of the attention and thought of the people. There may be many reasons for that, but whatever the reasons are, there is to-day a deeper and wider interest in the condition of affairs in our country and in the policy and administration to be pursued under those circumstances than I have seen apparent in any preceding time during my public career.

One member has suggested that possibly a reason for that is that we have different forms of taxation. I think there is a good deal in that. Almost every individual in our country, every business enterprise, every business man, every corporation, every financial man, every banker, is brought face to face, from time to time, with the paying of taxes which he absolutely cannot evade. They are brought to his notice when the time for collecting taxes is at hand. That induces thought, and pretty serious thought, especially when the taxation bears heavily and is burdensome either on the individual or on his business. That is, I think, one reason why there is to-day an interest, wide and broadly based, in the future administration of this country. It is desired to lighten, if possible, the heavy conditions of to-day and brighten the course of progress for the country in the future.

What are the three basic facts of that situation? In the first place, it is apparent to all of us that in Canada to-day we have a large and increasing public debt. We cannot get away from that fact. In 1914 a debt of $336,000,000 was supposed to be a heavy and crushing one. To-day we have a debt of $2,400,000,000, the burden of which is apparent to and is felt by all. The debt of $336,000,000 in 1914, with the population that we had then, represented a comparatively small amount per head of the people. The present debt of $2,400,000,000 runs pretty well up to $300 per capita of our people, or $1,500 for every family of five.

But not only is that debt large: it is showing year by year the quality of increase. When the war ended by the Armistice the debt amounted to $1,400,000,000. The period of demobilization and of consequently heavy expense extended for four or five years thereafter. It was natural that the debt should increase. It was simply the bringing together of the ends and fragments of the great war expenditure that we had had. But since that has been done the debt still increases by millions of dollars each year, so that we not only have a big debt, crushing in its absolute weight upon the people, but we have that debt still increasing from year to year, and that increase causes anxiety and discontent. As a corollary of that we have, in the second place, a crushing burden of taxation—a burden of taxation which, from the ending of the war up to the present, has tended to increase rather than decrease. So you have not only the debt, heavy and increasing, but also the corollary to that in the tax burdens upon the country, which are largely growing out of that debt and which too are constantly on the increase.

Again, looking about at the individual, or the community, or the province, or the Dominion, you do not find in government and administration the spirit of economy penetrating into and directing or controlling the expenditures. There is still, growing out of the war period, an expenditure which does not make for thrift or economy, but which rather continues the spirit of extravagant spending which characterized the war, as it indeed characterizes all wars.

Those are the three things to be taken into consideration from the economic and the financial point of view.

We have to take into account something else besides; because we are situated alongside a country which is our chief competitor and which is the chief attraction for many of our best people and in other ways. The United States of America did not enter into the war until nearly two and a half years after it had begun. During that time the United States was busy making money, and making it in very large amounts. It enjoyed a period of industrial and other prosperity during that period of two and a half years, which was altogether exceptional, and tremendously profitable to its people. The United States therefore had less of the burdens of war and less of the difficult consequences of war to combat than we had. But it lies alongside our borders. It is therefore, as I said, a competitor and an attraction to our people. During the time that has elapsed from the period of demobilization up to the present, what has the United States been doing? This has been referred to by my honourable friend the leader of the Opposition (Hon. Sir James Lougheed). During that period the United States has absolutely decreased her debt by nearly five billions of dollars. It has also, in a legislative enactment which has passed one of its Houses, taken off $466,000,000 of the present taxation laid upon its people. Whether that sum is ultimately to be subtracted from the taxes of the people of that country one does not know. The measure has yet to pass the ordeal of the Senate. But it is safe to say that between $350,000,000 and $450,000,000 of taxation will be released to the people of the United States as a result of the legislation which is at present taking place at Washington.

Those two causes make a contrast between ourselves and the United States, our great competing neighbor. We cannot be oblivious to that contrast. The people of Canada live along a border of 3,500 miles close to our neighbors to the South. Canada therefore cannot afford to impose upon its inhabitants, upon the business of the country, a larger taxation, a heavier burden, than is imposed upon the people of the United States. She cannot afford to stand under the contrast of the continuous diminution of debt on that side of the line and the increase of debt on this side.

There are other competitive advantages which the United States has, and there are disadvantages which we have. These accentuate the situation, and our Government and our people, irrespective of parties, from a purely national, economic and business point of view, have got to take that into consideration as a most serious factor for the future progress or otherwise of the Dominion of Canada.

Now, that barely and briefly outlines the situation. It is that which is causing serious thought throughout Canada. It is that which is taking hold of our legislators, I hope, and our Governments, I hope, as well. Then, what is best to be done, and possible to be done, under those conditions that must attract our attention, and that should call for our best co-operated efforts to make the situation better? Without going any further along that line, because it just opens the proposition, have we hope that we can meet that situation? It will be met if the people of this country are absolutely in earnest. Are they in earnest? Looking at sentiment as we find it put forward in public, it would seem as though our people in Canada were absolutely in earnest to have something done which would mend the matter. What is it, then, that we think ought to be done? What is it that the people ought to demand? In my view it is this. First, that there should be an absolute stop put to any increase in the public debt. The public debt is now at a maximum that will acidly test the capabilities of our people and the resources of this country. Under no circumstances should the debt be increased by borrowing or otherwise. If it is increased by borrowing you simply add to the burden by increased taxation.

But not only should there be an absolute stop put to the increase of the public debt, but in my opinion the time has come when there should be a continuous, if small, decrease of the public debt from year to year. That should be the demand of the people, that should be the duty of the Government, and that is what administration should bring about. It is necessary for the health of Canada. Take a man who has been struggling with an individual proposition. He gets up to a point where he finds himself at the limit of the debt that he can bear. If he sees no prospect of diminishing that, he loses hope and initiative; but if he can make a little reduction each year on that capital debt, the view is open to a release from it, and he gets hope and confidence and initiative, and greater power to work. The same psychology, I think, holds with reference to a nation, and it would put spirit into our people from one ocean to the other if we could get to a position, and get to it quickly, where we could say not only will we not increase this enormous debt, but year by year we will bring it down from the total amount, and gradually diminish the burden which we are bearing. I think the whole question comes down to this: is it possible to make such economies in expenditure, and thus at the same time make a reasonable reduction in the taxes which are burdening this country, its business and its individuals so heavily at the present time? It all depends, I think, upon the administration of the Government and the legislation upon which that administration is based. Is the public mind ready for economies in expenditure? In the main, I believe it is; but I find a good deal of this sort of thing as well: a man will put the case for economy mighty strongly to the Government, but in side whispers he will say, "Don't apply that to my constituency."

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: And even aloud.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: The whole West is calling out for economy.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: And the Hudson Bay railway.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: The whole West appears to be coming down with propositions that would add very largely to our immediate tremendous expenditures. Note the demand which is to be preferred to the Government for the finishing of the Hudson Bay route as a communication from the West to the European markets. Note also that there is almost a demand for a subsidy from the Government to enable Alberta coal to be delivered to the firesides and the factories of the people of Ontario, and maybe of a portion of Quebec. Coal is a product of Alberta and other western regions, and I am absolutely in favour of making it available in Ontario and places to the east if it can be done economically; but I am absolutely against it if it makes it necessary that the Government shall subsidize the carriage of that coal from the Alberta coal mines to the homes of Ontario. And it is absolutely a subsidy even though you say: "Oh, but we have Government railways; what are they for? Let them foot the difference between the real cost and the amount which is necessary to put Alberta coal into the homes and factories of Ontario." We find men banding themselves together and forming a bank; they elect their own representatives; they put in their own directors; and, as business men, they invest in it their money and put in their deposits. If the bank fails we find people coming to the Government demanding that the depositors' and shareholders' losses shall be made up by the Government. All that goes to show that there is a somewhat divided opinion with reference to real economy in expenditure, and a real keeping down of the vast debt which to-day burdens our country. But in the mass, I believe the people are behind the demand that economy shall be brought about.

Now, is there any line which we can follow as to how economies may be brought about? I am going to treat this question very casually, but I am going to suggest some means by which I think these economies may be brought about. In the first place, I state this prominent fact: the people of the United States, 112,000,000 in number with a territory under actual administration much bigger than our own, carry on the federal administration and government with 9 ministers. The Dominion of Canada, with nine million of people or less, and with a territory widely distributed, has no less than 17 members in the cabinet drawing salaries. We have nearly twice as many as there are in the United States. Does it not strike a business man, and would it not strike even a member of the Government, when he comes to sit down and look at it as a business proposition, that it may not be absolutely necessary to have 17 members of the Cabinet to administer the affairs of Canada when in the United States 9 are supposed to do it with precision and advantage and efficiency?

Then, take the departments of the Government. Is it necessary that they should all be full-fledged departments? I do not believe it is. What reason is there why the Secretary of State Department should have a Minister full-fledged, with all the paraphernalia of a Cabinet Minister? What is the Secretary of State's business? His department is simply a place of record. There is no policy involved, or none that could be called a policy, outside of mere administration methods. There seems no reason in the world why the Secretaryship of State should not be made an appanage of another appointment, and the paraphernalia of a Minister, and all that it involves, gotten rid of.

Then, again, you have the Finance Department which has to provide the money ways and means for the administration of the country, and you had formerly collecting departments such as the Inland Revenue and the Customs, two different, full-fledged ministerial departments. I believe that we would have a more efficient piece of work if the Finance Minister, who has to provide the sums that are necessary for administration, were in charge, and had supervision of the collection of the revenue which he provides for in the legislation that he brings down to Parliament. I think that Customs and Revenue, having been put into one department, might now very well be put into the Finance Department, and one Ministership dispensed with.

Then you have Public Works. What are public works? You have a Department of Railways and Canals to administer the railways and the canal system. You have also a Department of Marine and Fisheries, the marine part of which is public works, just as much as the Public Works itself. It has the construction and management of lighthouses, and that kind of thing, under its supervision. Is there any reason why you should not have one ministry of Public Works, and have under it, as subordinate branches, your railways and canals and your marine work? Something might be said as to the allocation of the fisheries to a different department. But that could very well be done if it were necessary.

Then, take the Solicitor General. The Solicitor General is simply doing work that the Justice Department must supervise, and there is no necessity for a full-fledged or partly fledged Minister in that Department. I think that if business sagacity and business efficiency were put to work upon these propositions you could diminish the number of heads of departments by at least five.

What reason is there that the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment should not be put under the Department of National Defence? Why should it necessitate a full-fledged ministerial position with all that it involves?

So I think a business survey of the work of administration of the departments, if made thoroughly, honestly, and from an efficiency and economy standpoint, might well result in reducing the number of Ministers by at least five. Whenever you have a Minister, you have his Deputy, his secretaries, his special men, and all the paraphernalia of a full-fledged ministerial department. The expense of all these could very well be dispensed with. That is one line on which I think economy could be exercised.

There is another ground where unnecessary and extravagant expenses might be dispensed with. What is that? It is in the management of the Civil Service as a whole. In speaking of this, I am not speaking simply of the 40,000 employees, and the salaries they get, and their positions, or what they do and whether they earn what they are paid for doing what they do as Civil Servants. I would go further than that. I would say that a survey of the departmental layout, the plan of their organization, and the methods by which they carry out their plan, made from a practical business standpoint, would introduce economies which would save hundreds of thousands—even millions of dollars. I have had some experience in that matter. My honourable friend the leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Danadurand) has had a Committee of the Senate appointed to inquire into the Civil Service. I do not know how far that Committee is going to go, but I do know that if the Committee is to be at all effective it has got to go a long way, a much longer way than the time that is at its disposal will permit it to go. For two years I had some experience, along with some of my colleagues in the late Government, with reference to departmental organization. As a concrete example of what took place in one branch of a department—not under my supervision and that of my colleagues, but before we undertook that—I simply cite what was done in the Printing Department. Reports authorized by Parliament were made upon it, and they showed that there was extravagant management, to say nothing more. As a result, the Civil Service Commission undertook a reorganization of that Department and called to their aid certain outside help to enable them to make a proper survey and allocation of the work to be done. To make a long story short, what happened? Re-organization of that Department was effected by the Civil Service Commission, with its assistants, and as a result $600,000 were absolutely cut off the first year, and it was made possible to cut off that amount for each year thereafter. Besides a saving of $600,000, the layout of the Printing Department's work, the co-operation and the interchangeability of the officials and the clerks themselves, the juxtaposition in which they were put so as to prevent loss of time in communications resulted in a service which was infinitely better organized and more efficient, and a spirit of work and emulation and content in that department that you never had before. That is simply a concrete example, and it was possible to do this by a simple application of business methods.

The committee with which I worked, and of which I was chairman, put on a survey of two Departments, with a partial survey of a third. There is an idea abroad which is quite contrary to the fact, with reference to that investigation which was carried on and that process of bringing the Departments into a better condition. Experts were employed, not to say what Civil Servants should be employed, not to say what salaries they should get, but to make a survey of the work which was to be done by the Departments, the organization which was trying to do it, and the efficiency of the method to gain the end in view. That committee did not simply go into a Department and act of itself. It went into a Department and collaborated with a chosen number of the chiefs of that Department, and the two bodies carried on their investigation together. They came perhaps to different conclusions in certain respects, and they canvassed those differences and came closer together, and in the end their combined report, in many cases entirely unanimous, came before the sub-committee of Council for revision by the committee in consultation with the head of the Department itself. After all that consultation there was an agreement in the matter of organization and of the methods which should be carried out. In the Post Office Department alone, the survey of which we completed, it was made absolutely certain that from $1,000,000 to $1,200,000 per year could be saved and the business done, and under better organization.

That is a system which is absolutely necessary before you can make anything out of Civil Service economies. You cannot bring before a committee a body of clerks and their accompanying Deputy Ministers, and reorganize that service. The first thing that you have to do is to make a survey of that service. A survey was made of the Customs and Inland Revenue Departments, with exactly the same results. The chiefs of the Customs Department sat in conference with our specialists and in conference continually with the committee. An unanimous agreement was reached as to the method of organization, and if that method had been carried out there would have been a saving of nearly a million dollars in the expenditures necessary for the administration of those Departments, Customs and Inland Revenue. These surveys were partially commenced in other departments, and they were completed in the Printing Bureau. They were put largely into operation in the Post office Department, and quite largely in the Customs Department. Then we went out and our committee became a thing of the past.

What has been done since I do not know; but, from my long experience in departmental affairs, from observation and from actual work, with the Departments of Government organized on modern business lines, with efficiency and economy as the only things to be held in view, I am absolutely confident that millions of dollars could be saved and the services of the country better done, and the esprit de corps of the service as a whole be immensely heightened and improved.

These are the suggestions that I offer. I think that as long as we talk of economy in the general we shall get nowhere. Until we have points on which we converge, and objectives at which we aim, we shall not do much in the way of economies in that respect. I therefore put these points—and I could put a great many more—before the Senate as objectives which might be aimed at with very great advantage.

Now I come to another point, regarding a deficiency which has existed under all administrations up to the present. There are times when an effort is made to remedy it. In Canada for forty years there has not been a real financial control over the expenditures of the various Departments of this Government. The Finance Department has not had it in hand, and the Audit Branch has not done effective work in controlling the expenditures after they have been appropriated. That is a vast and most important thing to do. You must have, I think, that financial control intelligently, resistlessly and constantly put into force and operation, and there is need for the continuous and uniform exercise of backbone. What are you going to do to control the expenditures of a great country like this when the expenditures are audited months and sometimes almost a year after they have been made? What is required is a pre-audit: there is no doubt about that; it is the only effective way. It is quite possible to do it, and do it well. But a post-audit is always made after the illegal act has come out, always after the wrong expenditure has been made, always after the diversion of a vote from the purpose for which it was intended by Parliament. Then of course it is fait accompli, and all you can do is to grumble and growl, and a very large part of the Auditor General's work has been grumbling and growling, and he has put his grumbles and his growls in an immense report which we know as volumes 1, 2 and 3 of the Report of the Auditor General. Therefore a financial control by the Finance and Audit Departments, which is effective and continuous and carried on uniformly, is necessary for the accomplishment of large economies.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: May I ask my honourable friend if he has ever attempted to verify the extent to which annually there is an excess of expenditure over the amount appropriated by Parliament? Has he done that for any number of years?

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: My honourable friend will always see the results in the Auditor General's Report. He will find the over-expenditures and the under-expenditures. Some Departments will not have reached the amount of their vote; others will have gone beyond it. It is all totalled up. But the finding is reached after the expenditures that ought not to have been made have been incurred and disposed of.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: What I meant to ask was, did my honourable friend ever attempt to make out, for a number of years, the figures regarding excess of expenditure over appropriations?

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: Oh, yes, it has been made every year.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Can my honourable friend give me the figures?

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: The Finance Minister knows at the end of the year, from the accounts that come before him, what has been over-expended.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: But can the right honourable gentleman tell us what has been the amount over a number of years?

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: I cannot tell. The amount runs sometimes into millions. Certainly I should think it would almost always run into millions.

One other thought is this. Every member of a Government who have passed through the hectic period of the examination of appropriations that are to be brought down in the Estimates will know how exceedingly crude and unsatisfactory is the control that is had over the first appropriations or estimates that are put before the House of Commons. How does it all come about? Here is the genesis of it. A member casts about him, desiring to do the best he can for his county, and, in a way, to do the best he can for his political reputation and standing as well. He comes to the Minister of the Department and places before him a list of what he wants. That list is always much more than he ever has any hope of getting. It is always more than the Finance Minister can indulge him in any hope that he will get. But the man who is Finance Minister always has to put up with this. I am, say, Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and you come to me. I say, "You want these put in the Estimates?" "Yes." "Well, I cannot promise you what will be done, but I will put them in for you. It all depends on the Finance Minister. He is the tyrant. He is the man that wields the axe." There is a disposition to put the items in the Estimates and try to pass them through, letting the Finance Minister do the pruning.

If the Estimates from all the Departments come in and are thrown into Council about four of five weeks before Parliament meets, with the idea that Council may pass fair judgment upon those thousands and thousands of items, you are expecting too much from human nature. It cannot be done. Where is the initial difficulty? It is that items are put into the Estimates because they are pressed by people and by interests —often in good faith—but are not sufficiently investigated. The basis for rejection or approval is not placed before either the Department or the Cabinet. There is the initial difficulty. Consequently there is not that supervision which would require that no expenditure be recommended unless there is a necessity for it in the public interest. That alone is the basis upon which the Estimates should be submitted and appropriations made. The difficulty is that that is not done in one case out of ten.

The United States has during the last two years carried out a policy initiated by President Harding. They have not only exercised a pretty thorough supervision over the Estimates for appropriation, but after the two Houses have made the appropriations the President through his officials has gone into the Departments and controlled the expenditures. Mr. Harding, by virtue of his power as President, appointed a Controller of Appropriations and said: "There they are; they have been voted by the two Houses of Congress, but it is your duty to make a thorough examination of them and to cut off such as you think can be dispensed with." Last year and the year before the Controller at Washington cut off between $300,000,000 and $400,000,000 of appropriations that had actually been made by the two Houses of Congress, and in only one case did the President refuse to carry out his recommendation, and in that case, concerning some portion of the Naval Service, a compromise was made.

Now, in some way or other, there ought to be guards, first on what goes into the Estimates, and, secondly, on what comes out in appropriations. We have none. There is no committee which takes those things in hand, as is done in Great Britain, and examines and prunes. We have no controller such as they have in the United States of America. I do not know what it is best to do, but there is something that could be done there, and it would very greatly add to economy.

I am not going to ask the House to follow me further in this matter. I have briefly thrown out certain points to suggest how we might accomplish a great deal in the work of economy and good administration.

There is one other point I must mention before I sit down. There is in the Speech from the Throne an intimation that tariff changes will be made, and there is a pretty good lead given as to certain points on which reductions or entire remissions of tariff taxes will be effected. I wish to point out in the first place, that this is a serious time to commence making reductions in the tariff protection which has been given to our industries in Canada. The situation in Europe is absolutely confused. Exchange is rising and falling continually. The man who to-day wants to import from France articles which may come into competition with industries that we have here, finds that the value of his money is a little more than four times its normal value in French currency. There is an advantage which any business man will take, as far as he possibly can. That might easily wipe out or completely nullify any protection that an industry in this country might have. This applies not only to France, but in greater degree to Belgium, in about the same degree to Italy, in greater degree to Poland, and to a maximum degree to Germany itself. These things are trials and difficulties which our industries in this country have to cope with, and in a period of indecision and of confusion of exchanges it is not very opportune to lessen the protection which our industries already have.

A great deal is said about the development of our natural resources. It is a high point with the present Premier. It is that upon which is based many an argument. It is said that in Canada what we must do is to develop the natural resources of the country and depend upon them for our prosperity. Granted. The natural resources of Canada are its great guarantee for progress and prosperity in the present and in the future. She has reason to be greatly thankful that she has such splendid natural resources. You ask us to develop them and base our prosperity on that. I say as well, develop them and base our prosperity on that. But are you going to stop at a certain point in development, and thereby have not only incomplete but arrested development? That is the point which we have been considering since 1878; that is the point which we must consider now.

Take, for instance, our forests. What a splendid natural resource the forests of Canada have been and are. Develop them and depend on them for your prosperity. Develop them how far? Up to the simple timber to be exported at a certain value? Up to sawn lumber to be exported at a certain increased value? Up to the point of pulpwood to be exported at a certain value? Are you even to stop there, and have an arrested development, or is it not the duty and the right of this country to continue an uniform and progressive development until that forest production is raised to the highest point of selling value? Then when you sell you get a return which is adequate to the resource itself.

But you do something else. On every subsidiary operation from the raw wood to the paper that is calendered and made fit for consumption, you develop industry and provide employment, and it is that which gives you what you ought to get out of your natural resources.

We are at one that we should develop our natural resources. But the National Policy, the protective system, looks not to an arrested development but to a continued and perfected development along with the lateral advantages that come from that course of action. We have a history in this respect. To-day it would seem as though the Government proposes to traverse a portion of that well-established and well fought out history, if I may so denominate it. What did our forefathers who planned Confederation have in view? They had in view the building of a nation. It was not simply to have a community in British Columbia and another community somewhere in the Northwest, and another in the central provinces, and still another in the Maritime provinces. They had a vision which overcame obstacles of which we do not know the name. They were bereft of methods and means, which to-day are at our hands at every side, and yet they never wavered or faltered.

We must make of this country a nation. To do it we must have more than a paper pact; we must have a practical union. To get that you have to have national transports and a national tariff as well. That was the outcome of the trouble from 1875 to 1878, and after a full study and a full strife on that question, Canada inserted those two things in her programme—a national transportation and a national protective tariff; and those two things have gone side by side, hand in hand, the one with the other, and have made Canada what she is to-day.

Suppose we had gone in single harness and had not linked up with a national transport system and a national protective system, where would we have been? Suppose we had taken the shorter lines of communication, and had neglected the through lines, where would this country have been? What would have been its position compared with what it is to-day?

So we are coming back to discuss that same question again, and it must be discussed, and it must be settled. To my mind there is only way of settling it. You must have stability somewhere. The curse of the business position to-day, and the difficulty of it, is that there is no stability in it. We had an Opposition which for seventeen years preached revenue tariff, and almost if not entire free trade, and which called down the protective system in every shape and form. The Laurier Government, however, found it healthful to swallow their opposition principles, and continued a fairly protective tariff. We then had the utterances of a party working for renewed power. Their 1919 platform laid down certain propositions; it created an impression and a condition in this country of which capital and labour had to take cognizance, and of which they did take cognizance. Then we had the repudiation of that platform by men who were at the convention, who declared, when they brought down legislation, that they were not in favour of the platform and never intended to abide by it; and financial proposals were made which did not tally with the platform. Then the Finance Minister says: "Now, let us have stability; that is what this country needs for its business prosperity." The Finance Minister unfortunately is on his sick-bed; Sir Lomer Gouin unfortunately is in ill health; the two balance-weights of that Cabinet seem to have disappeared, and now we have almost a plain intimation: "Reverse your engine and go back to free goods or to the minimum tariff."

That does not give capital or labour a chance. No capitalist will invest his money under conditions of that kind. Under the Conservative Administration capitalists and labour knew one thing—that their principle was a protective one, and that they would give a fair tariff, which was necessary to keep the industries on their feet. Now capital and labour have no security at all; consequently they are both affected.

Some men say that we are not losing population. I like to speak of that under my breath, as nearly as possible, but I say that no man could have travelled in Canada, and gone in and out of the ports of the United States during the last summer and autumn without seeing the numbers that were going from Canada to the United States. Why is this? It is because there are better conditions for labour, better conditions for capital, and better conditions for business. Under depressed business conditions in this country our men cannot get employment, and our capital cannot advance or expand. There must be some basis of security upon which to go.

These are all the remarks I wish to make this afternoon, and I end with one thought. Are we in Canada down-hearted? I do not think we are. If we are, we ought not to be. We have got to take a long vision ahead; we have got to have regard to history as well; and we have got to make sacrifices in order to bridge the space which comes between periods of prosperity. I cannot go through our country from one end to the other and look at its resources and its 40 years of progress and think of the infinity, almost, of resources that remain yet undeveloped, without saying to myself that it all depends on ourselves. But let us be mighty careful that in trying to bridge the spaces we do not make use of materials which are insufficient for national support, and which will not carry the weight which is to cross them. British Columbia, Alberta, and even Saskatchewan and Manitoba, in the not very far distant future will become increasingly larger manufacturing countries. There are great hopes and prospects, which seem to me to be well founded, with reference to Alberta and British Columbia. Years ago in the Western States there was the same difficulty. The East was the manufacturing part of the country and the industry of the West was confined to raising cattle and agricultural products. There was that disparity of interests between them, but they worried through, and to-day the middle west is one of the greatest manufacturing centers in the whole of the United States of America.

We may not have the same comparative extension of manufactures in our middle western provinces, but on each side of them we are bound to have a large extension of manufacturing and diversified interests. We must, I think, have that in Canada. We must have employment for our people; we must have security for our capital; and we cannot have them unless we have a diversified industrial life. With the circumstances as they are to-day in this old world, when every country not even excepting Great Britain has its protecting barriers, we are at a disadvantage when we pull our barriers down below the living rate for the industries which are our need in Canada. Especially is that the case with reference to the United States. It will probably not be many days before President Coolidge will say that the duty on wheat must be raised to 50 cents, and that the duty on other agricultural articles must be raised. If the farmer in the West cannot make his own implements, yet he must have them. Suppose that by a tariff extinction you shut up these industries in this country where will they be made? They will be made in the United States of America; they will be made by United States labour; the profits on them will be on United States capital. The homes that will be built up will be United States homes, and those homes and that labour will be largely supplied by the transfer of the best elements of Canadian life across the line for those purposes. We cannot afford to have our skilled labour leave our country and go to the building up of other countries. That question, whether there be a Liberal Government, a Conservative Government or a Progressive Government, would occupy the attention of those who work out these plans and administer them; and I devolve upon the head of my honourable friend who represents the Government here, so far as I can, the full weight of that responsibility, and I ask him and his Government to stop, look, and listen, before they go too far.

Hon. J. P. B. CASGRAIN: Honourable gentlemen, I have only a few minutes, but I would not like to see the eloquent speech of my honourable friend go absolutely unanswered. I have taken just a few notes. I congratulate the right honourable gentleman not only on his well-known eloquence, but on his eternal youth and good complexion. He has spoken of what took place thirty or forty years ago—of affairs of state in which he took so prominent a part—but you would think by his appearance he only came into public life yesterday.

My right honourable friend spoke at considerable length on the debt of Canada. He was very modest; he said it was $2,400,000,000. That is very little, as he knows, as an ex-Minister of Finance. Canada owes a great deal more than that when we take into consideration what we have guaranteed in the way of bonds for the railroads—I have not the exact figure, but I think if all the items were added up the total would be not far short of $1,600,000,000. So in my humble opinion the real debt is not alone the figure which the right honourable gentleman has mentioned, but $4,000,000,000.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: That reinforces my argument.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I have no objection to that. It shows also in what a terrible condition my honourable friend and his friends have left us. He tells us himself that when they took office the debt was $236,000,000. It had actually been reduced, for I remember that at one time during Sir Wilfrid Laurier's regime it was over $300,000,000. But my honourable friend and his party have increased the debt, and now we are face to face with not ten times but about twelve or fifteen times as great a debt per head as there was in the golden age of Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

The right honourable gentleman spoke for some time on how to decrease expenses. He told us how Departments could be merged, and I agree with him. But the right honourable gentleman did not tell us that he and his friends had not only 17 Ministers, but, I think, 20 or 22, amongst whom was an Overseas Minister in a Department in London, England. However, I think it would be a very good thing if some of the Departments were amalgamated. Take Trade and Commerce, for instance. My right honourable friend held that portfolio for a long time during which he journeyed all over the world. The duties of his office in Ottawa must have been light indeed when he was able to make so long a journey.

But my right honourable friend should be glad to know that, notwithstanding the terrible situation left to us by former Administrations, we are told that the budget is to be balanced. Personally I am sceptical about that, I admit. Still that is the statement made. Well, even this talk about balancing the budget is pleasant. It is a silver lining to the cloud. How they will balance the budget is more than I can understand. If it is merely a question of bookeeping, it is easy enough; but large expenditures must be incurred for railways and transportation on capital account.

My right honourable friend spoke of national transportation and the National Policy. The National Policy was in effect from 1878 until Sir Wilfrid Laurier came into power, and for some years afterwards. Still, in the words of the famous Edward Blake, we had an empty Northwest and an empty treasury, and people were leaving this country in greater numbers than they are leaving it at present. That was all under the National policy. However, the National Policy may be a good thing. Personally—I say it openly and I do not care who knows it—I am a protectionist. I agree with the right honourable gentleman that all our products should be manufactured and finished right in this country. I am not ashamed to say so. This is a free country, and surely anyone can be a good Liberal and be also a good protectionist.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: No, he cannot.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: In the Liberal party everyone is entitled to his own opinion. It is not like the Tory party, in which everyone must hew to the line, or keep his nose to the grindstone. We are the party of liberty, and every Liberal is entitled to have his own ideas.

The right honourable gentleman waxed very eloquent in discussing our natural resources—the forests, the lumber and the pulpwood. If he would cast a glance at the Province of Quebec he would see that we are doing what he advocates. We are manufacturing pulp and selling paper. For a long time the Province of Quebec has actually prohibited the exportation of raw material from Crown lands. I am pleased to declare in this House that I was one of the first to go to Sir Lomer Gouin, in company with Sir William Van Horne. At that time, I must say, he was not very favourable to the proposal, but he became favourable to it, and to-day we are turning out the finished product. I would like to see the finished article produced in every case.

The right honourable gentleman said a good deal about economy, but he seems to have kept away from one of his pet hobbies, a subject on which he has spoken from Halifax to Vancouver—the League of Nations. There is a matter in which we might effect a little economy. The League of Nations is costing us nearly $200,000 a year, or about $400 a day, and what do we get from it? Would anybody in this country be any the poorer if we kept that money here? Could we not find some way in which to use that money to better advantage? There is an expenditure of about $200 a day—by whom? By a notorious socialist, M. Albert Thomas. He is spending Canada's money. For what? Socialist propaganda. Talking about departments, how many has Mr. Albert Thomas under his control? How many stenographers? One hundred and nineteen. And what salaries they get! There is a matter in which the right honourable gentleman might have advocated economy, and nobody would suffer as a result, because, as I have stated many times, we have no more right to be in the League of Nations than we had to be at the Washington Conference.

The Empire Parliamentary Association issues monthly reports, and in one of these I find the statement that at the Washington Conference, where we had representatives, there was only one vote for the whole British Empire, although in the League of Nations each Dominion votes, and the British Empire has six votes at Geneva.

I see also in this report of the Parliamentary Association that somebody—I think it was Mr. Downie Stewart—was asked what in his opinion would happen if at Washington any particular Dominion had refused to acquiesce in the decision of the British delegation. Mark you, honourable gentlemen, the credentials of the British plenipotentiaries were different from those of the delegates of the Dominions. Supposing there had been a divergence of opinion between the delegates from the Dominions and the plenipotentiaries from Great Britain, what would have happened? The answer was that the British plenipotentiaries would have signed the Treaty and it would have held good for the whole Empire.

Whilst we are on the subject of economy, let me point out a saving that might be "They have been made in France." French effected this year again. Each year we have voted in the Budget $60,000 for an Ambassador at Washington. An appointment has not yet been made.

I find also in this document from the Empire Parliamentary Association something which I would like to quote, because I have often stated the same thing, and I am pleased to observe that someone, apparently a man of substance too, agrees with my opinion:

> If on any question conflict arose, no general policy could be evolved. Exactly the same difficulty was going to arise if Canada pursued her policy of claiming the right of separate representation through her Ambassador in America and elsewhere.

There are five or six dominions, and there is the home Government. If conflict arose, what would our poor Sovereign, King George, do? Canada might advise one thing, Premier Massey of New Zealand might advise another, and Premier Bruce of Australia still another. Mr. Smuts has declared that South Africa will go to war whenever it likes. I commend to honourable gentlemen the reading of this report. Mr. Smuts says that South Africa will go to war when it is ready, and will make peace whenever it is ready. There are some people in Canada who would say that Canada could do the same thing; that Canada is not necessarily at war when Great Britain is. I read in a Montreal paper last summer an article to this effect: Suppose a Canadian ship is in a German port, say Hamburg or Bremen. Along come the Germans and they take possession of that ship. The Captain says: "Hold on! This is a Canadian ship, and we are not at war." The Germans say: "How is that? We are at war with England." "Oh, yes," replies the Captain, "But Mackenzie King stated in Ottawa that Canada was not at war." "Who in the world is Mackenzie King anyway?" they would say, and they would take the ship just the same.

I am sorry, honourable gentlemen, that my time is so limited, but I would like to deal for a few moments with the British preference. The right honourable gentleman did not mention that when he was referring to the fluctuations in exchange and to the depreciation of foreign currency. One of the most important factors is the British preference. You will be surprised, honourable gentlemen, to know, if you do not know already, the situation at Bradford and other places in England where woollens are manufactured. Merchants who have establishments on our principal streets have gone from Montreal to England, as they have been doing from the time they commenced business, for the purpose of buying goods, and what goods have they got? They said: "These goods are not made in England?" They were told no. "Where have these goods been made?" The answer was: "They have been made in France." French cloth is to be found in the shops of the best tailors in Montreal. You never saw that before. Why is it there now? Because of the depreciation of the franc. The manufacturers are asked: "Are you not making any here? Your woolen factories in England are almost idle." The answer is: "We can buy the goods in France and sell them to you cheaper than we can make them ourselves."

But, honourable gentlemen, you ask what this has to do with preference. Here is the explanation. Many of those cloths are unfinished. I have seen them myself. Some come to St. Johns, Quebec, where there is a factory now, and in the condition in which they arrive they must be very cheap. They are put in proper condition there. It is the same with gloves. We have glove factories. I am sorry to say that many of those we had in Montreal are closed to-day—why? Because gloves are imported from Germany, Italy and France more cheaply than they can be made in Canada or in England—even in free-trade England. A large buyer of gloves in Montreal went across to buy his usual supply. When some gloves were shown to him he said, "These are not English gloves; we want Dent's." They said, "We haven't them; we are not making them." "Why?" "Because we can sell you these gloves cheaper than we can buy the skins."

Our friends the farmers in the West are very strong on that British preference. They do not know that it is hurting them. Take hides, for instance. There are shoemakers and leather workers idle in Montreal to-day—why? Because hides are imported into England from continental countries whose currency is depreciated, and those hides are made into boots, which are shipped to Canada as English boots, and undersell those made by our own people. The consequence is that our people are idle when they should be employed in making boots for use in Canada. There is a result of the preference.

For twenty-five years we have been giving England a preference. When Sir Wilfrid Laurier said, "We ask nothing in return," those were the words of a chivalrous Frenchman. If he had been a Scotchman, he would have asked, "What will ye give?" But he simply said, "No, we ask nothing in return." But he expected something, and there was no more disappointed man in Canada in that respect than Sir Wilfrid Laurier himself when, as years and years rolled on, no recognition came, no preference was given to us. On the contrary, Great Britain excluded our cattle for 35 years. Now that the embargo has been removed they are placing all sorts of obstacles in the way. A good many cattle were exported from Canada to Great Britain the year before last, but last year, owing to obstacles of all sorts, the exports amounted to very little.

As to the British preference, I say, let the people of Great Britain look after themselves, and I do not blame them for doing so. Canada also should look after itself and should say, as Mr. Massey of New Zealand and Mr. Bruce of Australia have said, "If you do not want to give us a preference, there are other people who will, and we can make arrangements with them." I think that would be one of the best things for Canada. This country wants revenue. There would be more duty paid on goods imported, and that would increase our revenue and would at the same time afford protection for the workingmen and also be a good thing for the farmers in selling their hides. It would also be a great advantage to the farmers to have protection for their wheat; and why should they not have it?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Come over.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: We are the children of Great Britain. We have made many sacrifices for the British people. We fought for them in the war—I had three sons there. Well, why should they not give us preferential treatment? In the British market Canada is at present on the same basis as any other country, even strangers. The Germans are treated every bit as well as we are. Why should we not have a little preference? Even a slight preference on wheat would mean a great deal to the farmers in the Northwest, and yet it would add very, very little to the cost of bread in Great Britain. I figured it out, and I know it is infinitesimal.

I was very sorry to see Mr. Baldwin rush into his protection policy without the people being prepared. We had seen, for instance, automobile factories growing in England. A big duty, a tremendous duty, was imposed on automobiles—I think it was equal to one-third ad valorem. What was the consequence? Henry Ford went there and built a huge factory, and in that factory in England men are working at good wages, and the surrounding community, which has to supply those work people with food and clothing, is prosperous, and agriculture is prosperous too.

The right honourable gentleman said a good deal about the taxes. The taxes are terrible, but who is paying them? I took the trouble to look into that matter, and I find that, as usual, my poor old Province of Quebec is the one that is most mulcted. It has been the milch cow of this Confederation ever since it entered, and is yet. In income tax Quebec pays per capita $9; Ontario pays $8.25; Manitoba pays—considerable for a Western Province—$7; British Columbia a little less than $7; Alberta, $2.70, or a little less; Nova Scotia, $3; New Brunswick, $2.75; Saskatchewan is a very rich province, according to what we hear. Premier Dunning says: "I have a million dollar surplus; what shall we do with it?" He was very much insulted, according to an interview in the Star, when he was told "Pay your debts—what you owe on the guarantees you gave for the railways." You see, people enrich themselves when they pay their debts. Saskatchewan pays $2 as against Quebec's $9. I am sorry the honourable gentleman from Prince Edward Island is not here, for he would be shocked to learn that Prince Edward Island pays exactly $1 per head. There are 88,000 people in Prince Edward Island, and they pay $88,000, exactly $1 per capita. I think Prince Edward Island is a poor speculation for Canada. However, the exact total is $59,711,559.

Now, although Quebec, as I have said, is the province that pays the most per capita, how is Quebec treated? In all the building of railroads with money out of the public chest, what has Quebec got? We have only one-fifth per capita as much railway mileage as Saskatchewan. So railroads do not seem to make for prosperity. Here is Saskatchewan, with five times more railroads than Quebec per head of population, and it pays only $2 per capita in income tax, whereas Quebec pays 4½ times as much per capita income tax. Surely Saskatchewan must have too many railroads. That must be what is hurting that province.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: You have the terminals in Montreal.

Hon. J. H. ROSS: What do the farmers do?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: They do their share.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Move those corporations up to Ontario or Alberta and they would pay quite as much.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The right honourable gentleman explained how he had investigated several Departments and as a result millions of money had been saved. They started the good work and affected a saving in some Departments. I suppose they suffered from remorse of conscience because they had been spending too much money, and decided they ought to spend less. But some of their work was left undone, when the people of this country chose other administraters, and since the present Government has come into power they have dispensed with 2,700 Government employees.

Hon. Mr. STANFIELD: Then why is there not more room, if they have dispensed with those clerks?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Why are they renting more premises?

Hon. Mr. STANFIELD: A few months ago they took over three floors of the Jackson Building.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I cannot answer that. However, the former administration must have found themselves very much cramped, because when they came into power they dismissed 11,000 Liberals. They afterwards put in 22,000 of their own friends. No wonder it was necessary to increase the accommodation.

I am very sorry, honourable gentlemen, that time does not permit me to continue. I could have gone on further, but as I have to take the train I must cut my remarks short. The right honourable gentleman referred to conditions thirty years ago. I read the other day a review showing the conditions existing in Canada twenty years ago—what were its exports and its imports, etc.—and I was surprised at the marvellous progress we had made in the twenty years. I am one of those who were pessimistic, but if we make half of that progress in the two next decades, I thing Canada will be able to pull through its difficulties, and I trust that by same arrangement or other we shall be able to lessen the burden. I think the prospects are good. According to what we hear, in speeches and otherwise, the National railways are not doing too badly at all. I am agreeably surprised to observe how well they are doing. They are doing so well that they are, I believe, giving some concern to their rival, the Canadian Pacific railway. I have heard of Canadian Pacific railway officials complaining about unfair competition from the C.N.R. Well, I know that when people commence to say that unfair advantage is being taken of them, they are not getting the better of it. When people commence to whine, it shows that things are not going quite well with them. However, there is the fact which we must look in the face. The two systems cannot exist together in this country for long. If you are going to have Government ownership in the country, you cannot have private ownership at the same time. So, if Government ownership is going to be a success, the C.P.R. will have to join with the rest, and then we will have the whole thing.

At 6 o'clock the Senate took recess.

The Senate resumed at 8 o'clock.

Hon. R. H. POPE: Honourable gentlemen, I believe it is customary for all who speak on this occasion to offer either congratulations or sympathy to the mover and the seconder of the Address. I know so much about the mover (Hon. Mr. Pardee), and he knows so much about me, that possibly it is better I should not say anything about him, for fear he should say what he knows about me. I am not at all disappointed, however, at the way in which he has acquitted himself on this occasion. As for the seconder (Hon. Mr. Coté), he is an entire stranger to me, and I congratulate him, as well as myself, upon being lucky enough to get into this House for ever and one day after.

The Speech from the Throne should in itself, I presume, represent something of the intentions of the Government of the day. It is customary, I believe, no matter how hard the times may be, or how difficult our position, to extend felicitations upon and thanks for the prosperity that surrounds us. I am glad to see that this Government has not neglected to do that, because, if it had, we would never have known of the splendid success which is being enjoyed and which is appreciated by everybody in this country, and it would be very unfair to us to have His Excellency come here without offering in what he had to say, some succour or relief, if not in money, at least in spirit. I join with His Excellency in saying I am glad it is no worse. I am sure he will be delighted to know that he has my sympathy and support in this matter.

The honourable gentlemen who have spoken upon this side of the House, especially my leader (Hon. Sir James Lougheed), have pictured the new form of Government. I am not going to deal with that question, honourable gentlemen. What I am going to say will be said to the gentlemen who now govern under the constitutional system under which we find ourselves placed. Whether that system is the best that could be or not, it is the actual system that we have to deal with, and if there are any shortcomings in administering the public affairs of this country, this Government is responsible for those shortcomings.

Without desiring to be extremely partizan—though I honestly confess that I am partizan—my criticism will be directed towards the Government of the day. There possibly may be some constructive features in what I have to say, but they are not mine: they are ideas inherited from people who have gone before. I say this because we are really not in a new period, so there is no reason why we should not be governed by what has been done in the past, and no originality or novelty of thought is required to deal with the issues of the day. Canada had the same issues to face after the American war, but not in the same intense degree. Transportation by land and sea in those days had not been perfected to the extent which it has been to-day, therefore our market was not so open to the world's competition as it now is. I think that any man who reflects upon the conditions of 1878 and reads the result of the elections at that time, will realize that the people of Canada on that occasion were wise when they decided upon a National Policy to protect the industries and the people of Canada. If they were wise in 1878, it does not require a great deal of acumen to see what would be wise in this present day and hour. The depreciation of currency, the low cost of labour, the ruin of Europe after the recent war, exposed our market in all directions, whether agricultural or industrial, to a competition that cannot survive under ordinary systems of protection.

The leader of the Government, in his remarks here upon this occasion, endeavoured to prove to his satisfaction and relief, I presume, that he was imitating to a certain extent the tariff of his predecessors. Imitation is the strongest feature of the Liberal party. It always has been. The Liberal party is devoid of originality. That fact has been recorded in the history of this country over and over again, and I would have been disappointed if the Finance Minister the other day, when he wanted $100,000,000, had not imitated Sir Thomas White, ex-Minister of Finance, and appealed to the people of Canada for the money. Instead of going outside for that money, which we need very badly, and bringing it in and putting it into circulation here, imitation, which I say again is a strong feature of the Liberal party, came to the front.

Then, again, they imitated, or attempted to imitate, the pre-war tariff which we had, a tariff which in my estimation never was strong enough. Some honourable gentlemen may differ with me on that, because I am an extreme protectionist and believe in a high tariff for a new country. I believe that to encourage capital to come into this country you need a high tariff and not a low revenue or free-trade organization. I do not believe that under any minimum degree of protection it is possible to restore this country to that degree of prosperity which I believe every honourable gentleman in this House wishes to see. If I were going to say anything of our American friends, I would say they were very wise. They have developed a wonder country. They have 100,000,000 people, while we have 9,000,000 people; they have wonderful trade connections; but I would say to them for their benefit that if I had my way we would give them tariff for tariff as they have given us. We are both on the same continent; we own half and they own half—and permit me to say that we have the bigger half, and I consider that we have the better half. I really believe it. We have a vigorous climate which produces a vigorous people; we have not the southern climate that weakens them. In proof of this, see how the Americans are always asking for our young men to go over there and take positions of confidence in matters of business.

Then, as to the mineral resources of this country. I do not think there is anything to compare with them, but I do not think that our Governments have realized their possibilities. For every acre of agricultural land we have several acres of minerals, forests and fisheries. I think you will agree with me, honourable gentlemen, that the policy of Canada has not been broadly Canadian in that respect, and that whenever we have seen fit to go to these natural resources and dig out of the ground these minerals—be it asbestos or copper or nickel or something else—or to go to the forests and hew down what nature has grown through centuries, we have not adopted a policy that has encouraged the industrial development that should be associated with the removal of these things from nature. Our nickel has gone forth and other nations have supplied the labour; the same is true of our asbestos, and, to a large extent of the products of our forests. In my humble opinion, we have failed as a people to appreciate the value of the complete development and manufacture of these things that nature has given to us. For this reason and some others, we have to-day on the northern half of this continent ten millions of people, whilst in the country to the south of us they have one hundred and ten millions of people, amongst whom I regret to say they have probably as many people who ought to be Canadians as we have in this country who are Canadians.

Now, as we approach the result the Great War has imposed upon us, a debt of three billion dollars, it becomes us to be more scrutinizing and more critical of the policy we shall pursue in order that we may meet conditions. Not only have we that national necessity imposed upon us by the Great War, but we have also imposed upon us the result of the folly of the Government under Sir Wilfrid Laurier, which undertook the construction of two transcontinental lines, both of which, unfortunately for that Government and more unfortunately still for the people of Canada, have proven to be failures in regard to sustaining themselves. Those railroads imposed upon the people of Canada a most extraordinary burden at a time when, in order to provide the necessary money to protect our liberty and the liberty of the Empire to which we belong, we had enough to confront us. Because of the mongrelization of the present Administration, I suppose there are some who would object to that.

We are promised in the Speech from the Throne a reduction of taxation; we are also promised a tampering with the tariff. Evidently somebody has left that Administration since last year. In order that I may be well understood, I must quote what was said by the present Minister of Finance, who is unfortunately indisposed:

> There is a thought which does not receive as much consideration as I think sometimes it should be given in public discussions, and that is the desirability of something like tariff stability. Business men do not like to be always threatened with changes in the tariff. It is desirable that something like an assurance of tariff stability should be given to business men. Such assurances are very desirable, for no business man would care to enter upon enterprises which may be brought into peril by frequent tariff changes. I think the country should be content to accept the tariff as it stands as one as fair and reasonable as can be prepared under all the circumstances, and business men should be able to carry on their various enterprises without the fear of being soon disturbed by further changes.

It is hard to realize, honourable gentlemen, that these remarks were made by the present Minister of Finance only a year ago; yet we read in the Speech from the Throne that there is to be a disturbance of the tariff and duties are to be reconsidered, This Government must imagine that the people of Canada have an extremely short memory. I admit freely that the people are agitated and that their viewpoints change more quickly than they used to do. There is not so much of the Family Compact as there was at one time, either on one side or on the other. Still, to expect us to forget those remarks in a single year is to expect too much. I think that what His Excellency was asked to state is an imposition on our intelligence.

The tariff that we had prior to the war, the depreciation of currency and the lowering of wages in Europe—the tariff previous to all the changes in conditions caused by the war—is to-day no protection for the industries and the people of Canada. Permit me to say that in my humble opinion there is not a line of encouragement in that tariff. You cannot maintain industries and business in Canada and develop this country as it ought to be developed, under even the tariff left by the Conservative party ten or twelve years ago. We must be prepared to meet the new conditions as they exist.

We have seen during the last year a development that has caused enormous loss to this country. I refer to the exodus of native-born Canadians. I notice that in a record published at Washington it is stated that there had been counted at the boundary line 208,000 Canadians, who had paid their $8 a piece entrance tax, or whatever it is called, for entering the United States of America. I think honourable gentlemen will agree that if 208,000 people qualified under those conditions, it is not too much to say that 500,000 people who should be in Canada have left Canada during the past year.

Think of the economic aspect of this matter. A child is born in this country and is reared to manhood or womanhood. Think of the cost of education, care, clothing and all that. When our children arrive at a stage of usefulness, 21 to 30 years of age, we lose them. Think of the big school houses that have been opened in the country districts in all the provinces of Canada, for the purpose of educating people who leave this country and go to the United States of America. Much has been said in this House by the honourable gentlemen who have preceded me with reference to the economic situation. I know of nothing that affects the economic situation and the future of Canada so seriously as the exodus of our citizenship. It is bad enough to bring people here, from England or other parts of Europe—selected people, if you like—and to lose them afterwards. It is only after all, a matter of a few dollars and cents to bring them across the Atlantic and to see that after remaining here a few months they find their way across to the United States. We regret that; we should regret it; but what is more to be deplored is the fact that native-born Canadians grown to manhood or womanhood under the conditions I have mentioned, of education and all the rest, leave their families who have lived in this country for the last century more or less. The policy prevailing in this country does not give them the means of earning their bread and butter in the land of their birth. Let me say to this Government that it is their duty to recognize this appeal, not from me, but from the numbers who have left Canada and crossed the border line to the United States and become citizens of a foreign country. I know of nothing that appeals to me so much as that. You may speak of the export of cattle, sheep, and other products, or of our imports—which I will deal with briefly in a few moments—but what are they in comparison with the exportation of living persons, full of youth and vigour, from Canada to a foreign country? Surely there must be something wrong in all this. Surely these facts mean more to us than the millions of dollars of taxes, however severe may be the burden of taxation we have to bear. We must bow our heads in shame—ay, in shame, honourable gentlemen—that we have not the courage or the ingenuity, or that we have not a Government who will inaugurate a strong national Canadian policy, to keep the boys and girls of Canada at home in the land of their birth. To me figures of exports and imports mean little, but the exportation of those people means everything. I say to this Government of the day, as I said to them a year ago in this House, come down with your policy; come down with your big Canadian policy; submit it to the Parliament of Canada; and if they turn you down go to the people of Canada with it. They have failed to do so. Instead, we see this shuffling of the cards on the political table. We have seen strong men like Fielding worked to death. We have seen Sir Lomer Gouin leave the Cabinet. It is said he is in ill health. I do not know. Any man who puts his finger upon the policy of the centres of great vitality in Canada—at least, they should be centres of great vitality, they are centres of wealth—knows full well what the condition is. I venture to say to you that there is somebody who was sitting over there today, from the city of Montreal, who will move from one position to another. There will be others to follow, far and wide in this Canada of ours. Why do they hesitate? Why do they linger? Why do they, before our faces, make deals with the Progressive organization, so called, from Alberta, Saskatchewan, Ontario, or wherever it may be from? Is Canada to be governed, not by policy, but by blocs—by specimens of this and that, gathered together—and are our great interests to be temporized with for the sake of anybody drawing the salary of a Minister of the Crown? Surely the time has arrived, honourable gentlemen, when this Government should appreciate the fact that Canada is suffering a great loss.

We hear it said by the Prime Minister that Canadians are returning from the United States. It is not for me to speak of the intelligence of the Prime Minister, but if I were to measure his intelligence by that remark I should say that he is unfit for the position that he occupies. It is not for me to say that; but let me tell the Prime Minister of Canada that when those utterances are read along the international boundary line, in counties such as that in which I live, where people are seen day by day passing over to the United States, it will be known that those utterances of the Prime Minister are not borne out by the facts. It is impossible for me to believe, honourable gentlemen, or pretend to believe, that the Prime Minister did not know when he made that statement that it was very far from the facts. I could criticize him for the past, as he is criticized in the streets, but it is not my desire to do so. But it is my desire that he, as the head of the Government of Canada, should cease misrepresentations of fact to the people of Canada and should give us instead a strong national Canadian policy that will develop and conserve the natural resources and the industries of this country and keep our people at home.

There are many side issues in this matter. They speak of protection as a thing that is going to impose on the majority of the people of Canada a tax for the benefit of the few. I do not hold that view at all. Protection, as I understand it, is an equalization of conditions. The conditions that we have to equalize in this country are the exchange situation, cost of labour abroad, and competition in various ways. It is the equalization of those conditions in business that enable you and me to contend with the importations from outside. As to the so-called free trader, I do not know with whom he is going to free-trade, because all countries in the world, excepting ours and Great Britain, have a high tariff. And how you are going to free-trade with people who will not free-trade with you has never been explained to me since 1878, when Sir John A. Macdonald described free trade as a jug-handled policy. If we are going to approach the task of reconstruction in this country with the idea of not equalizing conditions, then I say we are wrong. They must be equalized. You must give the Canadian a chance in his own market, it makes no difference whether he is engaged in industry or in agriculture.

Looking at the figures the other day I was a little surprised to find that in the year which is about to close, and ten months of which have already passed, the imports into Canada from the outside world, in agricultural products, in meat, fish, vegetables and other foodstuffs, and that sort of thing, which we can produce in Canada, will amount to $235,000,000 or $240,000,000. Those products compete with the products of our own farms. As honourable gentlemen know, I have been a farmer all my life. I follow no other occupation than that of the agriculturist, or tiller of the soil. I have laid down this principle before, and I lay it down again, that I know of no farmer on the face of God's earth who has the same privilege of feeding the Canadian people as has the Canadian farmer, and it is protection, and protection alone, that gives him this market. When I quote this figure of $235,000,000 or $240,000,000, do the Government understand that? Do they realize that in the country to the south, one of our greatest competitors in agricultural products, the sun begins to shine earlier in the spring than it does in the north? Do they realize that products grown in the gardens of the United States come to maturity earlier than ours? Do they realize that the first harvest from those gardens comes into Canada, and by the time our garden products and other crops are ready they are taking the offscouring of those same lands in the south and sending it up here in competition with our products? I state here, honourable gentlemen, without fear of contradiction from any farmer who studies the situation and is as practical as I have been, that there is no way for this northern land to compete with the land to the south in the articles that I have just mentioned, unless it is safeguarded by a strong line of protection.

When I first came to the Parliament of Canada, thirty odd years ago, I learned, purely by accident, that Swift and Armour were about to take our markets in Canada, as they had taken the markets in New England. You know what they did there. They went to the centres that had been dealt with there as they are being dealt with in Canada, by the local butchers. In every city and town in the East, to say nothing of villages, they established a distributing centre. They sent there one man who opened up a fine shop, surpassing anything that that town or city had ever seen and they began offering to the people of Concord, New Hampshire, and of other central cities and towns in the East, meats at lower prices than they had ever offered before. In that way the local butcher was put out of business. Finally the local butcher came around to this new man and said: "How is this?" The answer was: "I can sell you meats at a price which will enable you to make money, and you will not have to have any butcher shop or place to kill cattle; you do not have to do all that dirty work; we can turn over to you carloads of sirloin, tenderloin, or anything you want, and here are our prices." He became the wholesale agent. He was really the agent of Swift and Armour, and they took possession of all the centres of industry—the cities and big towns of New England. They drove the home butcher away. Then, when they had done so, they dictated the prices that the people had to pay. As I was going to say, about thirty-three years ago they were coming into this country. I chased them from London, Hamilton, Toronto, Montreal, St. John and Halifax. I went to the man who was Prime Minister of this country, Sir John A. Macdonald, and I laid before him what I had discovered. There was then a duty of one cent a pound. What happened? At that very Session the duty was increased to 4 cents a pound. Since then it has been reduced one cent. The duties on eggs, butter, cheese, pork—all the agricultural products in Canada were put up at the same time, The Liberal party appealed for unrestricted reciprocity the next year, and got the boots beaten off them, because we had given encouragement to the farmer; we had shown him where the facts were.

What is the situation to-day? Beefsteak was worth in those days 10 or 15 cents a pound, no more. That was a lot of money. To-day, when it is from 25 to 35 cents a pound, what is a protection of 3 cents a pound on beefsteak or other meat, as compared with 4 cents when the price was 10 or 12 cents a pound? We have no protection to-day, and what is the result? Go to the big consuming centres like Montreal. In the Mount Royal Hotel, for instance, you will find the guests eating Chicago beef, not Canadian meat. A village like that in which I live is not sufficiently large to attract the American packers, and if the people are short of local meat you will find them eating western beef. But in the great centres, where meat is required in large quantities, it is worth while to buy a cargo from Chicago. Do the farmers of this country, be they in the East or the West, North or South, think it is in their interest that a policy of this kind should be pursued? Do they not honestly think that, with a tariff of 10 per cent on those meats, which is quite small enough for the present time, as compared with 3 or 4 per cent thirty years ago—that with a tariff of 10 per cent, to give them this market for themselves, there would be more money in it for them than in a little reduction on binders which they are not going to buy for four or five years? In my humble opinion, there is no comparison.

Take butter and eggs. Until a few years ago we held a supreme position in those products. What is the matter when New Zealand can send butter here to-day by the shipload to defy our competition and take the place of our own butter or reduce the sale of our own product? New Zealand as you know, has a mild climate. It has an open climate all the year round; and it is not the only country in the world that has such a climate, but it has perfected its system of manufacturing butter and other dairy products as many another country has not. So they are keen competitors in this market, be it either East or West. They land it in the city of Montreal, and in the city of Vancouver, and compete with our own people who are endeavouring to make ends meet and who, when their stock is tied up by the neck in the stable, are feeding it with the product of their summer's labour. I say that the man who is doing legitimate farming in Canada is entitled to a protection that will make it possible for him to prosper and to supply the people of Canada with their requirements in his line.

Someone has spoken of wheat. Some years we have a great deal of wheat; some years we have not. Let me say to this honourable House something that they know, but which I wish to put upon Hansard—that no country has ever become permanently successful on a single crop. I remember perfectly well the story told in the western States; that the people grew wheat till the mortgage on their property was bigger than the pile of wheat they grew. At that time they were in as bad a position as our people of the West are in to-day. I know whereof I speak. I am associated with the West in a way which keeps me in close touch with conditions. Instead of exporting my children to the United States I sent them to the West, and I know that to-day, if you have to draw your wheat any distance it costs 60 cents a bushel to put it in the cars or in the elevator, and that there is no chance to make a dollar for a living—and that is on the basis of 40 bushels to the acre, not upon 20 or 25 bushels. The only man in the West who has been able to succeed at all is the man who had a quarter section and grew crops on it, and had a neightbour who did the same thing with whom he co-operated. Instead of paying men $6 a day to work for them they worked together.

Now, what has happened? During the war there were wild prices for wheat, $2.50 a bushel or thereabouts. We had some poor crops during that time. The farmers in the West were mostly young men. The world seemed to be gay and open to them, and they may have been extravagant. I do not say they were not; I do not say they were all economists; in fact, I presume the economists were few and far between. However, these young men were Canadians, and made an effort when they saw the opportunity. But later, when the war ceased, and the tide came in, and the grasshopper made his appearance, and the blight or possibly frost or dry weather, these poor devils who had been led to believe that a single crop was the salvation of the future found themselves in the most despondent and awful circumstances. If they had been taught the lesson of mixed farming they would have had at least a portion of their livelihood left. But co-operative alliances were formed, and these men believed every story told them. They did not realize that there was a great political organization growing up under them which had not the truth in it and which had not their welfare at heart. They lent themselves to the Farmer party, or the Progressive party, whose argument was that if they had free access to the markets of the United States they would be prosperous.

Honourable gentlemen, forty years ago a lot of trouble was taken to establish the fact that in the Northwest of Canada we could grow the best quality of wheat in the world. It was proved by sample test that a bushel af Canadian wheat would make more flour and better flour than a bushel of any other wheat, with the result that independent authorities in England, which was the great consuming center for wheat, accorded us a commanding position. We felt then that we had a market for the wheat which we had to sell, and that we could go into that market and command the highest price the world had to offer. Now, what do the Progressives say? They say ship this good wheat of yours down to the United States to mix with their wheat so that the mixture can be sent to England to compete with yours, and you will get rich. That is the whole story. It sounds like a fable when you repeat it here, but it is a fact. This advice has been followed until the United States has put on a duty—which is the only friendly act on the part of the United States that I know of for a long time. Now they are going to raise the duty to 50 cents. I wish to goodness they would put it up to a dollar and let us send our wheat direct to the market that consumes it, either in the raw state or as flour. I do not care how it is done, but let us let the world know that if they want the wheat that produces the best flour in the world, the best keeping flour in any climate, it is grown in Canada and cannot be bought anywhere else; then we will get a price for the wheat that will return a reasonable compensation for its production. But we have an effort on the part of the Government to conjure with the importers from the West. We have seen the Prime Minister playing with them. We have seen the real Grit—because we have a few in this House—grin with delight at the wonderful success of this combinaiton. We have seen him shake hands with himself in the dark, and say: "Thank God, Fielding is gone, and Gouin is gone; now we are in possession of a combination that has neither principle nor national honour, and we will be able to keep in power for at least two or three years." I do not think they can go much beyond that point. So much for that.

I cannot dwell too earnestly upon what I consider to be of national value in our assets. I think my old friend Sir George Foster, who is an economist of high degree, said to-day that it would be an awful thing for Canada to draw coal from the West over the National Railways at a price that would not pay the overhead. Well, my old friend and I disagree so materially on that point that we will never be in the same tent when coal is being discussed. I know of no better use to which the National Railways can be put than to bring fuel to points of consumption either from Nova Scotia or from the prairies. I know of no better occupation for these railroads from the first of May to the first of September, a period during which they have thousands of cars and hundreds of engines idle. To my mind it is much better to keep men engaged in this work than to send them to the United States to work there. Let us relieve ourselves of the serious disability of having to depend on a foreign nation, no matter how kindly disposed it may be. We were warned last year that the time was close at hand when possibly the United States would not be able to give us more fuel, and our supply would be curtailed. If that is so, it behooves us to get ready for that day.

Every $100,000,000 that we can keep in Canada is worth more than 6 or 7 per cent. We want every dollar we can get; we never wanted money so badly as we do now. I do not remember the times of 1878 so well as some men here who are older than I am, I do not remember that period from the money point of view, but I remember it from its political history; and from what I know of it I do not believe there ever was a time when money was so urgently required for Canada as it is to-day. If instead of allowing our money and our people to go to the United States we can keep them employed here in developing our natural resources, we will make our citizens happy and comfortable; and whether that is a tariff policy, or some other kind of policy it is the only one that will make Canada worthy of the name of nationhood which has been bestowed upon her.

Some people say the western coal is soft coal. We threshed that out in this House last year. We know of the Hoppe field, and the whole of Canada knows of it. We know that it contains millions of tons of anthracite, that it is only 75 miles from a railroad, and that there is no reason why that coal should not come here. I was told the other day—I do not know whether the statement is true or not—that there has been a very favourable rate made for the carriage of products from the Pacific to the Atlantic in order to compete with water transportation via the Panama Canal. I would not like to quote the figures, because I have not been able to verify them; but if there is any such rate in existence there is no reason why we should not have the coal of the West delivered in the eastern provinces.

I do not believe any province in Canada has a greater right to national development than Alberta, with her oils, gases and coal and timber resources. I am convinced that we never had a province better qualified for industrial development, and I say it is a crime—I do not care who or what Government does it—to go amongst the people there and tell them that they have only the narrow future of growing wheat and things of that kind when nature has been so kind to them. Why, honourable gentlemen, the coal in the Hoppe area, of which I have already spoken, compares favourably, more than favourably, with the anthracite that we get from the United States. It is purer and better, and if steam coal, soft coal, friable coal from Alberta can be delivered in Ontario with some satisfaction, and it is, the same rate applied to anthracite would bring it here just about as cheaply as we can get it from anywhere. But there must be a national policy, a national spirit, to accomplish that end. We must not be governed by blocks of people called Progressive organizations or Liberal organizations.

My honourable friend who moved this Address (Hon. Mr Pardee) spoke of unity. I suppose he meant unity of Canadian sentiment. If we are going to have a unity of Canadian sentiment we must have unity of policy. We must be true to the promises of Confederation as well as other things. This Government has not been true to the people of the Marititme provinces; it has been false to the spirit of Confederation.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: That is true; it is too true.

Hon. Mr. POPE: There is no use talking of the Intercolonial as a paying proposition. It never was intended to be that; it was an offset to the canal system of Ontario and Quebec, and was agreed to at Confederation by Sir Charles Tupper. The sacredness of that pact is an inherited thing, if you like, in the sections down by the sea. They think they should have this special treatment.. They have been told of it for one or two or three generations, and if anybody, under any pretext whatever, violates the sacredness of that pact, he has not a desire for the unity of Canada. Mile after mile of non-paying road has been added by bankrupt institutions to the Intercolonial Railway, and the people of the Maritime Provinces have been told: "You must be taxed by freight rates, passenger rates, etc., until you make this whole system pay." The Government had no right under the pact to tax them to make the original system pay, let alone the addition of bankrupt roads that were added to it, and I am in full sympathy with the people of those provinces. When we realize the disturbed condition of Canada, as well as the rest of the world, we must recognize the importance of being true to the trust that has been left in our hands. It is important that we prove true to the promises and pledges given at the time of Confederation. We ought to go a long long way in the direction of establishing unity of sentiment in Canada.

Speaking of railroads, there was offered to us last year a Branch Lines Bill. It was thrown into this House in the last hours of the Session, and, without preparation, we were asked to swallow it as it was presented. Since that time I have taken the opportunity of looking into that matter, and I consider that the authority on which I speak is reliable. I want to say to the honourable leader of the Government—I am sorry he is not here, but he can read my statement, if it will do him any good—that we were not treated fairly; we were not given the information that ought to have been given us. The Government of the day did not want us to pass that Bill. I am satisfied of this now. I did not know it then. They wanted to camouflage. They wanted to impose the Bill upon the Conservative Senate of Canada, so that it might be said in the West that they had defeated it. You have read such statements over and over again. The leading Liberals sitting in that front row over there practically all voted with us, but in the newspapers throughout the length and breadth of this country you have not found that fact stated.

Hon. Mr. STANFIELD: Not in the Liberal newspapers.

Hon. Mr. POPE: That is cowardly. It is not decent. It is not courageous. It is not worthy of any Administration.

I am convinced also of this fact, that there were lines included in that Bill that had no business to be there at all, and that did not meet with the approval of the General Management of the National Railways. I am absolutely satisfied on that point. They were included in the Bill to camouflage it. There may be roads that ought to be built in the West. I do not say there are not. There may be unfinished roads that should receive our attention. Well, if the Government desire to have us attend to them, let them bring their proposals down early in the Session. There is no excuse now, because they know exactly what they are. They do not have to wait until the last minute. They can lay the proposals before us to-morrow just as well as any later day, as soon as the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne is passed. The Bill can be introduced in this Chamber. We have here a member of the Government who will introduce it for them. Then we shall have an opportunity of examining it, and if we find that there are people who are suffering from lack of transportation facilities, and who have been led to believe that those facilities would be provided, we will do our best as the Conservative Senate of Canada to see that they are treated properly. But, so far as I am concerned, if those measures are brought here at the last minute, requiring an appropriation in a lump sum, I would not only vote them out, but I would not give them one dollar of Supply until they went to the people of Canada. I would go much further and I would take all the responsbility that went with my action. This House, composed as it is, is not a body to be joked with or fooled with, or misled or deceived by any Administration. We are independent people here, and I think we are worthy of the seats we occupy. If we are, then let us be fair with all the people. Let us be fair with those people in the West. I am bound to say that a vast area was opened up there for homesteading that should not have been opened up as early as it was. Nevertheless it has been opened up, it does not matter by what Government. In opening up those lands they invited the people to go in, as they have done in the Peace River country. You cannot invite people from the four corners of the world to go in and occupy those areas without giving them reasonable transportation facilities within a reasonable time. I know that, and, so far as I am concerned personally, I am prepared to support that proposition. Let it be on reasonable, sound business grounds. Let the Government bring down to this House their proposition in this respect, and other propositions as well, in time to permit us to discuss them properly. They have no right to say that I am opposed to the proposals because I am a Conservative. As a Conservative I and the people who went before me voted to build the C. P. R., in spite of the Grits, and did everything to develop this country, in spite of the Grits. Therefore no one has a right to say now that I am not prepared to do a little for the man who lives in an isolated district out there, who was induced to go there and was placed there by the Government, whether that Government was Liberal or Conservative. That man is entitled to consideration, and permit me to say that in my humble opinion he can turn to this side of the House with a better chance of success than he can to the honourable gentlemen who sit on the other side as representing the Government of the day. That is my honest opinion.

A few honourable gentlemen on the other side voted with us last year. What prompted them to do so? I give them credit for being sincere, as we were. We must understand, honourable gentlemen, that when we expend money for branch lines we are going to increase the overhead on the National railways. Those branch lines are not going to pay the year we build them. We must be prepared for all that outlay. There must be no criticism from the honourable gentlemen over there some other day—which is not so far away—that we increased their burdens, because we do it with our eyes open. Every mile that you build of that road will have to be rebuilt in the next 15 or 20 years. We know from experience that there will be necessary re-grading, re-ballasting, re-tying and so on; therefore it will be years before the everhead will benefit by the construction of those roads.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: What about the equipment?

Hon. Mr. POPE: The equipment we have pretty well in hand.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: No, you have not.

Hon. Mr. POPE: Whatever extra equipment is required will also be a burden upon the overhead. Notwithstanding all that, I want it distinctly understood that there is at least one man sitting in the Senate who is prepared to assume all that responsibility; and I am certain that I am not alone. However, I want to do it intelligently, and I do not want the Government to try any more camouflage, as they did last year, and expect that they will receive assistance from me to remain in office, for they are not going to get it.

I notice that considerable time has been devoted by the economists—I do not belong to that class, you know—with reference to the cost of the Civil Service of Canada and the number of people employed. There is always an effort on the part of one Government to put the blame on the other party. I understand that we appointed a committee the other day to investigate this matter. I do not think it is worth the time that it takes. The people who ought to be held responsible for this situation are the Government of the day. They must accept responsibility for the fact that, in my humble opinion, we have three employees for every one that is required for the proper carrying on of affairs of this country. I firmly believe that. I know the expense is double what it ought to be. I know that we have not the efficiency that we should have, and I know that it is only the Government of the day who are responsible for that, and they must accept the responsibility. There is no use of their trying to shirk it. That will not do. Of course, during the war we increased the number of Civil Servants from, I think, 29,000 to about 50,000. That was quite natural. The last year that the Conservative Administration were in power they discharged over 8,000. There have not been 8,000 discharged during this last year—or these last two years —as there should have been. Economy is a national necessity, especially when people are being taxed as they are to-day in every direction. There is not only the Dominion taxation, but also the provincial. Nobody escapes to-day. The burden that we have to bear in that respect is tremendous; therefore we are materially interested in these ideas of economy to a degree that we never were before. And the people throughout the length and breadth of Canada are talking about them. If all I wanted was the defeat of this Government—which I do not care a snap of my finger about—I would be delighted with the conversation that is going on in the streets, blaming the Government for all the burdens which the people are bearing. Nothing would please me better. So, if my honourable friends want to avert some of that criticism, the best thing they can do is to direct their attention, as the late Government did, to a reduction in the number of employees, the bringing together of some of the Departments and the abolition of others, thereby making a bold bid for economy. If the former Administration had remained in power, instead of being defeated, to-day there would not be so many Civil Service employees paid out of the taxes of the people of Canada, nor would we have as many Departments of administration as there are to-day. My reason for thinking so is that the former Government passed a Civil Service law which was being carried out while they remained in office. However, public opinion saw fit to dismiss Hon. Mr. Meighen and his Administration and substitute the present Administration, a mongrel organization composed of peculiarities of the human family that have been produced from time to time in the various parts of Canada and grown up to manhood. They have had bestowed upon them the extreme honour of being called Ministers of the Crown, members of Parliament, and so on. Many of them are getting $4,000 a year, more money than they ever got before or ever will get again, and, in my humble opinion—with just a wink of the eye—a few other little things thrown in—a little something for the binder—a dollar here and a few cents there—that they may still be able to retain power for the next two years, to the gratification of the extreme Grit who sits in this House or in some other place. Thank you.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Bennett, the debate was adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at 3 p.m.

THE SENATE

Friday, March 7, 1924.

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

CIVIL SERVICE COMMITTEE

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would move that the names of Right Honourable Sir George Eulas Foster and Honourable D. O. L'Espérance be added to the Civil Service Committee. Sir George Foster, as he told us yesterday, was the chairman of a sub-committee of Council that worked out the reform of the Civil Service, and I think his experience will be very helpful to the Committee.

I have been told by the honourable the ex-Minister of Labour (Hon. Mr. Robertson) that he would like to be freed because he has some other special work in connection with the Senate. I would not move to have his name dropped now. If he feels that he cannot serve, he may withdraw later on.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: Honourable gentlemen, I would like to have it distinctly understood that I am not going on that Committee if it is a condition that my colleague, Senator Robertson, should withdraw.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Oh, no, there will be no such condition.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Before the motion is put, I would like to draw the attention of the leader of the Government to the fact that there is one province that is not represented at all on that Committee. I think it would be fitting if every province were represented.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: In conjunction with my honourable friend opposite I will examine into the matter and see if we can enlarge the Committee further.

The motion was agreed to.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech on the opening of the Session, and the motion of Hon. Mr. Pardee for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. W. H. BENNETT: Honourable gentlemen, in rising to continue the debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, it is my pleasure to associate myself with the kindly references that have been made to the mover (Hon. Mr. Pardee) and the seconder (Hon. Mr. Coté). The House naturally expected an incisive speech from the honourable the mover, known as he has been not only in the House of Commons but in the Provincial Legislature as well; and it was not disappointed. As to the seconder, I welcome him very heartily to the Senate. I heard it once wittily remarked by an honourable gentleman who has a seat in this House that the Senate of Canada was not only the greatest club in Canada but had the longest waiting list. Whether that be so or not, one can always consider that it is a desirable thing to become a member of this body. The honourable gentleman, having lived in the West for a number of years, and having followed his profession as a land surveyor, will be able on many occasions, no doubt, to give the House first-hand information on many projects in regard to that section of the country which come before this House for discussion.

We have had a Speech placed before us by His Excellency, which might well be described in the words of Euclid as length without breadth. It certainly has length, but very little can be said for it as to its breadth. I must congratulate the leader of the Government in this Chamber on the fact that he has certainly devoted himself to an endeavour to defend his Government at a time and on an occasion when the country is asking for an explanation and a defence from the Government, because his remarks in the main have been addressed to the trade and commerce and tariff policy of the Government of the day.

So long as I can remember, from the memorable time of 1878, the tariff question has always been a burning issue in this country. There has been a well-defined line of cleavage between the two parties from 1878 on. It is true that while the so-called Liberal party made certain professions when in opposition, they adopted—and it was for the good of the country—the policy of their opponents in the main when they attained power. For this reason the country had a fair measure of prosperity.

Consequent upon the Great War, a time arrived in Canada when men should have devoted more than ordinary attention to what was to be done in the future. During that time the party at present in power had an opportunity of seeing what was going on throughout the world. European countries were generally increasing their tariffs, and our neighbour to the south, our greatest rival in trade, increased its tariff in a way in which it had never done before. What did the Liberal party do during that time to make provision for the aftermath of the war? Was it not to be expected that thousands of men would come back from Europe, and that many of them would be out of work? Was it not to be learned that after the war production would be cut down to a great extent, at least on the part of the concerns which had been manufacturing munitions of war? If there ever was a time for a Government to sit down and seriously consider what action should be taken to afford employment, it was with the advent of these gentlemen into power.

It is true that they were bound by a certain number of promises made in 1919 to reduce the tariff; but it would have been better for the country had they gone back on those promises for all time to come, as they had done for two years, rather than permit the trade of the country to slip away as it has been doing in the last few years. Yet, when we take up the Speech from the Throne, what do we find in one of the first clauses?

My Ministers are strongly of the opinion that a reduction of taxation is of first importance, and that to this end the efforts already put forth to combine strict economy in the administration of the public services with rigorous retrenchment in public expenditures, should be furthered in as many directions as may be possible.

On the question of economy, the present is not a time when this country should have been so anxious for economy in public expenditures had the affairs of the country been wisely conducted, because then we would have had throughout this Dominion a measure of prosperity.

How has the country been progressing in the last few years? Last year we were told by different speakers that we had had a rather low tide of affairs. Well, honourable gentlemen, is not depreciation as rampant to-day? Every week there are published in the press of this country reports from different mercantile agencies as to the number of failures that are occurring. Compare them with the lists of last year and you will find they are almost as great. And, remember, last year the press found a certain degree of consolation in the fact that the weakest mercantile and manufacturing concerns went to the wall first, just as the ripe apples fall first, and prophesied that if we would only wait for another year the question of so many failures would be a thing of the past. Yet if you take the list for last week you will find that in the two months of January and February there have been in this Dominion no less than 580 failures. It may be said that these are only ordinary country storekeepers. That is not so at all. In many cases the failures are those of large manufacturing concerns, many of which I can cite —advertised in the newspapers from time to time as selling their assets. There must be little consolation in these things for the honourable gentleman who leads this House. He must be getting a thorough awakening, because in that list of almost 600 failures no less than 205 have occurred in his own Province of Quebec. I regret to say that there has been a corresponding or even larger number in the Province of Ontario. Is it not high time, when we see this state of affairs in the country, that we should become, as at least a large number of people have become, alarmed? Yet a clause in the Speech from the Throne says:

I am glad to be able to congratulate you upon the many evidences of increased prosperity. Though the general economic situation still reflects the consequences of the World War, the records of production, trade, transportation, employment, and public finance have been uniformly increasingly favourable throughout.

These are the words of the Government in the Speech, but such facts as I have stated are staring the people of all parts of this country in the face. How idle it is to talk about this country being in a state of prosperity when people are fleeing from it as if there were a pestilence. I am not going to vouch for any particular number as showing the extent of the exodus to the United States or to any other country. Figures have been quoted here showing an average of about 17,000 a month going to the United States during the past few months; and that number not only leaving this country, but also taking the oath of allegiance in the United States, or giving notice of their intention to do so. Figures have been quoted in this and other places to show that over 400,000 people have quitted Canada in the past year.

"The state of general employment has been distinctly better." Why should it not be better in the country, even when only an ordinary amount of business is going on, after the exodus of this vast number of people from Canada? I suppose that if a person in any town or village in the Province of Ontario, or any other part of the country, wished to employ a man, he could doubtless find him and give him employment; but there is not a great number to pick from, on account of the exodus. The reason for any improvement in the state of employment is that there is a better chance for the people who are left.

That is all I intend to say on the question of the trade of this country at the present time.

It is all very well for honourable gentlemen to refer, as I have heard them do, to the earnings of the railways. What has this Government had to do with that? Did it produce the sun that shone on the great wheat crop in the Northwest, or did they increase it? Not one bit. The energy and thrift of the people there produced that crop, and that is not at all due to any action on the part of this Government.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I claimed no credit for the crop.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: No, not for the crop. The crops that the honourable gentleman has been trying to gather were different crops, and he cannot claim much credit in regard to those. I will refer to them later. On top of this vast exodus of the people, and the depression existing, as it does, honourable gentlemen say that now they are beginning a reign of economy in this country. Well, actions speak louder than words. It is true that they are startling many girls and other clerks in the Civil Service to-day with the threat that their heads are going to be cut off. Everybody knew that the Civil Service was overmanned. But how have these honourable gentlemen dealt with that situation? They knew that with the ending of the war a large number of these clerks could have been dispensed with. Two years ago they had an opportunity to dispense with them. Why did they not go about it then—pay them a couple of month's salary as a bonus, as they are talking about doing to-day, and dispense with their services, and even give them an opportunity of going to the United States if they wished? There are a great many things that they might better have done in those two years than at present, when they are starting this wild raid on the Civil Service, with the intention, as they state of reducing Civil Service expenditure. This Government came into power pledged above all things to a policy of retrenchment. It is true that during the war heavier duties devolved upon Ministers; but one of the things that honourable gentlemen opposite have always cried out against was the large number of Ministers. Yet, although two years have passed away, they are not uniting departments and in that way getting rid of the surplus number—two, three or even more Ministers of the Crown. Go where you will, over this province or any other province, and you will see evidences of the reckless expenditures this Government have entered upon.

Let me give just one instance that occurs to me regarding my own riding. A Government boat happened to be lost in the seas on the upper lakes. A new boat was wanted. It was not absolutely necessary; there was no particular need for it. But the cloven hand of the politician came in. The sum of $100,000 was voted to replace that boat. What happened? Although it was not necessary at all, a boat was purchased which is unfit for the work—purchased of course from a political friend of the Government, without any advertisement calling for a boat that would be fit for the purpose. No attempt was made to obtain a vessel that would be suitable.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: What is the name of that boat?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: The honourable gentleman will hear of it very soon in the Public Accounts Committee, and a little relish will be added to the affair by the fact that the gentleman who sold it never owned a boat before, and the only qualification he had for any political cleverness or business acumen was the fact that he was a Home Bank director. The boat is called the Murray Stewart. I say that had that boat been put up at public auction in the city of St. John, where it was for months, and an effort been made to sell it, the boat would never have brought $40,000; and yet, without competition, there is handed over the sum of $80,000—to whom? A political friend of this Government. And the honourable gentleman will find that the trail leads from this Government to the Home Bank in other affairs.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: It is the pork barrel again.

Hon Mr. BENNETT: It will be found in the Public Accounts. I might have added that I think several thousand dollars have since been added to the cost, on account of repairs. I know that the boat was held up at Midland for some months, and was having several thousand dollars worth of repairs put on her.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: What department bought it?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: The Marine and Fisheries, of course. What other department would be expected to be having reckless expenditures—except its twin brother Public Works Department?

Now let us look at the Public Works Department. Here, right under the guns, what do we see going on? Any honourable gentleman who walks down Wellington Street can see an area of nearly one-third of a mile in length of buildings and if he asks to whom this property belongs, he is at once told, "It belongs to the Dominion Government." "These vacant shops—these brick buildings?" "Yes. the Dominion Government." And what has happened here within the past few months? A couple of political hangers-on have a building down near Sussex Street, and the Government, although they have one-third of a mile of frontage on Wellington, consisting mostly of vacant shops, go down to a street off Sussex—George Street is the name, I am reminded—to purchase there from a couple of political friends, on the eve of the Halifax election, a certain property for no less a price than 120 odd thousand dollars. I ask the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) what they are going to do with that property. All he can answer is, "God knows," because nobody else knows what they are going to do with it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: What is the name of that building, or the name of the vendor?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: The building belonged to a man named Labelle—or Labelle & Boulay. It was at one time known as the Ottawa Wine Vaults. That building to-day, I am told, is not assessed for over $40,000 by the city of Ottawa, a city in which assessments run high.

And commission? Why, the country has been pestered to death with commissions. At $20, $30, $50 a day, politicians are engaged on commissions on which thousands of dollars are being expended and by which practically no results are attained. There was a laughable event in Western Ontario last summer, when a prominent Ottawa politician, wishing to sojourn at his summer residence in that part of the country, was holding court with the Indians in the district of Brantford. He had a commission of inquiry concerning the Indians there, and it continued week after week. I suppose that when the Bill is presented it will be found that several thousands of dollars have been expended in that respect.

Talk about letting a few girls out of the Service. Why, these Ministers have become so high and lordly as they roll around the city in their automobiles that they cannot notice at all what is going on. It is all very well to talk about economy. We are told that they want to economize; that here in the city of Ottawa there have been for years a useless expenditure by the late Government in respect to hiring buildings. But it is well known, and it has been stated in the public press, that they recently rented three flats in the Jackson building on Bank Street. As for private cars, there never was a time when private cars were run so much as they are at present by these honourable gentlemen, and the excuse given for it by the First Minister the other day was that they wanted to learn something about what was going on in the country.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: They could not travel in an ordinary car.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: There is no doubt they have been moving around.

Now, let this farcical talk of economy cease. Economy of that kind is not economy at all, and in nine cases out of ten it is done for no other purpose than political leverage. The Government of the day stands in this position, that three Ministers of the Crown have strong charges preferred against them. One case I will refer to—that of Mr. Sinclair, Minister for Prince Edward Island. That is a case of expenditure by the Crown. Is it a matter of credit to Canada that a Minister of the Crown to-day sits in the councils of the mighty while his close associate is behind prison bars over in England? That is true, and the public press repeats it to-day. I could not do better perhaps than read the letter of Mr. Larkin in that respect, because I think it should be published more widely than it is. What were the circumstances? Mr. Sinclair secured the assent of this Government to pay for the services of a man named Mitchell who was going over to the Old Country to act as agent for Prince Edward Island. Remember, the Province of Prince Edward Island had refused to have anything to do with that man in the matter of payment of his expenses, but his expenses are paid by the Dominion Government. At once his action over there attracted attention. The man was going about offering land in Prince Edward Island for sale, and extolling it in great fashion, making all kinds of promises, as the people innocently believed, on behalf of the Province from which he had come. His conduct was of such a nature that, to use the words of Mr. Larkin, the High Commissioner himself:

> I am afraid Mr. Mitchell is a bad lot. He refused to come over and see me, and there is no doubt that he is continually selling these lots, on which, as you point out, no man can make a living.

"I have therefore had him stopped," and so on.

> I feel that personally, my skirts are clear, because I reported to the Honourable Charles Stewart, after seeing Mr. Mitchell, that I had a very poor opinion of the appointee.

Who is Mr. Stewart? The Minister of the Interior. Here is the fair fame and reputation of Canada involved, and, worse than that, the money of Canada is taken to send a man over there on behalf of certain political friends who own the land that was being sold, as Mr. Larkin says in his letter, at extortionate prices.

This Government cannot humbug the people by making believe that they are either practising economy or carrying out any particular principle. They have been tried in the balance in the last few months, and with very poor results. They went down to the city of Halifax and opened it. The whole strength of the Government was there, from one end of the Province of Nova Scotia to the other, and from adjoining provinces as well. Minister after Minister went to the constituency, in which the Government had had a majority of 5,000 only a few months before, and they were routed there, horse, foot and artillery, by the indigation of the people of Halifax. Yet these honourable gentlemn will not take a hint. They will not believe that the people of this country are so disgusted with them that they want a general election, to put an end to their sufferings.

There was another election, a more redoubtable one and the result is a bitter pill for the honourable leader of this House. That was the election held in Kent, New Brunswick. The honourable gentleman could not have believed that the Government could be defeated in a riding which had a large French Canadian or Acadian vote. The Government's chief organizer, the honourable Senator from Vaudreuil, was there with the rest of them. The present Minister of Justice was there; also the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who was not Minister at that time. Oh, what a fall was there! A majoritiy of about 1,500 was turned into a minority of 208. That should be sufficient to convince this Government. If honourable gentlemen would like to contest an election in the Province of Ontario, I would suggest that they open a constituency there. There is to-day a vacancy in the Senate for a German representative to succeed the late Senator Ratz. The gentleman who is entitled in all fairness to the appointment is Mr. Euler, member of the House of Commons for North Waterloo. I would like to see the honourable gentlemen open the constituency of North Waterloo by the appointment of Mr. Euler, a very capable gentleman, to the Senate. They know what would be the result.

What is the reason for the feeling that prevails against this Government? It is due to the fact that they came into power at a time when every possible effort should have been made and every influence exerted to put the country in order, first, in regard to economy, and, next, in regard to the administration of the country and the tariff. Since that time what have they done? They have been confronted with the condition—and they are confronted with it to-day in a worse manner than they were last year—that they have not a clear majority in the House of Commons. To-day, if there was a measure of strength of those elected, those elected to oppose the Government would outnumber them by two votes. And here is this exhibition of truckling and trading so that they may maintain themselves in power, and all this truckling and trading is done at the cost and expense of the manufacturers of this country. I am not going to read the pledges which these gentlemen made in September of 1919, because they have been read and reread; but I do say that it is only fair to place a word on Hansard of a statement made last year by the then Finance Minister. I have here under my hand a statement of the Hon. Mr. Fielding, which has been read once or twice:

Hon. Mr. BENNETT.

I think the country should be content to accept the tariff as it stands as one as fair and reasonable as can be prepared under all the circumstances, and business men should be able to carry on their various enterprises without the fear of being soon disturbed by further changes.

That was the statement made by Mr. Fielding in the House of Commons last year, the then and present Finance Minister of Canada. But unfortunately certain things have happened, and we all regret the absence, and particularly the cause of the absence, of Mr. Fielding from the House. Circumstances have arisen since then, and Mr. Fielding is disregarded. Sir Lomer Gouin, who believed in a protective policy, has left the Government, and the result is that the Government finds itself in such a position that a vote in the House of their united opponents would put them out of power. For that reason they have started trucking and trading with the so-called Progressives in order to keep their places.

Some few months ago the country was rather startled by the pilgrimage made to Ottawa by Mr. Crerar, who is a member of the House, accompanied by Mr. Dunning, the Premier of Saskatchewan. There has been an explanation given as to why these two gentlemen were here, but everybody knows they were here on a political mission—to see whether or not they could deliver the Progressive vote into the hands of the Government. There was no shamming about it. It was done in the open market—truckling and trading, selling place and position. The question of how many Cabinet positions they were to have was discussed, but something overturned the negotiations. The fact was that Mr. Crerar and Mr. Dunning found that they could not deliver the Progressives into the hands of the Government, so these two gentlemen had to go back without portfolios, empty-handed, and now they are starting a line of campaign to buttress the position the Government is taking in tampering with the tariff. The manner in which that is being done is political and nothing else, because the Saskatchewan Legislature, which is now in session, passed a resolution the other day asking the Dominion Government to frame a reduced tariff along the line of the principal articles to food and a carefully selected list of implements and machinery of production, and building materials, and that such should be free from customs duty as well as raw materials entering into them. Then by an amendment this was made to read:

Wheat, wheat flour and all products of wheat; the principal articles of food; farm implements and machinery; farm tractors, mining, flour and sawmill machinery and repair parts thereof; rough and partly dressed lumber; gasoline; illuminating and lubricating fuel oils; nets, net twines, fishermen's equipments; cements and fertilizers should be free from customs duty as well as raw material entering into same.

Anyone in his sober senses can easily see why this resolution was passed. It was passed because the Saskatchewan Government had been felt out, and they were going to try to buttress the Government with the assent of the Legislature of the province of Saskatchewan to that resolution.

It is true that nothing has been said in the Speech from the Throne in regard to it, or in the speeches made so far, except the attacks upon the agricultural implement industry of this country. There may be reasons for that, but the only reason I can see to-day for the Government attacking the agricultural implement industry is that the factories in the main are situated in the province of Ontario. This onslaught upon the agricultural implement industry of this country is simply a political attack. The city of Brantford has a representative in the House, who, if he had any sense of honour, would resign his place in protest against the action of the Government if they reduce the duty on implements—why? Because during the election the present Premier visited Brantford and said there would be no reduction in the tariff on implements, and the honourable member for Brantford won his seat on the pledge that the duty on implements would stand. Now the honourable gentleman and his friends know that they cannot possibly win Brantford at the next election, so it has gone into the discard. They know that the great agricultural implement works there have been practically closed for the last year, so Brantford is to be placed in limbo.

What would the Government think if their actions affected any manufacturing interests in Toronto? They do not care a snap of the finger what happens in Toronto, because they will not have candidates in that city, and, if they do, they will be defeated, as they always have been defeated, by thousands of votes. Then go to Hamilton. Will they promote a contest there, where the International Harvester works are?

But the province of Quebec has no agricultural implement concerns, and therefore they think they are safe in Quebec so long as they confine their attack along those lines, to the province of Ontario. The boot and shoe industry will not be attacked: Sir Lomer Gouin promised that at a dinner given to the manufacturers a year or so ago. He spoke on what was to be done there. I am not advocating that that industry should not be attacked—not for a moment—or that any other industry should be attacked, because I believe that the tariff of this country should be raised in many respects in retaliation against the tariff of the United States.

What shall I say of that thriving industry, the cotton industry? Is it to be attacked? An industry making large profits and issuing new stock and giving presents to stockholders? Cotton is an article that is required by the masses of the people. No, sir, it is perfectly safe as long as it has behind it as a director in one of the largest concerns the protecting arm of a prominent Minister of this Cabinet.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend realizes, and I think he will admit, that the cotton industry had to bear two increases in the British preference, and did not wince.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: All I can say is that I think that if my honourable friend had been sitting as a director of a large agricultural implement concern in this country, instead of a director in the cotton industry, he probably would have been able to exert such influence that the agricultural implement industry would not have been affected.

It is all in the game. It is a game of politics with this Government. I am not imputing anything wrong to the honourable gentleman. He is inspired by the motto, "Sauve qui peut"—everybody save himself. That is what this Government is trying to do.

Why does not this Government attack the woollen industry? Not that I am advocating that that should be done, for I think that that industry should be protected; but the honourable gentlemen are interested, and the province of Quebec is interested largely, in that line of goods. In my opinion, the tariff is not high enough. I agree with everything that was said by my honourable friend from De Lanaudière (Hon. Mr. Casgrain) last night, that the woollen industry should be assisted, because there have been failures, and heavy failures.

Why is not the automobile industry attacked? Are automobiles necessary? Are the limousines of the Ministers and of the wealthy people of this country necessities? What are automobiles? They are articles of pleasure in very many cases. Why do they not attack the automobile industry?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend will realize that the automobile industry has been very heavily taxed.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I do not know what the honourable gentleman means, unless he means heavily protected.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Oh, no. I say heavily taxed.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: The fact of the matter is that these gentlemen are to-day making a political tariff, looking out for certain ridings in Ontario which were won by certain promises made to the automobile people, and the honourable gentleman knows it. He knows also that during the last two Sessions, when the tariff was attacked, they did not dare to interfere with the tariff on automobiles to any extent, because they were thankful for the favours they had received.

Mr. Kennedy had been elected in North Essex, and was the member. The Government had won there aided by the automobile industry in the county of Kent, as they did in the county of Ontario. While honourable gentlemen properly measure up their political chances in Brantford, Hamilton and Toronto, and are sacrificing the agricultural implement interests, they are taking good care that they do not sacrifice the automobile people. I wish to be taken as saying that the agriculturists after the war should have had the tariff raised for the benefit of the agriculturists. If there is one thing about the tariff that is a crying shame, it is the fact that while the United States is smiting us in every conceivable way in regard to agricultural products, this Government is making no attempt to retaliate. If honourable gentlemen who come from the province of Ontario have any knowledge of the state of affairs there, if they read Bradstreet's and Dun-Wiman's reports and see the long list of chattel mortgages filed by farmers, they will be impelled to ask the reason why. It is, in the first place, because the home market has been affected, and, in the second place, because of unfair competition against the Canadian producer by the American farmer.

Now, what is this agricultural implement industry? The agricultural implement industry is a large one. It is stated that $100,000,000 are invested in it, and that 30,000 workers are employed in it, so that on an average of five persons to a family that means there were 150,000 people dependent on it. Well, I suppose honourable gentlemen do not mind whether the 150,000 people connected with the agricultural implement industry live in Canada or not. As far as they are concerned, they may go with the other three or four hundred thousand, and honourable gentlemen will be the gainers politically. But this industry has special claims on the Government, because during the general election Mr. Mackenzie King visited the city of Brantford and gave a specific promise that if he was returned to power no legitimate industry in Canada would suffer any injury. I take that statement from the Brantford Liberal paper. Yet only last night there was a mass meeting in the city of Brantford protesting against this Government interfering with the agricultural implement industry. If there ever was a time in the history of the agricultural implement industry when it should not be attacked, that time is now; and I will tell you why. From time to time the protective duty on agricultural implements has been decreased, until now on the major articles it is only 10 per cent. Australia, as I recollect it, has passed a high tariff against the importation into that country of agricultural implements. There was a time when there was no better market for our implement manufacturers than Australia, but now they are shut out of that market. Furthermore, our implement manufacturers had a great market in Europe. I have heard the statement made time and again that the agricultural implements exported to Europe were even greater than the local consumption. In its present distressed condition there are no buyers of agricultural implements in Europe. So why are they assailed? It is to provide political capital—that and nothing else.

Then, there is the riding of Smith's Falls. Honourable gentlemen have bid good-bye to that riding. They had a test only a few months ago in that section. I wonder whether, if Sir Lyman Jones and Senator Frost had been in this Chamber to-day—they were interested in the industry—would this change in the tariff have been made? Not at all.

Is this all part of a plan made with those gentlemen from the West? If it is a part of the plan, how much further is it going? They have thrown out in the Saskatchewan Legislature an intimation of what they expect, and when it comes down to the real tariff and the budget, what are we to have? Is the cement industry of this country to be attacked? Is the lumber industry to be attacked? Or is it confined to agricultural implements? I for one say that this is nothing more or less than political trucking and trading with the Progressives, in order to secure their support, and had it not been for that, and had the Government been independent in the House, this policy would never have been heard of.

Then, the Government take great credit for what they claim has been done in connection with the Government Railways during the past year. All I have to say to that is that no person will congratulate the Government more warmly and more heartily than I when they are deserving of congratulation, but I think there would have been much greater success if the Government had not interfered last year with the railway interests. The great grain crop of the Northwest added very materially to the profits made by the Government railways; and I think every person is in accord with the policy pursued by the Management in the main. We all hope and trust that business will be better in the coming year than it was last year; but this Government is actually militating against the chances of that railway doing a much larger business than at present. I will endeavour to prove that. For years past the cry has been that we were not carrying as we should the bulk of the grain from the Canadian Northwest; that it was being diverted to channels other than Canadian, that a large portion of the crop was going by way of Buffalo. The figures this year show that of the output of the West there have been carried to Buffalo about 117,000,000 bushels, while through Canadian channels there have been carried only 107,000,000. Why was that? The principal reason was that arbitary rates were being charged upon the Great Lakes, much higher than should have been charged, and this Government stood by and permitted these excessive charges in defiance of a statute that they themselves had passed. The House will remember that last year a commission was appointed, and thousands of dollars were expended upon its inquiry into certain grievances of shippers from the Northwest, and then there was enacted a measure which was cheerfully supported by this House. I was delighted to see it passed. It provided that any persons or transportation companies carrying grain at high rates should be tried before a board. But this Government stood aside and allowed vesselmen to charge what they pleased. The result was that in the spring of the year, and during the summer, grain was carried on the Great Lakes, in open defiance of the law, at rates nearly twice as high as had been charged before. What has the Government to say to that? Furthermore, while high rates were charged for the carrying of grain from Fort William to Lake Huron and Georgian Bay, the rate charged from Duluth to Buffalo was 2½ cents a bushel and the rate from Port Arthur to Buffalo 4¾ cents. Now, I ask the Minister to answer me this question: does he think it was right, when American vessels from Duluth to Buffalo were charging 2½ cents a bushel, that Canadiain vessels—or American vessels either—should charge 4¾ cents from Port Arthur to Buffalo? The Government should have enforced the law. Why were the Canadian vessels charging almost twice as much for the same distance?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: In what month was that?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I refer to the 19th of September. These are the quotations for that date.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: 1923?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Yes, 1923. On the 27th of September, 1923, the quotations given were: Duluth to Port Colborne, 3 cents; Fort William to Buffalo, 5½ cents. Why was the Canadian shipper being mulcted by 2½ cents a bushel? September 13th—Fort William to Buffalo, 5½ cents; Duluth to Buffalo, 3 cents a bushel.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Has my honourable friend the rates from Duluth or Port Arthur to Georgian Bay ports?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I may have some of those. However, the rates to the Georgian Bay ports should have been much less, because a vessel could make three trips to Georgian Bay ports as against two by other routes. But here is the most striking feature. The trade between Fort William and the lake ports is restricted to Canadian vessels. American vessels could not ply in that trade, otherwise they would be contravening the coasting laws. Yet Canadian vessel men were allowed, in defiance of the law, to charge 5 or 6 cents a bushel. Mark you, the rates always increase as the season approaches late November, yet from Fort William to Buffalo the rate was 4 cents a bushel, and wheat was being stored for the winter in the vessels. This Government stand idly by and see the hard-pressed farmer of the West obliged to pay a rate considerably higher in the spring and early summer. Why did the Government allow that? Because they were afraid to enforce the law that they had placed on the Statute Book. Had it not been for their failure in this respect, a vastly increased quantity of grain, I believe, would have gone through the Georgian Bay ports. That was a matter of importance. It is all very well for honourable gentlemen to give as a reason for not enforcing the law that American vessels could not be had. There were American vessels in the trade, but it was not fair to expect, when the law was allowed to remain in abeyance instead of being enforced as a lever to bring down rates, to do otherwise than accept the rates that were offering. Had they gone over to the United States, they could not have got as much, owing to the competition there. That is one reason why more grain was not shipped last year by Georgian Bay ports. We were pleased that about 40,000,000 bushels of grain passed through the Midland elevators; there was no lack of cars and we might as well have had 60,000,000 bushels. Grain was carried to Buffalo because it could be carried there at cheaper rates than to points on the upper lakes. This question of grain-handling concerns not only the portion of the country in which I live; it concerns also the farmers of the Northwest. If the farmers of the Northwest were in such a desirable position that they need not care what are the rates by lake or rail, it would be all very well, but such is not at all the condition of the farmer of the Northwest.

I am aware that any person who rises in this House or in another place and calls attention to the depression that prevails in this country, even if he points out how it may be corrected, is going to be subjected to the cry of "blue ruin." Well, there is no good crying "peace, peace," when there is no peace; and there will be no peace in this country until those rates are rectified. This Government will not rectify them if by doing so they would interfere with the plans of their friends. The honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) surely knows as well as he sits there that the protection afforded to those vessel men in Canada last spring was exerted by the Government through the mighty influences of the Canada Steamships Company, whose creatures they are to a certain extent.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Did we not legislate against them last Session?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Certainly, you legislated against them; and there is my complaint: after placing the law on the Statute Book you failed to carry it out.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Were not the rates reduced by 50 per cent between 1923 and last autumn?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Not at all. They were increased, and I demonstrated that to the honourable gentleman by the figures I gave—and I will stand by the figures—showing that they could have had the grain carried much more cheaply. The Canada Steamships Company is a great corporation. My honourable friend from De Lanaudière (Hon Mr. Casgrain) is a director of that company. It has great influence. It could raise many troubles in the Province of Quebec. Many party friends are stockholders, large stockholders, in that company. That company wields a mighty influence, and this is the result.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It did not seem to have much influence when it was opposing our legislation last year.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: It did not worry much about your legislation, because it knew very well that even if the law was placed on the Statute Book, the moment it saw it was going to militate against the company it would never be put into force.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: And it was not.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: The company saw immediately it was not being enforced.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend knows that it is not the reason. He knows the difficulty we had in imposing our legislation on American boats.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: As for that, so long as your legislation applied in the summer time, when there was no grain transported, it had no effect on the American boats; but in the fall of the year, when the grain was largely carried, while American owners argued for the removal of certain clauses or restrictions, they were falling over each other to come in and carry that grain, on account of the high rate that prevailed on this side; because they had finished with the carrying of ore in the States, and there was not a large export of grain on the American side. That is the reason why late in the season, at the end of November, grain was carried to Buffalo for 4 cents a bushel, to be stored there all winter.

The question of the transportation of grain is a matter of great concern to the people of the Northwest. A grain inquiry has been in progress for some months past. From that inquiry what do we find? One of the most startling points is an abuse, which last year I alleged existed, and the existence of which I proved, I think, satisfactorily, namely, that it was the main endeavour of dishonest grain operators to have their grain taken through the United States, in order that they might mix it there. A report now appears in the public press, and I will quote one short clause from it. Before this investigating commission:

> The witnesses said they found the standard samples sent over to the United Kingdom comparing well with the Canadian grain received there, and many large buyers and millers complimented in every way the Canadian grades and qualities. They had, however, found some serious complaints of Canadian wheat being mixed and degraded while passing through the United States.

I compliment the Government on having that fact brought out in the inquiry, for if we are to maintain the high reputation that Canada has enjoyed for its wheat, it must be placed on the British market unadulterated, and not with a mixture of soft American wheat; and experience proves that while wheat is passing through the Buffalo elevators it is tampered with Let us stop the possibility of any trouble. Why should not the Government devote its efforts to concentrating shipments of all Canadian grain, or the greater portion of it, through Canadian channels? The Government have expended millions of dollars in Montreal to handle grain. They have three distinct lines of railway from the upper lakes to Montreal. The Government have millions of dollars worth of rolling stock. I am glad to be able to say that last year I supported in this House a recommendation asking the Government to consider the question of erecting additional elevator accommodation at the town of Midland, where I live. That policy was carried out, and the result was that, the National railways carried 40,000,000 bushels of grain to that port. All that is required there is further elevator accommodation. There is another Government elevator, with all the motive power, but with accommodation for only about 1,000,000 bushels, and I would recommend to the Government that Sir Henry Thornton and the Railway Board should be urged to increase the elevator accommodation there. One of the important results would be to prevent to a great extent the carrying of grain through Buffalo. It is a matter of importance to the farmers of the Northwest, and it is to their interest that the possibility of tampering with Canadian grain should be removed. I hope therefore that the honourable Minister will commend to his colleagues the proposition to increase the elevator accommodation at Midland.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Grain shipped by way of Hudson Bay.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: My honourable friend suggests that it may go by Hudson Bay. Well, I may tell him that this Government may find, after they have made agricultural implements free, that if the Progressives in the House of Commons go on strike they will make the Liberals vote for the completion of the Hudson Bay Railway, because it has been announced already that they are going to get the benefit of another $10,000,000 in decreased rates in the West.

The question of branch lines of railways has been raised in this House, and I intend making a few remarks upon it. I voted last year against the programme which was laid down by the Government, and if at this Session they bring down a Bill containing such objectionable terms as the Bill of last Session, I will vote against it, but, like other honourable gentlemen on this side of the House who have announced their intention, I will support any single proposition that commends itself. It has been pointed out to me that among the proposals included in the measure presented last year was one for the building of a railway in the Peace River district. I happen to know some people who have gone from my part of the country into that district, and I have heard from them at first hand of the difficulties under which they labour. The Peace River, I understand, is a splendid part of the great Northwest. Not only is it particularly suitable for grain growing, but it also affords advantages for cattle raising to a great extent, and it will gain further advantages if the transit of grain from that part of the country to the Pacific is developed. I think it is an outrage that the people of the Peace River country have not yet had the railway built. I understand that the mileage is about 200 miles.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Not quite.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: What does the honourable gentleman say?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It is 154 miles.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: All the better if it is less than 200. I understand that it was approximately 200 miles. That line should be built by the Government, and in my opinion they should bring down a Bill to provide for it at the earliest possible moment. There is an additional reason for the construction of that line: it would pass one of the best anthracite coal regions in the country.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: The Hoppe mines.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: The Hoppe mines. That is another reason for constructing the line. The farmers in that part of the country, according to what I understand, have in the past suffered severe depression, but if the line were constructed, with the amount of timber existing in that section, they could when not engaged in farming devote their time to the production of ties, telegraph poles, and that sort of thing.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: And pulpwood.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: They would have then the short route to the Pacific, of which advantage is now taken by the farmers of Alberta. The Government should devote itself to taking as much Canadian grain as possible from Buffalo. The country has an extensive system of railways and elevators on which there has been an enormous expenditure. It is therefore necessary to develop the trade by Canadian routes. The shipments by way of Vancouver are increasing. I am glad to see that Vancouver took this year about 50,000,000 bushels of grain. We should devote ourselves to taking more Canadian grain away from Buffalo to ship by Eastern Canadian ports than we have done in the past. I am told that the rate on wheat to Fort William is to-day 27 cents a bushel from Peace River, and if a railway were built into that district wheat could be shipped from there by way of Vancouver at approximately 10 cents. The cattle trade in that region could also be increased. Some doleful stories have come from that part of the country, to the effect that from 10,000 to 15,000 people have left it owing to lack of railway facilities. If this Government fails to bring down a Bill to vote the money for the construction of that line, I think they will deserve the censure of this House. And I for one am prepared to support the building of that line, having heard something about its merits and believing that it should be constructed.

I had some hopes of my honourable friend—the leader of this House. Personally I like him very much. I have always looked upon him as a member of the old school, and I thought he had some of the Liberalism of the old times that Sir Richard Cartwright and others had, which set principle first and place after—men who said, "We will stand by the ship and go down with colours flying." Cannot the honourable gentleman get some of those sentiments instilled into the other members of the Government? They are in the minority in this country, and are outraging the decencies of responsible government by holding office while in a minority. My honourable friend is part of an organization that is holding to power in this country against the will of the people; and, worse than that, it is not giving the people a chance to express themselves. I say open constituencies and give the people an opportunity. The honourgentlemen says they have opened constituencies in the province of Quebec. Well, I think they had better be careful about what they do. It is true that they selected Richelieu and re-elected a gentleman, a friend of mine, who had the prestige of being a Cabinet Minister. But the honourable gentleman knows that right in the province of Quebec there is a sighing in the mulberry trees that the Government is afraid to trust the people. It is a good principle to trust the people. When the party leaders introduced reciprocity, they said: "It is going to make a wonderful change; we will trust the people in an election." I say to honourable gentlemen, why do you not trust the people now in an election? The country is in distress; the only people who have any confidence in the Government are the members of the Government themselves.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Who is asking for an election?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: The people are.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have not heard that from the West.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: And the honourable gentleman does not want to hear it from the West. Let us engage in a contest on the merits of the case.

There is one beautiful clause in this bill of fare that appeals to me. It says:

> National unity, not less than national prosperity, depends upon the surmounting of those barriers which have tended to separate Western from Eastern Canada and to discourage permanent settlement upon the land.

National unity—that is what the country wants; and not simply between the East and the West, but all over the country, and the honourable gentleman should be one of the first to endeavour to build up national unity in this country instead of saying, "We will attack the manufacturers in the province of Ontario," as they have been attacked. National unity will not be brought about by raising these cries. There are times in one's life when one should be glad and rejoice, and I was very much entertained by reading a newspaper report a while ago which gave an account of a very jovial occasion in the city of Montreal. The honourable gentleman was present. Talk about national unity. My honourable friend was not there to promote national unity—not for one monent. True, he and his friends were suffering at the time from political reverses. They had heard the sad news of Halifax, and had suffered the anguish of knowing that they had been defeated in a French Canadian constituency in New Brunswick.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: That is Acadian.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: And that is French Canadian. They were all making merry, and there was only one fly in the ointment, and that was the annoyance of my honourable friend at something that had happened in the province of Quebec. What was it? The leader of the Opposition had been down there making a series of speeches; he had visited Sherbrooke and other industrial centers. Apparently he was making an impression on the people, and the honourable gentleman opposite, smarting under the reverses in Halifax and Kent, and fearful that the province of Quebec might be inoculated, gave vent to his feelings as follows:

For some weeks Mr. Meighen has let his voice be heard in the province of Quebec. This is his right, and it is our duty to listen to him. Mr. Meighen's chief complaint has been that the people of the province of Quebec seem to be against him personally. He asked why. He looks for reasons for this general militancy, and he attributes it to the Conscription Act. He is wrong. It may be one of the grave reasons, but there are others. I refer to his greatest sin; the one which will always be held against him by the people of the Dominion of Canada, the passing of the War Elections Act.

Senator Dandurand declared that he could not conceive of a measure more wrong, dishonest, perfidious, and evil for the country. He charges the former Government with allowing 28 voting offices to be opened in the United States for English soldiers who had served in the Canadian Army but who had never been in Canada. Votes were manipulated, he said, and distributed to suit the purposes of the Government. They were even manufactured, and it was for this reason that Mr. Meighen received his just punishment in 1921, when Quebec, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island went solid Liberal.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: And I gave the other reason—the defeat of reciprocity for the West.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: The defeat of reciprocity in the West will never be a question when an election is on in the province of Quebec; that will be dead, but it will be cries like this.

Now, I ask the honourable gentleman whether the statement is true that 28 polling places had been opened up in the United States where men from England who had never seen Canada voted.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I challenge the honourable gentleman to mention where there was one.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I wrote to the electoral officer for this country, Colonel Biggar, and asked him how many polls had been opened for the taking of votes for people who had never set their foot in Canada, and he gave me 28.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Where were they situated?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Throughout various camps in the United States, where soldiers from England were being recruited for the Canadian army.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I was astounded when I read that statement, and I made inquiries and found out differently. I was astounded to think that the honourable gentleman would make such a statement and let it go out and inflame passions and prejudices in this country. That was the object of it. The honourable gentleman could have found out that, with the approach of winter in 1918, I think it was, 5,000 young men were sent down from the province of Ontario to Texas to train for the Flying Corps, and they were the ones who voted there. Now, will the honourable gentleman be good enough to publish through the province of Quebec a retraction of his statement? They were not English soldiers who had never seen Canada. I can give him names.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend can give me those names, but I can give him others.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: And the honourable gentleman still alleges that they had never seen Canada?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Where did they come from?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: They came from Great Britain and were recruited under the Conscription Act of Great Britain. They were obliged to return to Great Britain, but they were enlisted under the Canadian flag, and because of that they were given a right under the War-time Elections Act to vote in Canada and to switch their votes wherever they pleased.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I want to tell the honourable gentleman that these men were young Canadians who had enlisted in the Flying Corps. Had they not a right to vote? Of course they had. They could not train in Ontario in the winter months, and they were taken down to Texas. The next time the honourable gentleman wants to make a statement in the province of Quebec with the object of inflaming public opinion against Mr. Meighen or anyone else, he should look well to his facts. What was the occasion? It was a jovial occasion. What was the use of introducing this attack upon Mr. Meighen?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: What was the motive?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: What was the motive? There was no motive except that the honourable gentleman knew that his party was slipping in the province of Quebec as it had slipped in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend is mistaken. I said Mr. Meighen contributed to the solid vote by the thousand—a thing never before heard of in Canada—ten, fifteen, twenty thousand majority. I said that conscription was a matter that might be debatable, but that what the province of Quebec and the other provinces objected to was that an election should be stolen by legalized robbery such as the War-times Elections Act.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT. The honourable gentleman says the Dominion election in 1917 was stolen?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Well, the honourable gentleman sat here, and his friends were here, and he had friends in the House of Commons. Why did they not have an inquiry about it? It is all very well to go down to Quebec and do as he did, but I am surprised that he did it. The bell-wether has to lead.

Honourable gentlemen are terrified to think of what is going to happen in the province of Quebec, and my honourable friend knows that this is the only reason for this truck and trade with the Progressives. We have seen what went on last year. Last year you purchased in cold blood two members of the Progressive party, and walked them across the floor. They took one man from a riding adjoining my own, Muskoka, a man who is almost ashamed to show his face in the riding to-day to the Progressives. Honourable gentlemen are afraid to trust the people, but if ever there was a time in the history of Canada when there should be an election, that time is the present, when the Government of the day is actually in a minority in the House.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Will my honourable friend permit me a question? Could this Parliament be dissolved before the Redistribution Bill is passed?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Very well, bring on your Redistribution Bill, and pass it. But I want to serve notice on the honourable gentleman that if a Redistribution Bill is brought into this House, and if the plan formulated by the Government last year for the province of Ontario is contemplated, even if it goes through the House of Commons, it will not go through here with my voice and my vote. Your party is endeavouring to do what has never been attempted before according to the plan placed before the Committee—actually to cut up a city into halves in order that you may have a party advantage. If the honourable gentleman thinks he is going to get a Bill of that kind through the House, he is badly mistaken.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It will be no gerrymander.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: If the honourable gentleman does not call that a gerrymander, to split up the city of Windsor—

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: We will see the Bill when it comes.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Your plans were laid before the Committee last year. I saw them myself through a member of the Committee. Bring on your Bill and then let the people have a chance to determine once and for all whether Parliament is to be governed by the majority or whether the whole fabric of the constitution is to be subordinated to the truckling and trading and twisting of politicians who prefer place rather than the performance of the decencies of political life.

Hon. O. TURGEON: Honourable gentlemen, I had made up my mind at the beginning of this debate to remain silent; but the remarks made by some of the honourable gentlemen who have participated in the debate have impressed upon me the necessity of directing a few remarks to some of the topics in which I am particularly concerned.

At the outset I wish to follow the excellent custom of extending my congratulations to the mover and the seconder of the Address on this occasion. For a score of years I was associated in the other House with the mover of the Address, and it was nothing new to me to listen to his impressive eloquence, which was only a repetition of many of those worthy addresses which it had been my lot and privilege to hear from him in that House. I must say that I was most pleased to hear the remarks made by the honourable the new Senator (Hon. Mr. Côté), who comes from that far-away province of Alberta, in giving us an outline of the past history of that province, together with a description of its hopes for the future I was more than pleased to hear him speak in the beautiful French language, which was an assurance to me that the French-Canadians who are now inhabiting the province of Alberta, while they have doubtlessly adopted the English language, have also retained the ability to appreciate the charms of and to express themselves in the French language.

I wish to congratulate His Excellency the Governor General and his advisers upon the Speech from the Throne, which is an inspiration to every Canadian to rise to a loftier plane than the one on which he has been dwelling since the war. It raises us to a greater contemplation, not of the past but of the future, and of the resources and possibilities of our country, a future which is certainly a most hopeful one. If we have not found ourselves as happy as we had hoped during the past years, let us contemplate the people of other nations—even of the United States, where, unfortunately, our children are going in too great numbers at present—and remember that in future they will be no more happy than the Canadian people who remained in our own country, when we give the right impetus to the development of the many resources and industries of this land, which are sufficient to support for centuries to come a population of hundreds of millions, but different measures have to be taken.

I do not agree with the policy advocated by certain honourable gentlemen, whose education and environment have been different from mine for the development and happiness of this country. I am not blaming those who are sincere protectionists and believe that by a high tariff alone can the people of Canada be made happy and prosperous. As you are aware, my training and my convictions are along the line of freedom of trade being exercised in every practicable way. In the last few years it has been practically impossible to give much impetus to free trade, but the time has now arrived when it is possible for the Government to do something in this respect. I admire the wisdom of the Government in announcing to the country, in the Speech from the Throne, its intention to provide for greater freedom of trade and greater development of the natural resources of the country —not by eliminating entirely, but by reducing as much as possible the duties on the implements of production, whether for the farmer, the fisherman, or the miner. To-day implements required by the miner are costly and the duties imposed are almost prohibitive. This policy will give encouragement to the industries engaged in production. The farmers of Canada—not only the grain growers and others in the prairie provinces, but our farmers in the East, and those in British Columbia as well, require every inducement possible if they are to remain on the farms and keep their sons and daughters there. The increase of our population engaged in production creates better markets for manufacturing and other industries in the cities. The manufacturers will improve their position, not so much by concentrating attention upon large profits on perhaps small output, as by the development of their business through the increase of rural population and the more prosperous condition of the farmer. It is better for the manufacturer to make, say, $1,000 less profit on one article, and at the same time increase their total profit by increased production and trade. Meanwhile the announcement of the intention to reduce the cost of implements of production will commend itself to all producers in the country.

There are other pronouncements in the Speech from the Throne which will certainly commend themselves to the aspirations of the Canadian people. I observe two lines which are very gratifying to me:

> Every effort will be made still further to develop the policy of Canadian trade via Canadian ports.

I notice also that a measure is to be again introduced for the building of branch lines of the Canadian National Railways. It was with much regret that I saw the Bill of last Session defeated. I have no desire to criticize the motives of those who voted against the measure, but in my judgment this branch of Parliament ought to have taken the same attitude as the House of Commons, in the interest of the country at large and of the Canadian National railways themselves. It has previously been stated, and the statement is repeated to-day, that we have too many railroads in this country. That is one of the arguments advanced not only by the Conservative members of Parliament, but also by some Liberal members on this side of the House. It has been stated that three transcontinental lines were sufficient and that, as economy was necessary, we ought not to add to those lines. It must be remembered that we have, under the management of the Canadian National Railway Board, two lines from the Atlantic to the Pacific coast, and those transcontinental lines must be properly fed if the system is to prosper and if they are to meet the necessary expenditure. They must encourage as much trade as possible, and the necessary sources of increased business for our railways are to be found only in those districts far away from the trunk lines. The purpose of constructing the proposed branch lines is to bring to the main lines the products of those different outlying districts. Without these the main lines cannot be operated at a profit, or even without loss.

It was only a few weeks before the Branch Lines Bill was brought down that this branch of Parliament had sanctioned several Bills presented on behalf of the Canadian Pacific Railway by honourable gentlemen who have great admiration for that system. Indeed, I admire it myself, and it has won the admiration of the people at large. The Canadian Pacific had asked Parliament for three-year charters to permit it to build branch lines which were necessary for the development of business on its lines. If we have such confidence in the administration of the Canadian Pacific railway—and I share this confidence with all other Canadians—if we are desirous for its success, why should we not have similar confidence in another board, responsible for the management of an even larger mileage than that of the Canadian Pacific—for 22,000 miles of railway, extending from one coast to the other? The same principle is involved. The Canadian National Board asked to be allowed to build certain branch lines during the course of three years. The Board of Management are agreed upon the desirability of constructing these branch lines, which they consider to be of advantage to the road, as well as to the populations which these proposed lines would serve. Why should we hesitate to comply with the wishes of the Board of the Canadian National railways, when we have acceded to the request of the Canadian Pacific railway? No objection was made in the Committee or in this House to the charters asked for by the Canadian Pacific, but when there came a similar request, with a similar purpose and equal hope of success, from the Canadian National railways, the property of the Canadian people, we considered that the request was not in proper form.

I for one have been in a position to judge of the necessity for the most of those branch lines. Travelling in the West during the past summer, I heard convincing arguments to prove the necessity and advantage of those proposed lines. I hope, therefore, that when the Bill comes again before Parliament, as announced in the Speech from the Throne, it will receive the favourable consideration of this branch of the Parliament.

The Directors of the Canadian Pacific railway are deserving of confidence, but have we not also on the Board of the Canadian National railways, belonging to the people, men deserving of respect and confidence? The record of Sir Henry Thornton, in the United States, In England, and as manager of our National Railways, is certainly one of which any man might be proud, and it certainly inspires the respect and confidence of every Canadian. Therefore, when the Canadian National Board, in the same manner as the Canadian Pacific, ask for a three-year charter to construct branch lines, their request ought to be granted. I for one believe it is more businesslike and more advantageous for the railway to have a period of three years in which to provide a certain mileage than to have only one year. If we voted a certain amount of money each year, there would remain only a few months in which the construction work might be proceeded with. When winter approached the construction would have to cease. Next year again we would have to vote another sum. The railway management cannot arrange their work so well when it must be done within one year as when they have three years ahead and can undertake the work that is most pressing, or most opportune, allowing the rest to stand for a year or two, distributing the work, as does the Canadian Pacific, so as to complete it in the course of three years.

The honourable gentleman who has just preceded me mentioned one particular railroad, and, while I do not agree with his general attitude on the branch lines, I must say that I agree with what he has stated in this case. I was pleased to hear him express the hope that the Peace River district, in Northern Alberta and in British Columbia, would be granted the extension of railway for which it has asked, in order that the people there may connect with the Transcontinental to Vancouver, Prince Rupert and other parts of British Columbia. The Pacific coast provides the only outlets for their products, and they cannot reach it with advantage until there is a branch line connecting the Peace River country with the main line of the Canadian National. The Peace River is one of the most promising districts in Canada, not only in regard to its wheat production, but also in regard to other agricultural products and its forest resources. I appreciate the remarks of the honourable gentleman from Simcoe Hon. Mr. Bennett), and would call the attention of this honourable House and of the Government to the advisability of granting the request.

It is certainly necessary to economize in every possible way. The Speech from the Throne promises that economy will be practised in Government administration. I agree with my right honourable friend from Ottawa (Right Hon. Sir George E. Foster) in what he stated yesterday as to the need for economy. He knows that if I do not always agree with him in his aspirations and his principles, yet I always admire him in every other way. It may be said that we have agreed to disagree once in a while. There must be economy in every respect, but, as the great French statesman Richelieu once said to Louis XIV, "L'économie ne consiste pas seulement à dépenser peu, mais à dépenser a propos"—economy does not consist only in spending little, but in spending judiciously. I believe that it is economy, with future success in view, to spend money on those branch lines, in order that the splendid results which the Board of the Canadian National railways has produced for the country may be continued. We have been able in the course of less than two years to convert a deficit of millions of dollars into a surplus of millions on operation. The efficiency of the Board is recognized by no less a person than the ex-Minister of Labour, who yesterday, or the day before, expressed his appreciation of the administration of the Canadian National railways. From my part, I have always expected that the Canadian National railways could be operated under Government ownership, or by a Board under Government control, or the people's control, as well as by a private company. I am aware that there are many people who yet fail to realize this, but it has been proven during the past year by facts and figures that it can be done, and with profit to the people of Canada. It is often said that if any railways are operated by the Government, they must all be placed under Government operation. I do not agree with that doctrine. I believe it is much better to have one system under Government control and another operated by a private company. This will mean a rivalry between the two companies; whereas if there were only private companies there might be an arrangement between them to raise rates and otherwise increase their revenue, and there would be less satisfaction to the people. On the other hand, if there were only national railways under Government ownership we might be apt to say that the Government neglected them, or used them for other purposes than in the interest of trade and for the benefit of the people.

I am pleased to know that every effort will be made still further to develop and increase the volume of Canadian trade through Canadian ports. It has always been my ambition some day to see the products of this country, from whatever part they may come, exported through Canadian ports. With that object in view the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his Minister of Finance at the time, the Hon. W. S. Fielding—whose absence from the House is deeply regretted not only by every member of Parliament but by every Canadian—when they were building the Transcontinental railway, said that when the road was completed they would make provision to extend the British preference only to importations through Canadian ports. That was a patriotic measure, and at this time it would be a great advantage to Canada, and more particularly to the railroads.

We in this country have been given by Providence a heritage which perhaps we do not sufficiently appreciate. We have an immense country extending for some four thousand miles from one ocean to another. We have ports inviting all possible trade from other nations. These ports have been placed by the hand of Providence in such a way as to facilitate the traffic of the country; but up to date we have not made a sufficient effort to direct our trade through them. And when I speak of Canadian ports, I do not mean only the port of St. John or the port of Halifax. I live many miles from St. John, and many more from Halifax. I refer to our national ports. Their prosperity means the prosperity of the country, and when I ask for the transfer of our trade to those ports I do not ask it merely because it will give work and be of benefit to the people of those towns and cities.

If, instead of letting 60 or 65 per cent of our grain trade from the West take the route to Minneapolis or Chicago, or from Port Arthur to Buffalo and thence to New York, Philadelphia and Boston, we directed all that trade through our Atlantic ports or the ports of the West which we have to-day, what a tremendous benefit it would be to the country at large. By keeping our exports from the American railroads all the money that is now paid by the farmer of the West for freights from Minneapolis to Buffalo would go into the hands of our own people, and they would be given more employment, not only in St. John and Halifax, but all along the line of the railroad in Manitoba, northern Ontario and the province of Quebec as well. This is not only a principle, but a patriotic virtue which should animate every Canadian.

No nation has been more devoted to her interests than the nation to the south of us, and I am only asking that we should imitate that nation for the benefit of Canada; and I trust that this paragraph will bring about the accomplishment of my hopes for many years, namely, that the products of Canada for export will go through Canadian ports.

The Pacific coast has a tremendous future before it. I admire the people there for their activity and energy in having succeeded in the course of a short time in bringing the products of Alberta and other parts of the West to their ports, which are open for twelve months in the year. They have, as I say, an immense future before them, and I wish them prosperity, as I wish prosperity to the eastern provinces.

It is Canadianism that we want in this country. We are not all of the East nor of the West. We are all of Canada. The great resources of this country in every direction, whether in the forests, in the lakes or in the ground, command the attention of the people of Canada, and the prosperity of one part of the country adds to the prosperity of all.

Nobody believes more firmly than I do, and have done at all times, in the prosperity of the prairie provinces. They are the feeders not only of the railroads, but of the trade of the West and of the East. When we say we will decrease the protection upon farm implements for the people of those provinces, we do so in the interests of all Canada—in the interests of the manufacturers themselves, who will produce more and sell more to the people of Canada. It will be an inspiration to the farmer to know that the manufacturer sends him these implements at the lowest possible cost. It has often been said by the farmer in the West, and with some truthfulness: "When I buy my implements from an American concern I give $200 to the coffers of Canada; but if I buy from the Canadian manufacturer I put that amount into his own private treasury." It is only when the farmer sees that the purchase of Canadian goods is to his detriment that he will buy foreign goods; otherwise he will say, whether he be in New Brunswick or in Ontario or in the West: "Let us buy of our own people."

Meanwhile, if we teach our sons and daughters to produce we will have a greater population, and our home market will be more profitable to our home industries, and will increase from year to year. It would be all very well to say that we make a big profit on shoes if the labourer in a shoe factory wanted nothing but shoes; but when he goes home and he finds he has to buy other things for himself and his family: he has to buy furniture and other products for his house: therefore it is only by the extension of these reductions on the necessities of life that the manufacturer can possibly succeed. For this reason I say that this Speech from the Throne has set the people of Canada thinking, and has instilled in them a spirit of utility.

My honourable friend who has just preceded me (Hon. Mr. Bennett), to whom I have listened with interest for a number of years, has given me inspiration in the few words he has pronounced concerning the election in Kent county in the province of New Brunswick from which I come. Yesterday and the day before, we heard the Liberal party and Sir Wilfrid Laurier blamed for having built the Transcontinental railroad, a road that cost so much, and that was idle and of no benefit, as it was said at the time. I am in a position to say that if some of the Ministers of the Government went to the election of Kent in the month of December last and came out unsuccessfully in the contest, it was due to the very fact that the Transcontinental had not yet been used to its full capacity by the Board of the Canadian National railways—although we could not expect that they would be able to do everything within such a short time. It was just because a leading representative of the Conservative party, the first lieutenant, perhaps I might say, of the right honourable the leader of the Opposition, the member for St. John, went to the county of Kent and appealed to the electors and induced them to have the vision which Sir Wilfrid Laurier had when he built the road 20 years ago in the interest not only of Quebec, Ontario and the West, but more particularly of St. John and Halifax. I am glad that some of the opponents of the Transcontinental railway have at last commenced to see the light, and are beginning to confess that when Sir Wilfrid Laurier built that road he had perhaps a greater vision of the future of Canada than any other man in this country.

I say this road is bound to become one of the great factors in the prosperity of Canada, and when I read the Speech from the Throne I took new hope. I well know that Sir Henry Thornton and his colleagues were not able to bring prosperity at once to that road. I had the honour to address Sir Henry Thornton in the city of Moncton at a large meeting of the Board of Trade, and I told him he had a task which would command all his attention, that marvels were expected of him, and that marvels alone would save the name and fame that he had acquired in other countries. At the same time I told him that the people of Canada were willing to give him time to accomplish those marvels; and I believe that what was said in this House yesterday and the day before is an expression of confidence in his administration so far, and that as time permits him to develop the trade of that road the people of the eastern provinces will be as well satisfied as those in other portions.

A great deal has been said about grain being concentrated at Portland instead of at St. John. That is no fault of mine. When the Bill for the acquisition of the Grand Trunk railway was before the other Chamber I endeavoured to the best of my ability to show that there was no necessity for acquiring that portion of the Grand Trunk between the border and Portland, and I contended that we could settle with the company. I put the Minister of Railways on his guard at that time against the operation of that line from Montreal to Portland. I told him, "If you once divert the trade through that channel it will continue to go that way." The lieutenants of the Conservative party who came to Kent county put all the responsibility for that upon the Liberal party, and I wish to have that impression rectified, not only before the people of Kent and the Maritime provinces, but before the whole people of Canada. Meanwhile I do not care so much if some grain goes to Portland, so long as every possible effort is made to divert to Canadian channels the trade now going to New York, Philadelphia and Boston which as I said, takes half the money paid for transportation from the Canadian purse and puts it into American treasuries. If shipments were made by the Transcontinental from Winnipeg to Quebec in summer, and to St. John and Halifax in winter, we would not interfere much with Portland, and the country would be satisfied. It is upon the maintenance of that trade within Canada, at Canadian ports, that I particularly insist. It may be said that St. John is so far away —much farther away from Portland than Montreal is but it is not by way of Montreal that I wish to see the grain and other products exported from the West, or imported goods shipped to the West, in winter. That trade, I think, should go through St. John and Quebec, over the Transcontinental. Any railroad man will agree that a trainload of grain can be taken in winter from Winnipeg to Quebec, over the Quebec bridge, and to St. John, as cheaply as the Canadian Pacific Railway can possibly carry grain from Winnipeg to Montreal and thence to St. John, as they do carry from 15,000,000 to 20,000,000 bushels every winter; because by the time the Canadian Pacific train of 25 or 30 cars of grain, or 40 at the most, has reached Montreal, the Canadian National train which has left Winnipeg at the same time, has already passed through Quebec, crossed to Levis, and is beyond Riviere du Loup. I say that the Canadian National can take that grain and deliver it in St. John or Halifax at greater profit than the Canadian Pacific is able to make upon its road; not only because of the reduction of 240 miles by the Transcontinental from Winnipeg to Quebec or St. John, but also because the same engine can haul on the Transcontinental double the tonnage that can be hauled on the Canadian Pacific. With the rapidity of transit as well as economy in transit, in carrying hundreds of thousands of busheds of grain there would be more profit to the railroad than could be earned by a smaller train going a distance perhaps a few miles shorter. There is a saving of labour and in winter a saving of fuel, particularly from Winnipeg to Montreal.

Therefore we have all that is needed to make our National railways a success. I am interested also in the success of the Canadian Pacific, because if it were not successful the country would suffer. Our National system, I know, has a great deal to learn from the Canadian Pacific, and I feel sure that if the Canadian Pacific had the Transcontinental line from Winnipeg to St. John in their possession, they would soon make use of it.

It has been said that the Transcontinental was built at a time of enthusiasm. It was undertaken after most careful consideration, and was approved by the people of Canada in 1904. It might be said that Sir Wilfrid Laurier appealed to the people on that issue. He appealed again in 1908, and in 1911. If he was defeated in 1911 on the issue of reciprocity with the United States, it was, I repeat emphatically, because of the great error of the majority of the people of Canada. Not only have the people of the Western Provinces suffered by that mistake, and they have undoubtedly suffered the most—but the whole of Canada has suffered, because the prosperity which the Western Provinces would have enjoyed in subsequent years would have been of great advantage to Eastern Canada as well.

The motion for the Address was agreed to.

THE LATE HON. SENATORS THORNE AND RATZ.

TRIBUTES TO THEIR MEMORY

Hon. R. DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, before the Senate adjourns I desire to refer to the loss we have sustained in the departure for a better world of two of our esteemed colleagues, Hon. Mr. Thorne and Hon. Mr. Ratz.

Hon. Mr. Thorne moved with such alacrity and ease among us that it was not apparent that he had reached so ripe an age as four score years. He had a long and useful career in the city of St. John, the capital of New Brunswick. He was very successful in business, having reached the top rung of the ladder, and enjoyed the confidence of the entire community, in which he was a leader. Hon. Mr. Thorne possessed all the qualities that win for a citizen the high esteem of the people among whom he lives. He was endowed with a sound judgment and was a most public spirited citizen. I know of men who, having the advantage of being near him, sought his advice for guidance in their own pursuits. His reputation as a sound man of business was recognized by a number of industrial and financial institutions, who called him to their councils. He had a most genial nature and made friends wherever he went. His loss will be keenly felt, not only by the citizens of St. John, but by the larger constituency of Canada. We in this Chamber admired him for his personal good qualities and his genial nature.

We are sorrowful, likewise, at the sudden demise of the Hon. Mr. Ratz. All that I have said as to our esteem for the Hon. Mr. Thorne I could appropriately repeat regarding the Hon. Mr. Ratz. He was a self-made man and made a success of the business which he established and developed in his own town. His fellow citizens showed their esteem for him by sending him as their representative to the House of Commons for a number of years. He was kind hearted and most companionable. We regret his departure and our sympathies go to his widow and children.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable gentlemen, I adopt as my own the sentiments which have been so aptly expressed by my honourable friend the Leader of the Government with reference to our two colleagues who have departed this life since last Session, and I feel that I speak on behalf of honourable gentlemen on both sides of the House.

The late Senator Thorne was a gentleman who had peculiarly endeared himself, not only to all the members of this House, but to the whole community in which he lived. It was a characteristic of our departed friend that in all his spheres of activity he might have been accepted as a leader. Within my long knowledge of men I can recall no man who possessed more of social charm or endeared himself more to those with whom he was associated, and this was due to an innate quality rather than to any effort on his part. It is no exaggeration to say that in his own community, the city of St. John, or in the entire Province of New Brunswick, or even in the larger sphere in which he moved, no one occupied a higher place in the esteem of his fellow men. Although previous to his appointment to the Senate he had not been a member of the House of Commons, yet he was easily the most dominant spirit in the political life of his province. Occupying no official position in the party in that province, he was yet the leader of the party, and his leadership was recognized by the Government that appointed him to the Senate of Canada. He was readily conceded to be the weightiest adviser in his party. The same might be said of him commercially. I know of no man who distinguished himself more in the business life of the province to which he belonged than the late Senator Thorne. He was acknowledged to be one of the commercial princes, not only of New Brunswick but of the Maritime Provinces. In whatever sphere in life he moved he easily occupied the position of a leader. We deeply mourn his departure, and those of us who knew him most intimately will mourn him most deeply. His memory will ever be cherished by us.

The late Senator Ratz, when he came to this House, had to his credit a long term of service in the House of Commons. He came here rich in experience of political life. Although he may be said to have been a silent member, he always participated actively in the business of this House. I know of few honourable gentlemen who took a more active interest in the affairs of the Senate than Mr. Ratz. He was faithful in attending the meetings of any committee to which he was appointed. Whatever duty was assigned to him he performed with a diligence and an ability that are highly creditable to his memory. The influence of this House in its dealings with public affairs is very largely made up of the knowledge and experience of honourable gentlemen of his character. They confer upon the Senate the advantage of experience gained not only in the House of Commons, but in the community in which they live.

I join with my honourable friend the Leader of the Government in his expressions of regret and sorrow. I know that I voice the sentiments of all members when I say that we mourn the departure of our two colleagues.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE SENATE

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: moved:

That when the Senate adjourns to-day it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, April 1st, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

My notice gives the date of Tuesday, March 25, which would mean a two weeks' adjournment. When I gave that notice I thought that the data requested by the Committee established for inquiry into the Civil Service would be available by the 25th of March. We learned, however, at the meeting held this morning, that the documents required from the Bureau of Statistics would not be ready before the 1st of April. As there is nothing, so far as I can see, that will reach this Chamber before that date, I am disposed, if the Senate views the matter as I do, to alter my motion to read:

That when the Senate adjourns to-day it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, April 1st, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

As I have stated, I do not know of any important matter that would reach us before that date. The Divorce Committee is empowered to sit during the recess. The other important work devolving upon this House would be the carrying on of our investigation in the Civil Service Committee, but we would gain nothing by meeting before the 1st of April, because the information on which our investigation is to be based will not be at hand before that date.

I take this opportunity to say a few words on the situation which confronts us. We are expecting legislation from the House of Commons, but it is very doubtful whether we will get any before the first of April, because the discussion on the Address in the other Chamber, usually occupies a fortnight or more, and then the Estimates for the year are brought down and work upon them is begun. As I see it, there is very little likelihood of any Bills of importance reaching us for some time.

In this connection, since it has been the habit in the other House occasionally to discuss Senate reform, I would like for a few moments to discuss House of Commons reform. We met practically on the first of March. If the procedure usually followed in the House of Commons is maintained, I foresee that this Session will last into the month of July, and may even run into August, which means that Parliament will be here during the dog-days of the summer season.

I have felt strongly that the House of Commons could well afford to amend its rules in reference to the discussion of public matters. The conditions which prevail in that House affect us to such an extent that I think the Senate is justified in discussing the situation. There are 235 members in the Commons and there will be at least 10 or 15 more after the next election; and it seems to me that a limitation should be put upon the length of the speeches delivered in that Chamber. In many other Parliaments such a limitation is imposed. It is true that the House of Commons has adopted the closure rule, but that has not seemed to limit the length of the speeches sufficiently to enable every member to be heard. In the United States Congress speeches are limited to a certain degree. I think power is given to the Speaker of the popular branch to gradually limit them as the discussion goes on. I wonder whether the leaders in the other House could not get together—and I mention particularly the Prime Minister, the Right Honourable Mr. Meighen, Mr. Forke and, if there is the nucleus of a Labour party, the leader of that party, whoever he may be—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: He is the whole party.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I wonder whether they could not get together and agree upon a regulation that could be tried this Session as an experiment. My suggestion is that on all Bills and substantive motions the first four speeches should not exceed one hour each in duration, that the eight speeches following should be limited to half an hour each, and the succeeding speeches to fifteen minutes each. If this rule were tried in the House of Commons for a Session I am convinced that it would make for a higher level of speeches in that House. Men would then prepare themselves to deal with essentials, and the speeches would have far more effect throughout the country than those which are of such great length that they cannot be read easily.

In the House of Commons in England, except on very special occasions, no man, I think, whatever his status, would dare to rise to his feet and speak for more than an hour. I believe that in most of the discussions that take place in that House the speeches do not extend beyond half an hour. Surely, if the matters which are treated there—international questions of the gravest import, or imperial questions which cover the Seven Seas—are dealt with in speeches not exceeding half an hour in length, the members of our House of Commons could by due preparation confine their remarks to essentials and save a great deal of the time that is lost in going into a thousand and one details.

I have followed the work of the British House of Commons for a number of years, and I have been astounded at the rapidity with which they cover the ground and deal with dozens of subjects in half the time that our House of Commons gives to the voting of the Address. I believe that if the speeches were restricted as suggested they would be far more effective, and that thousands of dollars would be saved to the country each Session. I have heard on all sides throughout the country complaints of the length of our Sessions. The length of the Sessions is based on the length of the speeches and the abuse of speech in the House of Commons.

I think we are interested in discussing this matter because we are here, practically the prisoners of the House of Commons, awaiting their good pleasure for the reception of their work. We are now adjourning to the first of April, and many matters will come over to this Chamber quite late in the Session. Valuable time is lost in the House of Commons during the first two months. I believe that if the leaders of the three or four parties of that House got together, as I suggest, they could save at least one month of the time of an ordinary Session, and instead of keeping us for four months, as they did last Session, they could expedite the business of the country and conclude it satisfactorily within three months.

I thought it was time for this Chamber to draw the attention of the House of Commons to our complaint, and I believe that these remarks will be received with due consideration by the members of that House. The leaders that I know in the other House are, unfortunately for me, some twenty years my junior, and as I am here surrounded by men of experience, many of whom have sat for a number of years in the House of Commons, it seems to me that our suggestions should be and will be received with good grace and will be given due consideration by that House.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend has struck a new note, namely, the reformation of the House of Commons. We have listened for so many years to proposals to reform the Senate that it is really a relief to consider for a moment the possibility of reforming the House of Commons.

It is impossible to discuss so large a subject, and one that covers so enormous a field, within five minutes; so I do not propose to enter upon any discussion of that nature; but I know of nothing more advantageous for us to do after we return from a well-spent holiday than to continue this discussion which has been raised by my honourable friend. In the meantime we can think over the many methods by which the desired end may be brought about.

There is simply this to be said, that there should be some better understanding between the two Houses of Parliament. The House of Commons proceeds to transact its business absolutely irrespective of the existence of this Chamber; it spends its time and devotes its energies to the transaction of business, regardless of the fact that there is a second Chamber or that this Chamber has to give consideration to the legislation which passes through that House from time to time. The obstacle that I see in the way of surmounting the difficulty my honourable friend has pointed out is that it is natural for Governments to exercise a peculiar strategy towards the end of the Session, and to hold back important legislation until it is too late for members of the House to discuss it. The consequence is that during the last two weeks of the Session we have placed upon the Table of the Senate the most important business of the country, without having any time to give it proper consideration. Honourable gentlemen will easily revert in their memory to what was done last Session. I think it is not an exaggeration to say that legislation involving an expenditure of a couple of hundred millions of dollars was thrown in our midst in the dying hours of the Session. It was utterly impossible to give it proper consideration, and hence it was the duty of the Senate to reject much of that legislation. For that reason the Senate has been subjected to much hostile criticism in the country, without the critics perceiving the many difficulties which confronted us.

Permit me to suggest this—and honourable gentlemen can consider it during the adjournment: could we not urge upon the House of Commons the desirability of expediting the public business by referring their Estimates to a Committee of that House, as is done in the British Parliament? We very well know that probably the greater part of the time of the House of Commons is occupied in dealing with the public Estimates. While the House of Commons is thus engaged, such legislation as we are called upon to consider cannot be dealt with. If, therefore, some provision were made for a Committee of that House to deal with the public Estimates, more of the time of the House could be given to legislation, and it would be enabled to furnish this House with measures which should and would occupy our attention, and we could avoid what I might term these unseemly adjournments that we are compelled to take from time to time.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: This matter can be brought up again, but I thought that before separating we should give the benefit of our advice, crude as it may be, to the House of Commons. I have suggested a limitation of the length of speeches; my honourable friend had added the very valuable suggestion that the Estimates be referred to a select committee of the Commons, as is done by the British House of Commons, so that while that Committee was scrutinizing the Estimates public legislation could be dealt with concurrently in the House and sent to this Chamber in time for proper consideration instead of coming to us in the last minutes of the Session.

In the United States Congress, a member who comes under the five-minutes rule, having prepared a speech which he wants his electors to read, may send it to be printed in the Congressional Record. Such a practice might perhaps be adopted by our House of Commons. It would not diminish the volume of Hansard, but it would save at least a month of the time of an ordinary Session.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: Honourable gentlemen, I would like again to make the suggestion that I made last Session, namely, that the leader of the Government should try to arrange that all private legislation should be initiated in the Senate and then be sent to the Commons. The result would be that the legislation would go through the Commons in one-third of the time that is now required.

The motion, amended as proposed, was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, April 1st, at 8 p.m.

Bill 13, an Act to amend the Fruit Act (French Version).—Hon. Mr. Dandurand.

FIRST READING

Bill 20, an Act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the Public Service for the year ending the 31st of March, 1925.—Hon. Mr. Dandurand.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, it has been the custom to pass the three readings of this Bill by general consent of the House. I am ready to proceed according to custom, but if there is any suggestion to the contrary I will abide by it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Well, say Thursday.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Very well.

CAPE BRETON LABOUR DISPUTE

INQUIRY

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. DAVID: I wish to call the attention of the honourable leader of the House, representing the Government in this House, to a report in the Montreal Star of a speech which is said to have been made at a meeting of Cape Breton miners lately by a man named McLachlan. The Star says:

> McLachlan made the firebrand speech of the meeting. He reiterated his advice to strike on the job and not give a fair day's work for a fair day's pay.
> "Every local in this district should send a telegram to President Lewis protesting against the wage contract," he declared. "You men are not bound to accept this agreement, and you should do everything in your power to break it. Wolvin will want coal in the next few weeks to fill his Montreal contracts. Then your time to get even will have arrived. Mine as little coal as possible so that your oppressors will be brought to a realization that you do not favor working under existing conditions and will not give the best that is in you until the company agrees to a contract satisfactory to men whom you yourselves elect to office."

I would like to know if that McLachlan is the same man who was released by the Government lately, and if he is, I would like to know if the Government intends to allow that dangerous man to continue to express such harmful sentiments, and if the Government does not think it proper to send him back to jail, where he should have been kept.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I suppose my honourable friend addresses that question to the Government, and I have no mandate to answer it. I would have preferred that my honourable friend had put the question on the Order Paper, and I would then have obtained an answer more authoritative than a simple expression of opinion from myself.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: I will do that.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Do it now.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I suppose my honourable friend the leader of the Government could not spare the time now to go down there and get McLachlan.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at 3 p.m.

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC TREATY

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, a message has been received from the House of Commons laying before us an agreement between His Majesty and the President of the United States on the liquor traffic, and it will come up to-morrow. I find that the Treaty has not been laid on the Table. I am now presenting it, so that it may appear in the Minutes and be before us to-morrow if we take up the matter then.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: Are there printed copies for the use of members?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I asked if it had been printed and distributed, and I am informed by the Clerk of the House that it has not been. That is why it ought to appear in our Minutes.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My right honourable friend from Ottawa (Right Hon. Sir George E. Foster) yesterday asked for certain information which, it seems to me, should be brought down before we give consideration to this subject. That information would illuminate the subject very much. If simply the bald Treaty is laid upon the Table, it furnishes to the House no information on which to base its action in so important a matter. If my honourable friend could expedite the preparation of that material it would, I think, be very much appreciated by the House and would assist us considerably in dealing with the measure.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I observe that the notice of motion given by the right honourable gentleman (Right Hon. Sir George E. Foster) covers considerable ground, and it may take some time for the Customs authorities to gather the data for this Chamber. Perhaps, when my honourable friend (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) has read the agreement between His Majesty the King and the President of the United States, he will find that we may not require that information in order to allow the United States the advantage of the right of search beyond the three-mile limit. However, we can take up that question to-morrow.

CANADIAN INDUSTRIES

INQUIRY

Hon. Mr. DAVID inquired of the Government:

Have the manufacturers of the country placed before the Government a statement showing what the different industries of the country require for their establishment, their maintenance or their progress and development?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The honourable gentleman has put a very broad question, which might be answered either in the affirmative or in the negative. If the manufacturers are considered as a body, I would answer in the negative. Individually they are in constant touch with the Department of Finance and do make representations from day to day. The Department of Finance does not fail to take notice of the declarations and statements by the President of the Association at their annual conventions, and even their monthly meetings.

CHICAGO SEWAGE CANAL

INQUIRY AND DISCUSSION

Hon. Mr. DAVID inquired of the Government:

Has the Government protested against a greater diversion of water from Lake Michigan than was allowed by the agreement passed between Canada and the United States in connection with the Chicago sewage canal and has there been correspondence between the Governments of both countries on that subject?

Is the Government informed that the Americans intend turning the Chicago sewage canal into a canal to connect the Great Lakes with the Mississippi in such a way as to lower the level of the St. Lawrence waterway, and if so, has there been exchange of correspondence between the Governments of the United States and of Canada on that subject?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The honourable gentleman has put two questions bearing on the same subject. The answer first sent to me by the Department of Marine and Fisheries to the first question was:

There has been no agreement between the Governments of Canada and the United States looking to any diversion of water from lake Michigan through the Sanitary District canal.

The answer sent by the Department to the second question was as follows:

The Government of Canada is aware that there are several bills before Congress for appropriations to build a nine-foot waterway from the west end of the Chicago Sanitary District canal to the Mississippi river, but until appropriations are made work cannot be started.

In connection with this waterway Canada has filed objections to any diversion of water from the Great Lakes.

I asked for more detailed answers to these questions and have received the following:

Referring to yours of the 20th instant on the subject of the diversion at Chicago, I beg to advise you that on the 8th of May, 1899, the then Secretary of War issued the following permit:—

"Whereas, by Section 10 of an Act of Congress approved March 3, 1899, entitled "An Act making appropriations for the construction, repair and preservation of certain public works, on rivers and harbours, and for other purposes," it is provided that it shall not be lawful to alter or modify the course, location, condition or capacity of the channel of any navigable water of the United States unless the work has been recommended by the Chief of Engineers and authorized by the Secretary of War prior to beginning the same;

"And whereas, the Sanitary District of Chicago, a municipal corporation, organized under the laws of the State of Illinois, has constructed an artificial channel from Robey street, Chicago, to Lockport, and has been heretofore granted permission by the Secretary of War to make certain improvements in the Chicago river for the purpose of correcting and regulating the cross-section of the river so as to secure a flowage capacity of 300,000 cubic feet per minute with a velocity of one and one-quarter miles an hour, it being intended to connect the said artificial channel with the west fork of the south branch of Chicago river at Robey street in the said City of Chicago.

"And whereas, the said Sanitary District of Chicago has now applied to the Secretary of War for permission to divert the waters of the said Chicago river and cause them to flow into the said artificial channel at Robey street as aforesaid.

"And whereas, the said Sanitary District of Chicago represents that such movable dams and sluice gates as are necessary to, at all times, secure absolute and complete control of the volume and velocity of flow through the Chicago river have been constructed.

"Now, therefore, the Chief of Engineers having consented thereto, this is to certify that the Secretary of War hereby gives permission to the said Sanitary District of Chicago to open the channel constructed and cause the water of Chicago river to flow into the same, subject to the following conditions:

"1. That it be distinctly understood that it is the intention of the Secretary of War to submit the questions connected with the work of the Sanitary District of Chicago to Congress for consideration and final action, and that this permit shall be subject to such action as may be taken by Congress.

"2. That if, at any time, it become apparent that the current created by such drainage works in the south and main branches of Chicago river, be unreasonably obstructive to navigation or injurious to property, the Secretary of War reserves the right to close said discharge through said channel or to modify it to such extent as may be demanded by navigation and property interests along said Chicago river and its South Branch.

"3. That the Sanitary District of Chicago must assume all responsibility for damages to property and navigation interests by reason of the introduction of a current in Chicago river."

On the 5th of December, 1901, this permit was modified in accordance with the following:

"Whereas, under date of May 8th, 1899, the Secretary of War granted permission unto the Sanitary District of Chicago to open the artificial channel from Robey street, Chicago, to Lockport, and cause the waters of Chicago river to flow into the same upon the following condition, inter alia:

"2. That if, at any time, it becomes apparent that the current created by such drainage works in the South and Main branches of Chicago river, be unreasonably obstructive to navigation or injurious to property, the Secretary of War reserves the right to close said discharge through said channel or to modify it to such extent as may be demanded by navigation and property interests, along said Chicago river and its South branch;

"And whereas, the Secretary of War subsequently directed said Sanitary District of Chicago, to regulate the discharge of water into the Chicago Drainage canal so that the maximum flow through the Chicago river shall not exceed 200,000 cubic feet per minute from midnight to 4 p.m., nor 300,000 cubic feet per minute from 4 p.m. to midnight;

"And whereas, said Sanitary District of Chicago has applied to the Secretary of War for permission to increase the flow between midnight and 4 p.m. daily, to 250,000 cubic feet per minute; and the Chief of Engineers has recommended that the increase applied for be granted, but that the rate of flow from 4 p.m. to midnight be reduced to 250,000 cubic feet per minute, so that the flow through the Chicago river shall not exceed 250,000 cubic feet per minute throughout the 24 hours of the day.

"Now therefore, this is to certify that, in accordance with the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers, the Secretary of War hereby gives unto the said Sanitary District of Chicago permission to regulate said discharge so that the maximum flow through the Chicago river shall not exceed 250,000 cubic feet per minute throughout the 24 hours of the day, upon the following conditions:

"1. That this permission shall be in lieu of the present authorized rates of flow as stated above.

"2. That the permission herein given shall be subject to such modification as in the opinion of the Secretary of War the public interests may from time to time require.

"3. That said Sanitary District of Chicago shall be responsible for all damages inflicted upon navigation interests by reason of the increase in flow herein authorized."

On the 5th of February, 1912, the Sanitary District made application to the Secretary of War for permission to withdraw 10,000 cubic feet per second from the lake. The then Secretary of War, Mr. Stimson, held a series of hearings at which Canada was represented by counsel, engineers, and various organizations from Ontario and Quebec.

The matter was very carefully considered, and the Secretary of War, on the 8th of January, 1913, rendered his decision, and in his finding he states amongst other things: "But, however that may be, and without resting my decision upon the question of my legal authority, I am quite clear as a matter of dicretion that under the facts presented by this case no further diversion of water should be permitted at Chicago without the direct sanction of the Congress of the United States." And he reached the following conclusions:

1. That the diversion of 10,000 c.f.s. from lake Michigan would substantially interfere with the navigable capacity of the navigable waters of the Great Lakes and connecting rivers.

2. That therefore, it would not be appropriate for him, without express Congressional sanction, to permit such a diversion however clearly demanded by local interests of the sanitation of Chicago.

3. That in the facts presented, no such case of local permanent necessity was made evident.

4. That the provisions of the Canadian treaty (Waterways Treaty of 1909) for a settlement by Joint Commission of questions on matters of difference between the United States and Canada, offered a further reason why no administrative officer would authorize a further diversion of water manifestly so injurious to Canada, against Canadian protest."

The Deputy Minister then continues:

It will thus be seen that the various Secretaries considered that each had no authority to grant permanent permits: that it was necessary for the Sanitary District to obtain the authority of Congress, and this authority has not yet been granted.

Secretary Stimson admits that the provisions of the Canadian treaty offer a further reason why no administrative officer would authorize a further diversion of water manifestly so injurious to Canada against Canadian protest.

In a memorandum prepared by the Chief of Engineers for the Secretary of War, on the 13th of May, 1916, in which he says "These injurious effects were clearly foreseen by the Department, and hence the diversion has been restricted to the amount stated, and the Secretary of War has not only declined to increase the amount, but has constantly adhered to the position that the permit granted was to be considered of a temporary character and that any permanent diversion of the waters of lake Michigan into another watershed required Congressional authorization."

Canada has never acquiesced in any diversion. The Sanitary District seems to consider that it is entitled to 4,167 c.f.s. (250,000 cubic feet per minute), but it has no right to this beyond the permit, which the officer who issued it admits, does not legalize the diversion.

The laws of the State of Illinois, under which the drainage canal is constructed, require a discharge of 20,000 cubic feet per minute for each 100,000 of population: this means 10,000 cubic feet per second for a population of 3,000,000 (approximately the present day population).

The perusal of this memorandum will show that there is no real legal authority for the assertion that there is any legal diversion. It is true a temporary permit was granted, but with the distinct understanding that this had to receive the authority of Congress, which, in spite of many attempts has not yet been obtained.

At the present time there is a suit pending in the United States Supreme Court against the Sanitary District, seeking to establish the legality or otherwise of the diversion. As you are aware many states and corporations in the United States object to this diversion as well as Canada, and the Sanitary District claim that under the Waterways Treaty of 1909 they have some rights, but no specific mention is there made of the situation.

I may add that this very important question should, in my opinion, be submitted to the International Joint Commission, whose powers are defined by the Boundary Waterways Treaty of 1909.

The enlarged Engineering Commission which is about to be appointed by the United States and Canada will have among its duties to examine into the water levels of the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence River in connection with the development of the St. Lawrence waterways. I take for granted that their very first duty will be to find out the normal levels of the Great Lakes and, of necessity, they will be obliged to examine into the effect of the diversion of water by the Chicago drainage canal. If they find—as I have no doubt they will—that this diversion lowers the level of the lakes, I am sure that the people of Canada will insist that no international work should be entered upon until the normal levels of the lakes have been restored, since all calculations must necessarily be based upon the acknowledged levels of the Great Lakes. This is the essential basis upon which will rest all their studies.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: What was done in the United States is very interesting, but I would like to know what our Government has done.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It has at various times instructed the British Ambassador at Washington to register the protest of Canada against the authorization sought by the Chicago Sanitary Canal Commission.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: Will the honourable gentleman allow me a question? Who is the author of that last section that he read? Who stands behind it, I mean?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The words at the conclusion of the Deputy Minister's memorandum are my own.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: In the name of the Government, I hope.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: Is it not a fact that this matter has been provided for in a Treaty between Great Britain and the United States? If that is so, why should the question be submitted to any commission? Why does not Canada call upon the United States to implement the Treaty?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I cannot satisfactorily answer my honourable friend on that point. I do not know why in the last five or ten years the Canadian Government has not pressed the United States for a reference of this matter to our Waterways Commission. The Treaty was entered into in 1909. The first diversion of water took place prior to that date; but even if the Treaty could be interpreted as governing only subsequent acts, I would think that the two Governments could have agreed, and could still agree, to refer the whole question to the International Waterways Commission. But if there can be no understanding by the two Governments on that point there can certainly be instructions given to the enlarged Engineering Commission, and instructions will be given them, to examine into the levels of the Great Lakes and of the St. Lawrence. To my mind that is absolutely the first step to be taken before those engineers proceed to examine into the possibilities of development. The first question for them to determine is, what is the reservoir which will furnish water, and what is the depth of the water in that reservoir. For these improvement—levels will have to be taken—not only present levels, but what are the normal levels according to an average during a certain number of years. Necessarily they will be face to face with the problem of that diversion of water; and, speaking for myself, not having submitted that part of my answer to my colleagues, I say that the people of Canada will be slow in entering upon future international developments of the St. Lawrence until the question of the level of the lakes has been definitely settled.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: In answer to the honourable gentleman from Manitoba (Hon. Mr. Bradbury) I might say that there was no treaty when that diversion was first made. The diversion consisted in reversing the course of the Chicago river, which was called Dog Creek, from the old French name, La Rivière du Chien. This river having been diverted, the height of land—

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: Diverted, or inverted?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The height of land preventing the water of Lake Michigan from flowing south is only 12 feet; that is the only summit they had to overcome, so it was a simple matter to make this canal—to reverse the flow of Chicago river, as they call it now. They built the canal in a southeasterly direction to Lockport and then further for some 40 miles. That canal has a depth of water of 20 feet. It is 160 feet in width at the bottom, and, as the slopes are one to two, honourable gentlemen will see that it is nearly 250 feet at the top. It is an immense river. There are very few rivers with a flow of 10,000 cubic feet per second, at low water in the summer time. At the end of the canal there is a drop of 34 feet, from which at present they are generating 36,000 horse-power, which they use to pump the sewage of Chicago, and light their streets and parks.

The 9-foot navigation that is now talked of is via the river Des Plaines, and the Illinois river, and on to the Mississippi. This was the course taken by ancestors of mine when they were not allowed to sell their furs outside of Canada, shortly after the cession of Canada. They travelled from Montreal through the Ottawa and Mattawa rivers, Trout Lake, Talon Lake, Turtle Lake, Nipissing Lake, French River, Little Current, along the north shore of the Georgian Bay, through St. Mary's river and Mackinaw Straits, along the south shore of Lake Michigan, and through Dog Creek.

I may say that up to date some $98,000,000 have been expended on that canal. It was in 1907 that the water was turned into it, and immediately there was a noticeable drop in the lake levels. of at least 20 inches. I discovered that at the time while acting as an engineer. Water levels can be affected by very slight causes. For instance, the small piers of the C.P.R. bridge at the upper end of the Sault Ste. Marie, actually raised the normal level of Lake Superior by one foot. As they are developing water-powers at the Sault they have kept very close watch on the levels of Lake Superior, because, as shown by the effect of that small obstruction, it would be very easy to prevent the flow. The same thing might apply to lakes Huron and Erie. As the United States has lowered the levels, the work of correction should be done at its expense.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: I understood the honourable gentleman to say that the Federal Government of the United States now wanted to take more water through the Chicago Sanitary Canal.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No; the Chicago Sanitary Commission. The Federal Government is opposed.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The Washington Government having permitted all this, it now says it is not its fault. That is something for our legal lights to spend some time on. The several States say that each is sovereign within its own territory. The State of Illinois says to Washington: "We will keep on diverting, and it is none of your business, because we have only delegated to you, as the Federal Government, certain powers; but this sanitary district is ours, and we will go on just as we have been doing." Thus they are defying the central Government. Honourable gentlemen know that the State of New York does not favour the St. Lawrence deep waterway scheme, and contends that Washington has no right to discuss the matter with the Ottawa Government, because such action affects the State rights. It asserts that the state of New York is the riparian proprietor, and that it should come here if anybody does.

NOVA SCOTIAN PUBLIC INTERESTS

MOTION FOR RETURN

Hon. Mr. TANNER moved:

That an order of the Senate do issue for copies of all correspondence and other statements received by the Government of Canada, or any member of such Government, during 1923 and since from or on behalf of the Government of Nova Scotia in regard to transportation, commercial, economic and other public matters of interest to the said Province, including any requests for investigation of the matters relating to said interests and also all correspondence and other statements by the Government of Canada, or any member thereof in response to such representations and requests.

The motion was agreed to.

EXPORT OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS

MOTION FOR RETURN

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER moved:

That an Order of the Senate do issue for a return of the clearances granted by the Customs authorities to vessels of fifteen hundred tons and under for export of intoxicating liquors from Canada during the calendar year 1923, giving according to Provinces the port from which, the port and country to which clearance was granted and the tonnage of each vessel cleared, the quality and kind of liquor indicated, the value of the same and the amount of duty involved, paid or remitted in each case, the amount and nature of the security taken by the Government to insure the bona-fides of the exports, the names of the vessels and the date of sailing from the Canadian port, and the date of the next entry of those vessels into Canada, the foreign ports from which they were cleared, and the name of the Customs official in each case who issued the clearance from Canadian ports.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAY EMPLOYEES

MOTION FOR RETURN

Hon. W. B. ROSS moved:

That an Order of the Senate do issue for a return giving a copy of the agreements between The Canadian National Railway and the Brotherhoods or organizations of Railway Employees together with a copy of one pay roll under each agreement for the Atlantic Division.

CAPE BRETON LABOUR DISPUTE

INQUIRY

Hon. Mr. DAVID, by leave of the House, rose in accordance with the following notice:

That he will call the attention of the Senate and of the Government upon the report published on the 31st of March last, and reproduced in the Senate Hansard of April the 1st, of a speech made by a man of the name of McLachlan at a meeting of miners in Cape Breton, and will inquire whether that McLachlan is the same man that has been released lately on parole by the Government, and, if so, does the Government intend to allow that dangerous man to continue to express such pernicious sentiments, and do they not think it proper to send him back to jail in the interest of society and of the working class itself?

He said: Honourable gentlemen, with the consent of the leader of the House and the honourable gentleman from Assiniboia (Hon. Mr. Turiff), I ask to be allowed to make my inquiry now. Through misunderstanding or mistake, it was put on the Orders of the Day for to-morrow. I cannot be here to-morrow, and so hope that I may be allowed to say a few words in explanation.

Hon. Mr. TANNER.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Go on.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: There is no objection to the honourable gentleman making his statements now, but, as some member who is absent may be desirous of speaking on this question to-morrow, it will remain on the Order Paper.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: I understand the honourable gentleman has the consent of the Senate to proceed.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: I thank you, honourable gentlemen. I suppose I do not need to read the notice, as it has been already published twice, but in order to justify my remarks I wish to read only a few words of the utterances made by McLachlan at Cape Breton. The Montreal Star, which reported his speech, says:

McLachlan made the firebrand speech of the meeting. He reiterated his advice to strike on the job and not give a fair day's work for a fair day's pay.

Afterwards, speaking of the contract made with the miners, he said:

You men are not bound to accept this agreement, and you should do everything in your power to break it. Mine as little coal as possible, so that your oppressors will be brought to a realisation that you do not favour working under existing conditions and will not give the best that is in you.

What does that mean, honourable gentlemen? What is the meaning of the advice given by McLachlan to the miners of Cape Breton? It means this. He advises them to be disloyal and dishonest, and to act illegally and fraudulently. That is the clear meaning of his speech.

I do not think it is necessary to attempt to show how dangerous it is to allow such agitators as McLachlan to express and spread such ideas and sentiments and instil the Bolshevist poison into the minds of our population, especially our working people whom we must protect against the efforts made to deceive them. Unfortunately the world is full of false doctrines and fallacious theories engendered by the dreams, the ambitions, and the selfishness of these agitators, and everywhere the world has drifted towards extreme democracy and anarchy, putting all the countries of the world at the mercy of a few, the good elements of labour being dominated by the worse. How long and to what extent will British institutions be able to keep their ascendancy and influence in the world? How long will Canada itself avoid the Bolshevist epidemic, especially if men like McLachlan are allowed to say and do what they like? Unfortunately, workingmen are too easily convinced by these agitators that they are working in their interests, and unfortunately also Governments in all countries do not realize sufficiently the dangers which threaten the foundations of society, and are therefore too much inclined to shut their eyes to the doings of these agitators. Let us at least protect our country, our dear Canada, against their nefarious influences in order that we may occupy a place in the world where the fundamental principles of law and order are respected. Let us do what is just and proper to improve the condition of all labour people so that they may love more our country and its institutions and thus strengthen the influence of the good and reasonable elements of this class of our population.

I may say that I have always done everything I could in that direction. When I was a member of the local House of the Province of Quebec, I was instrumental in having half-a-dozen Bills passed in order to exempt from seizure the wages and furniture of the labouring people, and to facilitate the recovery of their claims before our courts by summary justice. In the Senate, as honourable gentlemen know, I have always voted for Bills the effect of which was to improve the condition of the labouring people and to do them good. But I commence to be anxious about their doings; I commence to be afraid of the result of what is going on in the world. I am afraid that agitators like McLachlan may induce these people to defy all authority, even the authority of the chiefs of their Union, and I am afraid that they may thereby lose the sympathy of those who have at heart the welfare and progress of the labour people.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The notice will remain on the Order Paper for to-morrow unless someone desires to follow the honourable gentleman now.

REDUCTION OF SENATE MEMBERSHIP

MOTION

Hon. J. G. TURRIFF moved:

1. That in the opinion of the Senate it is advisable in the interest of economy and good Government to reduce the number of Senators by one third, viz., from ninety-six to sixty-four Members.

2. That this reduction should be effected by not filling any vacancy that may occur in the number of Senators representing a province until that number has been reduced by one third, except in the senatorial division consisting of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, as to which division special provision as to the distribution of the reduction will be required.

3. That in each appointment of a Senator made under the decreased representation it shall be provided that the Senators shall automatically retire on attaining the age of years.

He said: For many years, a good many of them before I became a member of this body, and since, I have felt that some changes or reforms might be made with advantage to the country. When our constitution was adopted almost 60 years ago the Senate was provided for under the British North America Act. Since that time the country has observed how it has worked out, and I think every honourable member will acknowledge that there has been a considerable amount of criticism throughout the country, and that the present Senate and the manner of its appointment have not been regarded as altogether satisfactory. I believe, honourable gentlemen, that that feeling is growing. I will not undertake to say that that remark applies to every part of Canada; but, speaking as a Senator from the western provinces, I can assure this House that there is a growing feeling that there should be some changes made.

Since I have been in Parliament during the last 20 years I have heard numbers of propositions brought forward in reference to reforming the Senate. These suggestions have almost always been made by the party in opposition; but as soon as they came into power they generally felt that they could leave it to Providence to reform the Senate by enabling them to appoint men of their own party. I have heard some good suggestions made, but every one of them involved addition to the cost of the Senate to the country. I do not believe that any reform or change can be made if it would add to the cost, for that would not be acceptable to the people of Canada.

It will be readily seen by every member that the suggestions I am making do not apply in any respect to the present members of the Senate, and I do not suppose that any reform could be so applied, because they have been appointed under the law. But if during the last 50 or 60 years it has been found that some changes could be made to advantage, why not make such changes very gradually? It would probably take 10 or 15 years to bring about what I propose, and while it would not very much affect the interests of any individual it would reduce the cost of the Senate to the country. Then, if further changes were suggested, I think the country would be much more likely to accept them, after we ourselves had made a reduction in the cost to the country. I do not think there is an honourable gentleman here who will say that the Senate could not perform its functions and its duties to the people of Canada just as well with a membership only two-thirds as numerous as it is to-day.

Look at the facts for a moment. Here we are with a country of 8,500,000 or 9,000,000 people, while right beside us to the south there is a country of 110,000,000. They have to deal with all the vast interests of the United States, as well as their outlying territories, such as the Philippine Islands; with their big army and their navy; yet they have fewer Senators than we have. I tried to look up the exact number, but I did not find it; however, I think there are 45 or 46 states, each of which has two Senators, making less than the 96 that we have at present. Now, if a vast country like the United States, with much greater interests than we can possibly have to deal with, gets along with fewer Senators than we have for 8,500,000 people, surely it is worth while to consider whether we cannot do something to improve the condition of affairs.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: May I ask the honourable gentleman if he has considered the fact that, in addition to the Federal Senate, every state of the Union has a second chamber?

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: Yes, I am aware of that. However, the State Senates and the Federal Senate, taken altogether, are not one-third as numerous as the members of our various legislatures, and their expense of governing is nothing like ours.

Now, I think it will be generally acknowledged that the feeling throughout this country is that some change should be made. If so, would it not be well for the change to come from within the Senate, rather than from without? I am well aware that under the B.N.A. Act any legislation, to become effective, has to pass through the Senate; but we all know that we are living in a democratic country, and that the will of the people must control the House of Commons and also eventually the Senate. If the people of Canada ever decide to change or reduce or abolish the Senate, the will of the people must be carried out. That being so, I think it is advisable for us to look into the matter and see if anything can be done that will gradually bring about a better state of affairs.

I am not particularly wedded to the form of motion that I have introduced. I think now, as I have always thought, that a nominated Senate in Canada is preferable to an elective Senate, the idea of which I do not like, for it would mean a great deal of expense every four or five years, as the constituencies would naturally have to be three or four times as large as those for the House of Commons. Furthermore, I think such a Senate would be more of a replica of the House of Commons than we have at present. I also believe that any independent person, looking around the House of Commons and the Senate, will say that the Senators appointed by different governments from Confederation to the present time have been a fairly reasonable and judicious selection, and will compare very favourably with the men whom the people elect to the House of Commons in ability, experience, and every thing that goes to the making of good legislators.

In favouring a nominated Senate, I presume that I do not represent the feeling of the majority of the people of Canada. Certainly those in the western provinces favour an elective Senate, the members to be elected for probably two terms, half of them being elected at each general election. However, that is a matter of opinion, and one that probably will not involve any change for some time.

I would like to see one or two other changes made in the Senate. I have not mentioned them all in this resolution, for the simple reason that my main object is to get an expression of opinion on the question of a reduction in the number of Senators and the cost to the country of carrying on the Senate. I thought it advisable not to complicate the matter by adding other things that can come just as well later on.

Holding these views, I have taken the liberty of bringing this question before the members of this House. If it is felt that what I have suggested is not right—and I do not for one moment expect that it will have general support—it is open to amendment. For instance, I left a blank where I suggest that in future, after the reduction has been made, Senators appointed should remain until they reached a certain age. I hesitated to put down the age I have in mind, because when I look around this House to-day and see the number of men that are over that age, yet who are just as young as I am, and a good deal younger in every respect but years, and mentally just as active and bright as ever they were in their lives, and many of them more so, and as active physically as they were 20, 30 and 40 years ago, I hesitated to put in a limit of any kind. I thought that would be better left to the good sense of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yet somebody will have to mention a figure.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: Oh, yes, and I am prepared to do so. I am always prepared to back my figures.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Put it so many years past your own age.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: I would put it six and a half years above my own age.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: What are you—ninety?

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: No, I am not ninety; I am only about ten years younger than my honourable friend. I do not mind saying that I am in my sixty-ninth year; so that, in about six and a half years more, if I live that long, I would arrive at the age that I had in my mind to put in the motion. I think perhaps that is too young, but if it were the opinion of the House that that should be the age, I would be quite willing.

Further, if the age were put at 75, and if we made the reduction in number and cut off one-third of the cost of the Senate, I feel quite sure that the Senate and the country would be quite willing to make a retiring allowance to any future Senator going out on account of age—either his full indemnity, or something very near it. This would not apply to any Senator in the House now.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: That is a money bill; we have no right to do that.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: You would soon increase the Senate to the same size, then.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: Oh, no. If Senators at a certain age went out automatically, there would never be very many of them out at one time, and if the age were fixed at 80, which would perhaps be better than 75, there would be fewer drawing the pension.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: What about the introduction of women to the Senate? You might as well deal with that while you are at it.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: If they were admitted to the Senate they would never be eliminated on account of age, because we know perfectly well that none of them ever get very old.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: You could not ask them their age, anyway.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: Honourable gentlemen, I know that a proposition of this kind will probably not receive a great deal of consideration in the Senate, but at the same time I really think that it is worth our attention. It is hardly to be expected that a law passed almost 60 years ago should be so perfect that it cannot be improved, and if so, why should we not improve it? If there is to be any improvement, why should it not come from the Senate itself? I think it would be much better coming from the Senate than by a Bill from the other end of the building. We all know that year after year a resolution in respect to this matter is brought up in the other House, and it has been nearly always, and of late years altogether, along the lines of either abolishing the Senate or making it elective. Now, I think that if we could take moderate action to bring about some changes it might satisfy the people of Canada.

While on this subject of reducing the cost and membership of the Senate, I think the time has come, honourable gentlemen, when the whole question of government might very well be considered and a proportionate reduction made, as it should be made, in the representation in the House of Commons. The cost of government in Canada is very excessive. With the increasing population in Western Canada we shall have in a short time a House of Commons composed of 300 members. I think that number is unnecessarily large. I think, furthermore, that the size of the local legislatures ought to be reduced. I see it is beginning to be advocated in newspapers throughout Ontario that the Ontario Legislature is larger than it should be, and that about three-quarters or two-thirds of the present number of legislators could just as well handle the affairs of the Province. I know that in our Western Provinces the Legislatures are unnecessarily large. The larger they are the more expensive they become, and in view of present conditions, when there are more or less hard times throughout Canada, when practically every Government in this country is adding to the provincial or the Dominion debt, I think it is time something should be done to begin the practice of economy at home. And it would not lessen the good that all the different Governments are doing.

Just to show about how our Government expenditures, taken all around, compare with those of other countries, I desire to refer to an extract which I clipped out of a newspaper the other day, and which is very much to the point. It is perhaps worth while putting it on Hansard. It is, I think, from a Toronto daily paper. At any rate, the figures were prepared by Grattan O'Leary. I do not know Mr. Grattan O'Leary. I have seen him only once in my life; but I know this, that he prepared a set of figures in relation to the tremendous expenditures that have been going on under the present Government, and under the late Government, and I have yet found nobody who could put his finger on any fact and say that the figure was not right. I think the figures are correct. I heard one person say that he had examined the figures closely in order to find him wrong, but had to admit that he was absolutely right in his figures. This clipping is dated at Toronto, March 22nd, just about two weeks ago:

"It is a conservative estimate that something like half a million people of this country are living on the taxes of the rest of us," declared Grattan O'Leary, Ottawa newspaperman, before the Canadian Creditmen's Association here this afternoon.

"The national debt of Canada which stood at one billion, three hundred and eighty-two millions on Armistice Day, is to-day $2,400,000,000," said Mr. O'Leary. "In other words, we have increased the public debt of Canada more since the armistice than we increased it during the whole of the war.

"And that is not all. In addition to this there are enormous railway securities which the Dominion of Canada have guaranteed and which bring the gross public debt of the Dominion to three billion, two hundred and nineteen millions.

"According to a statement of the Royal Bank of Canada the aggregate of debts of our nine provinces totals $428,000,000. Therefore, adding the debt of nine provinces to the debt of the Dominion and including also the debts of the large cities you get the alarming fact that we have a total debt of five hundred dollars for every living soul in the Dominion.

"Compare our position in this respect to that of the United States. That country has a population of 110,000,000 people, important possessions, a big navy and army, and has but eight cabinet ministers who draw in salaries $108,000 a year.

"Canada has a population of nine millions, has no outside possessions and no army or navy worth mentioning, yet she has eighteen cabinet ministers and pays them, including sessional indemnities, $229,000 a year."

Canada paid for nine lieutenant governors' salaries ranging from seven to nine thousand dollars a year, pays 235 members of parliament $4,000 a year and 96 senators the same, being an unusual total paid by the people, of $1,644,000.

Britain with a population of 40,000,000 people at home and a powerful army and navy, legislates for an Empire that encircles the globe and which has a combined population of three hundred and fifty millions. She did all this with a house of commons of 615 members whose indemnities total $1,230,000.

And they have no local legislatures at all, except now in Ireland.

Canada with nine million people had 908 legislators and 97 cabinet ministers, whose salaries are $3,000,000.

In view of those figures, which are absolutely right, does not every honourable member think that the time has arrived when we might reasonably consider this question and try to set an example by doing something to bring about a saving in regard to the Government of Canada?

Hon. Mr. DAVID: Can the honourable member tell me what reduction in expenditure would be effected by a reduction of the number of members of the Senate?

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: No, I could not give my honourable friend the exact figures, but the amount would be well on towards one-third of the present cost of the Senate, and it would mean a great many thousands of dollars. The usefulness of the Senate would not be impaired in any degree whatever.

In making this suggestion I am not trying to obtain any advantage whatever for the Province from which I come. Saskatchewan has a smaller number of Senators, in proportion to population, than any other province in the Dominion of Canada. The four Western Provinces, with considerably more than two millions of people, have just the same representation as the three lower provinces, with one million people. We have a smaller proportion of Senators for our population than even the Province of Ontario, which has a large population. I am not suggesting that the ratio should be changed. Just here let me say that the reduction of the Senate would not affect the influence of any one province in the Dominion. The reduction would be proportionately the same for each province. You will observe that in my motion I state that some little change would have to be made in regard to the lower provinces. The three lower provinces together constitute a senatorial district. At the present time the representation is: Nova Scotia, 10; New Brunswick, 10; and Prince Edward Island, 4. You cannot divide that representation in each case by three, taking off one-third, without leaving a fraction; so some special arrangement would have to be made there. It could be effected by giving Nova Scotia 8, New Brunswick 7, and Prince Edward Island 3; but I presume that Prince Edward Island, having four now, might object to having only three; and New Brunswick probably would object to having one less than Nova Scotia. However, that is only a matter of detail and I have no doubt it could be very easily settled.

I had thought of including in my motion—but this is one of the things I left out—a provision whereby more work would come to the Senate and more use be made of it. Take for instance the last adjournment. We adjourned for practically three weeks, after sitting only a few days. That was through no fault of ours. It was because we were waiting for work from the other end of the building. Now, I have always maintained—and I can see no good reason against it, and I want to impress this once more on my honourable friend the leader of the Government—that some arrangement should be made with the House of Commons for having all private legislation introduced in the Senate. That should be made absolutely compulsory, and, if it were done, I am quite satisfied, that, with the ability of the Committees of this House, they would lick those Bills into such shape that they would pass the House of Commons very much faster than they do at the present time. In that way probably at least a week could be cut off the length of the Session. That would be an advantage to the members of the House of Commons, the members of the Senate, and particularly the ratepayers of Canada, because the shortening of the Session by even a week would mean the saving of a great deal of money.

There is another point that I would like to see dealt with. I am sure that the Fathers of Confederation, in preparing the legislation regarding the Senate, never dreamt that at times the Senate composed of 96 members, or, as it was for many years, 81 members, should become one-sided. When Sir Wilfrid Laurier's Government came into power in 1896, if my memory serves me rightly, there were 11 Liberal Senators in the House, which was then composed of 81 members. In 1911, when that Government went out of power and the Government of my honourable friends opposite came in, the Conservatives had been reduced to about 18 or 20 in a House of 81. I do not think that is a good position for the Senate to be in, and I think it could be remedied to a certain extent. What I would propose is this. Of course, I am speaking now of the basis that existed at that time, when there were only two parties in the House. After a while—

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: We shall get back to two parties.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF:—it may come down to two parties again. I hope so.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: It is pretty near that now in the Senate.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: Oh, no. There are three active parties in the Senate. There is, I admit, a disparity in the numbers of parties, but there are three parties. However, I think we may get back again to two. My idea is this, that when a change of Government occurs the Prime Minister of the day should make all the appointments until his party has a majority of, say, one in the Senate; after that, the Prime Minister of the day should make appointments to the first two vacancies from each Province or from each senatorial division; then the leader of the official Opposition should be asked by the Prime Minister to nominate for every third appointment. The only result would be that if the Government remained in power for 12 or 15 years, as has occurred very often in the past, the Senate would not become quite so one-sided as has been the case in days gone by. The patronage of the party in power would not be affected to any great extent. It would be affected a little, but they would make up for that during the time they were in opposition; so ultimately the result would be just about the same. I think this plan would be an advantage. However, I have not introduced that into my motion, although that is what I had in mind.

As to the question of an elective Senate, I have dwelt on that a little. It might be an advantage, but I am not going to advocate that. If it ever does come about, it will not hurt my feelings at all. We might get a very good Senate in that way, but I do not think it would be any better than the Senate under the present arrangements.

I do not agree, either, with those who advocate the Senate being either nominated or elected by the local legislatures, for this reason. It seems to me that under the present conditions you get the Dominion class of politicians, if I may put it that way, appointed to the Senate, but under the other system you would get a Senate composed of members or ex-members of local legislatures. I do not think that would be of any particular advantage, or that it would be as good as the present system. However, I have no very strong feeling in this matter one way or the other.

I have thought on this subject for many years, and, as I have stated, I consider it my duty to bring it up and let it be discussed, so that the Senate may come to any conclusion it wishes. And I will not feel at all hurt if the conclusion is not in line with my ideas.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: Honourable gentlemen—

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Would the honourable gentleman allow me to ask a question? I would like to ask the honourable Leader of the House if it is permissible for us to wear our hats. I am afraid of getting pneumonia from these drafts.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have not examined the rules. Any practice not included in the rules is that of the Upper House in Great Britain, and I do not know what are the customs or the ethics of that institution. I would ask my honourable friend to allow me to postpone my answer for a day, so that I may look into the question.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I wish my honourable friend would give the answer before I get pneumonia.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: In the meantime have him postpone his pneumonia.

Hon. G. H. BRADBURY: Honourable gentlemen, I seconded this resolution largely for the purpose of giving the honourable gentleman from Assiniboia (Hon. Mr. Turriff) a chance to lay the matter before the House.

I am not prepared to make any extended remarks upon the question. I differ with the honourable gentleman on some very important phases. I differ entirely with him as to an elective Senate or a Senate appointed partly by the leader of the Government and partly by the leader of the Opposition. I am thoroughly convinced that the present system of appointing the Senate is the only wise and safe system. There is no question in my mind that any departure from that system would tend to create an atmosphere in the country that would be detrimental to the work we have to perform.

I agree with many things the honourable gentleman has said in regard to the overmanning, to put it that way, of Government all over this Dominion. I look with considerable alarm on the great increase in the House of Commons when I realise that there will be an addition to that body of eight or ten or more members every ten years when redistribution takes place. I believe there is room for serious consideration of the question of retiring a large number of the members of the various governing bodies including our local legislatures. The ship of state, to my mind, is badly overloaded, but just what should be done to remedy that condition I am not prepared to say.

Nearly every session, during the last few years, there has been a motion in the other House aimed at this Chamber. This Chamber seems to be the favourite mark for many people who know very little about the great work that it performs year in and year out. To my mind this Chamber is the very backbone of the Constitution of our country, but the work which it accomplishes is apparently little known. To weaken its powers in any way would be, in my opinion, a retrograde move and one from which this country would certainly suffer severely.

When I rose I had not intended to say as much as I have already said. I seconded this resolution, as I stated, in order to give the honourable gentleman from Assiniboia (Hon. Mr. Turriff) an opportunity to make his speech and lay the matter before the House and open up the discussion. No doubt if honourable gentlemen feel that the matter is worthy of discussion the debate will continue.

Hon. G. McHUGH: There was one statement made by the honourable gentleman from Saskatchewan (Hon. Mr. Turriff) that I should not like to see go on Hansard unchallenged. He referred to Mr. O'Leary, to whom he gave a very high character for veracity in regard to his figures. That gentleman makes the statement that the Federal debt of Canada increased at a greater ratio after the Armistice was signed than before. The debt existed before that time, but apparently increased very rapidly, because after the Armistice the country's debts were consolidated and showed a larger ratio of increase.

Hon. O. TURGEON: Honourable gentlemen, I did not expect that this question would come up for discussion before the House to-day, and I have with me no references upon which to base the remarks which I of necessity have to make in a very hasty manner.

As an admirer of the Confederation pact it has been my lot on different occasions from the very early years of my life to combat in behalf of that pact. When I reached the province of New Brunswick the school trouble in that province was agitating the minds of the people. We of the minority sent our claims to the Privy Council in England, and contrary to our expectations we were told that we could not be granted what we requested. I was one of the first to adhere to the judgment of the Privy Council, and to advise my friends of the minority to come into closer relation with the Government of the day and to accept certain modifications which would render the school law acceptable to the minority. It has always been my pride to say that the people of Canada have to-day the best mode of government possible and the best basis for government in the future.

We hear to-day many complaints from many parts of the country. The public mind is not at rest. We are still suffering from the unrest caused by the war. Everyone suggests a solution of the trouble which affects him more particularly. We have the cry of economy coming from every possible direction. As I have often said, economy consists, not in not spending money, but in spending it judiciously.

What is proposed in this resolution affects the Confederation pact, and with all due deference to this body, and to every public man in Canada, let me say that it is pretty hard for any one of us to be wiser than the Fathers of Confederation were when they had in view not only the existing state of the people of Canada, but the time when our population would fill the Northwest Territories as well as the Eastern provinces, and would reach a total of fifty or sixty millions. I think it would be wise for us to-day to advise our neighbours to have patience until the country is extricated from its present financial condition by greater efficiency in transportation and in the development of our natural resources.

Let me say that this is not a question for the Senate of Canada. We have no right to decrease the representation of the people of the different provinces in this august body. Each one of the provinces came into Confederation only by the consent of its legislature, and it is only by the unanimous consent of the nine legislatures of this country that a change in the Constitution of Canada can be effected. Before we can reduce our number by one-third or by one-half a conference of the provinces would be necessary. I am not prepared to cite any authority, but I remember that in the years 1907-08, or 1906, perhaps, when there was a great agitation for an increase of subsidies to the provinces, I was prepared to support the increases, but I was not prepared to allow the House of Commons and the Senate to inflict further imposts upon the country. And I have yet my correspondence with my esteemed leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, at that time, in which I intimated to him that I could not consent to the House of Commons increasing any subsidies to the provinces—subsidies which had been given at the time of Confederation—and that, unless some measure could be devised by which every province could be consulted, I would have to vote against the proposition. In the reply of my great and honourable leader I was asked if I would stand by a reference of the question to a conference of the different provinces, and I agreed that it was the only possible means of reaching that end.

Now we come to a question of greater responsibility still, namely, a change in the Constitution. My honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Turriff), for whom I have all possible admiration, has cited the representation of the Maritime Provinces in the Senate. The representation in this Parliament is based upon population. It has been accepted by the different provinces, and they alone can change that representation. Each province came into the Confederation with a certain number of representatives in the Senate and in the House of Commons, and the provinces alone have the power to increase or decrease their representation. We in New Brunswick could not take it upon ourselves to decrease that number by one or two or three—no more could Nova Scotia or Prince Edward Island. The province of Quebec has 24 members, and came in under that particular representation, and neither the House of Commons nor the Senate has the power to reduce that representation. It is the same with the other provinces. When the province of British Columbia came into this Confederation, it came in with a certain number of representatives, to be increased according to population. Are we going to decrease the representation of that province in this Chamber without the consent of the legislature of that province?

As a remedy for all the ills that we suffer to-day, I would suggest to the people of Canada that they have patience until things can be rectified by the development of our resources. It is not by any momentary agitation in one province or another that we will mend the condition of our people, more particularly for the future.

It has been said by my honourable friend (Hon. Mr .Turriff) that the Senate of the United States, a country with a population of 110,000,000 people, is no greater in number than the Senate of Canada. The Constitution of the United States was formulated before the Canadian Confederation pact, and it is possible that the Fathers of Confederation had this before them and profited by the defects in regard to representation as well as in other matters, and avoided introducing them in our Constitution. Would it be acceptable to the people of Canada to say that, when we have a population 50,000,000, 64 of us should be able to reverse the public opinion of the country by amending a Bill which had been passed by the House of Commons? I believe that when that time comes, instead of asking for a reduction in the representation, the people of Canada will be asking for an increase. If the Senate of the United States had not been reduced to such a small number, it might perhaps have accepted the Treaty of Versailles, and as a result the world at large would have been much better off.

There is a motion in the House of Commons proposing that the Senate be elected. But what difference would it make to the representation of the country if both the Senate and the House of Commons were elected by the people? It has also been suggested that the term of the Senate should be 6 years, one year longer than that of the House of Commons. What effect would that have on the minds of the people? This House would be subject to the same agitations as the House of Commons. The Fathers of Confederation wanted a nominated Senate in order that each and every one of us called to this body would be actuated solely by love of country, by love of even-handed justice. Many suggestions are made with a view to a reduction of expense, because of the decrease of population in many places. Alberta is complaining that it has not so large a representation in the House of Commons as its people desire. We cannot accede to that request, and anything that is to be done should be by the provinces holding conferences and coming to unanimous decisions as to any changes they desire.

I think it would be wisest for us to entertain the least possible change in the Constitution. This would tend to the contentment, happiness and prosperity of the people, for we must remember that the Constitution was created by men of wisdom and of sincere love of country.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Dandurand, the debate was adjourned.

FUNCTIONS OF THE AUDITOR GENERAL

INQUIRY

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon Mr. BRADBURY: I would like to ask the honourable leader of the Government if the Order in Council giving instructions to the Civil Service Commission and to the Deputy Ministers to revise the salaries of the Civil Service will in any way affect the work that the new Auditor General is supposed to be doing in the reorganization of the Civil Service. Will it be anticipating his work?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Without answering on the spur of the moment I would say to my honourable friend that in my opinion the mandate given to the Civil Service Commission to revise certain classes of salaries will have nothing to do with the reorganization of the Service by the Audit Commission, and will not hamper that work. I do not believe that the revision of salaries will cover the whole of the Departments, but primarily a certain number of employees who are receiving minor salaries.

PATENT BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of Bill 4, an Act to amend the Patent Act (French Version).

He said: This Bill has for its object the improving, in two particulars only, of the translation of the Patent Act which was passed last Session.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Dandurand, the House went into Committee on the Bill.

Hon. Mr. Belcourt in the Chair.

Sections 1 and 2 were agreed to.

The preamble and the title were agreed to.

The Bill was reported without amendment.

THIRD READING

Hon Mr. DANDURAND moved the third reading of the Bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time and passed.

INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES BILL

CONSIDERATION POSTPONED

On the Order:

Second Reading Bill 7, an Act to amend The Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, 1907.—Hon. Mr. Dandurand.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have been asked to postpone the second reading of this Bill until Tuesday next.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I would ask that it be postponed until a week from Tuesday, as I wish to discuss the judgment of the Privy Council.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: I would suggest that the adjournment be for a week or ten days so that we may look into the documents.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If we postpone the Bill over next week we go beyond Easter, but I have no objection.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: What is my honourable friend doing about securing the opinion of the Department of Justice on the legal or constitutional controversy that has arisen?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That was one of the reasons why I felt inclined to adjourn the second reading, until I could answer my honourable friend from Middleton.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: As the questions involved in the Act are very largely sub judice—I understand the Privy Council has already given judgment upon the constitutionality of some features of the Bill—it would be desirable that the opinion of the Department of Justice should be secured as to the constitutionality of the sections of the Bill before us. It seems to me to be idle to discuss a very important measure of this kind if it is suspended between heaven and earth on account of uncertainty as to our constitutional powers. I see no reason why my honourable friend should not bring down to this Chamber at once the opinion of the Department of Justice upon the questions involved. In the first place, we should have a copy of the judgment of the Privy Council, so that we could apply ourselves to the fundamental principles of the Act.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: To what judgment does my honourable friend refer?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I understand the question arose in Ontario in regard to the Hydro-Eelectric Power Commission.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: The Attorney General of Ontario vs Reciprocal Insurers; that was decided on the 25th of January this year.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Can my honourable friend not furnish this Chamber with a copy of that judgment, so that we may determine for ourselves its applicability to the questions before us.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I intended to discuss the legal and constitutional features when I took up the second reading. We are now simply trying to agree as to the date at which the Bill could be discussed on the second reading.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But my honourable friend will have a manifest advantage over the rest of the House if he alone is prepared to discuss the constitutional features, owing to the opinion of the Department of Justice or the judgment of the Privy Council which he may have in his possession. We, unfortunately, are not in possession of that information. My honourable friend should at least place upon the Table of the House the judgment of the Privy Council so that we might have access to it.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Or at least tell us where we can see it, where it is reported.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes; I have not seen it.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Everybody knows how important this Bill is. It was stressed on both sides very seriously last year. Would it not be wise to allow it to stand until we get the opinion from the Department of Justice? It seems to me there is nothing to be gained by passing the Bill immediately; it will not be sanctioned, and it could wait even until after the Easter recess.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I will move the adjournment of the consideration of this Bill until Thursday of next week, and between now and that date I may be able to bring an answer to my honourable friend's questions which are on the Order Paper for to-morrow.

The Order was discharged, to be placed on the Order Paper for Thursday next.

FRUIT BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of Bill 13, an Act to amend The Fruit Act (French Version).

He said: This Bill has for its object the harmonizing of the French version with the English one of an Act which was put on the Statute Book last year. Instead of saying "85" the printed translation said "80." The amendment is to make the proper translation, 85. I move the second reading of the Bill.

The motion was agreed to, and Bill was read the second time.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Dandurand; the Senate went into Committee on the Bill.

Hon. Mr. David in the Chair.

Section 1 was agreed to.

The preamble and the title were agreed to.

The Bill was reported without amendment.

THIRD READING

On motion of Hon. Mr. Dandurand, the Bill was read the third time and passed.

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of Bill 20, an Act for Granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the purpose of the financial year ending March 31, 1925.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, apparently the beginning of our fiscal year synchronizes approximately with the opening of Parliament, and the Estimates cannot be considered and cannot be taken up and advanced sufficiently at this stage for the Commons or the Senate to express an opinion upon each and every item; so that we have had regularly each year such a Bill as that which is now in my hands, providing for a vote of one-sixth of the whole supply.

The amount which is asked for the months of April and May is $40,871,970.85 "towards defraying the several charges and expenditures of the Public Service, from the first day of April," instant, "not otherwise provided for, and being one-sixth of the amount of each of the several items to be voted, set forth in the Estimates for the fiscal year ending the thirty-first day of March, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-five."

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable gentleman, it may seem somewhat unusual for me to enter upon any discussion of this Bill at the moment; rather because of the practice which has obtained in this House for some time, of the Senate permitting the Supply Bill to go through almost in silence. My honourable friend very properly said the other day that it had been customary to give the three readings to a measure of this kind without any discussion, so that the Administration might become possessed of the necessary funds for the carrying on of the Government of the country. At the same time, notwithstanding the practice which has been followed in the past, the Senate is not absolved from the duty of giving serious attention to Bills of this character. We would not hesitate to give the closest attention to any Bill coming up from the Commons dealing with any matter other than finance. According to the practice of this Chamber, we are not precluded from giving the same attention to financial measures. It has been the recognized policy of this Chamber not to amend financial Bills, and we quite concede that we have not the right to originate financial measures. At the same time, it is the right of this Chamber, and it is a peculiar duty from which we cannot absolve ourselves, to criticize or to point out to the country those abuses which in our judgment should be rectified. The financial Bills which are presented in this Chamber from time to time by the Government, in the form of Estimates or of Supply Bills, are the most important legislation which comes before Parliament. No other legislation submitted to either Chamber will compare in public importance with that involved in the ordinary Supply Bills. For reasons which I am about to point out, it seems to me that we should be derelict in our duty if we accepted Bills of this character hereafter without closely scrutinizing them, without criticizing them, without expressing our opinions in the freest possible manner as to the wisdom of voting from time to time such moneys for public purposes.

It is only on an occasion like the present that we can deal with a measure of this kind. My honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) intimated the other day that when the main Supply Bill would be presented to the Senate we might discuss it to the extent warranted; but I need hardly point out to this House that it has been the practice in the past, and will be the practice in the future, to present Supply Bills at the eleventh hour. Invariably they come down when the public are in the gallery, and His Excellency the Governor General is in the offing waiting to prorogue Parliament. From the experience which we have had in the past, whether sitting on one side of the House or the other, we know very well that this Chamber has no opportunity to discuss the Main Estimates unless we take advantage of an opportunity such as that which we are embracing at the present moment.

From Confederation down there has never been a time in the history of the Dominion—and I say it advisedly—when public attention was so riveted upon the expenditures being made by the Government of the day as it is at the present time, and within the four corners of this Bill are to be found the expenditures which are being criticized throughout the Dominion of Canada. For the Senate to sit idly by and accept the Estimates as they are being presented to-day, as found in this blue book, without expressing our judgment as to the wisdom or the unwisdom of them, would, I say, be a manifest dereliction of our duty. I need not tell honourable gentlemen that there has been a protest throughout the whole of this Dominion against excessive taxation; and that protest has not been limited to the political party sitting to the left of the Speaker, but has been voiced quite as loudly by those who have been in the past in harmony with the present Government. That protest has been voiced throughout the Dominion by the most representative organizations in this country—by, in fact, most of the business and financial organizations, so far as they could give expression to their views by resolution and otherwise. Taxation is determined by expenditure. I need not say that to my honourable friend. No one knows better than my honourable friend who is leading the Government that the burden of taxation placed upon the shoulders of the people is entirely governed by the expenditures which are to be found within the pages of this blue book known as the Estimates for the present fiscal year. Therefore it is not unreasonable for me to ask honourable gentlemen to give some attention to these particular items, to ascertain whether or not the Government is making a sincere endeavour to enter upon a policy of retrenchment in expenditure, so that there may be a complementary reduction of taxation.

In the Speech from the Throne the Government of the day took the opportunity to emphasize the fact that the Budget of the present Session would be balanced—something which had not happened since 1913. Great expectation was aroused throughout the country, particularly among the people who are bearing the burdens of taxation, at this announcement made by the Government. Expectation was worked up to the highest point, in anticipation of the Government bringing down Estimates which would show a reduction in expenditure. This would not have been unreasonable on the part of the Government of Canada. If there is any duty resting upon the Government of to-day it is that of reducing substantially the expenditures of this Dominion, with a view to reducing our taxation and our public debt.

I and others here have already pointed out that all our allies in the late war—the United States, Great Britain, the Overseas Dominions of Australia and New Zealand, France herself —have all substantially cut down their expenditures; not only have they done so, but they have considerably reduced their public debts. Yet we go merrily on, merrily on, giving not the slightest attention to the fact that we have passed through the most critical war known to history. Taxation and expenditure have been pyramided upon taxation and expenditure. Yet up to the present time—I say it advisedly, honourable gentlemen—there has not been the slightest effort on the part of the Government to introduce a policy of retrenchment or reduction of expenditure, or to give any consideration to the reduction of taxation. When I make this statement in this emphatic way, I do not make it from a partisan standpoint. Honourable gentlemen on the opposite side of the House know as well as I do that my statement is correct. We are the only national entity, so far as I know, among those who entered the war on our side, that has done nothing in the way of reducing its public debt or reducing its taxation.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Since 1918, since the end of the war.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I am coming down to the present time.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But my honourable friend, regardless of party consideration, says that since the end of the war we have not done as we should have done.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend knows, as I pointed out in the discussion upon the Address, that the late Government was essentially a war government; that up to the time we went out of office we were engaged not only in conducting the war, so far as Canada was concerned, but in meeting all our obligations incident to the war. Up to the time of the accession of my honourable friend to office, that Government had not the opportunity of carrying out, as I am sure they would have done had they remained in office, a substantial reorganization of the Public Services and a reduction of expenditure and likewise its complementary reduction in taxation. I pointed out a short time ago that Great Britain, notwithstanding the almost overwhelming obligations she assumed in the war, had entered upon a campaign of debt reduction to an extent that it is hard for us to appreciate. I find from recent cables that for the last fiscal year, ending March 31st, the expenditures in running the Government of the United Kingdom were £50,000,000 less than the total income, and in 1922-23 there was a saving effected of £101,000,000. I ask my honourable friend to show us that, even under the present Estimates, we have effected any saving whatever.

Let us see whether this boast of balancing the Budget and of reducing expenditure has any foundation in fact. It has been pointed out—and I think we shall be agreed upon this figure—that in the Main Estimates there is a reduction, in round figures, of $27,000,000, in comparison with the Main Estimates of last year. The Government has declared with great pride that this reduction in expenditure is an earnest of the policy upon which they have entered. Now let us analyze that statement and see to what extent this Government has really reduced its expenditure; that is, expenditure which it was within their power and authority to reduce. It will be found that decreases about which my honourable friend has so proudly boasted, and which were foreshadowed in the Speech from the Throne, are reductions which would have occurred automatically. Of the $27,000,000, representing the reduction of the Main Estimates as compared with those of last year, let me point out three items that in any event would not have been placed in the Estimates and that necessarily brought about the reduction mentioned.

The Canadian National Railways have asked for $19,335,576 less than last year. Here we have in one item over two-thirds of the decrease. Owing to the completion, or the approaching completion, of the Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment and Soldiers Land Settlement duties, which are all of a temporary character, there will be an expenditure of $6,114,996 less than last year. In addition to taking advantage of those two items, the present Government is exercising its cutting-down powers by withdrawing $1,269,000 from the Federal grant to agriculture. Along these lines this Government is carrying out its extraordinary policy of alleged retrenchment. These three items, honourable gentlemen, make up the boasted reduction of which it speaks.

But the Government has gone further. It has made most commendable institutions suffer by reason of this thirst for false economy. Take, for instance, the Canadian Tuberculosis Association—the Government has cut $5,000 from the grant to that Association. This saving will enable it, I presume, to put this additional amount into the pork-barrel.

Then, they have cut off $339,000 from the Immigration grant. Honourable gentlemen, if there is a grant made by the Government of Canada that is really necessary to the promotion of the very best interests of Canada, it is the Immigration grant. If this country is suffering from anything to-day, it is want of population. There is a condition of stagnation in the West, as honourable gentlemen know, all owing to the fact that our people are going to the United States, and that their places are not being filled by the carrying out of a vigorous immigration policy. Notwithstanding the fact that Canada is suffering from want of population more than anything else, yet, for the purpose of carrying out this vaunted boast of theirs, this amount is cut off.

Then, $1,114,000 is cut off National Defence.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Does my honourable friend condemn that cut also?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I do not condemn it, but I say that these are not the fields in which to practise this so-called policy of retrenchment that my honourable friends are boasting about. If retrenchment is to be carried out, let it be carried out in those fields where it can be advantageously carried out.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend will indicate them, I am sure.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If my honourable friend will look at the Estimates—

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend must be constructive in his suggestions.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If the honourable gentleman will permit me, I will be constructive. If my honourable friend will go through the Estimates for the present fiscal year, he will find that the pork-barrel estimates are quite as numerous and quite as generous as they have ever been in the past. Large sums are being expended in every part of this Dominion, unnecssarily, needlessly, recklessly. There has been no attempt on the part of the Government to cut down those most objectionable items which are plunging this Dominion into a condition of indebtedness from which it is almost impossible for us to extricate ourselves. If my honourable friend will look at the Harbour and River appropriations which have been made for the purpose of keeping the party solid, he will see where very substantial reductions could have been made.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I thought they were to keep those public works solid—maintenance work.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I imagine the Government of the day looks upon itself as the greatest public work in the Dominion, and is therefore fortifying itself in this way and by this expenditure.

What I do object to, honourable gentlemen, is that the Estimates which have been brought down here show a total absence of anything like design or policy on the part of the Government. Since public sentiment has protested against the excessive expenditure under which we are labouring and the excessive taxation which we are carrying, there has never been the slightest indication that there has been any intelligent design worked out by the Government for the purpose of cutting down expenditure. Nothing short of cutting the Estimates $40,000,000, or $50,000,000 for the next five years will satisfy the people of this country; nothing short of reducing taxation so that the people of this country will stand on a parity with the people of the United States will satisfy the people of Canada. The excessive taxation under which we are labouring to-day is a national calamity from which we are feeling the consequences daily. It is utterly impossible for the Dominion of Canada, lying, as it does, alongside a nation of 120,000,000 people, the greatest organized nation in the world, to hold its own against that highly-organized industrial, commercial, and financial community when our taxes are substantially higher than theirs.

The migration of Canadians by the hundreds of thousands during the past couple of years has been due to the excessive taxation the people of Canada are bearing. Until the Government will sit down and give serious thought to working out an intelligent policy of reducing our taxation, national disaster and calamity will be our fate.

The Government has taken considerable unction to itself for saving a paltry sum like $369,750 on account of the Civil Service. This is a paltry thing, honourable gentlemen; yet this Government has taken remarkable credit for the reduction which it has made along this line. At the same time, while with the one hand it has dismissed public servants, and thus saved the salaries of those dismissed, with the other hand it has ordered an upward revision of salaries which will of course absolutely absorb the saving of which it has already boasted.

And may I point out another extraordinary thing which I venture to say my honourable friends themselves will agree with, namely, that if it were not for the change in our financial system last February, by which the Canadian National Railway finances were taken out of the public Estimates and made chargeable in an account entirely apart from the Estimates, this Government would be facing a deficit during the present year. If they followed out the same system of bookkeeping as the late Government, this $50,000,000 of bonds which last year were sold in behalf of the Canadian National would appear in the Estimates. I need not point out to honourable gentleman that if that had been the case, the Estimates would have shown a deficit of about $35,000,000, instead of the Budget balancing itself. As yet, honourable gentlemen, it is too early to boast that the Budget will be balanced. The Supplementary Estimates are yet to come. Last Session the Finance Minister expressed the hope that he might be able to limit the Supplementary Estimates to $15,000,000. They exceeded $20,000,000. My honourable friends, in balancing their Budget to-day, are doubtless counting upon the Supplementary Estimates not exceeding those of last year. "We shall wait and see." I fancy my honourable friends will not then be so boastful of being able to balance their Budget as they were when the Speech from the Throne was delivered.

I have taken a longer time than I intended in directing the attention of the House to some of the items appearing in the Estimates. But I would again repeat what I said in the beginning, that I consider it the duty of this Chamber to scrutinize the Estimates as closely as we would scrutinize any legislation that might come from the House of Commons, and there has never been a more opportune time—a time when the country expected us to do it more closely—than the present time. Therefore I say that the more one will peruse the Main Estimates which have been brought down the more he will be disappointed, not only at the absence of all effort to substantially reduce expenditure, but at the seeming incapacity of the Government to bring about such a result.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, I intend to say very few words in reply to my honourable friend's remarks. He has stated that the expenditure has been most extraordinary. May I say that that expenditure was inherited by the present Government from the Government which my honourable friend adorned. He states that the time had not come for his Government to start work with the pruning knife. This Government apparently had the duty of doing so. My honourable friend did not do so.

I confess that I was somewhat discouraged when faced with that formidable load left by my honourable friend and the Cabinet to which he belonged. I did not see at what date the Budget could be balanced, at what date we could cease borrowing to meet our yearly expenditures; and if within thirty-six months of the swearing in of the present Government we have succeeded in balancing the Budget and have begun reducing the expenditure, I think we have done something for the country.

My honourable friend has criticized what? He has criticized some of our reductions. When he rose to discuss these Estimates, I thought he would open up some page of the bluebook and say that this expenditure or that was useless. I thought with him that the time was opportune for the Senate to raise its voice in trying to indicate to the Parliament of Canada, which is to-day studying each and every one of these items, where we should be able to economise. Instead of that, he has criticized the reduction in the grant for tuberculosis. Well, it was a small amount, but the Government was bound, if it could, to reduce every expenditure in order to bring about that equilibrium to which we all aspire, and that sum of $5,000, while it is a small one, is an intimation to the provinces that what belongs to them will be given to them.

We have also done away with the grant to the provinces for agriculture. Why have we done so? Because, if we had not, it would have entailed the borrowing of money to make those gifts, and some of those provinces did not need the Federal Government to go into debt to give them that bounty. The provinces will hereafter have to bear that load. The provinces did not bear the $2,000,000,000 load for carrying on the war. The Federal Government did. It went into heavy expenditures, and it has taxed the people heavily, and it is its primary duty to establish equilibrium by reducing that load on the shoulders of the people.

My honourable friend says: "You have cut the grant to Immigration by $239,000." Has he criticized an expenditure? No, he is again criticizing a reduction, and he says it is at a time when we need immigration.

I will judge of the work of immigration by the result and the result will be shown by the numbers of immigrants the ships carry to our shores. I know that there are parts of this country where it is said we should make efforts to retain our people and should not allow our bone and sinew to cross the line to the South, and replace them by raw material that must be Canadianized. I know the arguments; but I say that if we have lost a million people in a certain number of years, at all events we have evened up by bringing in another million. If this had not been so, we would be short 2,000,000 of population, and not 1,000,000. We are opening the door as wide as we can judiciously in order to bring here that population of Europe which wants to better its condition, and a portion will remain with us; but so long as salaries in the United States in certain lines of activity are double what they are in Canada, shall we be able to retain our population here? I have examined into some cases, and I can understand that families would be enticed to the other side because of the better opportunities offered. Nevertheless, I agree that immigration is of importance to this country, and that we must make an effort to obtain it.

There are some who say, "Why should we bring in strangers whom we have to assimilate?" But at the same time they cry out that our railways have deficits which must be met, and that this country has an immense debt which must be paid. Surely there is no other way of easing the situation or bettering conditions than by increasing our population; and I hope the thousands of people who come to this country will do well.

I am not one of those who believe the Western farmer cannot make a success of his farm. I believe the conditions are somewhat difficult at the present time, but the situation will gradually better itself, and the world will gradually return to normal conditions.

My honourable friend says: "You have cut the Defence grant by $1,114,000." Did he commend that action? No, he condemned it. That is a reduction. If he condemns the reductions we have made, at least let him state in what direction we should have made reductions. Surely when we are carrying a burden of $2,000,000,000 of debt brought about by a military effort unprecedented in history, we should be entitled to reduce our military establishment when we are threatened from nowhere. This is one of the unproductive expenditures that we can reduce, and I think we should be commended for the act, and not criticized.

My honourable friend says: "You have reduced the Civil Service estimates by $360,000." I stated on the motion for the Committee on the Civil Service that it was my opinion that we should pay the Civil Service a fair remuneration, but that we should limit the Service to the exact number required; that if we had thousands of employees too many, they should be dispensed with in some way or other that would not be cruel, and that the Civil Service should be re-established on a normal basis. When we have brought the Civil Service to a fair and efficient minimum, then I am ready to look into the salaries and see that the men who serve the state are as well taken care of as those who serve the large corporations throughout the land.

Now, my honourable friend speaks of the pork-barrel. He has been in touch with departmental affairs much longer than I. For a certain number of years he had to carry on as a Minister of a Department, but he is now in the happy position of being able to criticize, to preach virtue without having to practice it, Yet the government of the country must go on. Millions and millions of money are being spent in public works which must be maintained when the Minister of Public Works says he has a report from his engineer, resident or local, stating that $1,000 here or $2,000 there must be spent or those works will seriously detoriorate. Surely we cannot stop and say: "We will spend nothing; we will economize." That would be very poor economy indeed; but I may tell my honourable friend that as far as my own wisdom and experience go, a legitimate effort is being made day by day for a reduction in expenditure.

The other day I read in a newspaper an interview with one of the leaders on the other side, the leader of the Progressive party, who when asked his opinion on reduction in expenditure, said: "Everyone is for expenditure at his neighbour's expense; no one is for a reduction at his own door." Manitoba wants the Hudson Bay railway; Toronto wants the viaduct terminal; Montreal wants a bridge; everyone who sees something which will be to the advantage of the community in which he lives thinks that that should be attended to, and that everyone should practice economy but himself. We all know that situation, but let us live with the hope that the necessity which faces us will keep our attention fixed on the importance of re-establishing an equilibrium, of reducing taxation in order that we may offer the immigrant as good an opportunity as he would find in the United States.

With these few remarks, I beg to move the second reading of this Bill.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Honourable gentlemen,—

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I thought I was closing the debate. I looked around to see if anyone wishes to speak. I think my honourable friend is too late.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I did not understand that.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I did not understand that either. When my honourable friend moved the second reading of the Bill he made a speech. I think my honourable friend was entirely out of order in making the reply which he did, because that was the speech which he evidently intended to deliver on the Bill. If I had known that my honourable friend was under that impression I would have pointed out to him that several honourable gentlemen wished to speak on the subject.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I cannot refer to the rule, but the practice in this Chamber has been for the mover of a motion to reply and close the debate. Acting upon this practice, I looked around to see if anyone desired to speak.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No; I think my honourable friend was so warmed up to the subject that he forgot to look around, and he proceeded to express himself without doing that.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I think the Chamber would be quite willing to give the honourable gentleman an opportunity of closing the debate after the others have spoken.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, we will take a third speech from him. Adjourn the debate until to-morrow.

Hon. W. H. BENNETT: After the challenge of the leader of the House that no person could place his finger on any item of these Estimates that should not be there, one has almost to respond to the challenge. I may tell the honourable gentleman that when I spoke on the Address, had I these Estimates, that were issued after the Auditor General's report, I should have made further remarks than I did on that occasion. I told the honourable gentleman at that time that he was squandering the people's money at a time when the country was harder up than it ever had been. I challenged the honourable gentleman to rise and defend in his person, or by any superior of his, the disgraceful, outrageous purchase of a building on Sussex Street, in this city, when they had a third of a mile of vacant stores here. The honourable gentleman asked for the name of the building, and he got it. I suppose he has gone to his confreres and asked them about it, and he is ashamed to rise in this House and defend that scandalous purchase.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I may tell my honourable friend that I asked the honourable Minister of Public Works about this purchase, and he explained that the land that was at our disposal could not be utilized for that purpose. I will ask him for a memorandum explaining fully, and I hope to the satisfaction of my honourable friend, the reasons for the purchase of that property.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: As I said, these Estimates were not down when the Address was debated, and one had not an opportunity of seeing what they were. And now what do they contain? As has been indicated by the honourable leader on this side of the House, it is the old game of this Government playing politics and making investments that are tainted with suspicion. The honourable gentleman will not dare to stand up in this House and defend the iniquitous purchase of the so-called Paris Hotel—why? Because he cannot reconcile himself to the statement made the other day by the Minister of Railways and Canals that it was a mistake. Yet to-day this country, at a time when it needs every dollar for necessary works, is spending $3,000,000 in the city of Paris on that building which we do not require. Who ever heard of emigration from France to this country? The honourable gentleman knows there is none; and yet to-day this Government is going to make an investment of upwards of $3,000,000 on the purchase of that building in Paris which the country does not need, and which one of my honourable friend's colleagues in his place in the House said should never have been bought.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Will my honourable friend allow me—

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Yes, I can state what my honourable friend was going to answer, that is, that the National Railways are making the purchase.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That is part of the answer.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I knew it would be.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But that is the fact, and confirms anything that may be challenged. It was not purchased by the Federal Government; it was purchased by the Canadian National Railways.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Paid for by the Canadian Government.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Paid for by the Canadian National Railways.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: And we had to give them the money.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: We did not give them the money for the purpose of that purchase, but ultimately, if there is a deficit, the country will have to pay that amount. But I think it would be fairer for this Chamber, which stands above the petty political and party quarrels, to await an explanation of the whole transaction by the Canadian National Railways themselves. That will be done to the thorough satisfaction of both branches of Parliament, I am sure, and then we may discuss, with open eyes and the clear facts before us the whole situation. As a barrister I do not think my honourable friend should pass judgment on an incomplete record. If my honourable friend will await the record, then we may examine it together intelligently when we have the statement of the Minister of Railways.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Would my honourable friend, before he sits down, give us his opinion on this phase of the matter. He says that the Government of Canada is not paying for it. We are advancing to the National Railways in these Estimates nineteen millions and some odd thousands. If the Hotel Scribe had not been purchased, I suppose we would have been advancing to them some sixteen millions.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Certainly, if there had been no deficit, the Canadian National Railways would be carrying the expenditure. I suppose the country has to carry the deficit. I answered the question of the honourable member from Hamilton (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton) as to the Government furnishing the money, by saying no, the National Railway furnished the money; but in the deficit for the year our sum will be increased by the price of that building.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We are paying for that building out of these Estimates.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Ought we not to discuss that question when we are passing the Estimates relating to it?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Would my honourable friend say that that amount is comprised in the total we are giving?

Hon Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I say yes, we are advancing them $19,000,000. The Hotel Scribe cost approximately $3,000,000.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Are the details of the $19,000,000 given there?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No. It is quite manifest that if they pay out of the National Railways treasury $3,000,000 for that hotel, they come back to the country for that amount of money.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend has no doubt that this matter will be fully ventilated elsewhere. Then we will be seized of the facts, and we will draw our own conclusions.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I address myself to the honourable leader of the House, who says we are talking party politics. I may say this, that I never knew a time in the history of Canada when a member of Parliament was not expected to discuss the expenditures of this country, and I never knew a time when it was more necessary to do so. We are at a period when trucking and trading between the political parties is going on in the other Chamber in order that the Government may maintain themselves in power; therefore this matter should be discussed in this House.

Why should the Government, with indecent haste, rush over to London and purchase there a building costing a million or a million and a half, when another million will have to be expended on it? Surely there are things to be done in this country, where money could be much better spent than over there. The business of Canada has been conducted in England in the offices we had. What is the Government doing over there except increasing the staff that they keep up, while certain politicians over there are holding high offices as rewards? We have the case of one gentleman taken from the House of Commons and rewarded over there with a salary of $7,000 a year. The Government had a Secretary and a staff there that were able to carry on all the business.

This is a specimen of the reckless expenditure that is going on in this country, and the honourable gentleman says, "We preached virtue, but now we fear we cannot carry it out." That is the trouble with this Government: they made so many promises that the people took them at their word, and expected there would be something done along the line of their promises. That is what they are now confronted with, in the country.

There has never been more reckless expenditure than has gone on in the past year on the most absurd items. I have repeated time and again, and no one can challenge my statement, that on Wellington Street in this city there is a whole string of buildings, and a very little expenditure would put many of them in order for Government business; yet what is this Government paying to-day? It is paying in this city of Ottawa $1,450,000 in rents.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Is that an increase over 1921?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: The honourable gentleman always consoles himself with that reflection—that it is not an increase. There should be a decrease, that is what they promised.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Certainly.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: If the honourable gentleman's friends had gone through the city of Ottawa and said, "We are going to rent Tom, Dick and Harry's buildings all over this city when we get into power," they would not have got many votes on that platform; but the honourable gentleman must remember that the expenditure for rents in Ottawa running up to $1,450,000 is very different from what conditions warranted during the time of the war. To-day you have clerks standing around in these offices; nothing doing in the Public Works Department, and others. True, you are dismissing some of the clerks, but there was no reason why you should have gone on as you have done, renting new buildings in this city from party friends and purchasing from your party friends property that you did not require.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Has there been increased rental in the last few years?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: In the aggregate.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: In Ottawa?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: There are new buildings being rented. You have an item here of $1,450,000, which was the same as in the prior year; but what I say is that the public expected you were honest in your professions that you were going to decrease these amounts, and now you pride yourselves that you are not honest, that you have not done what you promised to do, but say you have hopes that you may do it at some time to come.

Now, let us go on a little further with these matters of expenditure. This government has run right on throwing away the money of the people of Canada, as is shown to-day in the Auditor General's report, and by answers to questions propounded in the House of Commons.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Before going into the Auditor General's Report, call it 6 o'clock.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Could we not sit to-night?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Just as you like.

At 6 o'clock the Senate took recess.

The Senate resumed at 8 o'clock.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Honourable gentlemen, as I stated before 6 o'clock, I rose chiefly to protest against expenditures that are disclosed in the Auditor General's Report and also now in the Estimates. When I spoke on the Address I referred to matters that were mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. I wish to call the attention of honourable gentlemen to one particular clause in that:

> My Ministers are strongly of the opinion that a reduction of taxation is of first importance, and that to this end the efforts already put forth to combine strict economy in the administration of the public services with rigorous retrenchment in public expenditures, should be furthered in as many directions as may be possible.

With those words still ringing in our ears, surely the honourable leader of the House ought not to have demurred this afternoon at my indulging in what he called party politics. The Government have placed that as a programme before the people, and the people have taken them at their word. According to the record, in the past year, when they were supposed to be devoting themselves to economy, they were adding some of the expenditures of which I am going to complain, and were proposing others.

My honourable friend this afternoon referred to one matter to which attention has since been called by an honourable gentleman; that was the question of Militia expenditures. The question of retrenchment in that service is altogether too large to be now dealt with. Whether it is commendable or is not, we all hope that the war periods are at an end and that there may be retrenchment in that respect. But I want to say this, that no person anticipates or expects from this Government any consideration for the Militia forces of Canada, because the Militia forces have always been the butt of these honourable gentlemen. They have never turned a friendly ear to the Militia. And what do I see to-day in an order appearing in the Canada Gazette, relative to the wearing of military uniforms by men who have been, and are perhaps to-day, in the service? Everybody knows that when men returned from the front their uniforms in many cases were badly tattered. A generous country might well have considered that and said: "You men having those old clothes may wear them". It has been a pretty hard winter. I do not know what the honourable gentleman has found the condition to be in the Province of Quebec, but I may tell him there have been hard times in the City of Toronto, and had it not been for the generosity of the public spirited and kind hearted citizens there, who magnificently subscribed the sum of $500,000, to be spent in a most careful manner amongst the poor, there would have been a great deal of hardship encountered by the men there out of work. It may be that in wearing the old coats the returned man was wearing it to keep the cold out of his bones. But this kindly disposed Government issued a Militia Order under date of the 20th of November. I will not read it all. After reciting the circumstances it declares:

The wearing of any uniform or article of military clothing, except on those occasions and under those circumstances as set forth in the Militia Act, the King's Regulations and Orders, and in any Militia Order which is or which may hereafter be issued, shall be deemed to be unauthorized.

And in another place it goes on to declare that a man who is found wearing one of those old coats which he had worn over in Europe is liable to a fine not exceeding $300.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Who issues that Order?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Why, it is issued by His Excellency the Governor General in Council, and the Order would come of course from the Militia Department or the Minister of that Department.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: On the recommendation of General MacBrien.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: There is the old story. When anything is done that is wrong, then it is somebody else who does it. When the Canadian National Railways buy a hotel in Paris the Government is powerless—"what can we do?"

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: They did not even know about it.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Nothing is left for the country to do but pay the bills.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The National Railway is your child.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: It is no friend of the honourable gentleman opposite anyway; I would say that.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: We found it on our doorsteps.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: You seem to be bringing it up just now.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: The only thing that the Government have as their stock in trade to-day, when they go before the public of Canada, is the wonderful success they have made of the National Railways. That is the only thing they can boast of.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: They cannot boast of their changes in the tariff, because they have not made any yet; and they are going to be frightened out of making any, too.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Wait and see.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Now, this is a wonderful Government, and it was at one time said that they had a strong man at their head. Well, I will admit this, that the Premier has been asserting himself a bit of late. It is true he was overshadowed a year ago, when he had the then Minister of Justice, and the kind offices of the present Minister of Finance, Mr. Fielding. Now he is by himself—free to do as he will, and to throw out his chest as far as he wishes.

What happened last summer? The annual meeting of representatives of the Colonies was held in Great Britain. I am glad that the Premier of Canada went to that meeting, to act in concert with them as to the lines of policy to be followed by the Overseas Dominions and Great Britain. We had all heard the vaunting of the Premier. We had all heard the fulsome laudations that had been showered upon him by a subsidized press. We had read such newspaper articles as a testimonial given by Mr. Choquette, a former member of this House, who happened to be in England at the time. Although I have not the clipping, this is what Mr. Choquette said: "The greatest man in the world to-day, practically, and the greatest man at the councils of the nations, was the Premier of Canada. Speaking of eloquence, Laurier at his best never surpassed him. Speaking of ideas, he was wonderful. He was the greatest of them all." Well, Mr. Choquette knew the man of whom he was talking, and, as there is a vacancy for a Senatorship in the Province of Quebec, probably Mr. Choquette thought it was well to throw a little adulation at the Premier.

What have we heard about the Premier? We have heard all those assertions as to what a wonderful man he is. Though not a trained lawyer, he had constitutional law at his finger ends. Why, he had written books. He had not confined his life to Canada: he had travelled the United States, and, as one might read in an interview given by him to a correspondent—I think for the Saturday Evening Post about October last—I am sorry I have not the report here—he was a man who performed miracles when he went over to the United States and escaped the draft in this country.

Now he was going to England. Here he was, the skilled diplomat, the man who, as I said before, had constitutional law at his finger ends, the man who would be master of all who might assemble at the board. Who accompanied him? I think it is worth while placing on Hansard the record as to those who did accompany him. The other day a return was brought down in the House of Commons in answer to an inquiry, and here is some information as to the gentleman in his entourage; for he seems to have suffered from "cold feet" when he was about to start for England and encounter the big men. There was Commander Hose, who cost the country $1,468. His secretary, Mr. Agnew, $337. There was General MacBrien, $1,776. There was General MacBrien's secretary, Captain Cummins, at an expense of $1,143. There was Colonel Ryde, at an expense, for services, of $3,966. There was Professor Skelton, at a cost of $6,250 for services and $845 for travelling expenses. The cost is upwards of $18,000 to $20,000. Here was this great diplomat going over there accompanied by Professor Skelton, whose claim to distinction is the fact that he wrote a book on the life of Sir Wilfrid Laurier; but I have yet to learn that he was known as a constitutional lawyer or a man versed in the strategy or art or skill of politics. Yet he goes over there at this cost of $6,250 for his services and $845 for his expenses.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: Did not that prove his skill?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Yes, he proves his skill.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: In drawing public money.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: In drawing public money. But there is little skill required in that, with this Government, as I will show later on. That is simply following a common practice that was inaugurated when this Government came into power.

I notice by the bluebook, the report, that the proceedings there lasted forty-five days, because they opened on the 1st of October and ended on the 14th of November. So Mr. Skelton must have drawn down an average of about $140 a day for his services. But here is the point: the statement has gone out in the public press, it having been anticipated probably that this fact would come out, that Professor Skelton was paid only $50 a day besides his expenses. If the total payment is figured out at $50 a day, then Professor Skelton was missing for 80 odd days. Where was he all the time?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: He was getting ready.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Getting ready. The honourable gentleman anticipates me. Why, at this palatial residence of the Prime Minister up in the hills—Kingsmere, I think the place is called—they were closeted night and day making up the speeches that were to be delivered, doubtless, by the Premier when he got to England.

That is not all. According to this return, when they reached England they had the services of Major Bell, Mr. F. C. Blair, Dr. Camsell, Mr. Coats, Dr. Doughty, Mr. Grisdale, Mr. Duncan Marshall, Colonel Smith and Mr. Harrison Watson. In extenuation of this lengthy list, no expenses are placed opposite their names, because of the fact that they said they were over there on other services.

Well, honourable gentlemen, let us have the real thing in Canada for the future. When we have a Prime Minister who is to be sent abroad, let him go on his merits, and not with a battalion such as this honourable gentleman had to support him and stand at his shoulder. It costs too much to have a Premier of the stamp and style of Mr. Mackenzie King. We ought to have a man who is better fitted for the position. No man knows his own delinquencies and shortcomings better than the man himself. That is my experience, and I think it is the experience of every man. Therefore we can understand how Mr. Mackenzie King, the Premier of Canada, when he was about to go overseas, said, with fear and trembling and knocking at the knees: "If I am to go I must have an entourage." Now let us hear no more of this boast of what a wonderful man the leader of this Government is.

Let us pass on to this book, the Auditor General's Report. Since this Government came into power there has been a raid on the Treasury by every man who thought he had any influence there that he could work. Resurrected from what was supposed to be his last long political sleep, we see Mr. W. T. R. Preston down here on Commissions, one after another. You can see by an answer given the other day that he had drawn several hundreds of dollars; and I have no doubt he is still amongst the employed.

But, above and beyond all others, there is shining one particular star, Mr. Duncan Marshall. Remember, the watchword of this Government was "strict economy," but that was thrown to the winds by Mr. Mackenzie King when he took his battalion along to act as his defenders over in England. Since this Government came into power, according to a return of Parliament, Mr. Duncan Marshall has drawn $11,774 for salary, and $7,863 for travelling expenses, or a total of $19,630. Now, I ask my honourable friend who leads the Government, what has Mr. Marshall been doing? He cannot tell! It is true he was over with Mr. Mackenzie King. I don't know what he was doing. He was an agriculturist, a defeated candidate in the West. And Mr. Duncan Marshall on more than one occasion during that time has been doing nothing more nor less than addressing Liberal meetings in the province of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If my honourable friend would put a question as to the doings of Mr. Marshall, I could furnish him with the answer.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: They are better known and better stated by the honourable gentleman in the House of Commons, who can give day and date where he has been exercising these political proclivities of his. Now, let us have an end of this humbug and this cry of this Government being an economical Government. They are sitting in their places to-day, thanks to the so-called Progressive party. Knowing their life is going to be short, they are going in for a merry one at all events. Stand out here in front of the building any evening and see the battalion of motor cars waiting ready to receive the Ministers. At whose expense are those automobiles furnished? Look into the Auditor General's report and you will see.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: They are all legacies from the old Government.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I beg the honourable gentleman's pardon, they are not legacies from the old Government. But even if they were, are not these the very things they denounced? But they are not legacies from the old Government. Let me give you an example of one of them: "Department of Interior, Cadillac touring car, at a cost of $5,250." What does the honourable gentleman say to that? That is to be found in volume 2, page 241. Then we find "uniforms and overcoats for chauffeurs, $332." and "gloves, $21." And the people of this country are going around praying for bread. These Englishmen who came down from Toronto the other night asked for some place to put them up, and according to the press the Minister of Labour generously breakfasted some thirty odd of these men, and the Prime Minister offered to look after three of them. It is a wonderful Government when they are not dealing with their own money.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Montreal takes care of its unemployed. Toronto should do the same.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: These men were not Toronto men; they came from the West, and settled in Toronto because of the fact that Toronto is so good to them.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: They do not belong to the West.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Let us take another item. Mr. Motherwell, the Minister of Agriculture—and, being an agriculturist, of course he had none of these city tricks, these city ideas, about him—came down here. In volume 1, page 12, will be found the following: "Uniform for chauffeur, $108."

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Nothing is too good for agriculture.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: That is the trouble with the honourable gentleman's friends in this country to-day. While the people are starving, you gentlemen with your big salaries are laughing at them. You know what you experienced in Halifax and Kent, and what you will experience in any riding that you open up.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: What Halifax?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I am glad there is a voice from Halifax. I thought the Liberal party there was dead.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: We are not all dead.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: You are a good reviver. Now, here is the up-keep of this Minister's automobile, $2,185.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: Not the Minister of Agriculture?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: The Minister of Agriculture. Then he has the princely indemnity of $10,000 that is paid to a Minister of the Crown as well as his sessional allowance of $4,000; and, living here in the city of Ottawa, of course he is here to attend Parliament and after Parliament is over. But I see that he draws $98.20 for travelling expense coming to the Session of Parliament and returning. Is it any wonder the people are getting disgusted when they see such contraventions of the law as that? Does my honourable friend smile at that? He cannot smile at it, because I tell him the other Ministers are too decent to do it. I don't suppose any Minister of the Crown ever did it before.

Then we will take another item, because I know the House is anxiously waiting to hear how the Premier gets along. If the honourable gentleman will turn to the Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, he will find there a new car for $2,000. And another one was pointed out to me the other day as belonging to the Minister of Marine. If any complaint could be urged against it, probably some of his friends would say it was painted blue instead of red.

But there is one who towers above them all, and that is Premier King. The up-keep of his automobile, according to the figures—that is, chauffeur, gasoline, and so on, during the year—amounted to $3,259.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: That is very cheap.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Well, he is a cheap man. I will be bound to say that he never paid that much in his lifetime for the maintenance and up-keep of a car at his own expense. Then there is a chauffeur uniform, $152. Then I turn to another part. The honourable gentleman will find in volume 3, page V-72 the expenditure in the Prime Minister's office. I have not been in that office for some time, but I can remember it very comfortably furnished. There was an arm chair in which Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Sir Robert Borden had sat, and everything looked very nice. But when the high and mighty Mr. King moves in, things are not good enough for him. If you go over there to-day you will see the chair he sits in, because I assume he bought it so he might sit in it, that cost the people $112. I have bought some chairs in my time, but I could get a mighty lot of chairs for $112, and so could most of the people in this country. When he has one of his Ministers or some particular friend there he places him vis-a-vis in another $112 chair, and if the company increases its number by four, there are four smaller chairs that cost $330, or a total of $524 for six chairs. I say it is a disgrace at a time when economy should be practised in this country. Does my honourable friend smile at that and applaud it?

That is not the worst of it. Of course, the Prime Minister is a busy man. His time is precious; he has not even time to look at his wrist watch, if he has one, so he has installed, so he can see it with a rapid glance, a red marble dial clock at a cost of $120. Then there are two bronze fixtures, $34,60, and sundries, $35, a total of $713 spent in that one office alone.

Then he has another Department, the Department of External Affairs, and as to some of the expenditures there, I will have to ask some other honourable gentleman to explain. I know this: that in well-arranged houses they have for the purpose of making tea a little hinged tin or enamel ball that opens. It is suspended on a wire or a piece of chain, and that is dropped—I see my honourable friend from De Lanaudière anticipates me; he knows it all, and they are a well-known article—this is then dropped with the tea in it into the teapot and the hot water poured on it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Call it a teapot dome.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Could any man in his right senses believe that in the office of the Premier of Canada there was installed an electric tea ball at a cost of $18?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: It must be silver. That is very cheap for the teapot and everything.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: It may be, but it is not much consolation to the people of Canada to think that they have a Premier who asked them to pay for his private convenience to the tune of $18, even if he has to take tea. Then there are two ferns and three jardinières, at a cost of $17. If honourable gentlemen are proud of that, I am surprised at them. I do not object to the Premier drinking tea, even if it is furnished free of charge by his patron, Peter Larkin, the High Commissioner; but I do object to this country paying $18 for this paltry tea ball for the convenience of the Premier of Canada. I am told this is small talk. Of course it is, but we are dealing with a small man.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: That is to receive the Japanese Consul.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: What I have given you is only a sample of what can be found if you go through the Auditor General's report. Talk about the girls in the Departments not being employed with work, and of their doing fancy work, crocheting or knitting. I don't blame any girl who passes the office of the External Affairs Department and who sniffs the odor of the Premier's tea, and, knowing she can't go in to participate, going back to her knitting.

Here in the city of Ottawa, where the Government is boasting because it is cutting off the heads of men, these disgraceful expenditures are going on. As I said before, in this city no less than $1,450,000 is being paid for offices. Offices are being transferred from buildings which have been rented from men who are not political friends of the Government to buildings which are owned by their friends. Here is a whole row of buildings, good buildings, and these gentlemen will not take them. My honourable friend said this afternoon: "What can a poor Government do? We have docks from one end of the country to the other, we have public buildings, and our engineers inspect them and report that money must be expended to maintain them or they will be swept away." I agree that in cases of that kind it is very proper that the work should be done. But you are not doing that. You are playing the game of politics, and politics alone, to help you to party advantages. Let me cite a case right in the province of Ontario, because I know something about that province. There is a riding called North York, which is represented by the Premier of Canada, and if you look you will see an item:

Jackson's Point, to purchase and reconstruct a dock, $6,400.

To my own knowledge—because I have lived on Lake Simcoe and have been often at Jackson's Point—the old dock has stood for forty years and more, and no member of Parliament, whether Liberal or Conservative, has ever dared to ask the Government to buy that dock, because the establishment of a Government dock at that point is simply disgraceful. Mulock and Aylesworth as Liberals never dared ask for such a thing. Armstrong, the late Conservative member, dared not ask for it. But the great man King has got slipped into the Estimates this sum for party advantages in his own riding. I do not know who owns the dock, but I think it would be a safe wager to say that it was some good Grit who had performed services for his party.

Take another item. There is the sum of $50,000 in the Estimates for a dock at the city of Oshawa. Any man who knows the city of Oshawa knows that it is on two lines of railway—the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific—and yet this Government is going to make an additional expenditure of $50,000 to make a harbour there. What do we want a harbour there fore? It is nothing but the pork-barrel. The Government succeeded in winning that riding, and as a reward are going to spend $50,000 there. Oshawa is a growing city; it was incorporated the other day. But this is a time when the Government, through my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Dandurand), are defending their action on the ground that they are maintaining old works because they want to be economical. Yet here they are embarking on an expenditure of $50,000 at that point, and the estimate does not show what the ultimate cost will be.

Then we come to Pellee Island, represented by the Minister of Railways and Canals, and there is a proposed expenditure there of $66,000. We go to the town of Collingwood, where there is dredging to be done at an expenditure of $30,000. In passing, let me say this: Collingwood is an old shipping town. There is an elevator there owned by the Government of Canada which could handle a great quantity of grain. Why does not the Government take the $50,000 from Oshawa and rehabilitate the elevator at Collingwood and use its own railway line to carry the grain? That would be sound policy. The line is a short one to Montreal with a connection at Barrie and on down to Orillia. But here is this drib-and-drab process going on in order to make the party solid.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I see two items for Collingwood—$50,000. Are they justifiable?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Yes, I think they are quite justifiable, but I do say that the Government, instead of buying a dock in Mackenzie King's riding and doing some of these other works, should concentrate at Collingwood and provide business for their own railway system and their elevator there.

Now, I turn the page over to the other provinces, and I see these new wharves proposed all over. In the province of Quebec I see upwards of eight or ten new wharves to be constructed, some of them quite expensive wharves too. Yet my honourable friend justifies all these expenditures on the ground that they are only for the maintenance and repair of old ones. It is not that at all; in many cases it is the other work altogether.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Nine-tenths of these works seem to be repairs.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Well, they may be. However, if one leaves a bad apple in a barrel with nine good ones, what is he doing? It is the pork-barrel, pure and simple.

So I could go on through this report. In some cases public buildings are being started, though I cannot place my finger on them just at the present. Yet the Government are playing politics: they are not out for a policy of retrenchment at all; they are simply seeing how many votes they can get in each locality, because God knows they will need them badly if an election should come on.

Hon Mr. DANDURAND: That should not concern the honourable gentleman; he is safe here.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: But it does; for as a citizen of Canada I want to see a good Government. Now we will come to another line of expenditure. Premier King referred the other day to this when he said he thought the time had come for stopping Government Commissions.

You had a Commission last year to consider the question of the grain rates. You spent probably $40,000 or $50,000 on it. You enacted legislation in order to protect the shipper of grain from the Northwest, and after the law was on the Statute Book this Government would not put it into force—why? Either because they were afraid of the vessel men, or the vessel men had a grip on them. I have here a clipping dated April 21, 1923, when the law was in force, and I will read to you what it says:

> Rates are quoted to-day on the lakes at 6 cents a bushel by the Standard Company. This is the organization in Winnipeg that controls 56 per cent of all available Canadian lake tonnage.

And after this Government had frittered away—because it was a frittering away if you did not propose to enforce the law—

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Last April the law was not enacted; it was in June last.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Well, there was a disposition on the part of these gentlemen, the owners, to ship at 6 cents a bushel, and I have seen some statements in a paper that to-day while the rates are being quoted from Duluth to Buffalo at 2½ cents, I think it was, there are no rates being quoted at nearly that figure from Fort William to Buffalo, which is an equal distance; and the Government will not enforce the law, and the farmer of the West will be mulcted in excessive costs as he was last year.

Talking about Commissions, you have the one of which Mr. D'Arcy Scott is the counsel at $100 a day. The day goes on, and the day goes over, and $100 a day is dropped into his hands. Well, a good many lawyers in Canada do business for less than $100 a day for a month.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Mr. Tilley had $500.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: And $100 a day when he stopped home.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: With all due deference to Mr. Scott, I do not think his rating at the Bar is the same as Mr. Tilley's.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Well, there is one to five.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: There it is, with an expenditure of thousands of dollars on these Commissions, all simply to give pap to their political friends, when the Speech from the Throne says that they are devoting themselves altogether to economy.

Well, the honourable gentleman can peruse at his leisure the Auditor General's report. A very hurried inspection gave me a few of these gems, and I can promise him that if he looks through that report he will find hundreds of others that are equally glaring and equally indefensible.

What this Government needs to do is this—to do business in a businesslike way and on a business scale, and not be frittering away money. Let them go into something big, even if the country will not stand it. I believe the country would stand the expenditure to-day of money on doing many things, even if the money had to be borrowed; but the country is not prepared to expend money along the lines that these honourable gentlemen are following.

This country has the National Railways, and can only make them pay by giving them a good rate on traffic. Let the Government go to work, and in the interests of the Canadian National Railway build elevators on the Georgian Bay. I do not care where they are built, though there is only one real place for them, emphatically, and it is the town where I live. You have a large elevator there to-day, and if alongside of it and in connection with it there were placed another million-bushel storage, you would get the same result that you had with the other elevator last year. The Government had one elevator there of two-and-a-half million bushels; with commendable energy and foresight and good judgment they put an addition to it, and last year, before it was really completed, it was filled to the top, and through that operation you did 60,000 bushels of grain where you had never done 40,000 before. There is an elevator well equipped with power, well situated, but here the Government sits dawdling with money, throwing it away—$20,000 on trips of the Prime Minister to England, $10,000 for a dock here, and $20,000 for another one there.

I would ask the honourable gentleman to take this matter to Council and talk it over seriously and say: "Here, we have on the Upper lakes a great trade to work up; we have an elevator there which if it had an addition would do double the business it is doing to-day." Let the Government wake up and do business in the public interest, and not in the interests of their friends.

This Government has a line of boats on the Upper lakes. I do not blame Sir Henry Thornton for the way in which those boats have been treated; he may be a superman, but he cannot control every part and portion of that vast system of lake and water transportation. But will the country believe that two of the very best boats that were owned by this Government were put up and sold on a falling market last year into the hands of competitors, to go out and fight their own National boats? Now, that is true. There must be something ulterior when this Government will sell its best boats to its competitors and keep inferior ones.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: We have two or three dozen more to sell.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Well, I can tell the honourable gentleman he should have sold the worst ones, not the best ones.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: But no one will buy the worst ones.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Another thing. Last year the Government of Canada handled thousands of tons of coal at the town of Midland. They had their own vessels tied up at docks in this country, and they would not handle one ton of that coal, and the contractors had to go to the United States to hire vessels to come over there and carry the Government coal while the Government boats were tied up. I ask the leader of the House if that is good business.

Now, you cannot disparage those boats to the extent of saying that they were not fit to carry coal, because when the pressure got so great in the fall, and your competitors were forced to pay abnormal rates, you turned those vessels into the grain trade and they did good business in that line also; yet through the summer months this Government was actually hiring American boats through a contractor to carry coal when their own boats were tied up at the dock.

Is it any wonder that the men of this country who are paying the taxes, who see performances of that kind, can come to no other conclusion than that there is something behind—that there is some ulterior motive on the part of persons who have a pull with the Government—when they have damaged their own property and spent the people's money to that extent?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend forgets that it is the Canadian National Board that handles the grain.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: There it is again—the Canadian National Board; but when that Board puts out a healthy and a good showing for the work done by them, and their receipts are good, the Premier and the Ministers and down to the humblest member of the Cabinet stroke themselves down and say, "We did it." Canada pays the bills but the deficits come out of this railway.

The times are serious in this country; there is no doubt about that. It is all very well to whistle to keep up our courage, but the prospects are none too good in Canada. We have to bear the aftermath of the war. We are all filled with hope and resolution, and so we should be, because I believe that the tide will turn,, and prosperity will come our way. But in the meantime do not let us have so much of this humbug, to the effect that the present Government is an economical Government, when such a record stares them in the face, and we see some of the expenditures they are making. Let them play the game of statesmen, play the game of patriotism, play the game of Canadians, and not the game of petty politicians struggling by hook and by crook to maintain power, at the cost of principle and of self-respect in the long run.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Honourable gentlemen, there are a few remarks I wish to make in regard to the Estimates that have been laid before us. I think the history of the world during the last two or three years establishes one thing beyond doubt, and that is that there are world movements that raise and lower prices in spite of the combined governments of the world. There is no use in our trying to quarrel with those forces, and I am not disposed to try to make any capital out of what the Government has nothing to do with ,and for which they are not at all to blame. They are not in any way to blame for the prices which the people of Canada are able to get in foreign countries for what they produce. That is something beyond them altogether.

No doubt there is a great depreciation in prices of everything we have to sell. Wheat has gone down; so has beef; lumber is coming back a little; but there was great distress in the lumber trade; there is great distress among fishermen. I do not blame the Government for that in any way. All that a farmer or any other man can do when he finds that what he has to sell is bringing a reduced price is to look to the other side of his account and make all the economies he can. I think that is all that can be expected of this Government. In my opinion there is no good in trying to make any case against them with regard to what Canada has had to export.

It is simply a question now whether the Government are doing as much as we have a right to expect from them in looking after the other side of the account and reducing the large expenditures. In my humble opinion I think they are trifling with the situation, and are going at it in the wrong way. You cannot rule a democracy unless you have the dominant sentiment of the country behind you.

Now, just as long as this House and the House of Commons and the Government leave their salaries and their indemnities where they are, the dominant sentiment of this country will not be behind them when they come to cut the salaries or abolish the bonus of postal clerks or typists. I think the country has a fair right to expect us to begin at Jerusalem in dealing with public economy. It is a perfectly fair thing to hurl at this House or at the other House the saying, "Physician, heal thyself."

I want to say that I think it is in the hands of the Government to make an enormous economy with regard to this House and the other House without really hurting any person in either of the two Houses. What are the facts about the present Session? Early in the year the telegraphic despatches all over the country from Ottawa said that the Session was to begin early in January. Then, later on it was said that it would be late in January; then it would be early in February; and then late in February, when it met. As a matter of fact, I could have been very busy during the whole of the months of January and February, and could have got my work out of the way if I had known the Session was to open here at the end of February. So far as I am concerned, the Government spoiled the winter, and now it is perfectly clear that they are going to spoil the summer. In the United States, Congress opens on a stated day. If this Parliament were to open on a certain day, say the 20th January, and proceed to business, and adopt the closure rule, and let us out of here early in the first days of May, or not later than the middle of May, it would be to the great advantage of each member of this House —he at the same time going back to the old indemnity of $2,500 a Session. Even making a reduction of $1,000 in the indemnity would mean $96,000 here, and in the House of Commons it would mean $235,000, and there would be a saving of incidental expenses through the shortening of the Session.

I think the Government are not alive to the situation, or they would have dealt with the indemnity, and have made good to the members or this House and the members of the House of Commons by setting a definite date for the opening of Parliament, and shortening the time. Then, when members knew those dates, they could make their business engagements for all the rest of the year. As it is now, a man's year is absolutely spoiled. As I say, the winter has gone, and the summer will be gone; out of the whole of these twelve months there will not be three months altogether that a man could say belonged to himself. That is where I think the Government are at fault, and the sooner they get busy about that the better.

Having done that, Parliament can go with good grace to some other institutions in the country and ask that there be a reduction of salaries outside of this House, in the Civil Service. I find in the accounts for the administration of justice that the salaries of judges of all classes amount to about $2,000,000, in round numbers. Now, if you make a reduction of 25 per cent in the indemnity of members here, say from $4,000 to $3,000, I would propose a reduction of one-fifth on the salary of all the judges—every one of them from top to bottom. That would give you $400,000. There is no doubt that no class in the community could stand the cut better than the judges. When I came to this House the salary of a judge of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia was $4,000; now it is $9,000. The County Court judges' salaries were about $2,000 up to $2,500; now they are all paid $5,000. If you are going to ask typists and clerks on salaries of $600 and $1,200, and men that work in the fields and in the drains, to economize and to make a self-sacrifice, I do not know any class in the community on which you could more fairly make a claim than you could on all the judges in Canada. Furthermore, I have enough faith in the character and patriotism of the judges to believe that there would be no great complaint from them if we did that, provided always that we dealt here on proper lines with the indemnities of members of both Houses.

Proceeding from the judges, I would cut the salaries of Cabinet Ministers, and reduce the number. Then, I would deal with all the high salaries on the railways. I made a short calculation as to approximately what in my mind would be a fair thing to do with salaries, irrespective of where they are, apart from those two that I have already mentioned, namely, our own indemnities and the salaries of the judges. Salaries from $8,000 up I would cut by one-fifth. From a salary of $6,000 I would take one-sixth. From a $4,000 salary I would take one-eighth. From lower salaries I would take a smaller proportion, until coming down to a $2,000 salary, I would take off one-twentieth. It is perfectly certain that you can save a large sum of money in that way.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: They might go on strike.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: Then there are savings that can be made apart from this question of reduction of salaries. There is a Committee at work now on the Civil Service, but it would be in a much better position to deal with the Civil Service if it had behind it legislation carrying out the reductions of which I have spoken. If you do not have that, and you come into conflict with the postal clerks or other classes in the Civil Service, you are going to be beaten. They will defy you, and the people of this country will be behind those employees with small salaries. I know it now. I have seen a good deal of this country in these last six months; it so happens, a good deal more than I had seen in any other six months for some years; and that is one of the things that are in the minds of the people of this country almost from coast to coast—that time is wasted here, there is an enormous waste of public money, and it is an outrage that a man with a wife and three or four children and who is getting perhaps only $1,600 or $1,800 a year, should be thrown out of his employment, at a month's notice, while members of the Senate and members of the House of Commons are drawing a $4,000 indemnity and the judges are paid salaries of $10,000 and $12,000.

I do not want to travel over the whole field, but I wish to call attention to a debate which took place in the other House two or three days ago. It was a discussion with regard to the agricultural experiment stations. It is a very enlightening debate. The statement made by the men from the West and by Miss Macphail was a very creditable one, and what surprises me is that, though they made out what appeared to me to be a perfectly unanswerable case for closing up two-thirds of those experiment stations, the debate finally flopped and all the money asked for was voted. I am entirely in sympathy with the contention that there can be at least $250,000, possibly, $400,000, saved on institutions that are of no value at all. I do not mean to say that there are no men there who are any good. There are a number of good men in stations like the Central Experimental Farm here, where research work is conducted. There is useful work done, and you may be able to justify having perhaps one of these farms in British Columbia and one in each of the other provinces. We have three in Nova Scotia,—the one at Truro, the one at Kentville, and the one at Maccan. Now, there is no more need of those three stations in Nova Scotia than there is for a fifth wheel on a coach. The institution at Truro is a provincial school, centrally placed, and there is railway communication with it from all other parts of the province; but the institutions at Kentville and at Maccan could be closed up without the slightest loss to the province. There is a good man at Kentville, Mr. Blair: he could be transferred to the Central School at Truro. I do not know about the head man at Maccan. But there is no difference of climate in Nova Scotia. I can understand why you want one experimental farm up north, to see what will grow there, and why you want one in British Columbia; but why there should be three institutions in Nova Scotia, trying experiments in the feeding of steers on the ordinary feed of the country, and why money should be lost on every one of their experiments, is something that I do not understand at all. If there were a new feed, a new grass or something of that kind, to experiment with, there might be some value in such an experiment. But that is not the case. I have scarcely any patience with it. However, I am not going to labour that any longer, because practically, mutatis mutandis, what those people from the West had to say with regard to the experiment stations applies to the whole of the Maritime Provinces.

As to saving the sum of $40,000,000 or $60,000,000 and reducing taxation, there is not the slightest doubt in my mind that instead of decreasing public expenditures by that amount, if two or three good business men examined the affairs of this country, a saving of nearly $100,000,000 could be effected.

I am not going to travel through the other items. There are other features of these Estimates which will come up in connection with the railways, and which can all be discussed when some of the railway bills are dealt with. But, before sitting down, there is one matter to which I would like to call the attention of the honourable Leader of the House, because I do not understand it. I was under the impression that we had in this country a Civil Service Act. Now I find in these Estimates three items on which I think we ought to have some explanation before we vote them. There is on page 59 an item, number 318, to provide for the administration of the Business Profits War Tax Act, 1916, and the Income War Tax Act, 1917, and amendments thereof, and authority for this purpose to create positions and make appointments notwithstanding anything contained in the Civil Service Act, "and the said positions and the staff so appointed are hereby wholly excluded from the operation of the said Act." There is provision for a salary of $10,000 for the Commissioner of Taxation. The amount of the item is $2,000,000. That is taken from under the Civil Service Act.

I understand that the history of this section is this. From 1917 down to date the Finance Minister or his Deputy appointed the employees, and after they were appointed according to the opinion of the Deputy Minister of Justice, or the Minister—I do not remember which—they were held to be under the Civil Service Act.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I never heard of that.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: Yes, that opinion was given. They raised the question themselves.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But they were all appointed directly by the Government.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: Yes. The Civil Service Commission had nothing to do with the appointment. The Department itself selected the officials; but then it was held by the Department of Justice that, once appointed, they automatically came under the Civil Service Act. These words now at the end of the item are new: "and the said positions and the staff so appointed are hereby wholly excluded from the operation of the Act."

If we are to have a Civil Service Act, I think we ought to be given some explanation of why this large expenditure of $2,000,000 is taken outside the Civil Service Act.

You will find on page 62 another item, number 364:

Salaries and contingent expenses of the several ports in the Dominion, including pay for overtime of officers, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act, and temporary buildings and rentals, $5,720,710.

I do not know the history of that, but I would like to have some explanation of it. I am not very much in love with the Civil Service Act, but as long as we have one I see no reason why those two sums, amounting together to $7,720,000, should be taken out of the administration of the Civil Service Act.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend is adding the two items together?

Hon. Mr. ROSS: Yes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: This one is $5,720,000.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: Yes, on page 62, and there is the item of $2,000,000 on the other page.

Hon. Mr. STANFIELD: The employees of the Income Tax Branch have never been under the Civil Service Act. The late Government appointed them that way.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: What I want to say to you is this: I am told on the very best of authority that the employees in that Department raised the question, claiming that they were under the Civil Service Act once they were appointed, and that the question was left with the Minister of Justice, who decided that they were. You now have words that never were in the appropriation before; namely, those words that I told you were new, withdrawing those employees entirely from the Civil Service Act.

Hon. Mr. POPE: That is the reason the words are there.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: There is another item, which is not very large, and which you will find on page 7. There may be some good reason for it. It amounts to only $125,000. Perhaps it is a sort of transient, accidental thing. It relates to the registration of bonds in connection with the loans.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: On what page is that last figure?

Hon. Mr. ROSS: It is on page 7—an item of $125,000. But I think I can see an explanation for that.

Honourable gentlemen, I am not going to detain you any longer on this thing. I am dissatisfied with the reductions made by the Government. I do not think they have risen at all to the occasion, and what I look for is a change of ways on the part of the Government, and an endeavour to get this country out of what is a rather embarrassing financial position. There is no doubt our people in the Maritime Provinces are leaving us every day. People are leaving the older provinces. It is all very well to say that things are all right. They are not all right. The first thing to do, in my opinion, is to slash the public expenditure in every possible way. Then see if you cannot clear the way to reduce taxation and railway rates, because they are both at the root of any advance in public prosperity.

Hon. G. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Honourable gentlemen, a critic of public expenditure gets very little sympathy. For many years in our history we were blessed with low taxation, and when there was no direct taxation, people paid no attention to the action of their various Governments. I remember when in the province there was no taxation at all that we knew about. There has been none in the Dominion until the last few years. Therefore, when the changes were rung upon the extravagances of the various Governments, people said, "Oh, that is just politics," and passed on, without paying any more heed. It was impossible to turn out any Government on the plank of extravagance. But things have changed since Hannah died. What was merely a dream has become a nightmare. In my judgment Governments are going to be held responsible for the immoral extraction of money from the people's pockets. I say immoral, because how any man of honour, realizing his duty to his country and having an appreciation of right and wrong, can see any distinction between taking money out of the Public Treasury to placate the voters in a district or to put into his own pocket is more than I can understand.

We have grown up with the idea that the Government owns the country and the money of the country, and that so long as it only takes it and uses it to corrupt the electorate it is honourable and scathless. That was all very well so long as we did not have to listen to the hammer of the tax collector on our own front doors. But I heard some gentlemen not long ago discussing the question of whether or not it was immoral to make false returns on tax papers. They said they had no scruple in cheating the tax collector when the levy was dishonest and immoral.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: They could not get absolution then.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Blackstone says it is no harm.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Two wrongs make a right.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Is it a moral wrong, when you have a Government taxing you for things that are unnecessary, to resist and avoid payment? Whether it is or whether it is not, there are thousands of people who are doing it, and who are salving their consciences by saying that the tax is extortionate and unjust. For my own part I must say that if I did not have to sign my name to my tax-paper and tell an untruth over my signature, I would not consider it immoral to evade the payment of my taxes. I think it is the duty of a citizen to support the Government of his country and to pay all the justifiable taxation which is levied upon him; but when I find the Government taking from people who are in distress and who are absolutely unable to pay, great sums of money for expenditures which are avoidable, I must confess that if I were on a jury I could not convict a man of wrongdoing who tried to avoid payment.

Look at the state of our taxation. I was told the other day that in the province of Manitoba the taxes were $25,000,000 in arrears. What does that mean? It means that the people cannot pay. I was talking to a tax collector in Hamilton the other day, and he told me that he knew that there was not one merchant from James Street to the Bay who was making any money. Yet they have to pay this enormous taxation.

Take up the company returns and see the gigantic sums of money which the companies in Canada are paying into the treasury of this country. What does it all mean? I spoke to a gentleman the other day who is in a very large way of business. He is selling out. He said: "What is the use of expanding my business when on every thousand dollars that I add to it the tax mounts up 20, 30, 50, 60, 70 per cent? There is simply no use going on." That man is one of the greatest merchants in Canada, and I know that he is contracting his business, because, as he says, there is no use trying to expand it any more.

I am not trying to play politics, but I sincerely and honestly believe that this country will get into the class of the small countries of the world unless someone arises who has enough patriotism in his soul to look after public expenditure. Just look at this building. I walked around here to-day with a gentleman, and he said: "Oh, they tell you you are playing politics if you talk about the little expenditures. They forget that little drops of water make the mighty ocean." Let me point to something down opposite the door of the House of Commons. There are nine benches there which this man —and he is an official in this building—says cost $600 a piece. That is the price of a good farm; and that is just a drop in the bucket in the cost of this building. Down next to the House of Commons reading room there is a place decorated in such a way that if Louis Quatorze had had such a room he would have died of heart disease. And who do you suppose the decorations consist of? Bunches of cigars and cigarettes. It looks like one of the United cigar stores.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Is that the smoking room?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: We have a smoking room out here—and I heard a resolution passed in this Chamber that it was to cost $1,000—upon which I am told $10,000 was spent. That, honourable gentlemen, is because we have lost our bearings on public matters; we have no idea of handling other people's money.

I agree with every word said by the last speaker (Hon. W. B. Ross). I think that what he said about the reduction of salaries is absolutely right and just and proper; but, as he said, a man that had any sense at all could so regulate the sittings and the duration of the sessions of Parliament that there would be no hardship on anybody. But everything goes. It is just "come day, go day, God send Sunday." Nobody cares a rap. We have got sixteen ministers, and, so far as honest constructive work goes, I do not believe they do enough work to keep them warm. What do they do? They have deputies who are the heads of the Departments. I think if any Minister of the Crown would sit down and say: "Now, instead of laying the lash on the people of Canada, year after year with more taxation, I will use my time in trying to curtail expenditures," the people of this country would rise up and call him blessed.

Democratic government is on trial, and there is no need of mouthing from the housetops to say so. If you read the thoughtful magazines, if you look at Spain and Italy, if you see this new society called the Crusaders that is arising in England, you will come to the conclusion that the day has come when the people are commencing to wonder whether or not government as we have it is the best form of government. I defy anybody to point to any public man in Canada who has ever made it his business, when he was in office and had the power, to cut down the expenses and look after the money of this country. They say man is a gold-hunting animal. He is a gold-hunting animal, and is on the grab all the time; and around the Government at Ottawa there are shoals of parasites, people who are everlastingly tempting their Government to expenditure—clamouring members, contractors, people from cities that want expenditures—and it takes a man who is a man to resist them.

There are just two things for which the Government is of any use: one is to save us money, and the other is to promote the prosperity of the country by proper tariffs or proper adjustments of that kind. All other things are vain.

At the risk of being accused of talking politics, I would just like to mention the tower of this building. All the great cathedrals and other splendid buildings of Europe took hundreds of years to build. They were gradually built and added to first a wing here, then a tower and that went on over many years, and is going on now. But here we think we must do everything in a year. Everyone will admit that this country is being taxed to death; everyone will admit that we cannot afford to pay the taxation that we are being forced to pay; and yet the Government want to spend $600,000 on vanity, to stick another piece on the tower. And what did they do? Upon my soul, it sounds like Alice in Wonderland. I am told they brought stones from Europe to put into the tower. Of all the sloppy sentimentality I ever heard of, the bringing of stones from Europe to put into the tower of the Parliament Buildings of Canada is the worst. The bent of the human mind is an extraordinary thing. I remember one time there was a horrible murder at Brantford. Shortly afterwards I was there, and with a friend of mine was walking across a bridge, when he said: "That is where the murder was committed." I said: "What tore all that shrubbery to pieces?" He said: "That was done by the people who came to the scene of the murder taking mementos away with them." They took away almost a ton of pieces of branches and leaves from the scene of the murder. In just the same way this Government have gone to the scene of the murder and have brought the stones of France to Canada. What inspiration are they going to give to the people of this country? I thought it was bad enough when all this scrap iron those old cannons that are scattered around the parks of this country and that no one ever looks at was brought here; but now they have brought the stones over.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But that is not what will attract attention. It is the carillon that will be installed in the tower.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Haven't we got enough stones in Canada? It is like the building of that great harbour in Toronto—making land in Canada—bringing stones to Ottawa. It is funny to think of. I say the Government cannot justify the expenditure of that $600,000—and it will be a million before the work is done—and when it is done, what will it be? It looks to me like the tongue of a wagon stuck up in front of a wagon. That tower has nothing to do with the building, and, I do not think the building will look any more beautiful when the tower is twice as high as it is now. At all events, it is a luxury.

I did not like the statement of the leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) when he said the Government of Canada was not responsible for that hotel purchase in Paris. He is wrong, and if the Government takes that view it is wrong. The Government should be responsible, and should not allow any management to spend the money of this country at its own sweet will. If the Government is not responsible for it, then all Sir Henry Thornton has to do is to touch the button and get all he wants. He has got $400,000,000 now for equipment, and I suppose, sated with that, he is going to put on all these frills. Mr. Graham says that purchase was a mistake. If it was a mistake, he should stop it.

When I was in London this summer, I saw the building in which the High Commissioner is entombed—a very handsome building on Pall Mall just off from Waterloo Square—and to my absolute amazement I heard that the Government had gone down and bought the old Union Club. I know that building is at least sixty or seventy years old; I have been in it many a time, and it is not in the least adapted to offices. It is not on the business side of the street. Further, why do we want to pick out the most expensive property we can get? It is like the nouveau riche, those people who get a lot of money and go out and buy the finest car and most magnificent house, and put on all the vulgar airs they know how. That is not what the British Government does. The British Government houses the Government of the Empire in a very humble, obscure street. The American Government has no such quarters for its Embassy. But the smaller the country, the bigger the building, it seems to me, and the more crazy the expenditure. I went down just off Waterloo Square, and there I saw a magnificent building, that of British Columbia. I have forgotten where Ontario's building is. Of course, each province, as well as the Dominion has got to have its own building. From a business point of view what earthly use is the High Commission? I don't know, and I have never been able to find out. Lord Strathcona set his face against palatial offices all his life; he said the quarters down Victoria Street were good enough for anybody, and he performed his duties as well as any man could be expected to do. He did not need to have a building as high as Nelson's monument.

They tell me that we have 200 Civil Servants in London. An honourable gentleman here this afternoon said that we have 500,000 employees. That means that we have over 2,000,000 people, or one in every sixteen, living on this country. It is said that the recent revolution in Spain was caused by the fact that the whole country was packed full of office-holders. So is this country, from ourselves down. Think of Canada having a House of Commons of nearly 300 and going strong—going to have more this year. I saw a gentleman who went through here, who said that the West had not enough representation. Will you tell me what on earth good ten or fifteen members are to the city of Toronto or Montreal? Not a snap of a finger.

I had something to do with preventing Hamilton from getting more than three members in the Ontario Legislature. My argument was that we were taxed enough to elect three, and we did not want to be taxed to elect another one. What good are they? They are not listened to in the House. You make your speech; it is embalmed, just as mine is going to be, in the Hansard; but it will not have the effect of a snap of the finger. Those members who come here from Toronto and Montreal are not listened to. The Government makes up its mind before it hears the debate what it is going to do, and it puts that legislation through every Session, whatever the members say about it. Mr. Marler made a wonderful cpeech, and reflected great credit on himself; it was one of the finest speeches I have read for many a year, that came down to the practical business of governing this country; but he was just throwing sand against the wind, for the Government had committed itself. I have yet to see the Government that is big enough and strong enough to back down when anybody shows them that they are wrong. They will put their legislation through unless the Senate kills it. And thus it goes on year after year. I think that we could afford to give a man $50,000 a year, within half a mile of where we sit, and I will undertake that he would save $2,000,000 a year if we gave him a free hand, and he was any kind of a business man. But we do not care.

Now, to come to an end of these rambling remarks, the people are going to make us care. You cannot sit down in a railway train and talk to any man but he will say, "Well, Senator, you know I am paying so-and-so." Everbody knows what taxes are now. They run away with the idea that the Government thinks that spending money makes them popular. You cannot gain elections by spending money in any of the constituencies. It cannot be done. I have seen them come up to Hamilton and spend from twenty to fifty—yes, a hundred thousand dollars; and who gets it? They bring up a troop of outsiders, and the contractor gets it, and nobody knows what is going on. There was no penalty heretofore, but now the people have to pay taxes.

I remember the late Chief Justice Armour saying once, "I wish I were Czar of this country for just six months: I would make everybody pay taxes, and then they would make every Government sit up." That is what they would do, and that is what they will do. Now, when you come to talk to an audience and mention taxes, they are interested; so are the Boards of Trade and the newspapers. Mr. O'Leary, who fired that shot the other day in Maclean's Magazine, has done more to stir up the people of Canada than any man in the last ten years. I think he has done a wonderfully patriotic work, and as I heard an honourable gentleman say here to-day, nobody has been able to lay a finger upon a misstatement in it. Now, that is only the Civil Service, but there are dozens of other abuses, even worse than the Civil Service.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

JUDGES BILL

SECOND READING POSTPONED

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of Bill 25, an Act to amend the Judges Act.

He said: After the suggestions of the honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross) last evening, my proposition may appear to be in direct contradiction to his conclusion. The honourable gentleman suggested that the emoluments of judges and others should be reduced.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: You are adding to them?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It so appears on the face of the Bill, but it is not an increase. The proposed amendment to the Judges Act would bring the salary of the judge of the Territorial Court in the Yukon Territory from $7,000 to $9,000, but, according to the declaration of the Minister of Justice, he has enjoyed a living allowance of $5,000 in addition to the $7,000, and the purpose of the increase which is being voted him is to place him on a par with judges of his own class, who were granted $9,000 some years ago.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: In the Yukon Territory?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes. He is now receiving $7,000.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But, I mean to ask, have his predecessors in the Yukon enjoyed a salary of $9,000?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No, they have not. There was a time when they, like all other judges of Superior and Supreme Courts in Canada, were paid $5,000; but they were two in number and they received in addition a living allowance of $5,000, which brought the total payment to them individually up to $10,000. That emolument of $5,000 was increased to $7,000, and the judge continued to receive his living allowance of $5,000. The Minister of Justice declares that after this amendment is made the judge will receive only $3,000 instead of $5,000 for living allowance. Therefore the only change will be to put his regular salary on the same level as that of the other judges. The great advantage for him will be that his retiring allowance will be based on the increased salary of $9,000; but when he does retire he will not be entitled to receive more than the $6,000, that is, the two-thirds to which any retiring judge receiving a salary of $9,000 would be entitled. The increase in charge will be in his retiring allowance.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: It would be an increase of $1,000 a year.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Perhaps it would be $1,000.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: That is what the Minister of Justice said.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: What is the population the judge up there serves? Has the honourable gentleman any information as to that?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No, I have not.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: About 4,000 I think.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Only he is obliged to live there.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: That is bad.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: And to serve the district in whatever work there is.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But he does it willingly, does he not?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes, willingly; but I suppose he would prefer to be transferred to Vancouver or Toronto.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I suppose that in his spare time he could dig for gold.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I do not know to what he devotes his spare time—perhaps to his library.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Now that prohibition is in force, he will not have to try drunks. He will have only mining cases.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: He will have the bootlegger, though.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I wonder if there is not a Justice of the Peace who is attending to those cases.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable gentlemen, we have reached a period in the government of Canada when all minds are more or less concentrated upon retrenching and cutting down expenditure. I have some knowledge as to the expenditure which is made by the Government of Canada in connection with the Yukon Territory, and I say with absolute confidence that there is no other section of the Dominion in which, relatively so much money is being unnecessarily spent. There is no reason why there should not be a thorough reorganization of that entire Territory. I feel satisfied—in fact, I know from an examination which I made into the subject shortly before we were driven into the wilderness—that half of the expenditure could be saved to the exchequer of Canada. Why, I ask, should there be a duplication of all kinds of services in a community not numbering more than probably 3,000 or 4,000 people? Why should there be practically all the machinery of a judiciary, all the duplication of public servants, and so on? One or two public officials could transact all the business for that community; yet we have, relatively speaking, a small army of them, practically duplicating the same services that are carried on in the provinces, but of course, on a very much reduced scale. There is no question that if the Government gave its attention to the reorganization not only of the machinery of government, but of the ordinary services which are rendered in that Territory, we could save a very substantial amount.

Furthermore, there is no reason why the so-called government of the Yukon Territory should not be handed over to the province of British Columbia. For some time that project was discussed with more or less seriousness, and I heard no expression of disbelief in its feasibility. The system of extravagance into which we have fallen, and from which we have not rescued ourselves, was entered upon at a period when we believed that country was overrun with gold, as it was to a certain extent, though we permitted our American friends to cart it all to the American side of the line. So far as I know, we have not entered on any serious reduction of those expenditures since that time.

Why should a judge be paid $5,000 for living expenses in the Yukon Territory? Is there any difference in the cost of living between that section and British Columbia, or any of the other western provinces, or indeed any eastern province? The judge has access to all the centres of civilization by the ordinary means of transportation, and by the generosity extended by the transportation companies to many judges, I will not say all, notwithstanding that it is possibly against the policy of the Act. Why, then, should the Government of Canada, under present conditions, even agree to pay a judge in the Yukon Territory $5,000 a year for living expenses? He is nothing more than a County Court judge; in fact, he does not discharge the important duties of County Court judges in other parts of Canada. In revising the scale why should the Government pay him $3,000 a year for living expenses, and counterbalance the reduction by adding to his salary $2,000?

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: And adding to the burden of the future.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes. There is no reason in the world why one of the judges from British Columbia should not go up to the Yukon periodically and dispose of all the judicial business in that small community.

If my honourable friend would only look into this question, asking the officials of the Department of the Interior for data, which could be readily furnished, as to reductions which might advantageously be made, and which could be made at once, he would be surprised that we should seriously consider at this time the increase of salary of a judge to $9,000 and also the continuance of his living allowance at $3,000. I invite my honourable friend's attention to the investigation of this subject, and commend to him the desirability of such examination before we deal any further with this Bill.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: May I, not with the view of discussing the matter, but just for the purpose of putting before the House what was said by the member representing that district in another place, quote from Hansard, page 828:

> Mr. Black (Yukon): I should like to make the situation clearer to the committee. By the Revised Statutes of Canada, chapter 138, the salary of the judge of the Yukon territory was fixed at $5,000 a year. By the same act the salaries of the Superior Court judges of Quebec and of the High Court of Justice of Ontario were fixed at $7,000 a year; and those of the judges of the Supreme Courts of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Alberta, and of the Court of the King's Bench of Manitoba, at $6,000 a year. By section 192 of the act it is provided that the judges of any of the above courts, after serving fifteen years, might be retired on an annuity equal to two-thirds of their salary at that time. In the case of the judges of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec the amount would be $4,666. The judges of the other provinces would receive $4,000, and the judges of the Yukon territory would be entitled to receive $3,333. By chapter 59 of the Statutes of Canada, 1919, the salaries of the judges of the classes mentioned in the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Manitoba, British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Alberta, were increased to $7,000. There was no corresponding increase for the judge in the Territorial Court of the Yukon. By chapter 56 of the Statutes of Canada, 1920, the salaries of the judges of the classes I have named —New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, Manitoba, British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan, and including the judges of the High Court division in Ontario and judges of the Supreme Court in Quebec—were all increased to $9,000. The salaries of the judge of the Territorial Court of the Yukon was increased to $7,000. By section 20 of chapter 138 of the Revised Statutes, 1906, it is provided that if one has continued in office as judge of one or more of the said courts for thirty years or upwards he may resign, and the government may grant him an annuity equal to his salary for life. By chapter 56, 1920, under which act the salaries of the judges of the provinces were increased to $9,000, and the salary of the judge of the Territorial Court of the Yukon was increased to $7,000, it is provided by section 13 that the increases of salary granted by that act shall not entitle any judge to any increase in the annuity which may be granted to such judge under the provisions of section 20 to which I have referred, and the effect of this is that the judges of the province, if retiring after thirty years' service, retire at $7,000 per year, while without this resolution now before the House the judge of the Territorial Court of the Yukon would retire at $5,000, and with this resolution he would retire at $6,000 a year. This resolution is doing him partial justice, but I say that it does not put him on an equal footing with judges of his rank throughout Canada. I therefore move that the word "six" be struck out of the resolution and that the word "seven" be substituted therefor; so that when the judge in the Yukon has served thirty years he may be retired on the same terms as his brother judges. After serving thirty years there is no reason why he should not be put on the same footing as the others. It may have been extravagant to increase the salaries of the judges all over Canada as was done in 1919 and 1920, but if you are going to do it, be consistent and do it for the whole of Canada. I say that the government should not consider granting a judge an annuity of two-thirds of his salary and accepting his resignation now. I do not think there should be any thought of that on the part of the government. I do not know that the judge has it in mind, but, if he has, the government should not stand for it. I am happy to say the judge is in excellent health, and a comparatively young man. The time has not come for his retirement. The judge is there, and the court is necessary for the territory. The community is an isolated one, far removed from any of the provinces. Valuable interests, valuable property and civil rights are involved in actions. It is necessary to have a judge of Supreme Court jurisdiction to preside at the criminal court. The idea that judges might be sent on circuit from British Columbia to take the place of the Yukon judge has been mooted. This would not be practicable nor economical, and it would be most disastrous to the people before the court. I would like to point out that should the government accept the judge's resignation now his retiring allowance would be $6,000, in addition to which it would be necessary to appoint and pay another judge, and there is no reason to suppose it would cost less than the cost at present, which is $12,000 per annum, and instead of costing the country $12,000 it would be costing $18,000 a year to retire the judge and appoint another. In fact it would be costing $23,000 a year because we have now one judge who has been retired for a good many years on a pension of $5,000 a year. There is no need for such increased expenditure. Our present judge is quite competent physically and mentally to discharge the duties of his office, and I for one hope he will be spared for many years, and hope the government will continue him in office.

I say this judge should be entitled to retire at the same amount as the judges of his rank throughout Canada, which is $7,000. The amendment to the resolution will not at this time cost the country a cent more than the resolution as it stands. And in fact the resolution as it stands does not at this time entail any extra expense to the country; it only provides for dealing fairly with the judge when the time comes for his retirement.

I would not dream of adding anything to those comments.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: How many judges are there there—just the one?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Just the one, apparently. The member for the district is undoubtedly more able to speak of conditions there, than I am, and I think that this statement ought to be accepted.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Why was the living allowance of $5,000 a year added? Was that because living was more expensive in the Yukon than any place else?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: There is no question that at the time the Court was constituted the conditions there were totally different from those east of the Yukon, and $5,000 was but a fair compensation for the higher cost of living. I have not been to the Yukon, and do not know the conditions today, but those who have lived there for some time, if there are any among us, could give us their experience.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I could give my own experience. In 1899 or 1900 I had the great privilege of making a trip to the far north with one of the most revered members of this House, the late Sir Mackenzie Bowell, and the cost of living at that time, as compared with such cost elsewhere, was about in the proportion of ten to one. I remember that one day, on returning from a trip on what they called the Ridge Road, on which there was sand between eight and ten inches deep, we all repaired to the public bath, kept by a barber, and for a bath and shave and hair-cut we each paid between $5 and $6. You could not buy any kind of thing in Dawson, not even a local paper, for less than 25 cents. That gives an idea of the cost of living there as compared with the cost outside of the Territory.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But the cost is not very different now from what it is in the West.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I should not think social duties would cost very much there. There are no churches to subscribe to, and no societies calling for contributions.

Hon. Mr. W. B. ROSS: I do not think there is the slightest justification for our passing this Bill. According to the figures we get here, that Court costs now $23,000 a year. Mr. Black says:

I would like to point out that should the Government accept the judge's resignation now his retiring allowance would be $6,000, in addition to which it would be necessary to appoint and pay another judge, and there is no reason to suppose it would cost less than the cost at present, which is $12,000 per annum, and instead of costing the country $12,000 it would be costing $18,000 a year to retire the judge and appoint another. In fact, it would be costing $23,000 a year, because we have now one judge who has been retired for a good many years on a pension of $5,000 a year. There is no need for such increased expenditure. Our present judge is quite competent, physically and mentally, to discharge the duties of his office, and I for one hope he will be spared for many years, and hope the Government will continue him in office.

Mr. Black's argument seems to be that because we increased salaries of judges in the eastern provinces on two occasions, therefore we ought to keep on, whether we made a mistake or not, and increase the salary of this judge. You could get as many men as you want to take that man's place at the present salary. He has a good salary of $7,000 and a living allowance of $5,000. Evidently that man is going to retire and go into some other business in the East, and by means of this Bill he will get $1,000 added to his retiring allowance.

I think the time is not very far away when we will be compelled to revise the salaries and retiring allowances of judges. This man is suffering nothing at present, unless he is going to retire. I would leave this matter as it is, and I think it can very well stand over for a year or two. My view is that if the Government do not withdraw this Bill I would feel like moving the three months' hoist, which I do now.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: I think perhaps it would be a little too drastic to move the three months or six months hoist, but I think a case has been made out that we should have full information with reference to the Yukon Territory—as to the officials there, how much they cost us, what is being paid to each one, the revenues we get from that country, and all other data which will enable us to deal with the matter thoroughly, and test the bona fides of the Government, and at the same time test our own tendency toward making a real advance in economy in this country. We should sift thoroughly this whole matter of the Yukon, and come to a conclusion whether or not we are paying altogether too much for the services in proportion to the population, and whether in the interest of economy methods could not be provided by which a distinct saving could be made.

I do not know what the population of that Territory is, but I have been told that in the winter-time it is about 2,500, and in the summer season it is larger. Before we finish with this question I would like to have information brought down which would enable us to review the whole situation as regards the Yukon and its administration; and I will give notice of an inquiry which will bring out such information. When we get that we can sit down and examine the one point in our administration where there is an opportunity of making large economy and of giving an essential, reasonable and necessary service to that portion of the country.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I draw the attention of my honourable friend to the problem of the administration of justice in that Territory. Whatever may be the present conditions, I do not see how we shall be able to alter the methods employed in the administration of justice. I notice that it has been stated by the member who sits for that district that there must be a judge of proper rank, and clothed with the necessary powers, to administer justice in civil and criminal matters.

Of course, the larger question raised by my honourable friend opposite (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) and the right honourable gentleman from Ottawa (Right Hon. Sir George E. Foster) is interesting—could not a reduced establishment be suggested for the Yukon? Possibly the Audit Commission, which is now sitting and dealing with the Civil Service, may have a chance to examine into that situation.

I have no objection to adjourn this Bill for a time in order that we may turn the matter over in our minds. So far, the Bill only bears on an alteration in the form of payment; the judge is receiving $12,000, and under this Bill, with the living allowance, he will still be receiving $12,000.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: You can cut that down.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The advantage will only accrue to him when he retires, if he should have occasion to retire.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: How long has he been on the Bench?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I cannot say; but, since I am agreeable to adjourning this matter, I would like to address myself for a moment to the question of the retirement of judges after 15 years' service, which has been mentioned by my honourable friend from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross). I may say that I have always been of opinion, and have gradually become more convinced in it, that there was an abuse in the facility with which a judge who had served the country for 15 years could withdraw, at his own fancy, on two-thirds of his salary. I have always been under the impression that that facility was intended for a judge who felt weakened, physically or mentally, and who considered himself unequal to the task before him. Yet I have seen judges withdraw, not because they felt weakened in health or in mind, but because, in very many cases, they could better their position. I think the Minister of Justice could well afford to examine into this matter in order to obtain some greater discretion in allowing the retirement of judges under such circumstances. I have heard judges claim that it was their absolute right after fifteen years of service to ask to be pensioned. That has not been my view. I am convinced that that was not the spirit of the Act when it was passed, and it seems to me that we are too freely granting the privilege of withdrawing to judges who have been seasoned by fifteen years experience on the Bench and who are still in full vigor both mental and physical.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I quite agree with everything the honourable gentleman has said. I know of a case at the present time in which a Judge of the highest court in the land is carrying on his judicial duties for the purpose of drawing $1,000 a year. I think from what the honourable gentleman says that there is no doubt that the Act was not intended to give a judge the right to withdraw at his own discretion. I know of one judge who, if he retired to-day, would draw $8,000; but still he continues on the Bench and draws $9,000.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I move to discharge this Order, and place it on the Orders of the Day for the 22nd of April.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Will my honourable friend in the meantime make inquiries as to whether there have been negotiations between this Government and the Government of British Columbia as to the taking over of the administration of the Yukon Territory. I have a kind of remote idea that there were negotiations at one time between the two Governments in regard to that proposal.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I will inquire.

The motion for the second reading of the Bill stands to April 22.

THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC TREATY

JOINT RESOLUTION OF APPROVAL

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the message from the House of Commons requesting the Senate to unite with that House in the approval of the convention between His Majesty and the President of the United States of America, signed at Washington on the twenty-third day of January, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-four, for the purpose of avoiding any difficulties which might arise between them in connection with the laws in force in the United States, on the subject of alcoholic beverages, a copy of which has been laid before Parliament.

Hon. R. DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, the object of this convention is the authorization of the United States of America to exercise the right of search of vessels beyond the 3-mile limit when there is reasonable cause for belief that such vessel has committed or is attempting to commit an offence against the laws of the United States prohibiting the importation of alcoholic beverages and allowing of the seizure of such a vessel for adjudication before United States tribunals. This matter was considered by the Imperial Conference last autumn, and in the summary proceedings of that Conference which has been laid on the Table of this Chamber will be found, at page 12, the following reference to that discussion:

During the session of the conference, the question of the regulation of the liquor traffic off the American coasts and of the measures to be taken to avoid a serious conflict either of public opinion or of official action was seriously debated. The conference arrived at the conclusion that, while affirming and safeguarding as a cardinal feature of British policy the principle of the three mile limit, it was yet both desirable and practicable to meet the American request for an extension of the right of search beyond this limit for the above purpose, and negotiations were at once opened with the United States government for the conclusion of an experimental agreement with this object in view.

As will be seen by the resolution and agreement that is now before us, the principle of the 3-mile territorial water-line limit is maintained. For the purposes sought under this agreement, seizures may be made within a distance of the coast that may be traversed in one hour by the suspected vessel. Where a transfer from one vessel to another is contemplated, it is the speed of the latter which determines the distance from the coast.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: What is the maximum distance estimated during that hour?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Twelve miles has been mentioned. It seems to me somewhat low.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, for a motor launch.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes, for motor launches such as we have to-day.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: It is not in the open sea: it is on the coast, and they have to go much more slowly.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The distance is estimated from the coast.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: In return for such a concession, British vessels gain the right of carrying liquor to United States ports if it is kept under seal during their stay within the territorial waters of the United States. This applies to liners plying from the ports of Great Britain and Canada to any port on the Atlantic or the Pacific coast of the United States. As is well known, the United States denied to regular passenger liners the right to have liquor in bond while in an American port. In return for the concession granted under this resolution or agreement, the Americans agree to the British passenger boats retaining under seal the liquor for their return voyage.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is Article III.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: A reference to a Joint Commission of Claims for compensation in case of an improper exercise of the rights conferred by the Treaty is provided for. The said Convention is to remain in force for one year, or may be modified from year to year, or, if there is no understanding as to a proposed modification, it will lapse.

The Senate of the United States ratified this agreement on March 13 last, and it will be ratified by His Majesty the King when it is approved by the Parliament of the United Kingdom and the Parliaments of the self-governing Dominions.

On January 12, the Canadian Government was asked if it approved of the terms of the Treaty, and whether it was agreeable to attach its signature to it. The reply was in the affirmative; but attention was drawn to the opinion of the Canadian Government, that, when a vessel seized illegally was of Canadian registry, the British representative on the Board appointed to adjudicate upon the matter should be a person nominated by the Canadian Government. The approval was made subject to subsequent approval by Parliament. The answer of the British Government intimated that the wish of Canada in those two particulars was agreeable and would be respected.

This agreement was entered into by the United Kingdom, with Canada's concurrence, as an act of international good-will towards our neighbours, who are experimenting with the application of laws which they believe will have a high moral effect. It is not for us to discuss the value of that legislation, everyone is master in his own house; and our action will be taken as a friendly act by the great Republic to the south of us.

Hon. Mr. BARNARD: May I ask the honourable gentleman a question in reference to this matter? The Straits of Juan de Fuca, between the State of Washington and the province of British Columbia, are 17 or 18 miles wide, and the International boundary line runs down through the centre of the straits. It would appear to me from the wording of Article II that this Treaty would give an American vessel the right to cross into British territorial waters and search British ships. The same condition of affairs, if I am not mistaken would apply on the river St. Lawrence. I take it that the international boundary line, say at Prescott or Brockville, is the middle of the river. If I am right in my interpretation of the Treaty, that condition would lead to a somewhat undesirable state of affairs, and I would ask my honourable friend if the matter has been considered at all from that standpoint.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The question occurred to me, and I asked the right honourable the Premier of this country and the honourable the Minister of Railways whether the matter had been discussed from that angle. They were both of the opinion, and they were quite clear about it, that this only covered the 3-mile ocean limit and had nothing to do with inland waters.

Hon. Mr. BARNARD: But in a case like the one I have mentioned, between Washington and British Columbia, is the matter on the same basis?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The only question which occurred to me was the extent of territory which this agreement covered, and the answer I got was that it was confined to the ocean 3-mile limit.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I think the second line covers it: "outside the limits of territorial waters."

Hon. Mr. BARNARD: That refers to territorial waters of the United States. That cannot mean anything else.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: That is the whole point. They are given the right to search outside their territorial waters.

Hon. Mr. BARNARD: On the high seas.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Are the Straits of Juan de Fuca the high seas?

Hon. Mr. BARNARD: No, they are territorial waters, half American and half Canadian.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Then, if it is outside territorial waters, I am inclined to think there will be no trouble of that kind. The Privy Council have decided that the land under the water to the 3-mile limit is part of the mainland. How wide are the straits of Juan de Fuca?

Hon. Mr. BARNARD: About 18 miles.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Then there is 3 miles of water with land lying underneath it that is owned by the country. The rest is the high seas, I think. It is rather a conundrum.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable gentlemen, it may not be out of place at the moment to say that this Convention, the approval of which by the British Government and the Dominion of Canada is sought, stands out in very strong contrast to the treatment which this country and Great Britain from time to time have received at the hands of the United States in the consideration of treaties which have been negotiated between those countries. It may not seem to be the gracious thing at this moment, when Great Britain has extended her national courtesy to the United States in accepting this Convention, to make any comments upon the reluctance with which the United States Government has approached the consideration of treaties which from time to time have been negotiated between this country and that Government or beween Great Britain and the United States. There has scarcely been a period when the consideration of our treaties has not been approached in a more or less unfriendly spirit on the part of the United States, particularly by the United States Senate. This is in contrast with the fact that Great Britain or this country, in approving of this Convention, does so, in my judgment, not from sympathy with the manner in which the liquor laws of the Untied States are enforced. If there was a consistent enforcement of prohibition throughout the United States, one might be sympathetic with the steps taken by the republic to the south of us and with as much assistance as possible being given for the enforcement of their laws; but it is a matter of wide comment that the contravention of the liquor laws in the United States is daily the subject of comment throughout the continent. It may therefore not be out of place to mention the courtesy which has been extended by the British Government, and likewise the disposition of the Government of Canada to express approval of this Treaty, "lest we forget" the rather tardy treatment which has been accorded to us in the past in the consideration of our Treaties with the United States.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved:

That the Senate doth unite with the House of Commons in the approval of the Convention between His Majesty and the President of the United States of America, signed at Washington on the twenty-third day of January, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-four, for the purpose of avoiding any difficulties which might arise between them in connection with the laws in force in the United States, on the subject of alcoholic beverages, a copy of which has been laid before Parliament, by inserting in the said Resolution in the blank space therein "Senate and."

The motion was agreed to, and it was ordered, That His Honour the Speaker do sign the said Resolution on behalf of the Senate.

Canadian National Railways,
Office of the Chairman and President,
Montreal, Que., April 2, 1924.

Hon. Geo. P. Graham, M.P.,
Minister of Railways and Canals,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir,

With respect to the branch line programme of the Canadian National Railways, I desire to place before you the policy which governed the company in its recommendation, and the specific reasons and other data for the construction of each line.

In the preparation of the branch line programme, the following factors were given due weight.

(1) The money already spent and the work already done on each line, where such conditions existed;

(2) The strategic, economic and traffic value of each branch;

(3) The measure of relief afforded to farmers through shortening the road haul on grain and other products;

(4) A regard for the presumable aggregate sum which the finances of the Dominion would permit to be devoted to such a purpose.

After having given proper weight to the factors above mentioned, the programme which has already been submitted to you was prepared and in addition, it was suggested that the programme, should if adopted, be spread over a period of three years, the authority remaining alive until August 31, 1927. The objective sought in extending the life of the vote for three years was to provide that continuity of construction which is essential for economy and to enable the engineering and construction department of the railway, as well as contractors, to lay out their work in the most effective fashion. The practice is well recognized by private railways under whose administration sums, when voted by the shareholders, remain in the hands of the executive until the work is completed or authority rescinded. There would seem to exist an analogy between the shareholders of a private company in their relation to the executive, and the parliament of the Dominion of Canada in its relation to the Canadian National Railway system, which would justify such a policy if the experiences of private undertakings are of value.

Varying prices of labour and material, adverse climatic conditions and the difficulty of securing labour during the period of harvest render it imperative that an early start should be made each year if construction work is to be prosecuted with speed and economy and this, it is submitted, will not result if each branch line is to be subjected to an annual vote.

Appertaining to the Canadian National's branch line programme, for which you are submitting enabling bills to parliament, appended hereto are statements with reference to each line which set out the purpose and justification for each. While it is true that all of these lines may not be entirely justified from the present railway economic standpoint, particularly if viewed from their first few years' operations, broader grounds must be considered when preparing a system of feeders for a railway of the magnitude of that which has been entrusted to the present administration of the National Railways.

The first problem that arises from examination of the Canadian National Railways system is to ascertain the main and underlying cause of the deficits, and it is at once apparent that, although certain economies of operation and co-ordination of the various units comprising the system may materially improve the "net" position, the basic cause is found in the fact that the mileage is much too great for the traffic. The apparent answer to the necessity for more business is more people and a further development of these resources which nature has provided with a generous hand. This end can only be speedily attained by the immigration of both settlers and capital and my various officers and myself, realizing this need, have consistently endeavoured to promote both. No confidence can exist in those who lack faith in themselves. My survey of this Dominion gives me unlimited confidence in its ultimate destiny without which there could be no faith in the final success of the national lines.

Therefore we are looking to develop this vast country, at present but too sparsely settled, and asking people to emigrate and join us in this development. But what do we find? Certain sections of the country are losing the very population we are so anxious to augment. Why are these sections being depopulated? Chiefly through a lack of railway facilities, particularly on the prairies, and the question naturally arises, "Is not the settler, who has manfully demonstrated his ability to bring products from the soil, worth many times the untried immigrant? If we are to bring people into the country we should certainly not allow them to meet others who are departing in a discouraged frame of mind. Therefore, not only are branch lines necessary to develop the country and provide reasonable facilities for the immigrant, but also to retain that part of our population which has so courageously planted itself on the land.

It is not likely that the Canadian National Railways will suffer materially from a financial view, for three or four or perhaps five years if the branch line programme herein contemplated is abandoned, but it is inevitable, that should such a thing come about, at the expiration of a period of years the system will find itself robbed of all further opportunity for reasonable development. Strategic territories will have been seized by other transportation interests, and the railway will dry up at its roots. I can think of no more effective way to eventually bring about the ruin of the Canadian National Railway system than a refusal to embark upon and consistently maintain a branch line programme. No railway can stand still, and success can only be achieved by keeping abreast of the times in the fulfilment of transportation responsibility. This is even more important in a growing and rapidly developing country.

I particularly desire to make it clear that the recommendations herein contained are based not only on present day conditions but also have regard for the probable volume of traffic which would result from the settlement of the country in years to come.

I therefore endorse the programme which has been submitted to you as representing, after full consideration of all facts and factors, that minimum which is essential to the needs of the communities served by the Canadian National Railways, and the system itself.

Your faithfully,
H. W. Thornton,
President.

Sunnybrae. Mile, 0-67	Cost
Proposed in 1924..	nil
Proposed in 1925—67 miles grade..	$2,300,000
Proposed in 1926—67 miles track..	1,200,000
	$3,500,000

In 1924 no actual work of construction is proposed, but final survey will be run and in 1925, it is the intention to do the grading on the 67 miles from Sunnybrae to Guysboro at a cost of $2,300,000, and in 1926 to lay the track and complete the line to Guysboro at a cost that year of $1,200,000.

The purpose of the line is to open up the local territory for lumber industry and provide better facilities for agricultural products as well as give direct communication to Guysboro for its fishing and allied products. On part of the route there is considerable agricultural development, and quite extensive hardwood forests which the railway will make it possible to develop.

The original intention of the survey for this line had in view a low grade line with the idea of making it the main line. The results of the surveys indicated that to obtain this character of line it would be very costly, and on account of the fact that the present main line could not be abandoned, and would have to be maintained and operated, it could not be shown that such a line, with its excessive cost of construction would be justified. The present intention is to construct a line to open up the local territory and build it to cheaper standards of construction, but keep in view the eventual use of it for an alternative main line at any time this would be warranted. Therefore, the line will be located so that eventually a low grade could be obtained, but employ steeper grades for the immediate construction.

It has been estimated that there are 250 million feet of hardwood and 200 million feet of softwood available to the line, and also some possibilities in gold and iron mining which have not been developed, possibly due to lack of transportation facilities.

The justification for this line is that it will serve a section of the country that has been in long need of railway communication in order to give it a real chance for development and to put the town of Guysboro in direct rail communication with the Canadian National System

Lockeport Spur. Mile, 0-4—	Cost
Proposed in 1925—4 mile grade, 4 miles track.	$161,000

It is proposed in 1925 to grade and complete this spur of 4 miles in length from the station of Lockeport to the town of Lockeport.

The town of Lockeport is four miles from the station of Lockeport, and consequently the town has no direct railway communication. The purpose of the spur is to supply this deficiency.

THE TARIFF AND BRITISH PREFERENCE

MOTION FOR RETURN

Hon. L. O. DAVID moved:

That an Order of the Senate do issue requesting the Government to lay before this House statements and requests made by the Manufacturers Association in connection with the tariff and the preference granted to English products.

He said: In view of what has been published in the newspapers in reference to my question, I had the intention of speaking on the Address, and I rose twice to do so, but was too late, so that I shall accompany my motion with a few remarks.

I have been a sincere advocate of protection to industries during the last 60 years, and have during that time pressed my views as an apostle on all Governments, often to my detriment. When I read the Speech from the Throne at the opening of this Session I was a little anxious. I commenced to preach protection in 1871, when the census established the fact that between 200,000 and 300,000 of our people had left Canada to go and work in American industries. I then thought that the only way of preventing our population from going to the United States was to have industries established in Canada, and for that purpose it was necessary to give them protection. When I began to preach that doctrine 60 years ago the chiefs of both political parties were opposed to protection, they were more or less partisans of free trade, and naturally I was dissatisfied with them.

In 1875, when the Mackenzie Government came into power, I had a newspaper, which I had established chiefly in order to induce that Government to establish a protective tariff to assist industry. Unfortunately Mr. Mackenzie came to the conclusion that according to the constitution of his party he could not give what he wanted, and that the most he could do was to increase the protective duties by 2½ per cent. Hence I was obliged to suspend publication of my paper, because I could not continue without the help of the Government.

In 1878, two or three months before the celebrated elections of the 17th September, I was in the habit of playing quoits with Mr. Mackenzie on the exact spot where his statue has been erected. While playing that game we naturally discussed matters, and he once said to me: "Well, Mr. David, we will have elections in the month of September or October; what do you think of them?" I replied: "Do you want me, Mr. Mackenzie, to say frankly what I think?" He said he did, and I replied: "Well, you will be badly beaten if you do not give a protective tariff. If you come before the people in such a time of crisis without saying that you have something to remedy the situation, the Conservatives will promise to give what is necessary to improve the financial situation, and you will be defeated." He then asked if I would give him my reasons for saying that, and I replied that as I was better at writing than speaking I would send him a letter the next day. I did so. In a long letter I gave my reasons for thinking he would be beaten at the election; and after he had read my letter, while we were playing our game of quoits, he said: "Your letter is not encouraging, and your prophecy really alarms me; but what can I do? All my people, the members for Ontario, say that they must go to the polls with the tariff as it is." I replied: "Oh, well, Mr. Mackenzie, you asked me my opinion, but naturally I do not pretend to tell you what you should do now." We all know the result; the Government was defeated; the Conservative party came into power.

At that time my partner was Mr. Mousseau, who became Prime Minister of the province of Quebec, and he remarked to me one day: "Do you know David, that we at least have forced Sir John Macdonald to give protection"—because, as I have mentioned, the chiefs of both parties at that time were opposed to protection, but Sir John Macdonald knew how to win elections, and he thought the best way to do so was to come before the people with a protective tariff policy, and he succeeded.

I congratulated the Government, but my Liberal friends did not congratulate me upon my congratulations to the Conservative party. I could not help doing so, however, because the Conservative party had kept their promises. The farmers, upon whom the Liberals were relying, as others do now, were easily convinced that industries were as necessary to them as to the other classes of the population, and they voted in favour of the Conservative party. The best teacher is experience, and I think my friends who are now relying on the farmers should remember what took place at that time.

I did not regret the position which I then took, because there is no doubt that the effect of the tariff of 1878 has been to create all those industrial establishments which give work to thousands of workingmen, and furnish home markets to our farmers, and which have been beneficial to all classes of trade. So much so that when the Liberal party came into power in 1896, with Mr. Laurier as their chief, although the leaders of the Liberal party were more or less free traders, they considered that in the interest of their party and in the interest of the country they should keep the tariff made by the Conservatives in 1878. It may be too personal to speak of myself in this way, but I remember that one day my great and noble friend Mr. Laurier said: "David, what do you think of the question of the tariff?" I said: "My dear Laurier, I see there is only one question, upon which I would vote against you. It would be cruel for me to vote against you, but on the question of the tariff I would do it if you presented a free trade policy." He said: "I know that you would do it, to be consistent."

If I take the opportunity to recall these things it is in order to explain the views which I have always held, and which I will hold to the end of my life, and to explain the position which I intend taking on this question at the present Session, if I am called upon to vote. Nobody will be surprised. I have always been in favour of protection, I am in favour of it more than ever now, in view of what is being done in all countries of the world, especially in the United States, and also in view of the position taken in England on the question of preference. More than ever do I feel that we are obliged to protect our industrial interests—at least, to keep our markets at all costs. It is said sometimes that protection increases the cost of living, although experience shows that it has not always that effect, and that after a certain time competition forces the manufacturers to reduce the price of their products. But let us suppose for a moment that is has that effect. Is it not better for our labour people and even our whole population to pay a little more for what they want than to have no money to buy anything?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: That is all right.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: It has been said that the Government lost prestige because they did not carry out their promises. Is it not, on the contrary, because of the fear that they would carry out their imprudent promises and that the tariff would be reduced and the preference increased, that frightened our manufacturers and prevented them from extending their operations and putting money into industrial enterprises?

All over the country it is said that we want more population and that the Government cannot do too much to bring in immigrants. Well, in view of our people leaving Canada to go to work in the United States, do you not think that those immigrants will do as our own people are themselves doing—go to the United States to find work?

That manufactures are necessary to the welfare of the farmers has been clearly established by some farmers themselves, who have been frank enough to admit it. Small towns, as well as large, which owe their existence or their progress to manufactures, afford the best markets for farm and garden produce. The complaints against a protective tariff come particularly from the West—that great West that gives us so much trouble. What comes from those large and intelligent provinces is not always good. They want nothing to be protected except their wheat and their other products. If the Government of the day had listened to their requests, they would have made the farmers the only protected and privileged class in this country, by securing the highest price possible for their products; and everybody would be taxed except the farmer. The fact that they escape almost totally the tax on revenue shows that if the customs duties were abolished they would really contribute practically nothing to the cost of the adminstration of the country or to the payment of our debt. They cry for economy and at the same time for expenditure.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: And for the building of the Hudson Bay Railway.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: And they would reduce Ontario's and Quebec's means of paying. We must admit that the farmers are entitled to all the protection and sympathy possible, because they represent the main element.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The base.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: Yes, the basis of the country's welfare. But they must take into consideration the needs of the other classes, and they ought to realize that industry is necessary to their prosperity, that without a protective tariff there would be no industry, and that if there is less industry, or none, the consequence will be to deprive thousands of our labour people of their means of living and oblige them to go and work in American factories. There will then be less population to buy anything, especially the products of our farmers, who will lose more than they will gain by that policy. The fact is that although the tariff upon farm implements, woollen goods and other articles has been reduced, the prices of those articles have not been reduced; they have even been increased. I repeat that what the farmers would gain by that policy would be very little as compared with the harm done to all the other classes of the population and even to themselves.

And now, in view of the financial situation of our country, how would the Government replace the customs duties, which form the best part of our revenue? It has been often demonstrated that not only have customs duties had the effect of promoting national industry, but they are easier to collect than other forms of taxation, less productive of fraud or false statement, and more practical, and they effect especially the classes of our population who are best able to pay. If taxation can be reduced, for God's sake let us reduce the sales and income taxes, which are so onerous, and which so many rich people and corporations know how to avoid in great measure. If the Government decided to reduce the customs duties, which are so useful, when they could reduce the income and sales taxes, which do so much harm, they would commit a great error.

I hope that the Government will not be influenced by the exigencies of one class to the detriment of the whole population of Canada, and that they will not abandon their policy of industrial stability, which has proved so good for the country. I hope they will not place those Liberals like myself between their duty to their conscience and to the country and loyalty to their party. I admit that their effort to reconcile so many and different interests deserves sympathy; but if they cannot keep power without adopting a policy so dangerous to the interests of the country, let them fall honourably with flying colours.

In conclusion, to be consistent, I would vote against all reductions of the tariff which would affect industry, and against any increase of the preference, and I would vote for the increase of duties on certain manufactured products, for the reduction of the preference, and for an export duty on some of our natural products.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Pulp.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Good Tory doctrine.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: The protection of all the industries which exist or may be established, a reasonable duty on the export of our natural products, and a decrease of preference, would give more work to our labour people, would increase the purchasing power of our population, and would give to our Government the means of reducing the sales and the income taxes, which are, as I have said, so onerous, and would thereby improve the financial condition of Canada and remove the fears which are entertained about its future.

Let us have a true Canadian and national policy, and like all the other countries of the world, and particularly England, be guided above all by what Canada, our beloved country, requires in order to reach its high destiny

I know that my views will displease some of my friends. It will not be the first time—and perhaps not the last.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: Sad.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: But they will forgive me an old man, for trying to be consistent and trying above all to satisfy my conscience and my judgment—for saying and doing what I have always thought necessary for the progress and welfare of our country.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: May I invite my honourable friend to come over to this side of the House?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: It is not necessary at all. We started protection. You cannot have it all to yourselves.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The whole of you better come over.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: About half would have to come over.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would like to know if there is any other honourable member of this Chamber who desires to speak on this question.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN. Yes; the honourable gentleman from Assiniboia (Hon. Mr. Turriff).

Hon. J. G. TURRIFF: Honourable gentlemen, I did not think that ever in the course of my life a speech like the one to which we have just listened would be taken by the Liberals in this House, with practically no one ready to reply to it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I rose.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: I will accept the statement of my honourable friend the leader of the House.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: These are the real Liberals.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: I am not going to make much of a reply to the remarks of the honourable gentleman—

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: You could not if you wanted to.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: But I want to point out one or two statements that he has made and that I think almost every honourable member of this House knows to be not exact and not according to the facts. My honourable friend stated that the people of the West wanted protection only on what they produced themselves, and that they did not want protection on anything else. Let me tell my honourable friend and this Honourable House that the farmers of the West, time and again, in conventions at which there were hundreds present, demanded that there should be no duties put on wheat, or cattle, or anything else that they produced. That is the policy of the West. My honourable friend said that the East had to pay for the West.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Certainly.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: Let me tell my honourable friend this. Take the condition of the railways. They are not in a very good position to-day. Thank goodness, they are getting a little better. But what is keeping the railways up? It is the tonnage of freight produced in the West.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: My honourable friend may laugh as much as he likes. That is about all he is good for—laughing at anything that he does not agree with. But it is the freight of the West. My honourable friend, who is pretty well posted in railway matters, can look up the Canadian Pacific Railway evidence given before the Committees here, and he will find that the months in which they were handling the wheat from the West were the months when they made two-thirds or three-quarters of all the profits they made during the year.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: And kept the cars idle nine months.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: It is well known that there is more tonnage of freight, for both railroads, west of Fort William than there is east of Fort William. That is a fact that has only to be stated. Still honourable gentlemen will say that the East has to pay for the West.

Another thing that the honourable gentleman who spoke last (Hon. Mr. David) said was that the home market was the market for the farmers of Canada. I would like to ask what proportion of the wheat production of the West is consumed in Canada by the entire population, farmers and all. All that the people of Canada, men, women and children, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, can eat in any one year is 50,000,000 bushels of wheat. Last year we grew 400,000,000 bushels of wheat; where are you going to find a market for it? You cannot sell it in Canada. You have to ship that wheat out of Canada, as everybody knows perfectly well, and to say that the home market is a market for the farmers of Canada to sell their wheat in is talking absolute rot, and everybody here knows it.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: Will the honourable member allow me to say that perhaps I did not make myself quite clear. When I spoke of keeping our markets, I was not speaking of wheat particularly; I was speaking generally of our manufactured goods.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: Supposing that right —and I have no doubt it is right—if the manufacturers and all the people of Canada cannot provide a market for our wheat, what is there to do? Are we to stop growing wheat? How shall we pay for manufactured goods if we stop growing wheat?

My honourable friend referred to the fact that he is an old man. I am a pretty old man myself, and I can remember the election he speaks of in 1878. I took a very active part in that election and the election before it. But I can remember that shortly after 1878, when the protective tariff came into force, the whole cry of our friends the manufacturers in Canada was: "Give us the American tariff." That was their cry: "Give us the American tariff until we get on our feet, and as soon as we get on our feet we will be able to compete with the world." And that was Sir John Macdonald's idea right through. It was not his intention to establish a permanent high tariff; it was for infant industries until they were able to stand on their own feet, when competition would bring down prices. Those industries were of age fifteen years ago or more, and yet every year they are calling for more protection. Well, if high protection would make any country prosperous, surely to God this country ought to be prosperous, because we have had under the Conservatice Governments and under the Liberal Government since they came into power last, all the protection anyone could want, and still they are calling for more protection, and saying the country is going to the dogs.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: Did you not have high protection not only under this Government, but under Sir Wilfrid Laurier's Government from 1896 down?

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: That is just what I said a moment ago; and still honourable gentlemen say the country is going to the dogs under high protection.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Would you reduce it?

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: If factories are closing up, how are you going to keep them open by putting on double protection? As I say, the whole cry was: "Give us the same tariff as the United States." Why, to-day the Canadian manufacturer of agricultural implements can send his implements and repair parts into the United States absolutely free of duty.

Take the boot and shoe factories in Canada —and my honourable friends from Quebec know pretty well about that industry, because Quebec is the home of the industry in Canada. They know they can ship every boot they make into the United States, if they want to, and that they do not have to pay one single cent of duty in any shape or form. That is a fact, and you have only to look up the tariff to verify it.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: How long has that been the case?

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: Four or five years.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I had not heard it before.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: I am very glad to think that in my humble way I can give some information to my honourable friend; and I can assure him that the information is absolutely correct.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I am glad to get it.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: So you can see the manufacturers have not very much to kick about.

I may say to my honourable friend who spoke before me (Hon. Mr. David) that if the tariff is not cut down and reduced in many respects, just as he said, the Government will go out of power; and my honourable friend, I suppose, will be very pleased, because he is sitting in the wrong part of the House; he ought to be over on the other side, as was suggested by the leader of the Opposition.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: Would you have me do what you have done yourself?

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: If it came to doing it again, if a great part of Canada would not take part in the defence of Canada, would not stand by Canada and the British Empire, I would do it again and do it gladly and loyally. Do not make any mistake about that. I am not so hide-bound that I would see the country ruined for party's sake. My honourable friend says he would leave his party on a matter of protection. I do not know that I would on a matter as small as that, but when it comes to a matter of the existence and safety of the Empire there is no one party or no dozen parties that would make me do what I believed was not in the interests of Canada and the Empire in a national way.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: Then you admit there are circumstances under which a man may differ from his party?

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Would my honourable friend allow a question. Is he aware that the British preference has been increased on boots, and does he not consider that a reduction in tariff?

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: Yes, I am aware that the British preference has been increased on boots and shoes; and I am also aware that 2½ per cent of the boots and shoes used in Canada during the past year were imported, and that because of that we have the Canadian manufacturers howling that they are being ruined.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Does my honourable friend state that such is the proportion of boots now imported into Canada from England?

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: It is the proportion for the last year for which we have the figures.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Is he aware that the industry in the province of Quebec is seriously suffering from the importation of shoes from Great Britain?

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: I am aware of that, to the extent of 2½ per cent.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: And leather and hides for the farmer.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: So my honourable friend states that that is the percentage imported from Great Britain?

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: Those are the latest returns we have.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: I am speaking of the present. The honourable gentleman does not know anything of the quantity imported now?

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: I cannot tell you what was imported last week, but I can tell you what is shown by the returns of the Government for last year. I sat in the other end of this building and heard the statement made within the last ten days, so if my honourable friend wishes to accuse the Government of giving false returns and making false statements. I have nothing more to say in that regard.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: My honourable friend is talking of last year. He does not know that the quantity of boots and shoes imported from Great Britain has greatly increased since last year and is still increasing.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: My honourable friend may make his own statement. He can get the figures, perhaps, for this year, but I cannot give them any later than the last Government return, and I do not think he can either.

But that is the case of the manufacturer all the time. If there is a little competition and a small proportion of goods coming in from outside, he is up in arms and is going to close his shops unless he gets more protection; and if the Government chooses to listen to the cry from the high-protection, big interest end of the Liberal party, it will get what is coming to it whenever it faces the people of Canada.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I do not want to interrupt the honourable gentleman, but I think he is suffering from an illusion which should be dispelled. The officials who appeared before the Railway Committee of the Senate the Session before last and gave evidence under oath said that the receipts per mile of the Canadian Pacific railway—the best-established and the longest-established railroad in the three western provinces—were $8,000 per mile west of lake Superior, whilst east of lake Superior they were $11,000 per mile. I defy contradiction of this statement. Can you support railways better where you get less receipts? Can anybody show this honourable House that railways can be operated more cheaply in the West than in the East? The Canadian Pacific railway in the East, in Terrebonne, is paying $2.50 a day for ordinary labourers. Can they get them for that in the Northwest?

The grain, which is the cheapest thing the railways handle, is a very small proportion of their business, and to get that small proportion what is necessary? They must keep a lot of cars idle, commencing in the month of May, and must move them from the East to the West so as to have them ready to take the crop some time in August or the beginning of September. These cars are kept idle, and the people of the country are paying interest on them. An immense number of cars is required at a particular moment in order that the wheat can be moved to the head of the lakes, so that it may have the advantage of the cheap transportation by water. How can those cars earn interest on their cost when they are not required for more than three months in the year? And, further, during the time they are busy they have to be hauled back to the West empty to get the freight coming eastward.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Honourable gentlemen, I do not desire to make any statement to-night on the question of protection or free trade. I would like to congratulate the honourable gentleman responsible for this motion (Hon. Mr. David) upon the stand he has taken. I have great respect for his opinion, and I congratulate him on his consistency in this matter.

But there was one thing that I objected to very seriously, and that was the reference to the West. There is a tendency on the part of some gentlemen in the East, especially in the great city of Montreal, to sneer somewhat at the West.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: We do not sneer.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: There have been remarks that we are spoon-fed and that sort of thing.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: If you had not been, you would not exist.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I am glad to hear the honourable gentleman at last declare himself. I think it is about time that sort of talk stopped. I would like to assure honourable gentlemen that the West is quite capable of taking care of itself. If you consider the position of the West, and what it means to Canada, then perhaps you will admit that the future of Canada depends upon the great West. The West has paid for itself over and over again. To-day you have knocking at the doors of this Dominion three western provinces asking for the control of their natural resources, which were taken over by the Dominion and dealt with by them.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Under contract.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: No matter. It is a very extraordinary thing to hear honourable gentlemen sneer at the West when it is defending its just rights.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Who bought the rights?

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Who settled the West? The people in the West have paid for it time and time again, and as I said before, I only rose to make as vigorous a protest as I could against the statements made on the other side of the House in regard to the great West.

I hear honourable gentlemen talk a great deal about the manufacturers. Where would they be if it were not for the West? Who supported them during the last decade or so? Where would they be with their high protection, if it had not been for the West?

The honourable gentleman on the other side (Hon. Mr. Casgrain) is always very free with his statistics with regard to railways. While I would not accuse him of giving false information, I sometimes think the figures he quotes are not exactly what they appear to be. It is well known that there is not a branch line of the Canadian National railways in the West that does not pay for itself. I can give you the name of branch after branch that is paying—

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Who said that?

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Everyone knows it.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Except the Government. They say the books are not kept in such a way as to be able to tell.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I think the honourable gentleman made a statement dividing the East and the West. If he means that that portion west of Fort William is the West, and then skips the bridge north of lake Superior and refers to the remainder as the East, there may be something in it. But what is the use of talking in that way? If these honourable gentlemen, representing Canada, talk in that way about the West, let me tell them that is not the way to build up the country and to make a united Canada. The hope of the country is in the West, and I for one trust that while I keep a seat in this House those honourable gentlemen will refrain from making such derogatory remarks about the West.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Come over to this side.

Hon. C. P. BEAUBIEN: For my part, I did not understand the discussion as dividing the East and the West; and why it is that some honourable gentlemen in the House, when agricultural matters come up, assume that the question of agriculture relates entirely to the West I cannot understand.

My honourable friend on the other side of the House (Hon. Mr. Turriff) said that the farmer required a much larger measure of protection. To him, the farmer is the man in the West, and to his mind, I suppose, there are no farmers in the East, and the only commodity produced by farmers is wheat, which has to be exported. That is why a discussion which never should have taken place has been precipitated.

My honourable friend here (Hon. Mr. McMeans) should not be so touchy if we of the older provinces claim that we have some farmers worth looking after. Some of them produce wheat; they also produce other things.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: You never hear anybody of the West saying anything against them, do you?

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: We do, in this way. The farmer is entirely ignored unless he produces wheat. The farming community produce perhaps $500,000,000 or $600,000,000 worth of wheat a year, but the total value of the agricultural products of this country is over $2,000,000,000, and the great bulk of the farmers of the East want protection.

I would like to hear my honourable friend addressing some of the meetings of the farmers in my province, where I know them well, and proposing to reduce protection, with the result —which they now can see—that their own sons, many of whom have gone to the cities and become engaged in manufacturing work, would have to leave the cities and find work in the United States. And this is all because of a weak-kneed Government that trembles because it hears voices from the West, such as that of my honourable friend who has the honour of representing singly the third party in this House, and reduces protection by increasing the preference or by cutting the protection from under the feet of people who have a great deal of trouble in defending themselves against competition. Surely there is one thing the farmer of the West must understand, and that is that he has a partner in the East. I know that the farmer in the West at the present time has no local market. But does not my honourable friend from the West understand that the farmer in the East has a local market upon which he depends, because he cannot export his commodities? You cannot export the products of mixed farming, but the wheat of the West can always find a market in the world.

For my part, I am sorry that a discussion on protection should find its point of cleavage between the East and the West. It should not do so. We should consider protection or any other policy in a broad-minded way as affecting the whole country. That is the way I look at the matter, and I do not think my honourable friend has the right to claim that he speaks for the farmers of this country.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: May I ask my honourable friend a question?

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Certainly.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: Then the idea of my honourable friend is that fair play for the farmer of the West, and to a large extent for the farmer of the East as well, is to have no protection whatever on what he produces, but that he ought to be willing to give 20, 25, 30 or 35 per cent protection to the manufacturer, who should get all the advantage of the tariff, while the farmer has to pay it.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: If that is a question, I understood clearly a moment ago from my honourable friend that the farmer in the West did not want protection.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: No, he does not; you cannot protect him.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: You cannot protect the farmer.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: He wants to have free access to the markets of the world, to sell and to buy his goods.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: No, not to buy his goods. You will not hear a prominent man among the farmers to-day advocating free trade. That is only a job put up on them by such honourable gentleman as my honourable friend who has just spoken, who tried to make out that the farmers' party want to have free trade. They are not asking for free trade; they are asking for moderate protection; and you would not get any leader among the farmers to advocate free trade. You ought to try to be fair in discussing this matter. They want moderate protection, and are willing to pay a good deal more for their goods, because they know that some revenue has to be raised by the tariff.

But my honourable friends, more especially those from Montreal, want to have the tariff put away up, so that not only the farmers but the labouring classes and the consumers—and we are all consumers—will have to pay much more for what they buy and use than they would under a moderate tariff.

If the Government increases the British preference, or lowers the tariff on the main necessities of life, they will be doing a good thing for the people of Canada. If the manufacturers of this country, who have cheap electrical power, and the very best class of labour in the world, cannot exist under a tariff of from 15 to 20 per cent instead of 30 or 35 per cent, then I say they ought to go out of business, and into something else where they will not have to make their living by robbing some other class of people in the country. But even if the tariff were cut in two right among the whole line, I do not for one moment believe that a single institution would be closed up. On the contrary, a period of success and good business throughout the country would be brought about, and the manufacturers in Canada would secure the best market they could possibly get among the successful farmers from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Hon. G. D. ROBERTSON: The important subject which the honourable member from Mille Iles (Hon. Mr. David) has brought before this House is such as to command, and I think demand, some real attention from us. That honourable member, because of his ripe experience and mature views, sees the real danger that confronts this young nation to-day because of the drift of the present Government and its policy.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: The same policy you advocated when you were in the Government.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: If my honourable friend will lend us his attention now, he can make another speech when I am through if he so desires. There was a time 40 years ago, about 1878, when a situation similar to the present one faced this young country, and every man of experience and foresight who was a student of that day agreed, regardless of what his political affiliations had been, that protection was a policy that should be adopted in order to build up the nation. It was adopted, and carried on by successive Governments, regardless of their political complexion, until the Great War intervened.

Following the war, changed conditions throughout the world have upset the international equilibrium, so that to-day it is necessary to reconstruct our domestic affairs to meet existing world conditions. Prior to 1914, and indeed for some little time after that, the tariffs of Canada were so adjusted that trade was flowing freely and fairly, and at the same time our home industries and those engaged therein—because when I refer to manufacturers I include the million workmen in their factories—were reasonably protected and able to carry on.

After the war was over, with currency depreciated in so many countries of the world, with approximately 60 countries raising their tariff walls against us, with cheap labour in many other countries because of their depreciated currency—the cost in our currency to the manufacturer of the other countries being infinitisimal as compared with the cost to the manufacturer in Canada—all protection that the tariff had afforded previous to the war was in many cases entirely wiped out. That is the situation with which a number of our industries are confronted to-day: we are in competition with products manufactured in countries where those conditions prevail.

We are all prone, I assume, to view public questions from the standpoint of our own particular community, or the part of the country in which we reside. I think it is unfortunate that any of us should take exception to the view that a gentleman from some other part of the Dominion strongly holds. We ought to exercise all the charity towards each other that is reasonably possible, having due regard to our own dignity. But when one travels extensively through this broad Dominion, and especially during a long period of years, and has a wide acquaintance with men and affairs in every part of the Dominion, one naturally has his viewpoint broadened, and has more knowledge of and sympathy with the needs of the people in various parts of the country than would be possible if his experience were confined wholly or largely to a given locality in a particular province.

Eastern Canada has spent an enormous amount of money for the development of the West, while the West, by reason of its development, has supplied a vast store of national wealth which has during a number of years been constantly and gradually increasing in volume. That interchange has been useful to the country as a whole, and ought to cement the bonds of Confederation rather than have any other tendency. It is true that many railway facilities such as elevators and canals in the East would never have existed had it not been for the necessity of providing facilities for transportation of the products of Western Canada in large quantities at the cheapest possible rates.

It is true that the population in Western Canada is very small as compared with that of the East; yet the people there have consumed some of the manufactured goods of the eastern part of the Dominion. But when the eastern manufacturer, for example, the agricultural implement maker, realizes that the value of agricultural implements has dropped from $42,000,000 to $16,000,000 in a year, and knows that organizations of agriculturists in Western Canada, on a large scale are, by organized and determined effort, refusing to buy even a hoe or a spade made in Canada, we begin to understand some of the reasons for the antagonism that sometimes breaks out. It is unfortunate that that should exist, but it does.

I want to point out that the views expressed by the honourable member for Assiniboia (Hon. Mr. Turriff) on the question of tariff and protection for the agricultural industry, are not by any means those unanimously held by agriculturists in Western Canada. I had the honour and privilege of accompanying the Finance Minister of the late Government on a trip throughout Canada, listening to the views of everyone who desired to speak on the subject to the Tariff Commission. I remember very well one extensive farmer in the province of Alberta, who came before the Commission and made a statement which, in effect was this: "I assume, gentlemen, that the views I propose to express will not meet with very great sympathy from the farmers in this locality, who have, through their representatives, made statements to you to-day, but I want to assure you that I am absolutely opposed to the lowering or removing of the duty on agricultural implements, and I will tell you why. I own two sections of land in what is called a dry area. For the past two years we have had but little rain, and my crops were poor, and the straw was so short that the binder would run over it and not save the crop. I was therefore compelled to purchase two headers. They cost scarcely as much as binders to construct, but what did I have to do in order to get headers? In the first place, I had to pay for them in advance, though I could get a binder on easy terms of payments extended over a substantial period of time; and I had to pay exactly double the price of a binder in order to get the header, because headers are not manufactured in Canada."

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Will the honourable gentleman tell us what headers are?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: A header is a machine for cutting grain when the straw is only 8 or 10 inches high, and it gathers the grain off the straw when there is not an ordinary crop.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: Where does the farmer buy them?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: In the United States. The farmer to whom I referred went on to say: "I hold that if the duty were taken off agricultural implements entirely, as is proposed, the time would speedily come when the American manufacturer with his large production and small unit-cost would, if necessary, sell his goods in Canada at an absolute loss, for a brief period of time in order to put the Canadian manufacturer out of business entirely; and then I and all my neighbours would pay through the nose for binders, mowers and plows, just as I had to do for headers." I am not advancing any opinion whether that is a good argument or not, but I am stating that that was the argument very forcibly advanced by that large farmer in Western Canada.

I am very much interested in the subject of protection from another standpoint, that of immigration, and from the standpoint of employment for hundreds and thousands, indeed more than a million of industrial workers in Canada to-day. I want to point out to this House in all sincerity that some things are happening in this country, the significance of which we probably do not appreciate. I would like to ask honourable gentlemen if they have seen an American industry established or a new factory started in Canada in recent months or, indeed during the last couple of years? On the other hand, the Americans are closing their Canadian factories. We had over 600 of them here. Have honourable gentlemen seen any increase in the industrial population of Canada during the past few years? On the contrary, during the past 12 months 200,000 men with their dependents have had to take their little all and leave their native land in order to obtain employment and earn a livelihood. This Government might just as well have deported 200,000 honest Canadian workmen last year as to do what they did; yet they are persisting in that policy of tariff reduction—why? I am satisfied, it is not because the Government of the day believes in that policy, but because they are hopelessly helpless to do anything else.

During the past two days we have seen a very substantial delegation coming down from Western Canada, speaking for the elements who have been crying for economy, yet demanding the expenditure of approximately $50,000,000 for the completion of a railroad that will never earn the axle grease that will grease the wheels.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: That was said some time ago about the C. P. R.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I am stating that about the Hudson Bay Railway, and all that is necessary is to call up the records of the investigation made by the Department of Railways when Hon. Mr. Cochrane was Minister of Railways, and see what the facts are. The most careful investigation was made by a vessel sent by the Government in August to explore the Hudson Straits, and to report to the Government as to the possibilities of summer navigation. It is clear to anybody who has followed that subject that for the purpose of exporting wheat from western Canada to the European market the Hudson Straits route will never be feasible.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: This House made a report on that subject.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I hold, furthermore, that if the Hudson Bay Railway is ever useful for anything it will be to carry the iron ores from Belcher Island, situated in Hudson Bay, where there are large deposits of iron ore, to smelters that will some day be located on the top of the coal fields in the province of Alberta, and that wheat will be brought as return cargoes. We will be loading cars both ways from Fort Churchill or Port Nelson, whichever may be the best port, to a port in the vicinity of the present Moose Factory, and thence by rail to the city of Quebec, You will thus get a 300 miles shorter rail haul, and a 400 miles longer water haul, than by the Great Lakes route. It may be feasible to utilize the Hudson Bay Railway in that way some day, but it will never be feasible to work the Hudson Bay Railway for an export business.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: That is right.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Now, honourable gentlemen, let us pause just a moment and realize that there has been a parade of approximately 500 men for very working day during the last twelve or eighteen months. continuously marching past, leaving their native land and going to the United States to find work and earn a living.

Hon. Mr. HAYDON: Does the argument go to this, that if protection were largely increased this departure of people from the country would cease?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I will come to that in a few moments and, I hope, answer my honourable friend's question clearly. There is surely a remedy, but that remedy will never be found, honourable gentlemen, so long as the exodus continues and consequently the burden of taxation upon those remaining increases. The fact that our neighbours to the south are recuperating and reducing their rate of taxation will only aggravate the situation. So long as there is an exodus of people, so long as there is decline in industry instead of development, so long will this situation continue and the more serious will become our railroad situation each succeeding year.

In spite of all this, we have before us now, or in sight, proposals for the expenditure of public moneys that will run approximately to $150,000,000, which Parliament is encouraged and asked by different interests to grant for various purposes. Have we any idea as to what is the burden of taxation upon the people to-day? Municipal, provincial and federal obligations of this country to-day total approximately five billions of dollars. At 5 per cent what do we have to pay? About $250,000,000 or $225,000,000 in interest charges alone; and that is an annual tax. We have in Canada to-day between two and three million men and women who may be regarded as actual producers of wealth, engaged in various sorts of activity. I do not attempt to confine that total by any means to wage earners. Out of a population of 9,000,000 it is surely true that there are less than 3,000,000 who are doing the work of the country. Divide an annual burden, in interest alone, of $250,000,000 among 3,000,000 people, and you begin to realize the burden of taxation that rests upon every individual in this country. A means must be found, and found quickly, to turn this tide. Over $100,000,000 of increase in the public debt in the past two years, since a Government pledged to economy and cost of living reduction came into power, and the merry chase goes on, with an expenditure of $150,000,000 in sight right now, being asked for largely by those who are advocating and demanding economy. We have just witnessed in the province of Ontario an excellent illustration of economy as practised by a political party who preached it.

As to the remedy, I hold that to restore international equilibrium it is absolutely necessary that an all-round increase in our tariff should take place quickly. It should be in my opinion a perpendicular increase. Let it be investigated afterward. Increase the general, preferential and intermediate tariffs, and then do what is in my opinion a sensible thing: that is, endeavour as far as possible in the future to remove the question of tariff from the political arena. That cannot be done so long as the tariff is made a political football. I submit to honourable gentlemen and to the House this thought, that there should be attached to the Department of Finance a number of men, three or perhaps more, well skilled and with a complete and accurate knowledge of trade and labour conditions in and out of Canada, and that those men should have unlimited investigating powers, should listen to the complaints and requests of manufactures and consumers, and make concrete recommendations to the Minister of Finance, who must in the final analysis take the responsibility of action. In other words, a body somewhat like our present Railway Commission so far as investigation is concerned, should have the power to hear and investigate complaints and requests and the Minister and the Government in office at the time must of necessity make decisions.

Then the sales tax should be reduced at least to the level of two years ago, and it should be entirely eliminated as quickly as is possible from a revenue standpoint. In the platform of principles that they announced to the people, in 1919 the present Government promised by tariff reduction to decrease the cost of living, and there were hundreds of thousands of working men who felt that they were toiling under a burden of taxation by reason of the tariff, as they had been taught for years, and who voted for the party that gave that pledge. That pledge has not been kept, but instead the cost of living has increased. We need only look up the records in your own Department of Labour to see that from July 1920 down to December 31, 1921, the cost of living dropped about 37 points; that it lowered a little further, just a point or so, in the months of January and February, 1922; when the Budget was brought down, early in 1922, the cost of living stopped going down, remained almost level, fluctuating just a little during that year; then there was a distinct and substantial increase, and it is to-day higher than it was on December 31, 1921, when this Government took office.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: That is not owing to any change in the tariff. The tariff is the same.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: That is due to the fact that the Government took off 2½ percent on a few insignificant things and added a 6 per cent sales tax on pretty nearly everything that the working man consumed.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Added a 6 per cent sales tax?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Raised it to 6 per cent. I stand corrected to that extent.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes, raised it by a very small fraction, if at all.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: In addition to that, the sales tax regulations were extended to articles that were not formerly covered at all. For example I will point out just one class of articles. A great many people living in rented homes, who have not the facilities for laying by their winter supply of food, buy immense quantities of canned goods. Pease, beans, corn, or anything you like in the vegetable line, do not carry a sales tax until they are put into cans, but the moment they are canned they become taxable, and the working men to-day, by the hundreds of thousands, are paying a 6 per cent sales tax on every can of peas, beans, corn, etc., which they did not pay at all until this present Government imposed that special tax upon the wage earner.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Does my honourable friend pretend that the raising of the tariff generally, as he advocates, will have for its effect any reduction in the cost of living?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: In reply to that I desire to confirm and endorse absolutely the utterance of my honourable friend from Mille Iles (Hon. Mr. David), that a workman would much prefer to have the cost of living level maintained, or perhaps raised a little, and have employment, than to be out of a job and have to pay the prices he is paying to-day, because the reduction in tariff, that my honourable friend refers to and would like to emphasize, has resulted not in a decrease in the cost of living, but an increase.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: That is begging the question.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: It is not. I beg the honourable gentleman's pardon. I do not see how that could possibly be.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Another question which seems to me an important one: this result which my honourable friend foresees, and which I cannot foresee, will at least take a rather long time to make itself felt. It cannot be accomplished over-night. What is going to become of this exodus in the meantime?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I assume it will continue until something is done to stop it.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Exactly. Then you will not stop it.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: If my honourable friend and the Government which he supports will do what the honourable leader of the late Government did in 1921, when he still had a majority of nineteen in the House of Commons and about thirty in this Chamber—said, "If it will stabilize the situation in Canada and bring about more settled conditions and cause business to settle down quickly to normal to have a general election now, we will have it"—

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Oh, that is the remedy?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: No, No; I am not suggesting that. I say that if the Government had sufficient courage, as the honourable member who introduced this motion suggested, and were not dependent upon the party which my honourable friend from Assiniboia (Hon. Mr. Turriff) supports to remain in power, but would come forward and say, "Let this question be decided on its merits by the voice of the people," I am satisfied that to-morrow the people of Canada would stand by a policy of adequate protection. If they did not, we should not have anything more to say. I hold that if the tariff were adequately and quickly increased and steps taken such as I have pointed out, to do justice to all parties concerned or interested in tariff matters, the effect would be quickly to stop emigration and restore confidence, capital would flow in, and industry would again expand. But until that is done emigration, depression in business and timidity of capital will continue and the present situation will grow worse from day to day, until a provoked populace rise up and demand that some action shall be taken and that this pussyfooting shall cease.

Hon. R. DANDURAND: May I take it for granted that I close the debate?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: As far as I am concerned.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If nobody else desires to speak on this matter. I will say but a few words. If there is anyone in this Chamber who is handicapped in expressing an opinion on tariff conditions at present it is probably the member who now has the floor, because it is understood that the policy of the Government will be propounded within forty-eight hours.

I desire simply to say few words of a general nature. In the discussion of the Address I mentioned the fact that tariff making was not an easy matter; that the adjustment of the tariff had been tried by all governments since 1867, and the tariff gradually brought to its present state. I added that the manufacturers in their own branches, had themselves tried to prepare an ideal tariff and had failed in the attempt, because they could not reconcile the conflicting interest of their various sections. We have here an honourable gentleman, who claims to speak more particularly for the interests of the Western farmer, the honourable member from Assiniboia (Hon. Mr. Turriff), stating that there is no free trader even in that section of the country; that what the West wants is a fair tariff; that the farmers of the West, like the farmers of the East, are ready to contribute a certain share of the revenues of this country for the carrying on of the Government. The honourable gentleman has said that the representatives of the West are ready to sit down and discuss with those of the East, and with the manufacturers and agree to a fair apportionment of the burden—an arrangement which will be fair to the manufacturer, if it be but an incidental protection, provided it is not too heavy upon the consumer. Right here we see that it is a question of adjustment. In the conditions confronting us it is not a question of doctrine. There is not in this country a protectionist or a free trader There are those who are interested more particularly in the industries of the country, whose only ideal would be an increased tariff. There are others who feel that these manufacturers should not have the whole say. Now, what is the condition in the country?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Pretty bad.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But I am limiting the question to the tariff. On the whole the situation is not too bad, as I told my honourable friend, because our production, industrial and rural, has considerably increased during the last twelve months. Now, what is the condition as regards the tariff? Can it be said that the Conservative party backs to the limit the manufacturers' demands for a higher tariff?

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: No.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Here is an answer.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: That is a lone voice.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: A lone voice? But I would draw the attention of my honourable friend from the same province to this situation, that the former Government, which included five or six honourable gentlemen who are members of this Chamber, made two cuts in the tariff within the two years prior to their going out. They reduced the tariff twice. And all the representations that have come to me from the manufacturing interests complain of the fact that during the last four years there have been two cuts in the tariff. This Government has made only two, by increasing the preference twice. If there is any merit or virtue in the actions of the preceding Government in tariff adjustment, then they were favourable to a reduced tariff.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: Would my honourable friend point out to the country from the cuts made by the late Government?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I said my statements would be of a very general order, because, as I said, very soon the policy of the Government would be made known. But what I want to draw to the attention of this Chamber is the fact that the tariff is a matter for periodical adjustment. There are high protectionists in the Conservative party, and I find some even in the Liberal party. But let us not forget that Liberalism calls for greater freedom in all fields and that the natural tendency of the Liberal party and Liberalism is towards greater freedom in the economic field. It may be said that the tendency is not apparent in this Chamber this evening; but I answer that Liberalism has its advance guard and its rear guard. I have always told my honourable friend from Mille Iles (Hon. Mr. David) that he represented the rear guard, and was one of those lagging far behind.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: It is the other way about.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yet I respect his views. The first virtue in a democracy should be sincerity, and when my honourable friend or anyone else in this Chamber rises to express his opinions, he is entitled to the respect of all the members of this Chamber, once it is known that his views are sincere.

My honourable friend from Montarville (Hon. Mr. Beaubien) said that the farmers of the West were clamouring for a reduction of the tariff, and seemed to want to monopolize the interests of the farming community, forgetting that there was such a thing as an Eastern farmer. I would draw his attention to the fact that some three or four weeks ago a delegation, purporting to represent the farmers of Quebec, visited the city of Quebec and made certain demands upon the provincial Government. Some of them went beyond the field of provincial jurisdiction. They received a certain answer, and asked leave to deliberate again; later they came back and asked the Minister for certain things that would help the farming community, and amongst them was a reduction in the tariff.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: On boots and shoes?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I hear the question: "On boots and shoes?" In answer to that question and the statement of my honourable friend from Mille Iles (Hon. Mr. David) that there is at present a certain depression in the country owing to the fact that the people of the country are fearful that the tariff will be revised downward and have therefore stayed their hand awaiting the pronouncement of the Government, let me refer to the remarks of the President of the Chamber of Commerce of Montreal, Mr. Joseph Daoust, a boot and shoe manufacturer, in an address to the commercial travellers. As the report of this address is in French, I will ask the indulgence of the House for my translation. Here is how Mr. Daoust diagnoses the present condition of the country:

Like all physical and moral diseases, business has also its indigestion and congestion. What are some of the causes? One of the principal ills of business has been the mania to become rich quick without overwork and without any care for economy. In 1911 there was wild speculation in real estate here and everywhere. Every little piece of property on the Isle of Montreal was offered for sale. The people forgot one thing—the necessity of a sufficient influx of population. A great deal of money was made through speculation. How many have kept it? In 1914 the war came, and everyone wanted to have a hand in shell making. The consequence was a great increase of wages. But who economized in anticipation of the time of reaction? In 1919 there was a scarcity of goods, and everybody rushed to buy. "Prices are going up," could be heard everywhere. The commercial traveller, like others, took advantage of the situation. Business at that time made extravagant profits. Manufactures were increased, but the manufacturers forgot just one thing—that the crash would come.

In 1920, and still to-day, another congestion and another indigestion: manufactures too large, too numerous; a surfeit of production with an insufficient market. One thing was forgotten, and that was to take into account the consumption. These are the principal causes of the stagnation. To maintain the volume of business of 1918 and 1919 business men had recourse to three means: cutting prices, indiscriminate selling, and special sales. These courses were all wrong, because in cutting prices, legitimate gain was denied to a competitor; in selling to doubtful purchasers one had to face the risk of bankruptcy, and liquidation sales tended to shake confidence. The remedy is to restore confidence. Let us not forget that the seven years of leanness will be followed by seven years of abundance. We are in the time of purgation and reaction. Let us not lose our heads. Let us do less business, but do it wisely. Let us carefully watch our accounts and our credits.

The commercial travellers have in their hands the remedy for the present distress: it is to be conscientious, to guard alike the interests of their principals and their customers—not attempting to set up more traders where there are already sufficient, nor to stimulate over-stocking at the risk of overwhelming their customers with indebtedness. It has been said that commercial travellers are fine posers, great talkers, but small doers. Let them rather be great and honest doers. Among them there are both pessimists and optimists. Excess in either direction is to be avoided. If the skies are dark to-day, there will surely be a morrow serene and sunny.

Let travellers, then, fulfil their mission without flinching and with intelligence, correcting by good counsel the errors of the past, avoiding over-buying, over-selling, and overholding, and guarding against bad credits. By these means you will render to commerce the service which it expects from you.

I think that this is the main part of the address of Mr. Daoust.

Here is a business man, a boot and shoe manufacturer, who states what he considers to be the ills that affect business at the present moment. He does not touch at all upon the fact that a slight increase in the British preference may have brought about a slight increase in importations from Great Britain. Like most business men, he knows that owing to the depreciation of currency in other countries there has been more importation into this country than has been caused by the modest cuts in the preference that have taken place.

What conclusion can we draw from what we have heard on both sides of this question this evening? One thing is certain: Tariff making is a most difficult business. It is not a doctrine which divides the two parties. The Conservative party since 1878 has rested mainly upon the manufacturing interests, the industrial class; and this was their mainstay for the National Policy, as they called it. The Liberal party, which naturally inclines towards the masses, and tries to better their condition, has been constantly thinking of the consumer. To-day again the two parties are standing face to face, divided on the same lines. The Liberal party are trying to do what is fair by the manufacturer and the industrial classes, but are not forgetting that vast constituency composed of the consumers and purchasers of industrial productions.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Assuming that the honourable gentleman is correct in saying that the Government are mindful of the consumer rather that the manufacturer, how is it that the decrease in tariff that occurred during the past two years resulted in a raising of the cost of living to the consumer in Canada?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I will not admit that what has been done with the tariff during the past two years has had the effect of increasing the cost of the goods to the consumer. That would be paradoxical.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: But it is true.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If that were true, then there would have been a decline in importations of the goods that we are manufacturing, whereas on the contrary there has been a slight increase in the importation of boots and shoes from Great Britain. I have had occasion to tell my honourable friend that we are turning in a vicious circle; that the high wages we are paying throughout the land—in the mines, on the railroads, and so on, in spite of the statement of my honourable friend that there has been a reduction in the wages of railway men everywhere—have been among the principal factors in the increased cost of living.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Let me again point out to my honourable friend the fact that wages to-day are substantially below the level of two years ago; the tariff is below in some respects; the cost of living is higher.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: People are now content to do with a great deal less than they were doing during the war. That accounts for the fact that people are buying less.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am very much surprised to hear my honourable friend mention an increased tariff as a remedy for present conditions. When he had power he thought it best to reduce the tariff. Three years ago it was reduced twice. When my honourable friends reduced the tariff emigration was taking place, and it was taking place in 1920.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: May I again call the honourable gentlemen's attention to the fact that when the late Government took off the special war tariff, the debacle of decreased and depreciated currency in other lands, and the increase in the tariffs of other lands had not taken place to any extent. Had that occurred prior to that action, the late Government, I am satisfied, would never have made this revision of the tariff; and had it the opportunity to-day to apply the remedy, it would quickly do so.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am not in a position to tell my honourable friend what remedies will be proposed within forty-eight hours by the present Government, but I hope he will find some comfort in what is proposed. I know very well the effect throughout the world of the depreciation of currency. I know that conditions are universally abnormal; but I believe, as Mr. Daoust says, that we are passing through a period of depression, and that while everyone is working we are gradually moving towards better days; and there is hardly any unemployment in Canada.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: There were 1,065 unemployed registered in this city two weeks ago.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That is the natural unemployment during the winter months, but we are coming into the spring. I know that on the island of Montreal, with a population of 800,000 or perhaps 900,000, there has been less unemployment during the winter months just past than there has been during a similar period in ten years; and there was a time during the last twelve months when we were short of labour in certain lines. Consequently the situation is good. I realize that profits are not as large as they have been, and that we must work on a smaller margin. That, I think, is one of the causes of the dissatisfaction that we hear of. During the war and the two years that followed profits were large. Those profits have come down gradually, and men now feel that they must use all their energy to meet competition from inside. During the five or six years that preceded 1921 people were making big money, but they will now have to return to normal conditions, and I feel confident that Canada will be the first country to reach the sunny side of life.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: I would like to ask if it ever struck the honourable gentleman that one of the causes of less unemployment in Canada was that a large number of men, about 300,000, crossed the line last year.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am not ready to admit that figure. There is a movement to and fro across the line, and I am quite sure that there has been a larger proportion from the farms than from the cities, at all events in the province of Quebec. The reasons I have stated before: the farmers did not lay anything aside when they were making big profits; they became extravagant; they increased their comforts; they even went into some speculations and were caught, when prices went down, with some obligations. At the same time, the ports of the Atlantic were being closed to immigration from Europe, but not from Canada, so the wages on the other side increased. But I may inform my honourable friend that there is today a depression in the milling centres of the New England States, and there is a movement among our people to return to the province of Quebec. My honourable friend must not forget that when we are moving towards readjusting the tariff to meet the conditions of the whole country, we are simply implementing statements which were made at the last election.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at 3 p.m.

PENITENTIARIES BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT moved the second reading of Bill 12, an Act to amend the Penitentiaries Act.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, this Bill has a double purpose. Its first object is to place all inmates of penitentiaries in the same position with regard to the powers of the warden and the officers; in case of escape, for instance. In the penitentiaries there are convicts who have committed felony, and there are others who have committed misdemeanors, and a different rule applies to each class. I may illustrate it in this way. Those who are in the penitentiary under conviction for felony, if they attempt to escape, are liable to be shot at by the guards, who have power to resort to shooting; whereas in the case of a convict imprisoned for a misdemeanor it is very doubtful if the wardens or the guards have any power of that kind. The purpose of the first amendment is to put both classes of inmates under the same rule.

The other amendment of the Act is necessitated by reason of the adoption last year of the law with regard to criminal appeals, which fixes the time within which an appeal may be made by a person convicted of a criminal offence. There is no provision in the Act as it stands as to where the accused may be kept in custody during the time allowed him for appeal, nor is there any place indicated in which he may be held in custody during the time the appeal is being heard. The purpose of this amendment is to provide that during the time allowed to the convict for appeal, and during the time taken for the hearing and determination of the appeal, he shall be kept in the common jail; he shall not be sent to penitentiary. The idea is that during the time he is seeking to upset the conviction he should not be incarcerated in the penitentiary with criminals who have been finally convicted.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I understood there was some slight difficulty about the application of the section. I would like to ascertain if counsel for the Senate has passed on it.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The Law Clerk of the Senate has, I assume, himself prepared the explanatory notes, which my honourable friend will find on the right-hand page of the Bill as printed. I observe that his notes are confined to the explanation which I have just given to the House. I am not advised whether or not he has made any other representations, but I think that, as the notes are prepared by the Law Clerk, it may fairly be taken for granted that the Bill meets with his approval.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

HALIBUT FISHERY BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT moved the second reading of Bill 21, an Act to amend the Northern Pacific Halibut Fishery Protection Act.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, the purpose of Section 1 of the Bill is merely to correct an omission—or an error, to call it by its proper name—in the Act passed last Session, Chapter 61 of the Statutes of 1923. The object is to insert after the word "waters," in the seventh line, the words "during the close season." These words were omitted from the Act of 1923. As the Treaty and the Act itself are intended to prohibit fishing during the close season only, it is necessary now to add the words "during the close season." That is the purpose of the proposed new Section 6.

The purpose of Section 2 of the Bill is to repeal Section 9 of the Act. If honourable gentlemen will read Section 9 they will see that the subject matter is covered by Section 5. Furthermore, Section 9 of the Act raises some doubt which it is necessary to remove; it is therefore proposed to repeal the section and limit the provision respecting seizure to Section 5, which contains practically all that is contained in Section 9, and states it in clearer language.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at 3 p.m.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE SENATE

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I desire to inform the members of the Senate that the day before yesterday I had a discussion with the leader of the group that faces me (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) as to the probability of any legislation coming to us from the other House in the near future, and more particularly as to whether any of the Branch Line Bills would reach us before the middle of next week or early after Easter. I am now in a position to state that there is no likelihood of any important legislation coming to us before the end of this month. Next Wednesday the House of Commons will adjourn to the 22nd of April, the Tuesday after Easter. Under these circumstances, and as there is nothing on the Order Paper for to-morrow, I give notice that I will move:

That when this House adjourns to-day, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, the 29th of April, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

FREIGHT EARNINGS EAST AND WEST

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I rise to a question or privilege. This is the first time I have done so in twenty-four years, so I hope no one will say I have abused the privilege. On Tuesday night I gave in this House some railway figures, and the honourable gentleman from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. McMeans) questioned the veracity or exactitude of those figures. I may say that I told the honourable gentleman that I would bring the matter up, and he now holds in his hands documents which I think prove exactly what I said. He is perfectly free to object to or not approve of those documents. I was not in possession of them when I made my statement, and I spoke without notes, but to the best of my memory.

I wish to say that I have never in this House made a statement of figures that I had not taken the utmost care to verify as far as God has given me light to see the right. The words the honourable gentleman used were:

> The honourable gentleman on the other side (Hon. Mr. Casgrain) is always very free with his statistics with regard to railways. While I would not accuse him of giving false information, I sometimes think the figures he quotes are not exactly what they appear to be.

I want on this occasion to exercise my privilege, because, I believe, it is the right and duty of every Senator to maintain the reputation of this House for telling what we believe to be the truth as well as we know it. May I add, with Shakespeare:

> Who steals my purse steals trash;
> But he that filches from me my good name
> Robs me of that which not enriches him,
> And makes me poor indeed.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I accept the honourable gentleman's apology—

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: It is not an apology.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I did not accuse the honourable gentleman of making any false statement. The question arose in a discussion, and a statement was made about the railways in the West with which I did not entirely agree, and I told the honourable gentleman that he was apt to quote a lot of figures that sometimes conveyed an impression that was not quite correct. I stated publicly from my seat in this House that the roads of the Canadian National Railway in the western provinces were paying lines. The honourable gentleman contradicted me, and asked where I got that information; so I thought, when he rose in his seat to-day, that he was going to apologize for even assuming that I was not correct. I did not have the figures, but he drew a distinction between the tonnage of the roads in the eastern part—the provinces of Ontario and Quebec—and that of Manitoba and the western provinces. Of course that was the impression that his remarks would leave on the House—that the tonnage—

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Not tonnage; I always spoke of the dollars and cents.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Yes; he said receipts were $11,000 per mile east of Lake Superior, whereas west of Lake Superior they were $8,000 a mile. That would leave the impression on the minds of hearers that those railways were earning more money in the East than they are in the West.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: So they are; read the papers I gave you.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: But it does not say that the $11,000 are profits.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: No; gross receipts.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: But I venture to say that the earnings of the roads in the western provinces are greater than they are in the East. The trouble is that you quote a statement of that kind, and you say what is the total that arises in Ontario and Quebec; but of course you have the short haul there. You have a larger tonnage, but you do not consider the fact that there is that huge bridge spanning the north shore of Lake Superior, and connecting these provinces. You stop at one point and then go to the other. You take the thickly-populated provinces, Ontario and Quebec, and say there is a bigger tonnage there. That is quite natural, for you have 75 per cent of the entire population of Canada in the East. Now, what is the freight that arises between the east and the west? The total stated in the documents that the honourable gentleman gave me a few minutes ago is 30,176,543 tons furnished by Ontario and Quebec, while the three prairie provinces together furnished only a total of 19,967,127 tons, or in round numbers 20,000,000—a third less, while 75 per cent of the population of all Canada belongs to the East.

Now, honourable gentlemen, in making this statement, if I am wrong I hope the honourable gentleman will correct me, as I do not desire to say anything that he can take objection to; but the impression that he left, or intended to leave on this honourable body, was to the effect, as he most characteristically stated, that the West has been spoon-fed, and that our railways were of such a character that all the profits to the country were in the East and not in the West. It was only in a deferential way that I rose in my seat in this House to protest against those remarks that are continually made in the East against the West. However, I will accept the honourable gentleman's apology.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I assure you there was no attempt to make an apology. I think the apology should be on the other side.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: Might I ask the honourable gentleman from Montreal a question?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Sure.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: Do I understand from the remarks he made the other day, and those he made now, that the railways make more money on their eastern lines than on their western lines?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Yes.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: If I am in order now—

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: You are not in order; we are all out of order.

Hon. Mr. TURRIFF: I just want to give that statement an absolute denial, and assert that the C.P.R. and the Canadian National Railways make double the money net profit in the West that they do in the East; and I will take the first opportunity when the House meets again of putting the figures on Hansard, because I have them right here.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Good.

PROVINCIAL GUARANTEES OF RAILWAYS

INQUIRY

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN inquired of the Government:

1. What is the total amount of capital guaranteed by the Provincial Government of British Columbia for railway purposes generally, at present falling under the legislative authority of the Dominion?
2. What is the total amount of interest also guaranteed by the said Provincial Government?
3. What amount, if any, of this guaranteed capital has been repaid by the said Government?
4. What amount, if any, of this guaranteed interest has been paid to date?
5. What measures, if any, have been taken by the Dominion Government to collect this guaranteed capital or interest or both?
6. If no measures have been taken is it the intention of the Dominion Government to institute the necessary legal proceedings to adjust these matters or collect these amounts?
7. What is the total mileage thus guaranteed, either in capital or interest or both?
8. Is it the intention of the Dominion Government to tax all the provinces for these amounts?
9. If not, how is the Dominion Government to meet these payments?
10. All these same questions for Alberta?
11. All these same questions for Saskatchewan?
12. All these same questions for Manitoba?
13. All these same questions for Ontario?
14. All these same questions for Quebec?
15. All these same questions for New Brunswick?
16. All these same questions for Nova Scotia?
17. All these same questions for Prince Edward Island?
18. Where in the public accounts can a record of these various amounts be found?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND:

1. $40,157,523.86.
2. $1,702,088.58.
3. None.
4. None.
5. None.
6. Provincial guarantees connected with Canadian Northern construction would have become operative had the company failed to meet interest charges or redeem issues on maturity. There was no lapse under private ownership of Canadian Northern and since assumption of the property by the Dominion interest payments have been met upon all issues, by the Dominion as owner.
7. 758.
8. The National Railways are as much the property of the people of one province as another, hence the meeting of any deficiency in interest charges by the country as a whole.
9. Eventually it is expected the interest charges in question will be earned by the railways, just as operating charges and considerable of the fixed charges were earned during 1923.
10, 11, 12 and 13.

	Guarantees	Annual Interest	Mileage
Alberta	$22,539,957 97	$ 947,718 31	1,436.25
Saskatchewan	28,567,723 97	1,160,415 32	1,746.62
Manitoba	25,662,545 51	1,026,501 77	1,875.55
Ontario	7,859,997 59	275,099 90	318.

The position of the Grand Trunk Pacific provincially guaranteed securities is not altogether similar to that of the Canadian Northern. The main line guarantees were Federal, but in addition the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta guaranteed securities issued for the construction of branch lines, to which the Dominion Government was not party. When the road went into receivership these branch line guarantees became operative against the provinces, and for several years there was uncertainty as to these interest charges. Finally, upon the Canadian National management recommending the taking over of the branch lines by the Dominion Government, the Federal Government undertook the payment of these branch line interest charges, and reimbursed the provinces their outlays in that respect.

14. Quebec—No provincial guarantees.
15. New Brunswick.—No provincial guarantees.
16. Nova Scotia.—No provincial guarantees.
17. Prince Edward Island.—No provincial guarantees.
18. A record of securities outstanding and guarantees both as to principal and interest is to be found on pages 47, 48, 49 and 51 of the annual report of the Department of Railways and Canals for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1923.

The interest upon Canadian Northern securities provincially guaranteed and others, was paid out of loans, a record of which is to be found in schedule "K," page 10, public accounts for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1923; Grand Trunk Pacific branch line interest, under same schedule, page 11.

LONGLAC TO NAKINA BRANCH RAILWAY

SERVICES OF COLONEL A. E. DUBUC

INQUIRY

Hon. Mr. TANNER inquired of the Government:

1. Was A. E. Dubuc, who is a member of the Ralston Royal Commission on Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment and Pensions and who was paid as such Commissioner $12,600 for services and $2,046.12 for allowances—252 days—between August, 1922, and July, 1923, the same A. E. Dubuc who was during the period mentioned in the service of the Government as Superintending Engineer of Quebec canals, and who was paid as such engineer a salary of $4,500 for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1923, as per volume III of Auditor General's Report, page W-97?

2. Has the said A. E. Dubuc been in the service of the Government since March 31, 1923, as Superintending Engineer or in any other capacity or capacities (other than as member of said Royal Commission)—and if so, in what capacity or capacities—between what dates—and for what length of time? And what salary has he received from the Government for such services since March 31, 1923?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND:

1. Yes.

2. (a) Continued as Superintending Engineer from April 1, 1923 to February 4, 1924, when he was promoted to his present position of Chief Engineer, Department of Railways and Canals. During that period he has been in the service of the Government (other than as member of said Royal Commission) in no other capacity.

(b) From April 1, 1923, to April 25, 1924, $5,316.08. On the 20th July, 1922, permission was given to Colonel Dubuc to act on the Royal Commission on Pensions and Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment. This was set out in a memorandum by the Deputy Minister to the Chief Engineer, copy of which is attached. The memorandum in part provided that Colonel Dubuc would not be paid by the Railway Department while acting on the Commission during his regular office hours. Through a misunderstanding Colonel Dubuc was not notified to this effect, and only by accident did he become aware of this fact some few weeks ago. He immediately brought the matter to the attention of the Deputy Minister, and an arrangement was made for an adjustment of the accounts along the line of the original instructions to the Chief Engineer.

The instructions to the Chief Engineer are contained in a memorandum dated July 20th, 1922, as follows:

An order in council was passed by the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment appointing, on approval of the Minister of this Department, Colonel Dubuc as one of the Commission to investigate charges made by the G.W.V.A. against the administration of the Pencion Act. The work will be of such a nature that it is not anticipated that Colonel Dubuc will be away from his duties as Superintending Engineer for any length of time, and that he will be able to take care of the two positions without detriment to this Department. The understanding is that Colonel Dubuc will not be paid by this Department while acting on the Commission.

INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES BILL

SECOND READING POSTPONED

On the Order:

Second Reading Bill 7, an Act to amend The Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, 1907.—Hon. Mr. Dandurand.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I was asked for the production of some judgments that might bear one way or the other on the constitutionality of this measure, and I now lay on the Table the judgment of the Privy Council in the case of the Attorney General vs. The Reciprocal Insurers having no licenses under the Dominion Insurance Act and others; also the judgment of Mr. Justice Orde granting an interim injunction in the case of the Toronto Electric Commissioners vs. Snider. There was a hearing before Mr. Justice Mowat, and the case went to the First Divisional Court by way of reference. The majority report declaring the Act constitutional was signed by Chief Justice Mulock and Justices Magee, Ferguson and Smith, while a minority report was made by Mr. Justice Hodgins. If anyone believes that this list of judgments or the opinions of the majority and the minority should be printed, we might decide to do that later on. I lay them on the Table meanwhile, and would ask that the Order be discharged and be placed on the Order Paper for to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I know some Senators who would like to look into this matter thoroughly, and I would suggest that a longer time be allowed for study of these documents.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: As these judgments are quite long, I presume that members of the Senate may need 24 hours to peruse them, and I will therefore move that the order be placed on the Order Paper for Thursday next.

The motion to postpone the order was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at 3 p.m.

ST. LAWRENCE RIVER INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION

INQUIRY AND DISCUSSION

Hon. Mr. GRIESBACH rose in accordance with the following notice:

That he will inquire of the Government:

1. Whether it is the intention of the Government to appoint a Commission to collaborate with a similar Commission from the United States, on the question of the canalization and the development of power on the St. Lawrence River.

2. If so, is it the intention of the Government to give representation to the Canadian General Staff on such commission?

And to draw the attention of the Government to the military questions involved therein.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, it is stated in the public press that it is the intention of the Government to appoint a Commission to act with a similar Commission appointed by the United States to investigate the question of the deepening of the St. Lawrence river and the development of power thereon.

I would call the attention of the House to the fact that the St. Lawrence river throughout the history of Canada has been an important artery of traffic, and at all times has been a strategic frontier and military obstacle; and anything that may be done with a view to the development of power on that river or the deepening of the river will have a profound effect upon it as a strategic barrier. I am advocating that the Government ought to appoint on the Commission a representative of the General Staff of Canada. I suggest a representative of the General Staff, and not some casual officer, because the General Staff is competent and, what is of greater importance, is responsible for advising the Government in matters of this sort. If no other reason could be advanced, I would call attention to a dispatch dated Washington, April 1st, published in the Montreal Gazette:

Secretary of War Weeks to-day announced his selection of engineer officers of the army to serve on the joint engineering board which will study the St. Lawrence waterways project. The American membership of the board will be headed by Colonel George B. Pillsbury, who will be assisted by Colonel Edgar Jadwin and Colonel William Kelley as advisers. Colonel Pillsbury will devote his entire time to the St. Lawrence project, but Colonels Jadwin and Kelley will continue in their present duties, though giving some time to the work in co-operation with Colonel Pillsbury.

The American Government have seen fit to give representation to their General Staff, recognizing that this project involves strategic as well as commercial problems. Therefore, as I have stated, I am strongly of the opinion that in the selection of this Commission by the Government of Canada representation should be given to our General Staff.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I shall be happy to draw the attention of the Department of Defence to the remarks of my honourable friend. The answer which I have reads as follows:

1. The Government intends to appoint a National Committee to advise the Government on various aspects of this important national question. The American Government has already appointed a National Committee of representative citizens.

2. The suggestion for representation of the Canadian General Staff will be considered by the Government in connection with the personnel of the proposed National Committee. Steps have been taken to provide for representation by an official of the Department of National Defence on the interdepartmental Committee which is at present acting in an advisory capacity to the Government.

INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES BILL

INQUIRY

Hon. W. B. ROSS inquired:

1. If the Government or any Department of the Government has received an opinion from the Department of Justice or from legal counsel as to the constitutionality of the provisions of Bill No. 7, the Industrial Disputes Bill, or any of its sections?

2. If yes, was the opinion received before or after the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the case of the Attorney General of Ontario versus Reciprocal Insurers?

3. If no opinion has been received will the Government at once ask the Department of Justice for such opinion?

4. Or will the Government before proceeding further with this Bill refer the question of the constitutionality of sections 2 and 3 to the Supreme Court of Canada?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: To the first and second questions, I am instructed by the Department of Justice to answer in the negative.

To the third and fourth questions, the answer is also in the negative, as the Court of Appeal of Ontario has just pronounced upon the constitutionality of the said Act.

CAPE BRETON LABOUR DISPUTE

INQUIRY

On the Notice:

By the Honourable Mr. David:

That he will call the attention of the Senate and of the Government upon the report published on the 31st of March last, and reproduced in the Senate Hansard of April the 1st, of a speech made by a man of the name of McLachlan at a meeting of miners in Cape Breton, and will inquire whether that McLachlan is the same man that has been released lately on parole by the Government, and, if so, does the Government intend to allow that dangerous man to continue to express such pernicious sentiments and do they not think it proper to send him back to jail in the interest of society and of the working class itself?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Apparently this is the same man, but the Government has no definite information as to the truth of the statements reported in the press.

YUKON DOMINION OFFICIALS

MOTION FOR RETURN

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER inquired of the Government:

The number of Dominion officials and employees in the Yukon Territory of all kinds, their positions, duties, salaries, allowances and expenses; also the present population of the territory, the total revenues derived therefrom and the sources thereof.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would ask the right honourable gentleman to transform his inquiry into a motion for a return.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: With the hope that the return may not be too long delayed.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It is in my hands. I think the right honourable gentleman will find the answer quite complete. It covers all the Departments, as far as I know, that are interested in the Yukon.

While we were discussing the amendment to the Judges Act, my honourable friend who leads the Conservative party in this Chamber (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) asked me if I could not obtain from the Department of the Interior information as to an inquiry that he had set in motion—he was too modest to say so himself—as to whether the Deputy Ministers of the various Departments interested in the administration of the Yukon could not come together and reduce their expenditures. A conference did take place, as suggested by my honourable friend, and minutes of this conference, or of conferences, are in my hands, and I shall lay them on the Table, as well as the supplementary report which I have received from the Deputy Minister; so there will be a complete report from the Department of the Interior.

The motion for a return was agreed to.

IMPORTATIONS OF ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGES

MOTION FOR RETURN

Hon. Mr. BOURQUE (for Hon. Mr. Beaubien) moved:

That an Order of the Senate do issue for a report showing the quantity and value of alcoholic beverages imported per month in each province of the Dominion, during the period extending from January 1, 1923, to March 1, 1924, distinguishing between,—

(a) Liquors,
(b) Wines,
(c) Drugs,

and indicating the alcolholic percentages of each category and the countries from which they come, respectively.

The motion was agreed to.

PRIVATE BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT moved the second reading of Bill K, an Act respecting a patent of Thomas Williams Pritchard.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: Will the honourable gentleman give us the reasons for which that application is made?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: If I may, I will read the sworn affidavit of the applicant:

I, Thomas Williams Pritchard, formerly of the City of Wilmington, in the State of North Carolina, now of New York City, New York, U.S.A., Chemist, make oath and say:

1. That I have personal knowledge of the matters herein deposed to.

2. That I am the inventor of an invention known in the art as "Processes of Distillation" granted to me this deponent under Letters Patent of Canada Number 165,468.

3. That I am the sole owner of such Letters Patent.

4. That I have put a varied and detailed amount of research work extending over some years on the said processes of distillation to work and perfect them for commercial uses and application and have incurred and caused to have been incurred many thousands of dollars.

5. That, further, by reason of the unnatural conditions created by and following from the effects of the great war, it has been impossible for me to interest capital and obtain the financial means necessary to exploit the said invention by commercial operations up until the present year.

6. That I now have reasonable assurances of financial assistance which will enable me to get the said invention working within a period of, say, one year from the date of the passing of the Act petitioned for.

7. That on or about the 20th day of January, 1924, I had caused inquiries to be made as to the standing of the said Letters Patent in Canada and was advised and verily believe if I had made application for an extension of time to manufacture in Canada previous to the 10th day of January 1924, some ten (10) days earlier, and paid the fees for the second term on the said Letters Patent on showing cause why an extension of the time to manufacture should have been given me, this petition should not have been necessary to validate my Letters Patent referred to.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: What is the invention?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: He describes it as "processes of distillation" and refers to research "to work and perfect them for commercial uses and application."

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Distillation of what?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I do not know anything more than what is in the affidavit.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Anything dealing with distillation, of course, appeals to the public taste these days.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: To some people anyway. (Reading):

8. That unless the period in which to construct or manufacture or to carry on the said processes of distillation in Canada under the said Letter Patent is extended until one year from the passing of the Act petitioned for, I will be greatly prejudiced and have suffered a pecuniary loss running into many thousands of dollars.

(Signed) Thomas Williams Pritchard.

Sworn to before me at the City of New York in the State of New York, U.S.A., this 4th day of April, 1924.

(Signed) F. N. Bunger, a Notary Public.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: My honourable friend has not advanced any particular reason why an exemption should be made in favour of this applicant, who has not paid a dollar of his fees, has not fulfilled the fundamental conditions necessary to retaining his patent, and in his petition gives no reason for not having obeyed the law in the first particular, except a reason that could be given for any person whose patent had lapsed. I think we ought to be very careful as to how we break into the general patent law, the conditions it imposes and the rights it gives in individual cases. If this passes on the simple information that we have now. I cannot see how we should be justified in throwing out any application made by a person who had neglected to pay his fees or fulfill the conditions. It is a rather serious matter to pass this without some stronger reasons being given than those brought so far seem to be. Has my honourable friend himself looked into the case at all, or has he before him simply what we have?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: A gentleman who is interested called on me. I forget exactly what he said to me, but I at once suggested to him that the usual thing to do would be to put into writing, in the form of an affidavit, the reasons he had in support of his application to Parliament. He filed the affidavit with the Clerk of the House and sent me a copy. All the while I was relying on what has been for many years past the invariable practice of this House, to refer such Bills for investigation to the Standing Committee on Private Bills. The House has felt all along, as I understand, that this is a question of fact which should be investigated in the Committee, and the second reading is generally granted on the certainty that the Bill will be properly examined in the department and there will be the further opportunity to hear what the department itself has to say in the matter. I take it that the passing of the second reading of the Bill means no more than that there is delegated to the Committee the responsibility of looking thoroughly into the question of granting the application.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: All right.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

REDUCTION OF SENATE MEMBERSHIP

DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from April 3 the debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Turriff:

1. That in the opinion of the Senate it is advisable in the interest of economy and good Government to reduce the number of Senators by one third, viz., from ninety-six to sixty-four Members.

2. That this reduction should be effected by not filling any vacancy that may occur in the number of Senators representing a province until that number has been reduced by one third, except in the senatorial division consisting of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, as to which division special provision as to the distribution of the reduction will be required.

3. That in each appointment of a Senator made under the decreased representation it shall be provided that the Senators shall automatically retire on attaining the age of.....years.

Hon. F. L. SCHAFFNER: Honourable gentlemen, it is not my purpose to take more than a very few moments of your time this afternoon. Indeed, I had no intention of making any remarks on the motion introduced by the honourable member from Assiniboia (Hon. Mr. Turiff), and would not have done so but for the fact that, following the usual practice during my twenty years in Parliament, he referred to the country to the south of us.

My honourable friend was advocating the reduction of the number of Senators in Canada when I asked him this question:

May I ask the honourable gentleman if he has considered the fact that, in addition to the Federal Senate, every state of the Union has a second chamber?

The honourable gentleman from Assiniboia replied:

Yes, I am aware of that. However, the State Senates and the Federal Senate, taken altogether, are not one-third as numerous as the members of our various legislatures, and their expense of governing is nothing like ours.

After considerable research I hold in my hand figures showing the number of State Senates and state Legislatures, and the number of members of each, and I find that what I felt to be true when I asked the question is borne out by the statistics.

In the Federal Senate of the United States there are 96 Senators. But in considering this matter we must remember that the members of the United States Senate and the members of the House of Representatives receive just double the pay received by Senators and members of the House of Commons in this country, namely, $8,000 per year.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: There are 110,000,000 people to pay it.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: I am simply giving the facts. That means that the expense of the Senators to the United States is just double the expense to this country in that regard. But this is the point. If we consider only the members of the Federal Houses in the United States, the honourable gentleman's argument would be fairly strong; but we must not forget the State bodies. I am not arguing either for or against reducing the number of our Senators; I am simply explaining and substantiating the basis of my question to the honourable gentleman.

No doubt many of you have read what the honourable gentleman from New Brunswick (Hon. Mr. Turgeon) said on the constitutional aspect of the question. In my opinion, he made a good argument against reducing the number of Senators. I have often felt that, in view of the very few changes it has been necessary to make in the British North America Act, the gentlemen who drew that legislation must have had great vision. It seems to have served this country very well up to the present time.

The object of my honourable friend from Assiniboia is no doubt a legitimate one; but after all, what would his proposal to reduce the membership of this House by one-third accomplish? If Parliament saw fit to act on the resolution, the only expense that would be saved to the country would be the indemnities of the number of Senators by which this body would be reduced; the other expenses, I judge, would remain exactly as they are now.

Now, let us take Great Britain. To my surprise—it may not surprise many honourable gentlemen who are more familiar with the question than I am—I found that there were more members of the House of Lords than of the Commons.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The members of the House of Lords are not paid.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: Pay would not affect my honourable friend any more than it would them. The House of Lords has 740 members and the House of Commons 615. Previous to 1922, when the Irish Parliament was formed, Ireland had 105 members in the British House, whereas it now has 13, and the total membership of the British House of Commons was 707.

Now, coming to the United States, we know there are 48 states.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: 48 states and one Federal District.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: That is right. Regardless of its size or population, each State has two Chambers. And I may say in passing that it occurred to me a day or two ago, when the leader of the Government was answering the question of my honourable friend from Lanaudière (Hon. Mr. Casgrain), that if we had two Chambers in each province we might not perhaps have had all these millions of provincial guarantees to railways; because in Quebec and Nova Scotia, where there are Legislative Councils, there are no such guarantees. So, after all, there may be something to be said in favour of a second chamber.

As I have said, there are 48 states. There are 1,770 members of State Senates, and 5,661 members of State Legislatures. There are also 96 Federal Senators, and 435 members of the House of Representatives. That makes a total of 7,962, or practically 8,000 members.

One other point which I wish to make is that, no matter what our population may become, the number of our Senators will not be increased without a change of the constitution, where as in the House of Commons every 10 years, after redistribution, there is an increase of the membership because of the increased population of the western provinces. At present there are 235 members in the House of Commons, but after redistribution there will be 245. Therefore, as our population increases our House of Commons will become a very large body, but as I understand the membership of the Senate will remain the same.

The following statement shows the number of members in the Senate and the Legislature of each state of the Republic, also the number in the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

States	Senate	Assembly
Maine	31	151
New Hampshire	24	421

The numbers of members in the several legislatures of the Dominion of Canada are as follows:

Federal Senate	96
House of Commons	235
Total	331
Local legislatures:
Ontario	111
Quebec	85
Nova Scotia	43
New Brunswick	48
Manitoba	55
British Columbia	47
Prince Edward Island	30
Saskatchewan	63
Total	540

That is all I wish to say, except to point out that in each of the United States, no matter how small, there are two Chambers, and that, although that country has a much larger population than Canada, the membership of its legislative bodies is smaller. New York State, for instance, with probably the largest population of any state, nearly as much as that of Canada, has 51 Senators and 150 members of the Assembly, whereas there are 540 members in the different local legislatures of Canada. On the other hand, we have only two Legislative Councils—one in Quebec, with a membership of 24, and one in Nova Scotia, with a membership of 21.

Hon. Mr. STANFIELD: Nova Scotia is well off.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: Yes, there are some great men in Nova Scotia.

Hon. Mr. TANNER: All good men.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: I thought it might be interesting to have these figures for the purposes of comparison. I have taken up as little of your time as possible in presenting these facts.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Dandurand, the debate was adjourned.

INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES BILL

MOTION FOR SECOND READING POSTPONED

On the Order:

Second reading of Bill 7, an Act to amend the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, 1907.—Hon. Mr. Dandurand.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Before the honourable leader proceeds with this Bill I would like to suggest to him that it should stand over till some day next week. A number of judgments have been laid on the Table. One of them, a judgment of the Privy Council on some Ontario questions, I have been able to read. One of the big questions to decide in regard to this Bill is whether sections 2 and 3 are intra vires of the Parliament of Canada or not. The Privy Council have decided, in terms that they probably mean to be final, that the Federal Parliament cannot get jurisdiction over property and civil rights, or any matter assigned to the Provincial Legislatures, by passing an Act declaring as a crime what is a violation of a civil right, giving rise to damages in a civil action. That question, I think, will have to be threshed out here pretty fully. I do not think it is wise for us to pass legislation that is clearly beyond our powers. Quite a number of members of the House are, I know, interested in this matter, pro and con, and I would like to have time for myself to go over the decisions of the Ontario Court. I am inclined to think they do not at all touch the question that is mentioned here. And I am no quite satisfied that I have got a very full answer to the question that I put the other day, whether or not any opinion has been given by the Department of Justice with regard to sections 2 and 3.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The Department of Justice have answered in the negative.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: That they have given no opinion? Then no information has been given as to the intention of the Government to ascertain whether or not there is in this Parliament authority to enact sections 2 and 3 of this new Bill. I do not think the honourable gentleman gave me any great satisfaction on that.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: What day does my honourable friend desire to set for the discussion of this Bill?

Hon. Mr. ROSS: Next Wednesday. I think everybody will be here on that day.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have no objection to postponing the second reading until Wednesday, with the understanding that we shall proceed with it then. If we have to accede to the request of a number of honourable members to adjourn it, we may reach the end of the Session without having examined this Bill, which was before us for a considerable time last Session.

I may inform honourable members who would be interested in examining into the constitutionality of the Act, that I have brought for their information about 50 copies of the judgment delivered by the Court of Appeals of Ontario on the 22nd of April last. It comprises the judgment of the four judges who maintained the constitutionality of the Act, and the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Hodgins.

My honourable friend (Hon. W. B. Ross) has asked if the Government or the Department of Justice should not consider submitting the Act to the Supreme Court. I may inform him that the Department of Justice has already taken a stand on this Act by defending it before the Court of Appeals of Ontario, and has succeeded in that Court in having the Act declared intra vires. That being so, it is possible that an appeal may be taken from the Court of Appeal of Ontario to the Supreme Court of Canada or the Privy Council. However, I would ask my honourable friend to turn over in his mind this proposition, that the question of authority or jurisdiction is not even a doubtful one. I submit that it is not for us to doubt our own jurisdiction. This Act has been on the Statute Book since 1907 and has, I think, worked to the advantage of the country. It is now being attacked before the courts. Its constitutionality will be tested. The Court of Appeal declares that it is constitutional. I suggest that we leave it to the tribunals of final jurisdiction to express an opinion, and that we should not await their decision before modifying the Act. The proposed Bill would amend it in no very important particular, maintaining only the same principles as are already embodied in the statute. I draw my honourable friend's attention to this situation.

However, I have no objection to moving that this Order be discharged and be placed on the Orders of the Day for Wednesday next. Any honourable member who desires to study the question will find, I think, both sides of the case presented in the judgment which has lately been rendered by the Court of Appeal.

The motion to postpone the order was agreed to.

PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT

CORRECTION OF ERROR

On the Order:

Consideration of the first Report of the Joint Committee of both Houses on the Printing of Parliament.—Hon. Smeaton White.

Hon. R. S. WHITE: Honourable gentlemen, the Clerk has made a slight error in the report submitted, which I wish to have amended. Items number 35, 36a, and 37 and 37a appearing in the list have already been printed. They should have been on the list as being authorized by the Committee. The first, No. 35, was printed during the recess at the special request of the Prime Minister in order to have it ready for the opening of Parliament. 37a, in the same way, has been printed by special request, and should have been on the list. A certain number of copies of No. 36a and No. 37 have been purchased from London, but they will appear in the bound volume of the proceedings. Hon. Mr. DANDURAND:

1. Yes.
2. Yes.

4. On a petition received from residents in the district, the department ordered an investigation in accordance with the usual procedure. The petition charged the postmaster with political partisanship.

OCCUPATION OF THE RUHR

INQUIRY

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN inquired of the Government:

1. Whether the French Government is receiving substantial amounts in species or kind or both from the occupation of the Ruhr?
2. If so, is the Imperial Government participating in the receipts of the amounts?
3. If so, what percentage is collected by the Imperial Government?
4. Is Canada entitled to a share in these amounts?
5. If so, for what percentage?
6. If so, is the Government of Canada taking the proper steps to collect its share?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have been unable to obtain from our departments of Finance or External Affairs any other information than that the share which will accrue to Canada from the total amount of reparation receipts which Great Britain will receive under the terms of the Treaty of Versailles should be 4.35 per cent. I have secured information from another source which may be of interest, and will answer some of the questions comprised in this inquiry.

I will read an excerpt from a statement made by the Prime Minister of France, Mr. Raymond Poincaré, on the 2nd of April last, to Parliament. It reads as follows:

When France and Belgium decided to enter the Ruhr, in order to take a further lien or security, the German Government had just declared, in its letter of the 14th November, 1922, addressed to the Reparations Commission, that, for the next three or four years, the Reich would be unable to pay anything either in kind or money. Germany felt that it had reached the day when it could definitely escape meeting its obligations. If all the Allies had joined in, it is probable that Germany would have accepted the inevitable. Her resistance, at all events, would not have been as prolonged.

Such as it was, the realizing upon our securities became a technical problem far more difficult and which was bound to be of longer duration. The passive resistance, the obstruction, the sabotage gradually forced us to make our control more complete; the setting up of a Customs barrier at the oriental frontier, Railway control, industrial control of export trade from the occupied territories, licenses to do foreign trade and derogations for trade with unoccupied Germany.

The estimates of production which we had made in December, 1922, before entering the Ruhr, are to-day very largely exceeded.

The most striking example is given by the customs returns, which had been estimated to give 200 million gold marks annually. The receipts for February indicate a yearly return of 300 million gold marks.

The average daily receipts show the following increases:

In October last, per day..	803,000 francs
November, last, per day..	1,190,000 francs
December last, per day..	2,053,000 francs
January last, per day..	2,957,000 francs
February last, per day..	4,600,000 francs

Valued in gold marks the customs returns for January and February are sensibly superior to the total customs collections for the whole year of 1923.

The general results are as follows:

Financial statement up to the 31st of December, 1923, for the year of passive resistance—Grand total of receipts, including:

(a) Receipts of the French and Belgian services centralized by the Security Accounting Committee of the High International Commission at Coblentz.

(b) Receipts collected directly by the French and Belgian Treasuries.

Proceeds from the sale of coal, coke, proceeds from the seizures etc., 1,643,700,000 francs.

Expenditure, including the normal expenses of the French and Belgian armies on the left bank of the Rhine, as they stood before the occupation of the Ruhr, 986,500,000 francs.

Leaving a surplus of 657,200,000 francs.

So that on the 31st of December, 1923, and despite the passive resistance, the receipts had been sufficient to cover the expenses, including the normal cost of occupation of the left bank of the Rhine, and to leave a surplus exceeding 600 millions.

The results at present are as follows:

1. Customs, licenses and Derogations totalled 138 million francs for the month af February, or at a rate of 1 billion 600 millions a year.

2. The Kohlensteuer (coal tax) yielded from January 20th to February 20th, that is, in one month, 93 million francs, including the collection of arrears. The total for the year is estimated at 500 millions.

3. Forests, normal cut in 1924, will account for 110 millions during the year.

4. Railways: On the 1st of March, 1923, the traffic was completely stopped: trains covered 29,000 kilometres only per day for 7,000 travellers and 1,000 tons of merchandise. To-day trains are running 270,000 kilometres a day, carrying 330,000 passengers and 310,000 tons of freight. In 1922, the normal traffic was 320,000 kilometres, with 400,000 passengers and 375,000 tons of freight.

Briefly, the working of the securities organized up to date should yield annually well over 4 billion francs.

The cost of civil services, except that of the railway administration, the estimates I have just announced, showing only net returns, are less than 25 millions a year.

The cost of transportation of the stocks and of working the mines and the coke pits amounted in 1923 to 80 millions.

The total amount of military expenditure for the armies in the Ruhr, in 1923, was about 280 millions. It will be less in 1924 on account of the forces being reduced, which has been partly done already.

The normal cost of occupation by the French army of the left bank of the Rhine amounts to 493 millions.

So that, including the military expenses of Belgium and the normal cost of occupation, which is not an additional expense and is quite apart from the working of the securities, the total expenditure does not reach a billion, against receipts amounting to 4 billion francs. Consequently, a sum of 3 billions will go to the Reparations account.

This sum of 3 billions must be divided between the Allies, and Belgium is entitled to a preference; nevertheless it represents, for all the Allies, the result of the occupation of the Ruhr.

I have received this morning from General Degoutte the following telegram:

"In March 2,104,000 tons of fuel reparations have been shipped, while the estimation of the M.I.C.U.M. (Mission Inter-alliée de Contrôle des Usines et des Mines) was but 2,059,000 tons and that of the Reparations Commission, prepared on the 2nd of December, 1922, before the occupation of the Ruhr, was but 1,600,000 tons which amount the German claimed to be unable to deliver."

We have thus reached and even exceeded the normal output of the Ruhr and Rhineland, and we have demonstrated the bad faith of Germany, before the occupation, in so far as payments in kind and cash are concerned.

I have in my hand a statement of the production of the railways in the Ruhr compared with that of the railways in France. I think it will be interesting to this Chamber because, with the Allies holding valuable securities, it may give rise to the hope that the Germans will accept the General Dawes report:

On March 1st, 1924, the traffic under the Franco-Belgian management was about 4/5 ths of what it was previously under the administration of the Reich.

The "Régie"—that is the administration of the railway—could have already restored the traffic up to its importance in 1922, had Germany kept the agreement signed at Mayence on December 1st, 1923, and handed over to the "Régie" the 1,100 locomotives sent out of the occupied territories. But the German Government sent back only 18 of them! As for railroad cars, the "Régie" has only 16,929, while the number required for normal traffic is 44,400.

At the present time, the receipts of the "Régie" amount to 6 million francs, daily average, representing a net profit of 1 million francs a day.

On no French railroad are the conditions as favorable as they are on the railroads operated in occupied territories by the Franco-Belgian "Régie." The following tables bring out that remarkable comparison, they are by weeks:

Weeks	Daily tons of merchandise	Weekly receipts, in francs
1923—
November 19th to 25th.. ..	88,569	10,701,546

With these figures on Hansard honourable gentlemen will be able to see what a valuable piece of property the Ruhr is, and what an interest the Germans must have in freeing themselves of control and accepting General Dawes' report.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: If I may be allowed to speak, that is not an answer to my question at all. My question is very simple. It says in part:

If so, is the Government of Canada taking the proper steps to collect its share?

There has not been a word in answer to that. I know I am not in order in speaking; but what has been said is not in answer to my question.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I said my honourable friend would find in this statement practically an answer to his question.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Practically. What is the Government doing?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Great Britain, I think, has received nothing so far. My honourable friend cannot expect Canada to get its share now.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It will come later.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have stated what would be the share accruing to Canada when Great Britain, for the Empire, received its share from the occupation of the Ruhr district.

Right Hon. Sir. GEORGE E. FOSTER: I did not wish to interrupt my honourable friend while he was reading that important paper, but really this is one of the most extraordinary exhibitions I have ever seen in either House since I have been a member of Parliament. A simple question is asked by my honourable friend with reference to Canadian interests in the Ruhr. The leader of the Government takes the opportunity to make a long speech and to place before the House a mass of figures, entirely undigested, in the shape of propaganda for a certain proposition about which there are contending opinions, with an extraordinary alacrity to give information which pushes him away over the verge of any question my honourable friend could possibly have had in mind when he put his question. My honourable friend has taken up the time of the House, and has made a speech the parallel to which, I venture to say, you may search for in vain in the records of any legislative assembly.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I may say to my honourable friend that my alacrity was not considered great when I was reproached by the questioner with not bringing down the answer. I requested the various departments to give me an answer to the question. The answer was that there was no data. I found official data, which I thought would be interesting, because we have had no data either in this Chamber or the other as to the returns from the occupation of the Ruhr. 4.35 per cent of what accrues to the British Empire will be ours. These figures are most interesting, and I believe when my honourable friend reads them he will find them very readable indeed.

I intended doing more. I intended giving to my honourable friend (Right Hon. Sir George E. Foster)—who has the advantage over many of his colleagues of reading French—the whole speech of Mr. Poincaré, when he gave the official returns to the French Assembly. He declares that there will be three billions of clear profit belonging to the Allies. That is a statement which I thought came under the question, and I was convinced that the information I have given to the House, being new, and covering, as it does, our share, would be welcomed by the Senate.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: I will be very much obliged to my honourable friend if he will put in my hands the speech in full. I was not objecting to the information, but to the manner of its introduction. I should think there might come a time in this honourable House when we could discuss the question and when the information would be appropriate. I shall be glad to be put in possession of that information.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I will give it to my honourable friend this evening.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT

MOTION FOR RETURN

Hon. Mr. GILLIS moved:

That an order of the Senate do issue for a Return showing:—

1. The number of settlers under the Soldier Settlement Scheme that have abandoned their farms.
2. The cost to the Government for land and equipment in each of such cases.
3. What disposition, if any, was made of the land and equipment; if sold, what percentage of the original cost was realized.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, before this motion is voted on I desire to say a word or two. I imagine that when the return is brought down it will show that more of our soldier settlers are leaving the farms than we have any idea of. This is a somewhat serious situation. In the first place, we are losing what we believe to be valuable settlers in Canada; in the second place, the government is losing heavily in the case of every settler who leaves the farm.

Several cases have come under my own observation in which a soldier settler left his farm, and left all his equipment and everything else furnished him by the Government. This equipment, as a rule, is sold by public auction by the Government official in charge of the particular district. Last year at several auction sales, horses realized no more than 10 per cent of their original cost; and the same is true, although probably not to the same extent, of other equipment. This is a serious matter, and steps should be taken by the Government so to arrange conditions as to enable those soldier settlers to remain on their farms.

When the Soldier Settlement scheme was first brought into existence I think everyone agreed that it was a splendid scheme. This is quite evident from the number who took advantage of it. But we must remember that when these soldier settlers took up their land and entered into their contracts with the Government, conditions were somewhat different from what they are to-day. The land and lumber and everything they required was very high in price, and in consequence the obligations which they assumed were heavy. At that time everything was very rosy. The price of wheat was anywhere from $1.50 to $2.50 a bushel, and other commodities were equally valuable. Had those conditions continued, I do not think we now would find many of these men leaving the farm.

However, as we know, conditions have changed. Instead of getting $1.50 or $2 or $2.50 for their wheat these men get 60, 70 or 80 cents a bushel, and the prices of other things are in proportion. The consequence is that it has been almost impossible for these men to meet their obligations year after year. I will cite one instance. I received a letter not very long ago from one of these settlers in the neighbourhood where I reside. I may say that before I left home this gentleman came to see me and told me his tale of woe, and I asked him to write me a letter stating exactly his position. He is a returned man, a Canadian, with a good war record. During the three years he has been farming he has brought under cultivation about 75 acres of raw prairie land. He cropped a certain portion of that land year after year, and during the three years of operation he was able to sell about $1,000 worth of his product. It would require that amount to keep him in clothing, and to keep body and soul together. Of course, this case is somewhat exceptional; he was somewhat unfortunate. His crop was partially hailed out one year, and during another season he was not able to get his crop thrashed in time. In consequence he sustained a serious loss. But, allowing for that loss, we find that after the three years operation that man is indebted to the Government to the extent of about $500. In addition to that he owes $129 for taxes. Without allowing for his misfortune he is in debt to-day about $875. While I admit that this is an extreme case, there are others equally bad.

I do not wish to be understood as saying that the returned men are not making a success of farming. They are putting forth every effort possible, doing all they can, and are sincere in their efforts to succeed; but under the conditions I have outlined it is almost impossible for them to continue.

This matter was brought up in this House last year, and I think it is of sufficient importance to warrant the Government in taking some action to make things a little easier for these soldier settlers. We are spending a great deal of money upon immigration and on various wild-cat schemes. If we wish to retain these men, why not devote some of the money of the country to lightening their burden, and in this way trying to keep them on the land? I suggest that, in order to enable those people to stay on the farms, the Government should make a cut of 50 per cent all round. That may seem a large cut, and I do not insist on that, but something must be done.

All over the Western country we find that the people who have sold land under contract have to readjust their figures, otherwise the property would be thrown back on their hands. A few years ago I sold some land at $55, which was a trading price, but my purchaser was not able to meet his obligations, and I cut the price 50 per cent, and was prepared to reduce still more if necessary. Both land companies and private individuals in the West are making readjustments of prices, because that is the only way to restore normal conditions.

We owe those returned soldiers a greater debt of gratitude than we can ever pay, and the least we can do for them is to be a little more generous, and reduce their obligations, and in every other way enable them to continue on the land. I would urge the leader of the Government in this House to bring this matter to the attention of his colleagues, because the present conditions of the soldiers' settlements are serious, and by making the reduction I suggest we could not only help those men to stay on the land, but we could show our gratitude in a substantial way at a time when a reduction is very much needed and would be thoroughly appreciated. We know that every satisfied settler is an asset to the country, while everyone who abandons his farm is a great loss to the Government and to the country. I therefore trust that action will be taken in this matter at once, so as to relieve the distress among those men.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Before the motion is put I would suggest to my honourable friend that he modify it. He must judge for himself whether he would not reach the same end by so doing. I hold in my hand a letter from the Chairman of the Board bearing on this motion, and he writes in regard to the questions asked by my honourable friend. In regard to the second question—the cost to the Government for land and equipment in each of such cases—that is, the number of settlers under the Soldier Settlement scheme who have abandoned their farms, he says:

This statement would involve a large amount of work in the tabulation of the figures from each of more than 4,000 files. It would be possible without delay to inform the Senate as to the percentage of original disbursement realized in 1352 salvage cases which have been completely sold out. Salvage cases are not financially analyzed until they are completed, and the preparation of the information called for under the second question would require considerable time.

If my honourable friend felt that he would have sufficient data by the production of the statement in reference to 1352 salvage cases, perhaps he would be willing to amend his motion accordingly.

Hon. Mr. GILLIS: Yes, the salvage cases would do where the appraisement is completed.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Then I suppose the motion may be adopted as amended by the suggestion of the Chairman of the Board.

Hon. Mr. POPE: Might I ask what is meant by salvage cases? Are they sold out absolutely—everything in connection with them?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes, I would think it is the realization of the lien and the security. It may cover the land; it would cover the animals, and it may cover all the chattels.

Hon. Mr. GILLIS: I hardly think it would cover the land, because the land is still handled by some other soldier settlers. It would just cover the equipment.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I think the question covers the disposal of the land that was abandoned by the soldier.

Hon. Mr. POPE: I desire to know if this word abandoned means that a man left the property, or was forced to leave the property because he could not make payments according to his contract with the Government. In speaking of an abandoned estate, I would naturally suppose it to be an estate from which the owner had run away.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: All I have to guide me is the question itself.

Hon. Mr. POPE: The remarks of the honourable gentleman from Saskatchewan (Hon. Mr. Gillis) refer to the West, but they would apply with equal force to the East. Those properties were acquired at tremendous cost, as well as the animals that were placed upon them, but I do not think the live stock would possibly realize a third of what the animals cost, and I am sure the farms would not realize 50 per cent. I drew the attention of the House and the Government to this matter last year, with the hope that some movement would be made, and some substantial encouragement would be offered to those men who had fought for us overseas, but I have been disappointed in anything I have heard up to this time.

My information may not be correct; I trust it is not; but in my humble opinion there was but one way to deal with this matter, and that was by a thorough revision of the cost to these people of the properties they had acquired under their original contracts with the Government. That revision and re-valuation, should take place, and not an extension of time, because a property that is placed at 100 per cent above its value is of no practical use either to the soldier who returned or the man who never went overseas. No man could meet such an obligation out of his earnings, especially under farming conditions as they are to-day. It is scarcely necessary for me to tell this House what the farmers of this country, from the East to the West are saying as to the difficulties they are having in every section. Even men who own their properties and know how to farm them have difficulty in making both ends meet.

I suggest that the Government should go much further than granting an extension of time. They should go a long way in the direction of remitting values to those soldier settlers, giving them such encouragement as will warrant them in remaining on the farms. An extension of time is not of much use unless the valuation be placed upon a proper basis. After making a proper valuation, the Government might also give them an extension of time such as the conditions of the country demand. Thus we may possibly be able to serve some of those men in this country who served us in another place.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I would like the mover of this motion to include in it a return of the number of seizures of chattels, if any, that were made by the Government.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Why not move a motion, and get a separate return?

Hon. Mr. GILLIS: I have no objection to that being added.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If my honourable friend will suspend his motion and redraft it in conjunction with my honourable friend, it may be adjourned till to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. GILLIS: Let it stand till to-morrow.

The motion stands.

JUDGES BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of Bill 25, an Act to amend the Judges Act.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I thought the honourable gentleman was going to give us some information about the Yukon.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The request of my right honourable friend (Right Hon. Sir George E. Foster) for information referred to practically the whole of the Yukon, and I brought down a return. I have here the cost of administration of justice in the Yukon in 1921-22, in detail, showing a total of $33,978.61. The Estimates for 1924-25 show a slight reduction, from $33,978 to $31,500; that is, in the Department of Justice. All that remains in the Estimates for 1924-25 is:

Judge, salary	$7,000
Judge, living allowance	5,000
Judge, travel	200
Sheriff, clerk and stenographer—
Sheriff, salaries	5,000
Sheriff, living allowances	5,300
Police magistrate, salary	4,000
Miscellaneous	5,000
Total	$31,500

Hon. Mr. ROSS: Just what makes the reduction? Is it a reduction of $2,000 in that living allowance for the judge? The increased salary would simply swallow that up.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: There is no increase in remuneration in the present Bill. There is an apparent increase. There is an increase of $2,000 in salary, but a reduction of $2,000 in living allowance. The amount the judge was receiving was $12,000, but he was receiving $7,000 as salary and $5,000 as living allowance. That allowance of $5,000 is the amount that has accompanied the salary for the last fifteen or twenty years, to my knowledge.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is the way the estimate appears at present, is it not? You have not yet put through the Bill touching the increase of salary.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No. You see, as it stands for the coming year. 1924-25, it is: salary, $7,000; living allowance, $5,000; that is, $12,000. But, as I have stated, it is understood, and has been stated officially by the Minister of Justice, that if this Bill passes and the salary is brought up to the normal salary of high court judges, $9,000, the living allowance will be reduced to $3,000; so the total will be the same. The only difference will be in the amount of retirement allowance.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: Of pension.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Of the pension received when he retires. The maximum sum to which he would be entitled by virtue of the terms of the Bill itself would be $6,000.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: What does this Bill do? I thought this Bill was for raising the salary from $7,000 to $9,000.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes; but automatically the living allowance will be reduced by a similar amount.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: Honourable gentlemen, I am not particularly interested at the present time simply in the Bill which is before the House, except that it makes an increase in expenditure, which is one of the items coming under review when you take a survey of the Yukon as regards expenses and receipts.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Not actually.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: Yes, and in the future, because for whatever length of time after superannuation or retirement the judge lives there will be the added amount payable by the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: One thousand dollars.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: But the startling thing about it, to me, when the question was brought up here, after looking at the return presented by my honourable friend, was the tremendous cost of the administration of the territory, compared with what we get from it, and compared with the population which is there. In looking over the information given in the return laid upon the Table by my honourable friend I find that a good deal more is necessary before it is possible to make a review of the whole administration of the Yukon, and I intend to ask for that additional information and wait until it is brought down before taking up the subject from a general point of view. We have to deal there with a very difficult situation; there is no doubt about that. It is a far distant part of our territory. The population is very small, compared with the extent of the territory, and the expenditure in its administration is very large. I think that the expenditure can be greatly reduced and that when all the receipts and expenditures are brought before the House it will be quite impossible for the Government and the Senate not to give the subject their most serious attention. We are spending there for a population of less than 4,000 people—and part of that a temporary population, coming in and going out—and for an amount of productive development which is small in the aggregate and confined almost entirely to one class of persons, the men of wealth who work the mines and take to themselves the profit; and at the present time these workers of the mines are almost entirely non-Canadian citizens. Their supplies to a considerable extent are brought from outside; their products go to the outside; the amount of labour they spend upon their mining development is, in comparison with the output, the smallest of probably any business that could be engaged in. When you take all these things into consideration in connection with the services we are giving, at a cost running well up to three-quarters of a million dollars or more, it becomes a matter of moment, I think, for the Government and for both legislatures to see if some method cannot be found by which these expenses could be curtailed and the necessary administration of that territory continued.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

(b) T. J. Drummond, $515,000.00; J. A. McKee, $500,000.00. These vessels were transferred to the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, Limited, at the following cost: T. J. Drummond, $550,339.13; J. A. McKee, $521,514.11.

(c) Under ownership of the Department of Railways and Canals: T. J. Drummond, $30,984.26; J. A. McKee, $17,285.65. After transfer to the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, Limited: T. J. Drummond, $37,774.82; J. A. McKee, $26,182.07.

(d) The said steamers were chartered to the Great Lakes Transportation Company, Limited, for employment on the Great Lakes last season and their gross earnings were as follows: T. J. Drummond, $14,170.00; J. A. McKee, $14,170.00.

(e) The operating profits last season were as follows: T. J. Drummond, $7,200.64; J. A. McKee, $7,087.80. These figures do not include interest on capital, 5½ per cent, and depreciation, 4 per cent. These two items for the period January 1st to August 27th, when the said steamers were sold, would amount to $34,234.36 in the case of the T. J. Drummond, and $32,439.47 in the case of the J. A. McKee.

(f) The said steamers were sold to Messrs, N. M. Paterson and Company, Limited, of Fort William, Ont., for the sum of $110,000.00 net each after tenders had been extensively advertised for and six tenders received.

(g) The terms of the sale were $20,000.00 cash, the balance to be paid in five consecutive equal annual instalments of $18,000.00 each, with interest at 6 per cent.

(h) Recommendation to dispose of said steamers was made by the Management of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, Limited, which recommendation was submitted to and approved by the President and Board of Directors.

INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of Bill 7, an Act to amend The Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, 1907.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, I do not think I need detain the House at great length in regard to this Bill, as it was before us for a considerable time during last Session. It is true that there have been some accessions to this Chamber since that time, but I am quite sure that those who have come to us since last Session are fairly au fait of the matter of the Bill. Perhaps, however, it would not be amiss for me to say that in 1907, when the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act was passed, there was and had been for a number of years considerable agitation and disruption of trade in a number of industries, due to difficulties that had arisen between the employees and the employer. The restlessness of labour throughout the world had been noticeable for a number of years. Many countries had applied themselves to the task of finding a solution which would bring about better conditions between capital and labour; and when this matter had been grappled with by this Parliament in 1907 it was felt that Parliament could boast of having done some advanced work towards establishing peace between these two important factors in our economic life. We all recognize that harmony between these two essential elements, capital and labour, is most desirable for the prosperity and happiness of the country. Undoubtedly they are linked together, and it goes without saying that it is important that they should work harmoniously together. They are two kinds of capital—one the material capital, and the other the human capital, and we should all recognize that the more important of the two is the human capital.

Before the present legislation was put upon the statute book there was hardly any way to prevent the struggle from which the community suffered. Labour was striving for better living conditions by means of the offensive arm, the strike. I think it was felt, not only in Canada but throughout the world, that our legislation was advanced legislation, and that we had been pioneers in this field.

What was the end proposed by this legislation? It was four-fold: first, to bring the parties together before the acute struggle began; second, by bringing them together, to investigate their grievances at the conference table; third, to offer suggestions of adjustment; and, fourth, to enlighten public opinion if the parties could not agree.

I believe that this piece of legislation has accomplished its objects to a very large degree. I have had occasion to state that between 1907 and 1923 there were 580 disputes investigated, and of that number, through bringing the interested parties together by means of the machinery provided by this Act, 544 strikes were averted. In only 36 cases was there a failure to bring about a settlement and strikes ensued. I believe these figures indicate clearly the efficacy of the Act.

Now, honourable gentlemen, I beg that you will approach this matter with sympathy and with an open mind, and, realizing that one of the parties largely interested represents human capital, that you will approach it with a kind heart. This Bill was before us last Session, but when Parliament prorogued the two Chambers had been unable to agree upon the terms of the proposed amendments. The Bill is now introduced in the Senate, just as it was introduced last year, with the approval—I might say with the unanimous approval—of the House of Commons. There is an old saying that has come down to us from medieval times, when many questions were referred to the highest moral authority of that period, His Holiness the Pope. It is a French saying which runs like this: "J'en appèlle du Pape au Pape mieux informé"—"from the Pope's judgment I appeal to the Pope better informed." From the Senate's judgment of last year I appeal to the Senate better informed.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Would you give us the particulars?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It will be my duty to contribute my mite towards informing the Senate better than I did last Session. I would feel if left alone with the weakness of my argument, that I might fail in the attempt; but I know that I shall receive adequate support from honourable Senators around me and facing me, and I may succeed in informing the House better and more satisfactorily than we did last year.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Names? Names? Names?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I shall not attempt to repeat the statements, so concise, so clear and illuminating, made last year by the ex-Minister of Labour, who now faces me. He explained that labour at first was diffident about agreeing to the terms of this Act. Gradually fear left its ranks, and the labour element in this country became reconciled to it—for what reason? Because they found that in its operation labour was receiving fair treatment.

If the Act of 1907 and its amendments are read, it will be found that the vital principle is equality of treatment for employer and employee. What is that equality of treatment? It consists in the provision that before a strugggle begins, before a violent cleavage occurs, an investigation shall take place, and pending the report upon that investigation the parties shall remain as they were—the status quo shall be maintained. As my honourable friend the ex-Minister of Labour (Hon. Mr. Robertson) so well explained last Session, labour accepted this obligation and awaited the result of the inquiry before going on strike. During the whole period while it was striving for an increase in wages it respected the law in spirit and in letter. This was the obligation of the employee: "You shall not strike during the investigation." What was the obligation of the employer? "You shall not alter conditions—the parties shall remain as they are." This is in the text of the Act itself, and the purpose of the amendment now proposed is not to make a change in that respect. "You shall not alter the condition when an application is made for an investigation, or until the report is made. Then, as the report does not bind any of the parties, you may do as you please." This was and is the law.

There is a defect in the application of the penalty provided by the law, and that defect, which appears now but did not appear in 1907, is this: The employee was not to strike; if he did, clause 59 stated the penalty:

> Any employee who goes on strike contrary to the provisions of this Act shall be liable to a fine of not less than ten dollars nor more than fifty dollars for each day or part of a day that such employee is on strike.

What was the penalty for a violation of the law by the employer? I draw the attention of this Chamber to the title of the Act of 1907. It is: "An act to aid in the prevention and settlement of strikes and lockouts in mines and industries connected with public utilities." The employee was striving to increase his wage. The employer could retaliate only by declaring a lockout. So the only penalty provided against the employer for violating this statute was directed against practically the only act which he could do in opposing an effort to increase wages, by penalizing him for declaring a lockout. Clause 58 provided:

> Any employer declaring or causing a lock-out contrary to the provisions of this Act, shall be liable to a fine of not les than one hundred dollars, nor more than one thousand dollars for each day or part of a day that such lock-out exists.

Now, one of the amendments which are proposed by this Bill alters this clause 58 by providing:

> Any employer declaring or causing a lock-out—and here are the amending words—> or making effective a change in wages or hours contrary to the provisions of this Act, shall be liable to a fine of not less than one hundred dollars. . . .

The penalty which is sought to be imposed by this amendment, for making effective a change in wages or hours, does not alter the law as to the obligation under the existing Act, requiring the employer to maintain the situation and not to alter any wage or hour, pending the investigation. It simply adds the penalty for violating that law.

I stated that I considered that this Bill had for its purpose to re-establish, or establish clearly, the underlying principle of the statute—the maintenance of equality of treatment between the employer and the employee. When I made that statement, I remember, my honourable friend from Montarville (Hon. Mr. Beaubien) said: "Oh, yes, I see what you want. It seems of little consequence to alter penalty clause 58, but I for one will not agree, because there are no teeth in clause 58"—no sanction, he meant. That is true in the case of the violation of the law under that head; but there are teeth in clause 59, which concerns the employee, and I believe that the underlying principle of this Act, which was to maintain equality between the employer and the employee, will be established by the Senate agreeing that fair and equal treatment shall be given to labour and capital.

The amendments which were brought in from the Commons had for their object simply to make clear the will of Parliament to require that each party shall remain as it is, pending the investigation, and they make it clear by altering the penalty clause in the case of the employer, to provide that he as well as the employee must obey the law.

The Senate by its amendment, I contend, destroyed that equality of treatment, and I think I shall be able to show this simply by reading the amendment proposed by my honourable friend from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) and adopted by this Chamber. It was in the form of an amendment to clause 57A, which reads as follows:

It shall be unlawful for any employer, without the consent of a majority of the employees, evidenced in writing, signed by them or their authorized representatives, or for any employee, to make any change in the conditions of employment with respect to wages or hours, unless the party making the change—

That is, in the case of the employer reducing the wage—

has before doing so applied for the appointment of a Board to which the dispute shall be submitted—

It is clear that the employer can give a notice to his employees that from a certain date he will reduce the wage, and that he has on the previous day applied for the appointment of a Board to which the dispute shall be submitted. It is quite clear that under this amendment made by the Senate last Session the employer has the right to reduce the wage, provided he has applied for the appointment of a Board. I say that this destroys the equality of treatment which it was intended to maintain as between employee and employer. The employee cannot strike and must await the result of the investigation and the report. Under the amendment of my honourable friend from De Salaberry the employer can alter the condition by reducing the wage, pending the investigation.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: Will the honourable gentleman allow me to ask him a question about hours? Let us suppose that the employer requires, in order to finish a very important piece of work, three or four more hours. What will happen? Will he not have a right to them?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I believe he will if he pays an extra wage to the employee.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Will the honourable gentleman, who is so well able to clarify the situation, put the condition of the employer and that of the employee in juxtaposition, and say where the employer is affected and is diametrically against the employer?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If the employee desires a change he must ask for a Board, and must remain in the condition in which he finds himself at the moment, until that Board has investigated his demand and reported to the Minister of Labour.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: That is the employee?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That is the employee. If the employer desires to effect a change, under the amendment which was carried by this Chamber he can make the change immediately, provided that he gives notice to the employees that he has asked for the appointment of a Board So, pending the investigation, the employee cannot alter his condition, whereas, pending the investigation, the employer may do so.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Just another question, if the honourable gentleman will permit me. After the Board is appointed, will the employee receive the benefit of the Board from the time that the employer puts the change into effect?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The Board may find that the employee was entitled to an increase in wages and may suggest—for the Board's decision has no binding effect—that the increased wages be made retroactive, after a two months' inquiry, say. That is allowing a wide margin.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: It means a good deal to the employee, though.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But the employer may refuse to abide by the report of the Board, and then the strike may ensue. Conversely—and this was, I am quite sure, one of the factors which decided this Chamber to vote for the amendment of my honourable friend from De Salaberry—the employer may reduce the wages and declare to his employees, in accordance with the terms of this amendment, if it becomes law: "I asked yesterday for the appointment of a Board." The employees have to suffer the reduction of wages. The employer says: "If I am prevented from reducing the wages immediately, I may pay out with my good money the amount of the proposed reduction"—ten or fifteen per cent—"and after the report is made I shall be powerless to get back from the employees the amount which I unwillingly paid them, because the employees may refuse to return the money and may go on strike. Then I shall have lost that margin by which I intended to benefit by reducing the wages at the outset." My answer to that argument is this. The employer knows when he should give notice to his employees of a proposed reduction of wages. He can fix that date in advance. If he knows that there is a penalty clause which will reach him if he violates the law and does not maintain conditions pending the investigation, he will give notice to his employees that two months hence he will reduce the wages; he will allow sufficient leeway for the investigation to go on. It is for him to fix the date, and I contend that in order to maintain equality of treatment between employer and employee we should prohibit the employer from altering conditions just as we have prohibited for the last 15 or 16 years the employee from altering conditions.

Hon. R. S. WHITE: May I ask the honourable gentleman how he would deal with this question? Suppose you are faced with an international proposition, and your men go about saying, "We cannot consent to any arbitration because we have already had our orders," what then? In any large manufacturing establishment there are always several key-men who are essential. If those men leave their employment, what is the employer going to do? What regulation is there to hold those men? They simply go out and take other positions. What machinery is there to protect the employer against that situation?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: There my honourable friend raises the question of the liberty of man. One can leave his employment any day and take other employment; he can leave one town and go and work elsewhere. There is a freedom of action which cannot be denied or thwarted by Parliament. We are making laws for the general welfare of the country. I recognize that it is very difficult to make laws which will cover all cases.

Hon. R. S. WHITE: As I read it, if these key-men leave the employment of an employer, and a Board is asked for, and he cannot carry on, he will still have to pay this penalty. If these men leave, what is the situation?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would not like to give an opinion off-hand. Nobody can be held, and when there are conditions which bring about the stoppage of the whole machinery of an institution, it is not the fault of the employer.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Would my honourable friend consider the case where the employer has asked for a Board, and then reduces the wages or increases the hours, and the Board makes an award against either the decreasing of the wages or the increasing of the hours. Would not full justice be done to the employees by the compliance of the employer with the findings of the Board? In what way would the injustice arise if the finding was favourable to the employees?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: He would have to pay them back wages.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Would not that be done?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: He may refuse.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Then, what would be the difference in the latter event from the employer having done it in the first instance? I see no distinction.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The distinction is this. The law which is to-day upon the statute book, and which is the work of the Senate and the House of Commons, establishes absolute equality of treatment as between employer and employee. Both parties are obliged to maintain the situation; both parties are prevented from altering the conditions under which they are working when the trouble arises.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Then, will my honourable friend deal with this phase of it. The distinction is this. The employee has nothing at stake but his wages; the employer has the capital of his business at stake, and his entire equipment.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But my honourable friend will not forget that the employee's whole capital is his labour, and that is at stake. On the other hand, the employer may have some of his capital at stake.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: What about the other fellow's brains?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: What about the employee's brains? I feel that, in dealing with this question, we must treat both parties with at least equality, because human capital is far more important than the other kind of capital.

Hon. L. C. WEBSTER: Does the honourable gentleman not believe that full justice is being done at the present time to both parties?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No. Full justice is not done to both parties, because the employee is reached fully and is penalized for any disobedience to the Act, while the employer manifestly escapes, because the penalty clause does not cover him. Clause 57 of the Act as it at present stands says:

> Employers and employees shall give at least 30 days notice of an intended change affecting conditions of employment with respect to wages or hours; and in the event of such intended change resulting in a dispute, until the dispute has been finally dealt with by a Board, and a copy of its report has been delivered through the Registrar to both the parties affected, neither of those parties shall alter the conditions of employment with respect to wages or hours, or on account of the dispute do or be concerned in doing, directly or indirectly, anything in the nature of a lock-out or strike, or a suspension or discontinuance of employment or work, but the relationship of employer and employee shall continue uninterrupted by the dispute, or anything arising out of the dispute.

That is the law. The employer can with impunity violate that clause concerning wages or hours. Section 58 of the Act provided for penalizing an employer only in the case of a lock-out. The amendment proposed seeks to reach the employer who violates the law.

Now, to come to concrete cases. Last year, or the year before, a great institution, as powerful a one as there is outside of Parliament, the Canadian Pacific Railway gave notice to its employees that from a certain date there would be a wage reduction. The employees said: "Wait a moment. When we wanted to alter conditions we could only do so after a Board had reported upon the question. You cannot make this reduction, in virtue of the law, before an investigation takes place, and the Board makes a report."

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I desire to call my honourable friend's attention to the fact that all the railroads in Canada participated jointly in that action, and that the Canadian Pacific Railway should not be singled out in this connection.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That is true, and it makes my argument stronger. All the railroads had given notice of a proposed reduction at a certain date. When representations were made that they were violating the law, they admitted the justice of the representations, and applied for the appointment of a Board.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I would like to ask the honourable gentleman if there are any cases of employees having been fined for striking, contrary to the provisions of that law?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I cannot say. My honourable friend the ex-Minister of Labour (Hon. Mr. Robertson) may be able to tell you. But that would not alter the principle which I lay down as to the equality of treatment which must be meted out to both employers and employees.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Could not those key-men, to use the phrase introduced by my honourable friend to the left (Hon. Smeaton White), be dealt with in the same manner as the Department of Labour has dealt with Mr. J. C. Watters, who was put on a salary of $250 a month to keep him quiet.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: When a key-man leaves his employment and goes to other labour, he is free to do so.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: But the Department took this man up and gave him $250 a month to keep him quiet.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I shall not now discuss particular cases. I am dealing with general principles. I think I have made it clear that the employer cannot suffer under that equality of treatment with the law as it is, because he can take time by the forelock and fix a date far enough ahead to enable him to apply for a Board.

Now, honourable gentlemen, you have the point of difference between the House of Commons and the Senate, as to maintaining equality and providing an assurance that it will be maintained. The proposed amendment to section 57 simply clarifies the situation. It says:

> It shall be unlawful for the employer to make effective a proposed change in wages or hours or for the employees to go on strike.

And:

> The application for the appointment of a Board shall be made by the employers or employees proposing the change in wages or in hours.

There is no special difficulty as to this last amendment, I think I have stated clearly the point at issue between the House of Commons and the Senate.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The honourable gentleman has spoken about equality. There is no equality. He says that if an employer causes a lock-out he is liable to a fine. The honourable gentleman from Inkerman (Hon. Smeaton White) asked what would happen if the key-man or some others walked out and the work stopped. The Government says: "Oh, that is the liberty of the subject." The liberty of the subject is for the workingman, but if the liberty of the subject is for the workingman and not for the employer, where is the equality?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: May I call attention to the fact that the honourable gentleman from Inkerman was referring to an industry which does not come within the scope of this Act.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend has answered fully the question of the honourable gentleman from Inkerman. Honourable gentlemen will notice that I have not touched upon the constitutional aspect of the question at all.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I would like to hear my honourable friend fully as to that.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Before the honourable gentleman goes on, may I confess that I am not clear in my mind upon this matter, and would like to know whether the change proposed by this Bill is merely to provide that, in asking for a Board or in making a change in wages or hours, the employer shall file a statutory declaration to the effect that there have been negotiations between the committee of the employees and the employer, "or that it has been impossible to secure conference or to enter into negotiations." Is that the only difference between the law as it stands and what is proposed in the Bill?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Certainly not. My honourable friend has not read the Bill. He will find the amendment to each clause underlined. The honourable gentleman will notice that under the Act it was obligatory that there should be a conference between the employer and the employees. But a case may arise in which one of the parties will refuse to meet the others; hence the amendment. If my honourable friend will turn now to Section 2 he will find the contentious clause:

Employers and employees shall give at least thirty days' notice of an intended or desired change affecting conditions of employment with respect to wages or hours.

My honourable friend does not need any explanation as to the words, "or desired," because, as I said last Session, the word "intended" is meant for the employer, who has the power to carry out his intention; whereas, the employee is covered by the word "desired," because he can only wish for the change.

And in the event of such intended or desired change resulting in a dispute—now here is the amendment—

—it shall be unlawful for the employer to make effective a proposed change in wages or hours or for the employees to go on strike.

If that clause were not in, there would still remain in the Act all the essence of the prohibition. This amendment is but a clarifying one.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: You mean, the spirit would remain.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes. Now I wil read it without that amendment, and my honourable friend, as a lawyer, will see that it contains all the necessary prohibition.

Employers and employees shall give at least thirty days' notice of an intended change affecting conditions of employement with respect to wages or hours; and in the event of such intended change resulting in a dispute, until the dispute has been finally dealt with by a Board, and a copy of its report has been delivered through the Registrar to both the parties affected; neither of those parties shall alter the conditions of employment with respect to wages or hours.

The words in the existing section are fairly clear, but it has been the opinion of the Department that the section should be made clearer. I do not suppose there will be much objection to that clause.

The contentious part is section 58, where we find the teeth provided where they were lacking in the Act as it stood.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: For whom are the teeth intended—the employee or the employer?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The teeth for the employee were in the Act.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: How do you use them?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It was for the honourable gentleman to use them if he pleased.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: How can they be used? Explain.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Very easily. The tribunals are there for everybody. The teeth could be used against the employer only in the case of a lockout.

As to the contsitutionality of the Act, my honourable friend asked me to produce a number of judgments from the Privy Council and other tribunals. I recognize that by implication, in examining judgments of the Privy Coucil, some doubts may arise as to the power of this Parliament to legislate as it did in 1907; but we have now a decision of the Court of Appeal of Ontario, in which four out of five judges declared this Act to be constitutional.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Not the new Bill, but the old Act.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Without the amendments that we are proposing.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: Yes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But the amendments are consequential amendments.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: That is argument.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: They do not extend the principles in the least. The principles of the Act remain as they were. So I claim that, shielded by the judgment of the Court of Appeal of Ontario, it is not for us to question our jurisdiction. That judgment may be reversed by a higher tribunal, but in the meantime we are on fairly solid ground in amending, without altering the principle, an Act that has been on the Statute Book since 1907.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Honourable gentlemen, I have very few remarks to make on this Bill at the present stage. Last year when it was before us it went to Committee. I think the major part of the discussion on it took place in Committee, where amendments were moved; and I have no doubt that in Committee we shall come to the points more quickly; amendments will be moved again this year, and the points raised for discussion by these amendments can be dealt with better than at present.

There is only a little I want to say, with regard to the right of the House to deal with this Bill at all. I agree that generally where the courts of the country hold an Act to be constitutional or unconstitutional, it is well for this House not to interfere, but to await any change that may take place on appeal. But I call the attention of the honourable leader of the Government to a conclusion reached by a conference in Washington—I do not know the exact technical name of it, but it was one of those labour conventions that met under the provisions of the Treaty of Versailles. It dealt with the question of the eight-hour day. When that knotty question came here, in the time of the late Government, I understand that the Government avoided dealing with it by taking the position that whether the working day should be eight hours long or not was a matter for the provincial governments. I do not understand that the present Government has departed at all from that position. It is somewhat inconsistent to take such a position with regard to the eight-hour day and then to submit to us a Bill making it criminal to do certain things with regard to wages and hours. If you have jurisdiction with regard to those matters you have also with regard to the eight-hour day. If you have not the right to deal with the eight-hour day, you have no right to deal with matters affecting wages and hours.

Certain points concerning our legislation are clearer now than they were two years ago. There was a great dispute among the lawyers of this country during the war with regard to the power of the Dominion Parliament to override provincial laws. That dispute is finally set at rest by the Fort Frances case. A subject relating to property and civil rights is assigned under the British North America Act to the provinces. The Dominion Parliament under ordinary circumstances cannot interfere with property and civil rights; but in the event of an emergency like a foreign war, or an internal war, or a famine that extended to the whole country, or any circumstance of that kind, the larger power of the Dominion Parliament under section 91 of the British North America Act to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada can be invoked, just as it was invoked during the war; and as long as that emergency exists the Dominion Parliament can ride roughshod over every other legislative institution in Canada—provincial, municipal, or whatever it may be.

There is one thing to note about the judgment of the court in Ontario. They seem to have had an idea that we could legislate with regard to this matter in view of it being a national affair—something that concerns the whole country; but that will not do. There is no emergency at this time: there is no foreign war; there is no internal war. So there is no justification at all for this Parliament assuming jurisdiction over what is purely a provincial right.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The honourable gentleman is now sitting in judgment over the Court of Appeal of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: No, I am not sitting in judgment over them at all, but I am asking my honourable friend to declare himself with regard to the eight-hour day. Is this Government consistent in tossing that subject to the Provincial Legislature, saying that it cannot deal with the eight-hour day, and then bringing in here this Bill dealing with wages and hours? That is the particular point I am on. I do not intend to labour it long, because there is a way out of the difficulty: some manufacturer can file an action against the Attorney General for a declaration that the whole Act is ultra vires, and the question can be determined in that way. But I would like to know just what position the Government is taking with regard to legislation on property and civil rights; that is, the civil rights that are denoted by wages and hours. As I have said, I am not going to labour the point any further. I have nothing to say about the judgment of the Supreme Court of Ontario. They may be right, or they may be wrong.

There is another thing, which came up last year and which the honourable gentleman referred to in his argument. He is very anxious to produce equality between employer and employee. That is a very fine, pious sentiment, and is probably creditable to anyone who holds it: but there is this difficulty about the Act. Suppose an employer gives thirty days' notice of a proposed change, and then there is a dispute. In that event the employer's hands are tied until the termination of that dispute—until a Board meets, investigates the differences and gives a judgment that ends the matter. The inquiry may take one month, two months, three months, or more. Suppose the question is a reduction in wages to the extent mentioned by the honourable member—10 or 15 per cent. The employer may have paid out the higher wage for thirty days, that is, during the time his notice was running, and then for three months afterwards. If he has a large body of men employed he may have paid out three or four months' wages to the extent of ten or fifteen per cent in excess of what would have been paid if the reduction had taken place. When the Board does finally determine the question, if the decision is in favour of the employer, how is he going to get his money back?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I answered that by stating that he may take time by the forelock and give notice that in two months he will reduce the wages. Then he has plenty of time and leeway in which to obtain a report from the Board.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: That is assuming that an employer is different from all other men and that he can foresee the future.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: No; he would have paid nothing in excess in the meantime.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: But the honourable leader of the Government speaks of the employer looking away ahead and saying, "Two months from now I am going to make a reduction." He may want to make his reduction in a week in order to meet the situation. So you put the employer in the position that his money is paid out, and if there is any way of getting it back I do not know of it, and I have never heard it suggested. Suppose, on the other hand, that the reduction does take place. After thirty days' notice a reduction of ten per cent is made, and it is acted on for three months, but the decision is in favour of the men. There are very few cases in which the men will not be able to get the ten per cent, assuming that the statute is retroactive, as last year, on careful examination, we determined it was. There have been in this country one or two cases of retroactive decisions acted upon.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Of course, the Board's report is not a judgment; it is only a suggestion.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: A recommendation.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: A recommendation. It is not a binding judgment.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: But there are at least two retroactive decisions that have been given here in Canada. I think the honourable the ex-Minister of Labour (Hon. Mr. Robertson) told us of two, possibly three. It is all very well to try to bring about equality and justice, but I do not think you are getting equality in this way.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Honourable gentlemen, I am not going to discuss the constitutional question at any length, because I have not yet had an opportunity of reading the judgment just delivered by the Court of Appeal of Ontario, but there is one aspect of the matter upon which my honourable friend has not touched and which I think is of considerable importance. It is now accepted doctrine that the Dominion has power to legislate on subjects assigned to the provinces where our legislation on any such matter is merely incidental to a subject upon which we clearly have jurisdiction. Take, for instance, the subject of property and civil rights. We may pass laws under the head of trade and commerce, which is exclusively assigned to the Dominion Parliament, and in so doing we may affect property and civil rights in the provinces yet, according to the doctrine laid down by the Privy Council and now accepted by everybody, that would be perfectly correct so long as it is a necessary corollary or incident of the legislation on the subject as to which we clearly have jurisdiction.

The constitutionality of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act has been supported at times on the ground that industrial disputes are incidental to trade and commerce and fall under the very illustration that I am bringing before the House.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Peace, order, and good government.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Peace, order, and good government. I do not know whether the Court of Appeal has adopted that view, or exactly on what ground this judgment has been given.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: On both grounds.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: This constitutional aspect of the question is one which deserves our most serious consideration. If it is true that the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act is merely a matter affecting trade and commerce—and one would think it is—then we have jurisdiction.

There is only one other observation I wish to make, because I do not want to deal with this matter at length. As I understand it, we are not adding to the law any material provision, or any provision which, if the law is constitutional at present, would make it unconstitutional. We are merely interpreting the Act as it stands. We are putting in what it is easy to conceive has been the spirit of the Act from its inception. If we pass this Bill I do not think we shall render unconstitutional an Act which otherwise would be constitutional. It seems to me those two points ought to be sufficient to justify this House in passing the Bill now under consideration, inasmuch as four judges out of five in the Court of Appeal have supported the legislation on these very grounds.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Let me point out to the honourable gentleman that the judgment of the Court of Appeal of Ontario has reference to the old Act. What we are doing now is to make certain things criminal. Take section 58.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: It has to do with wages and hours. Does my honourable friend make any distinction between hours and wages, with reference to the power of legislation?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: No. I would think they would both be civil rights; and in the absence of anything like an emergency my theory would be that we have nothing to do with them.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I quite agree with my honourable friend; I would not say for one moment that the constitutionality of this Bill could be supported on the ground of emergency; it must be because it falls incidentally under the two subjects mentioned, trade and commerce, and peace, order and good government.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: In the Attorney General of Ontario vs. Reciprocal Insurers, decided in January of this year, it was held that this Parliament cannot grasp jurisdiction over a civil matter by turning it into a criminal matter. That is what you are trying to do here.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Is my honourable friend not prepared to admit that my proposition is sound, namely, that if you are by some legislation affecting property or civil rights in the province only incidentally while dealing with a subject over which you have jurisdiction—

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I grant that at once; but, after all, that has to be answered in another way. What are you doing? Are you legislating in this Bill in regard to trade and commerce?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Or criminal law, which is equally a subject for the Dominion Parliament.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Can you turn any civil right into a crime? You have to answer that question first.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I do not follow you.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: If this Parliament can grasp jurisdiction by contending that something is a crime, there is not a civil right left in the country.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I begin by looking at the series of matters upon which we can legislate, in section 91 of the British North America Act, and if we can assert our powers under the authority of that section, then, of course, we can incidentally invade the powers granted to the provinces under section 92. My honourable friend makes that statement. That is the position which the Court of Appeal takes—that under trade and commerce, and peace, order and good government, this Parliament has a right to legislate as it is doing although it does incidentally invade property and civil rights.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: My honourable friend will remember that when we were legislating with regard to the sale of intoxicating liquors, on different occasions our right to do so was questioned, and it was maintained on the ground that we could stipulate criminal provisions and impose penalties, and that because we had the right to deal with it under the criminal law we could confiscate civil rights. That is one of the very cases in which the Privy Council maintained our right to legislate on property and civil rights.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: But that was all preceded by the general proposition that the control of intoxicating liquor was a national question, and concerned the peace, order and good government of Canada; but the right of a man to hire a servant girl and dismiss her, or to hire men in a factory and regulate their wages and hours and dismiss them, is another thing altogether. What you have to look at now is whether you are creating a crime for the first time, or whether you are dealing with trade and commerce, or whether you are not by subterfuge legislating away from a man his right to regulate the hours and wages of his servants.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend says that the Supreme Court of Ontario has declared the old Act constitutional. What was the old Act? Here it is:

Employers and employees shall give at least 30 days' notice of an intended change affecting conditions of employment with respect to wages or hours; and in the event of such intended change resulting in a dispute, until the dispute has been finally dealt with by a Board, and a copy of its report has been delivered through the Registrar to both parties affected, neither of those parties shall alter the conditions of employment with respect to wages or hours.

That is what the Court of Appeal has declared to be constitutional. We go one step further and say, in legislating on a matter that is under federal jurisdiction without any question: "If you violate that law which is already on the Statute Book and which has been declared constitutional, you shall be punished."

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Yes, you constitute a crime now that you did not have under the old Act.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The old Act was declared constitutional.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: Suppose an employer is a farmer employing 10, 20 or 30 men, what will happen?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: He does not fall under this Act.

Hon. G. D. ROBERTSON: Honourable gentlemen, I would like to say a few words in connection with this subject, especially on some of the points that have been raised this afternoon, in the hope of assisting, if possible, to clarify the matter in the minds of honourable members. Let it be remembered, first, and constantly borne in mind, that this Act applies only to public utilities; that is, industries such as transportation, coal mining, gas companies, electric light companies, and so forth, that serve the public. It does not apply to any private industrial or manufacturing concern.

With that basic thought in mind, let us proceed to analyze some of the points raised. For example, the honourable member from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross) seems to fear that this Act fixes wages and hours, or contemplates doing so. A careful perusal of the Act will make it clear, I am sure, that it has no such purpose. It provides that when a dispute arises between a public utility and its employees, in the public interest there shall be no lockout and no strike until a tribunal, as prescribed by the law, has been created and has investigated this dispute. The Act is one of investigation only.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: May I ask my honourable friend whether the meaning of that is that this tribunal does not inquire into the propriety or impropriety of the wages or hours? It does not decide anything.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: The tribunal so appointed makes an investigation, and reports to the Department of Labour, recommending what in its opinion would be a fair adjustment of the dispute. It then remains to the parties to the dispute to assent to or decline to assent to the recommendation made by the Board.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: It does not affect any legal right of the parties?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: No.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Would the honourable gentleman mind reading the definition of "employer" in the Act. I understand the honourable gentleman to say that that applies only to public corporations. I shall read it:

"Employer" means any person, company or corporation employing ten or more persons and owning or operating any mining property, agency of transportation or communication or public service utility, including, except as hereinafter provided, railways whether operated by steam, electricity or other motive power, steamships, telegraph and telephone lines, gas, electric light, water and power works.

It is wider than "public utility."

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I would like my honourable friend to point out what industry or utility referred to in that section is other than a public utility.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: It means any person, company or corporation, employing ten or more persons, and owning or operating any mining property. If ten men own a mining property they are not a public utility.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: They are, within the meaning of the Act. It applies in a large way, of course. But the Act does not apply to private industries such as a manufacturing plant or a printing establishment, except by the consent of both parties. When an employer who is a proprietor of a manufacturing establishment, and his employees have a dispute, and they agree to refer their dispute to a Board under the Act, then the Department of Labour will establish a Board to make an inquiry; but the Department has no power to appoint a Board except by mutual consent of the parties other than in public utilities.

I fear also that there is some misunderstanding in the minds of some honourable gentlemen as to the manner in which strikes are called. It was suggested, I think by the honourable gentleman from Inkerman (Hon. R. S. White) that a few key-men might be called out of an industry. He was referring to an industry not covered by the Act. I want to make it clear that the laws of the employees' organizations provide the only means and methods by which this concerted action can be taken, namely, if, after a Board has made its recommendation, the employees feel that it is not acceptable, they refer the facts, along with the recommendation of the Board, to their membership, and only upon the sanction of a substantial majority of the membership, plus the approval of the officials of the organization, is it possible for a strike to be called. The key-men referred to are never removed from service, and the rest are not called out, because it must be by the voice and vote of the employees themselves that action of that sort is taken. While the honourable gentleman who raised these points had in mind an industry that does not come within the Act, I want to make it clear that it is not possible for that to occur in any public utility such as this Act covers.

Now, how did the necessity for these amendments arise? Let us all be clear on that point. The Industrial Disputes Act has been in force since 1907. It was not until 1921 that the question arose as to the observance of it. The spirit of the Act, as the leader of the Government has pointed out, has not changed. It was always the law since 1907 that during the interim that a dispute is under investigation there could be no change made in conditions or in wages by either party. In 1921 all of the railway companies in Canada sought to reduce wages, and they served notice on their employees in all classes of their service to that effect. At the expiration of the 30 days required by this law, which the railways respected that far, they met their employees and negotiated with them, but were unable to reach an agreement as to what should be done by way of a reduction. For 14 years prior to that time, whenever that situation arose the employees had always applied for a Board when they could not agree with their employers. In 1921 all these railway companies—I am not blaming any particular one, because all took similar action jointly—instead of complying with the law and applying for a Board, they gave notice that on the 16th of July, 1921, they would put into effect an arbitrary reduction of wages amounting to about $13 per month on the average. The employees objected, saying: "That is not right, because it is in violation of our agreement with you, and in violation of the law." The employers said: "We are going to do it anyway." And they did. Then the employees came to a realization of the fact that there was a flaw in the Act, namely, that while the law prevented, or at least forbade, a change of conditions until the matter had been the subject of investigation by a Board—and the employers had refrained from applying for a Board—yet a reduction of wages had been put into effect; but there was no penalty imposed. When the employees made application for a Board and the Board sat and the dispute was finally adjusted the inequality my honourable friend pointed out showed itself very conspicuously and I will quote a parallel case on the other side to bring out that fact. The first case that was ever tried under this Act was in 1907. I happened to be the representative of the employees applying for the Board. We reached the limit of our ability to negotiate with the railway companies in July 1907, and could not come to an agreement. They denied us any consideration. At that time we were getting $40 or $45 a month. We applied for a Board. The Board subsequently sat, and rendered its report, I think, about the middle of October. But from about the first of August to the end of October—I think the settlement became effective on November 1st, if I remember correctly—the employees were waiting. For what were they waiting? For what they surely felt themselves entitled to back in July when they were negotiating, but for what they were prevented from obtaining by reason of the requirements of this law. That delay, as I pointed out last year was one of the objections the workmen had to the adoption of this Act. That adjustment finally took place, I think, on the 1st of November and was effective from that date. Now, is it not fair to say that in 1921, when the same employer, along with others, made up his mind that the time had come when there should be a readjustment of wages, he should have been required to follow exactly the same practice that the employees had to follow and had followed for fourteen years, and make his application for a Board when he could not reach an agreement by negotiation? Let the Board sit and make its report, and if the Board conceded that the wages should be reduced, the chance of both parties accepting the finding would be much greater than under the method by which the railways proceeded.

There are three specific points in this. The first is one that has not been discussed at any length, and need not be, namely, the amendment providing that where an employer declines to negotiate with his employees, the fact that he has refused does not prevent them from making application for a Board legally. That passed without discussion last year and I believe it is not in dispute now.

The second amendment is that the employer or the workman, whichever of the two is seeking the change, must, if an adjustment is not reached by negotiation, make application for a Board as the Act requires, and that during the time that that matter is the subject of investigation by a Board, and until the Board's report is filed with the Minister and Department of Labour, neither party shall make any change in wages, hours or working conditions.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That last condition was in the Act before.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: That was in the Act; but in order to make it conform to the proposed changes in section 58 of the Act it was necessary to include that also in 57.

In section 58, which is the penalty clause affecting employers, we find, as my honourable friend properly described it, the teeth. Section 59 of the Act imposes a penalty upon employees if they fail in any respect to comply with the law. It is true that the penalty on the individual employee is much smaller than that on the employer, but, to use the same railway as my honourable friend did for illustration, the Canadian Pacific, there is only one company while there are probably 70,000 employees; so the cumulative penalty is many, many times greater upon the employees than it is upon the employer. But, inasmuch as neither has suffered in times past, I do not think we need worry much about that.

I do desire, however, to point out that the difficulty in 1921 was that there was no penalty for this particular offence. Section 58 of the Act provided a penalty against employers if they declared a lockout, and in that case they reduced the wages, but did not lock anybody out. They said: "Come on and work for us, but at a reduced wage." The whole object of the proposed amendments now before this House is, I understand, to cause the Act to be observed as it has always been intended that it should be observed. The present intention is to overcome that technicality by which the employers were able to evade their responsibility and obligation under the Act in 1921.

I would submit for the consideration of honourable gentlemen the suggestion that if there is any reluctance to give this Bill its second reading without prolonged discussion, and if it has to be examined minutely, it might be wise to refer it to a committee. It might be referred to the Standing Committee of this House on Labour, or I am entirely willing that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Railways, because this is largly a railway matter.

Let me give the House a reason why I think that should be done if we cannot agree among ourselves now and approve the Bill. I would respectfully call honourable gentlemen's attention to the experience had in this House, extending over a number of years, on another matter. Three times during a period of twelve years the House of Commons passed a Bill whereby railway employees in this country were to be paid twice a month instead of once a month, as had always been the practice from the time railways began. Three times this House in its wisdom saw fit not to approve of or agree to that Bill. In 1917 it was my privilege to discuss that matter in the Senate and to urge that honourable gentlemen withhold any decision on the subject until they had an opportunity to learn the facts in detail. I appreciated very much the action of the House in referring that Bill to the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours. As a result, one gentleman, who is now deceased, to the regret of us all, and who had always been strongly opposed to the Bill when it was before this House, after hearing the explanations and hearing the president of one of our railroads, who came before that Committee, say that the railroad had no objection to it, moved the adoption of that Bill, which had been denied those employees on all our railways for twelve long years.

I submit that this matter is of sufficient importance to be referred to a special committee.

There is a fundamental principle involved, namely, whether or not workmen and employers are to enjoy absolute equality in the application of laws affecting them both. I therefore support the motion of my honourable friend that this Bill be now given its second reading, and, if it is not, I would respectfully urge that it be referred to the appropriate committee, so that a proper investigation may be made and witnesses can be heard from both sides.

Hon. C. P. BEAUBIEN: Honourable gentlemen, I desire very briefly to state the reasons why, notwithstanding the very eloquent plea which has been repeated this Session by my honourable friend from Welland (Hon. Mr. Robertson), I cannot support the Bill. It is passing strange to me that the plea for this Bill is made in the name of justice and equality. Let us take up the Bill. This House, which is composed of experienced lawyers and men who command in industry, will look beyond the paper and the print of this measure and examine the facts as they really are and as they present themselves in everyday life. I will try to give, at all events, one concrete example.

In my humble opinion the first two clauses are of very little value to the existing legislation. What is the first amendment? It fixes the conditions under which a statutory declaration may be made for the purpose of obtaining a Board. It is already provided in the statute that if all efforts at satisfactory settlement have failed, a declaration may be made and a Board obtained. That is a pretty wide provision, that if all efforts to obtain a satisfactory settlement fail, then you may obtain a Board. To my mind it is a blanket clause covering practically every conceivable effort that can be made. What does the amendment add? If it has been impossible to secure a conference or to enter into negotiations, a statutory declaration may be made. It is quite evident that the law as it stands covers that situation, and in my humble opinion this is nothing but a clause for the purpose—shall I say?—of camouflaging the clause which is at the end of the Bill, so that it might not come before us in its full nakedness and we should not be frightened at it.

What is the second provision? The second clause repeats pretty much what is already in the Act; and, if my honourable friends would like to be fully convinced that this same impression was given to the Law Clerk of the Senate, they have only to refer to his preface to the amendments, in which he says that there is practically nothing changed in the law.

But in the third clause is to be found the purpose of the whole Bill. Is that provision a just one? How did the law treat both parties when they had entered into a contract and had disagreed. The law was apparently fair to both parties. I say "apparently, because, as I shall show, it was unjust, notwithstanding. It said to the employer, "You shall not lock out your employees." The employer was, as it were, deprived of his weapons. The law disarmed him. How did it treat the employee? The law purported to disarm also the employee by declaring, "You shall not strike."

What does this proposed legislation impose on the employer? An employer may be face to face with bankruptcy. My honourable friend knows very well that the price of coal has lately fallen no less than 50 cents a ton. Does he think that with the very small margin in coal mining it will still be possible to continue paying miners the same wages? Not only can the employer not dismiss his men but he will further be penalized. You have tied him up. He cannot lock them out. Will you force him to go on with the contract at the original rates and ruin himself absolutely? Is that reasonable? Is that what you are driving at? Is that the way you would build up this country?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Do you mean ruining him because he has to wait a month, or two months at the outside?

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: It may be for two or three months at several hundred thousand tons of coal a month. My honourable friend can perfectly well undertsand what it means.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: In the event of a large employer in the coal industry having a contract with his workmen extending for a year, and the selling price of coal rising $1 a ton shortly after the contract is made, does he not expect his workmen to respect their contract and fulfil it?

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: That is not at all the situation. But I will revert in a moment to a case which will be familiar to my honourable friend and which I cited last year. That instance did indeed occur, but the shoe was on the other foot. I appeal to my honourable friend, who is experienced and was for a long time Minister of Labour. He has dealt with people who control large bodies of men. He well knows how difficult it is for them to lower the wages of their employees—what it means to them in trouble, annoyance, and loss. It is only in the last extremity that they attempt to lower wages, because it is the most difficult thing in the world to do. Therefore it is only when nothing else can be done that wages are reduced. What are you going to do? You are going to hold the employer until the proceedings are finished, although they may last two, three, perhaps four months. In the meantime out goes his money, and it will never be retrieved. Will any honourable member seriously contend that, if after three or four months the Board declares that the employer was right and the wages should have been reduced, the employer can get any part of his money back? Has it ever happened?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Yes, sir.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Is it fair to expose capital to such risks in a country which requires it so much as ours? Is it judicious in the interests of the country to pass legislation of that kind? Will anybody here contend that labour has been ill-treated in Canada? Is there an honourable member of this House who can say truly and sincerely that the law which it is proposed to amend has ever been unjustly applied to the labour man? Are there not many in this House who know that the contrary is true—that very often this law has been unjustly applied to employers?

Let me remind my honourable friend of what happened in Toronto. By an agreement reached between the Toronto Railway Company and its employees, wages were fixed for a period of two years. Three months later the employees came to the Company and said: "We want more money, but we are not asking for increased wages: we ask for a bonus." But the Company said: "It comes out of the till just the same; it is really increased wages. We cannot grant them. What have you to say about this contract which you signed in good faith three months ago?" "We don't care. If you do not grant us this increase we will go down to Ottawa and get a Board." The men came down to Ottawa, and a Board was established. The Company's representative went to the Minister, showed him the signed agreement upon which the ink was hardly dry, and said: "Look at this. Are you going to uphold contracts made in good faith? Are you going to point out to these men that they have agreed to work for two years at these wages and that they must go back to their work? The Company's representative said further to the Minister: "Please look at the amount of this Company's income. See how it is hampered because it is getting only the same fare that it got before the war. See for yourself; investigate and find out for yourself that it is impossible for the Company to pay increased wages without using up all its capital." What was the answer? I do not blame my honourable friend here (Hon. Mr. Robertson): he was in a position of great responsibility, and his decision meant perhaps a great deal to many people besides the labour people. He decided for the men. The men got their Board; and what did it do? It was quite evident that the Board could do only what it did. It decided in favour of the Company—that the Company was right, not only because the agreement had been made in good faith, but because the Company could not possibly pay increased wages.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: My honourable friend has clearly and forcibly stated what occurred in the year 1918; but I would ask him and the House: was it or was it not wise in attempting to administer affairs at that time, difficult as they were, to finally agree, after careful consideration, to cause an investigation to be held, and, if possible, to avoid a struggle which would have taken place immediately if there had been a refusal to establish a Board? The struggle eventually did come, but at that it seemed quite possible that it might be avoided. After the investigation had been held by the Board, was there not a greater chance of the men accepting the representations of that tribunal than the arbitrary decision of a Minister of the Crown?

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: I am very glad my honourable friend has given that explanation. I have nothing to add to it. I will simply go on with a recital of what happened. The decision was against the men. Do you think they bowed to it? No.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: That was their right.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: They went on strike, and forced the hands of the Company. The Company was in the position of having either to continue its service or to turn the whole of its assets over to the city. The Company was between the devil and the deep sea.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: So was the Minister.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: The Minister of Labour was between the deep sea of political disfavour and the temptation of the devil—and he went the way the devil went.

Other examples could be given of the way in which this law has been abused by labour unions and employees. In view of the way in which the Act has been applied, and the way in which it has worked up till now, is it fair to fasten it more stringently and more cruelly upon the back of capital? This law has teeth, big and cruel teeth; and they set very well into capital; but labour runs through them. Labour cannot be touched by the penalty—everybody knows that.

How can you impose a penalty on labour men when there are thousands of them? What employer will make up his mind to arrest a thousand or two thousand men and try to make them pay the penalty? It is absolutely impossible. That clause in the statute is illusory. You cannot make use of it. You know perfectly well that capital is not protected by it. However, I suppose we have to submit to things of that kind nowadays. The statute must at least appear to give some sort of justice both ways, even though in one way it is not operative at all.

But, when you are not obliged to do it, why render the position of capital more difficult? When you know the law is inoperative in one direction, why make it more stringent in the other? It can do no good, and it can do a great deal of harm. For my part, I will vote against this Bill, as I did last year.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: May I add just one word more to the discussion which my honourable friend opposite (Hon. W. B. Ross) and I had as to the constitutionality of the Act? I think my honourable friend will agree, when he thinks about the matter for a moment, that we are not depriving anyone of any right. We are not legislating to affect anyone's right as to either hours or wages. This Bill merely provides for an arbitration between employer and employee.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: An investigation.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: An investigation. It does not decide anything as to the rights of anybody concerned. Either side may go through the investigation and come out of it with just as great rights in a legal sense as they had when they entered into it. So I do not see how the question of constitutionality can be raised in regard to this Act.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: If an employer is obliged to maintain wages through this amendment—

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No. The Act already obligates him.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: I beg my honourable friend's pardon. There are no teeth to that obligation. You are putting in the teeth this year. That is the only purpose of the Bill. By this clause, imposing a penalty up to as much as $1,000 a day, the Company is constrained to maintain wages when entitled to reduce them. Does my honourable friend think that after two or three months a company can collect wages unjustly paid to its employees?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: There is no difference between that case and one which I will mention. My honourable friend, we will say, is a merchant who thinks I am responsible for any contract I may make. He chooses to trust me with goods; but when the time for payment comes I cannot pay a cent.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: The difference is this, that the law might constrain me to do it.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The law does not constrain you to do it.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: With the law as it stands, a reduction of wages could be made without the Company being exposed to a penalty. If this Bill passes, the Company will be liable to pay $1,000 a day; therefore it is kept fast to its contract.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend reasons as though corporations were not only soulless, but without honour.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: I do not understand what you mean.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The Act already says that wages shall not be reduced or hours increased during the course of the investigation. Will the companies, because there is no penalty, violate that law with impunity? I do not think my honourable friend would apply such ethics to companies in which he is an administrator.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: May I turn the argument against my honourable friend, and say that if he thinks that companies are so respectful of the law that because clause 57 is already in the Act they will never reduce wages while the arbitration is going on why does he come to-day with clause 58 imposing a penalty? He is doubting the companies; I am not. He comes here and says: "We cannot trust the companies; the only thing we can do to keep them in order is to impose a penalty."

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend knows very well that penal laws are not made for honourable men.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: You cannot touch them at all.

Hon. WILLIAM ROCHE: Honourable gentlemen, I have listened with a very great deal of interest to the colloquy between the lawyers, but I think they have narrowed the question down too much. They consider that there are only two parties—the workingmen and the companies. I think there is another party to the matter, and that is the public. The public is interested in the dispute.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The lawyers form part of the public.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: They live by the public.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: Suppose there is a dispute between a company and its workmen, and the result of that is that the workmen receive a shilling more of wages—per ton of coal for instance. What does the company do? Does it pay the workmen the extra shilling? No, sir. It charges two shillings to the public. It does not lose anything. But how is the public reimbursed? It pays the money for the article, and never gets it back.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Is it possible to pass on an increase of wages on coal?

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: Yes. The price of coal has been advanced 300 per cent in my time.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Has not that advance been made jointly with the advance of the price in other countries?

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: When one shilling was advanced to the workmen, two shillings were put on the price of the coal.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Has not the price of coal advanced in Canada in proportion to the advance in the United States?

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: Not proportionately.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Is it not a fact that when a shilling is added to a man's wages, and the company puts two shillings on the price of coal, the dealer who sells to the public puts on four shillings?

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: My honourable friend knows something about coal; perhaps he has been interested in coal. The retailer has to take up all the sins of the other parties; they are fastened upon him, and he is blamed; but the real sinners escape.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would like to answer in a word my honourable friend who spoke of the dire danger of utility companies paying to employees immense sums which they will never get back. I have been in close contact with some fairly large utility companies, and it has occurred to me that the management of any of those institutions, by looking ahead, could make provision for the time occupied by an arbitration. So, I do not feel that there is any very great danger of these companies paying wages unduly in advance of the time to reduce wages.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I would like to ask the honourable gentleman representing the Government whether he has in mind any case which has made it necessary to introduce this clause in this Bill? Can he state whether corporations have acted under the present law in such a way as to make this change necessary?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I do not know whether my honourable friend was in the Chamber when the ex-Minister of Labour gave a concrete case. Perhaps that honourable gentleman would repeat it.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: On July 16, 1921, all the railroad companies in Canada arbitrarily reduced wages, on an average, to the extent of about $13 a month. That reduction affected nearly 200,000 employees. My honourable friend can compute for himself just what that meant to those employees. We submit, inasmuch as this law had been in force for 14 years, and every time an adjustment was made the employees had to await the decision of a Board, that, when the time came to adjust wages downward, the employers also should have respected the law in the way the employees were required to do and had done, and should not make any change until the Board had made its investigation.

Hon Mr. DANIEL: Suppose the recommendation of the Board was in favour of the employees, increasing their wages instead of lowering them, would not the effect be retroactive to the time when proceedings were commenced?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I can answer that by stating that on October 18, 1923, all the railways in Canada refused to accept an award favourable to a certain branch of their employees, consisting of over 20,000 men, after the employees had made application for a Board, and after an investigation had been made and a unanimous report presented stating certain increases should be granted.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

CRIMINAL CODE BILL (BAIL)

SECOND READING

Hon. R. S. WHITE moved the second reading of Bill Y, an Act to amend the Criminal Code (bail on charges and committals for indictable offences).

He said: Honourable gentlemen, I shall be very brief. Bill Y is intended to make it more difficult to obtain bail for certain criminal offences. In view of the lateness of the hour I simply move the second reading of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend might explain. I think he can do so within the time at our disposal.

Hon. Mr. WHITE: As a layman I naturally feel somewhat different in dealng with questions of law and I ask the indulgence of honourable members. I do not wish to make any criticisms of the practice as carried on in our courts. My only purpose is to try to assist if possible the administration of justice. I am informed that under the present system, so far as the Province of Quebec is concerned, the duties of the Crown Prosecutor do not usually include any appearance before the Magistrate on application for bail. If the Crown were represented by a Crown Prosecutor in all cases and his duties were enlarged so that he might inquire into the antecedents of the accused, possibly the legislation now proposed might not be necessary; but, as I understand it, the application for bail is made before a Magistrate, and, although the Crown Attorney has to sanction it, he does not necessarily appear before the magistrate, and consequently bail is very often granted. The ends of justice would in my opinion be promoted by making it more difficult to obtain bail in the case of certain charges.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: What is the amount of bail generally required in those cases to which the honourable gentleman refers?

Hon. Mr. WHITE: There are at present several classes of offences in which bail is not granted, like treason, murder, manslaughter, and offences of that character. The purpose of this Bill is to add to these classes such offences as burglary, housebreaking, and robbery, except that bail may be obtained by application to a higher court. The proposal does not do away entirely with the otaining of bail, but the object is to make it more difficult to obtain bail than it is under the present practice. In the Province of Quebec the courts have been very lenient in this respect. We have in Montreal a class of criminals that perhaps does not exist in other parts of Canada. In the first place, we have a great seaport, with many foreigners coming in. Then we are very near the boundary line of the United States. A great many of the criminals that appear before our courts are not residents of the city, and I think the antecedents of some of these men charged with various offences against the law should be looked into very carefully before bail is granted, because, being non-residents, they are more likely to skip their bail.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: May I ask my honourable friend if he has any figures to show the number of accused persons who have failed to appear and have forfeited their bail?

Hon. Mr. WHITE: No, I have no data of that character. As I say, I am not a lawyer and I can only speak on the principle of the Bill. It is said that there are certain people who practically make a business of giving bail.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: May I suggest to my honourable friend that he get, if he can, figures of that sort, which would help us in considering this Bill?

Hon. Mr. WHITE: If this Bill goes before a special committee, several persons who would probably appear could give that information in a much better way than I can. I would not attempt to give it. I will move, honourable gentlemen, that this Bill be read a second time and be referred to a special committee.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I understand that the remarks of my honourable friend cover Bill Y and Bill Z. I have not had time to get the necessary data from the court officials in the city of Montreal. The situation which the honourable gentlemen desires to improve is one which has developed in the metropolis of the country. I have observed at times that the bail required was insufficient, but lately the magistrates have asked for much larger bail than heretofore, because when they refused bail and application was made over their heads to a Superior Court judge, the bail granted was in many instances insufficient.

I do not object to the second reading of this Bill, but I would not like to be bound to the proposition which it contains. I would favour the sending of the Bill to a special comittee, which would send for persons who could give information as to the exact conditions. Referring to the situation in the city of Montreal, I am a little afraid of the shifting of the responsibility for fixing bail from the judges of Sessions to the judges of the Superior Court, who in nine cases out of ten have practiced civil law exclusively and know very little of anything of the criminal side of their profession. Besides, the judges in the Superior Court have not been presiding over the criminal courts. The duty of hearing criminal cases has devolved upon the Court of King's Bench.

I am not certain that the present proposal is the best improvement that could be suggested. I understand that in Ontario and some other provinces there is a Crown Attorney, whose duty it is to look after the granting of bail, and who watches the case from the start. That is not the situation prevailing in the province of Quebec. Perhaps the remedy for the evil that now exists may be found in the recommendation that the Province of Quebec appoint a Crown Attorney to watch over such cases. I know there was considerable dissatisfaction some time ago with regard to the small amount of bail required from the light-fingered gentry. They seemed to have an organization which enabled them to obtain a bond of $1,000 or $2,000 and disappear across the line. Most of those people came from the United States. There was an outcry throughout the community and in the press against the loose way of granting bail to those people instead of keeping them in jail, and on representations from the Attorney General the magistrates became more exacting, fixing larger amounts. In cases of arrest for selling narcotic drugs the bail has sometimes been fixed at $5,000 and in other cases $10,000. The magistrate was disposed to keep the prisoner in jail, without fixing any amount, but that made it possible for the accused to apply to a Superior Court judge and get out on a small bail. Therefore the magistrates lately have been more severe and imposed rather large amounts, knowing that the accused would thus be kept in jail.

My honourable friend speaks of a committee. If he has the names of the members of that committee, I have no objection to the second reading of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Honourable gentlemen, as this is a matter affecting criminal law, I think the Bill had better be referred to a special committee of the House composed chiefly of lawyers, so that we may send for witnesses and papers and examine into the matter very fully. After the second reading I intend moving that the Bill be referred to a special committee of the House.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Honourable gentlemen, I beg to move:

That Bill Y be referred to a select committee of this House consisting of the honourable Messrs Barnard, Beaubien, Beique, Belcourt, Bennett, Dandurand, Foster, G. G. (Alma), Griesbach, Girroir, Hardy, Haydon, Lougheed, Pardee, Ross, W. B. (Middleton), Lynch-Staunton, Tanner, White, R. S. (Inkerman), Willoughby, Tessier, and the mover, with full power to send for persons and papers and to examine witnesses under oath.

I may say that I have selected all the lawyers in the House.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Honourable gentlemen, may I make this suggestion, that, as the Attorney Generals throughout Canada are responsible for the administration of justice, they should be communicated with and asked for their views or recommendations in connection with this Bill. That might be done immediately by the Clerk of the House, because it will take some time and we ought to have that information before us when the committee does meet. It seems to me that communication should be addressed immediately to the Attorney Generals of the different provinces. We do not know when the Committee is going to sit. Probably there will bean adjournment of the Senate, and the Committee cannot act at once. If that information is before the Committee when it meets, it will be of considerable use. Will my honourable friend add to the motion the suggestion that the Clerk of the House do forward copies of the Bill now.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Yes.

The motion was agreed to.

OPIUM AND NARCOTIC DRUG BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. R. S. WHITE moved the second reading of Bill Z, an Act to amend The Opium and Narcotic Drug Act, 1923, as regards Bail and Certain Charges.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I beg to move that the Bill be referred to the same Committee, and that the suggestion of the honourable gentleman from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt) be adopted in regard to it.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: I do not think that is really necessary.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: We may simply ask the Clerk to see that it is done.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: Yes.

The motion of Hon. Mr. McMeans was agreed to.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

INQUIRY

Hon. Mr. TANNER inquired of the Government:

1. What is the number of complaints received by the Government in 1923 and 1924 from each of the provinces in respect to alleged violations of the Combines Investigation Act, 1923?

2. How many of such complaints in each province did the Government cause to be investigated?

3. Were grounds for prosecutions discovered in any of the cases—and if so, in what provinces respectively—and how many in each province?

4. Were there any prosecutions under the said Act, and if so, how many in each province?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND:

1. No formal complaints in accordance with section 5 of the Combines Investigation Act, 1923, have been received, though various representations and informal complaints have been received from various parts of Canada, all of which have been, or are being, investigated.

2, 3, 4. Answered by No. 1.

PRIVATE BILL

SUSPENSION OF RULE

Hon. Mr. GREEN moved:

That Rule No. 119 be suspended in so far as it relates to the (Bill X2), intituled, "An Act respecting The General Animals Insurance Company of Canada."

He said: Honourable gentlemen, the reason that I am asking for a suspension of the rule in connection with this Bill is that it has been before us for some time and, owing to adjournments and other causes, has been delayed. The interested parties are only asking for a change of name and change in the class of policies that they may issue. The Insurance Department is quite satisfied, and, so far as we know, there are no objections. I understand that it is necessary for a Bill of this description to be posted about seven days before the meeting of the Committee. If that is done in this particular case it will mean that the hearing will not take place until after our adjournment.

The motion was agreed to.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT

MOTION FOR RETURN

Hon. Mr. GILLIS moved:

That an order of the Senate do issue for a Return showing:—

1. The number of settlers under the Soldier Settlement Scheme that have abandoned their farms.

2. The cost to the Government for land and equipment in all cases that have been salvaged.

3. What disposition, if any, was made of the land and equipment; if sold, what percentage of the original cost was realized.

4. Number of casees where foreclosure proceedings were instituted by the Government.

Hon. W. A. GRIESBACH: Honourable gentlemen, before the motion is put, I should like to offer a few observations, in view of the fact that I am now in correspondence on the whole question with the Minister in whose Department it lies.

This policy of soldier settlement was inaugurated in 1919, or 1918, and I found it more or less in operation when I returned from overseas. I am bound to say that on learning the details of it I could not feel particularly confident of its ultimate success. I found that a larger sum of money was being advanced for these men to go into farming than nine-tenths of the people going into farming in our country ever possessed at the beginning of their operations. I found also that it was possible for men to enter upon this scheme who were more or less unfitted for the undertaking. I could not bring myself to believe that the scheme was soundly conceived or likely to succeed, because of the failure to observe ordinary business precautions or ordinary business dealings. No loan company would lend a man a sufficient sum of money for the purchase of a farm, taking a mortgage on the security so created, and consider its investment safe. It is quite true that the applicant was required to pay down a small sum of money, but this would be eaten up by the first year's interest. There was no margin of security. Similarly it may be said that no bank would lend a man a sum of money for the purchase of stock and implements, taking its security on the stock and implements so purchased, and consider itself safe. It was obvious to me that there must be a considerable amount of loss, because the transaction did not run along the lines which one associates with sound methods.

There was, in addition—perhaps unavoidably so, owing to the conditions under which the scheme was launched—a certain amount of rascality and stupidity. One perhaps should not complain of that now, because the scheme served its purpose at the time in settling down many men who might otherwise have been more or less unsettled. There were two classes of men who obtained these loans: men who were worthy of them, and men who were not worthy at all—men who could not possibly succeed under any possible set of circumstances. There were, of course, a number of others, who might succeed under decent circumstances.

We find now that of the men who embarked upon this scheme there are three classes: those who have succeeded and deserved to succeed: those who deserved to succeed and have not succeeded: and those who under no circumstances could succeed.

The situation has been complicated, so far as we in the West are concerned, by depreciation of the land values and depreciation in the value of the stock. There has been no great depreciation in the value of the implements except by ordinary wear and tear. In certain parts of the country with which I am familiar the depreciation in land values has been from $25 an acre to $15, or about that. In the Grand Prairie country in particular the depreciation has been from about $20 or $25 an acre to between $7 and $10. In the value of stock in that part of the country the depreciation has been from about $150 per cow to something less than $15 per cow. So the soldier settlers in all these three classes, particularly the men who are doing reasonably well, find themselves in a bad way because of the depreciation of the value of what they had.

These lands and stock were purchased when peak prices prevailed, and now the settlers find that the prices have all tumbled down. So I say that, in addition to the fact that the scheme is not a sound one, there has occurred this depreciation in values, and the Government of this country is confronted with a very substantial loss, which fact has been, probably from the best motives in the world, concealed by ministers and officials from the people of Canada. There will undoubtedly be a severe loss in the operation of this scheme, and if it is not too late now, the country must speedily choose the method by which it will assimilate these losses. If the Government allow matters to continue as they are, if they maintain the present values, the loss will take this shape, that the men will give up hope, will feel that they can never make these repayments, can never see the end of the transaction, and they will simply abandon the land. Therefore the Government is confronted with a definite loss. The Government, however, might retrieve the situation to a certain extent, suffering, perhaps the same loss, but endeavouring to maintain upon the land the man who has been placed there at considerable expense to the people of the country; and I think that at this time, or in the very near future, some method should be devised of revaluing these holdings, the loss being frankly admitted. They should be revalued in order that the Government may have authority to approach these men and deal with them in such a way as to give them confidence and courage in the future and induce them to remain upon the land. It is not a very bright prospect, but it does occur to me that, if something were done now with a view to empowering the Government to deal with these men upon a more or less equitable basis, while the country might still sustain the loss, we might in the end induce a large number of these men to remain upon the land until a better time comes.

Therefore I agree with my honourable friend from Saskatchewan (Hon. Mr. Gillis) that there ought to be at once an inquiry to determine just what is the situation, and that legislation ought to be enacted to make provision for the state of affairs existing, so that, though we cannot avoid the loss, this much at all events will remain, that many of these deserving men will be kept upon the land until a brighter day dawns.

The motion was agreed to.

SHIPPING ACT INQUIRY

MOTION FOR RETURN

Hon. J. D. TAYLOR moved:

That an Order of the Senate do issue for a return giving copy of all correspondence with the Department of Marine respecting an inquiry under the Shipping Act into an alleged casualty to the Canadian Government Merchant Marine steamer Canadian Farmer, together with the evidence taken at said inquiry and the findings.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, the return asked for by the motion standing on the Order Paper in my name will present the opening chapter of a story of what I believe to be organized rascality in the several departments of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine and the Canadian National Railways, particularly in the Province of British Columbia.

I realize that the subject is one that might very well be considered in a place other than this Parliament, and, realizing that, I have been endeavouring for from fifteen to eighteen months past to secure attention on the part of the high officials and of the directors of the Canadian National Railways, and in the course of those efforts I have proceeded as far as the President himself. I am sorry to say that the successes I had in starting what I hoped to be an effective inquiry have been negatived by the direct order of the President of the Canadian National Railways to suspend or cease the investigation.

In February of 1923, shortly after the opening of the Session of this Parliament, I caused the Management of the Canadian National Railways to be informed of the fact that I intended to bring up these rascalities in Parliament unless I could obtain redress sooner. In consequence of that I received this letter, which is the opening of a long though unproductive correspondence. It is dated Ottawa, February 19, 1923, and addressed to me:

Dear Sir,—

This will introduce Mr. Arthur Hesketh of the Investigation Department of the Canadian National Railways.

It has come to the ears of Sir Henry Thornton that you have certain information relative to Canadian Government Merchant Marine affairs in British Columbia, and I would consider it a favour if you would give Mr. Hesketh any information you can on the subject, in order that the matter may be fully investigated.

Yours truly,

H. J. Page,

Chief of the Investigation Department.

Hon. Mr. GRIESBACH.

The gentleman so introduced called upon me, spent several hours with me, and obtained from me details enough to start him on a thorough investigation with the names of a score or more of likely witnesses and full details of what I believed to be the modus operandi of the persons concerned. That was on the 19th of February. I heard nothing more of the matter for several weeks.

On the 15th of March, being then about to return to British Columbia, and having no documents in my possession at Ottawa, I wrote Mr. Page, the head of the investigating department, offering to get him, while I was back in British Columbia, certain documents which I indicated, should the progress of the inquiry justify calling for them; and also telling him in addition to the specific case given:

I have in the meantime a letter from Captain Boyd, dated the 6th of March, stating: "I have learned since that another engineer and Captain worked up a repair job on the insurance and pulled it off. I have been told by the Chief Engineer in question." I give you this statement for what it may be worth in the absence of opportunity of questioning Captain Boyd on the subject.

To that letter I received no reply.

Not having heard anything, I wrote to the Chief of the Investigation Department, asking what he was doing. I have his reply of the 8th of May, in which he says:

I regret any delay that may have occurred in completing this investigation but I assure you that everything possible will be done to have the matter thoroughly investigated, but before this can be done I wish to state that it will be necessary to take the evidence under oath and for this purpose I have at the present time an application laid with the Legal Department for authority to take such evidence to be given to J. M. Bannerman, Superintendent of Investigation at Winnipeg. I am taking this action as I find, owing to pressure of business, that I cannot go to Vancouver personally.

Therefore it is my intention to assign this case to Mr. Bannerman, and this will be done as soon as I obtain the authority for him as above mentioned.

The charges laid in this correspondence are of such a serious character that I find it incumbent upon me to arrange as herein stated. You will therefore readily understand that the matter has not been lost sight of, but will be investigated to the limit.

Yours very truly,

H. J. Page,

Chief of the Investigation Department.

On the 28th of August, being then at home in British Columbia and not having heard of any progress, I wrote to Mr. Page asking whether he had any progress report to make, and stating:

Information given to me officially in the Senate seems to indicate that the frauds and the organization for their concealment is even more far-reaching than I had supposed. Have the officials implicated been successful in stifling the investigation, or is it to be held, and when?

To that letter I received no reply.

On the 24th of September I wrote to Mr. Hungerford, the Vice-President and General Manager, by whom the investigation had been promised in the first place, telling him of my failure to get results, and asking what if any explanation there was. I had no reply from Mr. Hungerford, and on the 25th of October I wrote to him again. In the course of that letter I said:

It is apparent from the answers given to me in the Senate that even the auditors whose report was presented to parliament had concealed from them the accounts and correspondence respecting some of these fraudulent payments and claims; and to effect this concealment there must have been protection from within the head office of your Company.

As it is possible that my former letter did not get to you, I am making this further inquiry as to what if any steps have been taken pursuant to the several promises of inquiry; and I am registering this letter so that its destination may be ascertained.

To that I received a letter from Mr. Hungerford, dated November 5th, acknowledging mine, and saying:

When I received information on the subject in the Spring, I communicated direct with the President, and since your letter was received the files and reports received on the subject have been duly considered by our Vice-President and General Counsel, who advises me that our Executive has decided that no good purpose will be served by further investigations, and that this decision is not arrived at through official influence nor based on any impropriety, but is the simlpe conclusion of business men, based on the report of the Wreck Commissioner for British Columbia and other information which is available to the Executive.

Just to interrupt the thread of the correspondence for the moment it seems to me that it is not compatible with businesslike proceedings that, having promised to me a full investigation it should have been suspended and no communication made to me on the subject. However, that is the reason given by Mr. Hungerford.

Then, on November 16th of last year, I addressed Sir Henry Thornton direct in these words:

Dear Sir Henry:

This is an appeal to Caesar, necessarily addressed to that high quarter because of the disinclination of your subordinates to touch a matter so far-reaching in its implications.

This appeal concerns what I believe to be a conspiracy on the part of officers of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, ashore and afloat, to obtain by false pretences money from insurance underwriters, for payment for faked repairs to C.G.M.M. vessels, to the end that these unfaithful officers may be in turn rewarded with commissions from those supposed to make the repairs. Also conspiracy to use the vessels of the C.G.M.M. to deliver liquor to ports of call in the United States for the profit of officers on the ships and officers ashore.

I gave to Sir Henry a long history of the case, and 32 questions, the answer to each one of which I believed would be valuable to him as indicating that fraud did exist. I will not bother reading those questions now, but will read the concluding paragraphs of my letter following the 32 questions:

I am satisfied that the answers to these questions if obtained by any investigator competent to extract the truth from unwilling witnesses will show that there has existed at Vancouver a scandalous condition which should be terminated; and that any competent investigator can bring to light sufficient evidence to justify placing on trial the persons implicated in these frauds.

While the request for this inquiry is based on the inference from these many questions involving but one voyage of only one ship, of the score of ships operated by your Company out of Vancouver, I have no reason to suppose that this one voyage and one ship are any exceptions to the prevailing experience. That the frauds have not been exposed and punished is explained by the experience of Capt. Boyd, a lone sailor man standing against the unlimited spending money and influence of a government corporation. Capt. Boyd has not only been dismissed for refusing to be a party to fraud, but also he has been blacklisted with other owners through the machinations of your officers here, and his means of livelihood have been destroyed.

I proceeded to ask him why there should not be an investigation. You will note that it is simply an investigation that I have been asking for.

Here is Sir Henry's letter, dated Montreal, November 28, 1923:

My dear Senator:

I beg to acknowledge receipt of your letter of November 16th in connection with various matters relating to the Canadian Government Merchant Marine service on the Pacific Coast, and Captain Boyd in particular. I will have an investigation made by a representative upon whom I can rely.

I think I should tell you that, when I was at Vancouver last July, I ordered an investigation in regard to Captain Boyd stopped because of the extremely unsatisfactory reports I had received with respect to his character and ability as an officer. These reports were so unquestionable and so distinctly to his disadvantage that it seemed a pity to waste the time of our officers in conducting an investigation with respect to which there could be no foundation. Notwithstanding this, as indicated in the first paragraph I will see that the matter is thoroughly ventilated. It is only fair to say, however, in connection with both Mr. Hungerford and Mr. Page, that these officers are men of the very highest integrity and enjoy the respect of those who have worked with them. Any attitude they have assumed in the matter you may be quite sure is sincere.

Very truly yours,

H. W. Thornton,
President.

Now, with respect to the reference to Captain Boyd, I would point out that my request for investigation was not based upon Captain Boyd at any stage, but was sent forward to Sir Henry Thornton and his associates on my own responsibility as a result of the personal investigation I had made of the matter. It is quite true that Captain Boyd's name was mentioned incidentally, but the application was mine, and not Captain Boyd's.

As to the reference to Captain Boyd's character—a cruel reference, I thought, coming from a man of Sir Henry Thornton's position

—I took that matter up with a view not to establish the main case but to do justice to Captain Boyd. I wrote to Sir Henry as follows:

From my knowledge of Captain Boyd I am of opinion that these reports were dishonestly made to prejudice you against a worthy officer whose sole offence to your Vancouver office was that he could not be induced to participate in the practices which I have reported.

I would call your attention to the fact that these dishonest practices had been brought to the attention of your Mr. Hungerford before I laid before him this information brought to me through the dismissal of Capt. Boyd; so that even any aspersions that may be cast upon this officer do not affect the case for an inquiry into the frauds reported to Mr. Hungerford from quite another source.

In the same letter I asked him to communicate to Captain Boyd any statements made as to the character of that officer so that he might have an opportunity of answering them. Captain Boyd wrote to Sir Henry Thornton on the same date, quoting the reference to himself in my letter, and proceeding:

Sir, I have followed the sea, boy and man, for over forty years, and I have had the respect and the confidence of all under whom I have served, and I have good references from them. My experience with the C.G.M.M. is the only exception; and until I was shown your letter to Senator Taylor I had no idea that there was any imputation from your service against my character or ability. In view of the statement of your letter, I ask that the nature of the charges against me, to which you refer, be communicated to me, so that I may have an opportunity to meet them. You will realize, I suppose, that while these charges remain current and unmet my means of livelihood as a shipmaster remains suspended, and my wife and family suffer with me because of the disrepute into which I am supposed to have fallen.

Sir Henry Thornton, great man as he is, being appealed to by this poor sailor who had been summarily dismissed and disgraced for no fault of his own, no opportunity to defend the charge against him, and no knowledge of any charge, has taken no notice of that sailor's letter to him asking to be confronted with his accusers, and has taken no steps, from that day to this, to make good his statements as to that man's want of character or want of ability, nor has he made any explanation either to Captain Boyd or to me of his failure either to make good or to withdraw his imputation against Captain Boyd.

Not having heard anything again in pursuance of this second request for investigation, on the 28th of January I wrote to Sir Henry Thornton again and asked him what if any progress was being made, and I received this answer:

Montreal, February 5, 1924.

Dear Senator Taylor:

I have your letter of January 28, and regret the delay that has taken place in connection with the case of Captain Boyd. The large number of questions set out in your previous communication of November 16, has involved a great deal of research and investigation, all of which has not as yet been finally completed.

I expect, however, the information will be all compiled in the course of the next few days, and I will then be in a position to communicate further with you on this subject.

Yours faithfully,

H. W. Thornton.

On February 11, Sir Henry Thornton sent to me another letter. I think I had better read it all. There are several significant passages:

Dear Senator Taylor:

Referring to previous correspondence in respect to Captain William J. Boyd, and particularly your letter of November 16, last; enclosed is statement supplying answers to the thirty-two questions asked by you. The information supplied in these answers, I trust, will be found satisfactory.

In the light of the evidence adduced at the Wreck Commissioners Court, held in Vancouver, October 23, 1920—and which Court was held under the instructions of the Honourable the Minister of Marine and Fisheries—as provided for by the Canada Shipping Act,—and the details given in the statement previously referred as enclosed herein, it is my opinion you have been misinformed and mislead by Capt. Boyd, as I cannot see this latter gentleman has any grounds for the charges made.

That is, Captain Boyd has no grounds for the charges that I made, and that I make.

The charges made in respect to our Pacific coast officials, though serious and grave, are absolutely without foundation—

This, mind you, without inquiry—an inquiry twice promised over Sir Henry Thornton's signature—and finally, without inquiry, he writes to me that these charges, both serious and grave, are absolutely without foundation.

—and as you appear to have based your opinions on information supplied by Capt. Boyd, I can only say, it clearly indicates that gentleman is not as conversant with steamship practices and insurance requirements as a Master Mariner should be.

I feel we have, with this letter, supplied all the information we possibly can, that our investigations have been complete, and that we cannot move any further in the matter.

If you are not satisfied with the findings of the Wreck Commissioners Court, and if we have not succeeded in showing that there have been no wrong doings by our officials, Capt. Boyd has the right and privilege of appealing to the Honourable the Minister of Marine and Fisheries for a re-hearing of his case. As you no doubt know, Chapter 113, Sections 805, 806 and 807 of the Canada Shipping Act provides for this.

As to the charge of black-listing made in your letter of November 16, Capt. Boyd has the privilege of bringing suit through the Civil Courts against the individuals concerned.

It is my opinion that the Company has done everything that it may reasonably be called upon to do in this matter, and it is, therefore, for Capt. Boyd to decide whether he desires to further appeal to the Minister under the provisions of the Act.

Yours faithfully,

H. W. Thornton.

I will interrupt the correspondence to tell you what the Company did in the matter. Shortly after Boyd's dismissal I applied on his behalf to the Minister of Marine for an inquiry under the Shipping Act. First of all, I applied to the Marine Superintendent of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine at Montreal, who was the head of the Marine Service, for an inquiry, telling him that I based my request on the fact that I had seen affidavits from an officer and six members of the crew of Captain Boyd's ship to the effect that the log of the ship had been forged in order to manufacture evidence which might reflect upon Captain Boyd. I represented to the Superintendent at Montreal that in view of these sworn affidavits by an officer and six members of the crew he should have an office investigation. Joined with me in that request was Mr. McQuarrie, the member for New Westminster in the House of Commons. Mr. McQuarrie is a King's Counsel, a citizen of good repute, a lawyer of experience. He advised the Marine Superintendent in Montreal that he too had seen the affidavits, and that, having seen them, he thought there should be an office inquiry into the matter. And what do you suppose was the answer? In a spasm of new virtue, following the reputed abolition of patronage, the Marine Superintendent wrote to me and to Mr. McQuarrie that our polite and reasoned request to him was an instance of political interference in the management of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, and that therefore attention could not be paid to it!

Accepting the snub as gracefully as I could, I next applied to the gentleman to ask if he would join in a request to the Minister of Marine for an inquiry under the Shipping Act. An inquiry under that Act would not have brought out the most important matters in connection with the rascality, but would have laid groundwork for further inquiry. I asked this high official whether he would join in an inquiry under the Shipping Act. He replied that he would not; that the Canadian Government Merchant Marine paid no attention to the provisions of the Shipping Act in this connection, and that they would not be guided by any findings of any court of inquiry held under the Act. Notwithstanding that the Merchant Marine would not join in it, the Minister of Marine took a broader view and was considerate enough to give Captain Boyd the inquiry for which he had asked.

In view of Sir Henry Thornton's challenge to go again to an appeal in connection with the inquiry under the Shipping Act, it is timely to say that when that first inquiry was held his Company so far from joining or collaborating in it, sent their counsel at Vancouver to resist in every possible way the revelations that might have been made at that court of inquiry. The officials and other employees of the Company came there and gave evidence. I was not in the court, but it was described to me by responsible gentlemen who had been there as the most flagrant perjury they ever heard. One of the witnesses, an official of the Company, was warned by the Wreck Commissioner holding the court, in these words, which you will see in the return for which I ask.

You are plainly giving false testimony and concealling something. I warn you.

Men on the ship of which Captain Boyd had been in command were informed that if they came to the court and gave evidence on his behalf they would be dismissed from the ship. An essential witness on Boyd's behalf was sent away on another ship. Another witness, who insisted upon coming notwithstanding the warning that he would be dismissed, was posted as a deserter from that ship, while he was still in the court waiting to be called, many hours before the ship sailed; and when later he presented himself to go on board the ship again, he was told he was a deserter and refused admittance to the ship.

Yet the head of the Company whose officials treated the first reference to a court under the Shipping Act in this tyrannical way now says: "Why don't you have an appeal under the Shipping Act" an appeal in which no doubt they would use all the resisting force of the Company, as they did before?

On the 20th of February, after the receipt of this letter from Sir Henry Thornton, I replied to him in these terms:

Dear Sir:

I have to thank you for your favor of the 11th inst., with answers to my inquiries respecting the insurance frauds of the Vancouver office of the C.G.M.M.

I deeply regret that you have disposed of this matter without the inquiry which you promised me, and which your Mr. Hungerford promised to Senator Robertson. As I understand the situation, you have not had any inquiry, but instead have accepted the perjured testimony and evasive statements of the guilty officials of your Company.

The answers transmitted to me are all dishonest, and many of them are untrue, to my own knowledge.

Having now exhausted all channels of redress within your Company, for the relief of Capt. Boyd from the malicious persecution of your officials whose frauds he has resisted, I must now appeal to a higher court, before which I hope you will be prepared to appear, to show the basis upon which you rest your attack upon the character and the livelihood of a deserving citizen.

To that I received this answer:

Dear Sir:

Referring to your letter of February 20th. I am utterly unable to understand the statement contained in the second paragraph. On November 28th, 1923 I said to you that I would have an investigation made by a representative in whom I could rely. This was done and, furthermore, the whole case was reviewed by our Vice-President in charge of legal affairs.

I want to nail that right there. "This was done;" that is, the investigation was made. How could there be an investigation of my complaint without reference to me? or of Boyd's complaint withour reference to Boyd? There was no reference either to me or to Boyd in connection with this alleged investigation; therefore I think I am correct in stating, as I stated to Sir Henry Thornton, that he had had no investigation within the proper meaning of that term.

Your statement that the perjured testimony and evasive statements of guilty officers has been accepted is entirely without foundation.

Now, here is a significant paragraph, in view of the pretence in former correspondence that these complaints rested solely on the character or want of character, of Captain Boyd. Listen to this:

There has been so much accusation, recrimination and general turmoil on the Pacific Coast in which every officer in the service from top to bottom has been accused of every conceivable crime that I am getting heartily sick of such a condition and I have, therefore, nominated Mr. R. H. M. Temple, our Regional Counsel at Winnipeg to proceed to the Coast and undertake an investigation as soon as possible. In preparation for this, due notice will be made through the press and those who have charges to prefer or complaints to make will be asked to communicate them to Mr. Temple. It is perhaps unnecessary for me to say that the officer I have selected to conduct this investigation is an able lawyer of irreproachable reputation, in no way connected with any of our officers on the Pacific Coast and without knowledge of the previous state of affairs.

When this investigation is over we will certainly dismiss from the service anyone who is found guilty of acts which affect their usefulness, and I am also going to discharge anyone caught making malicious charges.

Yours faithfully,

H. W. Thornton,
President.

That was on the 26th of February. Parliament was to meet on the 28th, and naturally I was desirous of seeing this investigation at least started. Having heard nothing further of it, and not having seen any notice in the press, as promised, and not having learned from any of the interested parties that they had received any warning to be ready for it, I wired Mr. Temple on the 13th of March stating:

Sir Henry Thornton notified me on February 26 that you were about to proceed to Coast to hold investigation into affairs which I have brought to his attention. It is essential that I shall be present during this investigation if it is to deal with questions I have raised. I must leave for Ottawa on twenty-seventh for meeting of Senate after present recess, and therefore this is to request that you will kindly notify me on receipt of this as to date when you will be at Coast.

On the 14th Mr. Temple answered:

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR.

Replying your telegram thirteenth will endeavour to be at coast prior to twenty-seventh instant.

That is the very day I told him I wanted to leave for Ottawa.

To date have received no complaints.

R. S. M. Temple.

Here is an investigator promised as about to make a thorough investigation, sitting tight in his office at Winnipeg for three weeks after the promise has been made, with no notice to anyone that he proposes coming and making the investigation, and resting on the fact that, as he says, "To date have received no complaints."

I wired Temple on the 14th of March:

Thornton's promise of inquiry by you was in reply to my notice of intention to have parliamentary investigation which extent of rascalities justifies. If I am to present case at Vancouver instead of at Ottawa I must have opportunity of hearing and dealing with any statements in explanation or defence and this will take several days. You wire "to date have received no complaints." No public notice has been given that you are ready to receive complaints and I had no reason to think that you expected anything to be forwarded to Winnipeg.

In answer to that he wired me that he was leaving for New Westminster next day. The result was that the investigation was started on the 27th, the very day that I was due to leave for Ottawa. Now, while no public notice was given of the arrival of this gentleman, it is significant that the first visitor he had was the Chairman of the Patronage Committee of the Dominion Government at Vancouver, who evidently had been informed of the approach of this investigator and was ready for him; and the subject of their communication was—what do you suppose? The investigator told me the first day of his arrival—

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: What date?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: He arrived at Vancouver about the 23rd of March. He started his investigation on the 27th. On the day of his arrival he attended in my office. One of his first observations was: "I met to-day a Mr. Macdonald. He informed me that he had been offered the case of Captain Boyd before the Wreck Commissioner and had declined to take it because of its doubtful character."

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: That is the ex-Attorney General?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: That is the ex-Attorney General of British Columbia, M. A. Macdonald, the reigning Liberal politician, head of the Patronage Committee in Vancouver. He knew all about the arrival of Mr. Temple to investigate. Nobody else, so far as I know, had any knowledge of this gentleman's approach, and the first communication received by him was a communication to blast the character of Captain Boyd. Yet this investigator was content to receive an impression of that kind.

I formed the impression from presenting evidence to Mr. Temple before he started his formal inquiry—I happened to have two witnesses present and had them talk to him—that he resisted every suggestion of their testimony and was full of excuses, and I could not help realizing the foly of sending for an independent, unbiased investigation one of the Regional Counsel of the Canadian National Railways, when his own chief, Mr. Ruel, had advised against having any investigation whatever and had pronounced in advance that there was no foundation for it; and not only had his own chief been so advised, but his associate at Vancouver had been actively engaged in resisting the former investigation, and, as I was informed—I do not know this of my own knowledge, as I know these other facts of my own knowledge—at this very moment he was coaching witnesses to present evidence to Temple whenever Temple started his investigation.

However, that has gone on for a month. When I was home the week before last I asked Mr. Temple for an appointment to discuss with him the progress of the inquiry which he had been carrying on at my instance for a month, and in which I was supposed to participate. He assured me that he was so very busy that he could not find any time whatever to make a date to see me and discuss it with me. I asked him where he would be that evening—because I do not mind working late at night. He told me he had a dinner party for that evening. I had to reply: far be it from me to suggest that the matter which had brought him to Vancouver should stand in the way of a dinner party. I suggested to him that it would be unfortunate if I had to come back to Ottawa and report that this investigator had no time to talk with the man at whose instance he was holding the investigation. He thereupon made a lunch appointment for me for the next day; and I must say that he is a nice gentleman to meet, and we had a very pleasant lunch. But, unfortunately, he had invited a stranger to be present at the lunch with us, and I could not very well go seriously into the matter that was in my mind, in the presence of that stranger.

That is the history. I am sorry I have taken so long to give the history of the correspondence. I will summarize briefly now the nature of the trouble and the nature of the evidence. I may say that I have statutory declarations establishing the evidence under each of these points. I will not bother to read those now, but will summarize them as briefly as may be.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Has the honourable gentleman handed copies of those affidavits to Mr. Temple?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Oh, yes. Mr. Temple has them all. I also handed Mr. Temple a brief under each heading of the inquiry, giving my impression of it. I have given him all the assistance in my power and all the information I could gather up for him. I have given it all in writing.

The story, in brief, is this. Captain Boyd was appointed direct from Montreal to the command of the Canadian Government steamship Farmer, a freighter, trading between Ocean Falls and San Francisco and San Pedro, and carrying cargoes of paper and general ocean freight. In 1921, when passing through Montreal on his way home from four years' service as a ship-master during the war, Captain Boyd had made arrangements for his appointment. He had called on Mr. Tedford, in Montreal, and secured the promise of the appointment. The promise was kept 12 or 13 months later. On taking up the appointment he found that the man given to him as mate had expected the ship, and did not take gracefully the fact that he was superseded. Captain Boyd found from the beginning an air of antagonism to him about the ship—embarrassing because of the fact that on these ships the crews are hired and virtually discharged by the mate, the captain being alone on the ship. Indeed, he is supposed to hold aloof, and must, from the fact that he has no authority to hire or discharge, and that the crew depend on the mate for favours. The captain found he had no support from the mate, and reported to Montreal and suggested that the mate be transferred. Later he became aware of the fact that boot-leg whiskey was run on his ship—the ship had been searched on suspicion at Ocean Falls, and also at San Francisco. While nothing was found, he believed that there were good prospects of it being found, and he reported this to Montreal, without saying who was doing the bootlegging—one could read between the lines—and asked the Company to place on the ship an officer of their Investigation Department so as to run down this bootlegging. He offered if necessary to pay the expenses of that officer, because he said he was very desirous of putting to an end this menace to the safety of his ship. The ship was liable to be seized.

To his complaint against that officer he received no answer whatever from the head office at Montreal. He also reported other cases—one of inciting to insubordination, and one of absence without leave. He got no answer to any of these communications.

On the 18th of June, 1921, at midnight, the ship struck something in Porlier Pass, between Nanaimo and Victoria. What it was they did not know. That is what the Wreck Commissioner's inquiry set out to discover. Anyhow, the ship struck something, and they stopped and sounded, and found she was making no water, and went on their way. Four days later, at Ocean Falls, she was inspected and given a certificate of seaworthiness and proceeded on her way. She continued for two months in the trade in which she had been engaged. Then she went into dock at Prince Rupert for the annual overhaul. In the dock at Prince Rupert they found a mark on the keel-plate, 14 feet from the stern post—a dent between two frames, such as might be made by striking a log or any object of that kind. There was no damage to the plate, except the mark upon it; no paint off; no rivets started and no water making. So far as that impact was concerned, she might have been launched the next minute. She went through her annual overhaul, being in dock eight days, and went on her way back to Ocean Falls. At Ocean Falls the Captain got word to report at the Vancouver office. He did so, and there learned to his astonishment that he was dismissed. The news came to him like a bolt from the blue. He wanted to know why. The Vancouver office would not tell him. They said: "A letter will arrive tomorrow telling you." The letter came, and said he was dismissed because of "the various accidents" to his ship.

Now, while he had had a few minor accidents during the first few months of his career, it happened, as the insurance records show, that no claim for damage had been made in all the months of 1922 up to the time of this accident of the 18th of June. That was the sole accident of that year; yet he was dismissed because of "the various accidents to your ship."

Captain Boyd came to me with the letter, asking what, if anything he could do about it. He lived in the outskirts of New Westminster, where I lived—that is my connection with him; he was one of my electors when I had electors. He showed me at the same time an "extension of protest" that had been handed to him to sign at the moment he left to report at Vancouver. There was a letter which asked him to sign this, and he had signed it without reading it. It was a document of about five pages. When he had read it he found that it recited an array of disturbing experiences on the ship immediately following the impact of the 18th of June—the steam steering gear started to cut up and work with unusual rapidity; the hand steering gear had been found broken; the condenser had been found choked; the thrusts of the engine had been disturbed by the pressure put upon them, and the machinery was labouring. There was a whole series of injuries like that recorded as extracts from his log. He showed them to me and told me that none of these things had really happened. Of course, I came to the conclusion that the reporting of all these things to Montreal had been the cause of this man's dismissal.

Examining these entries, I soon recognized that at least two of them could not be in the log, because they were impossible: they had been carelessly put into this document without any idea that anyone would examine them as to their reasonableness. I suggested to Captain Boyd that he could lay a complaint of forgery of his log, entries being put into it after he had signed it. He did that, and made that part of the basis of his application for a court of inquiry.

When we got to the court we found that the main entries which were alleged to be forged appeared in the log in different ink from that used in making the other entries. We found that the entries as to the damage to the machinery continued in the log for the same number of days that they had been kept in the extension of protest, and that for fifty days after that, while the ship remained at sea, there was no record whatever of anything wrong with the steering gear or the machinery. We found that the specifications for the repairs at Prince Rupert indicated not simply a dent of one plate—which did not have to be touched at all—but that that plate was badly set up—that is, badly twisted out of shape—for five or six frames, twelve to fifteen feet; and that the floors and frames inside were represented as being set up also. Two other plates were represented in these specifications as badly set up for a similar distance, one at the bow of the boat, and the other alongside the main plate at the stern.

Upon investigation we found from the workmen employed in the dock that no repairs whatever of the kind indicated in these specifications had been made; that the only thing wrong which had been found was this dent, which could have been pulled out with a jack and the application of a little heat, but which it was not necessary to touch. All the rest of the supposed repairs were fakes. Notwithstanding that, we had a survey of three supposedly reputable officers—the owners' representative, the insurance representative, and the Dominion Inspection representative—the official titles I forgot—each of whom certified to the existence of all these damages, and at a later date certified that all these repairs had been made according to the specifications. On the contrary, no repairs whatever were made except an ordinary overhaul. That is one classification of the fraud.

Next, we turned towards finding the reason why this job should be put upon Boyd, and why he should be dismissed. For this we turned to the whiskey. We found a watchman who swore—I have his affidavit here—that he had been employed as a watchman for 23 months on the Canadian Government Merchant Marine on each ship in turn as she came into Vancouver; and that on each ship bound for American ports during those 23 months a large consignment of bootlegging whiskey had been loaded immediately prior to the ship sailing; that these consignments ran from 20 to 100 cases at a time; that in one instance, on a consignment of 100 cases about to go on board, the sales agent had come down and asked him as watchman to report next day the safe arrival of the 100 cases of contraband whiskey, "because," he said, "I cannot be around here when it comes on." The watchman swears that he attended at that office the next day, and told the sales agent that it had arrived and was safely stowed. He then entered into a general conversation, in the course of which the sales agent spoke about the satisfactory business they were having with the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, and told about some trouble that they were having with the Canadian Farmer. "The Captain is an old fogy: we can't do anything with him; he is interfering with the transactions of his mate; he is going to be fired." The captain was indeed fired a few weeks afterwards; and the watchman, a short time after that, was fired by his immediate boss, who said he was instructed by the Pacific Coast manager to discharge him because he talked too much about the whiskey.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Was the mate put in charge?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Yes. When Captain Boyd was fired they promoted to the command of that vessel the man who had been reported for bootlegging, for insubordination, for inciting the crew to insubordination, and for absence without leave.

A few months after that, according to this watchman's sworn statement, this new captain personally conducted on board, between 4 and 5 o'clock in the morning, 20 cases of whiskey. In the forenoon of the same day the Customs, having had some information on the subject, inquired of an exporting house as to the putting on of this whiskey. It was found that an export order had been taken for 5 cases of whiskey 4 or 5 days before. The Customs officials asked what had been done with that, and were told that it had not been sent down at the time because the ship had been delayed for 4 days, and that they had been told not to send it until the ship was sailing, but that it had just now gone down. When the Customs officer got to the wharf there were 5 cases already on the wharf. I have a statement not included in the sworn statement, but given to me after I had this Customs report, that 5 cases were taken off the ship by two sailors, and that it was the 5 cases so taken off that were found by the Customs officer after they had taken up the question with the exporting house.

Captain Boyd was not believed; he was fired. But what happened to this man caught bootlegging? Was he fired? No, he was taken off the ship for one voyage and was restored to it when she came back, notwithstanding the fact that in the meantime he had had more accidents with his ship and that the company had had to pay for more real damage than had occurred during Captain Boyd's whole career. Since that time this other captain has put his ship on the rocks, and now he is laid off, although I am told he is about to be taken on again. That is the way in which the standard of the service is improved.

During the course of the investigation this further branch came up. You may say: "How can these things go on without the people on the wharf and all about knowing it? And why don't they give information?" Here is the explanation. The people on the wharf have their own little line of graft. I have statements—not affidavits, because they were referred to Mr. Temple, who should have the evidence by now, of seemingly reliable witnesses who were employed as labourers on that wharf. They were under the charge of a man who was named the constable; but this constable regularly pilfered from the wharf in wholesale quantities, so much so that he brought down an automobile to take away his loot; that one of those labourers was employed in building this constable's house, and was paid by the Canadian Government Merchant Marine for the time that he was so employed; that the lumber used in the house was stolen from the Government wharf and was conveyed to this house on Government trucks; that the paint was stolen from the wharf, and that inside this man's house there was a large collection of the wares—such as canned provisions and liquor —that are dealt with on the Government wharf. We have those statements from 3 witnesses that I know. That constable is still on his job. The watchman has been dismissed; the wharf labourer has been dismissed; the captain has been dismissed; and the people who give information as to frauds are dismissed; but the culprits are on the job.

Just yesterday a gentleman who heard that I was interested in this matter presented to me this file.

Hon. Mr. PLANTA: Before you leave that first file, did you say there was some insurance collected on that?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Yes. In answer to the question, I would say that in writing to the office in Montreal I suggested that surely the Government of Canada were not going to be parties to collecting insurance under false pretences from insurance companies for damages which the ship had not suffered. They did not seem to rise to that suggestion at all; it appeared to make no impression. Last year I inquired as to the matter in the Senate when the insurance report was brought down. I asked for details, and found in them nothing to indicate that any insurance had been collected. The accident having happened in June, and the repairs made in August, by the end of the year something should have been collected. It looked as if I had been misled by somebody in regard to the story. I put an inquiry on the Order Paper, and after getting the details of insurance for all the vessels, and finding nothing to correspond with my information, I asked specifically what was the bill for repairing the Canadian Farmer at the Prince Rupert Dock in August 1922; how much of that bill had been charged to the insurance company, and how much had been paid by the insurance company, and, if anything had been charged or paid, why it was not in the accounts for last year. I got the answer that the bill was $8,500, that the whole of it had been charged to the insurance company, that the whole of it had been paid by the insurance company, and that the reason it was not included in the statement of account for 1922 was that at the close of the accounts on the 31st December they had not the information as to what the damages were, or what the insurance was.

Of course, I knew that was not true, because the dock company was in liquidation, and desperately in need of money, and they would press their bill with the greatest alacrity. But, apart from that, I had in my possession, at that very time, an official report from that company to the Registrar of Shipping, dated the 16th of October, 1922, and setting out the amount of the damages to the ship from the accident of the 18th of June. The official report was made on the 16th of October, and yet the answer to this Parliament, many months later, was that on the 31st of December they did not know what the bill was!

Now, I have another instance, and this is the last, of dismissals from the service of the Canadian Government Railways, not the Merchant Marine.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: You were going to deal with a file that was sent you yesterday; what about that?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: This is the one. Everything I have said so far has related to the Merchant Marine which is under the same roof in Vancouver as the National Railways. This file refers to the Canadian Railways. It does not depend on Captain Boyd at all; it does not depend on Senator Taylor at all. I knew nothing about this until yesterday. It originated in this letter—

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Does it bear on the Canadian Farmer—on the motion of my honourable friend?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Yes, it bears on the motion. All this bears on the motion; it is only the first chapter of a long series. This is a letter from Mr. H. T. Page Chief of the Investigation Department, to Mr. J. D. Watson, District Special Agent of the Canadian National Railways, Vancouver. It is dated Ottawa, February 1st, 1923, just about the time when I started the inquiry with which I have just dealt. It says:

Dear Sir:

There is a Mr. D. Thomas in Vancouver—

—I may say I do not know anything personal about this at all; my information about what I am going to say now is based on this file, and I have no personal information as to the rest of my story. This is the letter:

Dear Sir:

There is a Mr. D. Thomas in Vancouver who has been into communication with Sir Henry Thornton re certain complaints and I want you to call on him and tell him that you have been instructed by Sir Henry Thornton to interview him, and that everything he has to say will be held in the strictest confidence.

Take careful note of what he has to say and if the complaints he makes warrant an investigation, I want you to spare no pains to get the facts of the matter, and do this as quickly as possible.

As soon as you have had your interview with him, I would like you to report to me of what his complaints consist of, but go right ahead with your investigation and report to me direct at Ottawa.

Yours truly,

H. J. Page,
Chief of Investigation.

Now, in perusing that you will see that this man was not volunteering information. He was in a different category; he was instructed by his chief to go and get it, and he did so, and reported back to this effect. This is necessarily scrappy, because I have just taken the headings out of these many pages. He reported the names of several employees who had been dismissed for giving information as to the irregularities, and these will come up one by one a little later. Then he reported that Johnson and Whyte, freight solicitors for the Canadian National Railway, Vancouver, had complained of people refusing to do business as long as Labrie was in charge of the purchasing, and they produced reports to this effect that had been made to the office. He reported that Horn, the General Freight Agent, had taken up the matter frequently, but without results. He made this comment of his own:

Those of our employees who are aware of the details cannot have confidence or any respect for their superiors who are looked upon to set a better example.

There is next a paragraph that I would like to show to honourable gentlemen interested, but I will pass that over for the present.

This investigator, reporting by order, and addressing himself directly to his chief, says under date of June 27, 1923:

Everything possible has been done by Mr. Labrie to offset this investigation by making promises to Lumbermen that he will see them all right for Canadian National Railways business providing they gave him letters to the effect that he is up and above board and which letters he has been able to obtain, the Lumbermen stating that it is a case of dollars and cents with them.

The position he has placed himself and the Company in is that should he be allowed to remain here the Canadian National Railways will be at the mercy of these men, who he has made promises to.

He stands in the same position with some of his Staff that should he remain he and the Company are at their mercy and the employees both inside and outside of this Department, who have made truthful statements will be subjected to treatment not due them, while the Investigation Department will be nothing but an absolute farce.

The treatment already meted out to McLauchlin, Timber Inspector, is of a very serious nature from the fact that Labrie has intimated he and others through threats and promises and because McLauchlin has not met with his wishes he has been made to suffer unbelievable grief and worry through the fact that he is a man well up in years and has just recently got out of bed after being ill, and his wife is naturally very much distressed at such a state of affairs.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Will the honourable gentleman pardon me? I was interrupted while the honourable gentleman was speaking of the doings—bootlegging, etc.—on steamers; of Captain Boyd being dismissed, and of the dealings with the insurance business; and now I find him discussing Canadian National Railways. It was just at that moment that I was prevented from following my learned friend. Would he explain to me?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: I will say, for the information of the honourable gentleman, that the Canadian National Railways are under the same roof at Vancouver as the Canadian Merchant Marine, and they are very intimately connected, as they are all in the one office. This is a report of which I have no personal knowledge, but it was given to me yesterday as a series of complaints made to Sir Henry Thornton by the Chief of his Investigating Department at Vancouver.

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: Who is that?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Mr. Watson.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But not bearing on the statements and representations made by the honourable gentleman of which he spoke in the first part of his speech?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Well, bearing on them in this way, that I made a general statement of organized rascality in all departments, and this is one of the departments. My statement covers them all.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Is that with regard to insurance?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, no.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have no objection to my honourable friend continuing, and even expanding beyond his motion; but as he has given a notice bearing on certain matters, could he not restrict his statements to those facts, and bring up any further representation on some other matter, in order that we could have a complete statement of one matter? His notice does not cover the matter to which he is now referring. It seems to me that my honourable friend will have somewhat of an involved statement if he does not limit his remarks to the matter of his motion.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Pardon me for interrupting, but entirely apart from the distinction to be drawn between the two, the statement now being made by the honourable gentleman from Westminster is corroborative and confirmatory of the charges that have been made as against Captain Boyd. Apparently the chief officers of the road have taken the ground that the charges made by Captain Boyd have not been proved, and the statements are not to be relied upon; but here is evidence from the officers of the road themselves as to the irregularities which are going on there in connection with the Canadian National Railway system, of which this is a branch.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But on some other matter.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But it is confirmatory of the irregularities on the system.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes, but my difficulty is this. An inquiry is going on just now by Mr. Temple in Vancouver.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We do not know.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Well, my honourable friend will state so.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I do not think he will designate it as an inquiry.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: An inquiry or investigation. I leave my honourable friend to say which,—but if it bears on that matter which is being investigated in some way or other by Mr. Temple, it will reach Mr. Temple, and if the brief of my honourable friend which he handed him is not as complete as his statement, it will be of so much advantage for the information of Mr. Temple. But my honourable friend branches off into some other matters which Mr. Temple is not investigating just now, and which is not covered by his notice of motion. He could proceed by another notice of motion to disclose some other matters in connection with the Canadian National Railways.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: If the leader of the House has a point of order in his mind, I think I am quite in order.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am not raising a point of order, though I think I could.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: I would be quite prepared to meet a point of order if it were raised, because I think this matter is quite in order, and is covered by my motion. But as to Mr. Temple, I may say that he is at this moment engaged in hearing—I do not want to say investigating—something about this very file which I hold in my hand. He told me when I was there that he was through with Boyd and was now investigating the Watson case. I did not know what the Watson case was.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Is this the Watson case?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: This is the Watson case. I will be brief with this. I do not know Labrie at all, or any of these people. He was the purchasing agent.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Was, or is?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: He is still the purchasing agent, so far as I know. Watson's finding with respect to him is that the evidence shows that when he bought lumber direct from mill operatives he exacted a commission from them of so much a thousand —$1 a thousand is mentioned, and 50 cents per thousand—and that he insisted on having it in cash, wisely refusing to take cheques; that his general practice was not to buy direct, but through lumber brokers; that the lumber brokers pay the mills commonly higher prices than the mills would charge direct to Labrie; that the common report of timber inspectors, particularly of Inspector McLauchlin, who has been dismissed for making it, is that when a certain grade of lumber is ordered from the lumber broker—from two firms particularly—those lumber brokers pass on to the mills that order in the name of a lower grade, the price of that lower grade being from $5 to $8 per thousand less than the price of the grade for which the lumber brokers are paid. Watson's suggestion, established by a mass of evidence in this file, is that the loss to the country is from $5 to $8 per thousand on all the lumber purchased for Canadian National Railway purposes in British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: What is Labrie's position?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Labrie is, or was, purchasing agent.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: How long has that been going on?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: I do not know how long these frauds have been going on, but they have continued since long before government ownership. I could not say off-hand just how far these particular transactions have gone. An investigation was started last year. Watson found, with respect to a certain railway section of Vancouver Island, that the engineer in charge of that reported to headquarters at Vancouver asking permission to accept a local offer for a logging right-of-way, the logs to be taken care of without cost to the Company, and the Company to get some revenue for hauling them to their destination on the seaboard. But this was refused at the instance of Labrie, who said it was his perquisite to handle this, and Labrie made a contract with persons named, under which he paid them $58,000 for the service which others had undertaken with this District Engineer to do for nothing. And how the engineer comes to complain of that is that shortly afterwards he was dismissed because of the extravagant cost of the operations on his line. This engineer has for nearly two years been demanding an investigation, just as I have been demanding one in the case of Boyd, and he has been unable to get it.

There is the same complaint from Mr. McLaughlin, Timber Inspector, that he has been unjustly dismissed for reporting frauds, and has applied in vain for an investigation.

That indicates the nature of this file, which is corroborative of the general statements I have made about the Canadian Government Merchant Marine.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Will the honourable gentleman state what file? What kind of file is it? Is it an official file that has been brought down here?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Oh, no; it is not an official file. I do not know the origin of this file which is in my hands.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But has it any sign of authenticity?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: I received it from a reputable member of Parliament, who told me where he got it, and I have no reason to doubt it. It can be very easily confirmed, because Sir Henry Thornton knows whether or not he has the correspondence indicated here.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That would be a copy of what is in the Canadian National Railways offices?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Yes. There are no original signatures on this. These are all copies.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: And the report of Watson, head of the Investigation Department.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Copies of his letters. I have no reason to doubt the authenticity of the file at all.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Is this a file bearing on the investigation carried on by a gentleman by the name of Watson?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Yes.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This is the foundation of his report.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: What is the date of that document?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: The date of the instructions to Watson is "Ottawa, February 1, 1923." The date of his main report is, "Vancouver, June 27th, 1923."

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: What are his initials?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: J. D. Watson.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: By whom was he instructed to carry on that investigation?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: He was instructed by H. J. Page, Chief of investigation, the same man who gave the instructions in the case I first mentioned.

Now, this man Watson, immediately upon the presentation of this report, was dismissed, just like all the other people who find out anything.

Hon. Mr. TANNER: He got the axe.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR He was dismissed. He came down to Ottawa, as I am informed, with a letter to the present Minister of Railways, introducing him as a reliable man whose statements might be accepted. Instead of going to the Minister of Railways he went on to Montreal, to the Canadian National headquarters. When he finished there he did not have to see the Minister of Railways, because he was restored to the service and went back on duty in Vancouver. I supposed he was still there, but, on reflection, I realize that his name does not appear in connection with the other investigation, and it has been suggested to me that he has since left the Service again. I am unable to say whether Watson is in the Service at present or not, but he was there, and he was dismissed for making this report, and was taken back after this dismissal when he bearded the lion at headquarters.

All the persons against whom he reported have been continuously on the job, notwithstanding his reports of graft, extortion, drunkenness, misconduct in every form. I would not read—I could not read to this House—some of the evidence in this file. You would not want it to appear in the records of our House. Every man reported for misconduct by anyone whom I have quoted remains in the Service. The good men like Boyd are summarily dismissed. A good man like Lewis, the Vancouver Island engineer, on whom this $58,000 job was put up, is dismissed, against the protestations of his chief, who says he never had a more capable or more honest engineer. And these men who are guilty of this rascality are quoted through this and the other files as openly boasting that they have a pull which cannot be overcome.

There is the condition under which the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Government Merchant Marine services are being carried on in British Columbia. We discussed here the other day at considerable length the question whether or not we were justified in paying $31,000 a year for the administration of justice in the whole district of the Yukon, to maintain the dignity and the good name of Canada in that remote section, where the people mainly interested are foreigners, before whom it is absolutely essential to maintain that dignity. We balk at $31,000 for that purpose and suggest trimming it by 5 or 10 per cent. Are we to accept stories like this, of wholesale graft, of items—no doubt, infinitely repeated—like that $58,000 in a logging contract on the Island of Vancouver, and do nothing at all about them? If not, what are we to do? I have brought this Canadian National matter before, I think, five of the members of the Canadian National Railway Board. I cannot obtain any results from them.

Hon. Mr. BLAIN: Including the Presilent?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Yes, including the President. The President is the "main squeeze" in it. The President has personally ordered the discontinuance of the investigation in which his investigation department was engaged.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: He has ordered what?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: The discontinuance. He says so in his letter—says that he has ordered it because of Boyd's bad character. The General Manager for the Pacific Coast was asked on the stand the other day: "Do you know anything to the detriment of Captain Boyd's character?" He said: "I know nothing. My relations with Captain Boyd have always been most pleasant." Yet someone allows the President of that road to stigmatize that sailor as a scoundrel, unworthy of belief, in order to protect the real scoundrels with whose operations he has interfered. It seems to me preposterous that conditions of that kind should exist and Parliament should sit silent in the face of them.

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: Who was the agent in charge of the steamships at the time this took place in Vancouver?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: The same person as now. He has been promoted since this took place. His name is Mr. B. C. Keeley. He is an American citizen, I believe.

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: Who was before him?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Mr. B. C. Keeley has bene there ever since we have had the steamships. He is an American gentleman, who did not even do us the compliment of becoming naturalized. He is not yet on the voters' list of the Province of British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: He has not always been the agent for the steamships, has he?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Yes, he is General Agent out there. They call him now the Pacific Coast Manager of the Canadian Government Steamships.

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: Was it not Captain Nicholson?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: He was with the Grand Trunk Service.

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: You do not know how long Mr. Keeley has been there?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Keeley was with the Canadian Northern before the Government took it over.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Can my honourable friend tell us how far back these cases of rascality go?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: My knowledge of them dates from August, 1922, when they were first brought to my attention. I have not endeavoured to go back, nor have I pretended to present a complete case. What I have said to the Investigating Department is that the case that I have presented is in my opinion only a sample of what is going on in the whole service, and I have asked them to examine into other cases.

For instance, to take a minor case, this same "Canadian Farmer," going one day to Wallace's Dock at Vancouver, touched the floating dolphin that protects the ferry slip there. She drifted from the wharf down with the tide and touched this before she was got under control and brought up again. No damage whatever resulted. That floating dolphin is often knocked eight, ten or twelve feet out of line by the ferry coming in and gonig out. It is put there as a guide to the ferry and is left floating so that it may be struck without damage. A bill for $650 was paid for repairing that, when no one connected with the ship knew that any damage had occured, and the owner of the dolphin, which was the Corporation of North Vancouver, was entirely unaware that the dolphin had been damaged. Yet $650 was paid for restoring it to its place, and the next time the ferry came about it would knock it out just as far. That is a sample of what goes on in every possible transaction.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: By whom was the amount paid?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: The insurance was paid by the underwriters.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Who got it?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: I am told that in that case the people who put in the bill were the Wallace Dockyards.

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: We would not have anything to do with that.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Why they should be paid $650—

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Who paid it?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: The insurance company. The Canadian Government Merchant Marine claim on the insurance company.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: That is what I wanted to know.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: The insurance people pay it. The captain knew nothing about this, and the owners of the dock knew nothing about it months afterwards. You may say: "How do these things occur? There must be papers signed." The papers are signed in blank. It is the system of the Company to require their captains to sign their documents in blank. I asked Sir Henry Thornton about that. His reply was, "Absolutely no." At the time I received his reply I had in my possession, as I have to-day, a sample of these very insurance claims, amounting to $8,500. Two months after his dismissal they sent to Captain Boyd the papers for an official report and asked him to sign them in triplicate and return them. On my advice Captain Boyd wrote to them asking them to kindly let him know what the insurance was, and what the damage was, because there were columns for those particulars in the report he was asked to sign. The reply to him was to never mind that, just to leave those blank and sign his name to them, and they would fill them in. Now, when they do that with a man who is out of their employ, asking him to sign in blank a document which may be his own death warrant, and let them fill it in over his signature, what do they do with captains in their employ?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Could the honourable gentleman give us the name of the person who made that request of Captain Boyd?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Yes. I have the correspondence. The name of the person was Captain Finglass, the Assistant Marine Superintendent at Vancouver, who has since left the service. He wrote to Boyd asking him to sign this in triplicate, and wrote back to Boyd, when Boyd asked for the details so that he might fill them in, to never mind the details, but just to sign it.

Hon. Mr. GRIESBACH: May I ask a question which seems appropriate at this point? It is obvious that there is one set of people who are continually out in all these transactions; that is the insurance company. The Merchant Marine does not seem to get very much out of the claims, but the insurance company is always out.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Yes.

Hon. Mr. GRIESBACH: Do they intend doing anything in the matter? How long will they continue to be out? How do they get back their loss? Somebody must pay somewhere.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: They get it back in their premium rate; they make the rate of premium high enough.

While we are on the subject of insurance, let me mention one point that I forgot. There are claims every month for cargo insurance. In the correspondence between Captain Boyd and the Head Office at Montreal he reports time after time the fraudulent nature of those claims. They cannot reflect on him. It is not a matter of his putting the ship on a rock or striking anything; it is a matter of cargo being reported as damaged. I have in my mind, from the correspondence, this sample case. Fifty-eight rolls of paper are found to be slightly discoloured on the edge, from contact with sea water. That is reported to the captain by the mate. They both survey them and say: "Fifty-eight rolls of paper slightly damaged." In the course of time the captain gets an insurance claim to sign, representing the total damage to be 283 rolls. The 58 have grown to 283 in the meantime, and the damage is complete. When the captain takes that matter up with the gentleman presenting it to him and asks him whom he represents, the gentleman answers that he represents the insurance company. "Well," says the captain, "who represents the owners? I want to discuss this with the owners' representative." "Oh," he says, "I represent the owners too." One man representing both sides!

That is the way our business is handled by the Canadian Government Merchant Marine in Californian ports. It was in a Californian port that this occurred. One man represents owners and insurers both, and can make any report he likes and certify to it himself. Boyd reported that to his office—

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: That practice is quite common.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Do I understand any honourable gentleman to dispute that?

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: No, but it is a very ordinary practice.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: A very ordinary practice?

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: Yes.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: And the honourable gentleman, as a guardian of the money of the people of Canada, accepts it as a proper practice?

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: A very ordinary practice.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: It is a very ordinary practice in the Canadian Government Merchant Marine to claim whole damage for 283 rolls—

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: That is not the point. The point is simply that claimants and owners accept the one man at the same time. That is very ordinary.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: No, the point is, we are claiming from the insurance company and paying premium on losses at least three or four times greater than the losses that occur. Does the honourable gentleman consider that a very ordinary practice?

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: No.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: I consider it extraordinary. It is something that should be stopped.

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: I did not say that at all.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Will my honourable friend allow me to ask him a question? He has told us all the facts connected with Captain Boyd, and we are to infer from what he has said that that has happened since the Government took over the operation of the Railways.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Under the Merchant Marine?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The Merchant Marine. What I would like to know is whether the other matters alluded to—for instance, these timber deals and lumber transaction—did not antedate the operation by the Government? Are they not events which took place years ago when the railway was the Canadian Northern Railway and was not under the operation of the Government? I am not speaking now of the Boyd case, because it is evident from the dates given that it is recent.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: The dismissals of Lewis and McLauchlin are quite recent. They are under the Canadian National Railways all right. I could, by searching this file, give the honourable gentleman the exact date, but I cannot do it off-hand.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I have more particularly in mind the transactions connected with the man Labrie, of which my honourable friend spoke.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: The Labrie story, generally, is under the present Administration.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: What years?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: 1923.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Are the events reported against Labrie events which took place in 1923?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Yes. Here is the statement of J. M. Morgan, storekeeper, Port Mann, around the beginning of June last. There are some statements in the file antedating government ownership.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Can the honourable gentleman assure the Senate that this is a reliable copy of a file which belongs to the Canadian National Railways?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: I can assure you in the same way that I can assure you that our Hansard is a reliable copy from the Government Printing Office. I have no absolute means of knowing.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The honourable gentleman said he had a conversation with Mr. Temple in regard to that report of Mr. Watson's.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Yes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Can we infer from that conversation that Mr. Temple knows of that file which my honourable friend has in his hand?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: I do not know that he knows of this file, but he knows of the correspondence.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Because, naturally, I intend to draw the attention of the President of the Railways, and of the Department of Railways, to the remarks of my honourable friend. It is possible that they may search in vain for the official documents of which my honourable friend claims to have copies in his hand.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: What Mr. Temple said to me was: "I am now engaged in the Watson case." That is all I know about Mr. Temple's connection with the Watson case. I had never heard of it when he told me that. I received this file yesterday.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Is there any reason why that file should not be handed in for the purpose of aiding an investigation?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Not the slightest.

Hon. Mr. POPE: That all depends on whether someone is going to steal it or not.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: We could protect ourselves to the extent of asking the honourable gentleman to give a second copy of the documents which he has in hand.

Hon. Mr. POPE: To that I quite agree.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: There is this to be said about the file. It mentions the names of several firms under suspicion of regularly paying commissions to this purchasing agent. I would not like to give publicity to the names of those firms without knowing something about that matter.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend will recognize that in justice to the Canadian National Railway administration—

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: If the honourable gentleman wants the file, he shall have it. I simply suggest that the reason I refrain from reading these names is because I do not want to do an injustice to any person who may be misrepresented. I have no responsibility whatever for this file; and, having read from it, you are entitled to it.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Is it not true that the original of that file is in the hands of Mr. Page?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Oh, yes. It is in the hands of Sir Henry Thornton.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If my honourable friend is sure of the correctness of the copy of the file, that settles the question.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: I would suggest that if Sir Henry Thornton says he has not got this, I would be pleased to send it to him if he will make a copy of it.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Can it be identified in any way, so that the question can be answered by the Department? Is that Mr. Watson's report and appendices?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: What is the date of it.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: The date of his main report is June 27, 1923.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Then there is a second report?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: No, there is a preliminary report of the 17th of March, 1923.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: What is that annexed to the report? Are there no appendices at all?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Yes. A large number of statements, not purporting to be sworn, taken by Mr. Watson and another investigator whose name escapes me for the moment. There are, I suppose, about 20 or 25 statements.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Which were turned in to the Department by Mr. Watson, with his report?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Yes. Here are the names of those who made the statements: D. Thomas; G. Saba; R. F. Gernae; W. H. Fogg; Miss A. E. Morrice; Miss I. J. Roger; A. Crossland; J. H. Morgan; C. J. Quantic; V. L. Lloyd-Owen; Ross White; T. S. Tuxford; re P. Bain; re W. S. Burley; re A. T. Robson; re H. J. Mackin; re T. T. Gadd; A. E. McLaughlin; O. J. Millar; re Mr. Cameron; re Mr. Walton; re J. E. Coney; T. H. White; G. Fortimer; T. R. Macleod; D. O. Lewis; A. B. Grier; E. J. Wakefield; Mrs. MacKinnon; Miss McKay. Then there is a copy of newspaper clippings which I have not got, but which is said to be contained in this file.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Honourable gentlemen, I am sure the country will thank the honourable gentleman from Westminister (Hon. Mr. Taylor) for having brought this matter before the House. When Sir Henry Thornton was appointed to take charge of the Canadian National Railways, I think everybody voiced the hope that he would make a success of them; and at the same time they put him on his guard as to the handling of the combined railways—the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk. I remember very well on more than one occasion referring to things and officials connected with the Grand Trunk Railway. I had hoped that Sir Henry Thornton, after a short sojourn in Canada, would have dispensed with the services of some of the Grand Trunk officials.

Statements were made publicly in this House in this regard. For instance, I said that certain Grand Trunk officials, while in charge of matters of great importance, had allowed and permitted one firm to become the debtor of the railway to the extent of $200,000, and that owing to the failure of this concern not one cent had been received. That sort of advice seems to have been lost on Sir Henry Thornton. Men who must have known of that transaction still grace high positions in the Grand Trunk Railway. It is surprising that Sir Henry Thornton in all the time he has been in Canada has turned a deaf ear to all advisers, and, with a certain amount of bluff and bluster, may I say, has told Parliament and others that he is going to run the Railway just as he pleases. He has been doing that for the past year or so. The public may rail and the newspapers may discuss matters, but what is the result? Sir Henry Thornton is supposed to be above Parliament and parliamentary institutions in this country, and any man who criticizes anything about the handling of the Canadian National Railways is accounted a wrecker of the railway system belonging to this country.

Every member of this House must wish to see this Railway successful; but how is it to be successful? How are the men, from the lowest rungs of the ladder up, to make a success of it if Sir Henry Thornton does what he does? Read the papers of yesterday. Why, the country will stand aghast at the evidence given by Mr. Graham Bell yesterday before the Commission inquiring into the affairs of the Home Bank. It seems extraordinary that Sir Henry Thornton should have been the man who during a critical period in the affairs of the Home Bank should direct that $1,000,000 of the moneys of the Canadian National Railways should be passed over to that Bank so that it might make a good showing at the end of the month. I have not the printed evidence before me, but I have what appears in one of the newspapers. Let us see what it says:

> Mr. Graham Bell says:
> The meeting was held in Sir Henry Thornton's office. Mr. Gough, who, while a director of the railway, was also a director of the Home Bank—I did not know at the time that he was vice-president of the bank—I knew he was a director, and he approached me directly after the meeting and asked, as we were dividing up some of our accounts with different banks (we had taken a couple of new banks into our banking arrangements shortly before this), and on account of the business they were doing, which would be of interest to the railway, he urged that the Home Bank could use some of the money at that moment before the end of the month. He also said that they would have funds coming in at the first of the month and asked if we would not build up a deposit.

What next happened?

> "I told him that I had resigned and I refused to do it. I also told him he would have to see the president. He walked over to the president and the president called me over and said—he was talking to another director—'I am busy, Bell, and if you go into this matter, and if you are satisfied, go ahead with it, and then you can confirm it at the next meeting. You act for me in this."

It is idle to say, even if it was only a million dollars—because that seems to be a mere bagatelle in the sight of Sir Henry Thornton—that he did not know what was happening, because Mr. Graham Bell, being the subordinate, would not take upon himself the responsibility of doing what was done, without consultation with Sir Henry Thornton. Mr. Graham Bell then says this—

The Hon. the SPEAKER: I think I ought to ask the honourable gentleman what that has to do with the motion on the Order Paper.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I am going to give reasons, Sir, why an inquiry should be made into the Department of Marine. Among others, the reasons are these: that, from certain matters which have been laid before the public, it appears highly important that the papers asked for in the motion should be laid before us. I do not know whether this motion is to be permitted to pass or not, and I am going to give the reasons why in this particular matter I wish to see—

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I may say to the honourable gentleman that I have no objection to the motion passing.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Then I am sure the honourable gentleman, in the interest of the country, will quite concur that there should be a discussion in regard to the Canadian National Railways, which are of greater importance than those dealt with in the motion on the Order Paper.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I do not think it would be in order to extend the discussion beyond the bounds of the notice of motion. I do not know what ground it may cover. I looked at the motion on the Order Paper before I came into the Chamber, and I saw that there was no objection to granting what was requested.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Well, honourable gentlemen, I think that anything in connection with this railway can be discussed. I see no reason why it cannot be.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would draw the honourable gentleman's attention to the fact that the railway is not in question at all, but that the motion bears on the steamship Canadian Farmer.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: It is connected with the Canadian National Railways, and so is the matter I am referring to.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Surely my honourable friend will recognize that the administration and operations of the Home Bank are not fit matter to be discussed under this motion.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Then I will take the ground, before I sit down, that I will move an amendment to the motion. I think then I would be in order. This motion does not satisfy me; it does not go far enough. I will move an amendment.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The honourable gentleman ought to indicate the nature of his amendment.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I will indicate it at once:

That in the interests of the Dominion of Canada there should be a committee of this House appointed forthwith to inquire into any matters or complaints connected with the Canadian National Railways which may be brought before it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But my honourable friend surely will have to preface that conclusion by some matters which he desires to investigate, because, under the present motion, there is nothing that needs investigation.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I presume I shall be keeping within the bounds if I state the reasons. In the first place, I think there should be a full and thorough inquiry into the Canadian National Railways by a special committee of this House, because of the fact that the President of the Railway Council advised and promoted a loan of $1,000,000 to the Home Bank in order to buttress up its position at the close of the month, thereby deceiving the people of Canada who were depositors and stockholders in the Bank.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Does not the honourable gentleman believe that it would be far more regular to let this motion pass, and to give notice of a motion bearing on the necessity of an enquiry by this Chamber of a certain nature? Then we would have a substantive motion. Just now my honourable friend is opening a debate which goes far beyond the notice of motion which is on the Order Paper. I think the matter which my honourable friend has in his mind is of sufficient importance to deal with separately.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: If my honourable friend would think for a moment he must admit that the investigation of the Canadian National Railways management is hardly germane to the motion now before the House, and any amendment which might be proposed to the motion must be germane to it. I might be quite disposed to vote for a motion to investigate the administration of the Canadian National Railways, but not as an amendment to this. I might be compelled to vote against this proposed amendment on the ground that it is not germane to the motion.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Then I think there will be no difficulty, with the assistance of my honourable friend and the House generally, in supporting an amendment that this matter, which is smaller, be included in the greater and then all the subjects can be inquired into by a Committee of this House. My honourable friend is well aware of an inquiry in this House which shook Canada to its very centre, the Baie de Chaleurs inquiry.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: And the Canadian Pacific.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Why, then, not deal with matters that relate to the public purse of Canada?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: But it is not germane to this.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend can cover all the ground he pleases; he can take in any single point he wishes; but surely he should do that by a direct notice of motion.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Surely I have now made it direct when I have stated to the House that I will move an amendment to this motion, that there be a special reference to a Committee of the House, and that this matter be included with other matters that may be suggested.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I do not think so.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: The question of the Home Bank deposits is not the only question. There is the Paris Hotel, of most unsavoury reputation, and I propose to inquire how that man with an unpronounceable name was able to take this Government by the throat and get $30,000 out of them.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I might draw my honourable friend's attention to the fact that he is out of order. If he wants to investigate this matter or bring it before the Senate, there is a way by which he can do so.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I am surprised that honourable gentleman who have charge of the Treasury should not open it and expose it to the public gaze by public investigation.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Surely my honourable friend has been long enough a parliamentarian to know the rules that govern the House of Commons as well as the Senate. If he will bring in a charge or make an inquiry there is a simple way of doing this, and I am sure that the Senate will not deny him the right to an inquiry on any matter of public interest. It would take a certain time to do so, and he knows very well that such matters as the Home Bank and the Scribe Hotel will be examined in another place. They can be examined here if it pleases any honourable gentleman and a majority to go into a similar investigation. I will not block the way, but my honourable friend must do it under the rules of the House.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: As I understand the rules of the House there is no objection to my moving an amendment, and that amendment could be couched in these words:

And that in addition thereto there should be added that a Committee of this House inquire into that matter and any other matters that may be submitted to it.

Has the honourable gentleman any objection to that?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have. The motion is that an order of the Senate do issue for a return, and my honourable friend can enlarge this notice of motion by adding to the return which is sought; but to ask for an inquiry into something that is not germane to this motion is not in order.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: If I add these words—

And that an inquiry be made into the facts connected with the matters moved for, by a special committee of the House.

—surely that is not objectionable?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Why not take the other course which is plain, and to which there can be no objection? Some of us will vote against my honourable friend's amendment because it is not germane, who would probably vote for a substantive motion to the same effect. I cannot understand my honourable friend's persisting in violating the rules.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The facts stated by my honourable friend appeal to my mind, and I would be disposed to support a motion such as has been suggested, but I fail to see why the honourable member objects to following the usual rule. I do not think that he makes his amendment germane to the motion which is before the House. Notice may be given for to-morrow, and I would suggest that my honourable friend could make a motion to cover all that he has in his mind. The only objection on this side of the House is that my honourable friend is not proceeding regularly.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Very well, then, I am within the pleasure of the House as to that, and, as the honourable leader of the House assents to the passing of the resolution, I will postpone the remarks I have to make until I have moved the other resolution.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Till after the adjournment?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Yes. I shall not be able to be present to-morrow, and I would like to take part in the discussion of this matter.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I took occasion yesterday to urge that my honourable friend should not insist upon his amendment of last year. I hope that by granting him the postponement for which he asks we shall give him time to be convinced.

INDUSTRIAL INVESTIGATION BY J. C. WATTERS

MOTION FOR RETURN

Hon. Mr. TANNER moved:

That an order of the Senate do issue for a return to include copies of orders and letters of instruction authorizing J. C. Watters, during the present year, to make a survey of Industrial conditions in the coal mining districts of Nova Scotia, and other documents relating to such appointment showing the purpose and scope of investigation and survey to be made by him and the places in Nova Scotia in which he is to make the survey.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: I would like to ask the honourable leader of the Government if Mr. Watters has any engineering experience, or any experience as a surveyor. If the honourable leader is not in a position to answer that question, probably the honourable gentleman to his left (Hon. Mr. Casgrain), who is very capable in this line, can answer it. EXPORT OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I will attend to it.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Yesterday, in the course of the discussion on the motion of the honourable member for New Westminister (Hon. Mr. Taylor), I stated among other things that I intended moving to-day, I think, for a committee of inquiry into the affairs of the Canadian National Railways. When I made that statement I fully realized the consequences of it. Doubtless, throughout the country, in the press supporting the Government, there will be an outcry that this is an attack on the Management of the road, and that such an attack should not be made at the present time, considering the distress of business in Canada. I have not receded from the position I have taken; but the preparation of the motion would involve some work and a good deal of consideration; therefore I do not make the motion to-day. However, on the assembling of the House on the 20th instant I will make a motion for a special committee, couched in the terms that I used yesterday.

BANKRUPTCY BILL

FIRST READING

Bill R3, an Act respecting the application of The Bankruptcy Act, 1919, to the Province of Quebec.—Hon. Mr. Blondin.

GRANDE FRESNIERE-RINFRET JUNCTION BRANCH LINE BILL

FIRST READING

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill 31, an Act respecting the construction of a Canadian National Railway Line between Grande Fresnière and Rinfret Junction, in the Province of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I do not know whether this is the proper time to raise the question, but I should like to draw the attention of the House to the fact that we never get correct information in regard to these Railway Bills. I hope that when this Bill comes up for second reading the leader of the Government will give us some information that can be relied upon. Last Session I asked how much money had been spent on the Long Lac railway, and the answer the leader of the Government gave me was $150,000. This year I asked the same question, and I find that the line was completed within about three months after, and that almost a million and a half had been spent upon it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I do not recall the incident. I do not know whether my honourable friend refers to a question on the Order Paper, in which case the answer I gave him came from the Railway Department, or to a question asked during the discussion of the Bill, when I probably would answer from the information as I found it in the schedule before me. I wonder if the Senate will be disposed to take the same view as my honourable friend, and I would like very much to hear the opinion of the Senate on this point. My honourable friend expresses the hope that when these Bills are brought before the House for second reading all the necessary information will be forthcoming. I beg of him, and of the Senate, not to throw that responsibility upon my shoulders. If it is agreed to refer the Bills to the Standing Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, then I shall have officials of the Canadian National Railways present, with all the documents and data, and my honourable friend or any other member of the Committee will be in a position to obtain direct information. It is of course the right of the Senate to require information of the representative of the Government on the second reading, but I wonder why we should start a discussion on the merits of these Bills before the Committee has reported. It may be satisfied with the explanations given and report favourably, yet a majority of the Senate may differ with the Committee. I would ask my honourable friend to reconsider the advisability of insisting upon information on the seconding reading of the Bills. Personally I would much prefer not to be in the position in which I am at present, of giving information which may be found inexact when we go into Committee. Why take the time of the Senate? The Committee will have direct information from the railway officials, who will be present.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I would like to remind the honourable leader of the Government that last year, on the second reading of these Bills, the question was asked: "How much money has been spent on the Long Lac Railway?" His answer was: "About $150,000." I asked the question this year because I knew that he must be wrong, and he says the line was opened by order of the Board December 24th, 1923; work on the line fully completed; expenditure to January, 1924, $1,518,272.62. This Chamber has been abused throughout this country for stopping the construction of railways. The statement has been spread all over the country that we stopped it. The Long Lac Railway had been practically built when the honourable leader of the Government informed this Chamber that only $150,000 had been spent upon it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would point out that I gave a statement in June, but my honourable friend now carries the expenditure to the 1st of January, 1924. There may be the explanation.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: But the line was opened in December, and the information was given to us in June that $150,000 had been spent.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No, no, no; my honourable friend is mistaken. If he will read again he will find it was December, 1923, or January, 1924.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: "Opened by order of the Board December 24, 1923." That is, the line was built and in operation.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: In December, 1923.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: December, 1923; and in June, 1923, only $150,000 had been spent upon it. The assertion has been made throughout the country that this Chamber was very active in stopping the construction of branch railways. This line had already been practically built, for it was opened three or four months after the honourable leader of the Government gave the information to this Chamber. The information was absolutely wrong and misleading.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That is not so sure.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Certainly. There cannot be anything surer than that, and I desire to request the honourable leader of the Government that when he brings these Railway Bills before this Chamber he will give us accurate information, upon which we may rely. Then the Senate will not be represented as having stopped the construction of all the proposed lines in the country.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend will observe, if he insists upon information on the second reading, that I shall give him just what information I receive from the Deputy Minister, who will be sitting beside me; whereas in Committee it will be possible to cross-examine the Deputy Minister.

Hon. Mr. POPE: I would like to know from the honourable leader of the Government whether the evidence of the Committee is published or not.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: No.

Hon. Mr. POPE: Then we shall still be subject to the same criticism by the public press of both parties throughout Canada, that we have thwarted the development of this country by opposing the proposed measures. There will be no information before the public unless it is given to us on the second reading of the Bill; and I think the people of Canada, as well as honourable members of the Senate, are entitled to the fullest explanation that the honourable leader of the Government can give to us on those Bills, apart from what information we may get in Committee.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am not so sure that the public and the press are not admitted to the meetings of our Standing Committee.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Yes, the press is admitted.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Then information can go out to the public regarding that takes place in our Committee.

Hon. Mr. POPE: If there is not more interest than has been shown by the press of Canada, or if the press is not paid to publish the information, there will not be much of it going out. The press of Canada is a paid institution.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Put it in the Herald.

EXTRA ALLOWANCES TO GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES

INQUIRY

Hon. GEORGE H. BRADBURY rose in accordance with the following notice:

That he will direct the attention of the Senate to the large number of Government employees who draw extra allowances in addition to their salary, and inquire what action, if any, the Government intends to take in the matter.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, the notice that stands in my name on the Order Paper was placed there that I might have an opportunity of drawing attention to a matter of considerable importance to this country. There is considerable difficulty in dealing with this subject, and I realize that it is not a popular one. Anybody who criticises the Public Service in any way is often misunderstood.

My attention was drawn to a return laid on the table of the House by the Government a week or two ago at the request of my deskmate (Hon. Mr. Planta). In looking over that return I was amazed to find the large number of officials who received salaries of considerable amounts from the Government, and in addition allowances which in some cases were almost equal to their salaries.

I am not criticizing the salaries paid to these employees. Speaking now of what was at one time the Northwest Mounted Police, now known as the Royal Canadian Police, I am criticizing the method of keeping the accounts of moneys paid to these men. The Auditor General's report requires a great deal of time and search to find out exactly what each of those men receives from the country, as a system has been in vogue for years in connection with the expenditure of public money which is a camouflage of the amounts that are paid.

I remember my attention was called about a year ago to one case which I will cite in order to show exactly what I mean. I think it occurred in connection with the former Auditor General. According to the public accounts that officer received a salary of $5,000 or $6,000 a year, and the ordinary reader of the Auditor General's report would believe that that was all that this official received; but year after year an amount of $2,000 was voted in the Estimates and paid to that officer as part of his salary.

I want to enter my protest against this system of covering up the amount of money paid out to different officials. The body of men known as the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have a record in Canada equal to that of any other body of men in the world. The old Northwest Mounted Police made that record. Unfortunately the service has been degraded since it has been brought to the eastern part of this country. When the body was brought down here I understood, and still understand, that it was designed for a very special service, and that we would have a body of trained and independent men prepared to cope with any situation which might arise in this country. But our friends, the present Government, have practically taken the teeth out of this splendid force. For instance, not very long ago in Sydney we had a serious state of affairs where a great strike occurred, and valuable property was being destroyed, but the Government refused to send one of those men into that district. The Government apparently capitulated to the demand of the labour interests in this country, and practically refused to allow this splendid body of men to be called in to protect that property. I submit that this is a serious mistake, and if it is going to be continued they had better disband the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, because they will cease to discharge the great and important duty for which they were designed when they were brought to the eastern part of Canada.

I do not desire to take up much time in reading this return. My desire is to have it placed on Hansard, so that every member of this body will have an opportunity of seeing exactly what is being paid to those different men and the method that has been adopted in paying them.

For instance, the Commissioner at Headquarters, Mr. Cortlandt Starnes, has a salary of $5,456.25 (and his allowances amount to $2.506.66, making a total of $7,962.91. The allowances are made up of ration allowance, $584; rent of quarters, $1,320; gas and light, $122.16; coal, $480.50. In addition to these allowances this gentleman has a servant who costs this country I presume $1,300 or $1,400, and he has a chauffeur and a car.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: They all have cars, I think.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: I do not know. My point is that if this Commission calls for such salaries and allowances, then in the interests of everything that is decent in the way of keeping public accounts the men ought to be paid a straight salary so that the people would know exactly what they were getting.

I now come to the next, Mr. Worsley, Assistant Commissioner. I find his salary is $2,855.25, and his allowances $2,113.40, making a total of $4,969.65.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Has he got a car too?

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: No, apparently he has no car. Then the Superintendent's salary is $2,956.25 and his allowances $1,508.76 making a total of $4,465.02.

Superintendent Cawdron's salary is $2.956.25 and his allowances $1,508.87, made up of ration allowances, $292; rent of quarters, $840; gas and light, $111.12; coal, $265.

S. M. Fraser has a salary of $2,656 and allowances $1,444, making a total of $4,100, made up of ration allowance, $292; rent of quarters, $720; gas and light, $121; coal, $311.

The whole list of those officers is made up in the same way. Many of them are permanent men here, who have been living in Ottawa for many years, just in the same position as those in the Civil Service to-day.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: When did they commence to draw those allowances?

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: I do not know. It makes no difference to me whether this system has been going on for one or ten years.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I thought it was something new.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: I am pointing out the position of the matter, and asking the Government if it will not cease to camouflage the payments made to employees of the Government.

Now, gentlemen, I would ask that this return be placed on record on the Hansard without my taking up the time of the House to read it.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Those allowances are in lieu of barracks, which would cost much more.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: I want to point out also that there are about 1,100 men on the Mounted Police force, and I find that they have 40 civilians in Headquarters here conducting the acairs of that body, and in addition to those they have 70 uniformed men in the same office, making a total of 110 clerks to take care of 1,100 men. Now, everybody knows that that is hardly the strength of an ordinary battalion whose clerical work is done entirely at the Orderly room by a sergeant under an adjutant and four or five clerks; yet we find 110 men to do this work. I am simply drawing the attention of the Government to this fact so that something may be done to remove what seems to be a very great overlapping in this service.

I understand there are only twenty-seven men here in barracks, and that all the officers whose names I have read—and I have read only a very small portion of them—are required here at headquarters to look after the few men that are here and the others that are out on duty. Two hundred and twenty-nine of those men have been converted into what has taken the place of the old Dominion Police. I want to enter my protest against the practice of paying men who might be called military men, or semi-military men, if you will, salaries and allowances while here at headquarters. If they were in the field, of course they would be entitled to a portion of this amount for allowances, but many of these men reside right here in the city of Ottawa and there is absolutely no excuse for their drawing down these allowances.

In addition to that, I find a return from the Militia Department which contains similar objectionable information. I maintain that it is objectionable that any set of men in Ottawa who are practically civil servants, if they are anything, should receive these allowances. If you look over the list you will find that some of them draw very heavy allowances. I am going to read the names of two or three as an example. Major Armstrong, temporary Colonel, receives a salary of $4,200; he draws an allowance in lieu of public quarters—that means for his house—of $500; he draws in lieu of rations $200; and he draws a married man's allowance of $400. That amounts to $1,100 in addition to this salary of $4,200. I am not criticizing the total amount of money he is receiving, if he is entitled to it; but I ask the Government to make it plain, so that any man who picks up the Auditor General's Report can tell exactly what these men are receiving. Major Brown draws $4,400 in salary; he receives $500 in lieu of quarters; $200 in lieu of rations, and $400, married man's allowance. That is a total of $5,500.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: Do they have cars?

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: Not as far as I know. I have not the return that refers to that. I do not think they have.

Now, honourable gentlemen, I would ask that this return be placed on Hansard so that everyone may know exactly what these men are drawing from the country. I wish to emphasize as strongly as I can the objectionable features of this whole business, namely, the apparent attempt to cover up the amount of public money that is paid out to different men. The system is a vicious one and ought to be done away with; and I would respectfully ask the leader of the Government to call the attention of the Government to the facts, and to see if conditions cannot be remedied. While doing that, I think it would be well if he would point out the condition of the Headquarters Staff of the Mounted Police here in this city. The idea that it requires 110 officials, in addition to the officers, to care for the business of 1,100 men is preposterous, and I think there is room for some great change in this connection. With the permission of the House I will hand in this document with the understanding that it is to go on record.

In conclusion I may just say that there are some cars mentioned in connection with the Mounted Police. I find that the Commissioner is allowed a sedan and that he has a chauffeur. Anybody who knows anything about the old Mounted Police knows that they were a credit to Canada. All the members had horses. No doubt the men here now have horses also. As I said before, there are 27 men in barracks here, and I am told that there are fifty or sixty horses so some of these horses must be for the detachment that is supposed to be in Ottawa but that is doing duty elsewhere. I would not mention these things if it were not for the reasons given for having them. One of the reasons advanced is that the motors might assist in conveying gold from the Mint up to the Parliament Buildings. If it is necessary to take charge of the gold that comes from the Mint to this building, surely a mounted escort would be more in keeping than four or five men in cars.

Hon. W. A. GRIESBACH: Honourable gentlemen, I feel that I ought to offer a few observations with respect to the remarks of my honourable friend. I was born and brought up with the Mounted Police, and I think I may claim to know something about that force. My honourable friend has stated, and he has repeated the statement a number of times, that his purpose in bringing this matter to the attention of the House is to correct a form of accounting which he suggests is misleading to the public and constitutes a sort of camouflage as to the amounts paid to certain persons in the public service. Well, if that is so, it has been the practice of the Auditor General for so many years that the memory of man runneth not to the contrary. My honourable friend is seeking to put upon Hansard these amounts, and I suspect—although I may be wrong—that his purpose is not so much to call the attention of the House to an impropriety in accounting as to bring to the attention of the House the matter of the allowances and the pay involved.

In dealing with these allowances, it ought to be said on behalf of these officers that, upon joining the force, they are by regulation entitled to certain remuneration which of necessity in a military force, and more particularly in such a force as the Mounted Police, is partly in cash and partly in kind. There is a historical reason for that. In the old days when the Mounted Police were organized, money was of little value in purchasing housing, light, heat, water, food and so forth. To-day in some parts of the country covered by the activities of the Mounted Police these things are of great value; in other places they are of less value; but always of importance. An officer or man on joining the Mounted Police is therefore paid so much in cash, and is supplied by the Government, according to contract, with light, heat, water, food and housing. That has always been the rule. These men, by the very nature of their contract with the Government, are required, upon receiving orders, to serve wherever they are sent.

To meet these fluctuating conditions the policy has been, and must be, that everywhere the pay shall remain the same, according to rank, but that a man shall receive that which the Government has promised to give him. A man is brought say from Prince Albert to serve here in Ottawa. Usually that is a promotion. Surely a man with twenty-five years' service and a growing family, upon promotion to the Headquarters Staff in Ottawa, ought not to be penalized because of his promotion. The Government must provide him with the same pay he was getting in Prince Albert, and must compensate him for the difference between what it costs to live in Prince Albert and what it costs to live here. For this reason, when we find that in Prince Albert he would be entitled to a house, surely he is entitled to a house here. The Government have no houses here to give him, so they give him rent instead. In Prince Albert he would be entitled to light, heat, and rations. The Government have none of those things here, therefore they must give him money.

Allowances fluctuate in the different parts of the country; they are very much greater in the Yukon than elsewhere; and where the Government have their own stores and buildings there are no allowances at all. In such places as Lethbridge and Edmonton there are no allowances because the buildings are there and rations are supplied; but when these men are brought to a place like Ottawa, where the Government have none of these things, they must be supplied in the same kind, the same manner, and the same style as they were entitled to in the place from which they came.

What difference does it make to the country, what difference does it make to any intelligent man, whether the whole amount is lumped and called salary, or whether it is shown as allowances? It makes a vast difference to the men on the Mounted Police, because the salaries, according to rank, remain the same. As it has been, so it must be. Members of this House, or those who read the Auditor General's Report, must approach the matter in view of the facts, and with the intelligence that God has given them to understand these differences.

A few of my honourable friend's observations call for reply. My honourable friend has made one or two statements, of which he is not so sure, and he has been inclined to speculate with regard to them. I am bound to tell my honourable friend that with respect to some of these matters he does not know what he is talking about. He spoke of a civilian staff here in Ottawa. I was not able to catch the honourable gentleman's figures. That civilian staff consists largely of female stenographers, filing clerks and clerks of that description, who are employed in the Headquarters office. He draws an analogy. He says the Mounted Police Force consists of 1,100 men, and that that is about the strength of a battalion, and that a battalion is managed by a staff consisting of the adjutant and a few clerks. There is all the difference in the world between a battalion in camp or in barracks—a battalion of soldiers, mark you, not policemen—and a force of 1,100 men scattered from coast to coast and from the southern boundary almost to the North Pole, in small packages and parcels of from one to a dozen men. My honourable friend thinks this staff is engaged in running the Mounted Police. Perhaps not much more than the staff of a battalion is engaged in running the Mounted Police as a force. Much of their job must consist in shipping stores and supplies to all parts of Canada, largely by means of dog trains and ships, and over impossible routes, and at stated seasons of the year. That is a big job. But I say that comparatively few men on this staff of 170 are engaged in that work.

What is the work of that staff? The staff controls, for instance, the Department of Criminal Investigation, involving the whole system of finger-print identification for the whole of Canada; the Department is also charged with the enforcement of the Narcotic Drug laws; and the whole of the Secret Service of Canada is in the hands of this Department. And yet my honourable friend complains that 170 people are too many. Let my honourable friend walk down to the building where they are housed, and he will find them in one of the worst buildings in Ottawa; he will find that they, with their valuable records extending far back over a period of fifty years, and with their whole finger-print establishment and system for criminal identification, are housed in a building which is a fire trap and apt to burn to the ground any moment. They are housed in a building where the ventilation is so bad that a good deal of illness grows out of it; where a great work is being done by a great force, at the least possible cost, and with the greatest possible energy, the greatest possible effort, and the greatest possible success.

Now, with respect to these other suggestions for improvements which my honourable friend has made as to the best method of protecting public buildings—such a valuable suggestion, for instance, as that the Mint and other buildings should be protected by mounted men—such a thing was never heard of.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: I did not say that.

Hon. Mr. GRIESBACH: What did the honourable gentleman say?

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: The honourable gentleman ought to know: he has been taking notes. If my honourable friend had been listening he would know; he told me a moment ago I did not know what I was talking about, but I am not going to retaliate in kind. What I said was that when they were removing gold from the Mint to the Parliament Buildings a mounted escort would be better than placing men in a car.

Hon. Mr. GRIESBACH: It does not make any difference. My point is this. My honourable friend has undertaken to assist these high salaried gentlemen by telling them how they should carry out the work which they have been doing for the last fifty years. He offers the suggestion that the gold should be protected by mounted men, and not by men in a car. That is a matter of Police procedure. I cannot express any opinion on it myself, but I have grave doubt that the opinion of my honourable friend is of greater value than the opinion of the gentlemen who are charged with that duty.

With regard to the whole matter, let me say again that I think my honourable friend has sought rather to put before the House the salaries and allowances, and comment thereon, rather than to complain about the system of accounting which has been in effect ever since the Mounted Police or any military force was organized, and which, in the very nature of things, will probably continue to the end of time.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, I confess that it was hardly possible for me to bring to my honourable friend from the Government an answer to the question that he put, because I did not know the ground he intended to cover by it. I have no doubt that, even without my transmitting a copy, his remarks will be read in the Department of Justice, because the Mounted Police are under the direction of the Minister of that Department. I desire simply to question the propriety of placing on record now the return which I have brought to the House. I will tell my honourable friend why. We have at present sitting a Commission on Civil Service, before which the heads of all departments or branches will be heard. My honourable friend being a member of that Committee, will have an opportunity to satisfy himself as to the reason for the method which has been followed since the establishment of the Mounted Police. If the Committee makes some recommendation for the improvement of the accounting, the matter will then properly come before the Senate. If my honourable friend were to insist upon this report being published now, it would single out a whole body of men; whereas, after hearing their chief and the Deputy Minister of Justice, he may conclude that the procedure has been quite regular and in accordance with contracts which they made individually with the Government.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: Honourable gentlemen, I am not going to enter into any further discussion. My view was that it might be of assistance to have a record showing the allowances as they are. My great objection is against the manner in which the items are published in the Auditor General's Report. The purpose in publishing that report is, I presume, that the ordinary layman may be able by examining it to tell exactly what the different public services are costing the country. Now, I defy, I will not say, any man, but the ordinary man, to ascertain by examining that report what any one of those men is getting in pay and allowances. He will learn the exact salary, but the allowances are so scattered that it is very difficult for the ordinary man to ascertain what they are. I protest that it is not in the public interest to pay out money in such a way that the public cannot tell how it is disbursed.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend's statement is, I think, clear enough to make his point. I may say that, apart from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the Militia of Canada, the desire of the Government has been to discourage the payment to civil servants of more than one salary. It has been the expressed desire to lump together whatever the civil servant is to receive. This it may be impossible to apply to the Militia or the Mounted Police. I suggest to my honourable friend that, having stated his laudable desire that there should be but one figure, he may obtain in the Civil Service Committee such information as will satisfy him that these departments cannot come under the general rule.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: May I ask my honourable friend if the document which is being discussed is a response to a motion for a return?

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: Yes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: I do not know what the practice in the Senate has been, but in another Chamber returns brought down for discussion or for the information of the House are never placed on Hansard. I can conceive that to adopt such a practice would make Hansard infinitely more bulky than it is. One return may be very short and take up only a page, but another may be very long and require 20, 30 or 40 pages. The returns made by the Government, I think, go to the Committee on Printing, and the Committee decides whether the document is to be printed or not. For my part I would much prefer, if the return required to be printed, to have it printed in such a form that it could be referred to easily, rather than have it incorporated in Hansard of either the Senate or the Commons. I think we shall go a long distance if we undertake to place a return on Hansard for any one member, because then we cannot refuse to do likewise for another and Hansard will become unwieldly, if not impossible.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I wish to say just a few words on this question, to object to the printing and publishing of one-sided statements on the Civil Service. It seems to me it is not at all fair to the Service, and it is not fair to the public, because they show only one side of the medal. We have, as stated by the honourable gentleman to my right (Hon. Mr. Dandurand), a Committee appointed by this House for the purpose of looking at both sides; and until this examination has been made it is undesirable to publish these statements, which are not wholly reliable, as they show only one side. On this ground I think the House should refuse my honourable friend's (Hon. Mr. Bradbury's) request to have them published. The practice of the Senate is exactly the same as in another place, and I think the Printing Committee will not have the return printed unless specially directed by the House to do so.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: Honourable gentlemen, in view of the opinion that has been expressed regarding the placing of this return on Hansard, I will not press the matter. At the same time I would like to point out to my honourable friend from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt, that no reflection was made in any way on the Civil Service by anything I said. I was reflecting on the system and on the manner in which these accounts are kept. However, as has been pointed out, there is a Committee sitting and we may perhaps obtain the desired information.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: I understand it is the pleasure of the House that the documents be not placed on Hansard.

The report further stated that it was desirable so far as might be practicable to avoid the possibility of a recurrence of similar conditions and that it was in the public interest that an inquiry be made into the cause of such industrial unrest and the circumstances which occasioned the calling out and the retention of the Militia in aid of the civil power in connection with the same.

DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from May 1 consideration of the motion of the Hon. Mr. Turriff:

1. That in the opinion of the Senate it is advisable in the interest of economy and good Government to reduce the number of Senators by one third, viz., from ninety-six to sixty-four Members.

2. That this reduction should be effected by not filling any vacancy that may occur in the number of Senators representing a province until that number has been reduced by one third, except in the senatorial division consisting of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, as to which division special provision as to the distribution of the reduction will be required.

3. That in each appointment of a Senator made under the decreased representation it shall be provided that the Senators shall automatically retire on attaining the age of.....years.

Hon. F. B. BLACK: Honourable gentlemen, I do not intend to spend much time in discussing this motion; in fact the matter has been postponed so many times that any thoughts I had have been somewhat dissipated.

I have in my hand three newspapers published in three different portions of the Dominion of Canada, and in all those papers I read articles written by different people who were independent, not politicians, speaking before public gatherings which were not political, and all voicing practically the same sentiments. I am going to read one of these articles to illustrate what I mean. This is copied from a paper printed in London, Ontario, dated May 2nd, and contains an extract from an address given by Mr. W. F. Morgan-Dean before the Kiwanis Club. He says, in part:

Canada is the only Anglo-Saxon country in the world that is still paying the peak of taxation and that has not substantially reduced the national debt.

Canada is the most over-governed country on the face of the globe. Members and Cabinet Ministers, Senators and Speakers at Ottawa drew salaries exceeding $1,585,000 last year, while the total wage bill for 39,200 civil servants in 1923 exceeded $50,000,000. There is Government machinery in Canada sufficient to govern a nation of more than five times the country's population.

It seemed to me exceedingly strange that in three parts of Canada distant from each other in one case 500 miles and in another 1,200 miles, three people speaking on the same evening, having no political affiliation so far as we know, should give utterance to practically the same sentiments. It convinced me, and must convince every man, that there is a real desire in the minds of the people of Canada to-day for economy. It is this sentiment that I read in every paper I pick up, I hear in very conversation, and I listen to in trains, in public stores, and in city clubs. The demand for economy is constant and insistent.

Now, looking at this resolution before the House, the first section reads:

That in the opinion of the Senate it is advisable in the interest of economy and good Government to reduce the number of Senators by one third, viz., from ninety-six to sixty-four Members.

This section stresses two things—economy and good government. As to the first, the proposal as to reform is somewhat ambiguous and incomplete. My contention is that any question of alteration in the composition or status of this Chamber should come from the Government, and should have coupled with it a similar measure of reform in another legislative body which sits in this building. I am too new in this Chamber to attempt to offer any defence of this body; but it needs no defence, for one cannot read the history of Canada since Confederation without finding ample justification for the existence of this body, and a full demonstration of its value and necessity to this country.

As to the particular question of economy which is stressed in this motion before the House, I am in accord with any and every suggestion which means economy without undue sacrifice of efficiency; but I am bound to say that any suggested economy there may be in this resolution is so small that it is scarcely of interest to this body, and is of very little interest to the country as a whole.

Just before and at the time of the opening of this House there was a great deal of talk from the Government and its supporters about economy. The party press sent forth the word that salaries were to be reduced, staffs cut down, deadwood eliminated from all departments, public expenditures reduced to the minimum; in short, that a period of real economy was to be inaugurated by this Government. Parliament met, and for a few days the air was filled with the promises of savings here and savings there; but for the last few weeks we have heard absolutely nothing from the Government or its supporters.

It seems to me that the air of Ottawa is not encouraging to economists. This is a Civil Service city; the business houses are supported by the pay cheques of those working in government offices; the newspapers depend on the advertising from the merchants who do business because of those pay cheques; hence there is naturally strong opposition by press and public in the city of Ottawa to even a suggestion of reform that carries with it any reduction in the number of public servants residing in the city. This sentiment is so noticeable that one wonders if it may not affect both government and legislators.

But the sentiment which is expressed by the newspapers in this city, and the sentiment one meets on the streets of Ottawa, is not he felling in the country at large. Never in Canadian history has there been such a demand for real economy. Never has it been so easy for a Government to refuse public expenditures for wharfs, post offices, custom houses and other undertakings. Never has a government had such an opportunity to conserve the resources of the country without offence to the people. Why? Because the people of Canada have learned by bitter experience the meaning of a public debt and of yearly interest charges. They are paying through the nose by direct and indirect taxation to such an extent that business is stagnant, and the people are leaving our farms and offices.

I want to take this opportunity to suggest to the mover of this resolution and to the leader of the Government in this Chamber certain reforms whereby very large sums of money would be saved; and I want to substantiate my statements by reading to the House a few figures. It is true that these figures have been put before this Chamber and before the public in various ways. Some six months ago I had occasion to go into this question, speaking at a public meeting in New Brunswick, before there had been as much talk in the press and by the public as there has been of late; and I want to take the opportunity of saying here, where I can speak with some responsibility, just what I said before I came to this House.

Economy, like charity, should begin at home. If we are going to reduce the salaries of the Civil Service or any other employees of the Government, it seems to me it is only proper that we should begin at the head and go down. Suggestions have been made in this House and in another Chamber that this country is over-governed, that we have too many Ministers. I quite agree with that, and the country as a whole agrees with that. It is pretty generally conceded that with 13 portfolios we could carry on the business of this country with as much efficiency and more expedition and economy than with 18, as at present.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Have we 18?

Hon. Mr. BLACK: Well, there are 18 Departments. We could reduce those very well to 13. If we did that we could remove 5 Ministers of the Crown, and in my opinion give the remaining ones enough work to keep them busy and interested, and also save that much money.

Suppose we did away with 5 portfolios, there would be a saving of $10,000 each, or $50,000. That would eliminate 5 Departments. Suppose, however, that we simply cut out the cost of three Departments. Last year the cost of the Department of the Secretary of State was $203,000. No reasonable man will suggest for a moment that we have any real use for the position of Secretary of State in Canada. As to the Solicitor-General, somebody may know what he really has to do, but personally I have never yet had an intelligent answer as to any real cause for the existence of that Department in the Government of Canada.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: To let people out of the penitentiary.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: He gives tickets-of-leave.

Hon. Mr. BLACK: It is a generous department in some respects, but it cost the country last year $100,000. Then we have the Department of Railways and Canals. Before the formation of the Railway Commission this Department was one of the most important and necessary in the Government; but to-day it is a mere figurehead so far as the position is concerned, and it could very readily be absorbed in one of the other departments. That department cost the Dominion $205,000 last year. The expense of operating those three departments, amounting to $508,000, could be saved altogether. The other two departments could perhaps be abolished, but they might be required to carry on with less expense the necessary work.

Next, we come to the Ministers' salaries, and the indemnities to members of Parliament and members of this House. I do not say for one moment that a member of Parliament or a member of this House receives too much salary. I do not think they do. I further want to say that I think the members of Parliament and Senate receive very much less in proportion to the time they give and work they do than do the members of the legislatures throughout the various provinces of this country.

Nevertheless, if we are going to act with sincerity and with a desire to set an example to the people of Canada, to prove that economy is absolutely necessary, I think the proper thing to do is to suggest a reduction in the payment we ourselves receive. I would suggest that there be a 20 per cent cut in the salaries of all the Ministers that we have. Suppose we cut the list down to 13; 20 per cent cut would be $2,000 each, or $26,000 saved there. Then we have 235 members sitting in another Chamber, and by that same cut we could save $188,000 a year, and by a similar reduction in the payments to members of this Chamber we would save $76,000 a year.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: To what number would the honourable gentleman reduce the House of Commons?

Hon. Mr. BLACK: I would not reduce the number at all. I would simply reduce the indemnity 20 per cent. We listened to a very interesting address from the honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross) in which he made the very pertinent suggestion that the judges of this country were receiving more than the present financial condition of this country warrants. I quite agree with him. If the suggested cut were made in the salaries of the judges that are paid by the Dominion of Canada, there would be a saving of $400,000 a year there.

There is another direction in which we could save a good deal of money, and which I very strongly recommend to the leader of the Government in this House. Last year we paid for rentals alone in the city of Ottawa $678,000, not including upkeep. If the Civil Service were reduced to the same standard and the same number of employees as we had in 1914-15, the first year of the war, the vast majority of the buildings we are now renting in the city of Ottawa would not be required. There is no sensible reason why that sum of $678,000 should not be reduced by at least $500,000. A reasonable exercise of economy, a sensible looking after housing conditions, using the buildings the government already own, and doing away with rentals which we do not require, would effect this saving.

Then we go on to those buildings which are rented by the Government in cities like Montreal, Toronto, St. John, Halifax, Winnipeg and Vancouver, and smaller cities and towns in this Dominion. Most of those buildings are rented; some of them are used, and some are not. Buildings owned by the Government are only half utilized. Another $500,000 could surely be saved by a careful business scrutiny of the buildings rented by the Government outside of the city of Ottawa. In other words, it is a simple matter of using ordinary business intelligence to save $1,000,000 in rentals yearly to the people of Canada. I do not think the present Government is responsible for this state of affairs; I think it is an inheritance of both governments.

At this late hour I do not intend to go into the question of Civil Service, but if that service were put back to the basis of 1914-15, comparing the cost of the Civil Service in that year and to-day, there would be a saving of a little over $15,000,000. According to the figures given in the Blue Books the total is considerably more than that; but taking into account the increased cost of living and the necessary increase that must be paid to Civil Servants so that they may live comfortably, there would still be a saving there to the people of Canada of $15,000,000.

These figures which I have given so far amount to $17,248,000.

Now, I want to come to another very fertile field for saving, and that is the Canadian National Railways. Last year there were 99,520 people employed in the Canadian National Railways, according to the railway returns brought down a few days ago. The total amount of salaries paid was $140,515,907. The average pay of the railway employees was, I find, $1,510. The average pay is not high; undoubtedly some people are getting a great deal too much, but the ordinary man I think is not getting a bit too much. I would suggest to the leader of the Government in this House, and through him to the Government, that the same cut which I proposed in regard to Ministers and members of the Senate or of the House of Commons should be applied to the employees of the Canadian National Railways, who are receiving over $3,000 a year. They are employees of the Dominion of Canada. If you take those men in the Canadian National railways who are receiving from $3,000 up to $50,000 a year and make a moderate cut of 20 per cent in their salaries, you will save to this country something over $15,000,000.

If you add that $15,000,000 to the $17,248,000 which we had before, there would be a saving of $32,248,000—a very considerable sum, and one which would go a very long way towards making the people of this Dominion think that there was really some economy in the air at Ottawa, and that some time the enormous burden of taxation would be brought to an end. It would give to the business of this country an impetus that nothing else will, because it would lead those engaged in business to believe that some time they might venture on new developments without all the profits being taken to pay interest on our rapidly increasing capital debt.

There is another suggestion which will be discussed later by members of this House. If any honourable gentleman in this Chamber, or the other, will take the Estimates and go over the proposed expenditures he must be a very poor financier and a very credulous man who cannot put his finger on expenditures amounting to $50,000,000 which are not needed and for which there is no warrant. Time was when we had no debt: we had no debt in this country before the war. Time was when we had no taxation: there was no real taxation before the war. In those days the country could afford frills and furbelows, and could build wharves and post offices where they were not needed, and could put magnificent customs houses where very small buildings would have answered. But that time has gone by, and I suggest to the Government that if they will very seriously consider the Main Estimates before the supplementaries come down—because when they come down I have no doubt another $30,000,000 or $40,000,000 will be provided for—they will find an additional $50,000,000 which can be saved.

While those savings are entirely within the province of the legislature of the Dominion of Canada, I want to say, honourable gentlemen, that if we seriously put our shoulders to the wheel and really decide to effect reasonable economies, which would save $82,000,000 in one year to this country, the effect would be enormous. If the Canadian National railways, reduce the pay of their ninety odd thousand employees—and they can do it, because the railway men are reasonable men who, if they see that the rest of the people of Canada are economizing will be willing I have no doubt to do their share—then the Canadian Pacific railway would do the same thing, and naturally would be very glad to do it. That would be another demonstration of economy to the people of Canada. If the members of the two Chambers of Parliament decided to reduce their own salaries, what would be the effect on the legislators of the various provinces? There would be a similar reduction in the salaries or indemnities paid to the members of the various legislatures, and in that way $4,000,000 would be saved to the people of Canada. Such a movement could not be resisted; public opinion would be so strong that the reduction would have to be made. The same spirit would spread all over the Dominion of Canada, and it would become necessary for the provincial Governments to cut down their staffs and to reduce unnecessary expenditures. The result of such a policy as I have suggested would mean that instead of a saving of some $82,000,000, there would be saved to the taxpayers of Canada over $100,000,000 yearly.

So far as the country is concerned, for the first time in my life the people are ready for economy. It is true that members have been willing to see economics made in other directions, but have wanted all they could get themselves; but to-day they do not want it quite as badly as usual, and are not insisting quite as vociferously as they have done, because they know that if they did they would be committing a crime against the taxpayers of Canada.

That, honourable gentlemen, is all I have to say with regard to the motion introduced by the honourable gentleman from Assiniboia (Hon. Mr. Turriff) for the reform of this Chamber. I am quite aware that I have gone beyond the particular field that he suggested; but my justification is the fact that in his motion he emphasized economy and good Government. We can only have economy and good Government in this country by reducing our overhead expenses; by doing away with the pork barrel, by eliminating unnecessary expenditures and getting down to the condition in which every business man in Canada finds himself to-day, where he has cut down overhead and living expenses, has done away with extra automobiles, whether used for business or pleasure, and has got down to the bare necessities in an endeavour to carry on until such time as business conditions improve and allow him to go on and develop. Such a policy is more necessary in the Government of the country that it is in a private corporation, and the only way in which this Government will get back to level ground will be by exercising that common business sense that is used by the business houses of this country.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The honourable gentleman has suggested that the two large railway systems should reduce all salaries in excess of $3,000, by say 15 or 20 per cent. I did not notice that the honourable gentleman applied the same suggestion to the Civil Service.

Hon. Mr. BLACK: I mentioned the fact that putting the Civil Service back on the basis of 1914-15 would save $15,000,000. I did not suggest any particular reductions because there is a Committee of this House which has the question before it, and being a member of that Committee, I thought I had better not suggest any reductions in that regard.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Dandurand, the debate was adjourned.

DAYLIGHT SAVING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, I do not know whether the House of Commons has adopted the advanced time.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, Daylight Saving time.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The city of Ottawa has advanced the clock an hour, I understand, and I suppose we may do likewise.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Our clock is already ahead.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Then we will sit to-morrow at 3 o'clock by the advanced time.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at 3 p.m., daylight saving time.

DIVORCE BILL

FIRST READING

Bill Y3, an Act for the relief of Evelyn Eira Awrey.—Hon. Mr. Smith.

EXTRA ALLOWANCES TO GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: I rise to a question of privilege. An item appears in this morning's Ottawa Journal under the title, "On the Hill Day by Day." It says:

Then followed Senator Murphy with the idea that certain Government employees were living on the scale of Senators—drawing salaries and allowances at the same time.

Honourable gentlemen will remember that last night a discussion of the Civil Service and the Militia was initiated by a worthy member of this Chamber, and was attacked from the other side of the House. Honourable gentlemen will bear me out in saying that I had nothing at all to say in the matter; and I only wish the credit to go where it is due.

Hon. Mr. BRADBURY: I sincerely hope that some day the honourable gentleman will be able to take credit for doing something.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: This is not a serious matter, but as it takes credit from a brother Senator and gives it to me, in justice to that gentleman's prowess I think it is only right that I should bring it to the attention of the Senate.

SUNNYBRAE-GUYSBOROUGH RAILWAY

INQUIRY

Hon. Mr. TANNER: I wish to direct the attention of the leader of the House to an inquiry on the Order Paper in regard to the Guysborough and Sunnybrae railway which has been standing since the 29th of April. I want to be as patient as I can in regard to this information, and I readily acquit my honourable friend of any responsibility for the delay; at the same time, I want to point out to him, and I hope he will point out to the responsible persons, that the questions asked are based upon an official statement which is quoted at the beginning of the inquiry. If my honourable friend will look at the quotation he will see that this is so. The position, therefore, as I see it, is this: The person or persons who compiled the official statement which has been submitted to Parliament either knew or did not know what they were reporting; and if they knew what they were reporting, they should be competent to answer my questions, and answer them promptly; if they did not know, they should not have made the statement at all.

This is not a new matter. The Guysborough-Sunnybrae Railway is one which, to my personal knowledge, has been in course of construction for from thirty to thirty-five years. The first time I had the honour of being elected to the legislature of Nova Scotia, in 1894, it was publicly announced in that province that the road was being constructed—the Government newspapers announced that it was actually under construction. During every election after that time —and I contested many—that railway was being built. The Government of Nova Scotia, to my personal knowledge, has expended at least $100,000 in laying out experimental, exploratory and location surveys. I have been through the district of the Garden of Eden, and Sunnybrae, and East River St.

Mary's when farmers could hardly do their work for location pegs. I am not speaking of anything I have read; I have seen them with my own eyes.

If this is going to be a railway with wooden cross-beams and steel rails, upon which passenger trains are to run, well and good, I want to give the proposition fair consideration, and want to have a knowledge of it; on the other hand, if it is to be an election hot-air railway, I want to know it. In nine or ten elections I have run against the hot-air railway. Now I want to know what we are going to have, and I should like the gentlemen who prepared this official statement and sent it to Parliament, and who profess to know all about it, to answer the few simple questions which I have submitted. I have waited nearly a month for an answer, and I think I have waited long enough; and I would respectfully ask the leader of the Government to suggest to these gentlemen of the National railways that they should disclose the information without any further delay.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: This morning, in looking over the Order Paper and finding only the question of my honourable friend, I felt some pride at having almost cleared the Order Paper. I telephoned to the Railway Department in hopes of getting an answer to the honourable gentleman's question this afternoon. I confess that I had not read the matter contained in the inquiry, and was not altogether familiar with it as my honourable friend does not always read his notices loud enough for us to hear them on this side of the House. Now that I know that he is very much interested in this question, I will try again to obtain an answer.

Hon. Mr. TANNER: I am not finding fault with my honourable friend at all, but with the people who know or who do not know.

WINNIPEG UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

INQUIRY

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I would like to ask the leader of the Government if he can give the House any information as to whether it is the intention of the Government to pay to the city of Winnipeg what is justly due on account of unemployment relief expenses incurred in 1922-23. I understand that every other city has been paid.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would suggest that my honourable friend put a question on the Order Paper, so that I may be armed with some data.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That will be a good way of delaying it.

INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES BILL

CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE POSTPONED

On the Order:

Commitee of the Whole House on Bill 7, an Act to amend the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, 1907.—Hon. Mr. Dandurand.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I move that we go into Committee.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The honourable gentleman from Welland, the ex-Minister of Labour (Hon. Mr. Robertson), is very much interested in this Bill, and having been called away to the United States on an important engagement, he has asked me to request the House to have this Bill stand over until the beginning of the week. I presume my honourable friend will have no objection to that.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: We will put it down for Tuesday next.

The Order was postponed.

TICKET-OF-LEAVE BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. SMEATON WHITE moved the second reading of Bill A2, an Act to amend the Ticket of Leave Act.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, in moving the second reading of this Bill, I would like to put a note on record as to the meaning of the term "ticket of leave" as originally understood.

This term was first invented in the days of Australian transportation. In the English penal system a document or pass was handed to a convict who had completed the second stage of his sentence and was about to enter his third and last stage, that of conditional liberty or semi-freedom in which he went at large to earn his own livelihood as a more or less independent member of the State. The ticket of license was the outward sign of remission gained by industry and blameless conduct in prison, and had to be forfeited for disobedience or neglect of certain conditions shown on his license.

It will be noticed, honourable gentlemen, that in the early days of the practice of granting tickets of leave, the prisoner had to serve at least two stages, and it was only after the second stage that the ticket of leave was granted. The purpose of the Bill which is now before us is, if possible, to make it necessary for the prisoner to serve at least half his sentence, in order to be eligible for a ticket of leave. The practice of allowing prisoners out after they have served a very short portion of their term has apparently grown. This Bill does not in any way interfere with the right of the Crown to pardon a prisoner and to allow him freedom at any time; but it would appear that prisoners had been let out or granted their freedom under the ticket of leave system rather than under the pardoning system.

I move the second reading of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Could the honourable gentleman tell us when the ticket of leave system commenced?

Hon. SMEATON WHITE: It originally started when Australia was being colonized.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I mean in Canada.

Hon. SMEATON WHITE: I think the Ticket of Leave Act is eleven or twelve years old. It is comparatively recent, I believe.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, I had occasion to administer that Act for three months recently when the Minister of Justice was absent and when there was no Attorney General available in Ottawa. So I have had a little practice in the administration of that Act. I may say that there are general rules which govern the granting of the ticket of leave by the department, and it is seldom indeed that the issue of the ticket of leave is justified before half the sentence has been carried out.

When my honourable friend introduced his Bill I asked the Department of Justice for a statement of its views, and I now have the opinion of the Deputy Minister. It is very concise and I shall read it:

As to A2, entitled "An Act to amend the Ticket-of-Leave Act," the power of the Governor General in the administration of the prerogative of mercy is unfettered, and the intention of the Ticket-of-Leave Act was to provide a means whereby convicts who prove themselves deserving may be released on probation, subject to such conditions as may be prescribed, either general or special, for the particular case, and subject also to the authority of the Governor General at any time to revoke the license. In this manner the convict is kept under observation and remains liable actually to serve his sentence throughout the whole term, and at the same time is afforded an opportunity to make good if so disposed, and it was thought that the interest of the prisoner and the public safety would be better provided for and protected under this system of conditional freedom than in the alternative by the exercise of the power of clemency, whereby such mistakes as are liable to occur in the administration could not be rectified by the recall of the prisoner. It would, I should think, be inconsistent with elementary principles of justice that the prerogative of mercy should be taken away or restricted. Cases can be imagined in which the power should be exercised immediately, and that has been done even in a capital case. If experience under the Ticket-of-Leave Act has shown that it is not productive of good results it would, I suppose, be logical to repeal it, but I cannot think of any principle by which it should be declared inapplicable to convicts who have not served half time. One result of such a provision would be that a convict during the first half of his sentence would remain subject only to the prerogative powers, and in the event of the exercise of these powers the community would be denied the protection, such as it is, which the ticket-of-leave affords. I am satisfied that if the ticket-of-leave be good for the second half of the sentence it is equally good for the first half, but of course, like any other discretionary power, it ought to be administered with due regard to the facts and circumstances of the case.

The argument is before the House. I would vote for the second reading with some diffidence were it not for the fact that when the Bill has been read the second time it can be referred to one of our standing committees and there will thus be an opportunity to hear the departmental officials who are administering the Act and to obtain from them the more intimate information which they can furnish.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The honourable gentleman says he administered the Act for three months. Does he know of anybody let out on ticket of leave who was sent back to jail?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes. I signed certainly three, and perhaps half a dozen, such orders.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: As a rule, those people let out on ticket of leave carry on just the same afterwards as before.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: They have to report once a week.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: They report once a month, or once a week, as the case may be, but they carry on their nefarious work just the same while they are out.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Worse.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The important point is that the time during which the convict is out should not count against his sentence if he is sent back again. A man is sentenced, say, to three years. He ought to know that if he is let out for part of that time and then is put back, because he has behaved badly, he will have to serve his full time and it will not include the time he has been out.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I think that what the honourable leader of the Government has suggested would be the proper course in dealing with this Bill. Already two Bills to amend the Criminal Code have been introduced in the Senate, given second reading, and referred to a special committee. I for one would be very glad of the opportunity to obtain some information with regard to the way in which this Ticket of Leave Act is administered. I know myself of a very recent case in which a man was convicted for an assault upon a woman and was sent to penitentiary for five years. It was before the Criminal Appeal Act went into force. An appeal on a point of law was taken before the full Court of Appeal of the Province of Manitoba, comprising five judges. They examined into the case very particularly, came to the conclusion that the man was guilty, and would not interfere. In side of two or three weeks that man was walking about the city of Winnipeg free; and I was told by one of the judges of the Court that he had written to the Department of Justice asking them if they would give him any reason why a man who had been convicted and sentenced, and had his case retried before the Court of Appeal, was now walking around the city of Winnipeg free.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: When was that?

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: It was about two or three years ago. And the answer came back from the Department of Justice that it was a very serious thing to question any decision that had been arrived at by that very august body. That was all the answer he could get.

In my opinion, one of the great objections to the system is that the investigation is held behind closed doors, it is altogether a private arrangement, and is open to influence. I would not for one moment accuse the Department of Justice, or the Government of the country, of being influenced in letting a man out of prison, but I do know this, that a great many people have recently had their sentences remitted, or been given tickets of leave, and I as one member of this Chamber would be very glad to have the matter considered in committee, so that we might call upon the officials in charge of the branch of the Department concerned and get some first-hand information. I would be glad indeed to have the opportunity of moving that the Bill be referred to the same Committee that is dealing with the other matters; that is, if there is no objection to the second reading of this Bill.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: May I ask my honourable friend a question? In the case of the man to whom he has referred, was the ticket of leave granted him here without any reference to the judge who sentenced him?

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I can give my right honourable friend the name of the judge. The case went up to the Court of Appeal and the sentence was confirmed, but the convict was walking around the city of Winnipeg a free man in a short time. I will limit it to one month, but I will say it was within two months. The judge wrote to the Department asking for what reason the man was now at liberty—Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: That seems to be the practice, then.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: —and the answer came back—it was not under this Government; it was under the former Government—

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That does not matter.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: That does not make any difference, however. The answer came back in words to this effect, that it was very extraordinary, or very unusual, to ask the Department of Justice for any reason for what they had done.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have had the advantage of seeing hundreds of records. Every day they are piled up on the desk of the Minister administering that Act, because, as I understand, every man detained in jail or penitentiary, if he has not misbehaved, has a right to renew his application yearly. I have seen records of men applying to the Department for clemency five, six, seven, ten times, in as many years. I have never seen a record that did not contain a report from the magistrate or judge who had made the conviction, and a report from the warden of the penitentiary giving particulars regarding the individual.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Then this must have been a very exceptional case, but it is true.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: People are constantly coming to my office in Montreal and asking me to sign requests for tickets of leave.

We are receiving such requests all the time, and the lawyers representing persons who have been sentenced tell a pitiful story. They say, for instance: "This man was the bread winner. His wife is starving and his little children cannot go to school, for want of this or that." It is hard to refuse your signature, and you sign although it has cost the country money to put him where he is.

Another point I would like to mention is this. The honourable gentleman to my right (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) states that the Minister of Justice deals with these matters. The other day, in connection with a case of this kind, I went to the Minister of Justice, and he told me he had nothing to do with the ticket of leave; that it was the Solicitor General who dealt with that.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) in speaking of the administration of the Act left an impression, I think, on the minds of honourable members that one of the advantages of the ticket of leave was that a prisoner might look forward to getting a reduction of his sentence by good conduct, and so on. What I would like to know is, what is the system or practice of the Department as to securing reports upon the conduct of prisoners? Has the initiative to be taken by the prisoner himself, or does the jailor report systematically to the Department of Justice upon all prisoners? It seems to me that if a prisoner has to take the initiative himself for the purpose of securing a reduction of his sentence or invoking the advantages of the ticket of leave, that is a very mischievous policy to set in motion. It might be invoked by political or party influence or by other pressure brought to bear upon the authority having the right to issue the ticket of leave. Such a system should not be in vogue, and I think we cannot too strongly express our disapproval of anything of the kind. There should be a system that would operate equitably in behalf of all prisoners, so that the friendless prisoner, or the prisoner who could not invoke pressure, would have as good an opportunity of having his case brought to the attention of the Minister of Justice, or the Solicitor General, or whoever may administer the Act, as the man who can marshal all the forces of influence on his behalf, as has been done. I think one is justified in saying that it is only in cases where convicts can secure the influence of someone in authority that the advantages of the Act are extended to them. This should not be so, and if this Bill is to be referred to a committee, I would ask my honourable friend to submit to the Department of Justice these considerations, with the recommendation that some system be adopted which would be applicable to all prisoners and by which, automatically, the status of each inmate of a penitentiary or jail, as the case might be, would be considered by the Department, and not left to those who could set in motion the machinery of political or other influence.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Is any report made, and placed on public file, showing the reasons why these tickets of leave are granted? Is not a report made on each case, so that the action taken may afterwards be justified?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No, these are matters which, by general consent, have not come before Parliament.

In answer to my honourable friend (Honourable Sir James Lougheed) I may say that during my term of office I did not see any general report from the warden of a penitentiary upon the inmates of the institution, but I have repeatedly seen the machinery of the ticket of leave system set in motion by a written application from the prisoner himself or some member of his family outside. I do not recollect having seen any representations from the warden to the Department regarding the advisability of issuing a ticket of leave when it was not asked for.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Pardon me for answering what has just been said. I think it can safely be said that a large percentage of the inmates of penitentiaries or jails are entirely unaware of this system.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Perhaps so.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: They do not know of these provisions being on the statute book. The obligations of the ticket-of-leave system should not be thrown upon the jailer, or left to his discretion. There should be in the Department of Justice a system by which he would be compelled to report on all prisoners. For aught we know, prisoners may die in jail or penitentiary, after years of confinement, without ever having been at all aware of the advantages which might have been extended to them if the obligation had been placed upon the jailer to report on their case.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I appreciate the point made by my honourable friend. I desired simply to tell him what were the facts as they came before me. I think his suggestion is one that might well be discussed in Committee when we have the proper officials before us.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH: Honourable gentlemen, I have had some little experience with regard to the ticket-of-leave, in applying to the Department of Justice to have people let out of prison, and I think the Department follow a well defined rule in dealing with applications. A petition is signed by the people in the locality where the crime was committed, or where the prisoner lived, and it goes to the Minister of Justice. He writes to the Governor of the prison where the convict is confined, asking for a report on the conduct of the prisoner since coming under his charge. The Minister also gets a report from the jail in which the prisoner was confined before the trial—

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: And from the magistrate as well.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH: And the convicting judge or magistrate is asked for a report as to whether there were any circumstances that did not show in the evidence, or any reasons why he might think the prisoner was entitled to leniency or clemency. On these reports the Government act. I think that is a well defined policy with the Government. I have never seen, nor had anything to do with, a case coming before them in which that rule was not followed.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I think inquiry would show that very many prisoners, if not the majority, are released before their terms expire, if their conduct has been exemplary.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: They get 25 per cent off the sentence anyhow.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: But it is all dependent upon their conduct while in prison. Such being the case, there is a good indication that prisoners have been dealt with fairly well. However, I quite agree with the honourable leader of the Opposition that there should be a definite principle laid down.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I would like to ask the honourable leader of the Government if he could give the Chamber a definition of the difference between the exercise of the prerogative of mercy by the Crown and the granting of liberty under the ticket of leave system. As I understand it, the Government at present, without regard to the Ticket-of-Leave Act, can pardon a convict or remit his sentence. They keep him in for a day and then let him go, without any ticket of leave. Even if the present Bill became law, the prisoner would not have to serve one-half his sentence. That would not affect in any way the power of the Government to let him go free the day after he was convicted.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Certainly not.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Perhaps the honourable gentleman could tell us, from his experience, the difference between an application under the Ticket-of-Leave Act and the exercise of the prerogative of mercy.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: In the latter case no application comes to the Department of Justice, because of the Ticket-of-Leave Act applying. It is far more difficult to obtain a pardon than a ticket of leave.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: There is a remission of the sentence.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: There is an absolute remission of the sentence. In the limited experience I have had, no application has been made for the exercise of the prerogative of mercy; the application has always been under the Ticket-of-Leave Act.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: My honourable friend (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) has not indicated any way in which the exercise of political influence could be prevented.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I am not objecting to that; I am objecting to the failure to exercise influence on behalf of those who do not know anything about the privilege.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The application is made either under the general Royal prerogative of granting pardons or commuting sentences, or under the special statute granting tickets of leave. In either case I do not see how you are going to prevent intervention—and in some cases it would not be desirable to prevent the intervention of the people in the locality from which the prisoner comes. The people may be interested in preventing a man coming out, because they do not believe he is going to mend his conduct; or they may be interested in getting him out because they think he is going to improve. I do not see how you are going to prevent the people petitioning.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I do not protest against that. What I ask is a periodic consideration by proper authorities of the sentences of all convicts.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Only in penitentiaries?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: In gaols, if necessary.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I understand that my honourable friend's purpose is to prevent political or party influence.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Oh, no. I did not suggest that. What I suggested was that this seemed to be a most satisfactory way of securing clemency for a convict; but, unfortunately it does not apply to those who cannot invoke it, and who have no way of bringing their cases to the ears of the proper authorities. I see no reason why there should not be a systematic consideration of the sentences of every convict in every penitentiary and every gaol, so that if there are palliating circumstances or mitigating conditions they could be taken into consideration and the sentence accordingly reduced.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: My honourable friend's idea is that there should be a time fixed when some men in the Department should go over the list and take care of those men.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: I cannot see why the conduct of a prisoner while in prison should be the basis of his release. For instance, a man is committed to prison for forgery, and during the time he is imprisoned his conduct is excellent; but how are you to know that if you release him because of his good conduct in prison he will not commit a similar offence again? I have in mind a case of that kind which occurred not very long ago, a case in which I was in a way, one of the victims of the forger. He had been in prison for only a few months, when in some mysterious way he was let out on ticket of leave. Within two weeks of that time he proceeded with his usual business again and defrauded people who were less able to bear the loss than were those who had to bear it in the first place. Since that time that man has not been found; he is away. I claim that you cannot base the release of a prisoner on the conduct he has displayed while in prison. I can understand that if a man had a fairly good reputation before he went there, and it was a first offence, and he had dependents on him who were starving while he was there, some clemency might be exercised; but in the case I have referred to the man was a young man who had no dependents.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH: I would like to ask the honourable gentleman if a petition signed by the people in the community where the crime is committed is not the starting point for the action of the Minister of Justice? If a man has not had a good character, are the people going to support a petition for his release? I think one reason why some cases are not looked into is because the people do not take sufficient interest in them; the conduct of the prisoner may have been such that the people in the community think he is getting what he deserves. But there may be other cases in which people may think that a man is sufficiently punished when he has served half his term. They sign a petition to the Minister of Justice, and he sends out a request to the trial judge or the magistrate, and to the governor of the gaol or penitentiary where the prisoner is confined, and upon a favourable report from them the Department takes action.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

REDUCTION OF SENATE MEMBERSHIP

THE DEBATE CONCLUDED

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of the motion of Hon. Mr. Turriff:

1. That in the opinion of the Senate it is advisable in the interests of economy and good Government to reduce the number of Senators by one-third, viz., from ninety-six to sixty-four Members.

2. That this reduction should be affected by not filling any vacancy that may occur in the number of Senators representing a province until that number has been reduced by one-third, except in the senatorial division consisting of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, as to which division special provision as to the distribution of the reduction will be required.

3. That in each appointment of a Senator made under the decreased representation it shall be provided that the Senators shall automatically retire on attaining the age of.....years.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, after looking around to see whether any other member desired to speak on this motion, and having seen no one rise to his feet, I will for the third or fourth time address myself to the question of Senate reform. The honourable gentleman from Assiniboia (Hon. Mr. Turriff) suggests reforms that are modest indeed. In my time I have heard much more ambitious reforms proposed.

During the recess I took the opportunity to go through three debates on this question—two in this Chamber and one in the House of Commons. They were all academic discussions containing proposals ranging from the abolition of the second Chamber to the present suggested modification. The speeches made bear uniformly and especially on the method of appointment and the term of office of Senators. I have read the opinions expressed by some twenty members of this Chamber, and perhaps seven or eight members of the other Chamber, and I find that all the plans suggested in either Chamber had some merit; but that when they are weighed they seem to contain some demerit also. When one reads the various expressions of opinion as to the method of appointment and the limiting of the terms, one realises that it is somewhat difficult to get a majority of members of either House to agree upon a system of modification. This would bring one to the conclusion that it is the part of wisdom to move slowly in this direction.

Men of standing in both Chambers have confessed that more than once they have had occasion to alter their views on the constitution of the second Chamber. This shows the difficulty of the problem. I may say that I glanced over some remarks which I made in the session of 1908, and I would like to take the liberty of revising my own views on that point. I was then inclined to side with the opinion of Sir John A. Macdonald as expressed in the debates of Confederation, when he stated what would be his ideal Senate. One of the virtues or qualities which he would look for in an ideal Senate is that it should be sympathetic to the Government of the day. Constitutionally, perhaps, he was on solid, orthodox ground because the Government is supposed to represent the will of the people, and this being a democracy, Government by the people must prevail. Yet, in practice, I have come to the conclusion that perhaps Sir John A. Macdonald's opinion in this regard is open to question—and I must confess that I have somewhat altered my views because of the human feelings and failings of members of the upper Chamber.

Our main duty, I take it—and I do not suppose this opinion will be controverted—is to try to improve the legislation that comes from the other Chamber; and perhaps a sympathetic Senate would be prone to say amen to legislation coming from that Chamber. To-day I would rather see a Senate in a critical state of mind, with a leaning, perhaps, the other way. This does not mean that in the carrying out of the ordinary policy of a Government the upper Chamber should presume to substitute its views for the will of the popular Chamber. If that were done we would soon be told that the people appoint their own representatives directly to the popular House.

We hear considerable discussion at times in and out of Parliament, of reforming this Chamber; but I find that generally the opinions expressed are based upon a lack of knowledge, and in some cases, on a total ignorance of the work done by this Chamber.

I would like to cite the opinion of an old Parliamentarian who had been for fourteen years in the House of Commons, a man who was fairly inclined to criticize and to question the maintenance of the second Chamber. I refer to the late honourable Mr. McMullen who was with us for a number of years. Here is what he said in 1908 in a debate on his own motion suggesting some reforms in the Senate. His motion was:

> That in view of the agitation regarding the services rendered by the Senate as a part of our legislative system, and in view of the criticism both in Parliament and in the press with respect to appointments to this Chamber, it is, in the opinion of this House, desirable that the question of the method of appointments and the terms for which appointments are to be made in future, should be considered, and the system recast.

In the course of his remarks in support of that motion he said:

> I went carefully over the business of the Senate last session, and found that notwithstanding the number of members in the Commons, and the large Committees appointed there for the purpose of sifting the clauses of Bills introduced in that body, it was necessary to amend those Bills when they came to us. We made no less than 203 amendments to Bills sent to us, and 47 of these amendments were made to Government bills. So, after all, this House has been doing work, but the press and the Commons do not seem to realize it. The Bills are amended here and go back to the House of Commons; the amendments are read and concurred in, and that is all the notice that is ever taken of the work done in this Chamber.

The Senate—and I think I speak with some degree of experience, and that many of my colleagues will support this statement—may from session to session materially modify Bills coming from the other Chamber. We may add a number of clauses to a Bill—sometimes a dozen, or more, as in the case of the Bankruptcy Act last session—and the Commons, receiving those amendments, which are read at the Table, will accept them without any discussion. What does that mean? Does it mean that the Commons are indifferent or careless? Is it not, rather, a mark of confidence in the upper Chamber?

My honourable friend from Assiniboia (Hon. Mr. Turriff) suggests a reduction by one-third in the number of Senators, and he bases his argument mainly on the necessity of economy. No doubt the Senate could function with a reduced membership, and I have known men of standing to suggest that the membership should be reduced. I may quote Sir Wilfrid Laurier who, in the session of 1906 or 1908, expressed an opinion in favour of a reduction of the membership of the Senate to six members per province—following the American system of an equal number for each state—which would give this Chamber 54 members. The right Honourable junior member for Ottawa (Right Hon. Sir George E. Foster) who followed in that discussion, somewhat dissented from the view that the American system should be followed; yet he was inclined to favour a reduction in the membership of the Senate, and suggested that it could well function with half its then membership, and added that such a reduction would make for an improvement in the Chamber. The honourable gentleman did not stress that point, so I do not know his views as to how the Chamber would be improved.

Now, if we are to move towards a reduction in the number of members in this House, with a view of effecting economy, I would suggest that we should consider a proportionate reduction of the membership in the House of Commons also, because in that House to-day there are 235 members, and under the last census there will be an increase of 10. I believe that perhaps business would be handled more expeditiously by the Commons if that number were cut down by half.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: It would shorten the speeches.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I suggested that once during this session. But when it comes to a motion, introduced in this House, which means that a resolution should be adopted by both Chambers and sent to the Imperial Parliament for the sole purpose of having the membership of the Senate reduced by one-third, on the score of economy, I do not believe that it is worth amending the Constitution for the sake of the small saving that would be affected.

Now, as to the age limit, which is the other point raised in the motion before us, I may say that many have favoured it. Sir Wilfrid, in that debate which I mentioned, suggested the limited mandate. He mentioned from ten to fifteen years. And my right honourable friend, in the same debate, seemed rather to agree with the then leader of the Government by suggesting that the duration of two Parliaments would perhaps be sufficient. The age limit suggested by the present motion is, in my judgment, not much of an improvement. If it were seventy-five, for instance—

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Be careful now.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If it were seventy or seventy-five, that would be a very arbitrary figure. You would thereby eliminate as many useful men as invalids; perhaps more. On the other hand, there are some members of this Chamber who through illness will be incapacitated a number of years before reaching the age limit. Therefore I do not see that that part of the resolution would very much improve the present constitution of the Senate.

I believe, with another honourable member, that it would be perhaps as well to await a concrete proposition from the Commons, or probably from the Government of Canada. In the meantime may I express the hope that we shall continue to do our work wisely and dispassionately.

The motion was dropped.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at 3 p.m.

KINGSCLEAR BRANCH LINE BILL

FIRST READING

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill 26, an Act respecting the construction of a Canadian National Railway Line between Kingsclear and the St. Croix River, in the Province of New Brunswick.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, I would ask that the rule which requires an interval of forty-eight hours be suspended, in order that this Bill may be put down for second reading to-morrow; because, if the Railway Committee is to be called for Wednesday, it may be well to have as many of those Bills as possible before that Committee.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: There is this observation to be made, in answer to what my honourable friend has asked the House to do in regard to the suspension of the rule, that it is extremely improbable that the Committee on Railways, if the Bills are referred to them, will dispose of fourteen branch lines bills at its next sitting and thus permit of our entering upon the consideration of this Bill. I can assure my honourable friend that it will take the morning session anyway to dispose of the fourteen.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I realize that we shall have enough work on Wednesday. Therefore the second reading of this Bill may be left till Tuesday next.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The probabilities are that these bills may safely be fed to the Committee over a period of weeks.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My idea is that when we have the proper railway officials with us they will remain with us until we have finished.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If that is the case, they will probably have to board here.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: They had better bring their trunks.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: This may be the proper time to inquire of my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) if these Government measures are going to take precedence, and if private railway bills will have to wait until the branch line bills have been disposed of. Is that the intention?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It will be for the Committee to decide. Are there any private bills?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Yes, several.

The Bill was read the first time.

This Bill, which has passed the other Chamber, provides for another sixth, which would cover two more months, June and July.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: One-sixth of the same supply as we voted upon before?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes. I would suggest that we now give the Bill the three readings.

SUNNYBRAE-GUYSBOROUGH BRANCH LINE

INQUIRY

Hon. Mr. TANNER inquired of the Government:

Referring to the statement of the Directors of the Canadian National Railways in regard to projected railway between Sunnybrae and Guysboro in Nova Scotia:—

"The original intention of the survey for this line had in view a low-grade line with the idea of making it the main line. The results of the surveys indicated that to obtain this character of line, it would be very costly and on account of the fact that the present main line could not be abandoned and would have to be maintained and operated, it could not be shown that such a line, with its excessive cost of construction, would be justified. The present intention is to construct a line to open up the local territory and build it to cheaper standards of construction, but, keep in view an eventual use of it for an alternative main line at any time that this would be warranted. Therefore the line would be located so that eventually a low-grade could be obtained, but employ steeper grades for the immediate construction."

1. From what point in Pictou County did the proposed low-grade line start?
2. To what point or points was it intended that such low-grade line should run?
3. What was the intended course of the proposed low-grade line through Pictou and Guysboro Counties and through what settlements would it have run?
4. What was the estimated cost of said low-grade line at the time construction was under consideration?
5. What is the estimated cost of it to-day?
6. Is the line now proposed to be built between Sunnybrae and Guysboro, located near the proposed low-grade line; if so, how near, in a general way, will it be to the proposed low-grade line?
7. What is the course of the now proposed line and through what settlements will it run?
8. Is the now proposed line located (a) contiguous to the East Branch of St. Mary's River, or (b) contiguous to the West Branch of St. Mary's River?
9. Will the now proposed line tap, and if so, how closely, the settlements of Melrose, Goshen or Country Harbour Cross-roads; or Barren Brook?
10. What is the mileage of "existing grading" on the now proposed line; where is it situated, and when was the grading done?
11. What cost of construction does such grading now represent?
12. (a) Do the Directors of the Canadian National Railways know, and is the Government aware, that between 1890 and 1911 the Government of Nova Scotia caused to be made several exploratory and locating surveys for the projected Guysborough railway, about $100,000 being expended?

(b) Is the railway now proposed to be built to follow any of the said surveyed lines in whole or part; and if so, in what localities and to what extent?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND:

1. From Sunnybrae, in Pictou County.
2. To Mulgrave, in Guysboro County.
3. From Sunnybrae via the Valley of East River St. Mary's to Aspen, thence to Country Harbour Cross Roads, thence "via" Salmon River Valley to Guysboro, then skirting the North Shore of Chedabucto Bay and the Strait of Canso to Mulgrave. The line through Sunnybrae, East River St. Mary's, Newtown, Aspen, Country Harbour Cross Roads, Salmon River Valley, Guysboro and Mulgrave.
4. $9,394,800.00.
5. $13,151,000.00.

6. The proposed line will be located on the low-grade line excepting about eleven and one-half mile, near Country Harbour River, where at one place it will be about four miles distant.

7. Same as answer to No. 3.

8. To East Branch of St. Mary's River.

9. Two miles from Melrose, six miles from Goshen. Passes through Country Harbour Cross Roads. Does not pass near Barren Rock.

10. No existing grading.

11. None.

12. (a) Surveys from Sunnybrae to Guysboro were made by the Government of Nova Scotia between the dates mentioned. The actual cost to the Nova Scotia Government is not known to this Railway.

(b) The now proposed line may follow part of the line surveyed by the Nova Scotia Government in a general way, both lines passing through Aspen, Country Harbour Cross Roads, and Salmon River Valley.

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS

DISCUSSION AND INQUIRY

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER rose in accordance with the following notice:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the operation and activities of the League of Nations for the past year and inquire if the Government have considered the advisability of furnishing the Members of Parliament with the monthly summary of the League of Nations and the annual report to the Assembly on the work of the Council and the Secretariat and on the measures taken to execute the decisions of the Assembly.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, I do not propose to spend any time particularly on the suggestion made in the latter part of this notice, namely, that the Government should distribute or furnish to members of Parliament the monthly summary of the League of Nations and the annual report of the Assembly on the work of the Council and the Secretariat and on the measures taken to execute the decisions of the Assembly. I do not think it is necessary to spend any time on that, because it follows as a matter of course that as the Government is committed to the League of Nations, it is wise for it to give such information as to the workings of the Council and Assembly of the League to members of the Senate and House of Commons. The proper support and sustenance of the League involves the duty of placing full information at the disposal of the members, so that they may fully inform themselves. The cost which would be involved by that suggestion is very small, not exceeding probably $800, and bears almost no proportion to the amount which we annually spend in the sustenance of the League.

The purpose that I have in speaking to-day is two-fold. One is to give an idea in brief of the operations of that body to members who have not paid as consecutive and as continuous attention to the working of the League as myself. The other is—and it is done practically in carrying out the first part of the proposition—to answer certain objections which are floating around, and, if possible, to correct certain misapprehensions that seem to be in the minds of some people in reference to the objects, the working and the purposes of the League.

In the first place, it would be useful for us to remember that our nation, Canada, as well as other nations, has been interested in the League of Nations from its inception. Canada had a part in the Peace Conference out of which the League was evolved. She signed the Treaties of Peace of which the League covenant and the obligations of the League are also a part; and Canada has taken part in every League Assembly from the inception of the League until the present time. We devote a certain amount of money to its sustenance and support, consequently our people, as well as the Government and Parliament, have—or ought to have—a lively interest in the workings of the institution which they have called into existence and which they support, and should have information as adequate as possible of what is being done thereby.

Not only is Canada interested in that way, but probably there is no more influential and hearty supporter of the whole plan of the League of Nations than the British Empire itself, which has stood for the League from the start. In Great Britain there is the liveliest propaganda in support of the principles of the League and of its operations that is to be found in any country. The whole British Empire, in fact, has shown its interest over and over again. The Imperial Conference which met last year in Great Britain at which the overseas Dominions and India were represented, took up the matter of the League of Nations, and there was a unanimous and hearty expression in support of the ideals of the League, and a pledge of its sustenance and operation. Outside of our Empire, a very large proportion of the world in general, is to-day in the membership, and co-operating in the work, of the League of Nations. Therefore our interests as public men, as governors or administrators of Canada—one nation amongst the nations of the earth—and as citizens of the great Empire to which we belong, suggest our co-operation in this matter.

In this country, as in Great Britain, there is no party opposition to the League of Nations. The leaders of all parties in Canada have expressed themselves in its favour, and are ready to co-operate in its support. The same is true in Great Britain, where leaders of all parties and of all governments give their enthusiastic approval; while the League has no more loyal and intelligent supporters than the overseas Dominions and India. All these considerations make it obligatory upon us, as citizens of this country, and as partaking in its government and administration, to be as well informed as possible, and to have as clear and adequate an idea as can be obtained of the aims and operations of the League.

The first point I wish to make is that criticisms directed against the League, when examined, seem to me to rest on an inadequate conception of the purposes and powers of the League, and I think we ought to strive to have clear ideas in that respect. One of the first objections, and one most generally made against the League of Nations, was that it was bringing into existence a super-state, a super-nation, the result of whose purposes and objects would be to interfere with the nations of the world in the exercise of their sovereign rights. That objection was nowhere more widely spread than in the United States of America, and it was also voiced elsewhere. I think we can say, in all fairness and truth, that that idea has been almost entirely abandoned; and to-day, when we hear criticisms of the League, they are rather on the ground that it has too little authority than that it has too much authority, as will be developed in the course of the remarks that I am hoping to make.

As a matter of fact, the League of Nations is not a super-state or a super-nation. Each state which is a member of the League retains its own sovereignty, administers its own affairs, and establishes and regulates its own relations to other states and nations. A nation is not forced to enter the League of Nations, or to remain in it. It enters freely; it can leave just as freely. There is therefore no compulsion. Let me just suggest to the minds of honourable gentlemen whether or not they have come across any instance in the four years in which the League has been operating where there has been a shadow of a shade of interference with any of the autonomous rights either in government administration, internal or external, with the Dominion of Canada as one of the members of that League. No one can cite such an instance; neither can any one in any country. The criticism of the League as a super-state has passed to what I mentioned before —that it has too little power, and therefore cannot be effective.

Now, the League offers advantages accruing primarily to the world of nations itself, and indirectly to these that constitute the association into which these different nations have formed themselves. Their object is to compass certain advantages to the world, and to the nation-members of the world of nations, which could not otherwise be readily attained. These nations agreed of their own free will to form an Association among themselves, and in so doing they prepared, as it were, Articles of Association under which they united, and to which they unanimously assented in joining. As I have said, there is no compulsion in the case. They agree upon certain conditions. What are the advantages that they propose in the Association, and what are the pledges which they give? First, the abandonment of war as a method of settling disputes between nations, and the substitution therefor of the methods of peace; the promotion of mutual good understanding and good-will; next the creation of an atmosphere favourable to peace among the nations of the world; and, thirdly, the adoption of such measures as the Association may unanimously agree upon to effect these purposes.

Some one may say that in joining that Association nations must give up certain rights or privileges that they would enjoy if they did not belong. That is an objection which is and always will be open to any contract between man and man, or any arrangement made between nation and nation, whether there be a League of Nations or not. You cannot make a trade treaty with another nation unless you promise to do certain things, and promise not to do certain other things. To a certain extent you restrict your powers, and extend your obligations, but it is done upon free will; there is no compulsion in the matter at all.

The powers of the Association are shown in the Covenant, which consists of 26 Articles. It is an amendable Covenant; it is not a thing which is fixed for all time; changes may be made if improvement is necessary, so there is no hard and fast condition in that respect.

There were 32 signatories to the Peace Treaty, and 29 of those became members of the League of Nations. There were 13 neutral states that were invited to adhere, and all of them did adhere. Twelve nations have since been admitted by vote of the Assembly, which is their entrance gate into the League. Consequently we have now 54 nations of the world formed under this Covenant to carry out the purposes for which the League was projected, and to meet the obligations which the member states have undertaken. Now, if we keep these things in mind I think we will be able to answer objections that are made with reference to the League of Nations, and perhaps our own objections.

The first general objection made is that the League has not achieved peace in Europe; there is still war and unrest; there are still race and creed hatreds. The person who makes this objection seems to imply the conclusion that therefore the League does not secure the advantages which were proposed, and in fact may be of no advantage at all. In answer to that criticism let me say that if you will carefully study the matter you will find that though troubles have been and still are existent in Europe—troubles which have arisen from old causes and from new causes—the League is practically daily harmonizing terms of peace or difficulties which have arisen. But do not let us run away with the idea that all the troubles of unrest and race and creed that are yet to be found in Europe were not there before, in essence and in action. Race and creed hatreds, prejudices and strifes, existed in Europe for many years before the Peace Conference, and before the League of Nations came into operation; they are there still, and will remain there for many generations, perhaps. The question is simply how they may be modified and mitigated and smoothed, so as gradually to disappear as a factor of unrest and of trouble.

To bear out the statement I have made, take, for instance, the situation between the Allied Powers and Germany arising from the fact that the terms and conditions of peace agreed upon, or at least signed, by the two contracting parties had not been carried out. That is because of difficulty in enforcing the provisions of the Treaty. But with that the League of Nations has not had, has not now, and cannot have, anything in the wide world to do except on reference to it by the Allied Council. Take the trouble in Upper Silesia, which for many months was very acute and very threatening, which necessitated the keeping of Allied troops on the borders to maintain peace, thus causing an expenditure of somewhere between $2,000,000 and $3,000,000 for the upkeep of those troops. The inability of the Supreme Council and of the Allied Council to carry out and enforce the terms of the Treaty with reference to the boundary between the part of Upper Silesia which was to be given to Germany and the part which was to go to Poland was the difficulty, and war was very threatening at times; and at the last the settlement came through the reference of the case by the Allies to the Council of the League. Take also the difficulty on the borderland between Lithuania and Poland. It was the Allied Council which made the terms of peace, and which was to allot the territory. But it was unable to do this—I am not going into the causes—and consequently that remained a sore, and a very grievious one, for nearly four years.

There is no necessity to go further. I think I have demonstrated my statement that either delay in making the terms of the Treaty, or inability to enforce them, and consequent delay, has been the reason for most of the trouble and unrest and disquiet in Europe up to the present time.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: What about Turkey?

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: I have Turkey in mind, and will come to that a little bit later.

There are other instances, such as the Memel question, on a similar basis. The Allied Council was not able to carry out the terms which the Peace Treaty had laid down, and for nearly three years that operated as a source of disquiet and trouble in that section of Europe. There are also the boundary limits and the Sevres Treaty, the Treaty with Turkey, which, although it was negotiated, was not ratified. While having the assent of the nominal ruler in Constantinople, Turkey, under Kemal, was in quite a different frame of mind, and refused to recognize the Treaty, which made it necessary for another one to be negotiated.

Now, in all those points the League of Nations—let us keep that clear in our minds—has no jurisdiction and no authority whatever. The Treaties of Peace were made by the Allied and Associated Powers—five of them—in conjunction with the other smaller Powers, the main deciding authority resting in the end with the five Allied Powers. They had the right, and they only, to make Treaties, while the League of Nations was not formed until after those Treaties were all made.

The birth of the League of Nations took place only in 1920, and its organized capacity was not available until the end of that year. That is, the League of Nations had no jurisdiction and no authority in the making of peace terms. It might be well just to denominate the authorities in making and enforcing the terms of peace. First, there was the Supreme Council, which I have already mentioned. Then, when it became impossible for the Premiers of the four Great Powers to sit in togother in making the further terms of peace, which were provisionally made by the first treaties, and in enforcing the terms of peace, that power was delegated to what is called The Ambassador's Conference, made up of the Ambassadors of those four great Powers. To them was delegated the remaining work of fixing up and enforcing the terms of the Treaty of Peace. This Ambassadors' Conference, with its headquarters in Paris, and under the Foreign Office of the French Government, reported and kept in constant touch with the Governments represented. It carried out, under their instructions, the work which formerly been done by the Allied Council itself. Then there was another body which had to do with the enforcement of the terms of the Treaty of Peace—the Reparations Commission. The Reparations Commission was the creation of the Treaty itself. Its duties were defined, and its constitution was laid down. It was the duty of the Reparations Commission, under its different powers,—and it has large powers—to carry out and enforce the reparation terms of the treaties. Those three bodies, then, all had to do with the making of the terms of peace, with the enforcement of those terms, and with the carrying out generally of the provisions, financial and reparative, of the Treaty of Peace.

Now, I make a claim for the League, a claim, which I think will not be disputed. In many instances. what the Ambassadors' Conference could not do, what the Allied Premiers were unable to do in carrying out and enforcing the terms and conditions of peace, was handed over to the Council of the League, and the League by its methods did two things: first, it kept the peace between the contending parties, and in several instances by its methods it procured a satisfactory settlement. That was the case in Upper Silesia; that was the case in Memel. Another case referred for settlement to the Council of the League of Nations was the dispute between Poland and Lithuania. For three years the Council of the League of Nations kept the elements of strife from engaging upon actual war, and so kept the peace until finally, only last autumn, the Ambassadors' Conference settled the limits and alloted the territories as between Poland and Lithuania.

Now, there is another statement which I propose to make. In so far as the League of Nations is concerned, under its Covenant there has not been a single instance in which a member of the League of Nations has gone to war with another member of the League of Nations. During all that period of four years, the League of Nations has been able to keep the peace between the members of the League; and the only exception which might occur to one's mind would be the case of the dispute between Italy and Greece. My honourable friend raised that question a moment ago. Probably it would be just as well to speak of that at this moment rather than later in my remarks.

Let us just pass in review the situation existing between Greece and Italy, the Ambassadors' Conference, and the League of Nations on that embroglio. In the first place, take into account the fact that the ruler of Italy was a newcomer entirely in the field of diplomatic negotiations and relations between the nations of Europe. He had acceded to power in a marvellous way, but not in what we would call a constitutional way. He was new to diplomatic arrangements and dealings of nations one with another. Taking that into account, take now the other circumstances into account. The dispute arose from an incident which took place on Greek territory near to the Albanian frontier. The Ambassadors' Conference had as its prerogative—and it was the prerogative of no other—to settle the frontiers between different countries in Europe. The frontier between Albania and Greece was to be settled. The Ambassadors' Conference appointed a Commission of Italians, of Albanians, and of Greeks, and sent that Commission to delimit the territory and to fix the frontier. On their way, and just before they reached the Albanian frontier, the Italian members of the Commission, travelling by themselves, were ambushed, and three of them and their chauffeur were slain. That took place on the 27th day of August. On the 29th day of August Italy sent an ultimatum to Greece demanding within a certain time—twenty-four hours, I think was the limit set—that Greece should do certain things. On the next day Greece acknowledged the ultimatum, assenting to part of it and dissenting from the other part, because in assenting to it in its entirety she could not keep her place as a sovereign and self-respecting nation. On the 31st of August, directly after the receipt of the communication from Greece, a notification was given by Italy that a limit of five hours would be set, and that if Greece had not acceded to the terms of the ultimatum in that time, Italy would take her own course. Before the five hours were up, there had been an entry by an Italian expendition into Corfu: there was the bombardment of the fort and the taking possession of the country. That was on the 31st of August. On that same day the Ambassadors' Conference, whose Commissioners had been slain, took the matter up in defence of its own Commission, and sent protest to Greece and demanded from Greece an explanation, an inquiry and reparation, holding Greece responsible for the assassination of these gentlemen. After the second ultimatum of Italy, and when the occupation of Corfu was completed, Greece immediately applied to the League of Nations. Her application to the League reached the Council on the first day of September, one day after the Ambassadors' Conference had taken the matter up and had demanded inquiry and reparation. The moment that communication came to the Council it was taken into consideration; and the Council had the advantage of the presence of the Greek representative and the Italian representative at the Council. The Italian representative asked for delay; he wanted time to communicate by courier with his Government as to the action which he should take. That time had to be given. It was two days or three before instructions from the Italian Government came to Monsieur Salandra, who was its representative at the League of Nations. In the meantime Greece had replied to the communication of the Ambassadors' Conference (September 2) accepting its arbitration, and expressing a willingness to abide by its decision. At first the Italian ruler, M. Mussolini, had warned everybody off the grass. It was his prerogative and his alone to settle a question of honour between Italy and Greece, and he did not purpose having anybody interfere with him. But in the instructions which M. Salandra had received on the 5th day of September was this intimation, that Italy objected to the Council going further in this matter, because it had been taken up by the Ambassadors' Conference and they were willing to abide by the arbitration of the Ambassadors' Conference, as Greece also was willing. These are the facts in the case.

Let us consider what are the recognized steps of the League of Nations in trying to preserve peace. Every member of the League of Nations says first: "We will not go to war over any dispute that arises between us and a member nation." But there are three methods by which a settlement can be brought about. There is the ordinary plan of diplomatic intercommunication between the two parties to a dispute. If it cannot be settled by that means, it is referred to arbitration. If it cannot be settled by arbitration, and if legal and constitutional questions are involved, then let it go to the international tribunal. Failing a settlement by those means, it comes to the Council and the League of Nations and they proceed to try to effect a settlement and so arrange the matter. It is not the part of the League of Nations to interfere in, or to take up, a case which is under any of those other forms of adjudication—whether diplomatic communication, arbitration, or investigation by the Tribunal of International Justice. This matter having passed those stages, the League of Nations Council was discussing it on, I think, the 6th day of September. Both sides presented their case. The Italian representative denied the competence of the Council to go further in the matter and adjudicate upon it, chiefly on the ground that it had already been taken up by the Ambassadors' Conference. The Greek representative said that Greece had agreed to abide by the decision of the Ambassadors' Council. Then the League Council had nothing to do but advise, if it chose to advise; and it did choose, and there was brought in a scheme of terms of settlement, which it debated and approved of, and which were forwarded by wire on the night of the 6th of September to the Ambassadors' Council. On the 7th the Ambassadors' Council notified the Council of the League that they had received their settlement propositions and were very much indebted to the League for their suggestions and a report of the discussion which has taken place, and that they had prepared and sent both to Italy and to Greece the terms upon which an inquiry and reparations were to be made. That settled the matter. The primary object of the League of Nations was absolutely attained. There was no war. The settlement was made by a method which the League of Nations authorizes as a primary means, namely, arbitration before another competent authority.

But there was one matter not settled. In the course of the debates M. Salandra, the representative of Italy, assailed the competence of the League of Nations to interfere between two nations, members of the League, on a question like that which was involved between Italy and Greece, declaring that there was no war and that Italy had simply done as she did in taking possession of Corfu as a guarantee that reparations would be finally paid by Greece. Whatever there may be in that contention, he raised the question of competence. It was dealt with before the end of the assembly sitting that month in Geneva, and was settled in this way. A committee of jurists from nine of the principal members of the League was asked to give an opinion on the constitutional methods employed, or which should be employed under the Covenant, in cases where these disputes were referred to them. That committee of jurists did its work, and at a later session a report from them was presented to the Council and unanimously passed, and the competence of the League was absolutely upheld.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Naturally.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: And M. Salandra himself, in giving his approval as representing Italy, said that his country approved of it and hoped that it would be taken as their loyal reply and adhesion to the principles of the League.

That is, in brief, the history of this matter. It is for each one to judge for himself whether or not a blow was struck at the prestige of the League. It is my opinion that the incident clarified a situation which never would have been at rest until it was clarified, and that consequently the League's prestige and future work are made all the greater and more certain.

Having digressed on that text, let me go a little farther—to the second objection which one hears. That is couched in words like these: "The League has proved futile and ineffective; it has done little or nothing; it is consequently of no use and is not worthy of our support."

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: That is what Birkenhead says.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: I am not responsible for all that Birkenhead says.

Now, let us be reasonable on this matter. Let us take first into account that the League of Nations is a new adventure in international relationship and in world government. It proposes to substitute for war as a means of settling international disputes the methods of peace—in arbitration, in conference, by legal tribunal, or failing these as the League may advise. It opposes and reverses what has been the custom of the world ever since it has been in existence, which was to look upon force as the main, often the instant and always the ultimate, arbiter in the case of a dispute between nations. Now, a custom which has had vogue for six thousand years has established itself mightily and firmly, and it would be absurd for anyone to think that in a little time that custom could be reversed and headway made against all its fortifications of six thousand years, and that the world could immediately emerge into the full operation of the new ideal and the new plan. No reasonable man would take a ground of that kind. So we consider the new institution —the new adventure, if you have a mind to call it such—which has had a growth of only four years. Now let us examine very briefly —and this is the pith of my whole address this afternoon—just what has been the achievement of the League of Nations in that four years.

First, let me cite what is, I think, a good argument. There are other people in the world besides ourselves—men who have had more intimate connection with this League of Nations than perhaps any of us have had or ever will have. After four years what is the estimate of the League of Nations, in the opinion of these men who are in a position to judge it?

Let me take the King's Speech of January 15, 1924; that is, the utterance by the King for his own Government, the British Government, at that time:

It will continue to be my object to support by every means in my power the steady growth in influence of the League of Nations.

Take Mr. Asquith, the leader of the Liberal Party speaking on February 23rd, 1924, he said:

I believe that the only instrument by which economic reconstruction could be effectively dealt with was by the authority of the League of Nations.

Take Viscount Falloden, who was Foreign Minister in that eventful period just before the breaking out of the Great War. He says:

I regard the development and strengthening of the League of Nations as the best means and the only sound means of restoring the peace of Europe.

Take Premier Baldwin. On May 1st, 1924, he says:

The Conservatives will make the League of Nations the pivotal factor in foreign policy.

Take Ramsay MacDonald, the succeeding Prime Minister. He declared:

We must, we shall, make much more use of the League than we have done so far.

And over and over again he has reiterated his determination to use the League in its proper purposes as the peacemaker and peacekeeper of Europe and the world.

Take Lord Parmoor, who represented the Government at the last meeting of the Council at Geneva. He says:

The League has behind it the whole authority of the British Government, supported by a large majority of the British people.

Go further afield and take, for instance, Dr. Benes, who is Finance Minister and the leading statesman of Czecho-Slovakia. He declares:

For the last four years the whole policy of Czecho-Slovakia has been inspired by the ideals of the League of Nations, and my country will continue to pursue these ideals.

Take M. Briand, who is a possible Premier of the incoming Government of France. I do not mention Poincaré here, because he has over and over again, not only expressed his opinion, but carried that opinion out in the actual dealings under the League of Nations. M. Briand says:

> The war has given birth to an admirable instrument, in which we can have great confidence—the League of Nations. France cannot complain of the manner in which the League settled the question of Upper Silesia.

Take M. Herriot, who is also a possible Premier of the incoming Government of France. He says on January 11th:

> You may make the League the object of as much scoffing and scepticism as you like. It is none the less a fact that it represents the ground plan of an international statute of peace. Taking the birthrates of Germany and France into consideration, you are driven to the conclusion that security is to be found only in the League of Nations.

Take the great labour organizations in France and in Great Britain: they are overwhelmingly in favour of and in support of the League of Nations. Mr. Gompers, who heads that great institution in the United States of America, stated on the 1st of May, 1924, in an investigation at Washington:

> As to the entry of the United States into the World's Court, I am of the opinion that joining the World's Court will mean at least drawing closer to the League of Nations, and I am in favour of that.

I will read another. Herr Streseman, in the Reichstag—I have not the exact date—declared:

> Germany accepts the principle of the international solidarity underlying the idea of the League.

It is stated sometimes that people outside of Europe have no great interest in, and there is no great advantage to be derived from, the operations and work of the League. Here is an instance which has occurred within the last few weeks. The President of Brazil telegraphs to the Secretary of the League in Geneva, telling him that Brazil has appointed a permanent liaison body at Geneva and has given it ambassadorial dignity—an ambassador and an assistant, with a staff; and he ends his telegram in this way:

> This I have done because I desired by this action to give further proof of Brazil's feelings of devotion and respect for the League of Nations.

Some people say: "This is only a European body; it has its centre in Europe; it does its work in Europe; therefore it is of interest only, or mainly, to Europe; why should we bother about it?" Is that true? The whole of Africa with the exception of Egypt is under the League of Nations; the whole of Asia is under the League; the whole of South America with the exception of Ecuador; all of North America except the United States and Mexico, and the whole of Europe with the exception of Germany, Turkey and Russia. Germany, if the Dawes plan is put into operation, as seems now quite certain, will become at once a member of the League. Turkey has agreed to ask for admission to the League of Nations when the Lausanne Treaty is ratified; and as to Russia, I make no prophecy or promise as to what may happen there, although there have been statements made by Russia in conformity with the general principle of the League. What reliance can be placed upon them one scarcely knows.

But is it really an objection that, because this body applies its remedial measures chiefly to Europe at the present time, therefore it is of no interest to us? I do not think that will hold. Europe was not of much interest to us in point of advantage, commercially or financially, when the war broke out, but we found ourselves drawn into it, and we performed our part of it. As the maximum of disaster fell upon Europe, so the maximum of remedy is to be applied in Europe; and as the disaster spread from Europe to every part of the world, including Canada, so the good effects of a rejuvenation of Europe, of an adjustment of its affairs, of bringing about a reign of peace and of commerce and of economics, will redound to the advantage of Canada and of the whole world.

Now, what has been the achievement of the League of Nations in its four years? In all the old-time wars there was this prominent cause and motive for war—to possess yourselves of the territory of the country against which you went to war, and if you conquered you got, if you could, as much of its territory and its resources as you could join on to your own country. The League of Nations has killed that motive for war. It is an article of the League of Nations that conquered property becomes mandated territory, in trust of the mandatory power for the immediate benefit of the country itself, with the idea of gradually leading that country up to a plane of being able to carry on its own affairs, and consequently to joint the brotherhood of nations.

The principle of dividing up conquered territory which had not yet been acquired was a vicious thing that made it almost impossible for the Peace Conference to carry out a just and fair Treaty. For whatever reasons, powers got together in secret treaties and divided up what would be the prospective gains by a war. That system has been laid in ashes also. It is a fundamental principle of the League that every treaty made between members of the League shall be sent to Geneva, registered, and published. That was a bitter pill for some countries at least to swallow; but the custom has grown, and more than 500 treaties have now been filed and registered in Geneva, and more than 300 of them have been already published. The knell given to secret treaties spells a wonderful improvement in the peace-keeping properties of the world. Iet it be known that two or three strong nations have made some treaties between themselves, the terms of which are not known, and the first thing that happens is that three or four other nations make secret treaties in order to counteract what they suspect may be a result of the secret treaties of the other parties, and so you have incentives to war. The registration of all treaties, without which registration they are not effective or in force, is the death-knell of that kind of operation so prejudicial to the peace of the world.

The next thing that has taken place is that the League of Nations has prevented what competent people believe would probably have resulted in five wars of more or less intensity; and one never knows how far fires started in these tinder-like times will spread. These five wars that have been stopped are familiar to all of us. There was the difficulty between Sweden and Finland, a very conscious and acute difficulty. There was the difficulty in Upper Silesia, which the Allied Council found itself unable to solve; there was the Lithuanian-Poland trouble; there was the Memel trouble and the Albania-Servia dispute. Every one of these has been settled by the League of Nations, they having been transferred in all cases but one by the Conference of Ambassadors itself, after it had found that it could not settle them of its own effort.

What is the fifth war that threatened? The trouble between Italy and Greece. Prime Minister Baldwin stated on the floor of the British House of Commons—and I suppose he had as intimate knowledge of what took place at that time and through that controversy as any one—that if there had not been a League of Nations the trouble between Greece and Italy would have developed into a war which would have involved at least all the Mediterranean provinces. Now, that is a strong statement, but one which deserves weight.

What happened at Geneva? The very moment that the news of that assault on Corfu came to Geneva it happened that the League Assembly was in session; 54 nations were represented there; and of those 54 nations there was not one that even excused the action of Italy. From the smallest to the greatest there was a reprobation of the hasty and unnecessary action; and that feeling, which was an index of what the world thought—with the organ of the world thought bearing directly upon that question—restrained the impetuosity of Italy, and brought about a condition of peace, to exist until the settlement was made, and an early settlement of the difficulty was secured. So much, then, with reference to that action, and to that part of the League's work.

Then, the League has secured the establishment of a World Court, which was a dream of the best nations of the world, and of the best statesmen in those nations, for over fifty years. It was found impossible by individual or collective effort of a few nations to carry into effect that plan of a World Court. The League of Nations was given authority in the Covenant to perform that work, and inside of a little more than a year the League had succeeded in forming the International World Court, which has been acceded to and legitimized by actual legislation in 47 countries up to this date. That World Court has done important work up to the present. Processes have been carried on before it of an international character, as well as others advisory in character.

Look at a scene in that Court in Geneva, which took place not many months ago. The Allied Nations brought suit against Germany for stopping the passage of an Allied vessel through the Kiel Canal. That might have caused a war in other times. In these times, and under League ideals, it was agreed by the parties to put it before the International Court; and one day, in that Court, you saw the eleven judges of the Court and by their side a judge from Germany, who is privileged to sit on the Court when a case is tried involving his nationality. You saw German counsel and French counsel and British counsel taking up the alternate sides and arguing the point; and there was a decision which in the end carried out the Allied contention, and Germany paid the fine and the damages, and that is settled.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: How much was the fine?

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: I do not know. Then, take another case. Do we not all remember the Fashoda incident many years ago? It was an incident that centered around a bit of sandy territory somewhere in Africa. A French lieutenant had put up his flag, and the British commander, Kitchener, came to him and said: "This is British territory; you must pull down your flag." He said: "No; the French flag goes up, and does not come down." "But this one comes down," said Kitchener, and down it came. Then it became a dispute between France and Britain, and national sentiment was inflamed, as everyone knows who casts his mind back that far, and possibly war was only averted by a chance.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Without the League of Nations.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: Without the League of Nations. Now, what takes place? There is a dispute which involves nationality, and the conscripting of a British subject into the French army in Tunis or Morocco. Great Britain says: "According to international usage you cannot take one of my citizens and conscript him." France says: "That is a matter of local procedure in our own dominion; it is a domestic matter; we can and we propose to do it." So they got to a point where they could not agree. Then they said: "As members of the League let us send it to the International Court, and we will agree to abide by the judgment of the International Court." It was sent, it was argued, it was decided, and the judgment was against the exclusively domestic contention that France made. What happened? Within six weeks or so a treaty was made between the two nations which amically settled the whole question on the basis of that decision. Now, that shows what the World Court does.

To-day there lies in the pigeon-hole or on the table of the Foreign Affairs Committee in Washington a recommendation by the late President Harding, and a representation and recommendation by the present President, Coolidge, to get authority for the United States to enter that World Court. That shows that in the United States itself that country is not regarded as an enemy to the purposes and ideals and work of the League of Nations; it is, in heart and soul, of the same way of thinking, but differs merely upon method. To-day in many different activities of the League of Nations the United States is co-operating earnestly by means of its own citizens, officially or otherwise; and in the United States itself one cannot judge of the difference between those who are for that country's entrance into the League and those who are against it, in point of numbers.

Now, going a step further, there is the matter of financial reconstruction. I have just time to indicate the three chief points. First, the reconstruction of Austria, which, less than eighteen months ago, was on the brink of the precipice of financial economic and business disaster. It had exhausted its own resources; it had exhausted the good offices of Allies who had advanced money to it; and it came at last to the League of Nations. The League produced a plan, got certain legislation from Austria, put into Vienna its own director, and in the month of November —one year after the plan went into operation —had these tidings to tell, that under that plan the expenditures and the revenues in Austria balanced, and more than balanced; and that since November they had made no drain upon the extra fund which was provided them for deficits up to the end of 1924, when the term ends. Austria itself is acknowledged everywhere as an example of the most wonderful financial renovation that has been witnessed in modern times.

What happened directly after? Hungary witnessed the flight of its crown, which has sunk below the value of the Austrian crown at the time of her greatest extremity. Hungary applied to the League of Nations: "Come and help us on the same terms." The Reparations Committee gave consent: the Entente Powers gave consent; arrangements were made, and to-day in Budapest there is sitting the Director of the League of Nations in the person of a lawyer and financier from Boston, who is directing that same scheme of renovation for Hungary which worked out so effectively in Austria.

Last year a million and more refugees were poured out of Asia Minor into Greece—one-fifth of her whole population. Greece, disarmed, confused in every limb, without credit and without resources, how could she take care of a million—one-fifth of her total population—thrown in upon her? What country would do it? None. The League of Nations took up the case, prepared a scheme, made an agreement with the Greek Government, and put in Mr. Morgenthau, formerly United States Minister at Constantinople, as its Director, and then went to the Bank of England in London. The Bank of England looked at the scheme, at its methods, at its directorship, and said: "Here are a million pounds that we will advance." That million has been used and 200,000 or 300,000 of those people have been cared for. Another million pounds were needed, and it was not time yet to put out a loan for Greece. Mr. Morganthau went to the Bank of England only a week ago and put the case before it, and the Bank issued an advance of a million pounds more on the scheme backed and carried out by the League of Nations. I have not time to give the modus operandi, but that shows the confidence that moneyed people and moneyed influences have in the management of the League. So in financial reconstruction it has done that wonderful work.

How about the humanitarian methods of the League? The prisoners of war at the end of the conflict, and two years afterwards, numbered more than half a million, scattered chiefly throughout the far distances of Russia, but some of them in Europe. Of all imaginable conditions, probably the condition of those poor prisoners was the most miserable. What nation would undertake the work of putting them back into their own country? None could; none would. The League of Nations took the matter up, and with Dr. Nansen as their Commissioner, inside of eighteen months they had repatriated 477,000 of these poor prisoners and put them back into their own countries. That is part of the humanitarian work.

I must cut the rest very short. In the matter of disease, health, plagues, narcotics, the deportation and traffic in women and children, the League of Nations is combining under its direction the efforts of the 47 or 50 nations which belong to it, and the efforts of some nations that do not belong. Narcotics, epidemics, fevers, plagues, acknowledge no national boundary, and it is impossible to cope with them unless you get collective effort. They breed in places far distant, and then rush like a devouring flame on a civilization unprepared to combat them. But if you can get all or nearly all nations to work co-operatively, you go to the problem with the very best chance of a successful solution.

Lastly, let me take the final objection: what does Canada get out of it? We pay $170,000 a year—and Canada has no money to spare? What does she get out of it? Cui bono? That is the question that is asked. Let me just say one word with reference to that. What did Canada get out of the war? Sixty thousand of her sons lie in the dust of the battlefields of Europe; hundreds of thousands of casualties creep and walk about our streets, and encumber our hospitals and are cared for in our homes; a debt of two and a quarter millions of money, and taxes to support it, and all the manifold services for pensions and for other forms of alleviation—that is what Canada got out of that war.

Was there a possibility of that war never having taken place? Viscount Falloden, who was Foreign Minister at the time, has said over and over again: "If we had had a League of Nations in 1914, when I was trying to get three nations, or four nations, to come together at the supreme moment to put a veto, if possible, on the war, then we would have had no war." That is a weighty testimony. Any one has a perfect right to say he does not believe it, but that is the testimony of a man who had a very important part to play.

But if there should ever come another war, could Canada keep out of it? Would it be possible? And if there ever should come another war, what would be the character of that war in destructiveness and in all the horrible trail that follows a destructive war, compared with the character of the last war? To-day I read in the papers of the triumphs of electricity and of chemistry, and of research in those lines. I read that there is such a thing as is called the diabolical ray, which can be segregated in the atmosphere and launched with certain precision at any point within a certain radius, and that its effect is incalculably destructive. No one knows the limit of chemical research, but every authority on naval or military warfare expresses the opinion that the implements of destruction in the next war will be away beyond calculation in their destructive properties in comparison with the implements and munitions of war in the last great great struggle. Is it not worth while that we should take hold of the only scheme that is before the world to-day to prevent war and to multiply the chances in favour of continual peace? Shall we withdraw from the League of Nations and thereby set in motion the disintegration, by the withdrawal of others, which would destroy the whole fabric? Shall we, for the amount that it costs us, do this? After all, what does it cost us? There is an item of $168,000 in the Estimates to-day—make it $170,000 or so, and divide it among the people of this country as an insurance fund, and it amounts exactly to two-thirds of the cost of a postage stamp for every man, woman and child in the Dominion of Canada.

Hon. RAOUL DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, I simply desire to speak the mind of every member of this body who has had the privilege of listening to the address of my right honourable friend, in saying that we have been absolutely enchanted by the statement he has laid before us this afternoon. If there is a country outside of Europe that needs to link up with the League of Nations, it is Canada; if there is a country in America that is interested in the League, it is our country. We are the only part of America that is linked to Europe, and we have a direct interest in maintaining peace in Europe. I wish my right honourable friend could have been heard to-day by the Congress of the United States. I think he would have brought back to the mind and heart of the American people their original desire for the creation of a League of Nations.

For twenty years I have been in contact with various leagues for peace in the United States. I have attended their conferences more than once. Throughout the whole territory of the United States, in every State in the Union, there are leagues of peace. Of course, we all know how that nation, which was a pioneer in the movement for universal arbitration and for the creation of a League of Nations, has fallen by the wayside. I only hope my right honourable friend, in the zeal for that ideal which characterizes him, will cross the line and raise his voice in the Capital of the United States while Congress is in session. I know very well that there are sceptics. I have one to my left.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: A good many.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But I know also that very many men, and I should say also very many women, who have given thought to the problem, have felt that our salvation was in the creation of a League of Nations. I have in my hand a letter on the League of Nations addressed to the Montreal Gazette, the signatures of which represent all the various elements that go to constitute the population of Montreal. Let me read this public letter:

League of Nations Society in Canada

To the Editor of The Gazette:

Sir,—We are in full accord with the opinion you express in your issue of 21st inst. that Canada as a signatory and contributor to the League of Nations should have a larger knowledge than is now afforded her of the principales, operations and usefulness of the League. Information about it must be widely and systematically given if the various opinions as to the "advantages" of the League to which you say the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King recently referred are to be merged in that broad and intelligent support which our Prime Minister had anticipated for it and which alone can make it an effective force.

In response to your challenge, which is fully justified we now address ourselves to you and to the public through you, on this vital matter.

It is a familiar fact that Canada by her signature to the Treaty and Covenant of Peace at Versailles became a member of the League of Nations; but the implications of this fact, the obligations which it lays upon Canadians, the aims and methods of the League, its activities and accomplishments, are as yet very imperfectly known amongst us, and to this imperfect knowledge may be traced most of the objections raised to it. Such mistaken and contradictory impressions exist, for instance, as that the League is a superstate with power to force its recommendations on its members, or on the other hand, that it has no power whatever and has accomplished nothing. But the very purpose of the League is to abolish force as a means of settling international differences and to substitute for it the power of reason and sanity and public opinion. As for the charge that it has done nothing, it were enough to cite the financial reconstruction of Austria, the satisfactory solution of the intricate question between Sweden and Finland affecting the Aaland Islands, the settlement of various boundary disputes, as between Germany and Poland in Upper Silesia, Czechoslovakia and Hungary, Poland and Lithuania, the dispute in the last instance having all but precipitated war. If, as you say, these "good works were performed in remote theatres," we remember that there are some sixty thousand Canadian graves in France. You remark that the Corfu incident has not been mentioned as one of these good works. It would be impossible here to go into details of the Corfu matter, but there can be no doubt that the League both by what it did and what it refrained from doing that instance, made a powerful contribution to the cause of peace. Its failure to effect more was due not to any inherent defect in the League but primarily to two facts—first, that its functions and competence are as yet but imperfectly apprehended by the people and Governments of the States that are its members, and secondly, that its full power waits on the adhesion of those nations that still stand outside it. The services which it has performed, political, economic and humanitarian, have far more than justified its existence, and the progress, interests and activities of the League if presented to the public as a matter of course from month to month through the Press and from the platform, would afford an insight into foreign affairs and international relations which would be of great value and would meet a need that is increasingly felt. Steps will be taken shorty to ensure this publicity.

The progress and success of the League depend to an immense degree upon the Press, which can do more than any other agency to make it generally felt and understoon and to educate the citizens of its member states to a sense of its uses and of their own personal responsibilities towards it.

Hopeful or hopeless as we may be of the ultimate abolition of war, not one of us can escape the responsibility for doing what he can to delay or prevent it. Were it a question of making war milder, more humane, it would be difficult to combat the doubt whether such and aim were worth the effort. It is inevitable that with the advance of science, war should become ever more deadly, "civilized" only in the refinement of its cruelties, more and more ruthless and horrible. The chivalry in man revolts against instruments of torture and death like poison gas and poisoned wells—let chivalry be heard, but prudence and past experience tell us that in war pledges are but a flimsy protection from such methods of attack and the most honorable nation must go out prepared to meet and counter them.

A greater and more possible thing is asked of us. It is that every citizen of Canada should be brought to feel his or her individual responsibilities for war, his or her concern in war—that Canada should have a deeper consciousness of what was once the word of the seer and is now the commonplace of the business man, namely, that all men and nations are members one of another, that one can not suffer without all suffering with it, and that isolation, however it may be sought or willed, is actually impossible.

It is that men should be made to see the reality of war, its horror and its futility and that public opinion should be educated to seek some other way of settling international disputes than by fire and sword.

It is asked: Does Canada get any advantage by spending on the League $198,688 a year? The after-cost of war to Canada for this year is over a million dollars a week. On these facts let us compare the cost —and the returns.

There are before us the two ways. These are the alternatives, as the British Prime Minister has said, a League strong in the support of the nations and backed by public opinion, with peace—or a Balance of Power with war.

It is a choice between hope and despair.

"We have faith and not only faith but a steadfast hope in the League of Nations," says a representative Frenchman, interpreting the mind of France; and M.

Poincare hopes for "the consolidation of peace from its wisely ordered activity."

A reason for this faith which cannot be gainsaid is that the League makes for delay. Had the nations been pledged to delay in 1914, it is well within the bounds of possibility that the most terrible and destructive war in the world's history would have been averted.

The past is irrevocable.

The future is ours to make.

As is our call so shall be the answer.

Justice and charity alike demand that we should form our judgments of the League only "on evidence" and after fair trial—that we should do what we can to make it an instrument for peace, for the sake of humanity, as our sacred debt to those who died in the last war, and out of pity and justice for those who are to come.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS ADMINISTRATION

MOTION FOR SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Hon. W. H. BENNETT moved:

That a special Committee of the Senate be appointed to inquire into and to report from time to time upon:

(a) The statements and charges in regard to administration of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine and Canadian National Railways, made by Honourable J. D. Taylor in this Chamber on May 8, of the present year.

(b) The acquisition of the property in Paris, France, known as the "Scribe Hotel," and all dealings, transactions and payments in relation to said property.

(c) The employment or engagement of one Aronivici by the said Canadian National Railways, the services performed by him, if any, and the commission, salary or other remuneration paid to him by or on behalf of the said Canadian National Railways.

(d) The system of the purchase of supplies for the use of or in connection with the said Canadian National Railway System.

(e) The deposit by and withdrawal of the Canadian National Railway Company of $1,000,000 of public funds in or about the month of May, 1923, with the Home Bank of Canada.

(f) Generally all questions, matters and things, which in the discretion of the Committee, arise out of or incidental to the foregoing matters, or which the Committee deem to be necessary to inquire into.

(g) That the said inquiry shall be subject to the condition that no matter, of operation or of management taking place in the year 1924, inquiry into which would in the opinion of the Management of the said system be prejudical to the property of the system or its proper operations, shall be made subject of investigation.

(h) That the said Committee be composed of the Honourable Messrs. * * * *

(i) That the said Committee be empowered to take evidence under oath and to send for persons, papers and records and to employ such clerical and other aid as the Committee deem necessary for the purpose of the inquiry.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, when the charges were made in this Chamber, I think on the 7th of April, by the honourable member for Westminster (Hon. Mr. Taylor), honourable gentlemen on this side of the House, after hearing the charges, would, I think, have stood up in their places and said unanimously that there should be at once an investigation into them. Such was the nature and the gravity of the charges that no self-respecting Government could possibly ask themselves why the charges should not be inquired into; yet, to-day, after the press from the Atlantic to the Pacific has been reeking with these charges, the Minister of Railways and Canals in the present Government starts down deliberately and coolly says what? I will quote his words as published in the Montreal Gazette of March 22nd, 1924:

Hon. G. P. Graham, Minister of Railways, when asked to-day for an expression of opinion concerning the investigation proposed by the Senate, merely said that he was sufficiently human to have a respect for and confidence in every employee of the Canadian National Railways or the Canadian Government Merchant Marine until something substantial was proven to change his mind. So far, however, as the charges against men residing on the Pacific coast were concerned, the Senate would probably find it very expensive to bring all the witnesses to Ottawa.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Temple, of Winnipeg, made an investigation into these charges and is now preparing his report, the minister said. The evidence covered thousands of pages and to read and digest this thoroughly would take some little time.

It would only be fair that the committee appointed to investigate in the Senate should have this report before it before starting further investigation. However, the easiest and most direct and satisfactory manner of procedure would be for those who made these charges of conspiracy, etc., if they believe in them, to lay information either in the criminal or civil courts of British Columbia. This would give men, who declare their innocence, full opportunity to defend their character before a totally independent tribunal.

When a responsible Minister of the Crown will dictate an interview like that, all I have to say in answer is, in the first place, that he should apologise to this body. I care nothing whatever for what the Hon. George P. Graham says about myself, as a tried, salted, and wellknown politician, while he has practised the art of a politician in an endeavour to besmirch everybody; but there is this slur at the Senate, that this tribunal is not going to be an independent one. I am astonished that he should make that statement in view of the fact that the Globe newspaper, when these charges came out, said what?

> Charges of grafting made against Canadian National Railway officials in British Columbia and of rum-running by men of the National Marine should be investigated publicly under oath. The National System, if it is to retain public confidence, must be above suspicion.

The Globe did not descend to personalities, as Mr. Graham has done in insinuating that an investigation by this body will not be a fair and independent one. The Minister should have posted himself a little better about what has been going on in the matter of this investigation under the Canadian National Railways. Had he done so, he never would have made the mistake that is shown in his statement. He states that the investigation as to these charges has proceeded before a Mr. Temple, who is now preparing his report; that the evidence covers thousands of pages, and to read and digest those would take some little time. Why does Mr. Graham not tell the whole truth about it? In what does the investigation consist? It is not under oath at all. Why did not the Minister add to his statement that the investigation would have to be taken for what is was worth, because the evidence would be only hearsay and not given under oath?

I am going to look now in another direction, and that is towards the President of this Railway System, because on Saturday last he gave an interview to the Toronto Globe. He took a rather better ground. I will not now read all he said, though I may do so before closing my remarks. He said:

> If criticism there was to be, he asked that it should be based on concrete points, such as service, courtesy of employees and the like.

Honourable gentlemen, I am not going to make any complaints against the courtesy of the employees of the Canadian National Railways. Who are the National Railway employees? They are the old men of the Canadian Northern, the Intercolonial and the Grand Trunk. I have not travelled in the past thirty-five or forty years on the Grand Trunk Railway without gaining a fair knowledge of it. Who ever heard any complaints regarding the courtesy of the officials of the Grand Trunk? Who are the men that constitute the officials of the Grand Trunk? Let me give some instances within my personal knowledge. There was on the Midland Division of the Grand Trunk for a great many years a conductor named Mr. Mitchell; another was Mr. Boundey, and another, Mr. Piggott. In what position are their sons? Mr. Mitchell was one of the highest officials of the Canadian Northern Railway, and was asked by this Government to retain the position that he held as custodian of the financial condition of the road. I do not know for certain, but I think Mr. Piggott is at present at Stratford as Chief Despatcher of the Grand Trunk Railway there. As for Mr. Boundey, he has, not one, but two sons who to-day hold the highest offices in the financial department of the Canadian National Railways.

The President of the System need not expect that I shall waste my time in trying to attack the courtesy of the employees, because no such attack can be made. These sons of those old employees hold prominent positions to-day because they are sons of worthy men and were honoured wherever they were known. What is the use of Sir Henry Thornton trying to introduce such matters as this?

But I do not take issue with him on the question of service, and I intend discussing that question. I assume that the word "service" includes the conduct of every man in the employ of this railway system, from the President down to the chore boys. If anyone is guilty of wrongdoing, the more important the position he holds, the greater is his offence. the greatest man on this whole system, is of course, the President. There is in the Dominion of Canada to-day no man who has a greater or higher responsibility than the President of the Canadian National Railways, and with that responsibility goes a deservedly high salary—a salary of $50,000 a year, as I understand. Associated with him is a Board of Directors, and it is well for the House to realize who compose that Board. I will give the names in the order in which I have them written here: Mr. McDougald, of Toronto; Mr. Décarie, of Montreal; Mr. Dawson, of Prince Rupert; Mr. James Stewart, of Winnipeg; Mr. Tom Moore, of Ottawa; Mr. Sinclair, of New Glasgow; Mr. Bell, whose residence is Ottawa; and Mr. Ruel, whose residence is Montreal.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: What about Mr. Talbot?

Mr. BENNETT: The Government, for reasons best known to themselves, after a protest by the Liberal press in the Province of Quebec withdrew the appointment of Mr. Talbot; that was the explanation commonly given; and he was replaced by Mr. Décarie. I have not one word to say against any of these gentlemen. I think they are probably men well known in the parts of the country in which they reside. But the point I want to make is this, that, their residences being scattered from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and their long distances from Ottawa, it is almost impossible for the gentlemen to attend every monthly meeting that is held. The country is fortunate in having on the Board, and within easy call, Mr. Bell and Mr. Ruel, who are well posted on the System and are in my opinion eminently clever men. But, after all is said and done, the control is vested in the President. For that reason, above all others, the country is entitled to consideration from him and has the right to review his actions.

How much money is invested in the Canadian National Railway System? We hear so many millions and hundreds of millions of dollars mentioned that one would hardly hazard a guess. We know that one section of it alone, the Government section of the Grand Trunk Pacific, cost $250,000,000 or some such figure. Add one figure after another running into hundreds of millions, and you have a sum that dazzles the imagination, and all this practically under the hand of one man. Therefore this country has the right to ask that the dealings of the railways should be open to the public gaze. After all, there is but one stockholder and that is the people of Canada.

The proposal to inquire into the affairs of this Railway Company is not a new one. When honourable gentlemen of the Liberal Party were in opposition they placed the question of investigating the system before the public at all times, and spoke with no uncertain voice. I will read now from Hansard of 1921. At that time there were not specific charges of grave import before the House, but it was simply a question of the general management of the road, and Hon. W. L. M. King moved the following, which will be found in Hansard, volume 2, page 1,761:

> That all the words after the word "session," on the second line, to the end of the question, be omitted and the following be inserted instead thereof:
> That such committee shall have power to inquire into all matters in any way relating to the railways owned or controlled by the Government of Canada whether under the direction of the Department of Railways and Canals or under any corporation in which the Government are stock holders, whether relating to the construction or operation, from the date of the appointment by the Government of the Board of Directors of the Canadian Northern Railway Company down to the present time; and similarly to inquire into all matters in any way connected with the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, either in respect of the construction or operation of ships, and that such committee shall have power to send for papers, persons, and records, to engage counsel and transportation experts, and to make such reports and recommendations from time to time as, in their judgment will be calculated to promote the public interest.

That was a most sweeping resolution regarding the right of Parliament to delve into the affairs of this Company.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: How was that resolution dealt with?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I will come to that in a moment. Speaking to his motion, Mr. King concluded by saying this:

> In connection with this amendment, I hope the House will not lose sight of the fact that the country is demanding to-day full light upon the circumstances which have occasioned a deficit of something like $48,000,000 last year and $70,000,000 this year on the National Railways; also that Parliament is being asked by the Government to vote for railways and canals for the ensuing year a sum amounting to over $167,000,000, while thus far we have not been able to get any information of a substantial or vital character in regard to the operation, the control, and the management of these public services. It is to enable Parliament and the country to obtain the fullest light possible on these vast expenditures of public moneys that this amendment has been drafted in the comprehensive form in which it appears.

Everybody will admit that that was a most sweeping resolution, which, had it been carried by the House, would have called for an inquiry into all parts and conditions of this Railway System.

Honourable gentlemen will note that in the resolution that I have moved there is a clause directing the Committee not to inquire into the affairs of the Company for this year, because it would not be fair to hale before the Committee witnesses to prove what they were paying for this or for that in the way of supplies or construction or contracts being entered into. Yet this resolution of Mr. Mackenzie King's would have permitted inquiry into all such matters.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Was it adopted by the Commons?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: A long debate ensued. The resolution was not adopted, but the then Prime Minister, Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, moved this resolution, which was carried:

> That a select Standing Committee on National Railways and Shipping be appointed for the present session, and be instructed to inquire into the following questions:
> (1) What information as to the operations of Canadian National Railways and Shipping as conducted by the Board of Directors and Management should, in the public interest, be brought down in Parliament on Questions, Motion for Production of Papers, or otherwise.
> (2) When, by what method, and under what conditions, if any, should such information be given, regard being had for the necessity of securing to Parliament and the public all facts requisite for the determination of policy (including finance), and to the Board of Directors the best possible conditions for efficiency of management.
> (3) What system of auditing should be adopted, and what extent of detail should be given in the Annual Report.

(4) What if any improvement could be made in the general scheme of management.

(5) Whether and for what purposes the said committee should be continued, and that for the above purposes and for such other purposes as the committee deem in the public interest there be referred to said committee the Annual Report of the Board of Directors and that the said committee have power to examine witnesses under oath, to send for papers, persons, and records and to report from time to time.

In view of the fact that that amendment of the then Prime Minister was a sumptuary one, that inquiry should have been made, although there was a change of Government, but the present Government have not carried out the policy and have permitted the resolution to remain a dead letter.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: And what happened at the time it was carried? Nothing.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Unfortunately I have not the date of that. It was towards the latter part of the Session.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But the honourable gentleman, I think, has given the page at which the amendment moved by the honourable leader of the Opposition was printed.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Yes, and it will be seen from that. The reference I have given is Hansard of 1921, volume 2, page 1761. What happened then was that the House adjourned shortly thereafter, and the elections came on the following autumn, and the honourable gentleman knows what was the result.

Now, if the present government had been really honest in the position they took at the time in moving for such a sweeping inquiry into the affairs of the Railway Company and the shipping interests connected with it, why did they not then take action and have the matter delegated by the new Parliament to a committee with the powers conferred under the motion? However, they saw fit not to do so, and the result has been—what? That throughout the Session any honourable member may ask a question, and the Government decide whether or not they will answer it. Had they acted in accordance with the resolution adopted in 1921 there would have been appointed a Committee of the House who would have had full powers conferred upon them.

I do not believe that this Government realize what public opinion is with regard to either the condition of the country or the condition of this Railway System and the Merchant Marine. I will say this for the President of the System, that I do not believe he really knows what he is going on. I have no fault to find with the harmless amusements in which the President is said to indulge wherever he goes, such as shouting through a radio and urging the men to be of good cheer and good hope and telling them, "We are going to stand together." Nobody is asking these men to stand together. All the country asks of these men, from the President down, is to do what is fair and right, and if they do that the country will be indebted to them.

What is the condition of the country to-day as shown by the mercantile reports? I have here some clippings that I wish to read to the House. In 1922 there were in this Dominion no less than 23,676 failures, with liabilities of $623,896,251. In 1923 there were 18,718 failures, with liabilities amounting to $539,386,806. In 1921 there were a few million more than in 1922.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Less last year than in 1922?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Yes, less by $5,000,000. However, as I remarked in the House once before, surely to goodness you do not expect failures involving liabilities of these enormous amounts to continue in the country forever.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would point out to my honourable friend that during three years the proportion of failures has been greater in the United States than in Canada.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: There is the old story: if I have a boil I should not complain, because you have one. But the country looks for a business administration of the Canadian National Railways above all things, and to that end I am going to show some cases in which there can be business administration. It is not as if we had heard the last of these failures. They are continuing week after week. True, they are not as numerous as they were. There were perhaps fifty a year ago where there are only forty now. The only thing that I would say is this, that these failures involve an enormous amount, and that in 1914 and 1915 there were not half as many failures as there are to-day. Is it not high time that we should have an investigation of this colossal concern, the National Railway, and the Merchant Marine of Canada, in the interests of prudence and common honesty? It is for common honesty I am going to plead, and do plead in this connection.

Now, what has been going on? The President of this Railway happened to have, according to an item in the press, an acquaintance named Aronovici, who is a Rumanian, as stated in the newspaper. The President, in pursuance of what he thought would be a good line of policy for the benefit of the railway, enlisted the services of this gentleman in a scheme of immigration of people to Canada from Europe, and a year and a half ago engaged him. I thought we had an immigration service in this country on which we are spending thousands of dollars, but this high official says that he is going to practise a new immigration scheme, and he enlists the services of Mr. Aronovici. After some time an answer comes down in the House of Commons that his services have been dispensed with, and for what he has done he receives $33,041.46; and that in order to rid the country of this undesirable attache of the President he was paid $7,500 as a solatium. So our acquaintance with Mr. Aronovici as an immigration agent and a representative of the President for immigration to Canada has cost this country some $40,500 in round figures.

Let us go on a little further. Last year the country got rather a rude shock when early in the Session certain questions were asked in the House of Commons relative to the acquisition of a property known as the Scribe Hotel in the city of Paris. I will not inflict on the House the long debate that ensued, but I have a portion of what occurred on that occasion. On page 3208 of Commons Hansard for 1923, volume 4, the answer is given by the Minister of Railways, Mr. Graham, that up to date the Government had not given its consent to the purchase of this so-called Scribe Hotel. The people were lulled into a sense of security by that statement, because the proposition seemed so wild that they evidently relied on the assurance of the Government that they had not given consent to this purchase, and by the very words of the Minister the House was allowed to believe that they were not going to give their consent. So the matter stood over from May 29 until June 7, when whispers got abroad relative to this celebrated edifice. On June 7, 1923, when the matter was discussed at great length, covering many pages of Hansard, the Minister said: "I think they made a good business deal." So the Government acquiescence had been secured; not only that, but the Minister expressed his opinion that they had made a good business deal. Yet, forsooth, now that it is acquired, this same Minister stood up in his place in the House on March 18th last, and said:

> I think it was a mistake at that time to acquire the Paris building; I have no hesitation in saying that—Liberalism is free to express its opinion. But it will not be so grievous a mistake as some people are trying to make the country and the world believe.

I think there are a good many Liberals in this country who are quite willing that Liberalism may express its opinion freely, but not spend the money of the people so freely.

Now, what happened next on the debate last year? The question was then probed into, and inquiry was made as to how the deal was being carried on. The law requires that a vote of such a large amount, about $2,000,000, would have to be passed by Parliament. But this Government, that sits there and gets its orders from the President to please send along $11,000,000 for the viaduct in Toronto, deals with this sum of $2,000,000 of the public funds in what manner? The information was not coming along very fast, and finally it was announced that some person had an option on this property which the Minister of Railways declared would be a good business deal. Of course, it is idle to conceal who the gentleman was who had the option; it was Mr. Aronovici, the immigration agent who profited by $40,000. He was pursuing bigger and larger game, namely, the Scribe Hotel, but was not able to finance it, as the Paris papers showed. The despatches to this country told what his standing was, so he had to go around and look for some means to accomplish his end, and at the same time the Government had to accomplish its object and meet his wishes in a manner that is not creditable to them. Parliament was not in session, or, if it was, the money had not been voted for this purpose, and until the money was voted the transaction was beyond the limit of the law, and an Order in Council would be required to appropriate the money. So what does this Government, so zealous for the weal of the people, do? They allow this gentleman to form a syndicate, and it was made up of men whom the Minister of Railways actually declares he did not know. I will read his very words: "I do not know their names, although I have heard the name of the Chairman." What was done by the Government then? The Government instructed the Bank of Toronto to take $2,000,000 out of the funds of the country and place them to the credit of this syndicate.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The honourable gentleman is in error: the Government did no such thing.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Then all I can say is that if the honourable gentleman will follow me, if he can introduce that phase into the matter and prove it to the satisfaction of the House, he will prove something that no member of the Government dared to adduce in the other House when the matter was up. I confess there is a lot of light coming in on this subject from time to time.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The National Railways carried on the negotiations for the purchase of this hotel, or this building, and closed the negotiations, and paid for it before the Canadian Government knew anything about it.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Then we will take the dates on the record. I have already read the statement by Mr. Graham: "I think they have made a good business deal." So he knew about it that early, when he made that statement.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: He was expressing an opinion as to something that had been done by others.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Yes, others; but are not the Canadian Railways under review today, as well as the connivance of the Government in the matter?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: There is no connivance.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I am quite willing to hook them up together if I can, because I think that will be the result. Then, let us take it on that basis, that $2,000,000 of the funds of the people of Canada—for the money of that railway is the money of the people of Canada—was transferred to the credit of this irresponsible Mr. Aronovici and a syndicate of men whose names the Minister of Railways said he did not know. This man of straw was handed the sum of $2,000,000 to play with. Thank God, he did not go to Brazil or South America with the money. They floated this scheme, they got the money, they formed their syndicate of unknown men, and cheerfully the Minister expresses the opinion, on page 3615 of Hansard:

"The Syndicate think they will make money out of it; they think it is a good purchase."

He did not demur to that. Again, on page 3615 will be found this statement of the Minister:

I said the other day the consent of the Government had not been asked to this transaction. The Board had a perfect right to enter into this transaction, and the matter was entered upon before the Government was consulted at all.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That is what I have just said.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: He says: "The President did not consult me."

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Hear, hear: he never knew anything about it.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: This is not under oath, you know. None of these statements are under oath, and what we ask is an inquiry under oath, to see what we may find out about it. Honourable gentlemen may smile, but the country is not smiling, and the Toronto Globe does not smile with them at all. The Globe, having regard for its standing as a paper, thinks it necessary to call this Government to account for the present, and say this matter must be inquired into—at least, that those charges in particular must be inquired into under oath.

That was the position of matters in 1923. Now we come down to 1924. We were told how the President had got rid of the services of Mr. Aronovici for some $40,000, and we read in the public press of the visit of Mr. Graham Bell to Paris. I will read from the Calgary Herald of January 30, 1924, this special despatch:

Major Graham Bell, Minister of Railways, has just returned here after several weeks in London and Paris on railway business, and he has something to say about the noted Hotel Scribe. "There is every reason for confidence," he says, "that the Hotel Scribe in Paris, which has been acquired by the Canadian National Railways, will not involve any adidtion to the burden of the system. All the floor space which will not be required by the Canadian National Railways or the Dominion Government has already been reserved by various financial and other institutions, many of them Canadian. We are persuaded that the revenue derived from rentals will not only pay for the maintenance of this office building, but will enable us to lay aside sufficient to build up a sinking fund to take care of the capital outlay."

Now, when the honourable gentleman reads the House reply—because I take it that he will—I hope he will give us a list of the engagements of those financial concerns that have entered into contracts for space in that building. I would be bound to say that they have not made a contract with any person, and none of them have been produced.

A certain amount of information about this hotel has been extracted in the House of Commons. A question was asked on April 24, on page 1258:

Sir Henry Drayton:

1. What was the total amount paid by or on account of the Canadian National Railways for and in connection with the Hotel Scribe, Paris?

2. Was the said amount paid out of the cash receipts of the National Railway? If not, how was the purchase financed and at what rate of interest?

3. What is the name of the company now nominally owning the Hotel Scribe and who are the directors?

4. What is the total amount of taxes paid or payable in respect of the said hotel for the year 1923?

Hon. Mr. Grahem: I have asked a good many times that this question stand. The difficulty is in getting from Paris the information which has been asked for. It has been cabled for.

Now mark! The acquisition of the property had been made in 1923, and up to 1924 this Government had been so derelict in its duties that it had not even telephoned to the President in the city of Montreal to find out anything about it—because there is the Minister's answer, and they have nothing to say yet; but he is trying to get the answer, so that the people of Canada may know something about this whole deal.

We come then to April 24, and by good luck the country was permitted to know something of what had become of the whole deal:

Sir Henry Drayton:

1. What was the total amount paid by or on account of the Canadian National Railways for and in connection with the Hotel Scribe, Paris?

2. Was the said amount paid out of the cash receipts of the National Railways? If not, how was the purchase financed and at what rate of interest?

3. What is the name of the company now nominally owning the Hotel Scribe and who are the directors?

Hon. Mr. Graham:

1. $2,733,693 including cost of property, taxes, imposts, removal of tenants, etc.

2. Current cash.

3. Société Anonyme Immobilière de la Rue Scribe; S. G. Archibald, Arthur Vanson, F. A. Young, Major Graham A. Bell, H. W. Harding.

I do not know who any of those gentlemen are apart from Mr. Bell. Perhaps the leader of the House will tell us when we get through. Then follows this other question:

Sir Henry Drayton:

Was the title to the Scribe Hotel, Paris, taken in the name of Aronovici, when first purchased by the Canadian National Railways?

The answer was:

Yes.

So it was taken in his name when the $2,000,000 was advanced.

Has the title to the said hotel been since transferred by Aronovici, and if so, to whom?

The answer was:

Société Anonyme Immobilière de la Rue Scribe.

This is the unpronounceable name of the Company.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It is an anonymous society—Société Anonyme.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Then comes the question:

What taxes or imposts were paid in connection with such transfer from Aronovici?

The answer was:

$62,153.39.

So that if you deduct from this amount that was paid, $2,733,000, the $62,153.39 it will give an idea of what the commission was, apart from the arrangement with some tenants, that went to this gentleman who was the lucky friend and confidant of the President of the railway.

At 6 o'clock, the Senate took recess.

The Senate resumed at 8 o'clock.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT (continuing): Honourable gentlemen, I will conclude the remarks I have to make on the Scribe Hotel with a few references to the financial aspect. In answer to a question asked in the House of Commons on May 14, 1924 it is stated that there was paid for the hotel property 28,000,000 francs, or approximately $2,000,000. The sum of $2,733,693, included the cost of the property, taxes, imposts, removals of tenants, etc. A reference to the question and answer will show that the cost of the hotel property was $2,000,000; so there is a difference between the cost of the building and the total cost of $671,540. In answer to another question on April 24, 1924, the statement is made that the taxes on the property amounted to $10,939.65. Take that from $671,540, there is left a balance of $660,600. That includes the land taxes and fees that would be payable to the State, because I am informed that they have in France land taxes such as we have in the province of Ontario. The question naturally arises, where did this $660,600 go? Was that a commission paid to Aronivici and perhaaps some unknown persons? That is a large amount, from which there will be deducted, if we ever get an examination into the whole matter, the item of the land taxes. I do not know what the land taxes are in France, but I will hazard this: that when we go into the question it will be discovered that by bungling and bad management there were two land taxes paid, because, as will be remembered, in the first instance the title is in Aronivici, and when the title passed to him there would be a land tax payable; and then when he transferred it to the present syndicate who represent the Government of Canada or the Canadian National Railways there would be an additional tax. These figures can only be ascertained by a full and fair inquiry under oath into the whole situation.

I am now going to refer to the handling of the Marine service connected with the National Railways. There has been in Canada ever since the war a great deal of complaint about the immense cost of the fleets that were placed on the ocean by the then Government. I am not going to enter into a discussion as to whether what was done was right or wrong. Had any man been wise enough to know the exact date upon which the war would end, no doubt there would not have been as many ships built, and many other huge expenditures would not have been made. But as we have not a Solon in Canada, a large number of ships were built, which, unfortunately, turned out to the detriment of Canada from a financial point of view. As my honourable friend the leader of the House is always anxious to compare our performances with those of the United States, I can only say that the over-expenditures in the naval service made by the United States were colossal as compared to those made by Canada. I think I can prove to the satisfaction of any unprejudiced mind that we in this country have lost thousand of dollars owing to the way this fleet of vessels has been handled. I am not going to refer to those on the ocean, because I do not profess any knowledge about them, but shall confine myself to those on the upper lakes. I have asked a series of questions in the House as to the fleet that was placed on the Great Lakes, and will now give, for future reference, a list of the vessels owned by the Canadian National Railways, or by Canada, that are on the upper lakes, together with the carrying capacity of those vessels. There is the T. J. Drummond.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Is that a Government boat?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Yes. The T. J. Drummond, with a carrying capacity of about 100,000 bushels; the J. A. McKee, with a carrying capacity of probably 115,000 or 120,000 bushels; then there was the Arthur Orr, with a carrying capacity of 145,000 bushels; there was the Kearsarge, with a carrying capacity of 100,000 bushels; the Canadian Adventurer, with about 110,000 bushels; the Canadian Pathfinder, the same; the Canadian Sailor, the same; the Canadian Signaller, the same; the Canadian Sower, the same, the Canadian Trader, the same; the Canadian Warrior, the same, the Canadian Engineer, the same. Honourable gentlemen will see from that that there was a fleet on the upper lakes, placed there a couple of years ago, consisting of twelve vessels.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Are they 'tween decks?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I will come to that in a moment, perhaps. Those twelve vessels had, in round figures, a carrying capacity of 1,500,000 bushels; that would mean that from the head of the lakes to Buffalo there could be transported by this fleet every week a million and a half bushels of grain.

A year or so ago, when there were such hard times, at least in the three Western provinces, when the farmers were complaining bitterly about the rates that were being charged by vessel combinations on the upper lakes, the Government instituted an inquiry into the matter. I have no doubt, although I have not seen the figures as yet, that this inquiry cost upwards of $25,000.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It was a cheap Commission.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: The fees paid to one lawyer alone amounted to $9,000. But I do not say the Government were wrong in appointing that Commission; I think they were perfectly right. But what a state of affairs was disclosed! It was shown that the farmers had had extracted from their pockets, by the brigands who were in charge of the system of levy and assessment, hundreds of thousands of dollars in insurance commissions and in other ways. This was public knowledge last spring; it was well known; it had been published in the press throughout Canada—and here was the season of navigation coming on, when it was to be expected that a Government with a knowledge of the facts would be doing something. They had not risen to the emergency and made criminal prosecutions, as they well might have done, although the Winnipeg Free Press and others were urging that those connected with the transaction should be prosecuted. Evidently believing they were immune from any action on the part of the Government to curb their greed and avarice in the year 1923, after the results of that inquiry had been laid bare before the public, what did the vessel owners do? A combination of those vessel owners and others placed the freight rate at 6 cents a bushel. Here was a great opportunity for the Government. They had a fleet of vessels that could move a million and a half bushels a week; and further, I am told that at the same time there were tied up in the city of Montreal six other vessels of a similiar class which could have been taken up there to aid the fleet to help the farmer of the West. Was that done? Here is a record that shows what was done by the Government last year in that connection. The rates were so excessive and the complaints of the Government allies in the other House, the Farmers' party—then their allies, now their masters—were so persistent that the Government placed some of these vessels on the upper lakes and started in operation a fleet that could transport a million and a half bushels every week, making the round trip.

Now, let me give some figures from the return. The Canadian Adventurer showed a net profit of $6,883; the Canadian Engineer, a deficit of $4,450; the Canadian Pathfinder, a profit of $13,342; the Canadian Sailor, a profit of $5,464; the Canadian Signaller, a deficit of $8,973; the Canadian Sower, a deficit of $1,153; the Canadian Trader, a profit of $17,078; the Canadian Warrior, a deficit of $10,007; the T. J. Drummond, a profit of $7,-200; the McKee, a profit of $7,000. The two biggest boats in the fleet showed deficits, the Arthur Orr having a deficit of $21,280, and the Kearsarge a deficit of $11,788.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: How do you account for those deficits when they had so much grain to carry?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: That is what the public wants to know.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The honourable gentleman ought to know. He is well posted, and lives on the Great Lakes.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Could the honourable gentleman say what the net profits are? Does that mean interest on the capital?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: No, that is on the net earnings.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Why would one vessel earn and another one lose? How does that come?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I will come to that in a moment. The Arthur Orr had a capacity of 145,000 bushels, and the Kearsarge of 160,-000 bushels. Remember, those are the two best and biggest boats in the fleet, and should have been the most profitable ones; yet they have the hugest deficits of the lot. Why, you can hardly handle some of those boats without making money. The explanation is this. It was only by fits and starts that the boats were dragged out and put into service. But no man can convince me that there was not some flaw or bad management in connection with the Arthur Orr and the Kearsarge, until I hear that evidence under oath. Why were not those vessels all put out at the start of the season? The Arthur Orr would carry freight worth $9,600 every week, and yet showed a deficit on the season's operations of no less than $11,788.

But that is not the worst of it. The handling of those boats is what I am complaining of. I do not say the President handled the boats, but I say there is some person with a bad influence handling them, in that way, and for reasons best known to himself, and only an inquiry can bring out how it was that they were so handled.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Who was the General Manager?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Tedford, I think, is the second, and Teakle, I think, is the superior man.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: He is not superior if he cannot do better than that.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I asked another question in the House the other day as to the prices paid for the carriage of coal on the Great Lakes for the Canadian National Railways. I received a letter then from the Secretary of the Department, Mr. Yates. The Government, or the Department of Railways, did not think it was proper to tell the rates at which they were carrying coal. I acquiesced in that and asked him if he would simply write me a letter stating the quantities of coal that had been carried. I said that would suffice for my purposes. Thereupon I received this memorandum or letter from Mr. Yates:

> With respect to your question on the Senate Order Paper re coal contracted for by Canadian National Railways for delivery to Great Lake ports, I beg to advise you that the following tonnages were handled last year to the following ports:
> | | Tons |
> |---|---|
> | Depot Harbour | 52,509 |
> | Key Harbour | 200,557 |
> | Midland | 158,084 |
> | Port Arthur | 372,985 |
> | Fort William | 735,564 |
> | Superior | 74,436 |
> | or a total of | 1,594,135 |

Mark you, that was coal carried for the Canadian National Railway—this company that had, as I have shown, that large fleet on the upper lakes and a number of boats of a similar class available at Montreal. Now, why did not the company place them in commission to carry that coal? Why, it is easy for any man who contemplates the situation for a moment to see why it was all done Had the Government boats moved forward and carried what they could of the two million bushels a week of grain at six cents a bushel, the competition would be so keen that the men who had been charging, and had been proven guilty of charging, excessive freight rates in the year before, would have had a competitor in the field. Competition was the very thing that the management of this road apparently did not desire. And would you believe, honourable gentlemen, what this Government, or the Department handling the ships, were doing? Remember that there were, in round figures, 1,600,000 tons of coal to be moved. My honourable friend from De Lanaudière (Hon. Mr. Casgrain) will agree with me that the rate would be fifty cents to the head of the lakes.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: It would not be that much.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: There was $800,000 that might have been earned by those boats, a number of which were tied up at the dock. And who do you think were getting the carrying of the coal? Let me read another part of the letter:

There were no signed contracts for floating this coal, and the tonnage was divided between the Canada Steamships Lines and the Playfair interests, the idea being to give Canadian bottoms the preference. When the Canadian bottoms were not available other vessels were used.

Now mark those words: the Canadian bottoms were to be given the preference, provided they belonged to either of these two companies—not the Canadian-owned vessels of the National Railways. Oh, no, they were to have no preference: they were not to be allowed in the trade, because the Government would not put them in, and if they wanted to carry the coal for the Railways they could not carry it, because the business had been given to those two favorite private companies.

In the first place, let us deal with the matter from this angle. These are not the only two companies in Canada that have large freighters on the Upper Lakes. Apart from the Canadian Government fleet, there is in the city of Toronto a firm known as the Matthews Company, or Matthews Brothers. They have some of the finest vessels on the lakes. Apart from the Grant Morden, they have, I think, two of the largest Canadian-owned vessels, and be it said to their credit—and I wonder what enourages them, considering how they are treated under this Government—they have been building in Collingwood, during the past winter, another large vessel, which will have, I understand, a sapacity of 400,000 bushels.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: That is the Playfair Line.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: No, the Matthews Brothers. Then there is the Sault Corporation: it has a considerable fleet. There are a number of other vessel companies that I might mention, having their headquarters in Montreal, in one place or another. But, honourable gentlemen, the Canadian National management say: "You must not have a pound of this vast quantity of coal to carry, because it is being saved up for the Canada Steamships and the Great Lakes Company."

Consider the advantage to Canada and to the Canadian National Railways if the Government vessels had been permitted to carry the coal. Mark you, 1,182,985 tons of this was destined for Fort William, Port Arthur and Superior. The Government vessels would have gone up carrying that coal and made a decent freight at half a dollar a ton, and would return with grain at six cents a bushel.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Can boats that carry grain carry coal?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Oh, yes.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: My honourable friend is a land-lubber.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: He lives in Winnipeg.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: He was born on the Red River.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Honourable gentlemen, consider the taxation this country has to bear to-day. You are faced with taxation whenever you go into a bank with your cheque to have it cashed, or when you enter a store to buy an article on which there is a sales tax, or when you pay a bill and have to put a tax stamp on your cheque. It seems inconceivable, that the Government stand for such management as that by the Canadian National Railways and allow the interests of the country to be sacrificed.

Go a little further with this precious letter:

When the Canadian bottoms were not available other vessels were used.

In other words, when the Canada Steamships Company or the Great Lakes Company had not a vessel, then other vessels were used. I wish that there were sitting in the House to-night, as there should be, a representative of these Railways, who could correct any statement that is wrong. Is not the Canadian National Railways management sufficiently interested in the complaint of the Senate of Canada to have a man here? I see officials of the Railway float into Midland in their private cars, and they are bobbing up all over the country, but this matter does not seem to have their attention even to the extent of their sending up here a clerk who could be interrogated as to whether statements made are right or wrong.

Once again I wish to emphasize that statement that "when Canadian bottoms were not available other vessels were used." The town of Midland has in it many young men who are captains, engineers, and boatmen of different kinds, and all last summer there you could see—what? the coal that was being carried there to the tune of 158,000 tons. Vessel after vessel was American. I want the honourable leader of the House to take note of this specially, and ask the Canadian National clerk, before he makes a reply in this House, whether my statements are not true.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I intend to have the officials of the Merchant Marine read my honourable friend's speech.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: And they will tell you they are true.

Why were these American vessels used? Because, the two companies having a blanket order, no other concern could poach on their preserve; nobody else could get any of the $800,000 for carrying freight. If you figure it at 50 cents a ton, you will see that the amount was $800,000, or $400,000 to each company.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: They would not get 50 cents a ton going to Midland.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Then, whatever it may have been. I think they would get that, and I will tell my honourable friend why. When they went to the head of the Lakes they would return with a cargo of grain. When they went to Midland they had to come out light and then proceed on their way, and they would probably have to go three hundred extra miles; so I think they probably would get the same freight. However, it meant nothing to them. The only trouble that occurred in the blissful lives of these two favourite companies was that they had to go for vessels to the United States, where any number of vessels were to be had, and they could secure them at the lowest possible figure, hire them and bring them over. And here were young men in Midland who could not get employment on these American vessels—of course not. To the annoyance and mortification of the people in Midland, here were these American vessels carrying in coal, whereas Canadian vessels were not allowed to participate in the trade at all or even to compete for it in the first instance.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: May I ask the honourable gentleman, is there any relationship between those two companies?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: No, they are quite separate. There is no affinity at all between the Canadian Steamships and the Great Lakes Company.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: I understood there was.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Now listen to this:

The Management state that it is not possible to carry the Railway's coal in Government-owned vessels owing to the construction and small capacity of the C.G.M.M. vessels on the Lakes, which prevents them from carrying coal for the same cost as vessels specially constructed for the purpose.

Now, I ask my honourable friend, who is a director of the Canada Steamships, have they a vessel constructed with a patent carrier for carrying coal?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: We shall have one this year.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Yes, but they had not a vessel constructed for carrying coal at all; they were just on a party with the other vessels.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Oh, no. The honourable gentleman will not compare 'tween decks with the lake freighters. You cannot get coal into 'tween decks or out of them very handily. The honourable gentleman knows that. On the other hand, the lake freighters have only hatches, and they are opened and the coal is poured out. The honourable gentleman knows that as well as I do.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I will answer that question immediately by reading from one of these papers:

The steamer Canadien Logger, recently sold by the Canadian Government Merchant Marine to the Kirkwood, Line, Montreal, as been rechristened Torhamvan by the latter company and will shortly load cargo at Great Lake ports for Vancouver, sailing via the Panama Canal.

Here is another one regarding a vessel called the Belchers, which was one of those vessels held at Midland all last winter. My honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Casgrain) wants to make out that those vessels are useless, and here are private parties going and buying them and putting them on right in competition with his own fine boats.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Why do they not buy the six that we have had tied up in the Harbour of Montreal for two years? You cannot get them to be taken even for scrap.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: My honourable friend knows that the Management of the Canadian National are doing everything possible to black-eye these lines, and despite this fact practical vesselmen will go and buy the vessels. I have no doubt that more have been sold than these two. Furthermore, my honourable friend knows that the vessel market is glutted to-day.

The writer of that letter addressed to the Department here has set down deliberately the statement that the vessels used are specially constructed. The implication is that the vessels of those two companies are specially constructed for the purpose of carrying coal. My honourable friend admits that they have not a vessel specially constructed for the purpose of taking out coal.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Our freighters have no 'tween-decks.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I will not contradict the honourable gentleman.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Has the Grant Morden 'tween-decks?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I do not think she has, but she is not specially constructed for handling coal.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: She is.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: The other company, the Great Lakes Company, has, out of a total of twenty-eight vessels, one boat that has on it a coal-carrier—only one in the whole lot. Yet the reason is given, and sent up here, in answer to a request made in the Senate, that these vessels used by the Government are specially constructed for the purpose. My honourable friend complains about these vessels, which must be black-eyed and blacklisted, that they cannot make money. How is he going to get over these returns? Here is one that shows that the Canadian Trader had a net profit of $17,078, and had she been carrying coal she would probably have made $35,000 in the season. Away with such absurdities as the statement that the Canadian National is being conducted so as to make these vessels pay. They are being operated for other purposes altogether—first, for political effect, and in the next place in order to see that their friends get the plums that are being dropped for them.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Perhaps my honourable friend could tell us whether the Management which was organized prior to the coming into power of the present Government has been changed within the past two years?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: It has had a change of heart.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It takes its instructions from the Government, I suppose.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I will not venture an opinion as to whether Mr. Teakle was there under both the former Government and the present Administration. I do not know whether he was or not, but I will say this, that surely this government who allege that they have business men at their head, seeing these vessels tied up in the city of Montreal, ought to take the time to suggest to the Canadian National management: "Why do not these vessels go out and carry something —do something in the way of business? But the fact is, they have been selling these vessels, and the purchasers have been putting them right in commission. I noticed the other day—for I often read of the shipments of grain from the head of the Lakes—that the Belchers, your much-despised boat, has come down with a cargo of grain; and she is carrying it at the very same figure as the others, or she would not get the trade.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The honourable gentleman knows that it is cheaper to keep a boat tied up at present than to send it out, because boats are operated at a loss.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: My honourable friend does not know what is going on, even with the Canada Steamships; so I will tell him something that will cheer him up. The present of $400,000 worth of freight that was made to his company last season, without competition, was not sufficient for them, and here is the news which will be cheering to the honourable gentleman as a director of the Canada Steamships Line.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I hope it will make the stock rise.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT (reading):

> The Management expect to move approximately the following tonnages of coal to Lake Superior and Georgian Bay ports this season, 975,000 tons.

So, while his company and the other favourite company will not have as fine a crop as they had last year, they are to have the carriage of nearly another million tons this year, and without competition and at the price they fixed for themselves.

That is not the worst feature. Let me show another way in which these National Railways cripple this country and pile up huge deficits for it. I wish Sir Henry Thornton would take my advice. I do not flatter myself that he was prompted to take action by anything I said last year, but, as the honourable gentleman will remember, I urged most strongly upon him, from my place in this House, the advisability of having an addition to the elevator capacity at Midland. My honourable friend will remember that I made my argument along this line, that to the two large elevators there, one with a capacity of two and a half million bushels, there should be added a further capacity of one million; and I am glad to say that that additional accommodation was added last year. We have to-day those two huge elevators with a capacity of about 5,000,000 bushels. Now, what are you doing for your elevators up there? Here is the season of grain-carrying. Read the reports day after day, and you will find the rush to Buffalo. What is the trouble with the elevators at Midland? The cogs are silent; only a handful of vessels have gone in there, and I do not know whether the Merchant Marine fleet has yet been put out on the lakes. Good management would be doing that this year; and remember, as the rates are low with those vessels, it is estimated there are 100,000 tons to be carried. The Government should have these vessels on between the head of the lakes and Midland carrying grain, then sending them all down to Buffalo or Cleveland for coal, and having them go back to the head of the lakes with a cargo of coal. But are they doing that? Of course, they are not. That would interfere with the Canada Steamships Company and with the Great Lakes Company. What is the other result of it? Not only have you this large investment in those two huge elevators, one with 1,000,000 bushel and the other with 4,000,000 bushel capacity, standing practically idle, but you have 150 miles of railway doing practically nothing beyond its passenger trade. The Canadian National is the only system that runs from Midland, to Lindsaw, to Peterborough, to Belleville, and then on the main line of the Grand Trunk. If your Canadian Government vessels were carrying that grain from Midland, your elevators would be active, and trains would be passing out of there, but not a bushel of grain, comparaively, is being carried on them. Why is that? Because you must not interfere with those two steamship companies. My honourable friend from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Taylor) alleged the other day that parties were being "greased" out there—to use a common phrase—and that that was how all those iniquities were going on. I wonder if anybody is being greased in Montreal in connection with this railway, to see that those two favoured companies have all this business?

Now, let the House be seized of that position. Here you have 150 miles of first-class railway up there, that in former years was carrying a large quantity of grain, that could have its own line of 15 or 20 vessels, to bring freight up from Montreal and employ both the elevators and the railway.

Some gentlemen may say that that is rather wild talk—that there is no other freight business up there except in grain; and one gentleman asked me if there was not lumber up there. No, there is no lumber trade up there for that 150 miles of railway, for this reason, that below Midland, at a distance of about three miles, there is a cut-off that runs over to a line running from Penetanguishene to Barrie, and that cut-off line intercepts the lumber there below Penetanguishene. The result is that we have two large mills in Midland cutting enormous quantities of Lumber, but they do not ship down the main line, as they did years ago; they run down those three miles to this cut-off, then cross over on the Penetanguishene branch and run down that way.

Some person conversant with that country would say: "What about the large mills at Victoria Harbour?" But that lines does not go down there; so that practically for 80 per cent of that line there is nothing doing at all, and the wheels are rusting on thousands of cars that could be used on the Government railway, and the rails themselves would grow rusty if it were not for the small grain trade that is being carried on to-day from freight.

Let me turn over the page, and show you another picture. If you stand at the town of Midland and look to the mouth of the harbour, every week you will see five large C.P.R. vessels going up and down, loaded with flour on the down trip, and even going outside to hire other vessels to carry flour, as they did last year. I do not say those boats are going at that rate all the season, but they are going part of the time.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Why don't they hire the Canadian Government boats? They would get them cheap.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I do not think the C. P. R. would be allowed to have those boats for any money. It is not the business policy of the Canadian National Railways to make money out of those boats; apparently it is to lose money. More than that, if you look at the returns from Fort William you will see every day or so accounts of vessels going over to Duluth filled with screenings from the elevator, as they are called. You could get a lot of work there, but there is never a Canadian National boat on that trade.

Let us be charitable and believe that the management of those boats is thoroughly and utterly asleep, and do not know what is going on in the world, rather than incline to the idea that they are in complicity with other companies in giving them the business.

But that is not the only place where the Company could be carrying on up there. Just look at the map, in your mind. There is Chicago, a short run across from Midland or Depot Harbour, and you could carry corn that is offering, or early summer grain, and the wheat that is offering, and it could be carried on those Government boats to Montreal and then distributed to the eastern cities. Under Mr. Charles M. Hays the old Grand Trunk, with its attenuated outfit and limited capital, was doing business where this concern to-day, with its untold millions, does not know where to look for business. My honourable friend nods his head.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I say Government ownership is no good; I have always said that.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Government ownership is no good under its management to-day.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Under any management.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Then we must try to expose its extravagance, in the hope, futile though it may be, of improving it. Every word that I have said about the failure of these Government officials to do business over that line of railway from Midland down to Montreal, both as to American grain and Canadian grain, applies with double force against the line from Parry Sound to Depot Harbour. What are they carrying on for? This management does not want to make money. They sit up at nights and look at that awful sinner last year, the Canadian Trader, making a net profit of $17,000, and saying: "Spike her this year; see that it does not occur again." I would like to have one of those officials before a Committee and ask him the simple question: "How did you ever let that one escape and earn $17,000 in a season? Why didn't you get her into a hole with the other three or four or five, and be able to show a deficit?"

Now, I do not say that the C. P. R. is carrying enormous quantities of grain through Port McNichol this year—I am speaking about grain in bulk—because it is a well known fact that the greater part of the grain is gravitating to Buffalo and Port Colborne, and there being transhipped into smaller boats. I think the work of the boats of the Great Lakes Company proves that, too; they are transhipping grain there, while your lines from Parry Sound or Midland to Montreal are not doing business. Why should you not concentrate on those two points with your vessels and your railway and your elevators, and try and do business? What explanation can the management give? There are only two explanations—the people in charge of this organization are either knaves or fools, and the public will never know it until it is all inquired into.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I venture to say that all those gentlemen handling the Merchant Marine were selected by the Administration that preceded this one, and that no change has been made.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Well, that is a poor answer.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Why not make a change?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: It is a poor answer. Fancy the blindness, the listlessness of the present Government, and more particularly—with all due deference to their representatives in the Government from Montreal—that when they see these vessels, as they saw them last year, tied up at docks, under this Management, they did not seek for some way of changing such conditions. Cannot some business method be brought into the matter?

Now I want to call attention to this question about those boats being undesirable owing to their construction, and the small capacity which prevents them from doing the trade, and so on. I have in my hand a list of one of the favoured companies, the Great Lakes Company, with 28 vessels.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Is that the Playfair Company?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Yes, the Richardson-Playfair or whatever you may call them—the Great Lakes, Glen Steamship, or Glen Line; but they are all the same company—the Great Lakes Company. Now, out of those 28 vessels there are 15 that have a lower tonnage than these vessels, yet they are employed with sagacity and wisdom on the line from Port Colborne down to Montreal. They run the larger vessels down to the lake ports, and discharge to the others. In that way they have a clever business arrangement, and I presume that arrangement was followed out by the Canadian Steamships Company as well. So that the statement that these boats are too small is absurd.

And was it not the unkindest cut of all when I discovered from the public prints that they have sold two of those boats which they say are too small for the work, and undesirable for any purpose, even carrying coal; and after they had unloaded those two boats they actually would not let them carry the Government coal? At least, the Government might have given them a chance to carry the coal.

Now, what is the trouble about those boats that we hear so much of? Those boats were built during the time of the war. They were constructed for Atlantic sailing—ocean service. The boiler and the engines are placed in the center, or amidships, and at each end is a space for grain. When one of those boats comes up to the elevator the leg of the elevator moves out at the port bow, and then goes to the stern, and empties the part out there. Now, where is the handicap? There is no handicap at all on them.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The honourable gentleman knows very well that the great lake freighters have, hatches the whole length of the ship, and others, the 'tween decks, are not made to carry grain profitably.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I will come to the 'tween decks that trouble my honourable friend so much, but he will agree that although the machinery is in the center they can be unloaded—first the portion at the stern and then the portion at the bow.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: But they are not profitable in operation.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: There is the point. Now, my honourable friend will not contend that the ordinary grain freighter, when she goes up to the elevator, discharges all the cargo at the forward hatch and is never moved. That is absurd, because in the bulk of hoppers, when they take out of the bow of the boat, they move her backwards and forwards to the other hatches, and that is the way they have to treat these boats, too. But better than all that I can tell him—and I will not be personal about the matter—there have been none of those boats lost on the Great Lakes, where some other companies have lost boats, because they are bigger, better and stronger boats.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Yes, that is right.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: And if human life means anything to the Government they need not be afraid to put those boats out to Lake Superior, because I have been told that when other boats were lying tied in behind a point these went out on the lake.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: But they are not profitable lake carriers.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Now, I have a poser for my honourable friend, who is so strong in defence of this company, and thinks because they are not ordinary lake-carriers that they are an unfortunate holding for the country. I would ask my honourable friend to look into the fact. The T. J. Drummond was an ordinary lake freighter, and the A. J. McKee was also, and yet they sold those two boats. The choice boats they sell. Why, it is all humbug, and the honourable gentleman knows it. Some of his friends of the Canada Steamships Company wink the other eye and say: "What a great thing it is to start out for our earnings with half a million tons of coal to carry." Look at the advantage they have over other companies. Matthews Brothers' huge boats are not allowed to compete at all, because the business is all allocated to those two. What a cheerful matter of consideration it must be when the Great Lakes Company and the Canada Steamships Company read items such as this, that appeared in yesterday's papers:

Cleveland, May 20.—Wild cargoes are very scarce in other lines, as contract tonnage is taking about all the business, and some coal carriers are taking short loads. There is no change in sight, and owners will have to hustle to keep all boats that are in commission busy. The car supply is good, and ore carriers are not spending much time in port.

No worry for the Canada Steamships and the Great Lakes Companies; they have their cargoes secured, thanks to those kindly officials, for the whole season. "Rest and be thankful, and let the public be damned."

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I hope you are telling the truth. We have not paid a dividend for three years on the preferred stock.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: My honourable friend will go into another field to look for the losses on the Canada Steamships and not on the Great Lakes. Are these matters for investigation, gentlemen? Why, you have hundreds of thousands of dollars invested in vessels.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Millions invested.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Millions, yet you will not allow your own vessels to carry your quantities of coal, amounting to such enormous figures as they do—last year 1,594,135 tons, and this year 1,000,000 tons. No Canadian National Railway boats can carry that coal. The management says so, and "let the public be damned." That is the attitude taken.

Speaking for myself, I want to see this matter exposed in all its entirety, and if its officials are wrong then let them be attended to. Yet we are told that we are assaulting the Management of the Canadian National Railways when we go into matters of this kind. Nobody is assaulting the Canadian National Railways at all; it is the Management in certain directions and in certain quarters, when they are buying Scribe Hotels, when they are coming to handle boats like this; and if the time has not arrived to interfere with the Management in that regard, then I much mistake the temper of this House. I am not going to be frightened out by the statements that President Thornton makes. He goes out of his way to insult the people who think, as representatives of the people, they have a right to discuss these matters.

Speaking the other day at the city of Toronto, he made the following statement, which was broadcasted so that the people of Canada could hear his opinion of any person who dared to open his mouth and say one word about the outrageous transactions—and that is a mild term for the exposure that I make. Sir Henry Thornton made the following statement:

Do not take seriously the campaign of vilification with respect to certain of our officers and employes which is being industriously promoted in certain quarters. You may rest assured that, although no improper acts will be tolerated on the part of anyone in the service, the administration will be equally zealous in protecting the good name of its officers and employes whose only fault may have been that they have faithfully fulfilled their duties, irrespective of attempted pressure.

Certain interests are determined to prevent the ultimate success of the people's railway. By constantly stirring up turmoil and bringing malicious charges, they hope to discourage the administration, the officers and the employes, but we are not built that way. We are not hunting trouble but, on the other hand, we do not intend to run from it.

Now, where is the vilification of any officials? When I have explained—

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I do not know whether my honourable friend follows his phrases as he delivers them to us, but some of the high officials he has practically treated as pickpockets this evening.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I have said that the management of this fleet shows that the people in charge are either knaves or fools, and I do not intend to take back one word of it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend has repeated more than once that the Merchant Marine administrators were either fools or knaves.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I have no hesitation in saying that it was a foolish policy or else it was knavishness.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: And my honourable friend adds that perhaps some people have been greased, either in Montreal or elsewhere.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That will be very interesting reading to some of these people who are giving their time to this work.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I said my honourable friend from Westminster had showed such facts and circumstances as would imply that there had been what is commonly known as greasing going on out there, and I said it would be common knowledge in Montreal and elsewhere—

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Where is the grease put?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: It is not put on the machinery of these vessels; they are tied up at the docks.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: It is put where it will do the most good.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: If honourable gentlemen think there should not be some inquiry into these matters, well and good; but in all fairness, Matthews Brothers, who built a boat at Collingwood last year, should be given a chance to tender for the carriage of coal.

What is this Government doing? It is advertising mail contracts at $40 a year, and spending probably $125 in doing so; but when it comes to the carrying of freight, no tenders will be received. That is the ground that has been taken by the management, and if I have said anything to-night that will provoke those gentlemen or any of the employees to come to the rescue of their reputations, they will beg the Government to grant an inquiry so that they may explain their position. It would be well to do that, and the Government will not be the friend of those employees unless it gives them an opportunity of being heard before a special Committee of this House. I know the Minister of Railways and Canals sounded the keynote when he gave that carefully and studiously prepared statement to the Montreal Gazette. I fancy that when the statement is read in the Globe office, in the face of what that newspaper said the other day, that these matters must be investigated thoroughly under oath, it will be said: "Isn't it wonderful that Graham should issue such a statement as this?" Let the House listen to the closing intimation given to Government supporters as to what the Government wishes them to do:

> It would only be fair that the Committee appointed to investigate in the Senate should have this report before it before starting further investigation. However, the easiest and most direct and satisfactory manner of procedure would be for those who made these charges of conspiracy, etc., if they believe in them, to lay informations either in the criminal or civil courts of British Columbia. This would give men who declare their innocence, full opportunity to defend their characters before a totally independent tribunal.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: That is not a bad idea.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: My honourable friend agrees with the Honourable George E. Graham.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: What are the courts for?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Both of them are rather well known in their own localities as practical politicians, and when they find that something black is looming up on the horizon, they think the best thing to do is to put a good face on it anyway. Charges are made including almost every crime in the calendar except murder.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: What about rape?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Almost every crime except murder—defrauding, conspiring, and swindling the people of Canada out of their money; then the Minister of Railways coolly tells the member who has made the statements, and who I do not think will go behind them, to go down in his pocket and prosecute these people. That is the intimation that is handed out to the honourable gentleman to the right of the Speaker. I can tell Mr. Graham that I think he misjudges the intelligence and honesty of honourable gentlemen who sit on the other side of this House, as well as on this side, if he thinks they are going to take the tip of a practical politician, and say: "Peace; be still; smother it."

Who ever heard of such a thing? Has not my honourable friend the leader of the House read in the press only recently that a high official of the Agricultural Department was decapitated because he was seen going on some official business accompanied by a golf stick? But when crimes most black and foul are alleged here by a member, who, as a member of the House, is responsible, the Minister of Railways and Canals says: "Go to British Columbia at your own expense and prosecute them." I do not think the leader of the Government saw that statement before it was put in black and white.

In the last matter referred to, I concede at once that President Thornton does not figure at all; I do not allege that he does, except inasmuch as he has not got competent men under him. But now I come to another matter connected with the National railways —the Home Bank affair. The Home Bank affair, and the Scribe Hotel affair, are like the play of Hamlet—if you took out Hamlet it would not be much of a play; and if you take out the President in the Scribe Hotel affair and the Home Bank affair, there would not be much of a play. What is this Home Bank affair? I want to be fair to President Thornton, so I will read you a statement showing how it struck him. Under date of October 1st, 1923, there appeared in the Montreal Gazette a conversation between the President of the road and the Gazette reporter. We are all old enough to know that every person except the reporter is present when these interviews are given out. This has all the earmarks of having been prepared in the Grand Trunk offices, and in proof of that I would point to the fact that it went out by the Canadian Press, so that all the papers had it in the same way. Why, honourable gentlemen, in the province of Ontario, when the Home Bank closed its doors, there was a cry of dismay from thousands and thousands of people who had lost their money. This cry went up all over the country. True, there were some clever people who took thir money out at the last moment, and who, since repentant, are returning it. I have heard intimations of that as late as to-day.

So, Sir Henry Thornton, knowing the state of public feeling, at once rushed into an interview which was published in the newspapers. We will see what it says:

Toronto, September 30.—"No political influence or influence of any sort instigated the deposit," declares Sir Henry Thornton, president of the Canadian National Railways, in a statement relative to the million dollar deposit of the C.N.R. in the Home Bank last May 28, and which was withdrawn June 2.

"The board of directors of the C.N.R. meets on the fourth Monday of each month," he proceeded. "At the time of the meeting prior to the making of the deposit it was suggested by Mr. Gough that the Home Bank be given a share of our banking business. Accordingly, a deposit of $1,000,000 was made, but it remained in the Home Bank for a few days only, as shortly after the deposit was made it was brought to my attention that Mr. Gough was an active official of the bank.

"There is nothing more natural than the fact that we should give a portion of our banking business to Toronto, where we derive such a large portion of our revenue, and which is the very home of support for public ownership.

"I can say with complete assurance that, with the exception of Mr. Gough, not one official of the National Railways is in any way connected with the Home Bank. What is more, no one suspected that the affairs of the bank were in any way involved. For myself, the first intimation I received of the bank's difficulties was the news in my morning paper."

Asked as to the attitude of the National Railways toward the banking connections of Mr. Stewart, director of the Bank of Montreal, and Mr. Decary, director of La Banque Nationale, who are also directors of the C.N.R., Sir Henry said: "We consider that the connection of these gentlemen is entirely different from that of Mr. Gough. They act in a more or less advisory or honorary capacity, while Mr. Gough was an active official, concerned with the policy and management of the bank.

"The keynote of the whole situation is this: 'The transaction could only be termed questionable if it had been made knowing of the condition of the Home Bank. When I say that we had no inkling whatever of the state of affairs, I believe that it should completely clear up all comment.' "

Now, let us take this statement of Sir Henry Thornton seriatum. He says:

Accordingly, a deposit of $1,000,000 was made, but it remained in the Home Bank for a few days only, as shortly after the deposit was made it was brought to my attention that Mr. Gough was an active official of the Bank.

Now, mark you, it was not until after the deposit was made that the President of the road became aware of the fact that Mr. Gough was an active official of the bank. Well, all I can say to that is that if we have this investigation, I think President Thornton will want to brush up his recollection as to that statement. Surely he was interested enough when appointments were made to the Board to ask who Mr. Gough and the other gentlemen were. The first thing that went into the newspapers when Mr. Gough was appointed was the statement that he was a director of the Home Bank and other companies. The man on the street will laugh when he reads that story of President Thornton's, that he did not know that.

Let me picture a scene to the leader of the Government. Does he remember the wonderful trip that was taken through the West on what was termed the "Train de Luxe"? The first time Sir Henry Thornton went to the West, headlines appeared in the press all over the country telling about that train—of the sleepers, dining cars and so on—and I am pretty sure that my recollection is good, and that Mr. Gough was in the party. Fancy the President and the directors sitting there in the car on this trip, which took probably a couple of weeks, and never once, during the course of their conversation, mentioning that Mr. Gough was connected with the Home Bank. I know a few directors of banks, and I have not seen many of them hiding their lights under a bushel. I will warrant that if that statement is placed before Sir Henry Thornton, and he is asked if he did not know that Mr. Gough was a director of the Home Bank, he will not deny it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I will put my honourable friend to the test here and now. There is his leader, and here is my humble self. I defy my honourable friend to say offhand to what boards the leader of the Conservative party or I belong.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Well, not to the Home Bank, I might say.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: My leader is such a modest man that I would not mention it; but the leader of the Government cannot keep his light under a bushel, because the newspapers placard the fact that he is connected with a cotton mill that was very tenderly treated by the Government.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The honourable gentleman in his remarks attributes that to the leader of the Opposition, not to myself. As a matter of fact, the mill of which my honourable friend speaks has been very tenderly attended to by the Government by a double decrease in the tariff in the last two years.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The honourable gentleman from Mille Iles (Hon. Mr. David) is going to wipe that out.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Another statement is this:

> There is nothing more natural than the fact that we should give a portion of our banking business to Toronto, where we derive such a large portion of our revenue, and which is the very home of support for public ownership.

Then we go on to the opinion of the whole transaction. Of course, the answer of my honourable friend will be that the Government has conducted an investigation into the Home Bank. There has been an investigation with expensive lawyers, who, according to the returns in the other House, were paid the trifling sum of $250 and $200 a day. "They have exhausted everything. What is the good of having an inquiry into this matter?" I will tell you why, in my humble judgment, it is necessary—because the public want every light thrown on this question they can possibly get.

I looked up the official Gazette of last year, and what did I find in the returns made by banks? On March, 1923, there was deposited with the Home Bank $6,658,842 on demand, and $12,071,041 on notice. On April 30th, the deposits were as follows: on demand, $5,893,393, and on notice $12,104,004. The notice deposits were practically the same on both those dates, but there was a decrease in the demand deposits of very nearly $1,000,000. Here was an institution the stock of which was not selling very high on the stock market, and which for that reason was more or less discussed. And here his own published statement showing the position in which it stood, with the decreasing deposits. I allude now to the demand deposits. Here was the fatal day, May 31, 1923, approaching, when another return showing the deposits would have to be made. The return was made, and I would call the attention of the House to what it was on that date. There were deposits payable on demand of $6,565,100, and deposits by the public on notice, $13,310,000. So there was a betterment of those payable on demand of $1,000,000. Had it not been for the $1,000,000 that was deposited by the Canadian National Railways, the deposits of that month would have been lower than those of April or March.

Something had to be done, and that something was done. I have in my hand a copy of the evidence of May 7th; it is No. 10 of the published evidence. I am not going to say that this inquiry as conducted by the lawyers was unfair, so far as the public is concerned. Mr. Symington, of Winnipeg, conducted the examination on behalf of the Government, and I am free to say that on its face it appears to be a fair examination. All lawyers present their cases on the evidence that has been adduced. Now let us look at this evidence, bearing in mind the statement of Sir Henry Thornton on the 30th of September, just after the event, that at a meeting of the Board of Directors of the C.N.R. on the fourth Monday "it was suggested by Mr. Gough that the Home Bank be given a share of our banking business." Here we have the evidence of Mr. Graham Bell, who says, point blank, that nothing at all occurred like what Sir Henry Thornton said. There was nothing at all done at the Board meeting about that million-dollar loan. Here is the statement:

On the third Monday in May our regular meeting happened to fall on the 21st May; I attended a meeting of the Board of Directors on that day and tendered my resignation, which was accepted at the Board meeting. The meeting was held in Sir Henry Thornton's office. Mr. Gough, who was a Director of the railway, and also a Director of the Home Bank—I did not know at the time that he was Vice-President of the Bank, I knew he was a Director—approached me immediately after the meeting, and asked, as we were dividing up some of our accounts with different banks, we had taken a couple of new banks into our banking arrangements shortly before this, and on account of the business they were doing, the different members of the bank, Directors, were doing, which would be of interest to the railway, he urged that the Home Bank could use some money at that moment, before the end of the month and they would have funds coming in at the first of the next month, and asked if we would not build up a deposit.

I am not going to quibble on the question whether it was at the meeting of the Board or afterwards. The President was evidently mistaken about that, because it happened after the meeting was concluded.

I told him I had resigned and I refused to do it. I also told him he would have to see the President. He walked over to the President and the President called me over and said—he was talking to another Director—"I am busy, Bell, and you go into this and if you are satisfied go ahead with it and then you can confirm it at the next meeting, you act for me in this." So I had another conversation with Mr. Gough.

My purpose in reading that portion of the evidence, which is to be found at page 523, is to show that the President knew that application had been made for a temporary loan of $1,000,000, and, at least for the time being, divested himself of responsibility by handing it over to Mr. Bell. It is immaterial, in the eyes of the public, whether he handed it over to Mr. Bell or not, because the public hold the President of the Railways responsible for what did happen.

I will not weary the House with all of this, but I want to emphasize one or two of the points in the evidence. Mind you, it was on the 21st of May that this conversation or application regarding a loan took place, and it was not until the 28th of the month that the money was paid over. What happened in the interval?

The only witnesses that were called were Mr. Graham Bell and Mr. Yates, the Treasurer, but there was another gentleman who knew all about it. Let me read now from page 526:

Q. Now you have told us, Major Bell, everything you know about this, all the conversations you had?—A. No, pardon me. There was another conversation. Mr. Ruel was in the Board room at the time this took place, and about the first of the month I think, I cannot be sure Mr. Ruel will probably give you the exact date, he called me on the phone and he asked me if I had made this deposit; he said he had learned that Mr. Gough was a Vice-President. I said Yes, but I had given instructions to withdraw it. He said that was allright, and that ended the matter. He can give you that.

Why was Mr. Ruel not called? Why was he not handed over by the Government to Mr. Symington when Mr. Bell had stated, according to the evidence, that Ruel was conversant with the facts? And why this delay from the 21st to the 28th? The public would like to know what happened with all the officials connected with that.

Now turn to page 535. Here is a most remarkable letter. Before reading it let me state generally the purport of Mr. Graham Bell's testimony, and that of Mr. Yates. From the frank manner in which both gentlemen gave their evidence, and from my knowledge of them, I am confident that they told the truth in answer to every question they were asked. What was the situation? The President had been applied to by the co-director, Mr. Gough, for $1,000,000 as a temporary loan, and had told Mr. Graham Bell to act according to his own discretion. The matter was discussed with Mr. Ruel, another director, and Mr. Yates, the Treasurer, and it was agreed that that $1,000,000 should be handed over to the Home Bank on certain conditions. What were those conditions? On page 535 there appears a letter from Mr. Ross, who is connected with the Bank. The letter was dated May 25th and was addressed, as I understand to the Bank wherein the deposit was made:

Mr. Yates, General Treasurer, of the Canadian National Railways, advised the writer this morning that he is giving us not later than Tuesday a deposit of one million dollars which will be drawn out again on the 2nd of June, and we would ask you not to draw anything against same. Mr. Gough, our Vice-President, arranged with Mr. Yates for this deposit.

Mr. Ross does not give evidence. With whom did he make the arrangement that when the million dollars went into the Home Bank's coffers it was to be there intact? It might as well have been placed in a safety vault in the Home Bank, because it was there on the condition that it was not to be drawn upon.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: That was protecting the Government's money.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Certainly, and deceiving the public. My honourable friend was not a depositor or he would not think it was such a merry matter.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If it was Canadian Government money, the Government is a party to it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It was withdrawn in due time.

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: Nobody was hurt.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: A la Mr. Murdock.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I ask why, in the face of that evidence, was Mr. Ross, the writer of that letter, not called to explain with whom he made this contract that the money was to be earmarked and nothing was to be checked up against it. Is it surprising that the following letter also appears in the evidence?

Montreal, Que., May 28, 1923.

Confidential.
James A. Yates, Esq.,
General Treasurer,
Canadian National Railways,
Montreal.

Dear Sir,—Will you kindly accept our best thanks for the deposit of one million dollars. This amount has been placed to a Special Account according to our arrangements and we note same will be withdrawn between the 2nd and 4th of June.

Why the necessity of marking that letter "confidential?" I notice a number of other letters passing between the Department and the Bank, and they are not marked "confidential."

There is the situation before the public. The Government employ counsel for the so-called inquiry, and hand over certain witnesses, and after counsel has examined them to the best of his ability and extracted from them all the information he could, it appears that there are two men, Mr. Ruel and Mr. Ross, who probably know more about the matter than anybody else, and they are not placed on the stand at all.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The honourable gentleman knows that the depositors are represented by able counsel who are interested in establishing moral responsibility on the part of the Government, and who are acting as complainants.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I know that that is so, but it may not have occurred to these counsel that the two gentlemen I have mentioned should be called as witnesses. I know it would occur to an ordinary man reading the evidence, whether a lawyer or a layman, that he would like to hear Mr. Ruel's statement, and also the statement of Mr. Ross.

What was the situation as it presented itself? A bank on its last legs, as was shown when the final crash came; its deposits falling; a move made to increase its deposits to the tune of $1,000,000; and an arrangement made by the President of the road, or assented to by him—although he too was absent from the inquiry and not called as a witness. That million dollars was taken out of the funds of the Canadian National Railways, earmarked, placed practically in a vault where it would not be touched, and left in the Home Bank for three or four days after the 1st of June—for what purpose? As stated by one witness at page 525:

Q. It was not to be withdrawn then after the first of the month?—A. No, it was only when I learned that Mr. Gough was Vice-President that I decided to do this. I carried out my promise. I did not want to inconvenience him, taking it out at the end of the month, as I had given him this promise, and I had no doubt be had made his arrangements accordingly. After the first of the month, Mr. Gough knew that deposit might be $1 or $100,000 or might be a debit balance; but what he was anxious for— at least I drew that from his conversation—was that that million dollars should be there at the end of the month, and he gave me his reasons, that he had funds coming in, and it was a usual thing in banking to do that.

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: Did not the Ontario Government do that same thing through Mr. McGarry?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: When the bank failed?

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: No, not when it failed.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Two years ago.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: He was not the Treasurer, to do it.

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: Not when it failed, but before that.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I am bound to say that Mr. Gough and another director approached the Ontario Government and asked them to place on deposit $1,000,000 to tide them over the end of the month.

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: Apparently others did.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: There are the facts of the case, and it has been only partially inquired into, three of the most prominent witnesses not having been called. Surely in the interest of the public this matter should be fully cleared up. It ought to be referred to a special committee of this House, in order that they may inquire into it and if necessary hear in addition to the other witnesses the President, Mr. Ruel and this Mr. Ross, of the Bank.

Honourable gentlemen, that is all I have to say on the question of the Home Bank. I have addressed myself to three matters—the Home Bank, the Hotel Scribe, and the handling of the Marine fleet. If this House considers that these questions, and the charges made by my honourable friend from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Taylor) should be treated in the manner in which the Minister of Railways and Canals treats them, I shall regret it for the honour of the House. I consider it my duty to urge the adoption of this resolution that I have proposed, that an inquiry be made by a Committee of the Senate who will examine witnesses under oath. I would ask honourable gentlemen on the opposite side of the House, and particularly the honourable leader, to remember that there stands on record the motion of the leader of his party, the present Prime Minister of Canada, moved in 1921, for an inquiry into the Canadian National Railway Company's affairs—an inquiry much more searching, and more thorough than that which I propose. In the face of that former resolution, how can the honourable leader of this House suggest that an inquiry into this matter should be refused? I trust that an inquiry will be granted and that the matter will be probed to the very bottom.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH: Did I understand the honourable gentleman to say that the tracks and the wheels of the cars were rusting for want of freight traffic from the Georgian Bay ports, and that only passengers were being carried? Did he not state that no grain was coming down on the Midland division of the Canadian National road during the summer? Can the honourable gentleman give us an estimate of the amount of grain that was carried from the Georgian Bay ports down the Midland division of the Canadian National road during the year 1923, or from April, 1923, to the present time?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I think that last year the quantity carried through Midland was about 40,000,000 bushels; but if the rate at which they are going this year is kept up, the quantity will be far away from 40,000,000.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH: That is considerable for the railway to carry. I understood the honourable gentleman to say there was none carried—nothing but passenger traffic.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I did not say that there was nothing but passenger traffic. I said that the lines up there were in such a way that there was practically little or no lumber carried and that the grain trade was a nonentity at present; and so it is.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH: The grain trade is not a nonentity when 40,000,000 bushels are carried from the Midland division down to Montreal.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: If the honourable gentleman knew the situation better he would not speak of it in that way. Let me tell him this, that formerly only the grain that went from Midland passed through Lindsay, but owing to a change in the arrangements they are now sending also any grain that comes from Parry Harbour. Consequently there should be a double quantity of grain passing through Lindsay.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH: I know that the trains went through there loaded with grain during the grain-carrying season. One was scarcely out of sight of the other. They went through during the summer as fast as they could go, with locomotives carrying fifty or sixty cars, down to Belleville.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: Does the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Bennett) contend that at the time of that advance of $1,000,000 an arrangement was made as to how long it should be in the Bank? That is, as I understand, the evidence that was given before the Home Bank Commission. On the other hand, Sir Henry Thornton states in the letter which the honourable gentleman has read, I think, that it was an after-thought of his when he found that Mr. Gough was Vice-President of the Bank.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Yes, there is a direct conflict between the statement made by Sir Henry Thornton and the sworn evidence, because Sir Henry Thornton says it was only after he learned that Mr. Gough was Vice-President of the Bank that the money was withdrawn.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Does the honourable gentleman move his motion?

Hon Mr. BENNETT: I moved it when I rose.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But it was not put from the Chair.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I now move the motion I read when I opened my remarks.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, I was ready to follow my honourable friend and discuss the merits of his proposition as I found it on the Order Paper. I had no hesitation as to what stand I would take on the demand for an inquiry into matters which are at present under investigation in Vancouver; nor had I any hesitation as to the stand I would take on the other itemized charges or matters of investigation.

But my honourable friend has given us an hour's disquisition on the management of the Merchant Marine, and I confess I am not at all in a position to answer him. As he has made very serious charges against the managers of that branch of the service, I think I owe it to the Senate and to myself to inform myself. I would therefore move the adjournment of the debate, to be taken up next week.

Hon Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Better fix a day.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No, I may not have the information on all those matters.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But fix a day: you cannot adjourn it till next week.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I moved to adjourn the debate, and when that is decided we can fix the date.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But you cannot adjourn it sine die; it would fall to the ground, so you must mention a day.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have no objection to doing so. My idea would be to say Wednesday next, but we had better move the adjournment of the debate, and after that is carried, the question would be put from the Chair as to what date.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would have it put down for Wednesday, the first Order after third readings.

The motion to adjourn the debate was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I may not have opportunity, before the day when we take this matter up again, to draw the attention of the Senate to a very important discussion that took place in the House of Commons in the Session of 1921 on the management of the Canadian Railways by the Government, and the right of investigation or supervision by Parliament. I would therefore urge the members of the Senate to read that debate in the other House, because it indicates the very great difficulty of the problem which will confront us, and which I will discuss quite fully when the matter comes up.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Will my honourable friend say that there were specific charges alleged in the resolution that was debated?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is the distinction.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I know, but the whole question of the administration and control of state-owned railways by the Parliament of Canada was covered by the discussion in the Session of 1921. I mention it because I think it will interest the members of the Senate.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS BRANCH LINE BILLS

CONSIDERATION DEFERRED

On the Order:

Second reading Bill 31, an Act respecting the construction of a Canadian National railway line between Grande Fresnière and Rinfret Junction, in the province of Quebec.—Hon. Mr. Dandurand.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: May I suggest to my honourable friend that it is probably too late for him to go into a lengthy explanation of the principles involved in connection with all these branch line Bills. I presume it is only necessary to make a statement of policy in reference to one; yet, I think it should be made. The subject is of sufficient importance to command the attention not only of this House, but of the country, because more than ordinary attention is directed to the action of the Senate in regard to these particular Bills. I think this is an occasion upon which we should have an exposition of the policy of the Government in reference to all of these Railway Bills. I do not ask for an explanation of details at all, but only of the broad and general principles upon which the Government feels justified in entering upon such a large expenditure as will be involved in the carrying out of the construction of the different branches covered by the twenty-six Bills which I understand are to come before us. If my honourable friend would make that explanation to-morrow, no time would be lost. I would not for a moment stand in the way of accelerating the consideration of this question, but I apprehend that my honourable friend has in view the submission of these Bills to the Standing Committee on Railways, Telegraphs, and Harbours, so as to permit of an inquiry into the merits of each Bill. Inasmuch as that Committee will not be able to meet until Wednesday or Thursday next, no time will be lost by allowing the Bills to stand until to-morrow, when we can have a proper discussion of the principle or policy involved.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I do not know whether my honourable friend desires me to go further than to say that the Canadian National Railways were reconciled to the idea expressed by the Senate last year that separate Bills should be brought down, rather than one Bill with a schedule indicating the number of lines to be constructed. Last year I expressed the opinion that the different branches could be treated as separate units under the one Bill; yet the Bills are now before us covering certain branch lines.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is not what I refer to.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend, I suppose, refers to the method of construction.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes. May I further elaborate upon what I have already observed? What I am anxious to hear from the Government is a statement as to the fundamental principles applicable to the building of these twenty-six branches, involving, as it does, the construction of about 1,100 miles of railway. Is the principle one of prospective earning power, by which, or under which, a branch will be able to fairly maintain itself at an early day, or does it involve a policy of simply saying to the country at large: "We are prepared, entirely irrespective of the question of earning power, to build branches here, there and everywhere, in a promiscuous way?"

I am most anxious to know if the National Railways Management has given consideration to the all-important question of the financial result? It is unnecessary for me to point out that no other policy that can be entered upon will be so disastrous to public ownership as the policy of indiscriminate expenditure on building branches, irrespective of the all-important question of the earning power of those branches. I would suggest that my honourable friend take a little time to-morrow to explain to the House the principles upon which the Government has committed itself to this very important undertaking—probably the most important undertaking that we have entered upon by way of a public work for many years—because the estimated cost is only a small proportion of what it will ultimately involve. If I remember, the estimate in last year's Branch Lines Bill was $28,000,000. That made no provision for equipment nor for the initial operation of the road over a particular period. To anyone familiar with the construction of railways, it is well known that these roads cannot be constructed for $28,000,000. In my judgment, they would cost three times $28,000,000. However, I am not advancing that as an insurmountable obstacle to the building of these roads; but my own view is that the Senate should give every consideration to each Bill, and that each Bill should be considered upon its merits before it is adopted by this House.

I again appeal to my honourable friend, and say that if the great and important policy of public ownership is to be maintained by the Government of Canada, it can only be maintained and carried on by the adoption of the most economical policy possible; and this is particularly true of this system, because of the financial burden attached to it. I think, therefore, that this is a very opportune occasion to lay before this House and before this country the principles moving the Government in asking the country to assume the responsibility of entering upon this undertaking.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Then I will move that all the Orders relating to Branch Line Bills be discharged and be placed on the Order Paper for to-morrow. I may say that I am fully in accord with the point of view from which my honourable friend sees the building of these branches; and I think I will be in a position to reassure him as to the policy of the Government being strictly within the lines which he has indicated this evening.

The said Orders were discharged and placed on the Order Paper for to-morrow.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at 3 p.m.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS BRANCH LINES

STATEMENT OF POLICY

On the Orders of the Day respecting certain Canadian National Railways Branch Line Bills:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, before we separated last night I was requested to make a general statement of policy covering all these railway branches in order that the House might know what are the principles governing the present demands. I have thought that I could not state more concisely the policy of the Canadian National Railways than by reading the statement tabled in the other House, from the President of the Railways. It will illuminate all the projects in a general way. It will then be for the Committee, having in view the expectations expressed in this letter from the President, to judge of the value of each proposition.

I have already declared, and I repeat, that the passing of the second readings of these Bills does not bind this Chamber. We shall decide upon their merits when they are reported by the Committee.

This is a letter dated April 2nd, addressed to the Minister of Railways:

With respect to the branch line programme of the Canadian National Railways, I desire to place before you the policy which governed the company in its recommendation, and the specific reasons and other data for the construction of each line.

In the preparation of the branch line programme, the following factors were given due weight:

(1) The money already spent and the work already done on each line, where such conditions existed;

(2) The strategic, economic and traffic value of each branch;

(3) The measure of relief afforded to farmers through shortening the road haul on grain and other products;

(4) A regard for the presumable aggregate sum which the finances of the Dominion would permit to be devoted to such a purpose.

After having given proper weight to the factors above mentioned, the programme which has already been submitted to you was prepared and, in addition, it was suggested that the programme, should, if adopted, be spread over a period of three years, the authority remaining alive until August 31, 1927. The objective sought in extending the life of the vote for three years was to provide that continuity of construction which is essential for economy and to enable the engineering and construction department of the railway, as well as contractors, to lay out their work in the most effective fashion. The practice is well recognized by private railways under whose administration sums, when voted by the shareholders, remain in the hands of the executive until the work is completed or authority rescinded. There would seem to exist an analogy between the shareholders of a private company in their relation to the executive, and the parliament of the Dominion of Canada in its relation to the Canadian National Railway system, which would justify such a policy if the experiences of private undertakings are of value.

Varying prices of labour and material, adverse climatic conditions and the difficulty of securing labour during the period of harvest render it imperative that an early start should be made each year if construction work is to be prosecuted with speed and economy and this, it is submitted, will not result if each branch line is to be subjected to an annual vote.

Appertaining to the Canadian National's branch line programme, for which you are submitting enabling bills to parliament, appended hereto are statements with reference to each line which set out the purpose and justification for each. While it is true that all of these lines may not be entirely justified from the present railway economic standpoint, particularly if viewed from their first few years' operations, broader grounds must be considered when preparing a system of feeders for a railway of the magnitude of that which has been entrusted to the present administration of the National Railways.

The first problem that arises from examination of the Canadian National Railways system is to ascertain the main and underlying cause of the deficits, and it is at once apparent that, although certain economies of operation and co-ordination of the various units comprising the system may materially improve the "net" position, the basic cause is found in the fact that the mileage is much too great for the traffic. The apparent answer to the necessity for more business is more people and a further development of those resources which nature has provided with a generous hand. This end can only be speedily attained by the immigration of both settlers and capital and my various officers and myself, realizing this need, have consistently endeavoured to promote both. No confidence can exist in those who lack faith in themselves. My survey of this Dominion gives me unlimited confidence in its ultimate destiny without which there could be no faith in the final success of the national lines.

Therefore we are looking to develop this vast country, at present but too sparsely settled, and asking people to emigrate and join us in this development. But what do we find? Certain sections of the country are losing the very population we are so anxious to augment. Why are these sections being depopulated? Chiefly through a lack of railway facilities, particularly on the prairies, and the question naturally arises, "Is not the settler, who has manfully demonstrated his ability to bring products from the soil, worth many times the untried immigrant? If we are to bring people into the country we should certainly not allow them to meet others who are departing in a discouraged frame of mind. Therefore, not only are branch lines necessary to develop the country and provide reasonable facilities for the immigrant, but also to retain that part of our population which has so courageously planted itself on the land.

It is not likely that the Canadian National Railways will suffer materially from a financial view, for three or four or perhaps five years if the branch line programme herein contemplated is abandoned, but it is inevitable, that should such a thing come about, at the expiration of a period of years the system will find itself robbed of all further opportunity for reasonable development. Strategic territories will have been seized by other transportation interests, and the railway will dry up at its roots. I can think of no more effective way to eventually bring about the ruin of the Canadian National Railway system than a refusal to embark upon and consistently maintain a branch line programme. No railway can stand still, and success can only be achieved by keeping abreast of the times in the fulfilment of transportation responsibility. This is even more important in a growing and rapidly developing country.

I particularly desire to make it clear that the recommendations herein contained are based not only on present day conditions but also have regard for the probable volume of traffic which would result from the settlement of the country in years to come.

I therefore endorse the programme which has been submitted to you as representing, after full consideration of all facts and factors, that minimum which is essential to the needs of the communities served by the Canadian National Railways, and the system itself.

Yours faithfully,

H. W. Thornton,

President.

This is the basis or justification of the Canadian National Railways Executive in presenting this proposed development. It will be for the officials of that system, who have studied the whole situation and surveyed the ground, to give the Committee the faith that is in them, so that we shall have the advantage of having first-hand information from them. With this explanation I move the second reading of the first Bill.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable gentlemen, I have to congratulate my honourable friend on the rather ingenious plan to which he has resorted in not committing himself to the principles of the twenty-six Bills which are to come before us.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Twelve to-day.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend assumes no responsibility himself; but assumes to divest the Government of the entire responsibility of this important measure, and lays before the Senate a letter written by the President of the road of a very general character as to the policy involved, and states to this Chamber that this is the policy upon which the Government of Canada proposes to expend the enormous sum of money which must eventually be spent upon the building of these branches.

The Senate of Canada was most bitterly attacked in the public press, and otherwise, by a section of the public not at all familiar with the character of the legislation sought last session; but I think I am justified in saying that the action of the Senate at that time has been fully vindicated by the course since pursued by the Government, of abandoning the general character of that legislation, and of bringing down during the present session the twenty-six Bills which we shall shortly have under our consideration.

The course pursued last Session was based entirely upon a lack of information, and the very inopportune time at which it was sought to pass so important a measure—namely in the dying hours of the session. But during the present Session we find a rather different condition of facts before us. The question arises, then, what is the duty of the Senate upon this same measure, because it is practically the same measure divided into twenty-six parts? The duty of the Senate, in my judgment, is to clearly consider every measure submitted to us, and, upon its merits, to decide whether we shall accept or reject the Bill. What should be the standard to be adopted for the passage of these measures? Is it to be one of a purely sentimental character, entirely divested of the financial considerations which invest such an important subject? Must it be that because certain sparsely settled districts in this Dominion have intimated to the Government of Canada that they desire branch lines, therefore we must build the branches, and spend public money, entirely regardless of what the consequence will be in the future as to the earning power or the incubus that will have to be carried by the National railways, and also the Government of Canada, touching those particular lines?

It goes without saying that the Government of Canada, in assuming the administration of the system of railways known as the National Railways of Canada, representing a mileage substantially in excess of 20,000 miles, must administer it upon a strictly business footing. It cannot be said for a moment that it is a patriotic enterprise—that patriotism, or the building up of the country, or the submitting the will of the Government to the will of the people, and thus carrying out upon local or patriotic considerations the extension of this enormous system, is to be considered. The people of Canada are vitally interested in making this system a success, and I know of no other public question before the people of Canada involving so much serious consideration. But I say, if it is to be made a success, the administration must be based entirely upon financial considerations—namely, the earning power of the road and the possibility of its making a sufficient revenue to carry the liabilities which we are at present carrying, and the reduction of those liabilities, so far as it is possible, to attain that end. Therefore, I lay it down as a principle, honourable gentlemen, so far as my own personal judgment is concerned, that the prospective earnings of each branch should be and must be seriously considered by the Committee. That must be paramount to every other consideration. If it is not paramount to every other consideration it simply means that we are building branches, that we are investing the public money, and that we are attaching a further incubus to the enormous liabilities we are already carrying, and which threaten our financial stability, and which, unless reduced by economic management, will eventually result in disaster to the entire system.

There is of course the further consideration of the public interest to be served; but the paramount consideration must be early prospective earnings. If we adopt the policy laid down by the President of the railways in his letter to the Government, it stands to reason that branch line building must be entered upon and carried out vigorously—and these Bills are only the beginning of a policy which in the future will be pursued as energetically as it is being pursued to-day, regardless, I say, of the financial considerations involved.

Two or three considerations are pointed out by the president of the road which, I think, should not be entertained by us. I think the first consideration pointed out is that certain schemes have already been entered upon by the promoters of systems which we have absorbed. The fact that a certain amount of land has been broken or a certain amount of grading done, or initial steps taken for the construction of a branch, is no reason whatever for our entering upon the construction of these particular branches. I need not point out to honourable gentlemen that railway construction in the past has been very largely abused by the companies that entered upon this form of public undertaking. Many of the branches which already have been started were started entirely regardless of the public interest, but for the purpose of financial flotation—to enable the promoters to extract financial benefits from the sale of bonds and stock and subsidies obtainable from the different Governments of Canada, regardless of future results. That is the reason we have on our hands to-day a practically bankrupt system of railways.

There are honourable gentlemen here who are just as familiar as I am with the fact that this has been the leading consideration in the flotation of these branches, which have been built at the expense of the Government of Canada and of the provinces of Canada, and to-day this is being invoked as a reason why we should proceed to complete these lines.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That is one of the factors only. We need not throw good money after bad.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It has been urged by the President of the road, as a fundamental reason why we should enter upon the construction of these particular branches. Amongst these Bills are some making provision for the construction of an elaborate system, not of branches, but of railways which are entirely needless. Why, honourable gentlemen, a gasp went up, almost from the Atlantic to the Pacific, at the reckless expenditure proposed upon the building of certain eastern lines involving millions of money, entirely regardless of the development of the country, or the requirements of any substantial settlement along the proposed lines. It seems to me that if we are to give weight to the recommendation of the President of the road, and we find a weakness in some of the fundamental reasons which he has laid down as to why these branches should be built, a doubt is cast upon the entire recommendation which he has made, and the duty of the Senate is the greater to thoroughly investigate as to why we should embark upon the twenty-six enterprises which will be submitted to us. There is undoubtedly reason, honourable gentlement, why some colonisation branches should be constructed in the West; although I do not at all agree with the reasons advanced by the President of the road as to the exodus which has taken place from Canada being due to the want of railway facilities.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: He does not say that.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is the implication to be drawn from the letter my honourable friend has read—that if this exodus is to be stopped, it will be by entering upon an even more elaborate system of branch line building.

I entirely dissent from the principle so strongly emphasized by the President as to the three years' appropriation, although, in my judgment, that need not be a reason for rejecting any of these Bills. It seems to me, however, that it is a violation of one of the best-established principles of parliamentary government. It is now proposed to take away entirely from Parliament—from the elective branch of Parliament—any voice as to the appropriation of public money, and to hand this public money over to a Board not directly responsibile to Parliament. You cannot draw any distinction, honourable gentlemen, between this money in the hands of the National railways and this money in the Exchequer of Canada It is all the money of the Government of Canada. It is idle to draw an analogy between this system of railways and a privately-owned system. This is simply another branch of the Public Service of the Government of Canada, no matter what reasoning we may apply to it, and the Government of Canada must necessarily furnish the funds for the building of these roads; it must necessarily assume all the financial responsibility attached to this undertaking; and to say that Parliament should divest itself of the rights which it has to-day to appropriate this money, to criticize its expenditure, to review such expenditure, and to inquire into the contracts which will be let and to pronounce upon whether wisely or unwisely or recklessly this money is being spent, would seem to me to do violence to one of the most salutary and wholesome parliamentary practices we have, namely, that Parliament shall pronounce annually upon the application of the expenditure of all public money.

Now, the President reasons the matter of three years' appropriation along this particular line, namely, that of possessing available cash; but who is so much interested in the matter of carrying out this railway system and making it a success as the people of Canada, as the Parliament of Canada? Is it the President or the directorate of this railway that is carrying the responsibility of the financial provisions of this enormous undertaking? No, it is the Parliament of Canada. The responsibility, initially and in every other way, lies with the Parliament of Canada; and to say that we should hand over for three years a lump sum of money to the Board, and divest ourselves of the right of inquiry as to its expenditure, would be a violation of our parliamentary system.

I do not desire to expend any more time upon this subject except to say that the people of the Dominion of Canada should be deeply interested in the success of the National System of Railways, and I believe that this is the case, and that Canada views with pride and with a proper sense of responsibility the ownership of this vast system of railways, the largest system on the continent. Therefore, we are as deeply interested as any of those who are directly associated with the administration of the road, and there is no reason why Parliament should not be free with its advice, its criticism, its censure if necessary, or with its approval of the course pursued in the administration of the system.

But I say to my honourable friend, and I wish to emphasize it as far as possible, that if there is any way that can be adopted for the destruction of this magnificent system of National Railways it will and can be the reckless expenditure of money. If there is not the greatest economy and the greatest capacity shown in the administration of this National system, the time will come when the people of Canada will rise and divest themselves of the responsibility of operating a national system of railways. They will do this even at very great sacrifice and national humiliation except they see a desire on the part of those whose responsibility is to administer it to do so with the same good judgment that any private organization would demand. Another word, and I am done. It is this. We should adopt a standard, in considering these Bills, that would be adopted by any private railway system. Speaking in a general way, if the Canadian Pacific Railway would not enter upon the building of these railways should they be tributary to their own line, the Government of Canada should not enter upon the undertaking. When these Bills come before the Committee that is one of the standards that can be applied to every branch line submitted to us for our consideration.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I do not intend to carry on a debate on these Bills, because I believe we shall all be in a far better position to discuss them after they have passed through Committee. I simply desire to draw the attention of my honourable friend to the fact that we shall have to face the problem of the three-year vote in connection with the present legislation, because, as each branch is approved by us, a contract will have to be made for its construction, and the contractor cannot be forced to wait until the period in each Session, very often in June, when we call in the Governor General to sanction the Bill. There is this difficulty, that some of the best months in the year for construction work may be lost, because as soon as we reach the middle of August there is a general disposition on the part of the employees to move towards the harvesting work.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If I might interrupt my honourable friend, I would point out that the same remark would apply to every appropriation for the carrying out of public work. It would apply to canals and other work we are carrying forward in Canada.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But I think it will be demonstrated to the Committee that considerable loss has occurred to the country as well as to the contractors on undertakings that have been decided upon, by all the machinery lying idle because the appropriation for the year has been exhausted. There are probably members of the Senate who have acted as Minister of Railways or Minister of Public Works, and I am sure that has been their experience. However, I do not want to enter into a debate on this point. It will be considered, and whatever the Committee in its wisdom decides will of course stand for revision by this Chamber. At all events, we shall be far better informed when that time comes. I have stated that I do not lay these propositions before the House with a view to binding the Senate to the principle of each Bill. It is understood that they will go to Committee, there to be weighed, and to be passed upon more seriously and definitely when they come back from Committee. I move the second reading.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: I would like to ask my honourable friend a question. These Bills will be referred to the Railway Committee and taken up there, and can be intimately gone into by the members of that Committee with the officers, or whatever authorities are there for explanation. But a large number of members of the Senate are not members of that Committee, and this business is more than the business of a Committee or of a few men in either of the legislative bodies; it is a matter in which all Canadians take an interest. If we are going to have a system of National Railways, and that system is to be successfully carried on, we must have not only ability in its operation, but intelligent and active sympathy on the part of the people of Canada who own that system. Now, the question I want to ask is this: would it be a difficult matter to give a certain amount of fundamental information on each one of these lines? I do not know what has taken place in the Railway Committee of the other House, but where you have twenty-six roads, would it not be possible to have a memorandum with reference to each one of them, stating in brief the localities through which they go, and the sustaining production in those localities that now or may in future provide material for freight over those roads? That is the local side of it. Then, again, the roads link up with certain other points for traffic, and the memorandum should show what junctions are made, and what it is proposed to draw, on local hauls and wider traffic, through those connections; in short, the possibilities for traffic from the locality and also through the roads' connections. Those things could be easily stated, and copies of that memorandum could be put in the hands of every member of the Senate. Though we cannot all be members of the Committee on Railways, or attend its sittings, we all have an interest in this business, and we are to discuss it when the report of the Committee comes down. If we could have this subsidiary and initiatory information it would stimulate our interest, answer our inquiries, and enable us the better to undertake the final decision.

Much has been said as to the stand the Senate took last year. It has been alluded to by the honourable gentleman who has just spoken. Probably the strongest criticisms were made by those who gave the least consideration to what are the salutary forms of practice in legislative bodies in order to fulfil the responsibilities and carry out the trusts of those legislatures. While we must have certain safeguards, the point raised by my honourable friend that we should not make a lump sum vote, and put it at the unrestricted use of the Management of the railway for three years, without the opportunity on the part of the legislature to review that expenditure does not present a difficulty which cannot be overcome. There are ways and customs by which the House may hold its hand strictly and continuously on those outlays, and there is business sense enough in the legislatures to do this in a way which will not cause greater expense, but rather tend to the lowest possible cost, in the way of continuity of the work. I cannot see any difficulty in overcoming that by sensible and not difficult methods.

With reference to some of these lines, my present presumption is that they are very questionable. Some of them are calculated, to my mind, to be a continuous drain upon the system itself. I want to see a very strict discrimination with regard to those different lines. Instead of all being put en bloc, as they were last year, the concession has been made by the Government that we have them separated, and take up each one by itself. Unless there is information coming of which I do not know now, there are some lines which I consider dangerous, unnecessary, and simply perpetuating an old system of political patronage which has been inherent in this country from the first, and which still persists, but which I should hope, as we gain in sense and intelligence, will be relegated to the discard in the general interest of a great national system.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD: I should like to ask the honourable gentleman who would draw up this information in regard to the branch lines? Would it be the Railway Committee or the Management of the Canadian National railways?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would ask permission of the House, as each Bill is presented for second reading, to send to Hansard the memorandum which is attached to each Bill. Of course, I understand the Bills will pass and go to Committee, but if any of the members of this Chamber, having looked at the memorandum touching each Bill, feel that they need more information, they may express that desire on the Orders of the Day during the course of next week, and I will see to obtaining that further information.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Might I ask the honourable gentleman if the embarrassment of which he speaks has been found in the construction of railroads on account of not getting a three-years' appropriation? We have had great experience in Canada in building railroads, and, if I understand correctly, we have never granted more than one year's appropriation, yet have found no embarrassment.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would rather wait until the Committee stage, when we may have present the Minister of Railways and the Ex-Minister of Railways, who will give us their views.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: In the meantime, might I suggest that the Governor in Council could come to the relief of the situation if they ran short of money? That has been done time and again. We are all familiar with what constitutes a Governor Generals warrant.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: A letter of credit.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: We will discuss that when we go into Committee.

Hon. Mr. BLAIN: I understand that some of those railways commenced construction some years ago. Could my honourable friend furnish the Committee with a detailed statement of the cost of those roads to date, as the Bills are submitted to the House for second reading?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I think that information is in the memorandum that will appear in Hansard in connection with each Bill.

Hon. Mr. BLAIN: And also state the date when they were commenced.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I think it will all be there. At all events, if necessary I will not await the return of those Bills from Committee, but will furnish further information that may be asked for from time to time.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Provided the Bills are passed, will the construction of these roads proceed at once, and be continuously carried on?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Let us hope not.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I want the information if I can get it, because I know that railway people sometimes obtain charters and then postpone construction from year to year. The Canadian National Railways are not asking for a charter, but they are asking for money to build a branch line. What is wrong about that?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Does the honourable gentleman want them built right away?

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I want to know whether, if the grant is made, the money will be spent all at once, and whether all those lines will be constructed?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I surmise that when we come from Committee we shall know what lines are the most pressing. We may have our say on this matter, and the Committee may perhaps find that there are three categories of Bills—some that are very pressing, others that are pressing, but somewhat less so, and others that could wait.

Hon Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, wait for all time.

Hon. Mr DANDURAND: Therefore when we decide to pass these Bills because there is merit in them, we shall have from the Management, who will appear before the Committee, their statement as to the branches that will be first proceeded with. Of course, they have their own limitations. If we decide to adopt the principle of granting them a three-years' vote, they would be presumed to exhaust that vote during those three years. That presumption might satisfy my honourable friend.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Will my honourable friend say how the roads will be built—by contract, by tender, and, if so, to whom the tenders will be submitted?

Hon. Mr DANDURAND: I do not know. I think that all those questions were put in the other House and answered, but I do not know how they were answered. However, we will have an opportunity in Committee of examining into the building of those lines and discussing the question of contract or day labour.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I should like to ask the Government a very interesting question: will the construction of any of those branch lines be commenced before the completion of the Hudson Bay railway?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: They will go on contemporaneously.

Hon. Mr. BLAIN: May I ask the honourable Minister if, as the various Bills come up, he will state to the House, what lines the Government are in favour of?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: All of them.

Hon. Mr. BLAIN: I understand that they are not in favour of all.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: All I can say is that they have been presented by the Minister of Railways, and if he did not consider that they ought to be supported he would not have presented them. We may have the Minister of Railways himself before us. At any rate. I take it for granted that the Government must assume the responsibility to Parliament.

GRANDE FRESNIERE-RINFRET JUNCTION BRANCH LINE BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of Bill 31, an Act respecting the construction of a Canadian National Railway Line between Grande Fresnière and Rinfret Junction, in the Province of Quebec.

Grande Fresnière, Mile 0-12

	Cost
Proposed in 1924—12 miles grade; 12 miles track..	$357,000

It is proposed in 1924 to grade 12 miles and lay track on it at a cost of $357,000, thus completing this line between Grande Fresnière and Rinfret Junction. The purpose of this line is to shorten the route from the Huberdeau Branch and St. Jerome into Montreal. The right of way for this line has already been secured, but no further work has been done on it.

The Huberdeau Branch runs into the Laurentian Mountains and gives communication to a district which has become one of the important summer tourist and cottage resorts out of Montreal. On account of our present routes via Readen Jct. or Joliette being so long, passengers all use the C.P.R. between Montreal and Montfort Jct., and undergo the inconvenience of a change of trains at this point, and the consequent delays this always involves. The result of this has been that despite the admitted advantages of the country on our Huberdeau Line for summer holidaying over the C.P.R. St. Agathe Branch into the Laurentians, we are unable to develop this business as we should and we lose a great deal of the haul on business we actually originate and we have to accept the onus of the inconvenience and delays the present route to points on our line entails.

The justification for this line lies in the direct passenger connection it will give and also the shortening of the routes for freight over our existing routes via Joliette and Rawden, by 34 and 23 miles respectively, which will mean considerable economy in operation on present business, besides attracting further business by the better service it will give.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

KAMLOOPS-KELOWNA BRANCH LINE BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of Bill 33, an Act respecting the construction of Canadian National Railway Line, Kamloops-Kelowna Division, Province of British Columbia.

Kelowna and Lumby Branches

	Cost
Grade now ahead of track—101 miles.
Proposed in 1924—4 miles grade; 57 miles track and ballast..	$1,246,000
Proposed in 1925—48 miles track and ballast.	990,000
	$2,236,000

The Kelowna Branch constitutes a line from Kamloops Jct. passing through Kamloops and running through Armstrong and Vernon down to Kelowna, a distance of 117.5 miles, with another branch from Vernon through to Lumby, a distance of 15 miles. That part of the line from Kamloops Jct. to Kamloops, a distance of about 3 miles, is in operation and is used by the main transcontinental trains for connection to the town of Kamloops. Rather than duplicate the C.P.R. line it was contemplated to obtain running rights over the main line of the C.P.R. between Kamloops and Ducks, a distance of about 12.5 miles, and also running rights from them between Armstrong and Vernon over their Okanagan Branch, about the same distance, and this then left about 104.5 miles to construct.

In 1919 a contract was let for the grading of this line and grading was completed by the end of the season 1920, with the exception of a few small gaps amounting to about 4 miles. Practically all the ties required for the line have been produced locally and are now located at various points on the line.

It is proposed in 1924 to finish these gaps in the grade, lay the track and complete the line into Armstrong, and also to arrange for running rights referred to, with the C.P.R. In 1925, the line will be completed to Kelowna, and the branch to Lumby finished.

From Campbell Creek to the beginning of Grande Prairie, about Mile 35, the line runs through a broken hilly country with considerable scattered timber and grazing land, on which some cattle ranging is now done, and as this part of the line gets up to an elevation of 2,275 feet, it is not suitable for much actual farming, and will be confined to grazing and hay raising to feed stock.

The Grande Prairie Valley is a flat bottom about ½ mile wide and probably ten miles long, which is fairly well developed at the present time, but when further development should be capable of giving a fair amount of business resulting from mixed farming. At Falklands, near the foot of this valley there is a very large and good deposit of gypsum which, if a market could be found for it, should eventually give considerable traffic.

After the end of Grande Prairie, into Armstrong, the line goes through a broken hilly country, which is only suitable for ranching and has little development on it at present.

In the district of Armstrong, which produces largely hay, oats, celery and garden products, and fruit, considerable traffic would be expected.

Vernon is the centre of a considerable area of fruit growing land (mainly apples) and the valley of Long Lake, and the valley up towards Lumby are at present tributary to Vernon.

From Vernon to Kelowna the line follows a valley parallel to and about four miles distant from Okanagan Lake. From about 13 and 14 miles from Vernon, at the head of Long Lake, through to Kelowna, this valley is quite extensively developed in orchards, and is susceptible of considerable more development as further water for irrigation is procured and put on the land. Our line runs down the centre of this development and would shorten the wagon haul for the producer in this district.

The first eight miles of the Lumby Branch goes through a highly developed orchard district and at this point reaches the limit of fruit growing. From there on to Lumby there is considerable development by way of mixed farming and cattle ranging, besides some development further in from there.

The business from this line will be mostly to the Pacific Coast, or the Prairies, so will give the main line considerable traffic, mostly of a long haul character.

There has already been expended about $5,364,000 on these branches on the right of way, grading and fencing, which are mostly completed. It is estimated it will require $2,236,000 to complete them. It is computed that although the business from these lines will not clear sufficient to pay all the fixed charges when the amount now spent is included, it will nearly do so, which means it will give a very good return on the money now asked for to complete the line.

Note:—

Kelowna—Assumes that running rights over C.P.R. will be used between Kamloops and Campbell Creek, and also Armstrong to Vernon, total of 24 miles.

Lumby—Lumby must have track laid in order to reach ties for Kelowna piece.

The motion was agreed to and the Bill was read the second time.

PEEBLES BRANCH LINE BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of Bill 41, an Act respecting the construction of a Canadian National Railway Line from Peebles southerly in the Province of Saskatchewan.

Peebles South, Mile 0—22

	Cost
Grade now ahead of track—20 miles.
Proposed in 1924—2 miles grade; 22 miles track..	$300,000

It is proposed during the year 1924 to add two miles to the existing 20 miles of grade and to lay the track on this 22 miles and ballast and otherwise complete the line, at an estimated cost of $300,000. When this is done, it would not be the intention to extend this line any further for at least some years.

The grade on this line started in 1919 and was completed by the end of the season of 1920, and during that year the greater portion of the track material was delivered. Since 1920 no work has been done on this line.

This branch runs through a good agricultural area mostly grain growing, but at the south end has some mixed farming. This territory produces good crops when rainfall is sufficient, but is subject to dry seasons which make short crops. The land is practically all taken and mostly settled except south of Mile 20.0 where there is some unoccupied land. The crop in 1923 in this district was very good.

The justification for building this line is that approximately $216,000 has already been spent towards its completion, which is now earning nothing, and it is estimated that when the line is completed as far as proposed there will be an annual business of 660,000 bushels of grain furnished to it, a great deal of which now goes to our competitor, and in addition to the grain there would be about 150 cars of in and outbound freight, consisting of live stock, coal, lumber and merchandise. It is computed that the farmers would save an average of about 16 miles haul on the 660,000 bushels of grain referred to per year, and if this is taken as worth ¾ cent per bushel per mile hauled, it would mean an annual saving to them of $79,200. The freight from this line would be all of a long haul character, thus feeding other lines of the system.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

GRAVELBOURG BRANCH LINE BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of Bill 42, an Act respecting the construction of a Canadian National Railway Line extending the Gravelbourg Branch to Neidpath, in the Province of Saskatchewan.

Gravelbourg Extension, Mile 109—120

	Cost
Grade now ahead of track—11 miles.
Proposed in 1924—11 miles track..	$144,000

It is proposed in 1924 to lay the track on the 11 miles of grade now completed ahead of the end of steel, thus completing the line to the town of Neidpath, and there to leave it for the time being, at least.

In 1920, the grading was finished as far as Neidpath, (Mile 120.0), but the track was only laid as far as Mile 109.6. In 1922 the line was practically finished, including the buildings, fencing, etc., as far as Mile 109.0, with the exception of about 30,000 yards of ballasting, which remains to be done to this point.

This branch runs through an undulating country well suited for grain growing, and a large portion of the land is under cultivation, giving a good production of wheat and other grain.

The justification for building this line to Neidpath is that already one-third of the money necessary to complete it has been expended and is now earning nothing. Besides this it is estimated that when complete this line will ship 480,000 bushels of grain each year, in addition to about 70 cars of in and out-bound freight, composed of live stock, coal, lumber and merchandise. About 8 miles on the average will be saved in road haul to the farmers for this 480,000 bushels of grain, which if computed as worth ¾ cent per bushel per mile hauled would make an annual saving to the farmers of $28,800 for grain alone. The portion of this line already built has always been a large and consistent shipper of grain, which is of a long haul character, and thus would add materially to the business of other lines of the system.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Honourable gentlemen, before these Bills are rushed through and this pile of money is voted, I have a few observations to make. I feel that an evident discrimination has been made against my province and that an injustice has been done. It is therefore only natural and reasonable that I should voice my protest. We are here voting millions and millions of money to build new lines in sparsely settled territory and some of these lines, I know of my own personal knowledge, are not justified at all. At the same time we have in Prince Edward Island, in the hands of the Government, a railway that is forty years old and is not yet completed. It is broad-gauged for 120 miles, but there are 120 more to be done. I see every other province in Confederation getting hundreds of thousands and in some cases millions of money voted, and not one cent for the completion of this road in Prince Edward Island, which is, as I say, broad-gauged to only half its extent, and, in the ordinary acceptation of the term, is not properly ballasted at all. I cannot understand why there should be this discrimination. Is it because we are a small province? Is the Government going to take advantage of the weak? I say in all seriousness to my honourable friend that the injustice is so palpable that I would be remiss in my duty if I did not enter a protest. I cannot understand why proper representations were not made to the Government. Some representations must have been made, because we have sufficient men in the Government to make them.

The broad-gauging on our road was started about six years ago; in fact it was projected in 1911 or 1912, but the war came on and, as you know, such matters stood in abeyance. As soon as the war was over, the Government of the day broad-gauged the road to the extent of about sixty miles. It was in that condition when the present Government came into power, and after a year it broad-gauged sixty more. That is about half—there is about as much more to be done.

In the name of common sense why do we not get something from the "pork barrel," if you want to call it that? Some of the legislation, if it goes through, will be from the pork barrel. We have a thickly settled population who are suffering to-day for want of proper facilities. Having only a narrow-gauge railway, they can haul only half a load at a time. We should have a reasonable, fair share in the money to be expended, because, although we have but a small population, we shall have to pay our part of the fifty, sixty, or seventy-five millions that these Branch Lines, if constructed, will cost.

There is the other evident injustice: we have no ballast in our province.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: You are like the present Government.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: There may be something in what my honourable friend says. We have no proper ballast on our road. Why was not some provision made for that? Where the heavy engines and heavy cars run on the newly built part of the line, it is a menace to life not to have the road properly ballasted. When you were running gingerbread engines and gingerbread cars on the rails in the spring of the year, when the frost was coming out of the ground, it was not so dangerous to have the trains lurch this way and that way; but it is different to-day when you have those heavy mogul engines and heavy trains. Proper ballast is now an absolute necessity.

I think this injustice should be rectified even yet, in the supplementary estimates. I am sorry that proper representations have not been made to the Government. I feel that if they had been, the Government would not be guilty of such an act of injustice.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I will draw the attention of the Railway Department, or the National Railways, to my honourable friend's representations.

Hon. Mr. McLEAN: Honourable gentlemen, I will not vote for any new branch railway until Prince Edward Island has had its railway completed. In my own business we have a cold storage plant which cost us $20,000. For the last seven or eight years we have had to hold the cold storage goods in the plant until the winter time. We have been selling goods right here in Ottawa, but we cannot do so in the summer time. We have a branch line of regular gauge from Charlottetown to Summerside and Tignish, and from there to Borden, but the rest of the railway is narrow-gauge. A cold-storage plant would be necessary for the transfer of the goods. They would not get across during the summer time, because you cannot have a cold storage plant on a narrow-gauge railway. For these reasons I think the Government should complete the railway that is only half finished, before they enter upon the construction of branch lines.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: And should complete the ballasting.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Where do you get your ballast?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: We shall have to get it from New Brunswick or Nova Scotia. We have none.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

STE ROSE DU LAC-RORKETON BRANCH LINE BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of Bill 43, an Act respecting the construction of a Canadian National Railway Line extending the Ste. Rose du Lac Branch to Rorketon in the Province of Manitoba.

Ste. Rose du Lac—Mile 15-37

	Cost
Grade now ahead of track—22 miles.
Proposed in 1924—22 miles track..	$378,000
Proposed in 1925—nil..	.....
Proposed in 1926—nil..	.....
	$378,000

It is proposed during 1924 to lay 22 miles of track on the grading already done on this line, at an estimated cost of $378,000, it then being intended to allow the track to remain at this point for a few years before further extending this line.

Prior to 1919 the line was in operation to the Station of St. Rose du Lac, Mile 11.3 with the track laid further to Mile 14.9, and the grade to Mile 18.1. In 1919, a grading contract for 18.9 miles was let. This contract was completed in the year 1920, the grade then reaching Mile 37.0. This left 22 miles of grade on which no track has been laid. A location survey has been made for about 22 miles beyond the end of grade, with the eventual idea of tying the line into the town of Winnipegosis.

This branch runs generally north through a scrub timber country which has plenty of precipitation each year. There is considerable grain grown in this district but it is best suited for mixed farming. The land is practically all taken up and has very considerable settlement on it.

The justification for building this line is that about $110,000 has already been invested in the grading now done, which is earning no money, and it is estimated that 396,000 bushels of grain per year will be hauled off the line when completed. An average of about 16 miles road haul on grain will be saved to the farmers adjacent to this line, and this computed as worth ¾c. per bushel per mile hauled, would effect an annual saving to the farmers of $47,520 on grain alone. Besides the grain business it is estimated that 190 cars of in and outbound freight will be handled each year, consisting of live stock, lumber, wood and merchandise. The freight obtained from this line will be practically all of a long haul character, thus furnishing the rest of the system with considerable traffic.

Wagon road construction in this district is difficult and expensive on account of the sections of low wet ground. The railway would supply the main artery for this district, permitting the expenditures to be confined to lateral roads, and the Provincial Government has been appropriating money and building these lateral roads to the proposed sidings.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

TURTLEFORD-HAFFORD BRANCH LINE BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of Bill 48, an Act respecting the construction of a Canadian National Railway Line from Turtleford to near Hafford in the Province of Saskatchewan.

Turtleford S.E. Mile 0-102

	Cost.
Grade now ahead of track—23 miles.
Proposed in 1924—43 miles grade; 45 miles track; 30 miles ballast..	$ 966,000
Proposed in 1925—36 miles grade; 57 miles track; 35 miles ballast..	1,143,500
Proposed in 1926—37 miles ballast..	203,500
	$2,313,000

It is proposed in 1924 to add 43 miles to the already existing 23 miles of grade and to lay 45 miles of track, and 30 miles of ballast, at a cost of $966,000, and in 1925 to further grade 36 miles and to lay the track on the then remaining 57 miles of grade, and do 35 miles of ballast at a cost of $1,143,500, and in 1926 to add 37 miles of ballast thus completing the line to join the existing line near Hafford.

The 23 miles of grading now completed was started in 1920 and completed in 1921. Beyond this no other work has been done on the line.

The district through which the line runs is generally rolling, with timber in places of small sized poplar in bluffs with prairie openings. It is a largely mixed farming area, but a considerable portion of the land is susceptible to wheat raising. The land is mostly taken up and there is considerable development, particularly in the vicinity of Meeting Lake, or approximately half-way between Turtleford and Hafford.

The justification for this line is that there are a large number of settlers in its vicinity now such a distance from railway facilities that the road haul on their products is so excessive that it is almost prohibitive. It is estimated that this line will produce on an average 2,400,000 bushels of grain each year, besides 800 cars of freight in and outbound, consisting of live stock, coal, lumber and merchandise. About 32 miles on the average would be saved the farmers in their road haul on the 2,400,000 bushels of grain, which it is expected this district will produce annually, and if this is taken as being worth ¾c. per bushel per mile hauled, it would make an annual saving of $576,000 to them for haul on their grain alone. There is invested at present $207,200 on the right of way and grade, which is earning nothing. The business obtained from this line will mostly be subject to long haul, and thus contribute considerable business to other lines of the system.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

KELVINGTON BRANCH LINE BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of Bill 50, an Act respecting the construction of a Canadian National Railway Line from near Kelvington in the Province of Saskatchewan northerly 13 miles.

Thunderhill, Mile 114-127

	Cost
Grade now ahead Track—4 miles.
Proposed in 1924—9 miles Grade..	$ 75,000
Proposed in 1925—13 miles Track and Ballast	215,000
	$290,000

It is proposed to grade in 1924, 9 miles from the present end of grade, now 4 miles beyond Kelvington, at an estimated cost of $75,000, and in 1925 lay track and ballast the line for 13 miles at a cost of $215,000. This will take the line to a point on the Tuffnell Extension of the Canadian Pacific Railway now building. It would then be the intention to obtain running rights over the C.P.R. from this point to Tisdale. The purpose of this line, and the proposed running right is to get a shorter routing for all traffic west of Tisdale. Last year's proposal was to construct a line over the same route, but since the authority of Parliament was withheld the C.P.R. have commenced construction of their line over this route, and have thus secured the territory.

The route will be 24 miles shorter than by existing lines so the saving in train miles and consequent saving in operating costs on present business will contribute materially to the operating net, after the fixed charges imposed for construction and running right rentals have been deducted from the operating savings.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

PRINCE ALBERT-PADDOCKWOOD BRANCH LINE BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of Bill 51, an Act respecting the construction of a Canadian National Railway Line from Prince Albert to near Paddockwood in the Province of Saskatchewan.

Prince Albert, N.E. Mile 0-23

	Cost
Grade now ahead of track—17 miles.
Proposed in 1924—6 miles grade; 23 miles track..	$406,000

It is proposed in 1924 to add 6 miles to the grading already done and lay track on this 23 miles, taking the line to near the town of Paddockwood, and there leaving it for a time.

The first work done on this branch was in the year 1920, when a grading contract was let and by the end of the season 1921, about 17 miles of this work was completed, and since that time no other work has been done on this branch.

The line runs through a mixed farming district with considerable timber and small poplar with a small percentage of jackpine. For the first four or five miles out of Prince Albert the soil is light and not suitable for agricultural development. There is considerable settlement on the line beyond this point and in the neighbourhood of Paddockwood and beyond there is a settlement of returned soldiers.

The justification for building this line is to make good the $169,000 already spent and earning nothing, and the fact that it is estimated that 420,000 bushels of grain per year will be taken off this line, besides 230 cars in and out of live stock, lumber, wood and merchandise.

It is estimated that an average haul of 16 miles would be saved to the farmers by building this line, and computing this saving as being worth ¾ cents per bushel per mile hauled on the 420,000 bushels of grain referred to it would make an annual saving to the farmers of $50,400 for hauling grain alone.

The railway business obtained from this line will be all of a long haul character and therefore furnish considerable business to the other lines of the system.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

EYRE-ACADIA VALLEY BRANCH LINE BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of Bill 52, an Act respecting the construction of a Canadian National Railway Line between Eyre, in the Province of Saskatchewan, and Acadia Valley, in the Province of Alberta.

Acadia Valley, Mile 0-25

	Cost
Grade now ahead of track—42 miles.
Proposed in 1926—25 miles track..	$463,000

It is proposed in 1926 to lay 25 miles of track on the existing grade, at a cost of $463,000, thus completing the line to Acadia Valley, 25 miles out of Eyre, and there leaving the track for some years. The grading on this line was started in 1919, and was not completed until 1921.

The line starts in the Province of Saskatchewan off the Alaska S.E. Branch at Eyre, and after running approximately 12 miles westerly, passes into the Province of Alberta.

This branch runs through a good grain growing district a greater part of its length, and most of the land is taken up and well settled. This area, however, is subject to dry seasons and the effect of hot winds in the summer, but in seasons of sufficient precipitation during the growing season gives big yields per acre.

The justification for this line is that $434,000—$305,000 up to Mile 25.0—has already been expended on the grading, which is earning nothing, and that it is estimated that 600,000 bushels of grain on the average each year will be shipped off this line, besides 140 cars of freight in and out, consisting of live stock, coal, lumber and merchandise. About 8 miles on the average would be saved farmers on road haul, and if computed to be worth ¾ cents per bushel, per mile hauled, on the 600,000 bushels, would mean an annual saving to the farmers of $36,000. All the business off this line would be of a long haul character, thus furnishing other lines with considerable business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

ESTON-WHITE BEAR BRANCH LINE BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of Bill 53, an Act respecting the construction of a Canadian National Railway Line between Eston and White Bear in the Province of Saskatchewan.

Eston S.E. Mile 0-35

	Cost
Grade now ahead of track—35 miles.
Proposed in 1926—35 miles track..	$649,000

It is proposed in 1926 to lay the track on the 35 miles of grading which was started in 1919 and completed in 1921, at an estimated cost of $649,000, and there to leave the line for at least a year or two.

This branch runs through a good agricultural district with considerable percentage of the land cultivated. Like other areas in this district, it is subject to short crops in dry seasons, but in seasons of sufficient precipitation will produce a heavy yield of wheat per acre.

The justification for completing this line is that about $274,500, or more than one-quarter of the money necessary to complete it has already been expended and is earning nothing. Also that it is estimated when complete, this line should ship on the average 1,000,000 bushels of grain per year, besides 175 cars of in and out bound freight of live stock, coal, lumber and merchandise. With this line completed the farmers would save on the average 10 miles road haul and computing this as worth to them ¾ cents per bushel per mile hauled, on the 1,000,000 bushels estimated to come off this branch, there would be saved to the farmers each year $75,000 on grain alone. The freight business off this line being all of a long haul character, will furnish other lines of the system with considerable business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

ST. PAUL BRANCH LINE BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of Bill 55, an Act respecting the construction of a Canadian National Railway Line from St. Paul, in the Province of Alberta, southeasterly 21 miles.

St. Paul East. Mile 0-21

	Cost
Proposed in 1925—21 miles grade..	$180,000
Proposed in 1926—21 miles track; 21 miles ballast..	345,000
	$525,000

It is proposed in 1925 to grade 21 miles at an estimated cost of $180,000, and in 1926 finish this 21 miles with track and ballast at an estimated cost of $345,000.

There is considerable settlement developed east of the present end of the line, now at St. Paul, and for the distance proposed there is good country susceptible of considerable grain growing and mixed farming.

The justification for construction of this line lies in the fact that it is estimated that when the 21 miles as proposed is built it would produce annually 630,000 bushels of grain, besides giving in and out bound 185 cars of freight, consisting of live stock, coal, lumber and merchandise, all of which being of particularly long haul character would contribute considerable to other lines of the system.

It is figured that on an average 14 miles road haul would be saved to the farmers by this line, and applied to the 630,000 bushels of grain expected and taken at ¾ cents per bushel per mile hauled, would mean an annual saving to the farmers of $66,150 for grain hauled alone.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

ROSEDALE BRANCH LINE BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of Bill 61, an Act respecting the construction of a Canadian National Railway Line, being a joint section from Rosedale southeasterly in the Province of Alberta.

Joint Section with C.P.R.

Rosedale to Bullpound Creek, Mile 0—39

	Cost
Proposed in 1924—39 miles grade—half cost.	$593,000
Proposed in 1925—39 miles track—half cost.	322,000
	$915,000

It is proposed in 1924 to join with the C.P.R. and grade 39 miles and pay half the cost, which would be $593,000 and in 1925 jointly with the C.P.R. lay the track on this 39 miles and pay half the cost, which would be $322,000.

In 1919 when a conflict of railway routes between the C.N.R. and C.P.R. was discussed before the Board of Railway Commissioners, for a line easterly out of the Drumheller Coal fields down the Red River the Board ruled that this should become a joint line with equal rights to each railway and that the parties should make an agreement covering the same. This resulted in an agreement, May 9th, 1919, being drawn, making the stretch east from Rosedale as far as Bullpound Creek an equal joint section and fixing certain limitations in reference to the balance of the route.

The C.P.R. now wish to proceed with this joint section construction.

This line will open a further area of the Drumheller Coal fields. From the end of the joint section this line when finally linked up easterly to the Acadia Valley line will afford the C.N.R. lighter grades eastbound for coal from the Drumheller fields. It will also serve the agricultural district on either side of the Red Deer River over this distance.

No final running rights agreement has been reached with the C.P.R. as to the detailed terms for the use of the joint section, but the estimate is based on the understanding that half the money will be provided by each party.

Note:

Subject to arrangement to be made with C.P.R. Includes half cost only.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

CRIMINAL CODE (SCRIP LAND) BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. GRIESBACH moved the second reading of Bill 5, an Act to amend the Criminal Code.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, before this Bill is read the second time there are a few observations I would like to offer in respect to it. This Bill comes to this House from the other House, where it was sponsored by the gentleman who represents the constituency for which I formerly sat, and it comes to this House without any sponsor. The honourable leader of the Government probably because of my connection with the constituency aforesaid, has asked me to move the second reading of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I drew the attention of my honourable friend to this Bill, which seemed to be fatherless, as likely to take an interest in it.

Hon. Mr. GRIESBACH: I am interested in it, and am now explaining my position in reference to it. I have no objection to moving the second reading, except that I want to accompany that motion with the explanation I am now about to make.

As honourable gentlemen are aware, the greater proportion of offences under the Criminal Code are governed by some limitation as to the time in which proceedings can be taken. In 1921, I think, an amendment to the Criminal Code was introduced in this House and concurred in by the other House, fixing a limitation to proceedings with respect to offences committed in connection with half-breed scrip. When the Bill came before that House, of which I was then a member, I attached no importance to it. I then assumed, as I do now, that there ought to be some limitation to prosecutions for this offence, as there are in regard to other offences.

As I say, the Bill attracted no particular attention, and I do not remember at the moment whether I voted for it or not. At all events, I had no objection to it going through. It subsequently transpired, however, that at the very time this amendment was introduced and passed in Parliament a prosecution under the Act as it formerly stood was about to take place, or was actually taking place, which prosecution, it is alleged, was halted by the action of Parliament in passing the amendment to the Criminal Code providing the limitation.

The Bill before us is in effect, a Bill, to abolish the amendment introduced in 1921, and to leave this particular offence without any limitation whatever. Subsequent to the passing of the Bill in 1921 it was alleged that the amendment fixing a time limit was introduced for the specific purpose of protecting the individual against whom proceedings were then pending or being taken. I may say at once that I had no knowledge of that, and no evidence is before me that such was the case; hence I offer this explanation at this time before moving the second reading of the Bill.

I think the Bill ought to go to a Committee of this House, in order that the Committee may consider, in the first place, whether or not there should be a limit to prosecutions for this offence; secondly, what that limitation should be; and, thirdly, whether, having regard to the peculiar situation which resulted, the Bill as brought into this House should be passed, or amended, or otherwise dealt with.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I would move that this Bill be referred to the Committee that has now under consideration all other Bills that have been introduced this Session amending the Criminal Code.

The motion was agreed to.

KINGSCLEAR-ST. CROIX RIVER BRANCH LINE BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of Bill 26, an Act respecting the construction of a Canadian National Railway Line between Kingsclear and the St. Croix River, in the Province of New Brunswick.

He said: I beg to move the second reading of this Bill, and to repeat what I said when I moved the second reading of the other Canadian National Railway Branch Bills—that we are passing all these Bills with an explanation which will go on Hansard, but without binding the Senate to the principle of the Bill. When we have heard the discussion, and have the Committee's report upon the Bill, the Senate will be free, on the report or on the third reading, to take whatever action it pleases.

Connection with the United States Lines through New Brunswick

Mile 0-41

	Cost
Proposed in 1924—41 miles grade..	$1,446,500
Proposed in 1925—41 miles track..	676,500
	$2,123,000

It has been practically concluded that the best location for a direct connection of the lines in New Brunswick with rails in the United States, can be made by a line from Kingsclear to Vanceboro', by a line constructed between these points a distance of 41 miles, at an estimated cost of $2,123,000. As an alternative the line would be built from Kingsclear over about the same route but only as far as Harvey (14.5 miles), and there connect with the C.P.R., then running rights would be obtained over the C.P.R. from Harvey to Vanceboro' for use of our trains. Either proposal gives us a direct connection with the Maine Central Railway at Vanceboro'. This has the advantage over other proposals for a direct link to American lines, in that it will leave our proportions of present rates undisturbed, and obviates other railways sharing in the receipts before reaching the Maine Central Railway. The new line would be in Canadian territory all the way to the junction with the Maine Central Railway. As no arrangements have been concluded with the C.P.R. for using part of their line, the estimate of cost of construction of the whole distance is included.

The purpose and justification of this line is that it will give a direct interchange between the Canadian National Lines and the lines in the United States, without transferring through the C.P.R., as at present. The main advantage derived from such an arrangement will be in connection with the return of Canadian National cars from American lines as well as the more prompt handling of traffic to and from points in the New England States.

This is subject to a final arrangement being made with the Maine Central Railway or some other American Railway for interchange of traffic, and the establishment of suitable facilities.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

ROUSSEAU-LAURENT BRANCH LINE BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of Bill 30, an Act respecting the Construction of a Canadian National Railway Line between Rousseau and Laurent, in the Province of Quebec.

Rousseau-Laurent Cut-Off, Mile 0-17

	Cost
Proposed in 1925—17 miles grade..	$719,500
Proposed in 1926—17 miles track and ballast	280,500
	$1,000,000

It is proposed in 1925 to grade the 17 miles this line involves, at an estimated cost of $719,500, and in 1926 to complete it with track and ballast, etc., at a further cost of $280,500.

The purpose of this line is the first and most important step in the grade reductions of the route from Lake St. John Country south. The present grades on part of this route are too steep for economical operation. On the engine division between Lake Edward and Garneau Jct. they are 2 per cent in each direction, and between Rousseau and Laurent is the worst section of this engine run. The proposed cut-off will have .5 per cent grades in each direction and will avoid a rise of 200 feet in each direction.

The business from this line to Montreal and points beyond is steadily increasing, and very large engineering enterprises are now under way in the Lake St. John District, for Hydro-Electric and the paper industry development. If the expenditures now being made there are justified, it means the business to and from this district must be increased by several times the present quantity. Our line without improvement is not in shape to cope with much more business, and without grade reduction would soon come to the limit of its capacity. Another phase of the matter is that with the present freight rates and costs, it is not possible on bulk tonnage to get sufficient tonnage behind a locomotive to pay direct out of pocket expenses while operating over the present grades. This means that increased business instead of helping us only puts us further in the hole, whereas, if we reduce the grades, we can look forward to increased tonnage eventually contributing to our net profits, in an increasing ratio.

There are further grade revisions necessary to make this line a .5 per cent gradient route. Taking all of them into account it has has been shown that, with increased business the operating saving will pay a handsome return on the amount involved. Awaiting confirmation of expected increases in business, no work is proposed till 1925, when it is anticipated this work will be badly required.

Note.—Revision of Line to Lake St. John.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

SUNNYBRAE-GUYSBOROUGH BRANCH LINE BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of Bill 32, an Act respecting the Construction of a Canadian National Railway Line between Sunnybrae and Guysborough, in the Province of Nova Scotia.

Sunny Brae, Mile 0-67

	Cost
Proposed in 1924—nil.
Proposed in 1925—67 miles grade..	$2,300,000
Proposed in 1926—67 miles track..	1,200,000
	$3,500,000

In 1924 no actual work of construction is proposed, but final surveys will be run and in 1925, it is the intention to do the grading on the 67 miles from Sunny

Brae to Guysboro' at a cost of $2,300,000, and in 1926 to lay the track and complete the line to Guysboro' at a cost that year of $1,200,000.

The purpose of the line is to open up the local territory for lumber industry and provide better facilities for agricultural products as well as give direct communication to Guysboro' for its fishing and allied products. On part of the route there is considerable agricultural development, and quite extensive hardwood forests which the railway will make it possible to develop.

The original intention of the survey for this line had in view a low grade line with the idea of making it the main line. The results of the surveys indicated that to obtain this character of line it would be very costly, and on account of the fact that the present main line could not be abandoned, and would have to be maintained and operated, it could not be shown that such a line, with its excessive cost of construction would be justified. The present intention is to construct a line to open up the local territory and build it to cheaper standards of construction, but keep in view the eventual use of it for an alternative main line at any time this would be warranted. Therefore, the line will be located so that eventually a low grade could be obtained, but employ steeper grades for the immediate construction.

It has been estimated that there are 250 million feet of hardwood and 200 milloin feet of softwood available to the line, and also some possibilities in gold and iron mining which have not been developed, possibly due to lack of transportation facilities.

The justification for this line is that it will serve a section of the country that has been in long need of railway communication in order to give it a real chance for development and to put the town of Guysboro' in direct rail communication with the Canadian National System.

Hon. Mr. STANFIELD: I do not rise either to support or oppose this Bill, but to call the attention of the leader of the Government to the letter he read from Sir Henry Thornton giving reasons why these branch lines should be built. The first reason was:

(1) The money already spent and the work already done on each line, where such conditions existed.

I wish to call the attention of the honourable leader to the fact that in the county of Colchester there is an old line called the Stewiacke and Lansdowne Valley Railway. This road was started years ago. The company that started it failed, and a great many farmers in that constituency who were shareholders, lost their money. The Provincial Government now owns the railway. I may add that 10 miles of that railway are already graded. In my judgment, this branch line is as much needed as many lines that the Government are proposing to build to-day, and I would ask the railway authorities to look into this matter and say why they did not include this branch with the others.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The only thing I can do is to promise my honourable friend that I will see that his inquiry shall reach the Management of the Canadian National Railways.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND.

COWICHAN BAY BRANCH LINE BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of Bill 34, an Act respecting the Construction of a Canadian National Railway Line to Cowichan Bay, on Vancouver Island.

Cowichan Bay. Mile 0-8

	Cost
Proposed in 1924—8 miles grade..	$230,000
Proposed in 1925—8 miles track..	128,000
	$358,000

In 1924 it is the intention to do the grading and bridging on the 8 miles at a cost of $230,000, and in 1925 to lay the track on it and complete it at a cost for that year of $128,000.

The purpose of this line is to make a short routing to tidewater for timber and its products from Vancouver Island line. This would shorten the route 52 miles as against the haul to tidewater at Victoria. Besides shortening the route it would make a possible location for dumping of logs at tidewater, as there is not suitable location at Victoria for this purpose.

The construction of this line will make possible the hauling of logs off the Vancouver Island line, which at present has a length which is prohibitive.

There are a large number of timber owners who stand ready to go into a big development of timber and its products as soon as this line is completed.

NOTE:—Short cut for logs to salt water.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

COTTONWOOD CREEK BRANCH LINE BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of Bill 35, an Act respecting the Construction of a Canadian National Railway Line to Mile 100 on Vancouver Island.

Vancouver Island. Mile 74-100

	Cost
Grade now ahead of track—55 miles.
Proposed in 1924—9 miles track and ballast.	$155,000
Proposed in 1925—17 miles track and ballast.	193,300
	$348,300

It is proposed in 1924 to lay 9 miles of track from the foot of Cowichan Lake to Cottonwood, and repair 17 further miles of grade, at an estimated cost of $155,000. In 1925 to lay the track from Cottonwood, Mile 83, to Mile 100, at a cost of $193,300 for the year.

Prior to 1914 the grade on this line had been opened up to Mile 135.7 and had been completed continuously to Mile 109, with certain patches incomplete from there to Mile 135.7. By 1921 the bridges and track had been completed to Mile 74.0, at the foot of the Cowichan Lake, and subsequently nothing further has been done on this line.

The character of the country for the first 16 or 17 miles out of Victoria is partly agricultural and partly timber area of a light and scattered character of fir timber, of which a good deal has already been logged off. From Mile 20.0 to Mile 50.0 is fully timbered country, but the timber is not as thick nor as heavy as further ahead on the line. From Mile 50.0 through to the Alberni Canal the line runs through an exceptionally heavy stand of timber on which, up to the present, there has been practically no development, except along the Cowichan Lake where considerable logging operations have been and are going on during the working seasons. The only business of any consequence that can be expected from this line for a great many years to come will be timber and its products until the timber has been cleared and the stumps taken up to permit of agricultural development.

The justification for construction of this line is to handle the timber and its products. As the haul from Cowichan Lake on the line to Victoria is 74 miles over a line of 1.5 per cent grades and 12 degree curves, rates that would pay the railway would be excessive. To shorten this distance an alternative has been looked for and found by the proposed construction of what is known as the Cowichan Bay Cut-Off which would be a branch 8 miles in length from a point on the line about 16½ miles south of the foot of Cowichan Lake, at Mile 58.0, to tidewater at Cowichan Bay, thus reducing the haul from the foot of Cowichan Lake to tidewater from 74.5 miles to 24.5 miles. This cut-off being constructed will warrant the extension of the main line to Mile 100.0, which would tap an area of exceedingly fine timber and bring it within reasonable rail haul to tidewater and should produce a big traffic.

NOTE:—Extension to reach further timber areas.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

NIPAWIN BRANCH LINE BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of Bill 40, an Act respecting the Construction of a Canadian National Railway Line either to Mile 41 near Nipawin or in a northeasterly direction to a point in Township 48, Range 13, west of the Second Meridian, in the Province of Saskatchewan.

Melfort, N.E.—Mile 24-41

	Cost
Grade now ahead of track—6 miles. Proposed in 1924—11 miles grade; 17 miles track..	$360,000

It is proposed in 1924 to add 11 miles of grading to the existing 6 miles ahead of the track and lay the steel on this 17 miles, taking the line to near the Town of Nipawin, at an estimated cost of $360,000. When this work is completed, it is proposed to leave the track there for some years.

The first work was done on this line in 1919, when the grading was started, 30 miles of which was completed by the end of the season 1920, the track being laid on 23.7 miles in 1921, and in 1922 the ballasting, etc., being finished that far.

The line runs through a particularly good agricultural area, admirably suited for grain growing and the proposed extension would take the branch into the heart of a large settlement very well developed. The grain off this line is its justification it being figured that 612,.000 bushels annually might be expected, besides which 140 cars of freight inbound and outbound, consisting of live stock, coal, lumber, merchandise and wood, would be furnished the line. Practically all of these commodities, and particularly the grain and live stock, give a long haul to the railway, thus supplying other lines of the system with considerable business.

It is estimated that the average saving in distance for road haul to the farmers for their grain would be 12 miles, and if this is taken to be worth ¾c. per bushel per mile hauled, on the estimated Quantity of 612,000 bushels this would make a saving annually to the farmers of $55,080 on the grain alone.

Note.—This was the statement read to the House by the Minister of Railways and Canals but, in view of the fact that the description of the line was amended by the provision for an alternative route extending "in a northeasterly direction to a point in Township 48, Range 13, west of the Second Meridian," this memorandum will have to be read in the light of such amendment.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

HANNA-WARDEN BRANCH LINE BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of Bill 44, an Act respecting the Construction of a Canadian National Railway Line between Hanna and Warden, in the Province of Alberta.

Hanna-Warden—Mile 0-57

	Cost
Proposed in 1924—57 miles grade..	$504,500
Proposed in 1925—57 miles track and 30 miles ballast..	792,000
Proposed in 1926—27 miles ballast..	148,500

In 1924 it is proposed to grade 57 miles of this at a cost of $504,500 and in 1925 to lay track on this 57 miles of grade, and ballast 30 miles at a cost of $792,000. In 1926 it is proposed to ballast 27 miles at a cost of $148,500 thus completing the branch.

Construction of this line will serve a double purpose as it will open up the agricultural district through which it will run and will also make a shorter route for railway and other coal to Hanna and points east, as well as shortening the route from points on the Goose Lake line to points northwest.

The country through which this line runs is a good agricultural area, principally grain raising, and there is considerable settlement and development throughout.

The justification for the construction of this line is that about $42,000 per year will be saved in routing coal, and that there will be 1,710,000 bushels of grain marketed off this line, besides 370 cars of in and outbound freight consisting of live stock, coal, lumber and merchandise. It is figured that on the average 12 miles of road haul will be saved to the farmers, and this applied to the 1,710,000 bushels of grain and taken as being worth ¾c. per bushel per mile hauled, will mean an annual saving to the farmers of $153,900 in road haul on grain alone. The class of freight produced from this line, being all of a long haul character, will contribute business to other lines of the system.

Note.—To short route railway coal.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

LOVERNA BRANCH LINE BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of Bill 45, an Act respecting the construction of a Canadian National Railway Line from Loverna westerly in the Province of Alberta.

Loverna Extension. Mile 0-50

	Cost
Proposed in 1924—20 miles grade..	$146,800
Proposed in 1925—30 miles grade; 50 miles track; 30 miles ballast..	935,200
Proposed in 1926—20 miles ballast..	110,000
	$1,192,000

In 1924 it is proposed to grade 20 miles at a cost of $146,800 and in 1925 to add 30 more miles of grade and to lay track on 50 miles, and ballast 30 miles at a cost of $935,200 for that year. And, in 1926, to finish the line by ballasting 20 miles at a cost of $110,000.

The line runs through a good district susceptible of wheat raising and mixed farming, and there is already considerable settlement and development in this area.

The justification for the construction of this line is that it is estimated that 1,500,000 bushels of grain will be produced off it annually, besides 305 cars of in and outbound freight, consisting of live stock, coal, lumber and merchandise. On the average, 16 miles road haul will be saved to the farmer, and this taken at ¾ cents per bushel per mile hauled, on the 1,500,000 bushels estimated to be produced, would be a saving to them of $180,000 per year on grain haul alone.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

DUNBLANE-MAWER BRANCH LINE BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of Bill 49, an Act respecting the construction of a Canadian National Railway Line between Dunblane and Mawer or a point west thereof, in the Province of Saskatchewan.

Dunblane-Mawer, Mile 0-42

	Cost
Grade now ahead of track—nil.
Proposed in 1924—42 miles grade; 28 miles track..	$ 928,000
Proposed in 1925—14 miles track..	1,839,000
	$2,767,000

It is proposed in 1924 to do all the grading on the 42 miles between Dunblane and Mawer and lay the track to the South Saskatchewan river; also complete in that year, if possible, the substructure for the bridge across the river. In 1925 it is proposed to complete the trackwork and the superstructure of the bridge.

The main purpose of this line is to join the system of existing lines west of Dunblane to the G.T.P. Riverhurst branch at Mawer, in order to bring that area into more direct communication with the Moose Jaw-Regina district. The work will involve a large bridge across the South Saskatchewan river near Elbow, but it is justified by the improved routing to Moose Jaw and Regina from the west. It is estimated to make a saving of $131,000 per year on train miles saved. It is also estimated that this line should produce considerable grain and some other in and outbound freight, consisting of live stock, coal, lumber and merchandise. A certain amount of road haul will be saved to the farmers on their grain. The local business off this line, being mainly grain will all have a long haul and thus tend to feed the main lines of the system. The real justification of this line however is the short routing of traffic.

Note.—Includes bridge over South Saskatchewan river, purpose is to link up lines.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

RADVILLE, BENGOUGH OR RITCHIE BRANCH LINE BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of Bill 54, an Act respecting the construction of a Canadian National Railway Line from or near Radville, Bengough or Ritchie, in the Province of Saskatchewan.

Radville S. & W., Mile 0-115

	Cost
Proposed in 1925—90 miles grade; 50 miles of track and ballast..	$2,235,000
Proposed in 1926—25 miles grade; 65 miles track and ballast..	1,471,000
	$3,706,000

It is proposed in 1924 to make final surveys, and in 1925 to grade 90 miles of line, lay track and ballast 50 miles of this at an estimated cost of $2,235,000 for that year. And in 1926 finish the line to Fife Lake (Mile 115.0) at an estimated cost for the year of $1,471,000.

The original intention many years ago of extending the line beyond Bengough was in a generally westerly direction from Bengough through Willowbunch. Surveys were made over this ground and then considerable agitation developed to have this route modified, resulting in a survey being made from Bengough in a southwesterly and westerly direction past Fife Lake. On the completion of these surveys further agitation developed to run the line from the vicinity of Ritchie about due south and touch the west end of Big Muddy Lake, and then run generally west and tie into the second survey.

The result of these agitations appears to have divided the whole territory into three camps, each advocating the construction of the line into their own territory. For a period, two of the factions came together and advocated the line from Ritchie south via Big Muddy Lake, and against them was left the other faction, advocating the line to Willowbunch. Subsequently, however, the consolidation of these factions reverted to their three original parts, each advocating the construction of the line into their own territory. More recently, however, agitation has developed to start the line from Radville in a generally southerly direction and then swing west past Big Muddy Lake to Fife Lake, and have this constructed rather than the line, starting elsewhere.

After careful study of the matter, the conclusion has been reached that one line must be selected for this area, and that it should be so located that the settlers will agree that it best suits the needs of all concerned. Although the line from Radville is longer and more expensive than any of the other proposals it will serve and relieve more territory, and apparently more nearly meet the needs of the district. The Management, however, before the final location is fixed, wish a positive and final expression of all those interested.

The justification for construction of this line is that a great many settlers are a long distance from Canadian railway shipping points, and many are forced to trade at railway points in the United States. It is estimated that this line would produce 2,760,000 bushels of grain, and besides this there would be 750 carloads of freight in and outbound composed of live stock, coal, lumber and merchandise. About 20 miles road haul would be saved on the average to the farmers served by this line, and computing this to be worth ¾c. per bushel per mile hauled, on the 2,760,000 bushels expected from this line, it would mean an annual saving to the farmers in this district of $414,000 for grain haul alone.

Note.—This was the statement read to the House by the Minister of Railways and Canals but it is to be noted that the description of the line was so amended as to permit the construction of the same from any of the three points, namely, Radville, Bengough or Ritchie. The Act as introduced proposed to build from Radville.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

PINE FALLS BRANCH LINE BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of Bill 62, an Act respecting the Construction of a Canadian National Railway Line to Pine Falls in the Province of Manitoba.

Pine Falls. Mile 0-44

	Cost
Proposed in 1924—44 miles grade..	$374,000
Proposed in 1925—44 miles track and ballast.	726,000
	$1,100,000

This branch as proposed will be 44 miles long leaving the Victoria Beach Subdivision near East Selkirk and terminating on the Winnipeg river near the Fort Alexander Indian Reserve. In 1924 it is proposed to do the grading of the 44 miles at an estimated cost of $374,000 and in 1925 to lay the track thereon at an estimated cost of $726,000. The construction of this line is conditional on a Paper Mill being built at Pine Falls.

The main purpose of this branch is to serve a pulp and paper plant to be built on the Winnipeg River at Pine Falls. It will also serve a good agricultural country on the way, besides shortening the route into the mining district now developing north of the Winnipeg River. The immediate terminus will be near a good crossing of the river, so as to make it possible to readily extend this line when necessary.

When complete, the proposed pulp and paper plant would supply immediately about 1,500 cars per year of their products, which will steadily grow with the expansion of this industry, besides considerable inbound freight of merchandise and other supplies. The local farm territory would also furnish considerable outbound business. The freight to and from the pulp and paper plant would not only be handled over this branch, but would extend for distribution over the Company's lines to various points, therefore mean considerable long haul traffic to the railway.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

LOCKEPORT BRANCH LINE BILL

SECAND READING

Bill 63, an Act respecting the Construction of a Canadian National Railway Line between Lockeport Station and the Town of Lockeport, in the Province of Nova Scotia.

Lockeport Spur. Mile 0-4

	Cost
Proposed in 1925—4 miles grade; 4 miles track..	$161,000

It is proposed in 1925 to grade and complete this spur of 4 miles in length from the station of Lockeport to the town of Lockeport.

The town of Lockeport is four miles from the station of Lockeport, and consequently the town has no direct railway communication. The purpose of the spur is to supply this deficiency.

The motion was agreed to and the Bill was read the second time.

CHINA CLAY-ST. REMI D'AMHERST BRANCH LINE BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of Bill 64, an Act respecting the Construction of a Canadian National Railway line from the end of the China Clay Branch to St. Rémi d'Amherst in the Province of Quebec.

St. Rémi. Mile 0-2

	Cost
Proposed in 1925—2 miles grade; 2 miles track..	$105,000

Subject to the subsidy matter being settled, it is proposed in 1925 to grade two miles and lay the track on it at a cost of $105,000 which will extend the China Clay Branch into the town of St. Rémi d'Amherst. The purpose and justification of this line is that it will give direct railway communication to the town of St. Rémi d'Amherst which it has lacked in the past.

NOTE: Subject to subsidy being settled before work starts.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: Honourable gentlemen, before this Bill is read the second time, I want to call my honourable friend's attention to a matter which I think would facilitate the work of the Committee, and afterwards of the House. I have gone through memoranda relating to a number of the different branches proposed; in some cases the information is very meagre and fragmentary and there is an avoidance, almost, of any statement as to the present population of the localities—which, of course, is a pretty important consideration. That condition can be remedied by questions put in the Railway Committee; but there is one thing that would be immensely helpful to the members of this House who really wish to study any of these propositions. Reading over the memoranda with reference to a certain railway route, without having visualised before you the existing routes parallel to or running through or connecting with the route—

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: A good map.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: —it is impossible to get a good idea of the geographical lay of the ground. It might take considerable labour to prepare a little sketch map of each locality, so that the members could study the situation; but if that were done it would be immensely advantageous. I suppose those who go to the Railway Committee meetings will find ample maps showing not only the proposed route, but every existing line, so that they may get a relative idea of the necessity for and comparative advantage of having the construction carried on.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: And of the number of towns along the route, with the populations.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: To-morrow at the Committee we will have representatives from the Canadian National Railways, and perhaps from the Departments, who are familiar with the lay of the ground. I will hasten to ask them if we cannot get a sketch for distribution to the members of this Chamber who are not members of the Committee. At the same time, I would urge all the members of the Senate who are not sitting on other Committees at the time, to join that Committee in order that they may have first-hand information.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: But I want to call my honourable friend's attention to the fact that it will be utterly useless for the Railway Committee to meet to-morrow morning, even though there are scores of officials of the railway with their tongues ready to answer questions unless there is a map.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The map in each case will be on the wall; but I will ask if small prints of those maps cannot be issued.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: If there is a map on the wall that is as inclusive as I have suggested, it will fill that part of the bill. The small sketch map would be of great advantage to the members of the House and the Committee.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: We will meet these gentlemen to-morrow, and they will undoubtedly have all the maps necessary to satisfy the Committee; but I will ask them if they cannot have some maps made on a smaller scale for the members of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. WILLOUGHBY: I have been examining the wall maps used in this connection in the Comittee of the other House. Some of them are fairly large and fairly satisfactory; but there are many members of the House, not members of the Committee, who are very much interested in this question, and it would not be possible for them to follow the maps on the wall. The eye will not follow them closely enough. The suggestion of the honourable member for Ottawa (Right Hon. Sir George E. Foster), if followed, would be very helpful indeed in studying at least some of these branches. I do not think what has been suggested would be very expensive. In the Map Printing Department they have diagrams of townships and districts which could very readily be extended. I had one extended in regard to one of these branch lines some time ago. This would indicate in detail and more satisfactorily the location of the lines. Also, on these small maps could be put the other lines of railway, and the connections could be shown, making clear the advantages to be derived in building the railways, and the new territory that would be served.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I think the Board of the Railways ought to be requested to do what any private individual would be obliged to do. Any person applying for a charter has to have a route map made to a certain scale.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: That shows their own route, but not necessarily the crossing or parellel lines.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Oh, yes—a map of the country adjoining.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: It could easily be done, and it ought not to be very expensive. In any event, we ought to have it done.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

BANKRUPTCY BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. BLONDIN moved the second reading of Bill R3, an Act respecting the application of the Bankruptcy Act, 1919, to the Province of Quebec.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, before this Bill is read a second time, I may give just a few words of explanation. It applies only to the province of Quebec declaring that so far as that province is concerned the Bankruptcy Act shall apply only to traders.

Since the Bankruptcy Act became law only one Province, I think, has complained of the law. Those who have followed the reports in the newspapers of Quebec know that the Act has been bitterly criticized. This may be wondered at in view of the fact that before Confederation and since, the representatives of the province of Quebec in Parliament have contended for the enactment of a Bankruptcy Act. I have gone through Hansard for a number of years, and I could quote the opinions of the best-informed and the leading minds of the Province of Quebec, showing how they pressed Parliament to enact a Bankruptcy Act. This being so, the complaints coming from the Province of Quebec do not certainly refer to the principle of the law.

If one goes into the details of those complaints he will soon find where the evil lies: it is in the application of the law. Ever since the bankruptcy law has been enacted, the Provincial Legislature of Quebec has protested, and the Premier of Quebec has even gone so far as to declare that he would ask for the repeal of the Act. The law as it is applies to everyone, while it should be confined only to those engaged in trade and commerce. Before the Federal Parliament enacted the Bankruptcy Act, the Province of Quebec had defined bankruptcy in its Civil Code, and it was meant to apply to trade and commerce alone.

Therefore, having taken advice from the best informed people in the province, I have come to the conclusion that, as it stands, the Bankruptcy Act is an evil. I will not take the time of the House to quote the debates of the Legislature of last Session. Some have thought that farmers in Quebec should be exempted from the operation of the Act. How is it that the Federal Parliament alone has the right to legislate in matters of bankruptcy? The answer is obvious. It is because it is a matter pertaining to trade and commerce.

But I go further. Is it reasonable for the Federal Government, which has the right to enact this law, to apply it to every class outside of trade and commerce? The people of the Province of Quebec think it should be applied to trade and commerce alone, and I base the argument in favour of this Bill on two considerations: first, the well-known desire of the Province of Quebec that within that Province the Bankruptcy Act should apply only to traders; and, secondly, that since the Federal Parliament has the exclusive right to legislate in this matter, it pertains to trade and commerce alone, and should not go outside of that field.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Honourable Gentlemen, if this Bill passes, I think it will be a very happy solution of the difficulty which we are meeting in the Province of Quebec. The Act is applied, as my honourable friend has just said, to the farming community, and has created considerable disability. Some farmers have taken advantage of the Act, with the result that others who could have struggled through and met their liabilities, if they had been helped by loans, were refused loans because of the danger of the application of the law. I am happy to join with my honourable friend in supporting this Bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS

DISCUSSION CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from May 22, the debate on the inquiry of Right Hon. Sir George E. Foster:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the operation and activities of the League of Nations for the past year and inquire if the Government have considered the advisability of furnishing the Members of Parliament with the monthly summary of the League of Nations and the annual report to the Assembly on the work of the Council and the Secretariat and on the measures taken to execute the decisions of the Assembly.

Hon. JOHN S. McLENNAN: Honourable gentlemen, it is not my purpose to take up any of the time of this honourable House in going over the ground which has been traversed by our right honourable colleague (Right Hon. Sir George E. Foster). His handling of the matters with which he dealt was so clear and exhaustive, and his knowledge and earnestness are always so great, that it would be presumptuous for anybody to follow along exactly the same lines. But it has been my good fortune to have spent the better part of a fortnight in April at Geneva, and through our friend Sir Herbert Ames, whom I found there well esteemed and occupying the most important position of controller of the purse strings, I kept in contact with some members of the Secretariat and became to a certain degree familiar with the work that was being carried on by the League. I found the effectiveness of that work to be due apparently to the fact that the Secretariat had so prepared themselves for questions which were likely to arise, that they were able to deal promptly with the matters which were brought to their attention, or confided to their care, and could almost immediately present schemes that were in many cases accepted. For example, it was only a few weeks after the financial rehabilitation of Austria was entrusted to them that they were able to present a scheme which met immediately with approval, and which has justified that approval by its remarkable effectiveness in restoring Austria to something like a prosperous condition, or at all events turning her steps into a highway which will lead to a condition absolutely different from that which confronted her but a few months ago. I was greatly impressed with the work which the League did. I would recommend anybody at all interested, even anyone who has kept himself as familiar as possible with the work of the League, to visit Geneva to see the processes actually at work.

Yet, however appreciative one may be, however one may strive to make a fair appraisement of the work the League is doing, one has to recognize that there has been considerable criticism and that a certain amount of disappointment prevails that the League has not accomplished more. It is not necessary to attempt to analyze the causes of this disappointment and these criticisms. I think that they largely arise from the fact that we have not looked back into history and seen how very much longer the realization of results has taken than was expected. This naturally would be peculiarly the case after so great a cataclysm as the war. The very intensity of the struggle made one feel that when success was attained its results would be realized sooner than has proved to be at all possible.

Take, for example, the previous great upheaval, namely, the Napoleonic wars. It was all of thirty-five or possibly forty years before Europe reached a condition of stability in which, with minor interruptions, she could devote herself to the arts of peace and to that industrial and economic expansion which took place between the fifties and the seventies. It was found then that history repeated itself. Just as in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, when nations were successful, particularly when the spirit of nationality was revived in them or newly born; as in earlier times when Spain drove out the Moors and started on a great era of discovery; when France drove out the English and embarked upon her career of exploration, and also upon her ill-fated Italian expeditions: so that later period was a time of great industrial expansion which led nations into new adventures. France, defeated in 1870, displayed once more, as she has displayed over and over again in the last three centuries, a power of recuperation which verges on the miraculous. She felt that the best proof that she had not been crushed by Germany was to make a greater France. Italy for the first time became a nation, and Italy entered upon colonial adventures. Germany too, becoming an empire instead of a group of independent states bound closely together in the zollverein, caught the flame and wanted to develop and expand. England also was prosperous and expanded, but was not the only country permitted to take up the white man's burden. Bismarck was unwilling, in the case of Germany, to go in for colonial expansion, but Germany did go in, because she was forced by the energy and the recklessness of a younger generation—a recklessness and an energy which later on brought Germany to ruin.

Such being the conditions of that period, one would have expected war to follow; but here occurred one of the most remarkable things in the history of the world. There were two parts of the world where expansion could take place: one, Africa; the other, the islands of the Pacific. Between 1880 and 1900, or close thereto, all of Africa not already held by the powers was divided among them peaceably; and a similar thing happened in the case of the islands of the Pacific and the shores of Asia, in so far as they were open to settlement. That I think, disposes of the argument against the work that is being done by the League towards effecting peaceable settlement, making arrangements, or helping to make arrangements, which prevent war, rather than following the method in vogue in the eighteenth century, when people fought for seven years, more or less, and then gave back practically what they had taken and made an arrangement which might just as well have been made before.

But I take it that part of the disappointment that has been felt about the work of the League is due to some unfortunate phrases in its covenant. Most people have read at least as far as the preamble, and that preamble speaks of "achieving" peace. Now, to achieve is to bring about through effort. That, it seems to me, is not and was never the true intention of the League of Nations. It is better expressed in a later article, which speaks of "safeguarding" peace. Many people have been disappointed because the League at once, before peace was established, did not set to work to straighten out every question which had agitated and disturbed Europe, brought about so much confusion and was greatly delaying the restoration of the world.

In this respect I would like to supplement what has been said by the right honourable gentleman who introduced this subject to our attention (Right Hon. Sir George E. Foster). He did not deal at any great length with the necessity for publicity. There must be publicity in order that the League, or any similar agencies, may be backed by a strong, intelligent public opinion. If the bulk of the people are not in favour of a thing, that thing will fail, or its success, at all events, be seriously delayed. The student, the publicist, the intellectual, can obtain information about the work that is being done by the League, but the person who ought to be influenced is the plain man, the reader of the newspaper, the reader of the more popular magazines.

For example, a great many people in Canada are not aware that recently Canada was nearly haled as a defendant nation before the League. One of the submerged nationalities, the Six Nations, sided by an enthusiastic lawyer from the neighbouring republic, haunted the corridors of the League and so worked on the sympathies of, I believe, a couple of the members that an attempt was made to bring the rights of the Six Nations to the attention of the League. Their nations did not back up these enthusiastic and somewhat credulous gentlemen; therefore there was no way of bringing the matter before the League, and it dropped—not at all, I think, to the disadvantage of the Indians.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: What were they asking for?

Hon. Mr. McLENNAN: To have their nationality recognized as I understand it. I have only a somewhat sketchy knowledge of the thing, but I understand that they felt that they were never conquered; that they made a treaty of peace with Great Britain or with France, and that they were still an independent nation with national rights

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Somebody was pulling their leg.

Hon. Mr. McLENNAN: That would seem to be the proper view of it.

Another matter of which we hear in a general way is the settlement of the Memel question. Few of us know anything about it, yet it is an extraordinarily interesting affair. The River Niemen, to that part of Europe which it drains, is as important as the St. Lawrence is to us. The situation, as I understand it, was pretty much as if Quebec corresponded to Memel, Poland were some place up in the confines of Ontario, and Czecho-Slovakia farther away. Poland had seriously aggrieved Lithuania by taking of Vilna and the territory contiguous thereto. Lithuania objected and claimed she was in a state of war with Poland. Poland did not admit it; but Poland had Vilna and was in the better position. Now, reading about it incident by incident, it is not easy for anybody to grasp, but if the League of Nations, or some agency, or the union which supports it, could prepare information on the question with which they are dealing, or with which they have dealt, and make what the newspaper man calls a "story" out of it, to the extent to which their dealings with the matter were successful—and, as far as I can gather, their decisions in the great majority of cases have been well accepted and are working out well—it would tend to promote the good work and would make for the formation of that sound public opinion which the League or any other public institution needs to make it effective and give it momentum in dealing with the serious questions which await it.

This is not, as I see, a matter for the Government; but, touching on it in this casual way, I would call the attention of the honourable leader of the Government to the fact that there is, it seems to me, a duty which the Government of the day might perform with more vigor than they have done. What has developed within the last few years shows that nothing serious can happen in Europe, or elsewhere, which does not affect the interests of every farmer in Canada who has any surplus to sell; and all our industries are dependent in greater or lesser degree on the prosperity of the other countries of the world.

We have been given information lately as to the Lausanne Conference, but it was dealt with, notwithstanding the cable, in almost as leisurely a way as though the only communication across the Atlantic was by sail. We have heard little of what happened at the Imperial Conference. We have heard nothing or almost nothing of what was done last September at the Assembly of the League of Nations, where Canada was represented, and ably represented.

It seems to me the Government would be performing a public service if they would promptly, fully, and clearly advise the Houses of Parliament and the country of what is taking place at those important gatherings. They are important for the material reason of which I have just spoken—that our prosperity and wellbeing are tied up with those of most of the other countries of the world, and that the more thoroughly the people of Canada are informed the more likely are they to have sound judgment which will back the Government in doing what is right, or possibly check them if they get on the wrong road.

Hon. N. A. BELCOURT: Honourable gentlemen, I am going to detain the House for only a very few moments. There is really nothing to be said after the exhaustive speech of the right honourable gentleman (Right Hon. Sir George E. Foster) who introduced the matter, and what my honourable friend who has just taken his seat has added to it.

I am a strong, very strong believer in the League of Nations. I believed in the purpose adopted by the League a long time before the League was thought of. If my honourable friends here will not consider it too personal for me to say so, I should like to be allowed to remind the House that as far back as 1906, in another place, on the opening day of the Session, I proposed that an address be passed inviting Their Majesties King Edward and Queen Alexandra to visit Canada. I urged in my speech that the principal motive which might induce Their Majesties to come to Canada to visit us was the hope that the then Entente Cordiale, which the Peacemaker, King Edward, had succeeded in bringing to a successful issue, might be extended if the King and Queen were to come to Canada.

I held out the idea, or the hope, that the visit to Canada would involve, on the part of their Majesties, a visit to the neighbouring republic. At that time Theodore Roosevelt was the President of the United States of America. He, though a man of warring instincts, was at that time preaching as widely as he could the doctrine of peace. It occurred to me, as I said at the time, that the visit to Washington of Their Majesties under the conditions then existing would result in the extension of the Entente Cordiale so as to take in the United States of America. I added further that it would probably lead at an early date to the inclusion of Japan. We would thus have had an alliance encircling the world and comprising the two great nations of Europe, the greatest nation of America, and the only great one of Asia, and very likely sufficient to prevent any great war.

I do not know that it would be interesting to the House, but perhaps I had better say what was the sequel. The resolution was adopted unanimously, and with great enthusiasm, in the House of Commons. It was afterwards introduced in this Chamber, and, as I was advised, was also carried with equal pleasure. I believe that all the large cities of Canada passed resolutions endorsing the action of Parliament and urging that the invitation be acceded to. Well, it was sent over to the Colonial office, and, with that want of vision that has sometimes been displayed in that particular quarter, the request of the Parliament of Canada was thrown into the waste paper basket. The then Colonial Secretary ridiculed the idea of Their Majesties paying a visit to Canada, a thing which had never been done before.

Although it may be egotistical on my part to say it, I think that if some attention had been given to the action of Parliament, and the end which I foresaw had been accomplished through the visit of Their Majesties, the great war of 1914 would probably not have taken place. I do not think that the German Emperor in 1914 would have declared war on a coalition of that kind, including England, France, the United States and Japan. I think anyone will agree with that.

I mention these things to show that this idea of the League of Nations was one which I entertained for many, many years. I thoroughly believe that the League of Nations is the only means by which we can promote and assure world peace. If that fails, I think we must give up hope that we shall have peace, and be content to live again more or less in the jungle.

There is only one observation I should like to add, and that is a reproach which I have against the League of Nations. It is the only one, for otherwise I approve of it and am fully satisfied with the aims it has assumed and the work it has done. What rather grieves me is to find that practices which the League imposes on the nations that have been reconstituted or reorganized or recognized, it is not prepared to impose on its own members. What they have preached in all the Balkan States, in Poland, in Hungary, in Germany, and what they have imposed upon those states—the protection of minorities—the League of Nations is not prepared to extend to the minorities elsewhere. If the sponsors of the League of Nations were wise I think they would not put themselves in a position to be reproached because they are not willing to practice in their own countries that which is imposed upon those re-constituted nations. I am quite sure that my honourable friends who now listen to me know to what I refer, and I do not think I need make it any plainer, but it does seem to me that they ought to listen to some of us who are believers in and strong advocates of the League, and that they might perhaps try to practice what they preach.

Hon. F. L. BEIQUE: Honourable gentlemen, I have nothing to add to what has been said and so fully covered by the right honourable member for Ottawa (Right Hon. Sir George E. Foster) except to say that I entirely agree with my neighbour (Hon. Mr. Belcourt), and am as strong a believer as he in the League of Nations, and have been so from the beginning. I think that in its success the future of civilization is involved. I fully agree with the suggestion which has been made, that if we want the League to have its full effect we must adopt means for uniting public opinion in its favour.

I would suggest that the best way to form public opinion would be to work upon the young generation, and there would be no better way for the League to assure its future influence than by appealing to the schools. Instruction in regard to the League should be made part of the tuition in all the schools, primary as well as the secondary schools, in the different countries of the world.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Will my honourable friend permit me? On this very day letters have been addressed in both languages to the universities and colleges in the province of Quebec—and this will be done elsewhere—asking those colleges and universities to do just exactly what my honourable friend has now suggested.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Then I have nothing more to say.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: These gentlemen have nothing more to say about it but I have a lot to say, and I beg to move the adjournment of the debate until next Tuesday, because I am not prepared to speak to-night. I have a great deal of information, and good information, as to things that have been dutifully avoided by the speakers, so I move the adjournment of the debate until Tuesday.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I would like to call the attention of the House to the fact that next Tuesday is a holiday, and perhaps we might not meet, so the honourable gentleman might put it off until Wednesday.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: It goes automatically to the following day.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: There is no reason why we should not sit. We can sit on holidays.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The House of Commons is going to sit on Tuesday at 8 o'clock in the evening, because I understand there is a function in the afternoon.

The debate was adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at 3 p.m.

IMPORTS UNDER BRITISH PREFERENCE

INQUIRY

On the notice:

By the Honourable Lorne C. Webster:

That he will inquire from the Government:

For a list of the more important articles imported from Great Britain in Canada during the fiscal year 1923, which received the benefit of the preferential tariff.

1. What was the value thereof.
2. What was the amount of the duty collected thereon.
3. What would the amount of duty have been on the same articles if there had been no preference duty allowed, or if the general duty had been applied.
4. Also a list of the articles upon which the preferential tariff has been increased or reduced, directly or indirectly, by the budget of this year.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Stand.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: Will the honourable the leader of the House tell me when he will be able to lay before the House the answer to the inquiry made by the honourable member for Stadacona (Hon. L. C. Webster), because I would not wish to make my motion before getting that information.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I may inform my honourable friend that I have received a letter from the Department of Customs, I think it is—I have not got it before me—informing me that these inquiries will have to be changed into motions for returns, because of their length and the time it will take to get the information. I am sorry I have not brought the letter with me, but I will bring it to-morrow, when I will read it, and ask that these inquiries be made into motions for returns.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Returns, as the honourable gentleman knows, take a long time. This is a plain question: how much duty was collected in 1923 on goods coming from England? And: how much would the duty have been if there had been no preference? That is all that is asked.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: There is more than that. It asks for a list of the more important articles imported from Great Britain which received the benefit of the Preferential Tariff; and also what was the value thereof, the amount of duty collected thereon, the amount of duty if there had been no preference allowed, and also a list of articles upon which the Preferential Tariff has been increased or reduced by the Budget of this year.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: I do not know what to do about my motion. If we cannot get the information asked for by the honourable gentleman from Stadacona (Hon. L. C. Webster), I do not know when I shall make my motion.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Next sitting of the House.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: Say Wednesday next.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I will interview the Deputy Minister, and try to find out if he can obtain the necessary information for me at an earlier date.

DIVORCE BILL

FIRST READING

Bill T4, an Act for the relief of Dorothy Marie Robinson.—Hon. Mr. Bennett.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS ADMINISTRATION

MOTION FOR SPECIAL COMMITTEE

The Senate resumed from May 22 the debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Bennett:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to inquire into and report from time to time upon:

(a) The statements and charges in regard to administration of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine and Canadian National Railways, made by Honourable J. D. Taylor in this Chamber on May 8, of the present year.

(b) The acquisition of the property in Paris, France, known as the "Scribe Hotel," and all dealings, transactions and payments in relation to said property.

(c) The employment or engagement of one Aronivici by the said Canadian National Railways, the services performed by him, if any, and the commission, salary or other remuneration paid to him by or on behalf of the said Canadian National Railways.

(d) The system of the purchase of supplies for the use of or in connection with the said Canadian National Railway System.

(e) The deposit by and withdrawal of the Canadian National Railway Company of $1,000,000 of public funds in or about the month of May, 1923, with the Home Bank of Canada.

(f) Generally all questions, matters and things, which in the discretion of the Committee, arise out of or incidental to the foregoing matters, or which the Committee deem to be necessary to inquire into.

(g) That the said inquiry shall be subject to the condition that no matter, of operation or of management taking place in the year 1924, inquiry into which would in the opinion of the management of the said system be prejudicial to the property of the system or its proper operation, shall be made subject of investigation.

(h) That the said Committee be composed of the Honourable Messrs.

(i) That the said Committee be empowered to take evidence under oath and to send for persons, papers and records and to employ such clerical and other aid as the Committee deem necessary for the purpose of the inquiry.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, my honourable friend from Simcoe (Hon. Mr. Bennett) has opened up a question which is much larger and of much greater import than perhaps he has in mind, although I can see traces of some information which he possessed when he made a reservation in the powers that he was asking this Chamber to vest in the proposed committee of inquiry. The question now before us covers the following problem: what would a committee of this House or of the other House be authorized to do in an investigation of the activities of our National Railway system? The whole question of state ownership is involved in this inquiry: state ownership would be on trial. Under what forms, by what methods, and to what extent, can Parliament and the public be informed of the doings of the Board of Management of the Canadian National Railways and our Merchant Marine?

The motion of my honourable friend is not for an inquiry into specific facts. I draw the attention of this Chamber to sub-clause d, in which the honourable gentleman proposes to inquire into:

The system of the purchase of supplies for the use of or in connection with the said Canadian National Railway system.

and the sub-clause f, under which he wants to inquire into:

Generally, all questions, matters and things, which in the discretion of the Committee, arise out of or are incidental to the foregoing matters, or which the Committee deem to be necessary to inquire into.

Last week I suggested to the honourable members of this Chamber that they should take advantage of the week end to examine into the problems arising from the motion now under discussion, and which were discussed at length in the House of Commons in the Session of 1921. The present leader of the Opposition, the Right Hon. Mr. Meighen, was then at the head of the Government—and I may say that quite a number of his colleagues who were there present and took part and voted are now in this Chamber; and after two lengthy discussions, in which the whole question was reviewed from many angles, the Right Hon. Mr. Meighen, in view of the difficulties which confronted the House of Commons, could not go further than to move the resolution which my honourable friend read to this Chamber, and which I will again read:

That a select Standing Committee on National Railways and Shipping be appointed for the present session, and be instructed to inquire into the following questions:

(1) What information as to the operations of Canadian National Railways and Shipping as conducted by the Board of Directors and Management should, in the public interest, be brought down in Parliament on Questions, Motion for Production of Papers, or otherwise.

(2) When, by what method, and under what conditions, if any, should such information be given, regard being had for the necessity of securing to Parliament and the public all facts requisite for the determination of policy (including finance), and to the Board of Directors the best possible conditions for efficiency of management.

(3) What system of auditing should be adopted, and what extent of detail should be given in the Annual Report.

(4) What if any improvement could be made in the general scheme of management.

(5) Whether and for what purposes the said committee should be continued, and that for the above purposes and for such other purposes as the committee deem in the public interest there be referred to said committee the Annual Report of the Board of Directors and that the said committee have power to examine witnesses under oath, to send for papers, persons, and records and to report from time to time.

Honourable gentlemen will see that the Prime Minister stated expressly that he was not in a position to define the powers of investigation with which Parliament should vest a Committee of Inquiry. He gave his reasons at length on more than one occasion for the doubt which was in his mind and the reason for the close examination of the whole subject by a Committee. With him was the responsibility.

The then leader of the Opposition, who is now the Prime Minister of Canada, did not see eye to eye with the right honourable gentleman, and moved an amendment which contained in effect the wish which is contained in the motion of my honourable friend from Simcoe. It was:

That such committee shall have power to inquire into all matters in any way relating to the railways owned or controlled by the Government of Canada whether under the direction of the Department of Railways and Canals or under any corporation in which the Government are stock holders, whether relating to the construction or operation, from the date of the appointment by the Government of the Board of Directors of the Canadian Northern Railway Company down to the present time; and similarly to inquire into all matters in any way connected with the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, either in respect of the construction or operation of ships, and that such committee shall have power to send for papers, persons, and records, to engage counsel and transportation experts, and to make such reports and recommendations from time to time as in their judgment will be calculated to promote the public interest.

I say that this amendment of the then leader of the Opposition contained practically the principle which is the basis of the motion of my honourable friend, because my honourable friend asks that this Committee shall inquire generally into all questions, matters and things which the Committee may deem it necessary to inquire into. There is no limitation to such an investigation.

There was one point, however, upon which the two leaders in the other Chamber agreed. The Prime Minister, at page 1757 of the House of Commons Debates of 1921, said:

I need not suggest to the House that it would be wholly improper to commit to a Committee the duty of examining into the efficiency of an official. If we adopt that course we may give up hope of ever getting officials who will be big enough or able enough to manage a system of anything like the magnitude of the Canadian National railways. The responsibility for the appointment of the directorate must rest with the Government and the Government alone, and we must not expose officials of the road acting under the directors to review without specific cause by any other body. If we do, we may abandon hope of ever having either officials or directors fit for their duties.

I need scarcely add that the task of managing a system of this magnitude, surrounded by the difficulties that inevitably surround government management, is in itself none too inviting. It is easy for honourable members to believe that the task of securing just the man you may want in each post is easier than it really is. Therefore I say to the House in all seriousness, having had some acquaintance with the problem for many years, that we must take care to be fair to those who are entrusted with this great duty. We must take care that they are placed in a position that will enable them to perform their task to the best of their ability. We must take care that we do not prejudice the interests of the country by pursuing a course in this House, or in a Committee of this House, that does injustice either to the system or to the management.

And here you have the statement of the leader of the Opposition, which will be found at page 1759:

We contend it is the duty of the Government to bring down anything that is asked for by honourable Members of Parliament, or to take the responsibility for not so doing. The Government are not obliged to bring down information if they do not wish so to do, but they have to take the responsibility for refusing to bring down information.

There, honourable gentlemen, on the threshold of this discussion it is found that the leader of the Opposition recognizes a power and a responsibility vested in the Government. The Government, before the people and for the people, represents the majority shareholders; the Opposition for the time being represent the minority shareholders. The majority shareholders, through the Government, have the responsibility and the right to say to what extent they will bring down information. In other words, the leader of the Opposition said: "It is my right to ask, but it is the Government's right to refuse upon its own responsibility."

Now, here we have this question of a general investigation—for just now I limit my remarks to that feature of the motion in any event—a question which has been discussed in more than one sitting of the House of Commons. The conclusion arrived at was that the question of the extent of such investigation should be examined closely by a committee.

I have given some thought to the relations which should exist between the people's representatives and the state-owned railway Management. I said last Session, I think, or the preceding one, that some system should be devised by which Parliament could be fairly informed, sufficiently informed, satisfactorily informed. If my memory does not fail me, I cited a number of parliamentary committees in France which have a right to summon a Minister and inquire with closed doors into the most important matters of government. I instanced the Foreign Affairs Committee, whose Minister is obliged to answer the call of that Committee and lay all his cards before it. That Committee is formed of representatives of all the groups in the House of Assembly. The examination of that Minister, behind closed doors, is made by the best elements of the people's representatives. The same method applies to other departments. This brings first-hand information to the House of Assembly. I do not know to what extent the Senate of France carries on its investigations.

Now, my view—and it is a personal one—is that some organ will have to be devised for bringing to the public the assurance that this people's railway is not being governed by an autocracy free from parliamentary control. I suggest a committee appointed by the representatives of the people, of whom at present there are three main groups, with six delegates from each of those groups, to sit on the Railway and Shipping Committee, before whom the officials of the Canadian National Railways and those of the Merchant Marine would annually appear and be questioned on their annual statements, or upon the actions of their various departments. This would be behind closed doors, just as in the case of the board of management of a private corporation. If it appeared to some member of that committee that there was something wrong that should be denounced to the public, his right would still exist either to ask that the doors of the committee be opened to the public or to raise the question in the House and bring the matter to the attention of the public. There would be this considerable advantage in the suggestion which I make, that no man with a sense of his responsibility would rise in the House of Commons and make a denunciation before he had ascertained the facts. He would thoroughly know all the conditions before he would acquaint the public and Parliament with the matter of his grievance. He would come to Parliament from that committee if he felt that it was his duty to bring the matter before that public body after inquiry.

If there is no such organ of expression, we may have denunciation before inquiry, such as my honourable friend from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Taylor) has made, and as my honourable friend from Simcoe (Hon. Mr. Bennett) has made, with untold damage to the system if the denunciations are baseless. What are we witnessing to-day? Here is a property worth two billions of dollars, thrown into the arena for anybody to kick. It seems to me that this is a costly foot-ball for the party game.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Would my honourable friend permit me? He says I am denouncing without inquiry. Will he be good enough to add, for the record, that for 15 months I was imploring the Directorate of that railway for an inquiry?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I will come to that point, and I think I will answer my honourable friend, if not to his own satisfaction, at least to that of very many members in this Chamber. The honourable gentleman from Simcoe made clear his mind and aim. He is unconcerned as to the results.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I would ask the honourable gentleman to withdraw that statement. I am not unconcerned at all about the results. I am concerned about one result—that, for the good of Canada, the good of decent, honest government, the truth be inquired into.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend again speaks of true and good government. He fails to make the distinction between the Canadian National Railways Management, which has been given a free hand, and the present Government. It is that which is in his mind.

Hon. Mr BENNETT: Then, let me add the words, "and good honest administration of the National Railways and the National Merchant Marine."

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If my honourable friend has had a single eye to that end I would have no objection to take, except as to the mode by which my honourable friend tried to effect his aim.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: What would you suggest?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I will come to that if my honourable friend will bear with me in patience. I have just suggested a mode for an inquiry into all the facts before accusations are brought before Parliament.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But we have not got such a tribunal.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: We have not; but the Right Honourable Mr. Meighen, who was Prime Minister, suggested a Committee. My honourable friend said it was in the last days of the Session. He erred: It was in the beginning of April, 1921. It was voted upon, and he did not move for that Committee; but I believe that the time has amply come when that Committee of Investigation should be formed, and I throw out the idea for what it is worth. Are not denunciations such as those we have heard, very apt to cause depression, discouragement, a lowering of the morale of the whole staff of the Canadian National Railways?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: No, no.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: And have they not the effect of creating an unhealthy atmosphere? We are all supposed and expected to be working with enthusiasm for the welfare of the system; but my honourable friend from New Westminster came here and made his denunciation. The headlines of the papers, yellow and others, carried these denunciations on the "Rascalities of the Canadian National Railways." After my honourable friend from Simcoe had made his denunciation last week we had in the newspapers large headings extending over two columns, such as, "National Railways Reeking in Graft." And yet, honourable gentlemen, this is our own property. We all recognize that with two billions of dollars invested in that Company the fortunes of this country are linked with that formidable asset, or rather liability, which we have. If the Management fails, are there not many people in this country who will think that the country will fail? I ask, would the Canadian Pacific Railway shareholders thus attack their property? Let us see what a C.P.R. shareholder would do—and I mention this because my honourable friend who leads the Conservative party (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) gave that railway as his standard last Friday when he said, discussing the Canadian National Railway branches which were under review:

> We should adopt a standard, in considering these Bills, that would be adopted by any private railway system. If the Canadian Pacific Railway would not enter upon the building of these railways should they be tributary to their own line, the Government of Canada should not enter upon the undertaking.

This is a standard which I accept. Now, let us analyze the motion which my honourable friend has put on the Order Paper. I have indicated that it was sweeping in its character, it was general, it covered any matter which the Committee deemed it necessary to inquire into.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Look at clause g; please read that clause.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes, except the administration for the current year. Now let us look at the specific matters which are in that motion. The charges of my honourable friend from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Taylor) are under two heads: they cover the Merchant Marine and the Canadian National Railways. My honourable friend has denounced certain wrongdoings and has drawn the attention of the administrators of the Canadian National Railways to those wrongdoings.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: And they are still continuing.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The President took up those accusations, and started to have them investigated through his regular channels, his officials. My honourable friend from New Westminister felt that the reports which he received were unsatisfactory. I want first to draw the attention of my honourable friend to the fact that the President must rely upon his assistants until they are found unworthy. Now, my honourable friend from New Westminster, through his insistence, obtained a letter from the President, which he read, in which the President practically said: "I am tired of hearing these recriminations and accusations coming from the Pacific coast. I will send the regional counsel of the Company, Mr. R. H. M. Temple, from Winnipeg to investigate." That investigation —I am taking these facts and figures from the speech of my honourable friend—began on the 27th of March. Mr. Temple was assisted by Mr. E. F. Haffner, of the firm of Munson, Allan, Laird, Davis, Haffner and Hobkirk. I know none of these gentlemen, but I suppose these are the names of a firm of high standing in Winnipeg.

My honourable friend from New Westminster states that he appeared before Mr. Temple and had a long conversation with him and gave him a brief under each heading of the inquiry, also statutory declarations establishing the evidence under each of the points to be proved. He adds that he has given Mr. Temple all the assistance in his power, and all the information he could gather up for him.

This covers the accusations, of which he assumed the responsibility, against the administration of the Merchant Marine. What surprises me is that my honourable friend, who declares that he has nothing to say in reproach of the Commissioner, after having done that, comes to this House and starts to disclose all of his accusations, when he knows that Mr. Temple is investigating and is about to make his report. This is what passes my comprehension, when Mr. Temple has not yet reported. He is back in Winnipeg, and is preparing his report; yet my honourable friend, without indicating a desire to take any special conclusion—because he does not ask for a Committee of Inquiry—comes out and says all this in connection with this matter. I say it is injudicious, and I add that it is unfair.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Will the honourable gentleman permit me? Mr. Temple had closed his investigation and left Vancouver before I spoke.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: All the better. If Mr. Temple had left Vancouver, why could not my honourable friend wait for that report?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Why have you not got it to-day?

Hon. Mr. PARDEE: It is on the way.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But my honourable friend made his denunciation two weeks ago.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: If I may be pardoned for intervening, as I recollect the statement made by the honourable member for New Westminster in his original speech, his complaint seemed to be that the investigator, in the person of Mr. Temple, had failed to call the witnesses by whom the charges might have been proven.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: And it seemed to the honourable gentleman from New Westminster that the investigation could not be expected to result in anything on the lines of his inquiry, and therefore it was necessary to seek some other course.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No. The honourable gentleman from New Westminster has not said that Mr. Temple had refused to pursue his inquiry in the directions which he had given him, nor that he had refused to hear certain witnesses.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: I have not only said Mr. Temple neglected to call material witnesses, but I had written that objection to Mr. Temple before he closed his investigation, and I have his answer admitting the fact.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Did he refuse to hear any witnesses that you produced?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: No. I did not produce the witnesses.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: You should.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: I was at Ottawa. The counsel was instructed to investigate a month before I came to Ottawa, and deferred the commencement of his examination until the very day I left for Ottawa, and when I returned after a month he refused to discuss with me what he had been doing in the intervening month, or to give me any inkling as to what the results were.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But my honourable friend laid before the Commissioner all the information he had.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Certainly, and the Commissioner, in return for my assistance to him, refused to have any further communication with me regarding the results of his inquiry.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But my honourable friend will see what is the result of his inquiry when the report is made.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If ever made.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: I think I see it now.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: It is not here yet.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I do not understand how my honourable friend would see it now, unless he would try to prejudice this Chamber against the report of Mr. Temple. I do not know Mr. Temple, but if he is a respectable and honourable counsel I think he would resent being charged with not doing his duty. It will be upon his work that we shall judge him.

Hon. Mr. PLANTA: Does the honourable gentleman know whether the inquiry was made under oath or not.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I may as well treat this question now. Sir Henry Thornton informed the honourable gentleman from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Taylor) of the inquiry, of the form it would take, and of the advertisement which would appear in the papers. He stated that notification would be given in the press for any accuser to appear before the Commissioner at a certain date. I take it for granted that that was done.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: No, it was not done.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am informed that it was done.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Well, it was not done. I declare positively that there was no advertisement.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: At all events, even if it was not done, we are sure that Mr. Temple had in his possession all the information from my honourable friend, who had laid before him his whole brief, with the solemn declarations and other data; so Mr. Temple was aware of all the accusations.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: Can the honourable member tell me on what subjects Mr. Temple made his inquiry and report? Was it on all the subjects mentioned in the motion?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: He is supposed to have inquired into all the charges which the honourable gentleman from New Westminster was aware of. The honourable gentleman declares clearly that he unbosomed himself completely to the Commissioner and did his best; therefore the Commissioner should have been perfectly well informed.

Now I am asked, was that inquiry made under oath? I have had from the Department the statement that it was not, and I have since had the affirmation that we shall find that it was. I care not.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: I can tell the honourable gentleman it was not under oath.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Then, if it was not under oath, my honourable friend was satisfied that it should not be.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: No, no. I was promised that it would be under oath.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend never said that, and I see nothing of it in the record.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Yes—if the honourable gentleman will permit me. I hate interrupting him, but I do not want to be misrepresented. A letter which I read to this Chamber when we last had the subject up stated that the cause of the delay for three months was to get authority to take evidence under oath. There was twelve months' more delay, and then the evidence was not taken under oath.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Mr. Temple is simply a private citizen; he could not make an inquiry under oath.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That is my impression, except that we might find in the Railway Act some power vested in a Commissioner to inquire under oath.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I know of no authority by which a railway official can take evidence under oath.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Neither do I. But what I want to say is this. If at the outset, when Mr. Temple was appointed, my honourable friend had risen in this Chamber, had crossed the floor and spoken to me, or had written to the President, asking that a Royal Commission issue, I have it from the President of the Company, he would have had the Commissioner clothed with proper authority. I may say that after listening to my honourable friend's speech I felt that the weak spot in the inquiry might be the very fact that Mr. Temple was not vested with the powers of a Royal Commissioner; and, lacking the information that Mr. Temple was coming back, or at least had left Vancouver —a fact which my honourable friend seemed to know at the time, but which he did not impart to this Chamber—I felt it to be my duty to draw the attention of the President of the Railway Company to the remarks of the honourable gentleman. I told the President that if he requested the Government to issue to Mr. Temple a Royal Commission confering upon him the power to call witnesses and swear them, it would be issued; and Sir Henry Thornton did ask that such power be granted to Mr. Temple. He apparently did not know that Mr. Temple had left Vancouver. I saw the Minister of Railways, who said: "I had a request for a Royal Commission to issue to Mr. Temple and drafted an Order in Council, but I found that Mr. Temple was on his way back to Winnipeg."

I may say this to my honourable friend, that I do not believe that under the circumstances, when a Commissioner has taken over 2,000 pages of evidence, this Chamber or the other will think of bringing witnesses across the continent to examine them as to these charges, before the Temple report is presented. I may inform my honourable friend further, so little do I believe that this Chamber would start an investigation into matters concerning the Vancouver administration, that if the report of Mr. Temple is deemed insufficient a Royal Commission will issue. I have the authority of Sir Henry Thornton to make the assertion that he will ask for it, and I am authorized to say that the request will be granted. Therefore if the investigation made by Mr. Temple, covering over 2,000 pages, is found to be unsatisfactory, instead of disorganizing the whole system in Vancouver by hailing the officials across the continent, we shall have a Royal Commission which will have the necessary authority, and I trust it will have the respect of my honourable friend. If he does not like to have the Commissioner chosen from among his own people in British Columbia, we may get him elsewhere, and we shall have this matter sifted to the bottom.

I have said that my honourable friend had two sets of charges. One bears on matters which he had investigated and upon which he could give his own personal assurance that the charges were, at all events, worth investigating. He has asserted that they are true. The honourable gentleman has brought another set of charges, for which he does not take the responsibility. He says that the day before he rose in this Chamber a member of the House of Commons handed him a file regarding an inquiry that had been carried on by an employee of the Canadian National Railways, at the request of one of his chiefs, into certain charges made by some parties at Vancouver. The honourable gentleman read profusely from that file, though he did not take the responsibility for it. That file, unsigned, but which he thought was a true copy of an official file, he launched before this Chamber and before the public.

Why this denunciation in Parliament—this double denunciation? The first related to charges that are being investigated by a man of good standing in his community, who has risen to the post of Regional Counsel in the Canadian National Railway System. I am not acquainted with him, but honourable members from Manitoba do know him. His good faith, his honesty, and his honour are impliedly impugned by the fact that when he has completed the inquiry he is not allowed to finish his work, and all these denunciations appear before the public. Here are statements contained in a file comprising a report made by a man who is said to have been dismissed. Did my honourable friend stop for one moment to realize that he was perhaps doing harm to some men who were thus accused in an ex parte report?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Does the honourable gentleman dispute the file?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I do not dispute the file, but I say that file contained ex parte statements, and my honourable friend took advantage of these ex parte statements, as to which the parties accused had no chance to defend themselves; he threw out to the world the accusations which were contained in that file.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Sir Henry Thornton had that file for nine months, and the parties accused had had an opportunity to defend themselves.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Besides, my honourable friend admitted here in this Chamber that Mr. Temple had that file in hand. Consequently Sir Henry Thornton was not guilty of negligence: he had handed that file to the Commissioner, Mr. Temple, to investigate at the same time the charges contained in it. I have that from the lips of my honourable friend, for he said: "I did not know of this thing, but now I recollect that Mr. Temple said to me, 'I am now engaged on the accusations in the Watson report.'" That is what I find in the speech of my honourable friend.

Now, what justification is there for a Member of Parliament, whether he sits in the Commons or in this Chamber, to disseminate such charges when an invetigator is proceeding to inquire into them? I say my honourable friend did wrong in undertaking to play that role—did wrong in raising the question in this House before Mr. Temple has brought in his report. I knew nothing about those parties. The honourable gentleman knows very well that I am at his service, because I happen to be a Minister of the Crown, and if he had given me any inkling of anything that was disagreeable, unjust or unfair, I would have tried to remedy it. If he had informed me at the outset that Mr. Temple was unsatisfactory, or should be vested with the powers of a Royal Commission, he would have got it at the inception of this investigation, as he will get it to-morrow.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Will my honourable friend be good enough to say what he means by, "will get it to-morrow."

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: He will get a Royal Commission—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Who?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend from New Westminster, if that investigation by Mr. Temple is deemed to be insufficient. Can anyone conceive of a C.P.R. shareholder acting thus towards his company? I put the question.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Can anyone conceive of a C.P.R. director acting thus towards his shareholders?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend is just now coming to a very important question, which follows the present one. If a shareholder of the C.P.R. felt that he had discovered some situation that should be remedied, I say that his only course would be similar to that which my honourable friend pursued at the beginning—to expose the facts to his Board, and the Canadian Pacific Railway Board would have seen to it that an investigation was conducted through the ordinary channels, just as did President Thornton of the Canadian National Railways. Would that C.P.R. director or shareholder climb upon the housetops and denounce his company as a nest of thieves, before the report was made for which he himself had asked? If the C.P.R. shareholder were turned down by his Board and he could not hope at the next annual meeting to turn that Board out of office, he would have but one other course, namely, to appeal to the courts. He could not come before this Chamber or the other and exact his pound of flesh by bandying the charges which were being investigated.

My honourable friend from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Taylor)) said—and he repeated the assertion a moment ago—that it was somewhat unsatisfactory that no power had been given to Mr. Temple to compel the attendance of witnesses or to swear them. I have answered that. Mr. Temple could have been given such powers if they had been asked for.

That covers one matter upon which my honourable friend from New Westminster dilated, and which is at present in the hands of Mr. Temple, who has been assisted by an attorney, and we are awaiting the report. Yet we have had the exposé by my honourable friend, who was asking for some return regarding a boat. I have tried with all the power of my imagination to find the real reason why my honourable friend rose at this particular time, before the report is submitted to the Canadian National Railways and produced in this House. I have yet to learn why my honourable friend acted as he did.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Did you ask your honourable friend for his reason?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I see only the fact. There has been a Commissioner investigating, and he is preparing his report. My honourable friend has handed over to him all his data, and before that Commissioner has written out his report we have this denunciation. I say it is not fair either to the men who are accused before the investigator, or to the investigator himself.

There is another item in the motion under review, asking that inquiry be made into:

> The deposits by and withdrawal of the Canadian National Railway Company of $1,000,000 of public funds in or about the month of May, 1923, with the Home Bank of Canada.

My answer is that the Government has appointed a Royal Commission to inquire into all the facts connected with the Home Bank, and into that fact as well; that Major Graham Bell, Deputy Minister of Railways, who was on the Board of the Canadian National Railways, has been heard before that Commission, as has also the General Treasurer of the Company; that the facts have been disclosed so far in such a way as to give a complete and fair understanding of the reasons which actuated the management—Sir Henry Thornton, if you will, and Major Bell—in making that deposit. Sir Henry Thornton stated that he had been asked to give financial patronage to that Bank, as he was giving it to others, and that he asked Major Bell to look into the matter to see if the proposal was satisfactory and there was any objection to carrying it out. Major Bell did so, and decided to open a credit or make a deposit in the Bank. No one suspected in May that the Home Bank was in the condition in which later it was found to be, and the deposit was made. We must be gratified to know that it was withdrawn a few days afterwards. Major Bell tells why he withdrew it. Sir Henry Thornton states he did not even know that it had been made or withdrawn. He was expecting a report from Major Bell and thought that that had not been done, because he had not had any report. Major Bell had made no report to him because the amount deposited was withdrawn.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: May I ask the honourable gentleman where the proofs of these statements of the Presidents are? Does he read from some document or statement from the President to that effect?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I thought that these facts appeared in the letters from Sir Henry Thornton.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT. What letters? There is no letter of Sir Henry Thornton's before the Commission at all.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Did not my honourable friend read one himself?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I read in the newspaper a statement which contradicts Major Graham Bell.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I may say that, if I have not read it either in the press or in the evidence adduced before the Royal Commissioner, I have had it from Major Graham Bell himself. But we have the facts. We have the fact that a million was deposited and that a few days afterwards it was withdrawn, and the reason has been given by the person who ordered the withdrawal, Major Graham Bell. He takes the responsibility, I wonder, then, why we should institute a second inquiry, when one is already in progress.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Will my honourable friend allow me? If he will read carefully what I said he will see that my main complaint was that all the witnesses were not examined; that in the printed evidence mention is made of Mr. Ruel and another gentleman named Ross, who have the most important evidence to give. Why were they not called? Here is a shareholder in the Canadian National Railways who knows of a fact which is extremely interesting to the shareholders—that is, the people of Canada—namely, that a million dollars has been deposited in one of the banks—it happens to be the Home Bank—and is withdrawn a few days afterwards. My honourable friend lays stress on the fact that the money was not imperilled, but that it was withdrawn, deceiving the people of Canada. That was the principal point he made.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: And primarily that the holders of stock, and others interested in the Home Bank, were misled as to the actual position of the Bank at the end of the month. The honourable gentleman cannot evade that. It is a moral point; not a question of whether the money was returned.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: As to the moral point, I have found disclosed this strange, exceptional, condemnable practice, which prevails in some of the smaller institutions, of keeping an eye on the total deposits at the end of the month, and of making an effort to have those large deposits withdrawn, not on the last day of the month, but on the first, so that the deposits will be large at the end of the month. This practice, which prevails, apparently, in some of the smaller institutions, I hope is the exception. But I think my honourable friend has read that the Provincial Secretary of the Government of Ontario in years past admitted before a Committee of the Legislature at Toronto that he had done the same thing, and had helped the Home Bank by making deposits at the end of the month.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I challenge the honourable gentleman to produce one scrap of a statement made by Mr. McGarry that will in any way, shape, colour, or form bear out the statement my honourable friend has made, that at the end of the month Mr. McGarry would deposit money with the Home Bank to tide it over and help it out. The statement made by Mr. McGarry was that when he was Treasurer application was made to him to give the Home Bank a share of the Province's deposits; and he made no bones about it. He said in his sworn evidence that there were directors on the Board who were Roman Catholics and who were well known to him. He said:

> I knew it was a Roman Catholic institution, and I have nothing to regret when I say I gave them a chance with the other banks.

But as to the real point, I challenge the honourable gentleman to verify by a single word the statement that Mr. McGarry said that he gave them money to tide them over at the end of the month.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I take the honourable gentleman's statement for it. The statement was made to me—I did not read it—and I was informed that that practice prevailed in some quarters.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Perhaps it is the Honourable Mr. Smith the honourable gentleman is thinking about.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: A confusion in the names, that is all.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: We have got the main facts bearing on the fortunes of the Canadian National railways.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Before the honourable gentleman leaves that, will he please explain this, which is in the sworn evidence—

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: In the sworn evidence?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Yes, in this inquiry before Judge McEwen:

> Mr. Yates, General Treasurer of the Canadian National railways, advised the writer this morning that he is giving us not later than Tuesday a deposit of $1,000,000 which will be drawn out again on the 2nd of June, and we would ask you not to draw anything against same. Mr. Gough, our Vice-President, arranged with Mr. Yates for this deposit.

Can the honourable gentleman explain why that was left in there as a solid mass?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: By whom is that signed?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Yates acted with the Bank with only one object—to deceive the public.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: There is no question that the deposit was made, and that it was withdrawn.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: And that the public was deceived.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The public was not deceived to any extent at the end of May. The institution closed its doors in August, I believe.

We have got the facts, and I do not believe that the public takes sufficient interest in the deposits to know whether there are a few hundred thousand dollars more or less in any bank at the end of the month. I think if we look at the movement of the deposits in the fourteen chartered banks from month to month, we will see that there is sometimes quite a movement of funds, but that it never merits the public interest unless it is very much accentuated.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: As I read them, there is a conflict between the statements of Sir Henry Thornton and Mr. Graham Bell. Mr. Bell in his evidence gives us to understand that when this deposit was made a time was arranged when it should be withdrawn. Sir Henry Thornton in his letter states that he advised the withdrawal of this deposit after he ascertained that Mr. Gough was the Vice-President of the Home Bank. I have yet to understand why it would be necessary to make the withdrawal because Mr. Gough was interested in the Bank.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Of course, I cannot go into these details, because there is a Royal Commission which can investigate these details. But even if we had these details and sifted them, does my honourable friend think it would be conducive to the advantage of the Canadian National Railways for us to go into a minute examination of the statements made concerning this deposit? We have got the main facts. We have a Royal Commission that can continue its labours and examine these parties if it judges it useful so to do; but for the purpose of the administration of the Canadian National Railways, I wonder what would be gained by appointing a Committee of the Senate purely and simply to duplicate the work of the Royal Commission.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: The honourable gentleman must recollect that if a Committee of this House is appointed it is going to have before it, not these witnesses, but those gentlemen who made the deal. Mr. Ruel was in the arrangement; Mr. Bell swears he knew all about it. Mr. Ross, by writing that letter, proves he knew about it too. They were not before the Royal Commission at all.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Has my honourable friend in mind asking that those gentlemen—Major Bell, Mr. Ruel, and Sir Henry Thornton—be dismissed from the service of the Canadian National Railways? If he has not, what good purpose will be served by bringing those gentlemen before a Senate Committee of Inquiry when there is already a Royal Commission which can investigate the facts?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: The public are interested in having the whole truth of it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes, there is a morbid desire on the part of a portion of the public to belittle and besmirch men.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: The honourable gentleman showed himself to be a past master in the art in this House when he attacked the late Postmaster General.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I never attacked the late Postmaster General.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Or if the honourable gentleman wishes to apply that to me—

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I do not. The honourable gentleman spoke of the people, and I said there are many people who have a morbid desire to find the weaknesses of men rather than their strong points, and who judge of the administration of the Canadian National Railways by the petty errors or the big errors rather than by the general results.

I draw my honourable friend's attention to the fact that I am simply discussing a motion to investigate the Canadian National Railways and the Merchant Marine, and am examining into the opportuneness of granting what is asked for in the motion. I have no brief for the Canadian National Railway. I have asked them for some information; but my sole interest is a joint interest with my honourable friend. This is our common property, and that is all the interest I have; because, suppose he establishes that Mr. Ross or Mr. Yates or Major Bell has done something deserving of reproach, it does not touch the Government nor does it touch me personally.

My honourable friend has mentioned a series of matters to be inquired into—the purchase of the Paris property called the Scribe Hotel, and the employment of one Aronovici by the President of the Canadian National Railways. I draw the attention of my honourable friend to the fact that this Government solemnly promised Parliament and the country not to interfere in the management of the Canadian National Railways, but to give a free hand to Sir Henry Thornton. When Sir Henry Thornton was engaged, the Prime Minister stated under what conditions his services has been retained, and under what circumstances and conditions they had been given. Sir Henry Thornton, his Executive and his Board, were to have a free hand in the administration of the railways. I am free to say that if the Government had been consulted as to the question of the Board of the Canadian National Railways opening an agency in Paris, I for one on principle would have answered in the affirmative; but if the Government had been consulted as to the proposal to purchase the Scribe Hotel property, my answer—and I believe my view would have been shared by the Cabinet—would have been in the negative. That does not mean that on its merits the proposition may not be an orthodox and sound one; but we would have rejected the proposal because of the then existing financial condition of the country. The purchase may be a good business proposition, either as a matter of policy or in the price paid—time only will tell.

I have in my hands the documents which explain the inception of this purchase, and the position of the Canadian National Railways. First, there is a letter of February 3rd, 1923, addressed to the Canadian High Commissioner at Paris, the Hon. Philippe Roy, and signed by Sir Henry Thornton:

Dear Mr. Roy:

It is with pleasure that I venture to recall to you our previous acquaintance, when I was connected with the British Army in Paris; and, as you doubtless know, I am now engaged in an effort to administer the Canadian National Railway System. I had hoped to have an opportunity of seeing you in Paris before I left England to take up my duties here, but unfortunately I was so busy, and the pressure on me to come to Canada as quickly as possible was so severe, that I was unable to do so.

I am anxious to provide the Canadian National Railways with adequate office accommodation and a proper representation in Paris, apart from purely traffic matters. We are already well represented there from that point of view. I want a well-located office where our literature, time-tables, and, in general, the allurements of Canada, can be exposed to the public. I do not know quite how you are situated with respect to office accommodation; but it occurred to me that perhaps there might be an opportunity for co-operation between the Government and ourselves to our mutual advantage. I would suggest the acquisition of a suitable building, properly located, and preferably on the Boulevard des Capucines, somewhere not far from the intersection of the boulevard with the Rue Edouard VII. The ground floor could be occupied by the railway company with exhibits and literature of various sorts, in charge of a competent staff; and the upper floors, which no doubt would be more suitable to your requirements, could be used as offices for the High Commissioner. I think the offices should be of a dignified character, and thoroughly in keeping with the importance of the post you occupy, and the national railway system.

If this idea should commend itself to you, I should be very happy to collaborate with you here with a view to bringing the suggested plan about. I have asked Mr. William Phillips, European Manager of the Canadian National Railways, to see you upon his return to Europe, as he is here on a business trip. Meanwhile, I would appreciate any comments you may care to send me upon the subject.

With kind regards and best wishes,
Believe me,
Yours sincerely,
H. W. Thornton.

On February 23rd, Sir Henry Thornton received this cablegram from Mr. Roy:

Letter received. Entirely in accord with you. Am writing.

Then we have the letter of Hon. Mr. Roy, dated the 9th of March, 1923:

My Dear Sir Henry:

I remember you quite well, and I was delighted to hear of your appointment ac Chairman of the Board of Directors and President of the Canadian National Railways. You have a different problem to solve and we are all looking to you with confidence to save the situation.

What you are advocating to-day for Canadian offices in Paris I have recommended to our Government for several years. My idea has been always that the Canadian Government should own a building on the "Grands Boulevards," one of the best corners if possible. In the "sous-sol" of that building, I would fit up a cinema for commercial and tourist propaganda. The street floor could be reserved for a permanent exhibition of Canadian products, and suitable offices for immigration and railway department.

The Canadian High Commissioner and the Trade Commissioner offices would be on the first floor and the space left could be rented for revenue.

This arrangement to be effective should be done on a large scale; I mean that we should buy one of the best corners on the Boulevard des Capucines and arrange it so that the public would be attracted by our display.

There is a corner to be sold at this moment which would be an ideal one. It will be expensive, no doubt, but there is none better in Paris. You will remember the "Grand Cafe" with the "Jockey Club" and the Hotel Scribe upstairs. The whole building is announced for sale. It would be too large for our requirements, but a part of it could be easily rented and bring in a very large revenue.

The amount to be paid for that property may discourage the Minister of Finance and frighten Parliament. I know that the Canadian Government is prepared to spend a very large sum of money to acquire a property in London for Canadian offices. I would like to see our people do the same thing in Paris.

At all events, if you are counting on tourists from Europe to develop your national railway business in Canada, you must have a first-class agent and attracting office in Paris. This city is the centre of Europe, and as soon as the franc has recovered something like its normal value, you could, with proper propaganda, draw French capital and French energy to Canada. Our men during the war, by their gallantry and personal behaviour to the French people, have won fame for Canada and touched the heart of the French nation. The people here are anxious to deal with us, and come into closer contact with our country as soon as the circumstances will permit. France is busy at this moment cleaning house, and repairing damages. Believe me, she is doing this work as well as she has done the other; although she is doing it practically alone. Germany will be down on her knees shortly and will have to repair damage. Then peace will be re-established in the world, and prosperity will gradually come back to industries and peaceful nations: France is one of these.

I would like to see Canada make an immense bid for French business. The South American countries are all doing it. By our territory, population, and certainly by our resources, we are just as entitled as they are to international attention.

As I said before, as soon as conditions are better, and peace and security granted to France, it would be the easiest thing to get the French people to interest themselves to Canada. Large French parties would be arranged to visit our country and practical results obtained thereof.

Mr. Aronovici tells me that you have asked him to take charge of your office in Paris. I know that he is a man of large experience and unbounded activity.

No one, my dear Sir Henry, is wishing you more success than I do, and I feel confident you will succeed.

Circumstances and probably war conditions have forced Canada to make the experiment of "states ownership" which has proved to be a difficult business to handle in all countries. If, through your ability and energy, you can show to the world that such a state enterprise can be made successful, then we would pass a resolution in Parliament to declare that. "Vous avez bien mérité da la Patrie"!

I hope to go to Canada during the summer when I will probably visit the west. I have still some interest in this part of the country.

The latter part is somewhat personal:

You probably don't know that Edmonton has been my home during fifteen years and that five out of my six children were born in Alberta. So I know the western provinces as well as I know the province of Quebec.

Mr. Aronovici will give you all the European news. I apologize for this long letter, and more so for my English, which is a poor specimen of your beautiful language.

I would be pleased to hear from you from time to time, but I know that you will be too busy to write. Aronovici will tell me all about you and your projects. Some day soon I will pay you a visit myself.

With kind regards,
Your sincerely,
(Signed) Philippe Roy,
Commissioner General for Canada in France.

Sir Henry Thornton, K.B.E.,
President, Canadian National Railways,
Ottawa.

Then follow telegrams, one of April 9th from Sir Henry Thornton to Phillips, London.

Montreal, April 9, 1923.

(Translation)

To Phillips, London.

Please repeat to Roy in confidential cypher following "Understand from Aronovici that a property now occupied by Grand Cafe and perhaps others corners Rue des Capucines and Rue Scribe can be acquired for purchase price of 30,000,000 frs. to which must be added Government tax of 3,600,000 frs. and an additional amount of about 3,600,00 frs. would have to be paid present tenants to secure early possession, making total of 37,200,000 frs. Beyond this, we should have to lay down about 3,500,000 frs. to adapt building to offices for you and railways including cinema gallery for propaganda purposes. Building larger than Government and railways require—surplus space can no doubt be rented to advantage. Please say firstly whether you endorse proposition in principle, secondly whether you consider purchase price reasonable as I have no personal knowledge of Parisian property values. It will be necessary to move fairly quickly, as there in an option on property expiring April 20th. Cable reply."

H. W. Thornton.

The answer is from Roy to Aronovici; I think Aronovici was in Montreal then:

Paris. April 12th, 1923.

To Aronovici.

Rue Scribe property would be ideal one for our work. Would recommend it strongly if it could be bought on reasonable conditions.

Roy.

Then a cablegram, May 16th, Thornton to Aronovici:

Montreal, May 16th, 1923.

To Aronovici, Paris.

Bank sending money to Morgan's with instructions to pay to you on receipt of deed to you and mortgage to us satisfactory to Phillips London who will come to see you. Bank will also require a demand note from you for whole amount as evidence of their advance which note this company guarantees you against.

H. W. Thornton.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: What was the date of Aronovici being in Montreal?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I see that the cablegram from Roy to Aronovici is forwarded from Paris, so I surmise that Aronovici was either in Montreal or in London, but I know that he came to Canada.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Last spring.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The cablegram from Roy to Aronovici is dated April 12th, 1923. All this was last spring—last year.

Then on May 16th H. W. Thornton sends a cablegram to Phillips as follows:

Montreal, May 16th, 1923.

To Phillips, London.

Go to Paris immediately and see my letter of April 30th in hands of Arnold Aronovici of 2 Edward Seventh Street and get lawyer to approve title and deed to Aronovici and mortgage to this company. Matter to be Closed Saturday.

H. W. Thornton.

On May 25th President Thornton writes to J. C. Carson, Manager, Bank of Toronto, Montreal:

Montreal, Que., May 25th, 1923.

Mr. J. C. Carson, Manager,
Bank of Toronto,
Montreal, Que.

Dear Sir:

In connection with the advance made by your bank of 38,232,161 French francs, ($2,608,330.00) to Arnold Aronovici, for which his note has been issued payable on demand at 6 per cent, funds have been deposited by the Canadian National Railways in a special account in the Montreal Branch of the Bank of Toronto in the sum of $2,608,330.00.

This money is not to be withdrawn from the Bank of Toronto until the note and interest thereon is paid. You are authorized at any time to call for the payment of the said advance with interest after giving the General Treasurer of the Canadian National Railways five days notice of your purpose so to do, and if the principal of the said note is defaulted, you are empowered to apply the deposit to the liquidation of the defaulted principal. Any failure to pay the interest on the note is to be brought to our attention, but no part of the deposit is to be used for the discharge of this indebtedness.

Yours faithfully,

H. W. Thornton,
President.

Then I have a letter of May 31st, 1923, from Sir Henry Thornton to the Minister of Railways, Hon. George P. Graham, as follows:

Montreal, Que., May 31st, 1923.

Personal.

Dear Mr. Graham:

For some months, the necessity for a more aggressive campaign in Europe on the part of the Canadian National Railway System has been apparent to me if we are to get our share of the European business, and likewise develop a constructive immigration policy.

Two months ago, I brought the matter to the attention of our Board of Directors, outlining in a general way what I thought should be done, and the Board expressed itself as being in accord with my views. There has been abundant evidence that our inactivity abroad was losing us a certain amount of business, and you may recall, for example, the statement made recently on the floor of the House by an honourable member, complaining that the Canadian National Railway System was unknown in Europe.

One of the essential implements in the solicitation of business, as well as for the purpose of advertising the Dominion of Canada as a whole, is proper quarters at strategic European points. We are already properly housed in London, but we have no quarters on the Continent. I therefore considered it necessary to secure offices of sufficient prominence to meet our requirements in that territory.

Early in this month, an opportunity developed to secure a property at the corner of Rue Scribe and the Boulevard des Capucines, close to the Place de l'Opera, and in the centre of the banking and transportation district briefly, it may be said that this location is in the very heart of the city.

Immediate action was necessary, as I had information from authentic sources that other interests were considering the property. Accordingly, I immediately arranged that an agent should purchase the property, and employed the support of the Canadian National Railway System in arranging suitable temporary financial credit. The deal was immediately consummated, and simultaneously negotiations were entered into with a responsible syndicate not connected with the Canadian National Railway System, for the purpose of taking over the property, and with a view to our becoming tenants. These arrangements have now been completed, and the syndicate has agreed to take over the property, subject to certain details.

There will be reserved for the Canadian National Railway System such space as may be required for its purposes, and also for such departments of the Canadian Government as may wish to avail themselves of this opportunity. Should the Provincial Governments also wish to take advantage of the opportunity, they will be treated in the same way as the Canadian National Railway System. Furthermore, it is the intention to locate, if possible, in the building offices for Canadian institutions, so that the property will be, and will become known as a Canadian headquarters in Paris, and on the continent.

I regard it as fortunate that the National Railway System has been able to secure such advantageous quarters, at a reasonable rental, without capital expenditure. It would be unwise and undesirable in the interests of the Canadian National Railway System that full details of the transaction should be known until all arrangements have been completed, but I may say, for your information, that Major Bell, Deputy Minister of Railways and Canals, and Mr. Gerard Ruel, Vice-President in charge of the legal department, have full knowledge of the entire transaction, and are prepared to join with me in a complete endorsement.

Yours faithfully,

H. W. Thornton.

The Hon. G. P. Graham,
Minister of Railways and Canals,
Ottawa.

There is an addition here, which I suppose is written in the hand of Sir Henry Thornton, as follows:

This was written when it was intended that a syndicate would take over the property.

This refers to the last paragraph of the letter, and shows the original idea of the conception of the project.

All of the documents which follow, and which cover the intervention of the Canadian Government, have been deposited in the House of Commons, and I had hoped to have all those documents, but I will have them made out in order that members of the Senate may have under their hands the whole record as it has been prepared for the House of Commons.

Now, I have only this to say, that either House of Parliament has the power to investigate if, after the complete record has been put in possession of the members, any desire is expressed in that direction. I think the record will indicate how the Canadian National Railways went about the purchase of the property at its inception without consulting the Government with regard to such purchase.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: But the Deputy Minister of Railways was consulted; why not the Minister?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I do not know that he was consulted.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: He is a director on the Board.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Was Aronovici in the employ of the Government at that time, doing services for which he was afterwards paid about $30,000.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I do not know. Two questions which have been put in the other House bearing first on the activities of Mr. Aronovici as immigration agent, and then as representative of the Canadian National Railways, and his participation in the purchase of this property will appear also; but the answers may not all be in the same record. However, all that information will be available.

I draw the attention of my honourable friend to the fact that he erred when he expressed surprise at the Canadian National Railways retaining a party, whatever his name, to interest himself in immigration in the name of the Canadian National Railways. If my honourable friend had stopped to think a moment he would have remembered that the Canadian Pacific Railway is spending immense sums of money on this continent as well as on the other side, and that the Canadian National Railway is doing likewise in a lesser degree.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD: I would like to ask the Minister whether he is aware of the nationality of this man Aronovici?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: He is of Rumanian origin, but has been for over a quarter of a century a resident of Paris, and during the war he represented all or part of the British railway system in France; and, as Sir Henry Thornton was manager or president of one of those systems, he came in contact with Mr. Aronovici, who was acting in Paris.

One other thing I would like to add concerning the purchase of that property. I said that the Government would not have sanctioned the purchase, although if I had been consulted I would have recognized in a general way the importance of having the Canadian National Railways represented in Paris. I believe, however, that Sir Henry Thornton failed to analyze and gauge the psychology of the Canadian people when he made that purchase. Last year we were all despondent; we were mostly pessimistic, and very nervous, and many people among us had nearly lost all hope of our financial recovery. Sir Henry Thornton, not being of this country, and being an enthusiast and an optimist, if he is anything, did not see this matter as Canadians saw it; and, as he was accustomed to large business, he decided to corral what he thought was the best property to be had in Paris. I may say this for him, that undoubtedly he has laid his hand on the best property and the best corner in Paris, if I except, perhaps, the site of the Grand Hotel. Before the war there used to be a quarter of a million strangers moving about Paris every day. I am informed that that number has doubled—that half a million strangers are moving about Paris day in and day out; and not one of them passes through Paris without coming to that property, which is at the very hub of the city of Paris.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Would the honourable gentleman explain the statement that the hotel cost originally $2,000,000, as stated in the answers to the House of Commons, when after that they had to pay in all $2,733,693? Where is that represented?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: In the cablegram from Sir Henry Thornton to Mr. Phillips in London, he analyzes the total amount, but does so in francs. However, the figure which I have had is that mentioned by my honourable friend.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Are there no details for even a trifling amount like three quarters of a million?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes, I think the details are fairly given in that cablegram, but my honourable friend will realize that such sums, either fragmentary or total, are all paid by cheques, so that they leave traces not only in the books but in the movement of the funds. Whenever inquiry is instituted or information is asked for, it will be found that those things are adjusted to the last cent.

I said we were all nervous last year. We had been spending millions—tens of millions—lavishly, foolishly, during the war and in the few years that followed, and last year we were beginning to sober up while the taxes were piling upon our shoulders. I believe that to-day we are in a somewhat better mood, and one grievance is being lessened by the fact that the National Railways are doing better.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Does the honourable gentleman not know that the gross receipts for the week, corresponding with that of a year ago, were three-quarters of a million less?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The season is backward.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend the Minister of Railways is at this very moment making his annual statement on the railway situation in Canada, and the honourable member may there find information that will raise his hopes. I would not like to see him go to sleep with that nightmare. I am convinced that the honourable gentleman will find some reasons for becoming more optimistic.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: If the honourable gentleman is not interested enough to read the reports of the railway that are published, surely he cannot blame the ordinary public, the man on the street, for not reading them.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But I would ask my honourable friend not to judge of the results of the administration of a railway or of any large institution by week or month. He will very often have to wait for the full twelve months; and the 1922 report of the railway showed a net revenue of $2,886,711, while last year the revenue had risen from less than $3,000,000 to $20,000,000. So there is reason to hope, and we are beginning to see some light. I believe that this is not the time to be a critic, still less a knocker. Sir Henry Thornton asked three or four years for a trial, a sporting chance. He is doing well.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: That is the proper word—"sporting."

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: And we should do nothing to hamper him in his work. He has raised the standard of the service. He has created greater emulation among the men. He is maintaining the road at a high standard and is improving the earning capacity. Sir Henry may have erred—he has been only eighteen months at the helm—and he will most probably err. But he recognizes that he is not infallible. I would like my honourable friend to indicate the man who is infallible. Let me ask him to look about this chamber and question his colleagues and see if he can find many men who will boast of never having failed or erred in their lives. Big corporations, even the best of them, have no supermen at their head. I know of one splendidly managed system which about twenty years ago decided that it ought to attempt the experiment of mining its own coal and went about it vigorously. It spent over three millions of dollars and then quit. So far as I am aware, the shareholders did not blackguard the board of management for that failure. They recognized that those men, though of high standing and stature, were fallible, and they judged their work by the general results.

My honourable friend ended his onslaught on the Canadian National Railways by relating his own experiences, based upon his first-hand knowledge of the Merchant Marine as mismanaged on the Great Lakes.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Now the honourable gentleman is not fair. He knows very well that I read all the way through from an official letter of the Department of Railways and Canals. Do not put words into my mouth.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: And he came to the conclusion that the managers of that Merchant Marine—he did not even know their names—were either fools or knaves.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT. Oh, I stand to that. Now I can see where the honourable gentleman is at.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Then I am fair. Well, I like the confidence that my honourable friend has in his own facts and his own judgment, and he places them before this Chamber with such an air of conviction and such plausibility that he convinces us they cannot be controverted. He may be a little more modest when I have laid before the Senate the answer of that much abused Merchant Marine, about which he seems to know so much, especially as to their activities on the Great Lakes.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: As stated in their own reports.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes, but my honourable friend drew his own conclusions.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Oh, yes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It is the conclusions that I have to wrestle with.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Those are what we are interested in.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The honourable gentleman dealt with twelve vessels on the Great Lakes which may be classified as follows: (1) Kearsage and Arthur Orr; (2) the T. J. Drummond and G. A. McKee; (3) Canadian Adventurer, Canadian Pathfinder, Canadian Sailor, Canadian Signaller, Canadian Sower, Canadian Trader, Canadian Warrior, Canadian Engineer.

He also referred to "six other vessels of a similar class which could have been taken up there to aid the fleet to help the farmer of the West." The ships referred to by my honourable friend are of 5,100 tons capacity—larger than the boats on the Great Lakes. They were tied up in Montreal, as my honourable friend will remember, and he said that they should have been rushed up to the Lakes.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: They could not get through the canals.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: In fact, because of their size, it is not possible to navigate them through the canals to the Great Lakes, because the length of the locks is 255 feet, whereas the length of the ships is 331 feet.

Dealing specifically with the twelve vessels now on the Great Lakes, referred to by my honourable friend—

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Will the honourable gentleman tell me at what page of Hansard that is to be found? I cannot locate it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The page at which he made that statement?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Page 276:

> They had a fleet of vessels that could move a million and a half bushels a week; and further, I am told that at the same time there were tied up in the city of Montreal six other vessels of a similar class which could have been taken up there to aid the fleet to help the farmer of the West. Was that done? Here is a record that shows what was done by the Government last year in that connection.

I find that my honourable friend, further on, as the leitmotiv, refers often to the fact that this, that, and the other were not done, because the Canadian Steamships Company and the Playfair Company had to be taken care of.

Dealing specifically with the twelve vessels now on the Great Lakes, referred to by my honourable friend, there are: first, the Kearsage and the Arthur Orr. These two ships are owned and operated by the Canadian National Railway Company, and are not part of the fleet of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. The Kearsage and the Arthur Orr belong to the Canadian Atlantic Transit Company of the United States, a subsidiary of the Canadian National Railway Company, and are operated in connection with the so-called rail and lake differential route of the Canadian National Railways in regular assigned service. The nature of the traffic handled by these boats is largely package freight from New York and the New England States over the Central Vermont Railway and the Canadian National Railways to Depot Harbour, and by the boats referred to, to Chicago, and the ships are an integral link in this through rail and water route, and must necessarily be operated in conjunction with that through service and on a regular schedule sailing date basis. The rates applicable to traffic moved are based on a percentage of the through published tariff rate, and, whilst the boats in themselves may not necessarily show an operating profit, they bring to and hold for the rail line a tremendous volume of business which would not otherwise seek that route. The return cargoes consist largely of American corn and other grains from Chicago or Milwaukee to Georgian Bay ports, principally Depot Harbor, and it would be impossible to divert these boats to regular tramp service without interrupting or completely demobilizing the through differential line above referred to.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: That is a good answer.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Who writes this, may I ask?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: This is a statement which I have obtained from Mr. Galloway, who got his information from Mr. Teakle, the President of the Merchant Marine, and Mr. R. C. Vaughan, the Vice-President. I will read their letters.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: What is the date of the communication?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: As soon as my honourable friend had spoken, I moved the adjournment of the debate, stating that I wanted information—

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: The honourable gentleman may not be aware that Mr. Teakle is out of the country.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No, he is not out of the country, unless someone has forged his signature. I have his letter here.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Well, he is reported to be out of the country.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: This through rail and lake route has been in use for many years, and while a segregation of the earnings of the line does not show a profit to the ships, there can be no doubt but that the continuance of this route has been of substantial financial advantage to the railroad, both as to the business actually handled by this route and to other business which is obtained and held by the railway at other seasons of the year, which would not remain with the railways unless this service could constantly be given in the summer months.

It may be noted that my honourable friend refers as an example for the railway to the employment by the Canadian Pacific railway of five large vessels carrying flour between the head of the lakes and bay ports. These boats are employed by the Canadian Pacific as part of its through rail and water route, giving a service of the same character as that given by the employment of the Kearsage and the Orr.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Let me interrupt the honourable gentleman there. The man that writes that letter is simply writing a lot of rot.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I will ask my honourable friend—

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Will the honourable gentleman wait till I tell him?

Hon Mr. DANDURAND: I will ask my honourable friend to allow me to proceed to lay before the House the whole statement as I have it in hand?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Let me tell the honourable gentleman—

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: He may close the debate.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Very well. The honourable gentleman had better get more facts, though, instead of wild statements.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: This Government has not changed any of these officials. They were in office when this Government came in, and I am told that Mr. Teakle was taken from the Allan Line, and that he has a good record. It is not for me to defend him or to assail him, but surely my honourable friend will allow the Management to give an answer to his charges. Besides, my honourable friend asked me not to rise in my place before obtaining this information. He was very sorry that these gentlemen were not behind the bar to listen to what he had to say. Now I bring the answer in all sincerity, and I hope that my honourable friend may be able to analyze these statements.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I hope to do more than that—to examine some of these gentlemen.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Then there are the T. J. Drummond and the G. A. McKee. My honourable friend is not omniscient. He did not know that these ships in Montreal could not go up the canals.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Which? The Drummond and the other boat?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No, no; those six.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The six the honourable gentleman wanted to have put through the canals.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I said—and I have read it since; "I am informed there were six." So I was told.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Then there are the T. J. Drummond and the G. A. McKee. These two ships are lake carriers, and, as the Canadian Government Merchant Marine are not primarily engaged in lake carrying business, it was deemed advisable to dispose of the ships by sale. They were therefore tendered along with a number of other ships belonging to the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, and were sold at what was considered a fair price. Other ships on the Great Lakes were also offered for sale at the same time, but no satisfactory prices were received therefor, the reason being that they were not designed for carriage of traffic on the Great Lakes.

The Canadian National Railway Company are not primarily engaged in the carriage of traffic on the Great Lakes, and it was only for the purpose of assisting in the movement of the grain crop from the Northwest and because of the fact that charters were not available for these ships at profitable rates on ocean routes that they were placed in this service, and because of the fact that these ships were not constructed and are not very satisfactory for the carriage of traffic on the Great Lakes, and because of the large surplus of ocean-going tonnage available at the present time, no satisfactory offers were received for the purchase of any of the ships other than the T. J. Drummond and the G. A. McKee; and because of their being unsatisfactory for the purpose, they were only used intermittently when there appeared to be a sufficient volume of traffic moving to warrant their operation, as was the case for instance in the fall of 1923 and the spring of 1924.

In addition to the four ships already referred to there are on the Great Lakes the Canadian Adventurer, Canadian Pathfinder, Canadian Sailor, Canadian Signaller, Canadian Sower, Canadian Trader, Canadian Warrior, and Canadian Engineer; and the complaint from my honourable friend is that these ships were used for carrying grain from the head of the lakes to bay ports, and that they were not loaded with coal from American ports to Depot Harbour, Key Harbour, Midland, Port Arthur and Fort William.

The reasons for not using these ships to carry coal to the bay ports are obvious. They would simply be diverted from the grain-carrying trade to make the trip to Cleveland and return, and would then be in the same position as they were in when the grain was unloaded at the bay port, with this difference only, that they would have to be cleaned and made suitable again for the carriage of another cargo of grain.

The reason for not using them to carry coal to Fort William and Superior are set out in memoranda from Messrs. R. B. Teakle and R. C. Vaughan, a copy of which is attached hereto, and these reasons are briefly: first, the ships are not constructed for the coal carrying business. Their engines are in the middle of the ships and they are equipped with ballast tanks and other auxiliaries not commonly found in lake freighters. This type of construction makes it very awkward to load and unload them with coal. In addition to this coal being a heavy commodity, it is very likely to seriously damage the ship when it is unloaded into the hold, and when being unloaded large buckets are used which are dropped into the hold from a considerable height, with the likelihood of considerable damage to both the hull and the equipment of the boat, because of its construction.

Secondly, when these vessels were placed in the grain-carrying trade it was necessary to obtain charters for as much of the season as possible. They were chartered to different firms, each one of which insisted on placing a clause in the charter party that the steamers were to return light from Port Colborne or bay ports to the grain-loading port.

As above stated, our ships were not constructed for the grain-carrying trade and therefore the management knew that it would be unsafe to take a chance on obtaining charters from time to time in competition with other ships that by reason of their suitability were in much greater demand. It was essential therefore to arrange charters for the season on the best terms possible, and in order to do this we had to accept the provision for returning the ships light.

By reason of the construction of the ships they were liable to be damaged and thereby delayed in the coal trade.

In order to obtain charters under the adverse conditions created by the type of ships, we had to assure the return of the ships to the head of the lakes as promptly as possible.

The reasons for the deficits on some of the ships subsequently mentioned by my honourable friend are set out in Mr. Teakle's memorandum.

Complaint is made by the honourable gentleman that other steamship lines, more particularly the Matthew Steamship Company, Limited, were not given an opportunity to carry any portion of the coal requirements of the Railways, but that the Management declined to give such an opportunity to any Companies other than Messrs. Playfair Interests and the Canada Steamship Company. The fact is that a considerable quantity was carried in the vessels of other Canadian lines, including Matthew Steamship Company, Limited; Glen Steamship Line, Limited; Norman M. Patterson, Limited; George Hall Coal Shipping Corporation; Algoma Central Steamship Line Limited; Robert S. Misner; Mullen Coal Company, and others; and the management has not received complaints from any of these shipping interests that they were refused a fair opportunity to participate in this movement, nor are they aware that any dissatisfaction has existed respecting it.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Let me say right here, for the honourable gentleman's benefit, so that he may get these officials and tell them to be careful in what they state, that the Glen Line and the Great Lakes are the same line of ships, and the two boats, the Drummond and the Kearsage, were rented to the same company. Someone must think people know nothing.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The statement is that these two were lake carriers.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: They were rented to that same company.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: They were sold.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: No, they were rented to that company.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But are they not the two ships that were sold?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Was not the Drummond sold?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Yes, but before they had been sold—

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Ah!

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Wait a moment—they had been rented to this favoured company; not the Canada Steamships, but the other company.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The Playfair?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But if my honourable friend will allow me to proceed, he will have plenty of time to digest this document—these facts.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: It is amusing if nothing else.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Amusing, but it is couched in very polite form, and I think we might take a lesson from the way in which our own officials are giving us information. I know of persons who have been somewhat less particular in dealing with them, and they were not here to defend themselves.

If the Matthews Steamship Company or any other company in a position to handle the business will apply to the Management in the regular way, the Management will be glad to discuss fully with them arrangements for the carriage of a portion of its tonnage.

The Arthur Orr and the Kearsage, I draw my honourable friend's attention to this fact, belong to a subsidiary of the C.N.R. not to the Merchant Marine. The T. J. Drummond and the McKee, with the eight others, are tramp vessels on the lakes. The policy has been, and is, to sell all vessels for which the Company has no regular assigned service. The C.P.R. has no tramp steamers on the Great Lakes. These eight steamers are not suited for that trade, the evidence being that no decent bid came for them. It was a misfortune that they were all built for ocean trade.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: They carry only two-thirds of the cargo carried by other lake vessels of the same tonnage.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Here is a letter from Mr. Vaughan, of the 6th of May:

> Referring to your verbal request for information in respect to the floating of our lake coal to Lake Superior and Georgian Bay Ports.
>
> Arrangements for the carriage of this coal are made from year to year and the business is usually divided between Canadian Steamship Companies who are in the best position to properly take care of our requirements and this year the tonnage has been divided between the Canada Steamship Lines and the Playfair Interests, both of which operate a large number of vessels on the lakes. Our desire is to give Canadian vessels preference wherever it is possible to do so but when Canadian vessels are not available it is essential that others be used. When coal is coming forward in large volume from the mines to Lake Erie Ports and there are no Canadian vessels available, it is necessary for our Lake Forwarding Agent at Cleveland to charter whatever tram tonnage can be secured.
> I would advise, for your personal information, that the Playfair Interests and Canada Steamship Lines offered to float our lake coal this year at a maximum rate of thirty-five cents (35 cents) a net ton which is lower than the going rate (at present 40 cents).

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Was 35 cents the rate last year?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am reading that letter. My honourable friend knows very well—

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I did not catch what the honourable gentleman said, and I asked if that was this year or last year.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: (reading):

> I would advise, for your personal information, that the Playfair Interests and the Canada Steamship Lines offered to float our lake coal this year—

That is this season, 1924—

—at 35 cents a net ton, which is lower than the going rate—at present 40 cents—and under the arrangement made we are to receive the benefit of reduction if the going coal rate is at any time less than 35 cents, which we do not expect it will be.

My honourable friend mentioned 50 cents.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: The honourable gentleman puts words into my mouth that I never used. I never said they were paid 50 cents. I ask the honourable gentleman what they were paid last year. I said that computed at 50 cents the freight would have amounted to $800,000.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend computed at 50 cents, and said it was too high.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Tell the public what they did pay last year.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend puts that question as if he had the idea that there was something crooked being carried on.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Why not tell the House what they paid last year?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I will get that information for my honourable friend.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Why didn't they give it to you?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Apparently my honourable friend did not ask for it.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I asked, and was told confidentially what it was.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: You tell us.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I will not. I was told in confidence.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: This only establishes the danger of carrying on a campaign in this Chamber before having the facts. I would suggest that there should be some method of obtaining information and carrying it to the leaders of the parties in the House of Commons and here. I would not object to this House forming a joint Committee with the House of Commons to consider the facts before we destroy with our own hands the reputation of our own property.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Let the honourable gentleman ask what they paid last year, and he will find my computation was not so very wild.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND (reading):

We expect to move approximately 975,000 tons of coal to Lake Superior and Georgian Bay Ports this season as follows:

Fort William..	450,000 tons
Port Arthur..	285,000 "
Midland..	100,000 "
Key Harbour..	100,000 "
Superior..	40,000 "
	975,000 tons

The above coal will be shipped from such ports as: Lorain; Erie; Ashtabula; Huron; Fairport; Cleveland.

I find that during the 1923 season of navigation, in addition to the tonnage carried by boats of the Canada Steamship Lines and the Playfair Interests, a considerable quantity of our lake coal was carried in the vessels of such other Canadian Lines as the Matthews Steamship Company Limited, Glen Steamship Line Limited, Norman M. Patterson Company Limited, Geo. Hall Coal Shipping Corporation, Algoma Central Steamship Line Limited, Robert S. Misner, Mullen Coal Company, etc.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: What about my statement that it was carried in American bottoms? Is that untrue, too?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If my honourable friend will allow me to continue, he will perhaps find the information he is seeking in the letter of the General Manager, Mr. Teakle. If I have not covered all the ground, when I am through, my honourable friend need only send me a memorandum—he need not make another speech, although I am pleased to hear him—and he will get the facts.

Now I come to a letter to Mr. D. E. Galloway:

Dear Sir:

Referring to questions of this morning re deficits on several of our steamers while engaged in the grain trade on the Great Lakes in 1923:

ss. Canadian Warrior was laid up at Collingwood from January 1, to September 15, and the Canadian Signaller during the same period. The reason for the lay up of these steamers was due to their requiring very heavy repairs and it was not considered advisable to put them into operation until such time as there was really a demand at a paying rate, this particularly in view of the fact that the steamers were for sale and were to be sold on a basis of as is and where is. On or about September 15, according to our Traffic Department, there was a strong demand for steamers and it was decided to make the necessary repairs to the Canadian Warrior and Canadian Signaller.

In the deficits shown is included expenses during the lay-up period, which are as follows:

ss. Canadian Signaller, January 1, to September 13, $4,662.15; ss. Canadian Warrior, January 1, to September 15, $5,132.59; ss. Canadian Signaller, repairs, $5,784.27; ss. Canadian Warrior, repairs, $8,084.40.

ss. Canadian Engineer.—This steamer was in the grain trade from May 4 to June 15. On that date we entered into an arrangement to carry automobiles from Detroit to Montreal. This was due to their being no demand for grain space at that time and the automobile so carried were for our steamers on direct Montreal-Australian run, the ss. Canadian Engineer being used as a feeder. She continued in this trade until September 7, when she was again put back carrying grain and continued until the end of the season.

ss. Canadian Sower.—This deficit was partly due to her not being able to obtain as good a rate as our other steamers during the month of November and also to prevailing conditions at loading and discharging ports.

In regard to our steamers engaged in the Great Lakes carrying coal upbound—these steamers were under charter to different firms, and included in the charter party is a clause that our steamers are to return light from Port Colborne or Bay ports to grain loading port. ss. T. J. Drummond and J. A. McKee were under time charter to Great Lakes Transportation Company.

It is true that we had six steamers S.S. Canadian Aviator, Canadian Hunter, Canadian Raider, Canadian Rancher, Canadian Trapper and Canadian Trooper, tied up at Montreal during the summer season of 1923. It was not possible to put these steamers into the Great Lakes on account of their length, which is 331 feet, the length of the locks in the Lachine Canal being 255 feet.

Yours truly,

R. B. Teakle,
General Manager.

Now, I submit that all the matters to which my honourable friend has referred are matters of administration. I put this question to the Chamber: will we sit in judgment upon questions of administration? It is needless to say, with regard to these matters, two of which are at present under investigation, that I cannot accept this motion; and I hope my honourable friend who sits facing me (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) will adjourn the debate, if he intends to follow me, in order further to ponder over the numerous problems confronting us, and also in order that he may have the advantage of the annual statement of the Minister of Railways, which he is delivering this afternoon.

As I have said, these are matters of interest to the country. I do not see that my honourable friends, who have brought in a general, sweeping accusation, can gain anything by the inquiry of a Senate Committee, and I hope it is not for party advantage that they would have it. I feel that we have a very difficult financial situation in this country, one which needs to be examined and looked into and taken care of in a very delicate manner. I am convinced that when my honourable friend, consulting with the wise men of his party, examines into the situation, he will feel as I do, that something could be and should be done to obtain data from the Canadian National Railways and the Merchant Marine which could perhaps be commented upon afterwards; but that it would be hurtful to our own Canadian National Railway system to proceed as we have proceeded this far. I believe that we owe it to ourselves and to the people of this country not to try to tear down, but to lend a helping hand and try to build up.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: Before the honourable gentleman sits down, I have a question that I should like to ask, although it may not be altogether pertinent to the matter before us. I have been trying to discover for some time for what service this Merchant Marine was built. We have been told to-day that it is not adapted to the carrying of coal; and the Minister of Agriculture has told us that it is not adapted to the carrying of cattle and wheat in the ocean service. I do not know whether I have a right to expect my honourable friend to answer this question—

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend to my left says he has the information.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: It is information that I would like to have.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The honourable gentleman will remember that two years before the end of the war the then Minister of Marine, with the unanimous consent not only of this House but of the other House as well, on account of the heavy losses which the Marine world had suffered from submarines, decided to build a fleet of vessels to replace those that were being lost daily. These vessels, ocean-going vessels, were built. They were not intended to go on the lakes at all. Vessels on the lakes that were too large to pass through the canals were cut in two and floated down, and anyone who lived along the St. Lawrence saw many of them after they were cut in two, and brought down in pieces, with good stanchions and tight partitions, to be joined together again and sent off to the ocean. The main thing in those days was to get munitions and food across the ocean—and there was a scarcity of tonnage. It is well known that during the war tonnage was so high that an ordinary ship would pay for itself if it made two successful trips. Insurance rates were also very high.

The ships that were built at that time are not adapted to trade to-day. Those vessels were built for ocean service—and I would like to emphasize this, particularly to honourable gentlemen from the West—and they had to be strong enough to stand a storm on the ocean. The ships themselves were heavy and would carry only two-thirds of the cargo carried by a lake vessel of the same tonnage. Suppose a laker carried 300,000 bushels; an ocean vessel of the same tonnage would carry only 200,000.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: What year did they start to build?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: In 1916, two years before the end of the war. Parliament was then sitting in the Museum, and I remember that I myself approved of the policy of Mr. Ballantyne, because it was a time of war and ships were needed. Contracts had been given for the building of ships, but they were not all completed—and that may be a matter for discussion. As men were returning from the front, there was a great deal of unemployment, which was given as an excuse by the former Government for completing those ships. I do not blame the Government for that. Some of the ships were not finished until a year and a half or two years after the war. Some of those 8,000 ton ships were built in Halifax. Some of the ships that had been cut in two were again cut in two and taken back to the lakes.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: That does not say what they were built for.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: They were built to take munitions and food overseas.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: General purposes.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: They were not built for general purposes at all.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: We have some of them in operation on the West Indies route, and so on; but they are not profitable ships. Why they were designed as they were I do not exactly know. During the war ships of a certain draught were wanted, because it was not known to what harbour they might have to go, and as they were designed for war purposes, they were built in that way. They are all of pretty near the same type—'tween decks, and built solidly; but commercially they are not economical. They have very powerful engines and burn a lot of coal. Some of them can go at a much higher speed than ordinary freighters can. To use them would be like hauling potatoes in a sulky.

Hon. Mr. SCHAFFNER: Do you suggest that they would work well on the Hudson Bay?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: That would be the best place to send them now; it would save money, because they would never come back.

Hon. Mr. TANNER: In what respect do they differ from ordinary freighters?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Some of them are fitted with passenger quarters. The discussion we have had is about the Great Lakes, and lake freighters and ocean freighters are not the same at all.

Hon. Mr. TANNER: Some of them carried cattle across to the Old Country.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Yes, and how much did they lose in doing it? They are not fitted for the cattle trade either. I would commend to my honourable friend the speech made in another place by Mr Duff, the member for Lunenburg, I think, in which he explained why these ships cannot be operated economically.

Hon. Mr. TANNER: Is that the 5-hour speech?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Yes.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Although not sitting directly opposite my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Dandurand), I crave the honour of adjourning the debate.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Before the debate is adjourned, I want to ask the leader of the House what defence he has to make for not calling for tenders for the carriage of the 1,600,000 tons of coal when he knows that no contract exceeding $5,000 can be made without calling for tenders.

Hon. Mr DANDURAND: I have no defence whatever to make. It is not my duty to defend myself in that matter. I have nothing to do with that; that is why I have no defence. But I suppose the men who have charge of the Merchant Marine can answer all those questions.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: That is all we ask, to get them here.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: They have given the answers to a considerable degree, and perhaps to the satisfaction of quite a number of members, but if there is a question that they seem not to have noticed I will be glad if my honourable friend will ask his questions seriatim, and I will bring them to the attention of the Merchant Marine office. I have not yet found out where the office is. I have had nothing to do with those gentlemen, nor with the Canadian National Railways.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I would like to ask my honourable friend, Mr. Casgrain, if he was talking about those vessels on the upper lakes, about their having 'tween decks, when he said they cannot handle stuff in them, and all that.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: I can only say that he will be sorry when the evidence comes out, because his reputation will be shattered.

Hon. Mr ROBERTSON: I understand the honourable gentleman from New Westminster wants to make some remarks, and therefore I withdraw my motion.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: I have just a few words to say, and then I will move the adjournment of the debate. I think the Senate is entitled to congratulate itself upon having accomplished something by this episode, in bringing from the honourable gentleman the answer of the coon: "Don't shoot: I'll come down."

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But the coon is in Winnipeg, if my honourable friend means the investigator.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Well, he will come down.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: He will come down with his report.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: If a message has come from Winnipeg, then I have no objection to passing on the reference in that direction. I would suggest to the honourable gentleman, though, that this is evidently a last-hour repentance, because it is only a few days since his colleague the Minister of Railways issued a rather odd answer for a Minister of the Crown, and broadcasted it through the press of Canada, to the effect that persons making these charges should put up or shut up. By this he meant to say that they should go into court with their own money, or else refrain from using the privilege that is theirs, of coming to Parliament with a complaint when the persons and Ministers charged with the duty of investigations in cases of this kind refuse to exercise the functions with which they are charged.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But my honourable friend should trust to the Minister who represents the Government in this Chamber rather than to press reports.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: I would say to the Minister who represents the Government in this Chamber that he was kind enough to take me to task this afternoon and read to me a lecture upon my having presumed to exercise my privileges in this House, saying that he was at a loss to understand what motive I could have had for laying these facts before the House the other day, and not moving a motion commensurate with the occasion. If he had asked me then, or before, I would have had pleasure in telling him, as I tell him now, that he will find in the Statutes of Canada, namely, in the Shipping Act, section 781, this direction:

> The Minister may appoint any officer of the Government of Canada, or any judge of the Superior Court of the province of Quebec, or any judge of a county court, or any local judge in Admiralty of the Exchequer Court of Canada, or any stipendiary magistrate to be a commissioner to hold formal investigations; and a commissioner shall for such purpose be a court.

Now, that has been done already, as I narrated the other day. The Act further provides this:

> 805. In any case where a formal investigation has been held, the Minister may order the investigation to be re-heard, either generally or as to any part thereof, and he shall so order—
> (a) if new and important evidence which could not be produced at the investigation has been discovered, or
> (b) if, for any other reason, there has been in his opinion ground for suspecting that a miscarriage of justice has occurred.
> 807. The Minister may, if, in any case, he thinks fit so to do, pay the costs of any such formal investigation, out of any sums voted by Parliament for the purpose of holding investigations into shipping casualties.

Now, honourable gentlemen, the other day, when I laid before the honourable gentleman who represents the Government, the array of facts that I presented to this House, I was in hopes that he would have gone into consultation with his colleagues in the Cabinet, and moved them to hold the investigation under the Shipping Act which the law directs shall be held, "if for any other reason there has been, in his opinion, ground for suspecting that a miscarriage of justice has occurred." It seems to me that ample ground has been presented to this Chamber in the several statutory declarations I have given to the Commissioner.

While I received with pleasure the announcement of the honourable gentleman this afternoon that a Royal Commission would issue, I suggest that it be a Commission of Inquiry for which the Government shall be responsible, as the law says they are responsible under this Act, and that there shall be no attempt to avoid the issue by saying, "We will give you a Royal Commissioner of our choice, but the costs of any proceeding before him shall be on any private citizen who feels it his duty to bring to our attention matters of this kind."

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The honourable gentleman will realize that as soon as I heard him and his accusations I turned around to the President of the National Railway Company, and I suggested that the weak point in this inquiry was perhaps the fact that Mr. Temple was not vested with the necessary power. I did not intend to force upon the Canadian National Railway any action which it would refuse to take, inasmuch as it has a free hand, but I suggested that the President ask that we would clothe that commissioner, Mr. Temple, with the necessary power.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Well, I sincerely hope it will not be Mr. Temple whom they clothe with any power.

Now, I want to refer for a moment to the broadcasting of Sir Henry Thornton on the day following the debate in this House. I noticed that his broadcast was based on newspaper reports that were not quite accurate, and that he took me to task for something that the press reported, but that I did not say; that is, that no notice was given to me of the inquiry. Notice was given to me, but I do not know that it was given to anyone else, or to the public. Notice of the precise date came to me when I sent a wire to Mr. Temple, but until then he had not told me when he was coming, although then two weeks delinquent. The Canadian National Railway officials and the accused at Vancouver had notice, but the public at Vancouver and the complainants, so far as I know, had no notice whatever. I see in the broadcasting of Sir Henry Thornton the statement that notice was published in the press. I say, as a constant reader of the press, that I never saw it, and that I never met any person else who did see it, and I know that none of the persons interested in the inquiry had the first intimation that any such notice had been published. I may say further that if it had been published nobody would have understood what this very ambiguous paragraph did refer to.

Now, honourable gentlemen, I move the adjournment of this debate.

The motion was agreed to, and the debate was adjourned until Tuesday next.

WAR WITH TURKEY

INQUIRY

Hon. Mr. GRIESBACH: I beg to give notice that I will inquire of the Government:

1. Has a state of war existed between Canada and Turkey within the last ten years? And if so—
2. Was the state of war between Canada and Turkey set forth in any declaration, proclamation or other document published by the Government of Canada for the information of the people of Canada within the last ten years? If so, quote the document.
3. If a state of war has existed between Canada and Turkey within the past ten years, has such state of war been terminated and if so, by means of what Treaty of Peace or by what other means has the said state of war been terminated?
4. If a state of war now exists between Canada and Turkey, what offensive or defensive action does the Government propose to take?
5. If a state of war exists between Canada and Turkey and the Government does not propose to take any offensive or defensive action, does the Government propose to terminate the state of war by Treaty of Peace or otherwise?

I have not set the date upon which I expect the reply, but I may say that I expect it at an early date.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I can perhaps give the reply right away.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: So that the war may be stopped.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: War existed between Canada and Turkey when His Majesty the King declared war upon Turkey or Turkey declared war upon Great Britain. At that moment Canada constitutionally was at war. The war ceased when His Majesty the King signed or ratified the Treaty of Peace. I think this covers all the questions of my honourable friend.

Hon. Mr. GRIESBACH: Except that my honourable friend has omitted the name of the Treaty of Peace in question—the Treaty of Sevres or the Treaty of Lausanne.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I mean the Treaty which has been ratified lately by His Majesty the King, and which would be called the Treaty of Lausanne.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: You think there is no danger of an invasion by the Turks?

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: I feel relieved.

Hon. Mr. GRIESBACH: I desire that my question should go on the Order Paper. I am quite willing to accept the reply of the leader of the Government, and, I assume it will go on Hansard so that it may be compared with the information given elsewhere.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I wanted to reassure my honourable friend.

IMPORTS UNDER BRITISH PREFERENCE

INQUIRY

On the notice:

By the Honourable Lorne C. Webster:

That he will inquire from the Government:

For a list of the more important articles imported from Great Britain in Canada during the fiscal year 1923, which received the benefit of the preferential tariff.

1. What was the value thereof.
2. What was the amount of the duty collected thereon.
3. What would the amount of duty have been on the same articles if there had been no preference duty allowed, or if the general duty had been applied.
4. Also a list of the articles upon which the preferential tariff has been increased or reduced, directly or indirectly, by the budget of this year.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I will say "Stand" to the question, although I had intended asking the honourable gentleman to make it a motion for a return, as I am informed by the Department that it will take some time to prepare the information.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: So he must make another motion?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No. Of course, I have not his consent to transform this inquiry into a motion for a return, and as the honourable gentleman is not here, perhaps we could leave it on the Order Paper.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The answer is being prepared?

Hon. Mr. DAVID: I am interested in having that information; so, if you wish me to make my motion on the British Preference, you ought to have the information asked for brought before the House as soon as possible—and I hope you will do so.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I will make an effort to obtain the information from the Department. The statement which I have just made came from the Deputy Minister, Mr. Farrow.

MOTION FOR RETURN

Hon. Mr. McLENNAN (for Hon. L. C. Webster) moved:

That an Order of the Senate do issue for a return giving a list of the more important articles imported from Great Britain in Canada during the fiscal year 1923, which received the benefit of the preferential tariff, and showing:

1. What was the value thereof.
2. What was the amount of duty collected thereon.
3. What would the amount of duty have been on the same articles if there had been no preference duty allowed, or if the general duty had been applied.
4. Also a list of the articles upon which the preferential tariff has been increased or reduced, directly or indirectly, by the budget of this year.

The motion was agreed to.

EXPORTS UNDER McKENNA DUTIES

MOTION FOR RETURN

Hon. Mr. McLENNAN (for Hon. L. C. Webster) moved:

That an Order of the Senate do issue for a return giving:

1. A list of articles exported from Canada to Great Britain coming under the preference of the McKenna duties.
2. The value of such articles so exported.
3. What was the rate of preference duties thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

BONDED WAREHOUSES AT HALIFAX

MOTION FOR RETURN

Hon. Mr. TANNER moved:

That an Order of the Senate do issue for a return of copies of all communications during 1921, and since that year between the Government of Nova Scotia, or any person on their behalf, and the Department of Customs and Excise, or any other Department of the Government of Canada, in regard to the establishment in the City of Halifax, Nova Scotia, of bonded warehouses for intoxicating liquors.

The motion was agreed to.

TARIFF AMENDMENTS

MOTION FOR RETURN WITHDRAWN

On the Notice of Motion:

By the Hon. Mr. David:

That an Order of the Senate do issue for a statement showing the amendments made to the tariff in 1897.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: Having been promised the information for which I have asked, I will, with the permission of the House, withdraw my motion.

The motion was withdrawn.

EXPORT OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS

INQUIRY

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER (Translation from the French): Before proceeding with the Orders of the Day, I wish to draw the attention of my honourable friend, the able Leader of the Government in this House, to my questions of two months ago concerning the export of intoxicating liquors from Canadian ports. No answer to my motion for a return adopted by this House two months ago has yet been received, although authority for bringing that return has been given. I quite understand that the preparation of such a report requires a reasonable time, and I do not feel like pressing my demand more than necessary; but time flies, and flies very rapidly, and I would ask my honourable friend to make inquiries and to urge the Department to bring the information asked for a few days before the end of the Session.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I may say that my right honourable friend puts his request in such an agreeable form that I can promise him to renew my efforts to obtain the information he desires, and I will attend to the matter not later than to-morrow, to-day being a holiday for the Ministers of the Crown.

THE FLAG OVER THE PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

INQUIRY

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. SMEATON WHITE: Honourable gentlemen, I would like to inquire from the honourable leader of the Government for what reason the flag was not flying on the Parliament Buildings this morning; also if it is the policy of the Government to ignore the Senate as part and parcel of Parliament.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I was informed by my honourable friend early this morning that there had been, in his opinion, a breach of the ordinary procedure or custom regarding the hoisting of the flag over the Parliament Buildings when Parliament is in Session. I inquired at once and was informed by the person charged with the duty of raising the flag that it was raised only when the cannon boomed at noon, and that it would be duly raised at that hour.

INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES BILL

CONSIDERATION POSTPONED

On the Order:

Committee of the Whole House on Bill 7, an Act to amend The Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, 1907.—Hon. Mr. Dandurand.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable gentlemen, I am sorry that the honourable member from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross) is not here. He has taken a deeper interest in this Bill than probably any other member in the Chamber. I know that he proposed to present an argument to the Chamber as to the constitutionality of this measure, and I am sure it would have been of advantage to the Chamber to have heard him. I would suggest to my honourable friend that this Order should stand until Wednesday. It has stood for a very considerable time, and the public interest is not suffering by reason of the situation. I understand that my honourable friend from Middleton will be here before Wednesday.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Before the leader of the Government acquiesces or not in my friend's request. I should like to say that I noticed in the honourable member from Middleton evident signs of distress after the short argument that took place the other day on the question of constitutionality, so I hardly expect that he is going to make any argument on the subject.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: He is recuperating.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I would like to inquire if an opinion on the Bill has been obtained from the Department of Justice.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I thought I stated the other day that the Department of Justice was of the opinion that it was not for the Federal Parliament to question its authority, more especially as the Court of Appeal of Ontario had pronounced favourably upon the exercise of our powers in this field. I think that is the position taken by the Department of Justice, which was represented before the Courts in Ontario in defence of the constitutionality of the Act, and succeeded before the highest tribunal of that province.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Perhaps I am referring to the wrong Act; but I was furnished by a member of the House of Commons with an opinion of the Department of Justice that the Act is ultra vires. If there is an opinion of that kind it ought to be brought down and laid before the House.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Was that statement made in the other House?

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: No; it was an opinion obtained from the Department of Justice by the other House, and sent to me, and I presume sent to every other member.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But I communicated directly with the Department of Justice, and got the information which I have just mentioned. I think I have cited it before.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: But this was after the honourable gentleman had made the previous statement; it is only within four or five days. I may add that I received communications from parties in Winnipeg on this Act, and I forwarded to them copies of the opinion obtained from the Minister of Justice. I would be glad to furnish the leader of the Government with a copy of the opinion, which was sent to me by one of the members from the city of Toronto.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I do not want to insist on proceeding, but if the only reason my honourable friend has for adjourning the examination of this Bill before the Committee of the House is the absence of the honourable member from Middleton, I would gladly agree that we should go through the Committee stage, and at the third reading, if that honourable gentleman succeeds in convincing us that we are moving beyond our own powers, there will always be time to suspend or adjourn the Bill. I am convinced, however, that as to the merits of the Bill itself there is enough experience and wisdom in the senate as constituted to grapple with it now.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: I hope the honourable leader of the House will grant the delay. I know that the last time it was postponed the honourable gentleman from Middleton was quite ready to go on with his argument, but he was willing that the Bill should be postponed for the convenience of the honourable member from Welland (Hon. Mr. Robertson), who is taking a particular interest in the Bill. Under the circumstances, surely an adjournment for a few days would not injure the measure. There is noting imperilled, and it would only be rendering to the member from Middleton such courtesy as he has extended to the Senate.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have no objection to adjourning it until Wednesday if it is understood that we shall discuss the Bill in Committee, because if we must adjourn it from day to day because of the absence of one member, we may be brought to the end of the Session without disposing of it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We will dispose of it on Wednesday in one way or another.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Of course, if the Bill is returned to the House of Commons, perchance with some amendment, it will have to be dealt with there. Under the circumstances, I will move that the Order be discharged and be placed on the Order Paper for Wednesday of next week.

The Order was postponed accordingly.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at 3 p.m.

WINNIPEG EMPLOYMENT RELIEF

INQUIRY

Hon. Mr. McMEANS inquired of the Government:

Is it the intention of the Government to pay its share of the unemployment relief expenses to the City of Winnipeg during the years 1920 to 1923?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The Department of Labour has paid to the City of Winnipeg all amounts outstanding for the years shown and to date:

	1920-21	1921-22	1922-23	Totals
Distress Relief, Civilians..	$51,003 49	$71,170 38	$24,425 33	$146,599 20
Distress Relief, Ex-Service Men..	22,172 02	9,324 67		31,496 69
Excess Cost of Municipal Works.			18,427 80	18,427 80
Totals ..	$51,003 49	$93,342 40	$52,177 80	$196,523 69

Note.—The amount shown as expended in 1922-23 was in payment of the Federal Government's proportion of expenditures incurred by the Municipality of Winnipeg prior to June 15, 1922, and was in accordance with Orders in Council dealing with relief measures in effect during the winter of 1921-22.

In December, 1922, the Prime Minister of Manitoba and the City Clerk of Winnipeg were advised "that the question of Federal assistance to municipalities on the same basis of last winter or otherwise has had the careful consideration of the Government and it is necessary to point out that neither the present Administration nor, so far as can be gathered from the records on file, the late Administration had at any time contemplated that the action taken during the last two years by way of relief to municipalities should be regarded as a precedent for Federal participation in the responsibilities of municipal and provincial authorities, save under conditions comparable to those existing during the winters of 1920-21 and 1921-22, when, over the larger part of the Dominion, unemployment existed on a wholly unprecedented scale. Information reaching the Federal Government does not lead to the view that any situation exists at the present time which is at all comparable to that prevailing during the two last preceding winters, but is, on the contrary, to the effect that industrial conditions generally show great improvement and large sections of Canada are reaping the benefit of a harvest of unprecedented bounty. The situation, therefore, as it appears to the Federal authorities, is not one which justifies action on their part in assuming at present any portion of the obligations falling customarily to the municipal and provincial authorities, and the conditions you indicate as existing in your municipality cannot be regarded as ground for departing from this view." This position has since been maintained.

LLOYDMINSTER BRANCH LINE BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of Bill 46, an Act respecting the Construction of a Canadian National Railway Line from Lloydminster, in the Province of Saskatchewan, northwesterly 45 miles.

Lloydminster W. Mile 0-45

	Cost
Proposed in 1924—20 miles grade..	$262,500
Proposed in 1925—25 miles grade; 20 miles track..	385,000
Proposed in 1926—25 miles track; 45 miles ballast..	522,500
	$1,170,000

It is proposed in 1924 to grade 20 miles at a cost estimated to be $262,500. In 1925, to add 25 more miles of grade and lay 20 miles of track, at an estimated cost of $385,000, and in 1926, finish the line to mile 45 by laying the remaining 25 miles of track and 45 miles of ballasting, at a cost of $522,500.

The aim will be to eventually reach Bruderheim. The distance between Lloydminster and Bruderheim is about 140 miles. The line runs through a good agricultural country suitable for mixed farming and grain growing, and there is considerable settlement throughout.

The justification for this line is that with the very considerable development now being made in this country, the haul to railway markets is quite excessive. It is estimated that the portion of the line contemplated, when completed, will produce 1,350,000 bushels of grain annually and that the saving to the farmers in road haul would average 20 miles. This figured at ¾c. per bushel per mile, would save the farmers $202,500 per year on grain haul alone. Besides grain it is estimated that 460 cars of in and outbound freight would be handled, consisting of live stock, coal, lumber and merchandise. As all the freight from this line would be of a long haul character, it would contribute largely to the business of other lines of the system.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday next, at 8 p.m.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS BRANCH LINE BILLS

PRESS CRITICISMS OF THE SENATE

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Honourable gentleman, my attention has been drawn to articles which appeared yesterday in two Ottawa newspapers, condemnatory of a Committee of this House which has under review the Canadian National Railways branch lines. The main criticism is based upon the allegation that our Railway Committee agrees to be advised by officials of the Canadian Pacific Railway as to the necessity or opportuneness of these proposed branch lines.

I deem it my duty to state that that charge is unfounded. The Canadian Pacific Railway officials have only been called to give information upon a couple of Bills—of the nine which have been under review—in order that the Committee may be enabled to judge of the necessity of two competing lines in the same district. As I am in charge of those Bills, I can state that I have no reason to complain of the procedure followed to this date by the Committee.

One of the articles I refer to is couched in the most offensive and abusive language. Parliamentary bodies are assailed from all angles. They must bear with a degree of philosophy strictures just and unjust, but insults are not arguments.

The Senate has the right to ask that it be judged by its work when it is completed, and not before.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable gentlemen, I wish to express my concurrence in what my honourable friend has very fitly said with reference to the consideration of the Branch Lines Bills now before the Railway Committee of the Senate. May I say in the first place that the officers of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have attended before the Committee with reluctance. They have appeared not of their own motion, but through having been summoned by the Committee, and not for the purpose of making any representations as to their own interests, but for the purpose of giving to the Commitee such information as it may require from them from time to time, as to those Bills dealing with territory traversed by both roads.

May I say that I approached Mr. Flintoff, who is the General Solicitor of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and expressed to him the wish of the Committee that he should furnish such information as the Committee might desire, so that they might deal with the very important subject before them more intelligently than if they had no information at all. He expressed not only dissent as to his appearing before the Committee, but likewise the opinion of his Management that it would be very unwise for them to appear, notwithstanding the desire of members of the Committee that they should furnish such information as those members might solicit from them. Nevertheless the Committee insisted on its judgment—and I think it is a wise judgment—that such persons should come before the Committee as would have information upon the subject under deliberation. Hence any officers of the Canadian Pacific Railway who have appeared before the Committee have done so at the instance of the Committee and in order that we might obtain from them such information as we might require, and not to seek their opinion or advice in any sense.

It is unnecessary, by way of indicating the course pursued by the Senate at the sittings of the Committee, for me to say anything; but in dealing with a subject of this kind one might make reference to the fact that the Senate is treated in a rather curious way by a section of the press of Canada. If we do nothing in the matter of criticizing or revising legislation we are charged with being a rubber stamp, and a demand is at once made for the abolition of the Senate as being entirely unnecessary. If we take any action —if we criticize, if we analyze, if we excercise our judgment in the discharge of our duty, we find this section of the press hostile to the Senate for the attitude it takes regarding legislation of this character. In my opinion there have not been before the Senate for some years measures of such importance as those with which we are now called upon to deal, in connection with the Branch Lines Bills. We have before us twenty-six or twenty-seven Bills involving the construction of something like 1,100 miles of railway at a cost which in my judgment may reach at least $50,000,000 before completion.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The honourable gentleman said $100,000,000 last year.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I am now fixing the minimum, because it has been insisted that the cost of the undertakings will not reach that amount. In making this explanation I am not criticizing the policy of the Government as to the building of the branch lines, except to say that there are many of them of which the cost is estimated at $40,000 a mile. It seems to be overlooked, in the discussion of this very important subject in the press, that these lines are being constructed with the money of the people of Canada, not with the money of some private corporation on whom we might throw the responsibility of entering upon the project at its own risk. These lines are being built by ourselves. We are taking the money out of the exchequer of Canada to build them. We own the National Railways. We are concerned in the proper administration of those roads, to see that they are not loaded down with too much debt; otherwise they cannot be made a success. I think we are all agreed upon that point. Therefore it is the imperative duty of the Senate of Canada to give the gravest consideration to the undertaking upon which we are about to enter, and in this consideration we are entitled to look for the assistance and support of the press of Canada rather than the hostility or the vituperative criticism of the section alluded to. Are not the Senators of Canada as much concerned in the promotion of the best interests of this country and its development as is the press itself? The concerns of both should be identical in a matter of this kind, and all that the Senate of Canada asks is that the press or at least that section of it to which we refer, should manifest a proper sense of its responsibility, as well as the responsibility which we realize falls upon us in the performance of our duties in connection with these Bills.

I have perhaps said more than I intended in this connection, but I simply wish to point out the duty which falls upon every Senator in this honourable House—the duty of giving the most serious and impartial consideration to these Bills so that the money of Canada may be expended wisely.

Hon. ROBERT WATSON: Honourable gentlemen, I have a word to say with regard to the criticism of the Senate by the press. I think that when the Senate undertook to throw out the Bills of last year they undertook a very grave responsibility, and I am not at all surprised at the public in a great many portions of the Dominion being hostile towards the Senate for their action of last year. At last Session an opportunity was presented to the Opposition to those Bills to pick out the ones from which they dissented; but the Senate said, "No, we will throw out the whole Bill," and all the charters were thrown out. The Government have this year submitted the legislation in different form, each Bill dealing with only one branch. I have heard the proposal advanced that we should call in experts in order to ascertain whether these roads would pay or not. I want to point out to this honourable body the fact that hardly a mile of railroad has ever been built in Canada in the expectation that it would pay in the first few years. Most of our roads were built as colonization roads, when we knew they would not pay. You open up and develop this country by building railways, and you cannot open it up or develop it unless you do build railways. The money expended on them has often to be paid as an advance for the settlement of the country.

Now, while possibly the criticism in the press has been a little severe, and some Senators might resent the statements made, I do hope that when these Bills are considered in Committee and in this House fair consideration will be given to the interests and requirements of the country in regard to these branch lines.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Do I understand the honourable gentleman to imply that fair consideration is not being given to them? I resent any such statement as that made by my honourable friend from Portage la Prairie. If he does not see fit to support the Senate against attacks of this nature, then I hope he will speak for himself rather than for the Senate of Canada.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I want to say that in my judgment, and I believe in the judgment of the country, fair consideration was not given to the Bills last Session, when the whole programme of the Canadian National was thrown out because objection was taken to two or three Bills. I hope that this Session we may not be subject to the criticism of having thrown out a lot of Bills simply because some people object to some of them. Whether I believe in Government ownership or not, I am one of those who consider that at the present time we ought to give the Canadian National a fair show. It is not fair to deprive the Canadian National of the means of building branch lines into certain territories while allowing its competitors to get in first. I do hope that this Session we may not be subject to the criticism that I think we deserved last Session in rejecting all the proposals made without any reasonable excuse.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, I hope that we shall not pursue the discussion as to the merits of the Bills. They are before the proper Committee, and I think that the work done there and in the Senate will commend itself to the country.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I think the honourable gentleman from Portage la Prairie should withdraw his remarks.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The honourable gentleman spoke of last year. We are now discussing the action of the Senate this year.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, he has gone further than that: he has cast a serious reflection upon the action of the members of the Committee in considering those Bills during the present Session, and he owes an apology to that Committee and to the Senate for the statement he has made.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I think that when my honourable friend reads the remarks as taken down he will find that the honourable gentleman from Portage la Prairie was addressing himself to the action of last year.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, I do not accept that statement.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Honourable gentlemen, if any public body in Canada was ever justified this honourable body was for its action last year. The proposals were introduced here on the very last day of the Session, involving a possible expenditure of $100,000,000 of public money. We had no information. We were told that none of those lines could be built out of the grant of $72,000,000 that had already been voted. On one or two occasions, in the city of Winnipeg, I have been called upon to make some explanation about those Bills, and when I produced the Senate Hansard and explained the conditions under which they were introduced into this House, and the clauses which they contained, everyone to whom I spoke said that this honourable body was perfectly justified. The honourable gentleman from Portage la Prairie is talking only party politics when he says that this House was not justified in rejecting those measures. I inquired of the honourable leader of the Government last Session whether or not any branch lines could be built out of the grant of $72,000,000 that had been voted, and I could not get from him a positive answer. Sir Henry Thornton, I think, stated in the city of Winnipeg that he was advised by his solicitors that no branch lines could be built, and that this honourable body had stopped the building of all branch lines. I asked the honourable leader of the Government last year how much money had been spent upon the cut-off, and the answer was $150,000. This year I asked the same question, and I find that the whole line was completed in the month of December, about six months after my inquiry, and that nearly $1,000,000 was spent upon it. In the face of such facts as these, the Senate was expected last year to pass a Bill introduced on the last day of the Session involving an expenditure of public money amounting to nearly $100,000,000, at a rough estimate, and containing a clause providing that there would be no control over it for three years. The press of this country has absolutely misrepresented the action taken by the Senate last year. If anything justified that action it was the fact that on the Government side of the House only ten honourable members voted for the Government's Bill. All of them with the exception of a few extreme partisans like my honourable friend from Portage la Prairie recorded their votes against that Bill. Still the honourable member has the hardihood to rise in the Senate and make the statement he has made. I am surprised at him, and I think he ought to withdraw his statement. He owes an apology to this House.

5. If a state of war exists between Canada and Turkey and the Government does not propose to take any offensive or defensive action, does the Government propose to terminate the state of war by Treaty of Peace or otherwise.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I answered my honourable friend on the very day he gave notice of his inquiry; but for his fuller satisfaction I may say that my answer has the approbation of the whole Cabinet, including the Prime Minister. I suppose that will be satisfactory to my honourable friend.

Hon. Mr. GRIESBACH: Quite satisfactory.

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS

THE DEBATE CONCLUDED

The Senate resumed from May 27 the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Right Hon. Sir George E. Foster:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the operation and activities of the League of Nations for the past year and inquire if the Government have considered the advisability of furnishing the Members of Parliament with the monthly summary of the League of Nations and the annual report to the Assembly on the work of the Council and the Secretariat and on the measures taken to execute the decisions of the Assembly.

Hon. J. P. B. CASGRAIN: Honourable gentlemen, I rise with extreme diffidence to speak on this most important question, because the angle from which I approach it may not be popular in this House, because I shall probably be alone in the views which I hold—at any rate, in expressing them—and also because I am following the very eloquent speech made by the right honourable gentleman who introduced the question. Everyone here knows that he has been for many years a past master in the art of oratory. In another place he was considered the foremost debater of his party, and in this House, I am sure, everybody will admit that he has no superior. He dealt many hard blows in another place, and received equally hard ones in return; but in this peaceful haven of rest he has mellowed, and now he is satisfied with academic discussions on the League of Nations. The right honourable gentleman has made many speeches on the League of Nations, and we all hope that he will live to make many more.

I listened with the greatest of care to the right honourable gentleman, and I recognized in his speech many old friends. There was one which he forgot to omit, and which he took great pride in speaking about, namely, the settlement of the Aland Islands dispute. As honourable gentlemen know, the Aland Islands are situated in the Baltic, right at the entrance of the Gulf of Bothnia, half way between Finland on the East and Sweden on the West. They cannot be very important, because I have looked in vain in many geographies and even in the encylopaedia, to ascertain what their population is. I am told it is about 3,000. The League of Nations actually settled that most difficult question and prevented a war between Finland and Sweden. Well, such a war could not have lasted very long. We know that Sweden has a few millions of people, while Finland is a very sparsely settled country. Finland has practically no agriculture; she has some forests; but I do not know that she ownes a man of war that could go out to the Aland Islands to carry on a war. However, that is one thing we must give the League of Nations credit for: it prevented that war.

Now, I want to assure the House that I speak with absolute sincerity, and that, although I do not expect to convince others, I am absolutely convinced in regard to this matter. I am giving this House, not my own opinions, but the opinions of prominent men that I have gathered from reviews and speeches and articles written by them. I may say that at first I was rather friendly to the League of Nations; I thought it might be an excellent thing, and was preparing a speech to deliver in this House on the question. At that time I consulted our illustrious and lamented leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who told me to go to the library of Parliament and there ask his friend Decelles to give me the Treaty of Perpetual Peace by l'Abbé de Saint-Pièrre. I hold in my hand at this moment that book, which was published in 1741. There are sixteen volumes preceding this one, which were published in the twenty years preceding 1741. They are all on the subject of universal or perpetual peace, and, although they are nearly two hundred years old, they do not seem to have been used very much, because this book is in good condition still, and anyone can go to the library and see the sixteen volumes. The binding must have been very good in those days.

Only to-day in my office I was in conversation with the Right Honourable J. C. Doherty, who, in speaking about this book, said that l'Abbé de Saint-Pièrre had shown it to one of the Cardinals who was then an active Minister in the Government of France. He left it for the Cardinal to read and came back some weeks afterwards to get the Cardinal's opinion, who said: "My dear Abbé, this is perfect: there is nothing better: I could not add anything to it, nor take anything from it. It is perfect, but there is just one thing: this League of Perpetual Peace that you speak of is made not for men, but for angels." Sir Wilfrid Laurier also, in the conversation which I had with him, said that the League of Nations was a very beautiful dream, and his opinion was almost identical with that of the Cardinal mentioned by Judge Doherty.

Sir Wilfrid also spoke of Hugo Grotius, who instituted a league which was infinitely better than ours, because it was a league that would have had sanctions. His league provided for armies. Each one of the great houses of Europe and every Christian prince of the time, would have contributed a certain number of men to an international army; and in the event of differences the league would have rendered a decision, and this army would have been available to enforce that decision. We have no such provision in the present League. The book written by Hugo Grotius, "De jure belli et pacis"—on the laws of war and peace—is familiar to legal gentlemen, who know all his works.

I have made a long study of all the covenants made in times past, and I find that the present one lacks this essential which all former schemes had: the power to enforce decisions. What would be the good of a court or a judge rendering a judgment if there were no sheriff to execute that judgment? The League, so far as I am aware, has absolutely no power to enforce its decisions. I do not know that the League could even issue a very humble subpoena to compel the attendance of anyone. I do not know that it could force people to give evidence under oath.

Earl Birkenhead, who was formerly High Chancellor of England, attended a banquet in Montreal. The host stated that at a small caucus of prominent members of the House of Lords and the House of Commons, held during the time when Lloyd George was Prime Minister of England, he told those present that Earl Birkenhead had the greatest mind that he had ever known. At that banquet the Earl of Birkenhead—I myself heard him—spoke of the absolute futility of the League, going so far as to say that the United States of America were justified in not joining it.

The right honourable gentleman (Right Hon. Sir George E. Foster) spoke of Vilna, but did not say very much about it. The League of Nations, desiring to settle that vexed question, appointed Mr. Paul Hymans, who is at present, I think, Foreign Minister of Belgium, and a very prominent statesman in Europe, as an arbitrator to settle the difficulty between Lithuania and Poland. Mr. Hymans held court for a long time and then rendered a judgment. That judgment was disregarded by both parties. He tried again, and some time later rendered another judgment, but it did not suit. Finally he rendered a third judgment, which was disregarded, like the two previous ones. You see, therefore, an arbitrator appointed by the League whose decisions are disregarded. As recently as the 14th day of March, 1923, the Council of Ambassadors, consisting of four old diplomats in Paris, defined the eastern frontier of Poland and gave it Vilna. Again a success for the old diplomacy and a failure for the League.

One point that the right honourable gentleman made in referring to Geneva was the settlement of the boundary of Upper Silesia. Well, both parties had agreed to abide by the decision, whatever it might be. Great Britain and France, on that one point at any rate, were agreed, and they arranged that the verdict should be accepted by both parties. This is the settlement of which the League is most proud. Well, it is easy for the League to be proud of that, because, as I will show you, it is really the only one that was a success and was accepted. Although the right honourable gentleman spoke at length on this question and took great comfort for the League, the fact is, as stated in an article by Mr. Stephen Lauzanne, that if that question had been submitted by mutual consent to the Supreme Court of the United States, or to the Pope of Rome, just as good an award would have been given, and it would have been accepted by both parties.

During the years 1921 and 1922 the League was absolutely indifferent to the events that occurred in Asia Minor. As we all remember, Greece at one time invaded a great part of that territory. Men and women were slaughtered by the thousands. Smyrna was burned. The Greek fleet was in the roadstead of Smyrna. The League did absolutely nothing—no, I cannot say the League did absolutely nothing; they did something; they made an inspection of the harems.

Another case was that in which Chili made war on Bolivia, and Bolivia was badly defeated and compelled to sign a treaty which it considered to be unfair, and which entirely eliminated Bolivia from the sea.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Was Chili a member of the League?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Yes, they were both members. The war took place before the intervention of the League.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Chili was never a member of the League.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: They are members now.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: No, they are not now.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The honourable gentleman has the book there, and he can look it up. Chili said that the Monroe doctrine reigned supreme in America; therefore hands must be kept off Chili and Bolivia. But there is in the Covenant an article of only three lines, Articles 19 which provides:

> The Assembly may from time to time advise the reconsideration by members of the League of treaties which have become inapplicable and the consideration of international conditions whose continuance might endanger the peace of the world.

There was the article upon which Bolivia relied for redress with regard to the treaty, which it considered an injustice. There are other articles providing for redress regarding treaties made under duress, etc. However, in this case there was no verdict whatever.

We have here in America another League, with its headquarters in Washington. It is composed of the United States of America, of the 22 republics of South America, and of Mexico. It has a magnificant building in Washington, which I hope to see the next time I go. A permanent secretary is kept there, and the sittings are held in a beautiful big hall in which are displayed in golden letters the names of all the countries in America. There is in that hall a vacant seat for Canada. Our neighbours to the south have plenty of assurance. The Secretary of that League actually came to Montreal, where a dinner was tendered him in the Windsor Hotel. He came to invite Canada to join the Pan-American League. I happened to be at the table of honour, and replying to the speech of the Secretary, I told the gentleman from the United States that he might have saved himself a trip; that we had an Ambassador at Washington and our international dealings with any foreign country were carried on through the British Ambassador; that Canada, being a Dominion of the British Empire, could not enter into any such arrangement without the leave of England.

A great deal has been made of the fact that there are fifty-four nations in the League of Nations. Well, fifty-four may seem to be a large number, but in the world to-day, now that Austria has been eliminated as a big power, and has but a comparatively small population, there are only seven great countries, called the powers, the others being called states. Of the great powers there are Great Britain, France, Japan and Italy in the League, and there are the United States of America, Germany, and Russia outside. Those seven powers rule the world. And, mark you, in the fifty-four nations the British Empire is counted as six; so that, as the League of Nations is supposed to comprise sovereign states, the number should be reduced to forty-nine. Counting only the white people, there are in the British Empire, including Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, Canada, and the United Kingdom, not much more than sixty millions of people. France has 40,000,000, Italy 30,000,000, Japan 50,000,000. That makes 180,000,000. Of white people not in the League there are: Germany with 60,000,000, the United States of America with 115,000,000, and Russia with 160,000,000; or a total of 335,000,000. The right honourable gentleman (Right Hon. Sir George E. Foster) wanted the impression to prevail in this House that nearly all the nations belonged to the League because there are fifty-four represented; but, you see, there are nearly as many outside the League as there are in it. Supposing that in the world there are between five and six hundred millions of white people, more than one-half of them are outside the League. That is a very interesting point.

The right honourable gentleman spoke of Mussolini and the Corfu incident. Mr. Stephen Lauzanne, writing in the North American Review of November, 1923, gives a very different account from that given to us by the right honourable gentleman in this House; and Mr. Lauzanne's version comes straight from Mussolini. You remember the incident regarding the defining of the boundaries between Albania and Greece. General Tellini had been appointed, not by Italy, but by the Allied Governments, and he was accompanied by four engineers and a few other men. They were fixing the boundaries along the Albanian frontier. It is admitted that the Greeks displaced some of the boundary posts, but it has never been proven, and it is yet uncertain that the Mission was massacred by the Greeks, or that the Greek Government aided or abetted the massacre, or that the Greek nation knew anything about it; but Mussolini, contrary to every rule of the Covenant, flying in the face of the League of Nations, ordered the fleet to Corfu on August 31, and Corfu was taken. Under Article 16 of the Covenant, Italy by that action declared war on all the other members of the League. That fact has been corroborated by a gentleman who is about to visit Canada—who is now in Montreal—Mr. Frederick Whelen, who says that when the army of the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats and Slovenes invaded Albania, the League remonstrated with that Kingdom declaring that by their invasion of Albanian territory they would be declaring war upon all the fifty-three other nations. On receiving that intimation, the Serbs, Croats and Slovenes actually withdrew their troops, and thus the conflict was prevented. I heard that statement of Mr. Whelen's on Sunday night last, over the radio in my own house. However, Mussolini apparently did not care for the League of Nations, because not only did he make an invasion, but he bombarded Corfu and when it hoisted the white flag he took possession. The correspondent who was sitting in Mussolini's room on that day, engaged in conversation with him, saw a telegram come in. Mussolini was perfectly calm. He read the telegram and simply said: "Bene! Molto bene!"—"Good, very good," and communciated the dispatch. It was the announcement that Corfu had been taken. The correspondent hinted to Mussolini that England might not be pleased; that England had been the Protector of Greece from time immemorial, and so on. Mussolini was not at all excited, but remained as calm as if he had been talking of things that had happened years before. He said that in 1850 the Portugese Jew, Don Pacifico, a British protege, had a store in Piraeus, and during some riots there his store was looted. Don Pacifico demanded 800,000 drachmas and tried to establish his claim in the courts, but the courts ruled against him. He laid his grievance before the British Government—I suppose, through the Ambassador to Greece. Lord Palmerston immediately ordered the British fleet under the command of Admiral Parker to proceed to Piraeus, and it seized two hundred Greek ships. When that news reached England the Lords were rather adverse to such high-handed procedure, but Lord Palmerston appealed to the Commons in his memorable four-hour speech and carried the day. It was a wonderful speech and he received a tremendous ovation. It was on that occasion that he declared that in olden days it was sufficient for a man to say, "Civis Romanus sum," and to-day, "Civis Britannicus sum"—"I am a British subject"—should insure the safety of anyone no matter in what part of the world. The enthusiasm was so great that Peel, his rival, cried out in admiration, "He makes us all proud of him." Mussolini added: "If England, for the sake of a Portugese protégé, can take two hundred ships for 800,000 drachmas, how many islands can Italy take for 50,000,000 lire and the massacre of the entire Mission?"

But the correspondent was insistent upon the League; so he asked again: "Signor Mussolini, why will you not let the League arbitrate? Yours is a big, powerful country, while Greece is comparatively a very small one." Mussolini answered simply: "Because there is nothing to arbitrate." Mussolini, from what I have read, is looked upon as one of the greatest Latin geniuses since Napoleon; and anyone who reads his life will be astounded at what he learns. The telephone rang and Mussolini put the instrument to his ear; he turned very pale and became very excited, and said: "E terribile; E un giornata nera"—"It is terrible; this is a sad day indeed"; and cried like a child. The correspondent thought some great catastrophe had taken place, but it was simply news that four aviators had been killed by an accident. The correspondent asked: "Why don't you go to the League?" Signor Mussolini said: "The League is not qualified to arbitrate between Rome and Athens; Geneva has not the spirit of an arbitrator."

As the right honourable gentleman has said, before the League of Nations Signor Salandra defended the action of Italy, and M. Politis pleaded for Greece, Matters were getting near the stage when there was going to be a serious division in the League of Nations. As the League did not dare to touch such a difficult question, it was again referred to the Council of Ambassadors, and was decided in favour of the larger nation Italy, and the most humiliating conditions were imposed on Greece, the smaller country. First, there was to be a military demonstration; the Greeks were to bow to and salute the Italian forces. Further, a High Mass was to be sung in Athens for the repose of the souls of the victims who had been killed, and all the officials of the Greek Government ,regardless of the faith to which they belonged, were to be present, and in addition 50,000,000 lira were to be paid over immediately. When Signor Mussolini obtained all these concessions, he was almost ashamed to take the money. He could not very well hand it back to Greece, for that would have been adding insult to injury, so he resurrected the old Order of the Knights of Malta, which flourished during the middle ages, and which still had some members which he was able to find, and handed them a large sum of money and told them to proceed to Corfu and to pay for some of the damage done.

Then the Right Honourable Robert Cecil—a descendant of the great houses of Cecil, Burleigh and Balfour, and coming from a family that had given statesmen from the time of Queen Elizabeth—with all the prestige attached to his name, rose slowly in his place—and those who have seen him know how tall and how quaint looking he is—and solemnly asked that the articles be read. After the articles had been read, towering over all others, he spoke these simple words: "If the Treaties are not observed, Europe no longer exists." There was a great demonstration—ladies waving their handkerchiefs, and cheers and so on—but no one knew better than Robert Cecil himself that the Treaties were not being observed. Still, Europe continues.

Under Article 227, what do we find? It says:

> The Allied and Associated Powers publicly arraign William II of Hohenzollern, formerly German Emperor, for a supreme offence against international morality and the sancity of Treaties.
>
> A special tribunal will be constituted to try the accused, thereby assuring him the guarantees essential to the right of defence. It will be composed of five judges, one appointed by each of the following Powers: namely the United States of America, Great Britain, France, Italy and Japan.
> In its decision the tribunal will be guided by the highest motives of international policy, with a view to vindicating the solemn obligations of international undertakings and the validity of international morality. It will be its duty to fix the punishment which it considers should be imposed.

The Allied and Associated Powers will address a request to the Government of the Netherlands for the surrender to them of the ex-Emperor in order that he may be put on trial.

Was such a request ever addressed to the Netherlands? Are we not right in saying that the League of Nations has not kept faith with us, with the enemy, or with the world, in spite of the fact, that twenty-seven nations had signed that Article? Europe continues to exist, in spite of what Robert Cecil said.

It may be said that these are the opinions of men on the other side of the Atlantic; but we have people on this continent who have expressed opinions on this subject. I have taken the trouble to gather together opinions from some of the most prominent and reliable reviews. There is a Mr. Otto H. Kahn. Who is he? Mr. Kahn is a prominent American—a 100 per cent American, not a hyphenated American as his name might indicate,—he is immensely wealthy; his country estate on Long Island is better than most of the palaces one sees abroad, and his New York residence is one of the famous Fifth Avenue family homes. He has been decorated by France, Spain and Belgium; he has given immense sums to charity; he is President and Director of some of the largest financial houses in America, and is a respected banker. Mr. Kahn published, in the Nation of November 3rd, 1920, an article entitled, "The Failure of the League." I am not going to read the article, but will give you a short summary. He says in this article that President Wilson insisted on the Covenant of the League of Nations although the other treaty-makers were against it. My honourable leader (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) knows very well that some of the representatives of France, with whom he is well acquainted, were absolutely opposed to the Covenant. However, as I say, the President of the United States wanted it. Woodrow Wilson had been a genius.

During the war, before an immense audience at the Monument National in Montreal, Sir Wilfrid Laurier said that the people of the United States of America were a fortunate people; that Providence had given them men able to cope with all their great crises. At the time of the Revolution they had George Washington; during the Civil War between the North and South they had Abraham Lincoln; and lastly, during the great war, they had Woodrow Wilson. No greater tribute could be paid to an American citizen than that of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, when he compared Wilson to Washington and Lincoln.

"De mortuis nil nisi bonum"—never speak disrespectfully of the dead. But is it disrespectful to say that Woodrow Wilson was worn out bodily and mentally? He was sixty years of age. It is only necessary to read "The Last Phase" by Lord Roseberry, to know that at forty-five the great Napoleon, for the same reason as Woodrow Wilson, was diseased in mind and in body. Otto Kahn says he was irritable and would listen to no one; he would not consult even the Senate, from which he had no mandate, and which was supposed to approve of his action. If honourable gentlemen want to substantiate what I say in regard to the health of President Wilson, all they have to do is to read the book of Lansing, who was Wilson's Secretary of State.

President Wilson wanted the Fourteen Points. Clemenceau it was who said: "Fourteen points? That is a great deal. The Almighty Himself was satisfied with ten commandments." My leader here (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) knows that Clemenceau was against the League, and he knows also that in conversation with Woodrow Wilson, Clemenceau once said: "You have a Senate, and I have a House of Deputies; supposing this does not carry, what then? We must take some precautions." In order to assuage Wilson's scruples some of the English Treaty-makers gave in. They said: "There is nothing else to do; we cannot get the United States to come in unless we put the Covenant in the Treaty." And this is the burden of my remarks—a simple, ordinary treaty, would not have caused half so much trouble.

But Mr. Kahn continues:

The Treaty did not make good its pledges, not even to ourselves, and less to the world. This instrument is made for political dominion. There has been no disarmament, and where is the freedom of the seas today?

It is an iron-clad instrument which cannot be modified except with the unanimous consent of the fifty-four nations who are members of the League. What chance is there of unanimity among fifty-four nations? Sir Lomer Gouin knew that one dissenting party was sufficient to upset all the work of a session of the League—and, as Mr. Kahn says:

It is asking too much of the League to give perpetual peace with such a Treaty. The League Covenant is insincere, ineffective, and unsuited for peace and international justice; the Leagues breeds misunderstanding, irritation and ill feeling among nations.

See the speeches of Senator Harding, who became President of the United States, delivered on August 28 and October 27. In the Nineteenth Century of April 21, there is an article by J. D. Rees, in which he says that the League of Nations is a fertile breeder of strife; that League postulates other Leagues; and that there were divergences on points of substance between France and England from the very start, and only the consummate ability of Mr. Balfour was able to prevent a break-up of the whole League and reconcile the parties to it. It was his great skill that saved the League on that occasion.

The strange thing is that in all these documents the name of the United States comes first, and yet the United States is not in the League. I suppose it is "adhuc non res, sed spes est"—"it is not in it, but there is hope yet."

Notwithstanding the League of Nations, President Harding thought it necessary to have a big navy. General Sir Herbert Lawrence, who is quoted as an authority, thought that if the League had existed in 1914, Britain would have joined Germany, because, he said, most nations are small and have no interest in Britain's affairs, and Britain must depend on her own right hand. Ambassador Davis said: "A super-Government is contrary to all we cherish, and can have no sanction by our republic." General Pershing, in an address to the Canadian Club in Montreal said, before an audience of over a thousand persons, that at first the intention was to have an international army and navy, but that the idea had had to be abandoned; and he said that when that idea was abandoned the League became powerless.

If there is anything forceful at all in the League it is the famous article 10. It consists of only five lines:

> The members of the League undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the League. In case of any such aggression, or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression the Council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.

And, mark you, the French version is still stronger: instead of "shall" it says "does."

The Right Hon. J. C. Doherty—I think he was in company with the right honourable gentleman who introduced this resolution (Right Hon. Sir George E. Foster)—moved to have article 10 struck out of the Covenant entirely. It was contended, however, that this was a serious question; and as the Session was advanced the matter was put off till the following year. Mr. Doherty returned the following year, thinking he had many adherents; however, there was no result. Then there was a change of Government in this country, and I think it was the Right Honourable Mr. Fielding and Hon. Mr. Lapointe, who represented us. They did not ask to have Article 10 stricken out, but simply to have an interpretation placed upon it. The following year Sir Lomer Gouin and Hon. George P. Graham were our representatives. They took the matter where it had been left. I do not suppose they were in a position to talk of striking out the article, because they would have been told: "Your own Ministers did not ask for that last year." But after all what is an interpretation? It is simply an endeavour to make something say what it does not say. A document must be very badly drawn if people cannot understand it without the interpretation being written at the bottom.

However, as I have said, if there is anything in the League, it is dependent on Article 10. What is a territorial aggression? It is an invasion—an army of one country coming into another country; and if there is any one thing that will prevent such an army going further, it is another army. Article 10 says: "The Council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled." The only way to fulfil this obligation is to have an international army; otherwise Article 10 means nothing. Sir Lomer Gouin made a speech in regard to this article, and caused something of a sensation, and succeeded in having the Article referred back to the Committee, where he made another speech, carrying the Committee with him. Then the matter was referred back to the Assembly, and no one said a word until the representative of the Shah of Persia objected. Now, what the representative of the Shah of Persia had to do with that, I don't know; but he exercised his right, and objected—and because of the ironclad constitution of the League, which said there must be unanimity, the whole thing fell to the ground.

There has always been some question in my mind as to who put up the Shah of Persia to object. But evidently he was allowed to have his own way. The last hurdle was the one that was hardest to jump, and it is doubtful that Persia paid her dues. If they were paid, who paid them? And who saved Persia from the Bolsheviki? Who owns and controls Persia's railways, her oil wells, etc?

However, if Persia had not taken that stand, perhaps it would have been taken by the King of the Hedjaz, that sovereign who reigns along the east coast of the Red Sea, near Perim and Aden—and he never goes far from the coast, because if he went back into the mountains, among the wild tribes there, he would never come out alive. He has his kingdom, but does not police it very well, Perhaps, he would have done the thing, or, again, Portugal, another nation under control, might have helped those who wanted it done.

In that great assembly which the United States were asked to join, and of which we are members, the United States would have one vote, just the same as the negro Republic of Liberia. It is all very well to say that all are equal, but, honourable gentlemen, the ideal and the real will not mix. The statement has been made by a prominent English authority that if the Declaration of London had become law the war would have been lost. I do not know about the result of the war, but apparently that is generally admitted. Small nations without navies would probably have been in favour of the Declaration of London. But here, honourable gentlemen, is the most serious part of it. What is the position to-day? On May 21st, 1924, in the Revue des Deux Mondes, a highly esteemed journal, and one of the oldest, having some years since passed the century mark, there appears an article by Captain Fonck. The Prussian Clausewitz, in his book on War, writes: "One cannot introduce into the philosophy of war a principle of moderation without committing an absurdity." This Prussian axiom proves that Germany never meant to consider treaties as being any more than scraps of paper. They were good only to restrain her enemies.

Germany has even now decided what the coming conflict will be. It is to be an aero-chemical war. She is preparing feverishly now to destroy her prey at the first blow. There will be no declaration of war. General Von Hoeppner another German author, who has written, "Germany and Aerial War," states that Germany has kept virtually all her air forces and will soon be able to take a glorious revenge. She has factories for planes, etc., in Spain, in Switzerland, in Italy—nay, even a $30,000,000 plant right in the United States of America. Those are ostensibly naturalized industries, but they are working absolutely for the Germans, with German money. In Germany all the machines and tools are ready. None have been destroyed. The Germans have been using some of this machinery in the arts of peace, but they are ready now to be used for the purposes of war. At the Armistice there were in Germany 150,000 skilled workmen who had made 48,000 planes. How fast they will manufacture them! Germany has just ordered, all at one time, 1,500 planes from one of her most powerful branch factories outside of the Fatherland. This is a serious situation. Some people have said that France was militaristic and had a great air force. English newspapers were much concerned about the air forces of France, and it was declared in England that France should be restrained. All that France has is 1,620 machines, yet here is Germany getting, at one fell swoop, 1,500 planes outside of her own territory. Recently immense plants have been started in Moscow by German engineers and there are other big factories in other parts of Russia. The idea is that these big air forces will join together, an attack will be made at night, without a declaration of war, and torpedoes, incendiary bombs, and poison gas will destroy cities before morning. Some may be sceptical about this, but remember, honourable gentlemen, the 22nd day of April, 1915, when asphyxiating gas was used for the first time and our boys suffered so much. The son of one of our late colleagues, Sir George A. Drummond, was killed on that day. Remember that it took five months for us to be able to retaliate against the Germans by using gas. From that day on chemical warfare was decreed and established. In 1917 the Germans used mustard gas. How long do you think it took us to get mustard gas? It took eleven months before we could get it and use it. A long time is required, first for invention, secondly for production, and thirdly for use. Why has Germany led in this way? Germany has led for no other reason than that her immense dye works use practically the same products as are used in the making of explosives, poison gas, toxic gas, etc. The Chicago Daily News sent Mr. Constantin-Brown recently to Germany to observe and report upon the military situation. He came back with a long report, which can be found in the Chicago Daily News. He said that the Germans were preparing feverishly, working as hard as they could, for a war of revenge.

Is this the time, honourable gentlemen, to talk to the Germans of perpetual peace? No further time should be lost at Geneva. If we allow Germany to get this start, Germany will be irresistible. Wisdom dictates the formation of an inter-allied air force, the expenses to be divided among the allies. Lord Thomson, in the British House of Lords, only the other day, said that the Labour Government, although pacificist, and recognizing the folly of war, had enough sense to wait for general disarmament before giving up the means of defence. Idealism must agree with common sense. Before another year Great Britain will have fifty-four squadrons, each with hundreds of machines of the most powerful type.

Commander Burney, M.P., in the Sunday Times of February 24th, said that England could not pay for naval and aerial armament any longer; that financial aid must be immediately asked from the Overseas Dominions. We are giving Germany a breathing spell.

Germany at present has no food, not enough for the army, and no credit: her money is worthless. This is the time. "Si vis pacem, para belium"— "if you want peace, prepare for war."

In order that you may see, honourable gentlemen, how long I have been studying this question, I desire to quote from a statement which I made in the Senate on October 1st, 1919, for it is entirely apropos:

> Then there will be a Treaty with Turkey, saying that the Turks will be allowed to remain in Constantinople, because we have a good many friends amongst the Mahometans. But I believe that we shall never hear of the ratification; I think we shall consider that King George is quite able to ratify it, and will say that it is all right for him to do so.

That was on the 1st of October, 1919, as printed in Hansard, and I think the event has turned out pretty much as I predicted. It shows how long I have been studying this question, and at the same time it shows that we are bound by all the articles of the Covenant.

I might refer honourable gentlemen for their information to the Living Age, volume 32, of 1923, in which it is stated that the League of Nations is a court or club; also to Stephen Lauzanne in the same paper, volume 1920, by Marcelino Domingo, page 443. Honourable gentlemen can find it in the Library.

I desire now to refer to the Department known as the International Labour Organization, which is run under the direction of that notorious socialist, Mr. Albert Thomas. Mr. Thomas is very much in favour of the League of Nations.

The yearly expenditure of the League is more than $4,600,000. Out of that, there is appropriated for the International Labour Organization $1,400,000. The money is handed over to this Organization, and the League of Nations appears to have absolutely no control over the expenditure. In fact, the League of Nations is just a collecting agency for Mr. Albert Thomas and his department and it is Mr. Thomas who is calling for the creation of another reserve fund on which he may draw to make up the deficits caused by all kinds of questionable expenditure.

Mr. Thomas's salary from the Organization is $18,000 per annum, and in addition to this he is paid another $17,000 per annum for what is put down in the budget as "frais de representation." It is strange that while the League is fully staffed with translators not one of them appears to be capable of translating the term "frais de representation." Perhaps it would be more correct to say that the League officials deem it wiser to use the French words rather than to put them into bald English. As no translation is given, I will supply one. "Frais de representation" means money set apart for the purpose of giving a good time to the man to whom it is voted and such friends as he may pick out for expenditure on such items as cigars, champagne, theatre tickets, late suppers, seeing the sights and generally painting the town red.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That is a very free translation.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: It is to be noticed that a number of persons receive "frais de representation," on the ground, no doubt, that one man alone cannot stand the pace. For instance, the Secretary-General of the League gets £4,000 sterling, or $20,000, salary yearly. Then he has a house allowance of £1,000, equal to $5,000. In addition he is granted £2,500, or $12,500 for "frais de representation." Therefore this one official receives $37,500 per annum. Thus we have two officials, the Secretary-General of the League and the Director of the Labor Organization who receive $37,500 and $35,000 respectively which is twice and a half as much for each as is paid the Prime Minister of Canada! The Secretary-General has an assistant Secretary-General, who receives £3,000 per annum, or $15,000 and in addition £1,000, or $5,000, for "frais de representation"; a total of $20,000 per annum. If any of the Secretaries should happen to be away on leave of absence provision is made in the 1924 budget for the paying of the whole of his travelling expenses and his "living expenses" as well, and "travelling allowance," whatever that may mean, of such members of the League as wish to take a holiday overseas!

Straws often show which way the wind blows. We notice in looking over the League's Budget for 1924 that it provides for 96 stenographers for the League's Secretariat and 166 stenographers for the International Labour organization. The size of the staff which necessitates such an army of stenographers may be imagined. And by the way, Mr. Albert Thomas has just laid the foundation of a grand new Labour Temple at Geneva and one wonders how much the extra levy made upon Canada will be for this palatial centre for the spread of Socialistic propaganda.

I apologize for the length of my remarks. I have considered all these matters for many, many hours, and moderation has been my guiding star.

I have placed before the House a summary of the opinions of men and reviews, the most highly esteemed that exist. I think that the salvation of the world is to be found in a federation of the British Empire, in alliance with the United States of America, France, and possibly Italy. In such an arrangement I find, as God gives me light to see the right, the salvation of the world. I am afraid it is not to be found at Geneva.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am sorry that no one has risen to move the adjournment of the debate in order that some arguments may be added to those that have already been advanced in favour of the League. Honourable gentlemen, I would not like this debate to close on such a note of pessimism as that sounded by my honourable friend from De Lanaudière. He sees no hope, but he has not indicated any other remedy to which we may look. Wars have continued throuh the course of centuries, and always the hope has been expressed that if the nations came together some way or other might be found for securing and maintaining peace. Now we have the League of Nations. It is an imperfect instrument, but I hope that before long all the nations of the world will have entered it. I want to be an idealist still. It seems to me that in the League there is something that will bring about better days for humanity. My reproach to my honourable friend is that he would shake our hopes for a better world. Unless the world changes its course civilization and Christianity will not have made much headway in the last nineteen hundred years; but I desire to have this debate closed with an expression of our hope for better times.

INFRACTIONS OF LIQUOR LAWS

INQUIRY

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER inquired of the Government:

1. Have the recent negotiations and conferences between the Governments of Canada and the United States, or any of the departments or officers thereof, having reference to reciprocal services in the prevention or detection of infractions of the Liquor Laws and Customs Regulations of the two countries, been concluded?

CANADIAN GOVERNMENT MERCHANT MARINE

INQUIRY

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR inquired of the Government:

Has the Department of Marine or any other department of the Government received any report from one Davidson, formerly steward in the employ of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, respecting alleged dishonest practices in that service? If yes, what reply has been made? If investigation has been promised, has it been made, and by whom, and with what result?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND:

Department of Customs and Excise—

Letter from Mr. Davidson respecting the smuggling of cigarettes was submitted to this Department by the Department of Marine and Fisheries. The matter was investigated by Mr. Angus, Munn, Inspector of Customs and Excise, who reports that the charges could not be substantiated.

Department of Marine and Fisheries—

(a) Yes.

(b) No investigation was promised or made. The matter was referred to the Commissioner of Customs and Excise and to the Manager of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, Ltd., at Montreal, and Mr. Davidson was so advised.

Department of Railways and Canals—

In March, 1922, M. A. Macdonald, of Vancouver, forwarded to the Department of Marine and Fisheries a letter from H. Davidson charging Canadian Government Merchant Marine with smuggling ship stores. The matter was referred to the department of Railways and Canals which department forwarded the correspondence to President Hanna, of Canadian Government Merchant Marine, for inquiry and report. Mr. Hanna afterwards advised the Department that investigation had been held and the charges shown to be absolutely false. Mr. Hanna also advised that Davidson had brought action against Canadian Government Merchant Marine for $2,500 damages for wrongful dismissal. In the course of the action Mr. Justice Martin, the trial judge, intimated that he dis-believed Davidson's evidence throughout and expressly intimated that where there was contradiction between the evidence of Canadian Government Merchant Marine witnesses and Davidson he believed the former. The action, in consequence, was dismissed and costs awarded the Canadian Government Merchant Marine.

THE BRITISH PREFERENCE

MOTION

Hon. L. O. DAVID moved:

Resolved, That in the opinion of the Senate the sections of the Customs Act which provide for a preferential duty on imports from Great Britain be repealed until such time as the British Government grant a reciprocal tariff on goods imported from Canada or suspended until some agreements have been arrived at.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, although I have not received the information which I wanted, and which was asked for by the honourable gentleman from Stadacona (Hon. L. C. Webster), I think I should proceed with this resolution. I do so in the belief that I have sufficient information to convince the honourable members of this House that they should vote for the motion, which is a very patriotic one.

I must admit in the first place that the Government is doing all it can to make the Budget more acceptable and less harmful to some of our industries without displeasing too much our friends the Progressists. I submit also that the Tariff alone is not responsible for the financial condition of which we complain, but that the increase of industrial production during the war, the lack of orders, and the decrease of the purchasing power of the customers of our manufacturers and of the population in general, are to a great extent the cause of the depression. Although I am a Protectionist, I will not exaggerate and say that the Tariff is responsible for all the evils in this world. At the same time, there is no doubt that the situation of our manufacturers is menanced by the advantages given to foreign products under the Imperial Preference and the general conditions of our tariff.

It has been clearly established that owing to the Preference importations of woollen articles, and more particularly of boots and shoes, are increasing every day to the great detriment of our manufacturers, and that the result may be a stagnation in those industries in this country, and the closing of their establishments, which are so necessary to the living of thousands of our workingmen, who will thus be obliged to go elsewhere to find work. There is no doubt that some of our manufacturers had reason to expect that they would receive the protection which is granted to industry everywhere else in the world in order to assist them through the financial crisis. At all events the time was not opportune to make their situation worse than it was and to discourage them by frightening capital and sounding the death-knell of protection.

If our Government had contented itself with reducing the Sales Tax and abolishing the duties on raw materials imported by our manufacturers, perhaps it would not have been necessary to reduce the customs duties on farm implements. This would not have alarmed those who think the death-knell of Protection will be the death-knell of our industries, and consequently of our prosperity.

I am not surprised that our manufacturers were frightened. Death-knells are never gay, and it is not astonishing that in this case there has been produced a very bad impression upon those who were in danger. I have never been able to understand the principles of those people who think that we may have Free Trade or may reduce our customs duties to almost nothing while we have as neighbour one of the greatest industrial and protectionist nations in the world. Even if Free Trade or complete Reciprocity were established without restriction between Canada and the United States or with other countries, I am not ready to admit that our industries are strong enough and prosperous enough to sustain competition. I admit, however, that even in that respect there might be differences of opinion on the question, and that it might be argued that the disadvantages might be offset by the advantages resulting therefrom. But opening our markets to American or English products without compensation is certainly detrimental to the best interests of our country. Although I have always respected the opinions of my adversaries, in this case I do not see how there can be two opinions on the question. If we could reasonably believe that the modifications made or to be made in our fiscal policy would materially improve the conditions of our farmers, I would perhaps hesitate to oppose such modification; but, judging from what has taken place and by the experience of the past, I have no hesitation in saying that those modifications will do harm to our manufacturers without doing much good to the farmers—and perhaps will do a great deal of harm even to the farmers, particularly if the policy is continued.

It is true, as regards farm implements, that the Massey-Harris Company have declared that the reduction of the Sales Tax and the admission duty-free of some of the raw materials used by them constitutes a satisfactory compensation for the reduction of the duty, and will allow them to continue to manufacture with profit and even to lower the prices of their goods. But other manufacturers of farm implements have not the financial standing of the Massey-Harris Company, and are not in as good a condition to sustain competition. I have reason to think that all the manufacturers of farm implements are not as well satisfied as the Massey-Harris Company are.

The worst of the new policy is the declaration made by a member of the Government, and by almost all the chiefs of the Progressive party, that it is only the opening of the door of Free Trade. This gives us reason to believe that the policy of stability promised by Mr. Fielding is abandoned, and will certainly be a cause of depression, fear and discouragement. It will frighten capital, and prevent manufacturers from extending their establishments, and instead of increasing their production will induce them to reduce it, to the great detriment of all our labour people, and even of our farmers.

The announcement of such a policy at a time when it is proclaimed everywhere and by everybody that we must increase our population in order to save our country, which is in very critical circumstances, is difficult to understand, because it will certainly have the effect of sending to the United States a great number of our people and of the immigrants. We will continue to spend millions of money to draw thousands of people who, instead of living and working on farms, will, in the great majority of cases, increase the number of the unemployed in our cities if they cannot find work in our factories.

I think it proper to seize the opportunity of correcting certain allegations which have been made in regard to the views and policy of the Mackenzie and Laurier Governments on this question. I repeat what I have already said in this Chamber, that when Laurier became Prime Minister in 1896, although he was a Free Trader in principle he refused to make any modifications in the tariff which could hurt the industries of the country. If, later on, he did what all public men, especially Prime Ministers, do in order to secure a majority and to give satisfaction to the farmers of the West and declared himself in favour of the reduction of certain duties on farm implements and other articles of production, he was satisfied that that reduction would not have any injurious effect on the condition of our industries. I am convinced that, in spite of his declarations, if he had returned to power and governed the country since the end of the war, taking into consideration the financial situation of Canada, he would have listened to the representations of the manufacturers, and would have done what the interests of the whole country required. I base that assertion not only upon his private and public utterances, but also on the policy which he adopted when he was at the head of the Government.

As to Sir Wilfrid Laurier's declarations, they are numerous, but I will content myself with mentioning those which I find quoted in a great and memorable speech by Sir George Foster on the budget presented by Mr. Fielding in 1897. Sir Wilfrid Laurier said:

> It is humiliating to have to admit that after the existence of three hundred years, this country is not able to supply its own wants. Although nature has been marvellously prodigal in her gifts, and has done so much to make this a manufacturing country, we are yet dependent on foreign countries. It is our duty to foster our national industries.

That was said by Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1871. In 1876 he said:

> It is asserted by many and assumed by others, that free trade is a Liberal principle and protection a Conservative principle. If I were in Great Britain, I would be a free trader; but I am a Canadian-born and a resident here, and I think that we require protection. We have within ourselves the ability to create an industry. If it is shown we cannot maintain it, unless by legislation, either in the way of premium or prohibitory tariff, then I should be ready to take that into consideration.

I could cite dozens of extracts from speeches made by Sir Wilfrid Laurier containing declarations of the same kind, but I think that those I have read are sufficient to prove the truth of my assertion that when he spoke of reducing the duties on farm implements and other articles he was convinced that it would do no harm to any industry. I am sure that if he had been shown that a certain reduction would hurt some important industry, he would have refused to agree to any such reduction. I have said, and I repeat, that he refused to yield to the demands of several Free Trade friends when he became Prime Minister, and decided to continue the tariff which had existed since 1878.

In support of my allegation I will mention once more the declarations of Sir George Foster, who, like the other chiefs of the Conservative party, accused the Liberals of being false to their principles by adopting, as Sir George said, nine-tenths of the high-protection Tariff. I will read only one passage:

> Mr. Foster: The Liberal party, headed by my hon. friend the First Minister, has declared, through its Finance Minister, to this House and the country and the world its deliberate adoption of the principle of protection. It has embalmed that principle in its tariff; and if it has, in some few cases, lightened the duties upon special articles, in other cases it has added to the protection which was upon these articles under the old tariff.

That is clear. So that when Liberal protectionists invoke the Laurier-Fielding tariff to justify their views, they are not wrong, though it has been attempted to show that it was more or less a Free Trade policy. No, it was not; and when the Tariff was changed in 1907 there were some alterations and modifications, but not enough in their nature to destroy the principle of protection which was inborn, as Sir George Foster said, in the old Tariff.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The honourable gentleman will not fail to notice the programme of Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1917, when he went to the people.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: I know that, but I have just said that his deeds, instead of his declarations, are there. Although he had always been a Free Trader, and although he had several times in speeches proclaimed himself a partizan of the Cobden and Bright policy, yet when he came to power, considering the circumstances and interests of the country, he refused to put into operation the Free Trade policy.

There are other allegations which I think in justice I should correct. It has been said and published that the Mackenzie Tariff was the cause of the financial depression which existed from 1872 to 1878. The Tariff of that time was the Tariff made by the Conservative party since the establishment of Confederation. The only modification made by the Mackenzie government was the increase by 2½ per cent, raising the Tariff from 15 per cent to 17½ per cent. The reproach which Sir Wilfrid received, even from his friends like me, was that he did not raise it to 25 per cent or 30 per cent, as the Conservatives did when they came back to power in 1878. What is very curious is that in 1876, when the Mackenzie Government increased the duties by 2½ per cent, public men, including, I think, Sir Charles Tupper, said it was the beginning of a very dangerous policy; yet afterwards he was one of the most eloquent champions of protection. But such contradictions naturally occur very often in the political world, and sometimes we must excuse if we cannot justify them.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: They do not know any better.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: But let us come back to the question of British preference. Is it true that it injures some of our industries? Well, after having read the declarations made by the manufacturers, and the statements placed before the Government, I have come to the conclusion that, in conjunction with the advantageous position of the English manufacturers on account of low wages, the exchange or depreciation of money, Canadian manufacturers have to meet severe competition from foreign manufacturers. For instance, it has been clearly established that the importation of boots and shoes, linens, and woollen goods, has been increasing considerably for some time, and seriously threatening the existence of establishments employing thousands of people. Listen to the views expressed by competent men on the effects of the preferential tariff upon the shoe industry. Mr. Daoust, who is now the President of the Daoust-Lalonde company, one of the most important shoe manufacturers of Montreal, and a very able man, says, speaking of the Sales Tax, that the proposed reduction was from 6 to 2½ per cent on boots and shoes, including rubber footwear, and from 6 to 4½ on rubber boots, and he adds:

> I am sure that the Canadian industry will never be as safe from British competition as it should be until the Imperial preference is abolished and 30 per cent is the flat tariff on imported shoes.

Mr. Daoust goes on to explain that the present General Tariff on imported footwear is 30 per cent. The Imperial tariff preference originally reduced that to 20 per cent. Last year Parliament went further and brought it to 17½ per cent. He then says:

> Depreciation of currency makes a further cut of about 10 per cent, and that brings the tariff to, say, 15¾ per cent. Consider that the cost of production in Britain is 10 per cent cheaper than in Canada, and we manufacturers in the Dominion have now a net protection of about 5¾ per cent.

He concludes:

> That is making Canada a dumping ground for British boots and shoes, and their importation has greatly increased since that extra 2½ per cent Imperial preference was granted.

I must say to the honourable leader of this House that that increase in imports has continued, and in the last three or four months I have been told, and I think it is established by statistics that have been furnished, that the importation has more than doubled.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: It has increased 60 per cent.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: "I am opposed to the preferential tariff," says Mr. Daoust, "because, while we have been making reductions to Great Britain expecting to get something, we are getting nothing." Mr. Weaver, manager of the Shoe Manufacturers Association, confirmed the views of Mr. Daoust. He claimed that the British manufacturers were dumping their goods in Canada. These were also the views expressed by the delegates of the shoe manufacturers in their interview with the Government, in a statement prepared with a great deal of care. It is a very long statement, in which they express the same views as Mr. Daoust; so I will not impose on the House the obligation of hearing those views.

Leaving aside boots and shoes, let us see what has been the effect of the preference upon woollen goods and the textile industry. Ten workmen from textile mills, as a delegation representing the textile workers of Canada, waited upon Premier King and Hon. Mr. Robb and presented an open letter signed by 21,000 workers in the mills. That means something—21,000. The letter stated that great numbers of men and women in Canadian textile mills were being laid off and more were being put on short time. Some mills were shut down. Because of this many Canadians had to go to the United States. The cause was the large importation of woollen goods, because customs duties were too low. Statistics were quoted showing the extent of the importation. It was also pointed out that wages in Great Britain and European countries were only from one-half to one-quarter the wages paid in Canada and therefore Canadian workers could not compete, unless the Government protected wages by increasing duties. The letter concluded with a request for higher duties.

I wish now to read some of the views expressed by the manufacturers of Glen Williams. A communication from them submitted information on the importance of wool socks and stockings imported from Great Britain as follows:

	Pairs	Value
In 1921..	2,813,860	$1,201,793
In 1922..	6,594,324	2,496,450
In 1923..	8,101,572	2,951,372

So you see, honourable gentlemen, that the importation is increasing all the time. The communication from the manufacturers of Glen Williams stated that unless something is done to stop the influx of foreign goods the mills must close and the village will be depopulated.

I have also a declaration made by the representatives of another great industry, but I do not think it is necessary to continue along this line, either in my own interest or in the interest of honourable members of this House. I need not show that when two, three or more important industries suffer, the prosperity of all the allied industries is also affected. The fate of one great industry may affect the fate of ten, fifteen, twenty other industries. It was established recently in a newspaper article that if the farm implements industry were seriously affected, fifteen or twenty other industries would likewise be affected.

There is no doubt, honourable gentlemen, that manufacturers have reason to complain of the competition against their products caused by the preference, and to say that it is becoming every day more and more harmful. They should have complained sooner, but it took several years for them to realize its ill effects. I understand that a question of sentiment enters into the matter. I understand that when the interests of England are at stake, even the manufacturers, although concerned in their business, hesitate before protesting against anything that has been done in favour of Great Britain. We all have that sentiment. But, honourable gentlemen, I say, Canadian interests before sentiment.

But the question is, as I have just said, not merely a question of money. No; even if the harm done by the British preference were not so great as it is alleged to be, we ought to give evidence of self-respect, of legitimate independence. We ought to show that we resent the refusal of the British Government to give us any compensation for our fiscal concessions and to fulfil the promises and engagments made by the Baldwin Government. We ought to show that we resent that; and the way to show it is to adopt my motion, as I hope you will do. We ought to show that we are not beggars and do not want to impose upon Great Britain a policy which they think contrary to their interests.

They say that they want to be free to adopt the policy which they think is required by British interests. Well, they have the right to adopt that policy, but their deeds and their words justify our Government in exercising the same right and in doing, before all else, what Canadian interests require. Let us follow their example and imitate their independence. Let us also follow the example of Australia, who has protested against the proposed withdrawal of the McKenna fiscal concession, and announces that she will negotiate treaties of reciprocity with other countries. Why should Canada not do as England and Australia are doing?

I know what took place when Laurier initiated the policy of preference; for, as I suppose you know, honourable gentlemen, it was a French-Canadian Prime Minister, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who initiated that policy. I know that the question of sentiment, the desire to give England evidence of good will, of friendship, and the hope that she would appreciate our conduct and reciprocated to a certain extent—in other lines, perhaps—had much to do with the introduction of that policy. And a preference of 12½ per cent at that time was not thought dangerous to our industries; but it has been increased since that time, and the circumstances are changed, the conditions of our financial and fiscal policies do not allow us to continue to give everything without getting anything in return. We cannot afford any longer to be generous and charitable, and England does not want our charity. At all events, charity begins at home, and we never had more reason to apply that practical and wise axiom, which must have been invented by an Englishman. What harm is done in the world and to Canada by the exaggeration of good sentiment! The exaggeration of religious, national or democratic feelings, of loyalty, of generosity, which are generally worthy of respect and consideration, especially in private life, is dangerous when applied to a country. We had a proof of that during the war. And it is especially out of place when, as in the present case, it is not appreciated, as shown by the proposed abolition of the McKenna concessions and the refusal of the British Government to give us compensation. But it will be more appreciated if we show that we are not indifferent to any treatment which we may receive and to the scant consideration given to our generous deeds.

In view of the financial situation of the country, if the Government thought proper to depart from the policy of fiscal stability, they should have reduced the British preference. When England shows so clearly that on that question of preference and of tariff generally she consults before all her own interest, we ought to follow her example.

In a matter of such vital importance, the interest of the whole country must supersede all other interests and considerations and make it the duty of any man of conviction and principle to oppose a policy which he thinks dangerous to the country and which may be a cause of discontent and friction between different provinces—perhaps a cause of dislocation. What would become of all the appeals made in favour of national unity, of all the efforts made to create feelings of friendship among the different parts of the Confederation, if in order to satisfy one section we adopt a policy disastrous to the rest of the nation, or if we create the conviction that the interests of our provinces are so different that they cannot have the same policy or the same legislation?

I wish to add that in order to reach its destiny Canada cannot be exclusively agricultural. Nature itself shows that it must be also industrial in order to take advantage of its extraordinary mineral and hydraulic resources. Nature itself, as has been so well said by Sir Wilfrid Laurier himself, indicates the policy which we must pursue in order to do what the prosperity of Canada requires; and is it not evident, in view of the length of our winter, that industry must procure for the greater portion of our population the work which cannot be found on the farms?

Honourable gentlemen, no country can boast of having a more glorious past or history than Canada, or expect a brighter future, and if it does not attain its high destiny it will be our fault, because we shall not have been faithful to its noble traditions—because we shall not have had a true Canadian policy.

Hon. WM. ROCHE: Honourable gentlemen, I have listened with great attention to the address which our honourable and venerable friend has just given, and, although I agree with him on many occasions, I have to differ with him on this occasion on some points. On others I do not agree with him. When I differ with my honourable friend I always defer my own opinions and revise them, in order that I may ascertain their justness or propriety when the contrary has been asserted by so great an authority as my honourable friend. Yesterday evening an honourable gentleman opposite—whom I do not see present—remarked with some severity upon the division of opinion that appears on this side as shown by the votes that were given on a very important measure. That almost amounted to a curtain lecture from the honourable gentleman. I would remark at present that I do not think he knows the essential difference between the Liberal sentiment and the Conservative. A Liberal may entertain his own opinions, and on every proper occasion assert them, although he may differ from other Liberals, and perhaps the Government. The individual Liberal asserts himself. On the other side the severity of party discipline exists to a greater degree.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: There is no severity here.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: On some occasions honourable gentlemen who may entertain different opinions go with the majority for the sake of showing their numbers and perhaps their influence upon the House and the country.

Now I turn to my honourable friend from Mille Iles (Hon. Mr. David), and I must say that I appreciate and approve of the research which he has evidenced in connection with the subject that he has brought before us. I might remark to him and to the House that all the arguments which applied before the war, and before the various changes of government that have taken place, do not apply at the present time. The academic questions of Protection and Free Trade do not apply now. The war has made an immense change. There has been a debt contracted of twenty-five thousand millions of money: the interest on that has to be paid, and public services have to be maintained. A large portion of the sum which is to pay for the interest and for the public expenditure must be raised by excise and by customs duties. The Income Tax and other direct taxes have been pushed to the utmost extent. The country has rebelled against them to some extent, and they cannot be continued or extended any further. Therefore, if this government be in power or if a Conservative Government be in power, the measures resorted to to maintain the public services and to pay the interest on the debt must be a revenue tariff. We may have our views about what is called Protection; we may have our views about what is called Free Trade; but for the future of this country there must be a revenue tariff to supply the sums required for the public services.

We hear a great deal about Protection. What does Protection mean? If it be real protection of trade or manufacturing or industry or commerce, or anything else, we are all protectionists—everybody in the country is a protectionist. We would like to see the interests of our country established, maintained, and extended. We are all of one opinion on that point; but we cannot all go to the extent of saying that it is requisite to have the exclusion of foreign goods, and that the citizens of this country shall be charged with vast sums of money in order to support establishments some of which are necessary and economic and others of which may be extraneous or visionary. Are the consumers of the country to be made to pay the expense of the enormous sums necessary to compensate for deficiencies of energy or in management, or any other class of waste or extravagance? I may say this: that I will be the last one to allow, to vote for or to support any measure which would result in the introduction of foreign goods, from whatever source derived, that would break down our manufactures or destroy our industries, injure our people, or expatriate them.

A great deal has been said about expatriation. Did it not take place from all the interests in the country? Was it more noticeable in the case of the manufacturing industry than in the case of agriculture? Was it not because of the allurements of more money and the opportunities for greater excitement offered in the United States? What can be done to restrain those men? What can be done to give more inducements in our own country? What plans can we devise to cause young men to remain on their farms and in their employment? I would ask some of our members here who have inventive genius: Why could not something be done to increase the inducements to our young men to go to the farms in the West, in place of throwing out inducements in money and lands to those people who are brought as immigrants from certain countries in Europe—people who will never make good immigrants, who will never live on the farms, and who will never be valuable assets to the country, but probably will hang upon the precincts of the cities and be a charge upon the inhabitants?

Allusion was made in my friend's speech to the British Tariff. I would not agitate for a moment a tariff so low that it would induce the productions of Great Britain or any other country to come in and overthrow our manufacturers in this country. I do not know anybody who would. I believe there is sufficient patriotism in this country to cause us to consume our own productions, and to give a preference to our own goods, provided the quality and the price are within reach. But I would ask the honourable gentlemen who advocate Protection; "How high protection do you want? Do you want 30 per cent?" You have got it now. "Do you want 50 per cent? Do you want 100 per cent? How high do you want to go?"

Now, to speak of boots and shoes. What kind of boots and shoes are they that come in from England? Are they superior to our own boots and shoes? We know that English boot and shoe manufacturing is specialized in certain districts.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: They come from Germany.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: Of course, my honourable friend is familiar with all those subjects, but I am only learning.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: You are an apt student.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: And I hope he will withhold his array of knowledge until I have finished, and then he will be able to enlighten us all.

With regard to boots and shoes, how does the quality of our Montreal boots and shoes —for they have been mentioned—compare with that of English boots and shoes? We know the English people of this country want to buy everything that is made at home, and that a great many others like to buy articles because they are English, you know. In certain lines of boots anl shoes, perhaps the English goods are superior. The statistics given do not indicate the minutiæ of these facts; they do not lead along the line of comparison, or indicate whether a certain increase would lead to the greater consumption of our boots and shoes and to the exclusion of those of foreigners. We know that the English produce different grades of leather—they import largely from France and other countries, and the production is specialized in certain towns; and from long experience the English have become experts in the matter. I would like to hear what kind of boots and shoes compete with ours. What is the make? What is the material? What is the price? And if those articles are within reasonable distance of our own, ought we not to allow the people who wish to buy and use them to do so?

Furthermore, the English manufacturer enjoys the benefit of buying all his raw materials from all parts of the world, and he endeavours to pay for them in manufactured goods and other productions. By that means, and by the mixing of material and the use of advanced machinery and cheap labour and everything else, he is able to compete with the whole world.

Again, take the textiles and woollens. The English are the best mixers in the world. They produce and buy raw materials from all the countries in the world, and by reason of their vast trade they are able to command lower prices.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: What do you mean by the English being the best mixers in the world? Are they going to be allowed to throw their stuff into the country?

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: How much mixing is there in woollens, in blankets, or wearing materials?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Yes, in blankets or wearing materials. You know just as well as I do.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: How much is there in millinery or other articles? I will tell you about boots and shoes. A great quantity are made at Northampton. It is a special industry.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: I know that.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: Now, take ladies' shoes. I have asked manufacturers of boots and shoes in Montreal and elsewhere: "Why cannot you compete with American shoe manufacturers?" They say: "Oh, they can obtain a wider diversity of leather and materials, and with the specializing of their manufacturing, and by having the best models and devoting themselves to certain lines, they are able to produce a better article and sell at a cheaper rate in Canada."

I have spoken a little about textiles, from a rudimentary point, I admit, and I can see very clearly, from certain circumstances and conditions, that it may be necessary to diminish the preference given to British goods. I am told also, in relation to textiles, that the goods produced under the name of British goods are not always British.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: That is the trouble.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: I am told that many of those goods are produced in Germany and France; that if a certain portion of the finish is given to them, or if some ingredient is put into them in Britain, then they are shipped into Canada and other British possessions as British goods. I do not know the extent of that practice; I do not know what proportion is British and what proportion foreign; but I do not approve of and do not support any policy which allows either British or foreign goods to be admitted to the overthrow and extinction of our manufacturing. I think the inhabitants of the country should consume and use the articles produced in the country.

Now I turn to the article of sugar, a large portion of which came from Trinidad, Demerara, and other British possessions. Under the British Preference sugar from the British possessions was introduced at a lower rate of duty. The consequence was that the sugar syndicate in London advanced the price of sugar in the West Indies to include the cost of the reduced duty. They took the whole of it. That is the way the British manufacturer and the British merchant will act whenever he sees an opportunity of making the pound sterling. When we remember that Great Britain is a manufacturing nation, and that she owes an immense amount of money to the United States and must pay that by her productions, no longer having gold to pay the bills, we will see that wherever British productions can be pushed they will be pushed. Britain has command of the seas; she has shipping all over the world and vessels running to every port; she has a great trade with the United States, and there is a strong feeling in the United States for the consumption of British goods; so, trade with the United States must be great, and to a very large extent must be in British goods.

Now, I take another step forward. We have the preference given to British production. We have trade with Great Britain; we import from Great Britain; do we not send anything to Great Britain in return? When we talk about protection and exclusion and prohibition, what do we send to Great Britain? Is Great Britain to take everything from us, and are we to take nothing from her in return? Trade stands upon the principle of barter. Could we call upon our British friends to take our wheat and our apples, our cheese and our butter, our hams and our bacon,—everything that we produce —and we take nothing in return? What have they to ship to us? They have not raw materials or agricultural materials. What are they going to give us? It must be manufactured goods. Trade proceeds upon exchange, and if we wish to cultivate trade, we must give and take.

That is the principle of what is called free trade. But we have no absolute free trade any longer in this country, and cannot have. If we are protectionists, well and good, we are all protectionists, but if we are exclusionists and prohibitionists, and multipliers of taxes and expenses upon the consumers of this country, we are not in that category. I would like to know what is the reasonable figure that these poor injured manufacturers want to put upon their goods. They have their goods already at about double or three times what they were before the war—even in boots and shoes the price is about double what it was before the war. We do not hear about these establishments closing generally—there may be one here or there—and if one closes we know that another can do more business and can take over the hands from the factory that is closed, so there is no loss of men in that respect. But are we to have extortionate prices fixed by legislation upon the consumers of the country? The consumers will not have it, whether you put it under the name of Protection or under the name of exclusion, on the ground of patriotism or on the ground of money making and extortion. The people of this country want reasonable prices, they want what we produce at reasonable prices having a reasonable regard for the interests of the country, when they will carry out the policy which is for the benefit of the whole.

Hon. JOHN McCORMICK: Honourable gentlemen, I want to say a word in favour of the resolution and the ideas of my honourable friend from Mille Iles (Hon. Mr. David). The last speaker told us that since the war conditions in the world had been revolutionized. We all know they have been changed, and so far as the subject under discussion is concerned, if they have not been revolutionized, at least they have been very seriously aggravated.

The honourable gentleman wants to know what rate of tariff we require. That is not a very easy question to answer. I think the opinions of those who are concerned about matters of this kind are pretty well crystallized into a condition of this kind—that the question of what is reasonable protection for the building up of industry should be ascertained by men who are experts and who are familiar with the different trades and callings and who have made research into the matter.

The British Preference, I think, met with the approval of the people all over the country. My honourable friend from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Roche) has just said that aside from sentiment there is another phase of the question. Great Britain is one of the largest consumers of our products in the world. We must not forget that the British preference was 33⅓ per cent lower than the average tariff, and that last year, for the purpose of encouraging British imports, this preference was increased by 10 per cent, making it 43⅓ per cent on articles in which there was severe competition in this country, such as boots and shoes, fabrics, woolens, cottons, dress goods, cloths, etc. I know that such goods are now being imported in very much larger quantities than previously, and woolen manufacturers report that at least 40 per cent of the woolen industry of this country is now idle. We read in the newspapers of a large concern in Montreal dealing in woolen goods, in men's wear, socks, and that sort of thing, going to the wall, largely on acount of competition from European goods.

In addition to the 43⅓ per cent already mentioned, the exchange difference in the value of the British pound increases the preference on British lines of goods to 46 per cent. This is a serious matter to a sparsely settled country like Canada, which is in competition with old-established manufacturers in Great Britain who, while enjoying such a substantial preference, possess better facilities for buying raw materials. In addition to that, our Canadian manufacturers are side by side with one of the best-organized systems of manufacture and industry in the whole world, with a market of 110,000,000 people to the south of us, whereas this country has only 9,000,000 people, and has to face the conditions I have named.

While I favour British preference, I wish to be fair to our own country. This is our first duty, and we should not go so far in our generosity as to wipe out the capital invested in Canadian industry, and throw out of employment tens of thousands of our own people, and thus compel them to migrate across the line.

It is not for me, or for any man in this House or the other House unaided by experts, to say what the tariff ought to be; but under present conditions I think the present duties should be maintained only until a better system is adopted. I would like to see that 10 per cent of British preference that was added last year, taken off. I would also like to see some action on the part of the British people themselves, to reciprocate the advantages we have given them since 1897. Everyone who reads the press must have been pleased, as I was, to observe the effects of the small preferences that were given under the Baldwin system a few years ago, which enormously increased some exports from this country. That is one of the reasons why we have had such a large export of automobiles within the last three or four years. That tariff, I understand, is to be abolished on the first of August.

As far as I am personally concerned, speaking with due regard to my duties as a citizen, and as a member of this House, I am prepared to support a resolution, now or at any time in the near future, to have that 10 per cent struck off. If we find later, that manufacturing cannot be carried on without a further change and there is no reciprocation in the way of giving our products some advantages in the British market, in the spirit in which we gave the British preference, I would be quite prepared to say, if Canadian industry required it, that the whole preference should go.

I do not for a moment think that the proposed Canadian Tariff meets the approbation of the men who sit on the Treasury benches in the other Chamber; and I know that in this Chamber, and in this country, throughout the industrial centers in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and the Lower Provinces, it does not meet with approval. I want to say, further, that that policy was not selected by the Government, but it was dictated, with the big stick, by a selfish lot of men from the prairies. I am sorry to have to express views of that kind, and speak of those men as selfish, but I cannot see it otherwise. Those people are acting in a selfish way, with an eye only to secure the whole loaf for the prairies. They were recently demanding a straight 50 per cent preference on British imports. They want a lower tariff on goods imported, and in some cases want them free altogether. They demanded reductions in their transportation costs, and got it, and the other parts of the country, which have been labouring under disadvantages, though perhaps not to the extent that they are, have got nothing. Those people are demanding a policy that is striking at the industrial centers of the old provinces of Canada. At the same time they are calling for 26 branch lines of railway. The people in those Western Provinces, with the exception of Manitoba, have been paying an income tax of $2 per head, whereas that tax in the province of Quebec is $9.50 and in Ontario it is $8.50, while the poor little scattered provinces down by the sea, with Ontario and Quebec, have to find the bacon to give these men all the advantages they are securing.

I did not intend to discuss this matter, not knowing it was coming up, but I have no hesitation in saying that the sentiment of this country will not support the policy which has been proposed, although the changes suggested have not been very significant, and I do not know that they are going to do a great deal of harm. The evil lies in the abdication by the Government, and the reversal of the principles that have been acted on since 1897, as expressed by the Minister of the Interior, who said he hoped that this Tariff would be the death-knell of Protection. I want to say, honourable gentlemen, that a lot of well-informed people in this country have quite a different idea, and that if that policy is persisted in the Government will find that instead of it being the death-knell of Protection it will be the death-knell of the Government.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I have been requested by the honourable gentleman from Stadacona (Hon. L. C. Webster) to adjourn the debate, as he was called away unexpectedly to Montreal. I therefore move the adjournment of the debate until tomorrow.

The motion for the adjournment of the debate was agreed to.

DIVORCE BILL

THIRD READING

Bill U4, an Act for the relief of Raymond Anderson Mashinter.—Hon. Mr. Blain.

INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES BILL

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE ON RAILWAYS, TELEGRAPHS AND HARBOURS

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved that the Senate go into Committee on Bill 7, an Act to amend The Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, 1907.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Honourable gentlemen, before we go into Committee of the Whole on this Bill, I would like to make an observation for the consideration of the House respecting procedure. Without going into a discussion of the merits or demerits of the Bill, or the Act itself, I desire respectfully to point out that the principle underlying this whole Act, which has been in force for some 17 years, is one of conciliation, the purpose being to prevent hasty action on the part of employers or workmen which might result detrimentally to their interest, and especially such action as would be detrimental to the public interest.

When this matter was under discussion on the second reading I suggested that it might be wise to refer it to a special committee or to the standing committee, in order that those interested in the Bill, either in passing the amendments proposed, or opposed thereto, might have opportunity to express their views to the Committee, because they could not do so in the House. That view did not prevail at the time, and I again make this suggestion, for the reason that since that occasion I have received a memorandum, signed by responsible representative men, which I would like to submit to the House for consideration, and then renew my request. Under date of May 8 the following letter, addressed to myself, was received:

> Referring to Bill No. 7, now under consideration by the Senate, to amend the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, 1907. We sincerely regret that your proposal, to refer the Bill to the Standing Committee on Railways and Telegraphs, was not adopted by the Senate, for the reason that it would have afforded an opportunity for any interests which may be opposing the Bill or the large number who are in hearty accord with it to present their views.
> Although you have on several occasions clearly set forth in the Senate the views of labour on the principles of this legislation, as well as to the proposed amendments in Bill 7, it may be of interest to you to have at hand the opinions of the Representatives of labour in Canada affected by this legislation.

It is not necessary at this time to refer in detail to the history of the legislation or the chief reasons for its enactment. Suffice it to say that during the time the Act has been in operation labour has generally accepted the principles of the Act and has co-operated in giving effect to its chief purpose "to aid in the prevention and settlement of strikes and lock-outs in industries connected with public utilities." Generally speaking, this co-operation has continued, notwithstanding the fact that for many years the measure did not find popular favour among a large number of the workers affected. However, believing that in the public interest some legislative machinery should operate to insure ample opportunity for investigation and conciliation in industrial disputes, labour has gradually adapted itself to the principles and legal process of the Act, and is further willing that it should be continued, provided that its operation is made equitable to all concerned.

It would seem that during the discussion on this subject there has not been sufficient emphasis placed upon one of the fundamental principles of the Act, namely, Conciliation. In order to maintain this spirit of conciliation before a Board there should be equality of treatment under the Act. It is the adoption and acceptance of this principle by all parties concerned, both in the application for and subsequent to the appointment of a Board, which is essential to the effective carrying out of and wholesome respect for the Act.

That the Act has not always been used equitably in the matter of disputes between employers and workmen, because of unfair advantage being taken by employers of an omission inadvertantly made in section 58, thus enabling employers to force changed conditions of employment for reduction in wages, contrary to the spirit and intent of the Act, is a matter of common knowledge to those conversant with the operation of the Act, especially within the past four or five years.

All that Bill 7 contemplates is to insure equality of advantage, as well as responsibility, under the operation of the Act. It cannot be consistently contended that any injustice or burden will be imposed upon employers by the proposed amendment, unless he violates the Act. The employer should not entertain any fear of referring to a Board of Conciliation and investigation any proposed changes in wages or working conditions, before making them effective, especially in view of the fact that employees have accepted this obligation for the past fifteen years.

Trusting that the honourable the Senate will see the consistency of concurring in Bill No. 7 as it passed the House of Commons, we remain, Yours respectively,—

And then the signatures follow:

Byron Baker, Legislative Representative, Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers. L. L. Peltier, Legislative Representative, Order of Railway Conductors. Wm. L. Best, Legislative Representative, Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen. T. J. Coughlin, Legislative Representative, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen. Tom Moore, President, Trades and Labour Congress of Canada—

—who for legislative purposes represents all the men engaged in the shop trades, maintenance of way, station service—and so on. The men whose names I have just read represent, by properly constituted authority, 140,000 organized railway employees in Canada. Inasmuch as only the railway companies in Canada have offended against the Act thus far, I submit that, in accordance with the spirit of the law itself, which is based on conciliation, it is proper to refer these proposed amendments to the Standing Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours and at least give an opportunity to these gentlemen, and any others who may so desire, to appear before that Committee to state their views, either for or against the amendments. I respectfully make that suggestion and move that this Bill be not now referred to Committee of the Whole, but be referred to the Standing Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours for consideration.

Hon. C. P. BEAUBIEN: Honourable gentlemen, for my part I see no objection to having the Bill referred to the Railway Committee, provided sufficient time is given to all interested parties to send representatives here. If the Bill is sent to the Committee and considered within the next two or three days, that of course would be much too short a delay.

In order that this honourable House may know that there are very important associations opposed to the principle of the Bill, and for good reasons, I beg leave to read a letter and an accompanying resolution, which may be regarded as a counterbalance to the correspondence already read to this House by the honourable gentleman from Welland. This letter and the attached resolution were sent to me by the Asbestos Mine Operators' Association of the Province of Quebec at the end of May of last year, too late for me to submit them to the House. I understand that the amendments now proposed follow along the lines of the amendments of last year, and that therefore the situation is not changed.

Enclosed we herewith hand you copy of Resolution passed by Asbestos Mine Operators' Association of the Province of Quebec at meeting held on the 22nd inst.

The members of our Association are convinced that this amendment, if passed, will be detrimental to the mining industry, and would appreciate it if you will be good enough to use your best efforts so that bill will not be passed by the Senate.

Copy of Resolution passed at meeting of Asbestos Mine Operators' Association of the Province of Quebec held in Montreal, on Tuesday, May 22nd, 1923

Whereas Bill No. 84, Section No. 57, generally speaking, says that an operator desiring to make any change affecting wages or hours, must give thirty days' notice of intention, and that if a Board of Conciliation is asked for during that period of thirty days, conditions must not be changed until the Board has been appointed, heard the evidence and delivered their report;

And whereas this means that should conditions necessitate a change of any kind, nothing can be done in less than about 60 days, and whether the employer can afford it or not, operations must be continued or he becomes liable to a penalty of from $100 to $1,000 per day, etc., and the application of this penalty would, should labour troubles arise, cause the owners to sustain very heavy losses, and in the case of small operators, probably loss of title to their property, and while it may be said that the penalty applies to either party using these conditions for the purpose of delaying change, there is no way in which the penalty can be made applicable to employees.

And being convinced that such conditions could not fairly be applied to the Mining Industry, it was, therefore, resolved that this Association protest against this bill and that copies of this resolution be forwarded to members of the Senate.

I therefore ask that if this honourable House is of opinion that this Bill should be sent to the Railway Committee, due notice and time be given, so that all interested parties may be heard.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, I have no objection to this Bill being sent to the Standing Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours; but I know that that Committee has a pretty heavy programme for the next few days. Perhaps before the end of next week there may be an available date, but it would have to be fixed sufficiently in advance to permit of interested parties being notified of the hearings. I agree to the amendment. The Committee could perhaps consider the Bill on Thursday of next week.

Hon. G. G. FOSTER: Would a week's notice be enough?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Honourable gentlemen, before this matter is finally dealt with, it should be clearly understood that this is a public and not a private Bill, and is sent to the Railway Committee in order that the parties may be heard, but that does not prevent the Senate from dealing with it. Although any honourable member of the Senate may attend the sittings of the Railway Committee, yet we know that in practice very few who are not members do attend, and at any rate they have no vote there. I believe, therefore that when this Bill is reported from the Committee to this House it should go through the Committee stage here, even if it is only as a formality, because this is a public Bill.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is for the House to do as they choose with it.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Yes, but a public Bill should go to Committee of the Whole.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: When it comes back the honourable gentleman may move that the House go into Committee on the Bill.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: But it is a bad practice that we in this House have followed for some time—that of referring public bills to special committees, and, when they are reported here, giving them third reading immediately, without going into Committee of the Whole. I protested against that practice years ago. This is a public Bill and we are entitled to have it considered in Committee of the Whole House.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: May I point out to the House that there are twenty-six public Bills before the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours at the present time. I did not for a moment think it was out of order to suggest that this one, which is certainly of public importance and concerns a great many people, should be referred to that Committee.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I am not objecting to the reference of the Bill to the Committee.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I felt, furthermore, that, inasmuch as it is probable that certain amendments will be made in the Bill, as was done last year, and because those directly interested were debarred last year from being heard by reason of our dealing with the Bill in Committee of the Whole House instead of referring it to a special committee, therefore in connection with a Bill of this sort, based on the principle of fair dealing and conciliation, opportunity ought to be given to the interested parties to express their views. That was my only motive in suggesting that it be sent to the Committee.

The amendment of Hon. Mr. Robertson was agreed to, and the Bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours.

DIVORCE BILLS

SECOND READING

Bill V4, an Act for the relief of James Koniaris.—Hon. Mr. McCall.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at 3 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, June 5, 1924.

The Senate met at 3 p.m., Hon. Mr. Belcourt in the Chair.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

STATISTICS OF PROVINCES

MOTION FOR RETURN

Hon. Mr. BOYER inquired of the Government:

In each of the Provinces of the Dominion, what is—
1. The municipal land evaluation?
2. Farm land evaluation?
3. Evaluation of industries?
4. Municipal land evaluation of towns?
5. (a) Factories separate?
(b) Factories included?
6. The number of farmers in each province?
7. The number of manufacturers in each province?
8. The evaluation of villages not included in farms or industries?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would suggest that my honourable friend transform this inquiry into a motion for a return, as the Department of State will have to communicate with all the provinces.

The motion for a return was agreed to.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS BRANCH LINE BILLS

Hon. A. B. GILLIS: Honourable gentlemen, I should like to call the attention of the House to a statement made by the honourable gentleman from Portage la Prairie (Hon. Mr. Watson) in the course of his remarks the other day:

> At last Session an opportunity was presented to the opposition to those Bills to pick out the ones from which they dissented; but the Senate said: "No, we will throw out the whole Bill," and all the charters were thrown out.

As the House will remember, last year a Bill covering some twenty-five or thirty branch lines was brought in the day before prorogation. When an opportunity was presented to the members of this Chamber to deal with each line separately I have not been able to discover.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I regret that I have to draw my honourable friend's attention to the fact that he is transgressing a rule of the House. As these Bills will come back from Committee, my honourable friend will have an opportunity to go back to the history or the attempted legislation of last year. I doubt that my honourable friend should raise a debate at this moment. There is nothing before the Chair.

Hon. Mr. GILLIS: I was merely calling the attention of the House to a statement that is not correct.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Oh, yes, it is correct.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Make a motion.

Hon. Mr. GILLIS: If the House does not wish me to proceed, I will bring the matter up later when the Bills are before the House.

The Hon. the Acting SPEAKER: The honourable gentleman had better give notice of motion.

Hon. Mr. BOYER.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS ADMINISTRATION

MOTION FOR SPECIAL COMMITTEE

The Senate resumed from May 28 the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Bennett:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to inquire into and to report from time to time upon:
(a) The statements and charges in regard to administration of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine and Canadian National Railways, made by Honourable J. D. Taylor in this Chamber on May 8th of the present year.
(b) The acquisition of the property in Paris, France, known as the "Scribe Hotel," and all dealings, transactions and payments in relation to said property.
(c) The employment or engagement of one Aronovici by the said Canadian National Railways, the services performed by him, if any, and the commission, salary or other remuneration paid to him by or on behalf of the said Canadian National Railways.
(d) The system of the purchase of supplies for the use of or in connection with the said Canadian National Railway System.
(e) The deposit by and withdrawal of the Canadian National Railway Company of $1,000,000 of public funds in or about the month of May, 1923, with the Home Bank of Canada.
(f) Generally all questions, matters and things, which in the discretion of the Committee, arise out of or incidental to the foregoing matters, or which the Committee deem to be necessary to inquire into.
(g) That the said inquiry shall be subject to the condition that no matter of operation or of management taking place in the year 1924, inquiry into which would in the opinion of the Management of the said system be prejudicial to the property of the system or its proper operation, shall be made subject of investigation.
(h) That the said Committee be composed of the Honourable Messrs.
(i) That the said Committee be empowered to take evidence under oath and to send for persons, papers and records and to employ such clerical and other aid as the Committee deem necesary for the purpose of the inquiry.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, I desire with the leave of the House to make a statement in connection with this motion, upon which I have already been heard, with the view of finding a solution for the question raised by the honourable gentleman from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Taylor) and involved in this motion.

Last week I suggested that, before this Chamber began investigation of the charges laid by the honourable gentleman, it would perhaps be fair to await the report of Mr. Temple, who had been entrusted with the duty of inquiring into those charges. Mr. Temple is now in Ottawa with the attorney who for a time was engaged with him in inquiring into charges of wrongdoing against some employees of the Canadian National Railways. Mr. Temple has with him all the evidence that he obtained and his report. Inasmuch as the evidence covers 2,000 pages, and the report analyzing the evidence is a lengthy one, consisting of perhaps 75 or 100 pages, it would be very difficult for this Chamber to examine into the matter without, at all events, having the report itself printed; and even then we should simply have a key, which would leave us to review the whole of that evidence. I therefore throw out the suggestion that a Special Committee of say six members of this Chamber, who are also members of the bar, three of whom would be nominated by my honourable friend who leads the Conservative party in this Chamber, and three of whom I would nominate, be appointed to examine into the evidence and the report of Mr. Temple. Mr. Temple would be at the service of the Committee, and the honourable Gentleman from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Taylor) could attend its sittings. The members of the Committee would be gentlemen who are accustomed to examining and weighing evidence, and who could report upon it to this House. That seems to be the shortest and best way of determining the value of the inquiry and the report upon the evidence which was gathered at Vancouver.

If this suggestion appeals to my honourable friend from New Westminster and to this Chamber, I would make the motion now, leaving a blank for the six names which could be filled in later. This is the proposal I submit to the House.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: May I ask the honourable gentleman what is the purport of the report?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Is the honourable gentleman referring to the report of Mr. Temple?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Yes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have not read the report, but I suppose it contains the conclusions of Mr. Temple upon the evidence adduced before him.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: But surely we are entitled to know what those are.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That is just what I do not want to ascertain for myself. I may be obliged to do so at a certain time—

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Is it guilty or not guilty?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Of course I do not know. My idea is that, whatever the verdict may be, a small committee of members of this Chamber who belong to the legal fraternity will be better able to examine the evidence and report to the House. I am simply following up the suggestion which I made previously, that until we had the report of Mr Temple we were at sea; that we could not appreciate the merits of the charges until we had the evidence which was being or had been gathered by Mr. Temple. Now, that evidence is here. I am in the hands of the Senate. I am quite sure that we shall be led nowhere if I lay on the Table 2,000 pages of evidence, with a report of 75 pages; because every member will be entitled to ask permission to read that evidence, and it would take a few years for it to go around. Everyone is entitled to weigh the evidence and give his own judgment. Therefore, inasmuch as it is impossible for every honourable member to assume the task of reading that evidence, or even the 75 pages of the report based upon the evidence, I suggest the simple method of having a small committee of lawyers who would devote a few hours to that task, having at their side the honourable member for New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Taylor) and Mr. Temple, who would be there to give explanations and answer any questions that the Committee desired to put.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Honourable gentlemen, with the permission of the Senate, and in answer to the honourable gentleman who has just spoken, I would remind him of the saying with which we are all familiar that surely in vain is the net spread in the sight of any bird. I would suggest to him that I am a somewhat old bird. The proposition laid before us is not quite so disingenuous as it appears. It must be remembered that Mr. Temple is counsel for the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. He was assisted in this inquiry by another counsel specially retained to serve the Canadian Government Merchant Marine.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Would my honourable friend allow me to ask him a question?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Yes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I understand that Mr. Temple is the Regional Counsel for the Canadian National Railways at Winnipeg; that Mr. Haffner, who may or may not be connected in some way with the Canadian National Railways, has been retained as counsel from Winnipeg. So I am surprised to hear my honourable friend say that Mr. Temple has been counsel for the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. I would rather believe that his activities have been connected with Canadian National Railway matters in Winnipeg, but not with the Merchant Marine. Winnipeg happens to be in the centre of this continent, and I doubt that Mr. Temple would have anything to do with the Merchant Marine on either ocean.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Then, honourable gentlemen, let us say the Canadian National Railways, of which the Canadian Government Merchant Marine is a branch. In Mr. Temple's own letters to me his name appears as counsel along with the names of the counsel at Vancouver and that of the Vice-President, who is in charge of legal affairs' and by whose direction Mr. Temple has been at Vancouver. That Vice-President has already on three occasions committed to writing the statement that there is no foundation whatever for the charges that I have brought forward. He sends his subordinate out there to make a report upon charges which he has already judged three times, and as to which he is irrevocably on record.

The Regional Counsel at Vancouver is also involved in this up to the neck, because it was through his activities that the first inquiry failed; and his activities were very largely directed, as I informed Mr. Temple when he was out there, to making abortive this investigation also. I made direct representations to Mr. Temple how his associate counsel there was tampering with witnesses intended to be brought before Mr. Temple.

I do not know whom Mr. Temple has called. I do know that witness after witness whose name I gave him as that of a person in a position to offer material evidence, was not called. I did not pretend to give him a complete case at all—

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Will my honourable friend allow me to say that I saw Mr. Temple for half an hour last evening, and the first question I put to him was this: "Did you receive from Senator Taylor a list of the witnesses to be called?" He said, "Yes." "Have you called all those witnesses?" He answered: "They were all called and heard except one, who, for reasons specially known to Captain Boyd, was not available." This is the answer I have received from Mr. Temple.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: I am sorry to say that Mr. Temple's answer is not accurate.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But would not my honourable friend be able at a meeting of the small special committee which I suggest, to establish those facts? We are at present absolutely at sea.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: A special committee to examine the evidence for one side only? The honourable gentleman was eloquent the other day about ex parte statements. Here he asks us to take the ex parte statement of the Regional Counsel of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, who was out there with a force of private detectives, with a private car and the head of the service. And this whole force of detectives seem to have been unable to find any witnesses excepting the very few whose names I gave. Mr. Temple was supposed to be making an inquiry, not simply taking evidence on behalf of his Company against the evidence I presented to him; but so far as I know he heard only one side.

I call attention to the fact that there is not quite the good faith and the frankness that one would expect from Mr. Temple in dealing with me. We were informed last Thursday that he was on his way here, and, if that information was true, he arrived on Saturday. This is the following Thursday, and I have yet had no communication from him, although I have been in Ottawa all the time. As he held that investigation at my instance, one would think that in ordinary courtesy, if he is holding a fair balance between the Company and myself, he would tell me as well as the President of the Company that he had his report, and would show it to me for my inspection. I could read a report of 75 pages in much less time than the honourable gentleman indicates, and could come to some conclusion, whether Mr. Temple has been trifling with the commission given him or whether he has made an honest effort to ascertain the facts. As I see the matter, he has not answered the case that I presented to him; he has simply brought the arguments of his Company's officials to meet every point that they can possibly meet, but has not effectively met the case, and, particularly, has not gone into other matters brought to his attention. For instance, on the very last day he was in Vancouver he discussed with another investigator the fact that there were a large number of business men in that city who had made sworn statements for Sir Henry Thornton's eye about the scandalous conditions prevailing there. As he left Vancouver that very day, it is evident to me that he took none of the evidence of that large number of business men the existence of whose statements was known to him on the 7th of May.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Will my honourable friend allow me? I have, with considerable disinterestedness, made the suggestion that a small committee of members of the bar who belong to this Chamber be appointed to examine into all these questions in the presence of my honourable friend and in the presence of Mr. Temple. Can my honourable friend suggest any other means by which the Senate will know what is the real value of the work done by Mr. Temple? We are all bent upon trying to get at the value of the evidence that was taken, and the sincerity and diligence and honesty of the inquiry, and also on knowing if the report is really based on the evidence as it appears. Now, having made that suggestion. I would like my honourable friend to give me an idea as to how this Senate will be able otherwise to judge of that work.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: As I see the matter, this report is in precisely the same position as loaded dice in a gambler's hands would be; therefore I do not wish to risk anything on playing with loaded dice. I feel quite satisfied that the case which I have laid before Mr. Temple cannot be honestly met, and has not been met.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Honourable gentlemen, might I offer a suggestion for the consideration of both the gentlemen who have just spoken? A few days ago the honourable leader of the Government observed that reference to this subject in the House might well have been postponed until Mr. Temple's report was available, when the honourable member from New Westminster would have the advantage of the contents of that report for his information, and if not then satisfied with the investigation he could take the action that he is proposing.

Seeing that that report is now available, and that the gentlemen who made that report are now in Ottawa, would it not be proper and fair that the evidence, together with the report which summarizes the findings of the Commissioner, should be placed in the hands of the honourable member from New Westminster, and that he should take such time as he requires during the next few days to go into it thoroughly? If he is not then satisfied that the answer to his charges is complete and that the investigation is satisfactory, let him pursue his quest for a further inquiry in the House. Instead of submitting the evidence to a Committee, let the honourable member for New Westminster at least have an opportunity to examine whether in his opinion the report is based on the facts or whether it is biased, as he seems to think it is. I beleve that should be the first step.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I hardly think that would be fair to the Commissioner, who has been pretty severely handled by the honourable gentleman from New Westminster. I do not say that with any insinuation that he was too severely handled, but as a matter of fact the honourable gentleman has not treated Mr. Temple very tenderly. Now Mr. Temple brings in his report. Unfortunately he has only his original, and I may say, in answer to the honourable gentleman from New Westminster, that he brought his report to the President, or to the head office. When I saw the President on Saturday last, after conferring with some members of this Chamber from both sides, he was expecting the arrival of Mr. Temple, and he said that if the report was short he would read it, but if long he probably would not. He added that it was not his duty to do so, but he would see that the report and evidence were handed over to the Minister of Railways, through whom both Chambers could obtain it for their own use. I understand that the report was sent to the Minister of Railways either on Monday or Tuesday. Tuesday was a legal holiday. Today is Thursday, and Mr. Temple has been waiting, and he will remain here by order, so as to be at the disposal of the Minister of Railways or of this Chamber.

But is it not fair that the report be read by a certain number of members of this House in whom the Senate reposes all confidence, and that the reading be in the presence of the honourable gentleman from New Westminster, who laid the accusations, and in the presence of Mr. Temple, who will, if necessary, indicate the pages where evidence called for can be found; and if a discussion is raised by my honourable friend as to the value of testimony, or the veracity of some witnesses, that small Committee would be able, with the assistance of the honourable gentleman from New Westminster and Mr. Temple, to go through the report in a very few sittings.

In order to comply with the suggestion of my honourable friend, the ex-Minister of Labour (Hon. Mr. Robertson), a copy of the document would have to be made, the original remaining in the hands of the Minister of Railways. Then where would we be, when the honourable gentleman from New Westminster declares—

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: But he made more than one copy.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I asked if he had more than one copy, and I understood that only the original copy was brought here.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: I do not think anyone can entertain that suggestion, that with 2,000 pages of evidence only a single copy was made.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Of course I do not know; that is what I gathered from the short conversation; I may be wrong. When the honourable gentleman has read those 2,000 pages he will have satisfied himself; but, in view of the stand he takes in the face of a judgment by the Wreck Commissioner, who found against Captain Boyd on many of the charges which were investigated, should we not have to declare that all that work done by Mr. Temple and his report should be thrown aside because the party who made the accusations, but who did not hear all the witnesses, declares himself unsatisfied? I believe the Senate should not accept that affirmation and that situation as a basis on which to start an inquiry for itself.

It seems to me that the Senate is entitled to have a small impartial Committee examine into this matter and tell us their view. If we hand this big record of 2,000 pages to the honourable member for New Westminster, who started by affirming his strong belief in all the accusations before the report was made, we can quite realize what his conclusions will be; but where will the Senate be? The Senate will be where it was when the honourable gentleman made his denunciations a week or two ago. But the Senate all the same will require some kind of corroboration of the opinion of my honourable friend. I do not say this because I distrust the judgment of my honourable friend. But he has taken an uncompromising position; and as between him and Mr. Temple, who for a month or more has gathered evidence, seen all the witnesses, and with a court stenographer taken 2,000 pages of testimony, it seems to me that the Senate will ask the honourable gentleman from New Westminster to give it a chance of finding with unbiased eyes the value of that evidence.

I do not ask my honourable friend to agree immediately to my suggestion. I simply ask him to move the adjournment of this debate, and think over the suggestion that I have made, and if he can find a better one, I will act upon any suggestion that will solve the difficulty. The suggestion of my honourable friend the ex-Minister of Labour would leave the matter in the hands of the accuser, with 2,000 pages of evidence to sift and examine, and we would come back here with a strengthened conviction in the heart of my honourable friend from New Westminster that the evidence had not been taken as it should have been. Yet we would have his ipse dixit. I suggest that three members of this Chamber indicated by my honourable friend the leader of the Conservative party, and three by myself, would in a few sittings be able to sift the evidence and give to the Senate its opinion thereon.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I am still quite unable to follow my honourable friend's reasoning, in view of the fact that very recently, when this matter was under discussion, the honourable leader of the Government fiercely and vehemently, and I think with a good deal of conviction, declared that the step taken by the honourable gentleman from New Westminster might well have been withheld until the report of the Commissioner had been brought down. Now that report is available, and I am only suggesting that the procedure which the honourable leader of the Government himself proposed a few days ago should be followed now—that the report be placed in the hands of the gentleman who made the complaint, and if he is satisfied that the investigation has been a fair one, and that the facts have been brought out, that may end the matter. If it does not, then we would be just where we are now, and an investigation would probably be asked for, in accordance with the motion before the House. My suggestion was thoroughly in keeping with the recommendation of my honourable friend a few days ago, and therefore I fail to see why he takes such serious exception to it now.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am not taking exception. I say the report is here with the evidence; I can lay it on the Table, or it could be asked for; but where will that lead us? In order to ascertain whether the evidence is conclusive or satisfactory, I suggest that we have a small Committee to examine into it and report. My honourable friend suggests that the honourable gentleman from New Westminster should examine it and give his opinion; but if the report is not according to his views, where is the Senate?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Just where it is now.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: The Senate would be in this position, that it would have accepted as true statements that are presented by the Commissioner but which are not verified under oath, as against the statements of the honourable gentleman from New Westminster, who has pledged his honour, as a member of the House, on what he is to prove.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Will the honourable gentleman tell me if, when he was speaking to Sir Henry Thornton, that gentleman advised him that he had had an official report from Vancouver that this investigation was a farce and a travesty on justice?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No, he did not tell me anything of the kind, and our conversation did not bear on that.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I think my honourable friend overlooks this all-important point in considering this question, that is, the right and privilege of the honourable gentleman from New Westminster to request, or even demand, an inquiry from this House into the charges which he has made. If a preliminary inquiry were made by a Committee to consider the evidence which has been submitted, and to report to this House, though it might occupy very considerable time, it might prove abortive; but notwithstanding any report of that Committee, my honourable friend would have a right, in his place as a member of the Senate, to make a request for an inquiry on those subjects.

In view of the fact that this inquiry which has been conducted by Mr. Temple, and also I understand by Mr. Haffner, originated with my honourable friend from New Westminster, and was practically made on his behalf, it would seem to me but reasonable and logical that the result of the inquiry should be placed in his hands. What would be the consequence if that were done? No doubt my honourable friend would peruse the contents of that report with very great interest, and, on the conclusion of his consideration of the report, he would form a judgment, as to whether or not he would proceed further with it. He would then be in a position to say whether the witnesses upon whom he relied to establish his charges had been called by Mr. Temple, whether they had given the evidence before him that they represented to my honourable friend as being able to give; in short, whether the inquiry had been equivalent to what my honourable friend has proposed should be made. Would it not be very much better that he should be made familiar with the contents of the report? If it proves unsatisfactory, I am sure my honourable friend will not hesitate to state to this House that he is dissatisfied with the inquiry that has been made. However, upon investigation it may appear that all the witnesses were called by Mr. Temple whom my honourable friend expected to be called, and though they might have made statements to controvert what had been suggested, yet my honourable friend may possibly be disappointed in the witnesses whose names he gave to Mr. Temple, and he may not consider it advisable to proceed further. On the other hand, he may conclude that the inquiry was absolutely inadequate to the circumstances which warranted the investigation.

I therefore fully agree with my honourable friend from Welland (Hon. Mr. Robertson) that the first step to be taken should be to place in the hands of my honourable friend from New Westminster the results of this inquiry. Then it would be for him to say whether he would assume the further responsibility of proceeding in this Chamber. If he did so, there would then be time enough to consider the proposition that a small Committee should dissect the evidence. But, instead of that Committee considering the evidence, it has been proposed by my honourable friend that its work could be very much shortened by Mr. Temple and Mr. Haffner appearing before it and stating within an hour or two what had been done. I do not think it would be at all necessary to go through 2,000 pages of evidence, if we are to discharge the multiplicity of duties which will fall upon us between now and the end of the month, when it is hoped that prorogation will take place, though I very much doubt it. I fear there will not be time for the perusal of 2,000 pages of evidence, and to give proper consideration to the contents of a document so voluminous.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That is why I thought that Mr. Temple should remain here for the purpose mentioned.

Hon Mr. BEIQUE: Honourable gentlemen, I have the misfortune of not agreeing with either the leader of the Government or the leader of the Opposition. As I understand the matter, it stands in this way. The honourable gentleman from New Westminster has made charges against certain officials of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. These charges have not been followed up by any motion for inquiry by himself—

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: There is my motion.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: —but by the motion of the honourable member from Simcoe (Hon. Mr. Bennett), so that the matter is before the House. The leader of the Government urges that before passing upon the motion it would be proper to know what had been done under this inquiry which was originated at the instance of the honourable gentleman from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Taylor) on one of the principle matters covered by the motion, and he urges that the honourable gentleman was a party to the inquiry in that he had prepared the brief containing the accusation and naming the witnesses, and which had been submitted either to the President of the Canadian National railways or to Mr. Temple himself.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: I did not pretend to give him the list of witnesses. Mr. Temple's Commission was a commission of inquiry. I gave to him the names of witnesses who had come to me. I did not pretend to give him a complete case.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: As far as I am concerned, I must say that it occurred to me, the moment I was informed that such a course had been followed, that this honourable House would not take it upon itself to vote upon this motion before ascertaining what had been done under that inquiry; particularly as we were told that we might expect a report at any moment. Now we are informed that the report has been made and is in Ottawa.

I think the course to be followed is to deposit the report before this honourable House; then it will be open to the leader of the Government to make his motion, and it will be for the House to decide how the report should be dealt with. The first thing it seems to me, is not to send the report to the honourable gentleman from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Taylor). It is the House that is entitled to have the report, and therefore it should be deposited before the House.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: In order that it may be deposited regularly I would suggest that a motion be made to that effect.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I will move it.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Did I understand the leader of the House to say that he had consulted certain gentlemen on this side of the House, who approved of his conversation?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I said that after consulting some members of this Chamber I had had a conversation with Sir Henry Thornton on Saturday, but that it did not bear on this procedure.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Oh, it had nothing to do with this matter.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: With the leave of the House I would move that the report of Mr. Temple be deposited on the Table, with the evidence.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Has my honourable friend from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) considered this point: that this is not such a document as is laid on the Table of Parliament? It is not the report of a Department of the Government, nor one to which Parliament is entitled; it is not a report made at the instance of Parliament; in fact, it does not bear the imprimatur of Parliament in any sense. The practice followed in laying papers upon the Table of Parliament is that they must be in the custody of the Government and be laid on the Table for the information of Parliament. This is simply a document of the Canadian National Railways Company.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I am sure the honourable gentleman will not deny me the right to ask for the papers.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Oh, no. It is rather academic than otherwise. My honourable friend suggests that it is such a report as the House might be entitled to; but the action taken might be regarded as a precedent; and in the future would prove rather embarrassing if we had the right to say to the Government: "We want you to bring down a document over which Parliament has no control, and lay it on the Table of Parliament."

The Hon. the Acting SPEAKER: I think it devolves upon me at this juncture to inform the House that everything that has been said so far is altogether irregular. The question before the House is the resumption of the debate on the motion of the honourable gentleman from Simcoe (Hon. Mr. Bennett) for the appointment of a Committee to inquire into certain charges made by the honourable gentleman from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Taylor). I do not think there is any other question to be put; therefore the motion of the honourable gentleman from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) is quite out of order.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: It is in order if it is with the leave of the House.

The Hon. the Acting SPEAKER: I think the motion is also irregular on the ground just mentioned by the leader of the Opposition (Hon. Sir James Lougheed). I do not think the House can make an order of this kind. This is not a document which has an official character.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I do not know to what extent I may do violence to the rules of the House, or fall under any penalty clause, but I am ready to bring down the report and the evidence and lay it on the Table. Of course, I would have preferred to have done so in answer to a call from the Chamber. Since the document is now in the possession of the Minister of Railways, I wonder whether we are not entitled to have it before us?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Oh, bring it down and take the consequences.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would suggest that my honourable friend who has the floor (Hon. Mr. Taylor) should move the ajournment of his motion until Tuesday or Wednesday next; then we could regularize the position, with the general consent of the House, by having this motion carried.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It will not break the Constitution.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Is the honourable gentleman disposed to adjourn the debate?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: If I am in order, I am quite content to adjourn it, provided that I am heard for a few moments first. I want to set myself right as to the measure of distrust I have with respect to the methods followed by Mr. Temple. I do not think the leader of the House is right in saying that I treated Mr. Temple with severity or discourtesy before to-day. Until to-day I have restrained my real opinion of the Temple inquiry, so there is no ground for offence. I should like to show to the Senate the kind of evidence Mr. Temple rejected.

Hon. Mr. TESSIER: That is discussing the report.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend is entering into a discussion of the inquiry before he has the evidence in his hands. Surely he would rather postpone that work until he has all the documents in his hands.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: If we are discussing the Order of the Day, I am in order.

When I was home last, I called up Mr. Temple on the phone, and asked him, as I have told the House before, for an appointment. He declined to make an appointment. Notwithstanding that he had been there for four weeks, at my instance, making an inquiry of mine, he had no time to see me. He intended to stay there two or three weeks more. I said to him then, when he had no time to see me: "What have you done about that policeman's case?"—because a man had been in my office telling me that no evidence had been called—and he said: "I have had nothing about that." "But," I said, " you have. As I telephone you I have before me the evidence taken by your own man." He said: "I repeat to you that I have nothing about that at all." Then he asked me to luncheon, and I attended at luncheon the next day and gave him the evidence taken by his own investigator ten days before he had told me he had not got it at all.

Hon. Mr. HAYDON: May I ask of what date is the honourable gentleman speaking?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: I left Westminister, speaking from memory, about the 24th of April. This would be three or four days before I left—say the 20th of April.

Hon. Mr. HAYDON: Was not the investigation begun long before that?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Oh, yes.

Hon. Mr. HAYDON: And, if I am in order, may I ask if the honourable gentleman himself was not in attendance at the examination?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: If the honourable gentleman had done me the honour of reading what I said in this House, he would know the answer to all those questions. What I said was that, having notified Mr. Temple three weeks before he started investigation that I had to leave for Ottawa on the 27th of March, and although he arrived in Vancouver seven or nine days before that, he started his investigation on the afternoon of the last day that I could be in Vancouver; and that I was present on the afternoon of that day. My next interview was when I came back a month later. I asked what progress he had been making, and he had no time to talk to me at all.

This is the evidence I showed to him at the luncheon table the next day, and which he said he had not received, although the investigator had taken it ten days before. I will not read the names of the principals. I will call the policeman "Mr. Constable," although I am prepared to give his name if I am asked to do so. This is the statement of Edgar Mahy, taken by Mr. James R. Knight, an official investigator of the Canadian National railways:

Q. You were at one time I believe in the employ of the C.G.M.M.?—A. Yes, on the government dock.

Q. What was your occupation?—A. Watchman and tie-up ships, etc.

Q. Who were you employed by?—A. The wharf constable.

Q. At one time I believe he lived next door to you?—A. Yes.

Q. And it was through his living next door that you got your employment on the wharf?—A. Yes.

Q. Approximately how long did you work down there?—A. About seven months, until sometime about this time last year, April 1923.

Q. During your employment at the government wharf what have you seen take place in the way of stealing by the constable—A. The first thing noticed was tea—I saw him down there with another fellow, putting it into a sack. A few days afterwards I spotted the same sack and of course it was the tea that was in it.

Q. Anything else?—A. Well, I saw him climb the cage and get liquor and come back over the cage and go out with it, when I watching that night.

Q. You previously mentioned something about pineapples?—A. That is right, they had a big shipment of pineapples and as it was badly battered there was a lot of coopering to do on one shipment, and Mr. Stewart and I had to recooper that at night, after the shed was closed. At 12 midnight we had our lunch, and constable stayed around until we had finished our lunch to watch his chance to get away with his grip; and Mr. Stewart and I saw him while we were back at work . . . he quickly searched in the locker for his grip, then rushed out through the door, and he then had the pineapples in his grip.

Q. Now tell us what you know about the coal, exactly what you have seen?—A. There was coal down there on railway trucks, brought down there I suppose for shipment: he had it loaded in sacks, because I saw it done myself, and I even helped him when he came up here to unload it off the truck. That was government property, or I presume it would be anyway, as it came off the dock.

Q. I believe you have assisted this man to build his house, at various times?—A. Yes, I have.

Q. Did he pay you for this work?—A. No, only occasionally when there was a boat coming in, instead of calling me to help to go down and tie it up, he told me to stay there and he would book in my time, which the Merchant Marine had to pay for.

Q. How many times did this happen, to the best of your knowledge?—A. Five or six times, anyway.

Q. At the time you went to visit Mr. Turtellotte, what was the nature of the visit?—A. We went there to see if there was anything against me, as Mr. Constable was trying to put me off the government dock; and Mr. Turtellotte inquired from Mr. Tidy, and Mr. Tidy said there was absolutely nothing against me at all, that he had received no complaints of any sort and that as far as he was concerned I was fully capable of doing my work.

Q. Did you make any complaint to Mr. Turtellotte as to thieving on the part of Mr. Constable; and if so, what reply did he give you?—A. I did complain to him, and he said he would inquire and find out the reason for it.

Q. You claim to have seen two trucks on the premises of Mr. Contable?—A. Yes.

Q. How long have they been there, to your knowlerge?—A. Practically nine months.

Q. Do you know to whom they belong?—A. I think the harbor board.

Q. Did you see them come to his house at any time?—A. Yes I saw them.

Q. Were they loaded or unloaded?—A. Loaded with lumber.

Q. How many times have you seen these trucks come loaded?—A. At least five or six times—it would be hard to count them.

Q. How were the trucks hauled?—A. By Mr. Constable's car.

Q. Have you ever seen any shingles go to his house?—A. Yes, in his automobile—why I helped unload them myself on his premises.

Q. Do you know where they came from?—A. From the government dock.

Q. Did you see them load to his auto?—A. Yes.

Q. Have you at any time been in the house?—A. Yes.

Q. What have you seen there in the way of stolen property?—A. Liquor, flour, bacon, hams, dried fruit, canned fruits, syrup, sauce, tea, paint, brushes, blankets, pillows. . . lots of things.

Q. What was said to you with reference to the flour?—A. He told me he checked in the stores because the Chief Stewart was drunk and could not check them in. When he saw him afterwards, when the Chief Steward got sober, he thanked him very much for checking his stores and gave him the 100-lb sack of flour.

Q. Have you seen him take gasoline from the jtneys?—A. Yes, I have, on various occasions, also oil for his engine.

Q. Did he tell you what he wanted the paint for?—A. Yes, to paint his house, because he was going to build.

Q. Is there anything further you would like to bring out at this time?—A. No, that's about all I can think of just now.

Hon. Mr CASGRAIN: Is that sworn to?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: No, it is not sworn. When I showed him this next day, he said: "Oh, since you spoke to me yesterday I have inquired about that, and the man who makes this statement is a discharged employee, and therefore his evidence would be inspired by malice."

Before I went to Ottawa, I had given the name of a man called Stewart who had talked to me and impressed me as a reliable man. I met him only for the one interview. I did not take his statement. I gave his name, his address and his phone number to Mr. Temple, and to Mr. Page, the head of the Investigation Department, and asked them to get Stewart's statement. When Mr. Temple told me this other man was a discharged employee I said: "But, did you get Stewart? He is not discharged." He said: "Oh, no, I inquired about him, and he left the service with a grievance."—Therefore he would be wrongly inspired. His grievance was that he refused to work with a thief; he said that was why he left the service. Then there was a man named Hilton, I think, who talked to me a few days before. I said: "Did you get Mr. Hilton?" He said: "I never heard of him.' I said "Where is your Investigation Department? He was neither discharged nor did he leave with a grievance. He was a watchman and had most material evidence. Did you get him?" And he said no. That is the way Mr. Temple made a complete inquiry. I wrote him then a letter calling his attention to these omissions and my dissatisfaction with the proceedings because he had only taken some of my witnesses and had devoted all his attention to contradicting them with evidence from the officials of his company. He says in his reply to me, which is dated April 28th:

Referring to the evidence of the witnesses in regard to pilfering, this is a separate matter and I have not rejected any evidence.

When I spoke to him before, he told me he was not going to take it, for the reasons I give you. He did take it after I laid this before him at the lunch table, in the presence of Mr. Haffner, and showed it to Mr. Haffner also. The letter goes on to state:

I have not only the statement of the witnesses you refer to, but also the statement of the man accused, and am having further investigation made as I promised you.

In my mind there is no doubt whatever about that constable. I not only had three seemingly reliable witnesses tell me about him, but I made side inquiries as to his general character and satisfied myself from those inquiries that he was the type of man who probably would do what he was accused of doing. I would like to see from Mr. Temple's report what he has found about him, and whether or not he is still on the job. There are one or two cases like this, that I know so well, and if Mr. Temple can spend seven weeks there and find no cause of complaint against a man as to whom the evidence is simply overwhelming, then we can form some estimate as to the value of a report from that source.

I asked Mr. Temple also about the report from the dockyard. My evidence from the dockyard was that no repairs such as indicated in the certificates were done on that vessel. When he had declined to tell me what his finding would be, or give me any inkling of it, I said: "Have you met the dockyard evidence, as to which I gave you a statutory declaration?" "Oh, yes," he said; "I have called the manager of the company, and he denies it in toto." Now, the manager of the company is the man who got the $8,500. The evidence given to me is that he earned no part of the $8,500; that the whole thing was a fake; that there was no occasion for putting the ship into dock at all. And here is the evidence which was given to me, and which, according to all that Mr. Temple would tell me when I saw him, was met, not by calling any of the men who had done the work, but by calling the manager, the man who had got the money. It is his evidence that would be offered to the Committee of this House, and they could only compare one sheet of typewriting against another sheet of typewriting, without any knowledge as to the circumstances of the parties.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But what real knowledge has my honourable friend as to the evidence that was adduced on that point?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Mr. Temple's statement.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes, but Mr. Temple was there for three weeks after my honourable friend left him.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Mr. Temple told me that he had closed the case and that he would take no more evidence upon it. I have only his word for that. Here is the document which I objected his meeting with the evidence of the manager of the company. It is a statutory declaration:

I, Stanley Mark, of 129 Sixth Street West, North Vancouver, make oath and state as follows:

That in August, 1922, I was employed at the dry dock at Prince Rupert, B.C. I remember that the steamship Canadian Farmer was in dock during that month.

I was one of a gang, namely rivetter, holder on and heater, employed at work on the Canadian Farmer while she was in dock on that occasion. I have before me now a document which I have signed for identification, purporting to show the certificate of survey held at Prince Rupert on this occasion, and showing the following damge to the Canadian Farmer:

1st keel plate numbering from stem set up over five frame spaces;

10th plate all more or less badly set up over six frame spaces;

Port side: in "A" strake of shell plating the 11th plate set up over five frame spaces in way of keel plate landing;

Starboard side: first length of bilge keel more or less buckled over five frame spaces;

In way of damage the floors and reverse frames buckled;

Rivetting started and caulking sprung.

These are the six items certified to by three officers high in the employ of the Company and the Government, who made solemn declaration that all that damage was apparent on that ship. Here is what the man who worked on the ship, and who says he was one of only three who did work on it, says about those several items:

As to first keel plate—

That is one that is said to be "set up over five frame spaces." Now, five frame spaces would be, I suppose, a set up over twelve and a half feet. There are about two and a half feet between the frames, as I understand.

As to first keel plate, I and my gang worked on this. We took out about a dozen rivets all told, from here and there over the plate.

There are hundreds of rivets in every plate.

We picked these out because we found them loosened through rust. This plate was not set up, nor was there on it any other sign of collision damage. No attempt was made to fair plate; we simply put new rivets where we had taken rivets out.

As to 10th plate—

That is represented on the certificate as 'all more or less badly set up over six frame spaces"; that is, it was said to be twisted out of shape over fifteen feet, according to the certificate.

As to 10th plate: We removed this plate, on which there was a small dent, or as it would be called a "set-up." When we started work on this plate it was quite watertight, and there was no apparent necessity for removing it. The dent could have been eliminated by drawing, or fairing in place, as this would be described. To take this plate off we had the assistance of five or six other men, and it was a hard job. When the plate was off we took it to the blacksmith shop. So far as I know it was not taken to the rollers, which are in another part of the yard. My gang received the plate again at the blacksmith shop and brought it back to the dock, where we replaced it on the ship. It proved very difficult to make a job of the caulking when the plate was replaced, on account of the plate being a little short and we had to acetylene weld it. Even after this the plate was not watertight, and was not in so good condition as when we started to take it off. I note the expression "set up over six frame spaces," as to which I have to say that this is not correct. The set up was simply a dent between two frames. I observed the condition of the frames when the plate was off; they were in perfect condition, with no set up or other sign of damage. I observed also the floors in that vicinity; they too were all right, with no sign of damage. No work was done on either frames or floors; I am quite sure of that.

As to 11th plate—

The representations about the 11th plate were that it was "set up over five frame spaces in way of keel plate landing." That is twelve feet, again.

As to 11th plate, all that was done to that was to remove about eight or ten rivets, found rusted or loose from other cause. The boss indicated which rivets were to be taken out; but as to some of them there seemed no apparent reason for removing them. This plate was not damaged at all, let alone set up over five frame spaces as I read here.

The bulkhead bar in vicinity of plate 10 was sprung by the driving of the rivets in the course of our work and in consequence had to be welded to stop the leak so caused.

I have before me now a document which I sign for the purposes of identification, and which purports to be the specification for the repairs to the Canadian Farmer while on this stay at Prince Rupert. I see there in the "Detail of Work" the instruction, "Keel bar in same location (Plate No. 10) to be faired in place." I did not see anything the matter with the keel bar and so far as I know nothing was done on it. As to plate 11 I note the direction in these specifications, "sufficient rivetting cut adrift to enable plate to be faired in place." The rivets we removed had no bearing on fairing in place and no fairing in place was done.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR.

Here is a man who represents himself to me as one of a gang of three who were the only iron workers there, and he gives me in this detail a statement that no repairs of the kind indicated in the certificate and the specifications were done there. When I asked Mr. Temple, "How have you met that sworn statement?" he said: "I have called the office manager of the yard,"—the man who got the $8,500. Do I need to read the evidence of the man who got the $8,500 to know what he said? It seems to me preposterous.

I gave Mr. Temple the names and addresses of the other two workmen who worked with this man there. I have been told that he called the foreman some time after I made this representation to him. I do not know. But of the three men who actually worked with their hands there, I have the sworn declaration of one and a letter from the other. The third I have not heard from.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Was the ship in drydock?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Yes, the ship was there eight days, and they have a certificate, or three certificates of the same set, that that ship left the dock correct and seaworthy in every respect, and good for a year, the fact being that they had a regular row the day she left, because this defective plate was leaking—leaking so badly that both the captain and the engineer demurred about going away with her in that condition, and they were presented with twelve bags of cement by the dock management, to put on at the first convenient opportunity, to try to stop that leak. Yet they had the three certificates that when she left there she was correct in every particular. As I asked Mr. Temple how he met these various statements and he declined to tell me how he met them, or to allow me to see the evidence; and as he has been in town for five days, but has not communicated with me, though he went out to Vancouver at my instance; is it any wonder that I decline to place any reliance on a report made under the circumstances that I have described?

Sir Henry Thornton had advices from Vancouver by wire on the 7th of May last that this investigation was simply a farce. He has had mail advices going into detail, in confirmation of that. So I am informed. These advices are from a man whom he himself chose as an investigator for his Company.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: What is his name?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: It is true that they have since had a falling out. This man says he is still an investigator for the Company; Sir Henry Thornton says he is not.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: He fired him.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Is that the maker of that file—Mr. Watson?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: No, that is not the maker of the file, Mr. Watson. I am glad the honourable gentleman mentions that. I may say, in order to show the activities of Mr. Temple when he was there, that he called upon the gentleman to whom I now refer, mainly with the idea of imputing blame to Watson for that file being at large—

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Does not my honourable friend feel that it would be absolutely fair to meet Mr. Temple in a small committee, rather than to engage the attention of eighty members of the Senate on such petty matters?

Hon. Mr. BENNETT: Petty matters!

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: The honourable gentleman asks me a question and becomes annoyed when I answer it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend refers to a person who was in the employ of the Canadian National Railways, was dismissed, and is, he claims, re-instated. Something of that kind was said about Mr. Watson: he was said to have gone out and come in again. I wonder if it is not the same party.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: No. Watson is in again. They dared not keep him out when he came down and made a demonstration in Montreal. They did dismiss him, but they took him back again. This other man was instructed by Sir Henry Thornton on the 6th of December last to hold an investigation. About the same time—for it is in answer to my letter of the 28th of November—Sir Henry Thornton informed me that he had ordered an investigation to be held immediately. This investigator made one report, and on the 26th of December he is supposed to have been dismissed, because of the report he made.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: He made a report then?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: He made a report. He claims that he was never properly dismissed, and that he is still in the service.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Is he getting his pay?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Evidently not.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Then how could he be in the service?

Hon Mr. TAYLOR: He says he was instructed by Sir Henry Thornton to report to him, and he is still reporting to him, and he says he has scores of sworn statements establishing the rescality going in connection with that Company. Mr. Temple called on him in order to get them, but he declined to give them to Mr. Temple because of the nature of the investigation that Mr. Temple was holding, and because of his relationship to the parties concerned, which this man seemed to think would prevent him from giving a satisfactory or straightforward report. He thought Mr. Temple would be too embarrassed by his associations to make a report upon which reliance could be placed.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I do not want to interrupt the honourable gentleman. I have tried to follow him, but am not quite clear. Were there two ships, or was there only one ship?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Only one ship.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I understood the honourable gentleman to say that one ship had no damage at all, but they put it into dock and made a claim on the insurance company.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Yes.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: And that same ship was afterwards leaking and showed damage?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: They damaged her in the dock. She was all right when she went into the dock. There was no occasion for docking her.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: And they made her worse in the dock?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: They took off a plate which they were unable to replace. They made her leak and sent her away leaking.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: That is something new—to put a ship in when she is all right, and to have her all wrong when she is taken out. I thought there were two ships.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: No, no; one ship. I am afraid that Mr. Temple has called only the Company's evidence; that he has not called the evidence to make the case I state. However, as to the suggestion that I should have the report of Mr. Temple before further discussing this matter, I think that is a very proper suggestion. Have I the assurance of the honourable leader that that report will be in my hands in time for me to digest it before Tuesday next?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If there are duplicates of that report my honourable friend may rest assured that he will get one. If there is only the original I will give instructions to have a copy typewritten hastily, in order that I may lay it on the Table of the House for the information of my honourable friend.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: I would ask also that the return for which I moved on the 8th of May—a return as to the finding of the Wreck Commissioner, which there has been ample time to prepare between then and now—should be laid on the Table. With this understanding, honourable gentlemen, I would move that the debate stand adjourned until Tuesday next.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Taylor, the debate was adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at 3 p.m.

WELCOME TO IMPERIAL SQUADRON

INQUIRY

Hon. Mr. BARNARD inquired of the Government:

1. What arrangements have been made by the Government or are in contemplation for extending an official welcome to the Imperial Squadron, shortly due to arrive at Victoria and Vancouver.

2. Does the Government intend sending to British Columbia a representative for the purpose of extending such welcome.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have an answer from the Department of National Defence:

1. A dinner will be given by the Government at Victoria to a number of the officers of the Special Service Squadron. Upon arrival at Vancouver a train trip will be given to a number of the men from Vancouver to Edmonton and return.

2. Yes.

CANADIAN MERCHANT MARINE INQUIRY

MOTION FOR RETURN

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT (for Hon. Mr. Béique) moved:

That an Order of the Senate do issue for a copy of the inquiry made by Mr. Temple, K.C., on employees of the Canadian Merchant Marine and of his report on same, now in the hands of the Hon. Minister of Railways and Canals.

The motion was agreed to.

LOAN COMPANIES BILL

MOTION FOR SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. McMEANS moved the second reading of Bill Y4, an Act to amend the Loan Companies Act, 1914.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, this Bill is simply to provide for a Court of Appeal in connection with loan companies. As the law stands at present the Inspector of Insurance Companies is also the Inspector of Loan Companies. Upon certain matters being brought to his attention, he may close up a loan company on five minutes notice, and it is thought only proper that there should be a distinction between insurance companies and loan companies in this respect. At present an appeal to the Exchequer Court is allowed, but I understand it has been found to be very impracticable. This means that all the authority is practically vested in one man. In introducing this Bill I do not wish to cast the slightest reflection on the Inspector of Insurance, Mr. Finlayson, who is a very capable officer, and who, I am sure, carries out the duties of his office to the satisfaction of the whole community. I should like the Bill to go to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, where representations may be made by persons interested in the matter.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Is the honourable gentleman aware that insurance companies are the biggest companies in Canada?

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Oh, yes.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Then one man should be the inspector for both.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: It does not follow at all that the Inspector of Insurance Companies cannot be also the Inspector of Loan Companies. This is a question of providing an appeal. The Bill provides that the appeal shall be to the Treasury Board instead of to the Exchequer Court.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Is there an appeal to-day from the Inspector of Insurance, under the Act?

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: The Inspector of Insurance is also the Inspector of Loan Companies.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Does the Bill provide for both cases?

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: On what ground does the Exchequer Court refuse to deal with the matter?

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I cannot tell you that. I do not know. The Court sits only once in a while, and says it has nothing to do with this matter,—that it is only a court of law.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: It sits here practically all the time.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I think this would be getting out of the frying pan into the fire. It may be difficult enough to get before the Exchequer Court, but it will be more difficult to get before the Treasury Board. And why refer the Bill to one of our Committees? Are you going to call witnesses?

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: There are some gentlemen who desire to be heard. The Committee on Banking and Commerce is composed of gentlemen of experience in this line, who may listen to the representations to be made.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Will my honourable friend allow me to move the adjournment of the debate until Wednesday, so that I may get some information? I feel somewhat diffident about an appeal from the Superintendent to the Treasury Board. Some objections loom up in my mind, and I would rather have a little time to examine into the situation, because it has to do with the principle of the Bill. Before allowing the Bill to go to second reading, I should like to have the opinion of the Department.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Dandurand, the debate was adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday next at 8 p.m.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

ADVERTISING AND PRINTING—INQUIRY

Hon. Mr. TANNER rose in accordance with the following notice:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the following matter and will enquire from the Government:—

1. In what newspapers in Canada did the Canadian National Railways advertise during the years 1922 and 1923?
2. What was the cost of such advertising in each newspaper, in each of said years?
3. What persons, firms and corporations in Canada supplied printing, lithographing, etc. (commonly known as job printing), for the said Railways in the said years?
4. What was the amount of the contracts or orders to each of such persons, firms and corporations in each of said years?

He said: Honourable gentlemen, probably this is not a matter that calls for discussion at the present moment, but may I give just a word of explanation in regard to this inquiry, which I mentioned some days ago to the honourable the leader of the House. When I prepared these questions there was a very fierce assault being made upon this Chamber by certain newspapers of the country. It occurred to me and to some other honourable members of this House that it might be desirable to ascertain what kind of food these attacking newspapers were being fed upon, there being an impression abroad that the huge appetite for job printing possessed by some of them was being satisfied by the Canadian National Railways, and that, perhaps being overfed with job printing and other matters commonly known as patronage, and their intellectual balance being somewhat upset, they may have felt it necessary to wage a fierce and unexplainable warfare against this Chamber. However, my honourable friend the leader of the House took it upon himself to read, to some of these gentlemen at any rate, a very salutary lesson, and the leader on this side of the House joined him in pointing out to the attacking forces of the press that, instead of levelling their lances at the Senate on the subject of the Branch lines of railway and other important public issues they should be supporting the Senate in carrying on a thorough and exhaustive investigation of these matters. The lesson which my honourable friend the leader of the House, and the honourable leader on this side also, gave those gentlemen has gone home. There has been since a very noticeable calm. They have learned that this Chamber will perform its duty as the great bulwark of the country, no matter what irresponsible newspapers may say in regard to it.

I was moved to make the inquiries for the reasons I have just stated. Inasmuch as the forces have retreated, I do not know that it is very essential now to press for an answer. I am quite content to leave that to the discretion of my honourable friend the leader of the House.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Does the honouralbe gentleman want the questions dropped?

Hon. Mr. TANNER: If my honourable friend thinks it desirable to answer the questions I am quite content. If not, they can stand.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: When a question is put on the Order Paper the Department interested takes notice, and it is very likely that within a few days I shall get the answer.

The inquiry stands.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS FROM ENGLAND

INQUIRY

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN inquired of the Government:

1. What is the total amount of duties collected in the calendar year 1923 on goods imported from England?
2. What would the amount have been without preference?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND:

Customs Duties Collected on Imports from the United Kingdom under various tariffs and duties payable on the same imports if no preferential rates had been applied—Fiscal year ended March 31, 1924.*

	Duties collected	Duties estimated at general tariff rates
General tariff..	$ 9,572,777 68	$ 9,572,777 68
Preferential tariff ..	18,119,479 38	28,465,946 58
Treaty rates..	463,780 89	545,271 18
Total..	$28,156,037 95	$38,583,995 44

*Collections of duty on imports from each country separately are compiled by fiscal years only.

Hon. Mr. TANNER.

CANADIAN MERCHANT MARINE AND NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REPORTS OF INQUIRIES

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, I desire to lay on the Table a return to an Order of the Senate issued on May 8, 1924, for—

A return giving copy of all correspondence with the Department of Marine respecting an inquiry under the Shipping Act into an alleged casualty to the Canadian Government Merchant Marine Steamer Canadian Farmer, together with the evidence taken at said inquiry and the findings

I desire to lay on the Table two copies of a report by Mr. R. H. M. Temple on Captain Boyd's complaint; also two copies of a report by Mr. R. H. M. Temple on "Purchasing Department, Vancouver." I had asked for the evidence, but the Department of Railways has only one one copy, which comprises more than 2,000 pages, together with a number of folios of exhibits, and unless the Department receives direct positive orders from this Chamber for the printing of the evidence, which would take some time, it cannot part with its copy. The Department states that if any honourable member desires to examine the evidence, the record will be at his disposal in the Railways' Department, where a room will be available. Some other method may be suggested. In the meantime I lay on the Table the two reports of Mr. Temple, which must contain abundant references to the evidence. I have not read the report nor have I seen the evidence. If the honourable gentleman from New Westminster desires to refer to it, the whole record will be at his disposal in the Railway Department all day long. Perhaps he will consider this suggestion before asking that the country go to the expense of having the evidence printed or typewritten.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: If the honourable gentleman will permit me—Mr. Temple made more than one copy of the evidence; no question about that. He is only trifling with this Government in saying there is only one copy.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am not sure that Mr. Temple told me himself that he had only one copy. My inquiry was made at the Railway Department. Perhaps Mr. Temple has another copy, which he may have kept for himself, or he may have submitted one to the Legal Department of the Canadian National Railways. That I do not know. If my honourable friend were to question me, I should be absolutely unable to tell him positively that I did speak to Mr. Temple. I may have done so. All I know is that the Railway Department has all that evidence and all the exhibits. The exhibits are generally originals, and there would hardly be duplicates of them. At all events, if my honourable friend, after looking at Mr. Temple's report, desires to examine the evidence, it will be at his disposal. I have no objection to asking Mr. Temple, and will do so with pleasure, and if I find that a duplicate copy of the evidence is available I shall be glad to hand it over to my honourable friend from New Westminster or lay it on the Table.

THE BRITISH PREFERENCE

MOTION AND DISCUSSION

The Senate resumed from June 4 consideration of the motion of Hon. Mr. David:

Resolved, That in the opinion of the Senate the sections of the Customs Act which provide for a preferential duty on imports from Great Britain be repealed until such time as the British Government grant a reciprocal tariff on goods imported from Canada or suspended until some agreements have been arrived at.

Hon. LORNE C. WEBSTER: Honourable gentlemen, as seconder of the resolution for the suspension of British preference, as proposed by my honourable friend from Mille Iles, I regret that I was forced to leave this Chamber by a pressing engagement in Montreal before the honourable member had concluded his speech. I did not expect that this motion would come up until we received the figures and information asked for in a recent motion for a return. But the subject is of such great importance that we may perhaps discuss it further to-night. May I say that I agree with the motion proposed so ably by the honourable Senator from Mille Iles and supported by honourable senators from Nova Scotia. The honourable gentleman from Mille Iles makes a study of all important questions which is an inspiration to the younger men of this House. His independence of character and his outstanding devotion to his country is well known, and worthy of our imitation. In his own language, "Il a gagné ses épaulettes."

I desire not to discuss the question from any party point of view, or criticize any section of our political friends but to speak of the question and the situation as it appeals to me. I wish again to bring before you that ever pressing question, which I am sure is never far from your thoughts and is one of the most important problems that is facing Canada to-day—protection to Canadian industries.

The position of Canada in the northern half of North America, in such close proximity to the United States, makes it imperative that the living conditions should be approximately the same in this country as they are in the United States. So much American literature finds its way into this country that wages must be approximately the same here as they are in the United States, for if they are not, our artisan finds ready employment in that great country; as witness the emigration of Canadians, which last year amounted to about 181,000.

The remark has been made so often that it is considered a truism. "What Canada needs is population and money"—men to work the vast resources of this country, and the money to develop them.

Of what use is it for us to endeavour to bring immigrants to this country who are strangers and do not know our way of living, when our own population, the population that has been born and bred in this country and who love it, are forced to leave Canada for the more attractive fields offered by the United States?

In 1789 the United States adopted a policy of protecting American manufacturers and producers. The first tariff was framed under the influence of Hamilton, who also in his "Report on Manufacturers" laid the basis of later protectionism in the United States. Its adoption by other nations and the benefits that protection and manufacturing industries would bestow on the country, were the reasons urged by him for its adoption. By one Government or another this policy has been maintained to such an extent that the Fordney Act of 1922 has been described by Prof. H. Parker Willis as "the highest general Tariff Law ever enacted in the history of Protection." Thus American resources were developed, American people employed, and the American scale of living kept up. The results are too well-known to talk about. To-day the United States possess 110,000,000 people and have the highest paid class of working people in the world; at the same time the cost of living is not too high compared with the remuneration received.

In Canada we have followed an entirely different course and until 1878 there was no policy of protection put into effect. In 1878 The National Policy was adopted and this country commenced to develop, and, notwithstanding the fact that the United States has such a tremendous advantage over us in manufacturing, the progress of Canadian industry has been entirely satisfactory and we find now that the manufacturing industries of this country produce approximately $3,000,000,000 worth of goods per annum, and employ over 600,000 people. This means that a population of several million people are supported through the manufacturing industries of this country.

The question of railways and freight transportation is also bound up in the National Policy of this country, as most industries bring in two to three tons of raw material to manufacture one ton of finished product, and this is most profitable freight for the railways to handle.

Taking the value of farm produce, and the exports of farm products as per table below, we find that approximately 75 per cent of the farm produce is consumed in Canada.

Year	Gross Agricultural Revenue	Wheat Crop Bushels	Value	Total Exports
1917. ..	$1,621,028,000	$233,742,850	$453,038,600
1918. ..	1,873,037,000	189,075,350	381,677,700
1919. ..	2,096,014,000	193,260,400	457,722,000	$264,910,990
1920. ..	1,961,715,000	263,189,300	427,357,300	403,468,722
1921. ..	1,396,233,000	300,858,100	242,936,000	473,477,371
1922. ..	Not published	399,786,400	339,419,000	293,372,649
1923. ..	"	474,199,000	316,934,700	365,847,777

We find also, over a period of years, imports of farm products making a very considerable sum, as per table below:

1919..	$ 80,325,130
1920..	145,161,668
1921..	116,906,868
1922..	100,834,663
1923..	92,295,497

Without the industrial population to consume these farm products, where will the agriculturist get his market? Certainly not in the United States, because the United States policy is well defined and known. They immediately raise Tariff barriers against practically everything we export to that country. Tariffs can only be fought with tariffs. Most of our farm products could not be exported abroad, because, owing to the low financial state of European countries, they produce as much as they possibly can and only purchase what they are absolutely unable to produce. It is, therefore, of major importance that this industrial population should develop and increase so that our agriculturists can also develop and increase.

It has been estimated by economists that fully 80 per cent of the cost of manufacturing an article is made up of wages. Accepting this as a fact, and comparing the wages paid in Canada and Great Britain, I find in the figures supplied me, that in the skilled and unskilled trade a few years ago the Canadian wages were much higher than those paid in England. The wage scale a couple of years ago was:

Industry—	United Kingdom	Canada

There are several industries that have been hit very hard by the repealing of the McKenna duties and by the continuance of the British Preference in Canada—notably the woollen industry. In one leading journal I find the following:

Twenty mills have closed down since Jan. 1st 1923, out of 124 woollen and knitting mills from which we have had reports. There is an average of over 40 per cent of the machinery idle. There is considerable reduction of operating machinery over 1923, which was an extremely unsatisfactory year for the mills. To-day only 10,799 hands are employed in the mills reporting, while if these mills were working full time they would employ 23,055 hands. Out of the mills reporting only 58 could report on the number of their employees who have gone to the United States since Jan. 1st 1923, and these did not give all those who actually left the country, but only those highly skilled workers they actually knew about. The figures for the 58 mills are: Employed when the mills are on full time, 11,244; employed to-day 7,376; known to have left for the U.S., 776. This represents 10 per cent of those now employed in these mills.

While these figures reflect the serious condition in the Canadian Mills during 1923, and the more serious situation at the present time, we find that over $40,000,000 worth of woollen and knitted goods were shipped to Canada from abroad during the calendar year 1923, of which over $30,000,000 worth were shipped from Great Britain. Careful analysis of these imports shows that we have in Canada the machinery and technical ability to manufacture from 80 per cent to 90 per cent of these imports and that if the bulk of the imports had been manufactured here, from 17,000 to 20,000 additional hands would have been employed throughout the year.

It was submitted that the woollen and knitting industry, which is indigenous to Canada and of which 94.4 per cent of the industrial capital employed is owned by Canadians, should be safeguarded by tariff adjustments; otherwise capital employed would be dissipated, and the employees being out of work, would of necessity emigrate to the United States.

The article which I have quoted from deals with the effect of exchange rates. It says:

There is a large "Invisible Bounty" on all exports of goods from Great Britain to Canada owing to the purchasing power parity of the British pound to the Canadian dollar and the rate of exchange. This amounts to practically the difference between the par value and the exchange value of sterling. Duties levied on goods from Great Britain imported into Canada are diminished by this amount. There are no tariff regulations compensating for this "Invisible Bounty." It is a factor in addition to other advantages for producers abroad, such as lower wages, overhead, etc.

Goods partially manufactured in Continental countries by much cheaper labour than can be had in England may be shipped into Canada under the British Preferential rate. As an example, goods made in Great Britain can be sent to France to be dyed and finished. In this connection we would point out that Australia, New Zealand, the Union of South Africa and the Bahamas have the following clause in their regulations which prohibits such shipments to these countries under their British Preferential Tariffs:

"In the case of goods which have at some stage entered into the commerce of or undergone process of manufacture in a foreign country, only that labour and material which are expended on or added to the goods after their return to the United Kingdom shall be regarded as the produce or manufacture of the United Kingdom in calculating the proportion of United Kingdom labour and material in the factory or works cost of the finished article."

Now, may. I place upon Hansard the following figures regarding importation of woollens, by yards, for the months of January, during the last four years:

At the annual meeting of the shareholders of the Dominion Linens, Limited, held at Guelph, March 12th, 1924, the President stated that any person who undertook to establish an industry in Canada at the present time, or investors who bought the securities of industrial corporations in Canada, took very grave risks under present conditions, as their investments might be wiped out through reductions in the Tariff. This has already been the case to the extent of many millions of dollars.

Boots and shoes are largely manufactured in the Provinces of Quebec and Ontario. The firms to-day are running at only 60 to 70 per cent capacity. More than 70 firms since the war have become casualties. Twenty-five out of 175 either failed or discontinued business in 1923 alone. The capital invested in the shoe industry amounts to $32,000,000 and is practically all Canadian. This industry has been giving direct employment to 15,000 persons and producing goods to the value of $40,000,000 annually. Surely it should be properly and carefully protected. Canadian-made footwear is shut out of Europe by the low wages paid there and by the exchange. It is practically excluded from the United States by reason of the tremendous output and overproduction of American factories. The tariff on boots and shoes is as follows:

	British Preferential Tariff	Intermediate Tariff	General Tariff
611—Boots and shoes, pegged or wire fastened with unstitched soles close edged..	15%	22½%	25%
611a—Boots shoes slippers and insoles of any material, n.o.p..	17½%	27½%	30%
Schedule to Belgium and Netherlands..	....	27½%

Practically all the boots and shoes imported into Canada from the United Kingdom are of the description to which tariff item 611a applies. The general tariff is 30 per cent; the intermediate tariff 27½ per cent and the British Preferential tariff 17½ per cent, but from this there is the discount of 10 per cent in practically all cases, as the British goods come directly to Canadian ports. The net rate of 15¾ is a very low rate of duty for manufactured goods. This rate it should be noted, is applied only on the valuation at the factory in the United Kingdom, before any addition is made for the freight or insurance and low exchange. Every honourable gentleman present is familiar with the fact that even the hides from which boots and shoes are manufactured in England are imported from foreign countries; therefore the articles so imported and afterwards manufactured into boots and shoes, come into Canada under the low tariff. Canadian costs of production are increased by a 5 per cent Sales Tax, which places the Canadian producer under a handicap in competition with imported goods. Canadian manufacturers are required to pay 5 per cent Sales Tax on all purchases of equipment, lasts and patterns, and general supplies, even though these are treated as specific items in the cost of their shoes. In consequence of the rapid change of styles which is quite beyond the control of the manufacturer, the entire cost of lasts and patterns has to be treated as a current expense. An actual comparison of piece-work prices shows that the rates paid in Canada are from 66 per cent to 100 per cent higher than those paid in Great Britain for similar operations.

The freight situation also enters largely into the boot and shoe industry, more especially on the Pacific Coast. The average freight from Liverpool, via the Panama Canal to Vancouver, is 5 cents per pair. The Canadian manufacturer has to pay an all-rail rate which is equivalent to 16.23 cents per pair.

Thus, if we look into the real facts of the British Preferential Tariff duty applicable to boots and shoes from the United Kingdom, when imported directly to a Canadian port, we find that the duty is only 15¾ per cent; but of this the British manufacturer realizes a premium of approximately 10 per cent when converting Canadian exchange into British currency. Finally the British manufacturer sells to Canada at a special reduction of 5 per cent, permitted under the Dumping Clause, making his sales in the United Kingdom carry his overhead. Thus the margin of tariff duty over exchange premium and Dumping Clause exemption allowance is only ¾ of 1 per cent.

The cost of production in Canada is greater by reason of higher wages, by at least 66 per cent, which means a difference in relation to total costs of production of at least 12½ per cent. The General Tariff duty, ranging up to 30 per cent on "findings" not manufactured in Canada, is equivalent to a handicap of at least 1½ per cent on the total cost of production. This makes a total of 14 per cent net handicap under which Canadian manufacturers are trying to "carry on" at the present time in the face of increasingly severe competition from the United Kingdom.

Practically the same conditions as apply to these two industries apply to all other manufacturing and industrial concerns in Canada. So it is clearly to be seen that with very low British wages, cheap freight rates between Great Britain and Canada and depreciated currency, the British Preference to-day is working serious harm to the industrial development of this country.

After all, the key-note of Protection is Nationality. A young country like Canada which has had a National Policy for only some 46 years, and that not at all times consistent, is to-day likely to be shoved to the wall should it withdraw its tariff barriers. No country was ever built up except through the policy of protecting home industry. Even Great Britain had protection for over 200 years before adopting free trade. Oliver Cromwell framed the first protective customs tariff for England, and also in 1651 passed the famous Navigation Act. The protective system continued in England till the repeal of the Corn Laws in 1846. England only adopted free trade because she was industrially far ahead of every other nation in the world, and because it was to her interest to do so. Being an island with a rapidly increasing population, and limited room for expansion, she acquired great oversea possessions. These colonies produced large quantities of raw materials or semi-finished materials. England was the workshop with the formula of cheap food and low wages. Goods were manufactured cheaply largely because wages were low and living was cheap. Ships were built cheaply for the same reason and the sailors who operated these ships, to carry raw material to England and the finished products from England, were paid low wages. Thus Great Britain relatively maintained under free trade a considerable part of the industrial supremacy established during the two hundred years of protection, and the money made by the shipping interests of Great Britain represented a large measure of protection. Ships left England laden with useful commodities—the product of British labour—and sailed the seven seas, and returned to her shores loaded with raw material to be transformed into similar commodities to those which she was shipping to all parts of the world.

About the time of Oliver Cromwell the protective system was introduced in France by the statesman Colbert, and remained in force until the French Revolution, when it was modified, although France did not adopt a fiscal system approaching free trade until 1860.

After the introduction of free trade into France in 1860, it was quickly discovered that under this system France could not stand the competition of England and the United States and in 1872, after the Franco-Prussian war, France returned to the protective system. Other European nations had followed the free trade experiment of France in 1860, and they also imitated her later action in reverting to the protectionist policy. In 1879, under the direction of Bismark, Germany inaugurated a distinctly protective system, and most of the other European nations soon followed the example of Germany and France.

Thus we are forced to ask ourselves the question, "Is Canada different from all these countries in respect to need of protection for her industries?" I do not think that she is.

British Preference was adopted by the Canadian Government in 1897, not as an annual "gift" to England, but with the belief that Great Britain with her well-known generosity would give Canada equal or greater favours. As Great Britain is not doing this, does it not behoove us to consider at this time the suspension of our British Preference? It was my great privilege to know the Right Honourable Sir Wilfrid Laurier in Quebec, and I can assure this honourable House that there was no more disappointed person in Canada than himself when he saw years and years roll on, and nothing granted by Great Britain in return.

Recently great events have taken place in England. The British Parliament has repealed the McKenna duties from the 1st of August, while the British nation at the polls has overwhelmingly rejected the tariff policies of the British Government which took part in the Imperial Conference last autumn.

Some people imagine that sentiment enters into the question. It is a question of practical business. As Canadians we must choose that policy which will give Canada the larger returns. At present the Empire is not ready for a world-wide system of mutual preferences and it would be a bad thing for Canada for her to try to uphold it in the face of adverse feeling in England.

And so the appeal of the country to-day is simply for fair treatment. We are suing not merely for one class, but for the country as a whole. A country such as Canada cannot be powerful or happy with its industries languishing and its best mechanics leaving the country for the United States. Its farmers would be the greatest beneficiaries, because Canada, exporting its agricultural products, would benefit by a preferential treatment if granted by Great Britain.

I hope, honourable gentlemen, that my voice may reach beyond these four walls, throughout this country and even across the ocean to the homeland, that land we all admire and love, and that the remarks which I have made this evening may be taken not unkindly or as a threat, but as a warning if a one-sided preference is allowed to continue.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Honourable gentlemen, I am informed that the right honourable the junior member from Ottawa (Right Hon. Sir George E. Foster) desires to make some observations on this subject. I therefore on his behalf move the adjournment of the debate if no other honourable member wishes to speak to-night.

The debate was adjourned.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

DEPRECIATION ACCOUNT—INQUIRY

Hon. Sir EDWARD KEMP inquired of the Government:

What amount of money has been written off, also percentages of values, for depreciation on the premises, plant, rolling stock and other assets of the National Railways, including Canadian Northern and Grand Trunk systems and all subsidiaries, since they have been under government control (also including the Intercolonial Railway for the same period) in each fiscal year up to March 31st, 1924?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND:

In addition to the depreciation accrued as shown above, the Canadian National Railways during the year 1923 wrote out of their Capital Account the sum of $2,848,789.55 representing original cost of equipment and other property retired from service during the year; this amount divided over the various Railways as follows:

Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada	$871,227.31
Grand Trunk Pacific Railway	315,741.99
Canadian Northern Railway	957,870.58
Canadian Government Railways.	695,357.57

	$2,848,789.55

Instead of accruing depreciation, the Canadian National Railway Lines in Canada have adopted the practice of writing out all equipment and other property retired as and when retired.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON LEGISLATION

INQUIRY

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. DAVID: With the permission of the House I would ask for some information from the honourable the Speaker of the Senate with regard to a resolution which was adopted by the Senate last Session. A Committee made some very good suggestions, and the best of them was this:

Your Committee further recommend that the distribution of all Private Bills, exclusive of Divorce Bills, be regulated by the Speakers of both Houses jointly with the understanding that they will see as far as practicable that Private Bills, exclusive of Divorce Bills, be introduced one-half in each House.

I would like to ask the honourable the Speaker of the Senate what has been done to give effect to that resolution.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: Honourable gentlemen, at the commencement of the Session Honourable Mr. Lemieux, Speaker of the House of Commons, and myself, had an interview with the Law Clerk of the House of Commons, who stated that at that time there were, I think, about six Private Bills which had come before him; that he had suggested to some members of the House of Commons in whose names Bills had been placed that they should ask honourable members of this Chamber to take charge of three of those Bills, but the members of the House of Commons objected strongly to doing so, saying they preferred to introduce them into the Commons. There did not seem to be any way in which the matter could be dealt with, and since that time no further steps have been taken.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: That is not very consoling.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: We shall probably have to appoint another joint committee in order to see if we cannot succeed in discovering a plan whereby the introduction of private legislation, at all events, may be divided between the two Houses. I once suggested a very simple plan: it was that all private petitions and Private Bills should be sent to one official, who would receive them for the two branches of Parliament, would number the bills, and give the odd numbers to one Chamber and the even numbers to the other. In that way we could get our 50 per cent proportion.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS ADMINISTRATION

MOTION FOR SPECIAL COMMITTEE

The Senate resumed from June 5 the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Bennett:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to inquire into and to report from time to time upon:—

(a) The statements and charges in regard to administration of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine and Canadian National Railways, made by Honourable J. D. Taylor in this Chamber on May 8th of the present year.

(b) The acquisition of the property in Paris, France, known as the "Scribe Hotel," and all dealings, transactions and payments in relation to said property.

(c) The employment or engagement of one Aronivici by the said Canadian National Railways, the services performed by him, if any, and the commission, salary or other remuneration paid to him by or on behalf of the said Canadian National Railways.

(d) The system of the purchase of supplies for the use of or in connection with the said Canadian National Railway System.

(e) The deposit by and withdrawal of the Canadian National Railway Company of $1,000,000 of public funds in or about the month of May, 1923, with the Home Bank of Canada.

(f) Generally all questions, matters and things, which in the discretion of the Committee, arise out of or incidental to the foregoing matters, or which the Committee deem to be necessary to inquire into.

(g) That the said inquiry shall be subject to the condition that no matter, of operation or of management taking place in the year 1924, inquiry into which would in the opinion of the Management of the said system be prejudicial to the property of the system or its proper operation, shall be made subject of investigation.

(h) That the said Committee be composed of the Honourable Messrs.

(i) That the said Committee be empowered to take evidence under oath and to send for persons, papers and records and to employ such clerical and other aid as the Committee deem necessary for the purpose of the inquiry.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have requested the honourable gentleman from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Taylor) to further adjourn this debate in order that we may hear delegations on the Branch Line Bills now before the Railway Committee. Inasmuch as this is one of the most important pieces of legislation which we have to deal with, and would ordinarily come before the Committee of the Whole House, I think we should try to expedite matters by disposing of it while the Commons are leaving us some freedom of movement. We have very little on the Order Paper, but must prepare for the avalanche which comes in the last weeks of the Session. I think the honourable gentleman from New Westminster agrees to the suspension of this discussion for a day or even more. My idea was that we might return here on Monday or Monday evening, and I would suggest that he should postpone this discussion until Monday evening so that those who are interested may have an opportunity to read the reports now before the House. However, I am in the honourable gentleman's hands as to that.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Honourable gentlemen, I will readily accede to the request of the honourable gentleman if the Senate will first be good enough to permit me a few words of personal explanation, which will not take many minutes.

In the report laid on the Table last night, being the findings of Mr. Temple on what he calls "The Captain Boyd Complaint," there are some personal references to me on pages 4, 5 and 6, which I am content to let go with the description that they are entirely inaccurate. That is all I have to say so far as the personal references are concerned. But two of them involve other people. I read on page 5:

> The Senator states that he had frequently written all of Captain Boyd's letters for him, for the reason that Boyd was foolish. I tried to get a fuller explanation of what this meant, and he told me that Boyd could not look after himself, that he was simple-minded everywhere else but on his ship.

As to that, honourable gentlemen, I wish to say that it is an absolutely cruel distortion of the conversation I had with Mr. Temple. I have nothing but respect for Captain Boyd, whom I have represented everywhere as a most estimable citizen. I did say to Mr. Temple—in reply to the cruel reflection of his President on Captain Boyd that he was a man of no character and no ability, and another unkindly reference by another high officer, to which I have referred—that there could be no foundation at all for those aspersions; but that I would admit that Captain Boyd, like many another sailor man, was not so expert at handling himself ashore as I thought he would be in handling his ship at sea. I said to Mr. Temple that for that reason I had endeavoured to protect Captain Boyd as well as I could, in writing certain letters for him. I wish to say that I have no idea that Captain Boyd is either simple-minded or foolish in the sinister acceptance of those terms.

There is another reference on page 6, where Mr. Temple says respecting Senator Taylor:

> He also told Mr. Knight that he had had an interview with Mr. Butler, who was third officer on the Farmer, and that Butler had told him quite a lot. "He did not open right out," but he is sure if he were worked he would come through with the whole thing.

I may say that is entirely inaccurate. I do not know Mr. Butler; I have never seen him; I have had no communication from him, direct or indirect; I know he was an officer on the ship. Mr. Knight, who is reputed to have said this, I know is a reputable officer of the Investigation Department. I think Mr. Knight confounds Butler with another officer of whom I told him something of this kind. I mention this because I do not wish to hear the reply, on behalf of Butler, that he never told any such thing. He never did.

With these explanations, I move that the debate be further adjourned until to-morrow. To-morrow, if necessary, we can further adjourn it; but I do not think it should drag on too long.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am suggesting Monday because there are 150 pages of evidence here which I will have to read.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Think of all I have to say. I will forget some of it if you put it off too long.

The debate was adjourned.

PILOTAGE EXPENDITURES

INQUIRY

Hon. Mr. DANIEL inquired of the Government:

1. What payments by the Government were made in connection with pilotage matters during the fiscal year ending March 31st, 1924, in the ports of Montreal, Quebec, Halifax, and St. John, respectively, outside of those made from the earnings of the pilots, giving the details of such expenditure for each port.

2. What is the reason that superannuation allowances are allowed and paid by the Government to retired pilots in the port of Quebec only, and not in the other ports of the Dominion.

3. Is it the intention of the Government to grant to retired pilots in the other ports of the Dominion over which the Government exercises authority, the same assistance it gives to retired Quebec pilots? If not, why not?

On account of an arrangement entered into in 1906 between the pilots of the Quebec Pilotage District in good standing and the Department of Marine and Fisheries, for the following reasons: (a) reducing the number of pilots; (b) adding to the length of the district by 20 miles. The amount granted for this purpose must have the approval of Parliament and voted annually and applies only to those who were in the service at that time.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READING

Bill 18, an Act respecting a Certain Patent of the Fleischmann Company.—Hon. Mr. Bradbury.

THIRD READING

Hon. Mr. Barnard moved the third reading of Bill S4, an Act respecting Certain Patents owned by the Canadian Summer Iron Works, Limited.

Hon. Mr. REID: I would like to have an explanation of what this patent really is, from whoever is in charge of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. BARNARD: This, honourable gentlemen, is a Bill to validate certain patents relating to saw-mill machinery, which had expired, and which belonged to a company which was manufacturing in a very large way in the city of Vancouver. The matter was gone into very carefully, and the facts were proven by an affidavit before the Private Bills Committee, who unanimously recommended the passage of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I have frequently raised a question in regard to similar Bills, and I do not feel like allowing my honourable friend to escape. Whenever a Bill of that kind is read the second time it is supported by some affidavit.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: This is the third reading.

Hon. Mr. BARNARD: An affidavit was produced—a very lengthy one.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The Bill is merely to give power to the Commissioner of Patents to determine whether the patent should be continued or not. It does not make the patent valid, but merely enables the Commissioner to exercise jurisdiction. The time for making application had expired. The applicants were two or three months late. If they had applied to the Commissioner of Patents a few months sooner, he would have had jurisdiction. As they failed to apply within the prescribed time, he has no jurisdiction, and the purpose of this Bill is merely to give him the necessary authority. A number of Bills of the same nature have been passed in this House.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time and passed.

DIVORCE BILLS

THIRD READINGS

Hon. G. V. WHITE moved the third reading of Bill Z4, an Act for the relief of Katherine Gossage.

Hon. SIR JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable gentlemen, I purpose moving an amendment to this Bill, and a similar amendment will be applicable to all the Divorce Bills that come before us during the remainder of the Session. The Committee on Divorce, for the commendable purpose of shortening up the Bills and curing what they deemed to be an anomaly, considered it desirable to omit a clause which had appeared for many years, granting the petitioner the right to marry again, but remaining silent as to the respondent. Though granted no right to re-marry, the respondent married again without any hesitation. Upon the Bills which were sanctioned by this House going down to the Commons, the Private Bills Committee of that House took exception to the omission of this particular clause. Being very faithful to tradition and precedent, they considered it undesirable to omit a provision which had appeared in Divorce Bills from Confederation down to the present time. The two Committees held a conference, and, the Senate Committee being for peace, we said we were not wedded to this amendment, and accordingly consented to the restoration of the old clause to which the Commons Committee attached so much value.

It seems that the Bills now coming before the Senate will have to be amended in accordance with the arrangement which both Committees have agreed upon. In addition to this, there will be probably sixty or seventy Bills presented to-day from the Commons, in which it will be necessary to restore the clause. Without making the motion in regard to each Bill, I would ask the House to permit the amendments to be made forthwith. Thus we shall avoid a great deal of repetition, not only in the Orders of the Day, but also in the Journals. When the Bills come from the Commons I shall move concurrence in the Commons amendment.

I therefore move in amendment that the word "not" be inserted before the word "now" and the following added at the end of the motion: "but that the Bill be amended by striking out section 1 and substituting the following:

> The said marriage between Katherine Gossage and Thomas Gossage, her husband, is hereby dissolved and shall be henceforth null and void to all intents and purposes whatsoever.
>
> 2. The said Katherine Gossage may at any time hereafter marry any man she might lawfully marry if the said marriage with the said Thomas Gossage had not been solemnized.

The amendment of Hon. Sir James Lougheed was agreed to.

The Bill, as amended, was read the third time and passed.

The following Bills were similarly amended, read the third time and passed:

Bill A5, an Act for the relief of Alice Moore.—Hon. W. B. Ross.

Bill B5, an Act for the relief of Alexander Cruikshank—Hon. Mr. Ross (Middleton).

Bill C5, an Act for the relief of Francis Albert Armstrong.—Hon. W. B. Ross.

Bill D5, an Act for the relief of Edythe Kathleen Victoria Canniff.—Hon. W. B. Ross.

Bill E5, an Act for the relief of Helen Tuer. —Hon. Mr. McCoig.

Bill F5, an Act for the relief of Gordon Allingham.—Hon. Mr. Pardee.

Bill H5, an Act for the relief of Rosie Race. —Hon. Mr. Robertson.

BANKRUPTCY BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. HAYDON moved the second reading of Bill I5, an Act to amend The Bankruptcy Act.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Will the honourable gentleman explain what this Bill covers?

Hon. Mr. HAYDON: Honourable gentlemen, the Bill is a proposal to amend section 20 of the Bankruptcy Act. The information, so far as I have it, comes to me from solicitors in the city of Toronto. Section 20 of the Bankruptcy Act provides that:

(2) The permission given for the purposes of this section.

That is, permission from the trustee to solicitors to represent him—

—shall not be a general permission to do all or any of the above-mentioned things.

That is, to bring actions, defend actions in the courts, etc.

There have been some interpretations given by the Judge in Bankruptcy and by the courts, I understand, restricting the application of this clause, and the intention of the amendment is to give a larger freedom and a wider interpretation, and to settle some doubts that seem to exist on such judgments as have been given thus far.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: What was the original section?

Hon. Mr. HAYDON: I am sorry I have not the whole of it, but section 20, subsection 1 of the Act says:

The trustee may, with the permission in writing of the inspectors, do all or any of the following things.

That is a series of things, some of them, for instance are:

(c) Bring, institute, or defend any action or other legal proceeding relating to the property of the debtor;

(d) Employ a solicitor or other agent to take any proceedings or do any business, which may be sanctioned by the inspectors.

Then, there is a restricting clause:

(2) The permission given for the purposes of this section shall not be a general permission to do all or any of the above-mentioned things but shall only be a permission to do the particular thing or things or class of thing or things which the written permission specifies.

The proposed amendment is in the following words:

Provided, however, that the inspectors may by resolution authorize the trustee to retain or appoint solicitors, in which event it shall not be necessary for the trustee to obtain permission in writing from the inspectors to employ a solicitor or solicitors as set out in subsection (1) of this section and paragraphs (c) and (d) thereof, and the authority contained in any such resolution shall be sufficient to authorize the trustee to retain solicitors in any matter which he deems necessary without further authority or permission from the inspectors or creditors.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: That is to give lawyers a chance to charge more costs, is it not? I do not think that that Bill should be passed in a hurry.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Does the information that has reached the honourable gentleman come from more than one section? Is this a resolution from the Bar Association, or does the suggestion come from merely one firm of solicitors, or a single solicitor, or does it come from trustees or others who have had experience with the Act?

Hon. Mr. HAYDON: I do not know of any resolution. I am sorry if my information is insufficient. I did not know that I would have to give an explanation at this time. If it is in accordance with the usages or rules of the Senate, and would be agreeable to the House, this Bill might go to Committee, and I could then be ready to make a full explanation of it.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I think perhaps the honourable gentleman would be well advised if he let the Bill stand over until next week.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Except that we might agree to send it to the Banking and Commerce Committee.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I doubt if you would need to do that at all if it stands over.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Last year we had amendments to the Bankruptcy Act, which went to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Well, send it there now; that would be satisfactory.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time, and referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at 3 p.m.

SOUTHERN NEW ENGLAND RAILWAY

INQUIRY AND DISCUSSION

Hon. G. D. ROBERTSON rose in accordance with the following notice:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the necessity and desirability of completing the Southern New England Railway; and will enquire from the Government as to its intention respecting it?

He said: Honourable gentlemen, in giving notice of this inquiry my desire was to bring to the attention of this House and of the Government an opportunity of greatly extending the traffic and business of the Canadian National Railway System, rendering it more profitable, the business to be obtained being from new territory and not involving competition with any existing Canadian railway. I will undertake to be reasonably brief, but I desire the opportunity of laying frankly before this House a number of facts respecting this matter which I think will be interesting to honourable gentlemen and of course also of interest from the standpoint of the welfare and prosperity of the National System.

Outside of government itself, there is perhaps no domestic question that is of such interest or so important to the Canadian people as our railway problem. In view of the fact that over two billions of dollars represent the liabilities of the Canadian National Railroad to-day, as shown in the last annual report, and that the accumulated deficits, as per item No. 784 of that report, show a total to date of over $283,000,000, it surely devolves upon Parliament and upon the people of the country to give serious consideration to ways and means whereby that debit balance may at least be not increased, if it cannot be reduced at the moment.

The history of our Canadian National Railways in the past few years has demonstrated clearly to all concerned and interested that the solution of our problem is the increasing of the traffic to be handled over the mileage now existing, and the construction of such additional mileage as will be profitable, either immediately when it is finished or at a reasonably early date.

During the past four years we have witnessed with satisfaction the gradual reduction in cost of operation. That is to say, it costs less to earn a dollar as each year goes by. I think that in 1919 or 1920 it was costing about $1.28 to earn $1. That was reduced step by step in the succeeding years until it was cut down in 1923 to I think 92 cents. Meanwhile the business handled by the railway had substantially increased. This indicates that if the tonnage to be handled can be increased, the cost correspondingly decreases, and if we can reach the point where the traffic is increased sufficiently, the road will be self-sustaining. Therefore when an opportunity presents itself by the construction of a short piece of railway, which will be not only self-sustaining but very profitable from its inception, it seems to me that it merits our consideration in detail for a few moments.

The Canadian National Railway lines in 1922 earned in gross revenue the sum of $234,000,000, or a rate of $10,709 per mile; and it cost in that year 98.77 cents to earn each dollar that the railroad took in. In 1923 the business increased to $254,000,000, an increase of $20,000,000 in gross revenue. The Company was operating 21,850 miles of line that earned an average of $11,218 per mile. As a result of that increase in gross earnings and the increased earnings per mile of the line, the operating cost was reduced from 98.77 to 92.6 cents.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: May I ask the honourable gentleman where this railroad is? We could follow him better.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I will come to that in just a moment, if my honourable friend will bear with me.

I was attempting to show at the beginning that as the traffic increases the cost of operation correspondingly decreases, and the operating ratio therefore shows better prospects of profitable results.

The Central Vermont Railway, a line 371 miles in length, extending from Montreal, or, to be exact, from St. Johns, Quebec, to New London, Connecticut, running almost directly north and south, is a part of the Canadian National System. It was for many years controlled, and the majority of the stock was owned, by the Grand Trunk Railroad, and during that period—about 1910, I think—the Grand Trunk Railway under the then existing management conceived the desirability of constructing a line from Palmer, Massachusetts, to Providence, Rhode Island. Palmer, Mass., is 65 miles north of the southern terminus of the line at New London, and 306 miles south of the city of Montreal. From Palmer, Mass., the main line of the Central Vermont to Providence, Rhode Island, the distance is 78 miles.

The State of Rhode Island has no railroad whatever except the New York and

New Haven system, and southern Massachusetts and eastern Connecticut are served almost exclusively by that same railway. I will show to honourable gentlemen shortly that the industrial development of that area of the New England States has been so great, the traffic is so heavy and so congested at the present time, and has been so heavy and so congested for some years past, that the railroad now serving the area is quite unable adequately to take care of the business offered. The New York and New Haven Railroad itself would welcome the construction of this particular line that I will bring to your attention to-night.

The Central Vermont Railroad has never been regarded as a profitable adjunct of the Grand Trunk or the Canadian National Railways, so far as the earning power of the Central Vermont itself is concerned. It showed a deficit last year of $1,078,000. But that is a conclusion that one reaches from a superficial survey When one analyses what the Central Vermont is to the Canadian National System, one arrives at another conclusion. The Central Vermont Railroad is the only avenue that the National Railway has by which to reach New England points, and through it flows a very substantial amount of traffic from Canadian to American points, and vice versa. But, in addition to that, the great proportion of the Central Vermont traffic is traffic that originates at New England points and is destined for points west of the Detroit frontier, and even beyond the Chicago gateway; and the Central Vermont is the distributing instrument for a large amount of traffic which originates west of the Detroit river, and even west of Chicago, and which is conveyed by the National Railways through Canada. Therefore the Central Vermont, even though the proportion of earnings that it brings may not seem to make it a paying proposition, yet is the feeder and the distributing agent for a tremendous traffic which now passes over the Canadian National Railways between the Detroit frontier and Montreal, and which is profitable. Notwithstanding that the Central Vermont does not at present pay its own way, yet it is true and encouraging to realize that its gross earnings last year were $8,627,000, on a total mileage of 592 miles, including branch lines, or $14,574 per mile—which is $3,865 per mile more than the average for the entire Canadian National Railway System. I point that out to honourable gentlemen in order that you may appreciate the force of the argument that I have presented with reference to increased traffic resulting in decreased operating expenses; for when you look at the operating ratio of the Central Vermont you find that it is to-day 88.98 as compared with 92.6 on the Canadian National—a further evidence of the fact that increased volume of traffic results in lower operating costs. Therefore if the business handled by the Central Vermont, as a tributary to or a feeder for the National Railways, can be substantially increased, it certainly means that the Central Vermont is an asset instead of a liability and at the same time affords further profitable business to the Canadian National itself.

As to the territory that is to be served by this road, the Central Vermont, as I pointed out, runs from Montreal to New London, Connecticut, a distance of 371 miles. New London is situated at the head of Long Island Sound, and there is a boat service in connection with the railway from New London, Connecticut, to New York. But New London is the terminus of the railway.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: How much of that is in Canadian territory?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: None whatever.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: From Montreal to St. Johns?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: There are probably 45 miles to St. Armand, Quebec, which is near the boundary.

In the States of Rhode Island, Connecticut, Massachusetts, and Vermont there are 6,187,000 people, and this line, if built, will directly serve about a million and a half of people. It will serve in the State of Rhode Island alone more than 10,000 business concerns of various sorts. I will give you some details as to the development of the industrial life of that territory. Around Narraganset Bay the development has been phenomenal and almost unbelievable during the last ten or fifteen years. There are reasons for it, some of which I intend to point out to the House. You will realize the significance of this statement when I say that the State of Rhode Island alone, which on the map is only about the size of a postage stamp, contains 640,000 people at the present time. The manufactured products in 1914 were valued at $285,000,000, and in 1923, at $1,078,000,000. Three years prior to 1914 the Grand Trunk Railroad had deemed it advisable to construct this line, and the capital was provided for its commencement at least, and the construction undertaken; and if I remember correctly, during the years of 1911 and 1912, it was actively prosecuted, with the result that by the end of the second year something like seven million odd dollars had been spent, the right of way had been wholly purchased and paid for, and the grading entirely completed. In addition, the concrete and other materials used in the foundations for bridges, etc., were finished. Bridges were ordered. The laws of the states through which the road passed were rather stringent with regard to high level crossings. I think that there are something like 62 high level crossings in these 78 miles of railway, and the abutments and approaches for these high level crossings are complete to-day, and have been since 1912. There are 44 bridges for these overhead crossings that were fabricated at the time and are still complete and available for use. So this is not the commencement of a new project; it is the completion of a project that was considered necessary in 1911, and the necessity for which has increased at least four-fold since that time.

It is estimated that it will take about $7,000,000 more to complete the road. There is in the city of Providence property purchased and cleared that will accommodate nearly 2,000 railroad cars, in the heart of the industrial district, and it is undoubtedly true that, if built, the road would pay handsomely from the beginning.

I mentioned a few moments ago—and I am sorry to have made my remarks somewhat disconnected—the value of the output of the ndustrial plants. I desire to point out also that in 1914 the value of materials imported by these industries was 162½ millions, and in 1923 it increased to 416 millions. Most of the raw material has to be imported. A great deal of it comes in by rail. A very large proportion, indeed the majority of the manufactured goods, have to be shipped out by rail, because they largely go to Canada and the United States Middle West.

The Central Vermont Railway, I understand, the nearest point to Providence being 78 miles away, is not to-day in a position to compete profitably. It must pay the New York and New Haven Railroad an arbitrary on a proportion of the through freight rate if it gets the business from the New Haven at the nearest junction point; but the New Haven, like every other railroad, has followed the practice of hauling the traffic offered and originating on its line as far as possible, and therefore takes it to New York, or to what is commonly known as the Harlem river gateway. The Harlem river gateway has become so congested as a result of increasing business that it has not been and is not able adequately to take care of the traffic offering. The President and the Secretary of the Board of Commerce of the city of Providence, when I was making some investigation into this matter, placed in my hands evidence giving details and dates, with which I will not burden the House, to show that during I think the year 1920 or 1921 there were only 83 days in the 365 when there were not freight embargoes on that railway, and that the people in the New England territory—not only Rhode Island, but Connecticut and Massachusetts—went to points west of the city of New York, where cars were standing on sidings because they could not be moved forward through the congestion at the New York terminals, and unloaded hundreds of carloads of automobiles, and drove them to their destinations in the New England States. Those people are crying out for the service that can be given by the Canadian National from the Detroit frontier via St. Albans, Vermont, into this intensely populated territory.

I would also point out that there has been a marvellous increase in the business exchanged between Canada and the United States. Surely it is not improper to suggest that the Canadian National Railways, as far as possible, should carry the traffic that originates in our own country as near to its destination as possible. A tremendous quantity of Canadian products goes into this very territory. I could quote from one of our leading newspapers, the Montreal Gazette, which in February last referred to the fact that more than $71,000,000 more of Canadian business went to the United States in 1923 than in the year previous, and that during February, 1924, we sold $30,500,000 of goods to the United States and only $15,000,000, to Great Britain. This will enable honourable gentlemen to appreciate the importance of adequate transportation facilities to carry those goods as near as possible to their destination and with the greatest profit to our own railway.

Now may I give the House a little idea of the industries and their size, and the number of employees that they have in the city of Providence alone—and when I refer to Providence, I refer to Greater Providence, which includes Pawtucket and Lincoln and one other municipality.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Woonsocket.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Municipalities which are to Providence what Westmount, Maisonneuve and Notre Dame de Grace are to Montreal. Within that area there are 19 enormous cotton mills that employ 39,000 people; there are 72 woolen mills that employ 28,000 people; there are 19 knitting mills that employ 14,000 people; there are 16 rubber factories that employ 9,800 people; there are 9 silk factories that employ 2,700 people; there are 33 bleaching establishments that employ 10,700 hands. And let me say that these establishments are located in that particular place because of what to me was a very peculiar and interesting reason. Probably fifteen years ago it was suggested that the cotton industry, for example, was likely to be lost to the New England States and removed to the Southern States, the question being, why was it not desirable and feasible to manufacture cotton goods where the cotton was grown? There seemed to be no answer to the argument, and as a result a number of cotton factories were built in the Carolinas and Georgia.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: And cheap labour down South.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I am glad to have that admission from my honourable friend rather than to have to make it myself. In addition to that, the transportation of the raw material was also a factor. I was astounded at this growth, and I inquired specifically why it was that the industry was leaving the other territory and coming to this point. The answer was that it was the only territory on the North American continent that had exactly the right climatic conditions, similar to those existing in England, for the manufacture of textiles; that there must be a certain moisture in the air, and that fog and salt water had their influence, especially upon the dying and bleaching industries. That is why these industries were concentrating in that territory.

The territory is also famed, of course, as being the headquarters of the jewelry industry in North America. There are 113 jewelry manufacturing establishment in the locality I have described to say nothing of Connecticut and Massachusetts, that employ 10,300 hands; and there are 90 institutions manufacturing hardware and machinery, that employ 24,500 hands, making a total of 139,000 hands in the plants I have named, in that small territory, which looks like a postage stamp on the map, and which is populated by three-quarters of a million people.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: What are the raw materials imported from Canada by these industries?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: My honourable friend will perhaps recall that I did not state that raw materials going from Canada entered particularly into these commodities. But there are paper mills, for instance, down there. That is one of the outlets for a very important Canadian product. In addition to that, since my honourable friend from De Lanaudière (Hon. Mr. Casgrain) has referred to cheaper labour in the South, I would say to him that a very large proportion of the labour that is to be obtained in the New England States is of the good French-Canadian type, skilled in this sort of work, and that there are apprentices available to be taught by experts. That is another of the reasons why this industry immigrated back to this territory instead of remaining in the South.

I think I have, perhaps, given some reasons why it is desirable to get access for our Canadian National railways to a territory so densely populated and so highly industrialized when traffic can be carried to and from it, not only over this 78 miles of line which I think should be built, and when profits will accrue to the Canadian National railway.

There was another startling fact that presented itself to me on looking into this matter. If honourable gentlemen will pardon a diversion, I may say it was two years ago, I think, that this question was referred to in some way in this House. I suggested caution at that time, and said the matter should be carefully investigated before being endorsed. After having expressed that opinion, I felt that probably it was as fitting that I should make the investigation as that someone else should do it. That is one of the reasons, in addition to the fact that the opportunity presented itself, why I took some interest in the question. The other fact that I referred to was that the construction and completion of the Panama Canal has had a tremendous bearing upon and has caused an important change in the routing of traffic between the Eastern States and the Pacific slope. I will just give an illustration. I saw a lumber yard in the city of Providence which was only two years old. It covered approximately 100 acres of land. Three years ago it was not there. It was opened in 1922, and there was brought around, through the Panama Canal from Puget Sound ports, 40,000,000 feet of lumber. That lumber was not used in the State of Rhode Island alone, but was distributed as far west as the State of Ohio, and it was said that it could be sent in that way, even to the city of Chicago, at a less cost from the standpoint of freight rates than by the overland car rate from Seattle to Chicago. In 1923 that business had prospered so that they increased their sailings from once every two weeks to once every ten days, and they sold in 1923 60,000,000 feet of the products of the Pacific slope lumber camps. In 1924 the programme is to increase the sailing to one every week, and this year their programme is to handle 100,000,000 feet.

When one concern is bringing into that territory 100,000,000 feet of lumber a year, honourable gentlemen can easily estimate what it will mean in carload lots and railway traffic. It is all new business in addition to what was there before. That is only one industry of a number, but it is one that came forcibly to my attention. The boats in that service are 8,000-ton boats, and have to go back for another cargo, and they are willing and ready and anxious to carry freights back to American Pacific coast ports at a reasonable and indeed a nominal rate. Honourable gentlemen can go down there and see going into those boats carloads of freight that otherwise would go west overland, and this means an increased railway traffic in each direction.

In my humble opinion that is the principal explanation of the congestion of the railroads of the United States that touch the Atlantic seaboard. That change in the routing of traffic has come to stay, and as it becomes better known it will become increasingly profitable, and the result will be a constantly increasing trade in that direction. I saw 72 carloads of automobiles standing on the tracks down there waiting to be loaded into boats. Those automobiles were manufactured in Detroit and adjacent cities, that being the automobile centre. I inquired from the railway people as to the division of the earnings on that traffic, because I realized at once that if business in large quantities could be brought in that direction, it was profitable not only to this little bit of railroad that I speak of, but to the whole Canadian National system. I found that for the month of March this year 92 carloads had come down over the Canadian National and Central Vermont railways from Detroit. On each car the Central Vermont earned $73.09, but on the same traffic the Canadian National earned $136.26.

My point is that if we can, by the completion of this 78 miles of line, get access to that intensely populated and highly industrialized area, and carry American traffic from the Central Vermont to the Atlantic seaboard and help out the congestion there, which we are urged to do, and at the same time get return business, it is good for the Canadian National railways as a whole, it is good for Canada as a whole, particularly when it is not taking this traffic from any other competing Canadian railroad. There is in my opinion little virtue in building railroads in Canada to divert traffic from other Canadian roads. That does not benefit the people of Canada, because either the Canadian Pacific railway or the Canadian National railway is giving very good service. But if we can go into this new territory where business has extended to such a point that present facilities are unable to cope with it, and can bring traffic to the Canadian National System, it is good business for the railroad and for Canada.

The estimated cost of the completion of these 78 miles of road is about $7,000,000. That will put the road in operation and equip it, and build terminals and all that is required.

But there is another feature that is more serious. The States concerned, which have granted charters, have already given intimation of their intention of requiring that the property be restored to its original condition if the railroad is not completed. It is estimated that this will cost $5,000,000. I do not think any one wants to throw away $5,000,000 to fill up the hole that has been dug down there. I think it would be much better business to complete the line and put it into operation. Not only would the road carry itself handsomely, but it would put the Central Vermont on its feet, and would be an important and profitable factor to the Canadian National Railways.

I consulted business men in the city of Providence, who stated several other interesting facts. They stated that the State of Rhode Island was not only the smallest in the Union, but also one of the wealthiest, being 38th in point of wealth and 39th in point of population. They said: "We want that road so badly that if the Canadian National Railways will guarantee the bonds, the money can be raised right here in the State of Rhode Island, and it will not cost Canada a cent." I suggest, honourable gentlemen, that it is good business to give them the opportunity, and I implore the Government to give immediate consideration to this important problem and aid in making our Canadian National Railway a success, help to make the Central Vermont railroad a paying proposition instead of a burden, and at the same time render a valuable service to our country.

Hon. J. P. B. CASGRAIN: The honourable gentleman has spoken very well indeed, and shows a thorough knowledge of railway operation and of the localities of which he has spoken, and so on; but I may say that I have always remembered the Central Vermont Railroad, with which I am familiar, as showing a loss and being a drag, even under the private ownership of the Grand Trunk. The honourable gentleman forgets that it would be the money of the taxpayers of Canada that would actually go to the building of this railroad in the United States. We have already got 1,600 miles of railroads in the United States, which are run by the taxpayers of Canada. Perhaps the honourable gentleman knows better than I do, and if I am wrong he will correct me, but I doubt very much if there is one of those lines in that wealthy country which is not run at a loss to the taxpayers of this country, except the line from Chicago to Sarnia. That line, I am told, is a great feeder of the Grand Trunk system, and I have heard, on many occasions, that in a normal year the Grand Trunk Railway got from that line 63 cents of every dollar it earned. But honourable gentlemen must remember that the Grand Trunk Railway system is after all an American railway. It begins in Chicago, where it has wonderful terminal facilities—I do not know of any railroad in the United States that has better facilities in Chicago; it runs through Canada for the sake of convenience, and ends in Portland. It is an American road which takes a short cut through Canada. I am really astonished, when you consider that we have Government operation, that the honourable gentleman should suggest that we should try to run roads in the United States under Government operation. The United States themselves have tried Government operation, and surely they were in just as good a position as we are to operate in their own country. Nevertheless, the amount lost every day ran into millions, and in addition the roads were left without improvements and maintenance of way; and railway authorities say that it will take fifteen years from the time the Government stopped operating the roads in the United States to put them in as good condition as they were in when they were taken over.

The honourable gentleman said the Vermont Central received $14,000 per mile, which is much more than is received by any railroad in Canada. The Canadian Pacific east of the Great Lakes receives $11,000 per mile gross receipts, and in the prairie provinces of the West $8,000 per mile. I do not know what the Canadian National railways are getting, but, judging by the general results, they cannot be getting as much. Here is this road getting $14,000 per mile, and still running at a loss. Are we to extend it by 78 miles in the United States, under Government ownership, when the American people could not make their roads pay? It is said that $5,000,000 spent by the Grand Trunk in buying right of way, I suppose, and so on, will be lost; but if this is such a good proposition, can you understand the people there—they are fine people—not doing the work themselves? They are willing to take our bonds—the bonds of the Dominion of Canada—and it will not cost us a cent. We have tried that game of giving bonds before. We gave them to Mackenzie and Mann and others. It has cost this country something. We would have to pay the coupons on those bonds; there is no doubt about that. So I do not think it is any favour at all for these wealthy gentlemen in Providence, Rhode Island, to say to us that they will accept Canadian Government bonds. I do not think that is any inducement at all, because there would be interest to pay. Would they do it without interest—with no coupons?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: If my honourable friend will permit an interruption—I never suggested the issue of bonds by the Canadian Government at all.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: A guarantee.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I stated to the House that my information from responsible gentlemen in the city of Providence was that the money necessary to complete the line could be raised there without difficulty. The Canadian National Railways would guarantee the bonds. Now, I am aware that I should not discuss the question further—

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Certainly, certainly.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: But there was one point I forgot to mention, and that I think is of some importance. During the month of April 409 cars passed through St. Albans, Vermont, which is the headquarters of the Central Vermont, from points off the Canadian National Railroad, destined to the city of Providence. What occurred in the month of April—and it occurs practically every month in the year, because the business is regular and the traffic flows in both directions—that will give honourable gentlemen an idea of what the traffic would probably be at the outset. Now, that has to be handed to the connecting lines and hauled a longer distance to its destination, and the connecting lines participate in the revenue of the through route, which has to be divided up. It seems that at the present time the traffic would go say to New London, Connecticut, which is the end of the line, 65 miles beyond Palmer, and then a distance of about 90 miles over the New Haven. If this branch from Palmer to Providence, which is already largely constructed, is completed, a distance of 78 miles, you save the haul from Palmer to New London, 65 miles, over the Central Vermont, and for 13 miles further. You put that traffic into Providence and collect the whole of the revenue, instead of dividing it with another railway. That was an important point that I omitted to call to your attention.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The point that the honourable gentleman raised before making his little speech was that a guarantee was asked from the Canadian National Railways. Well, how can the Canadiain National Railways guarantee anything? Is it not the Canadian Government that would have to go behind it? What would be the value of the guarantee of a system that is running behind year in and year out? It is the Canadian Government—it is rather the taxpayers of Canada—who would have to give the guarantee to these wealthy people. We do not owe them any gratitude at all for offering to take the bonds of Canada on the condition of a guarantee. If the proposition is so good, why do not they guarantee the bonds? Think of all the money in the United States. For instance, you see by the newspapers that money in New York is at 2 or 3 per cent. Why would they not build this wonderful line themselves? I cannot understand why. There may be good reasons, but I cannot understand why they would not build it.

A great deal was made of the lumber. It was said that there were 40,000,000 feet of lumber. Forty millions looked like a large quantity. Then it grew to 60,000,000, and that looked bigger still. And now we are talking of 100,000,000, and you would think that an enormous quantity. But right in this city, at Mr. Booth's mill, they cut much more than that; and our late colleague Senator Edwards used to cut many years ago 125,000,000 or 130,000,000 feet, and we did not make a fuss about it.

The honourable gentleman spoke also about the jewelry that was going to be made there. That would not help the freight very much.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: And raw materials too.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: However, it was very interesting to hear the honourable gentleman's statements. I know it must be an eyesore for people to see the abutments along the sides of the streets. Here in Canada we have to be satisfied with level crossings, but in the United States people have insisted upon overhead crossings, etc.

I say it is a great detriment for Canada to own a single mile of railway in the United States with the exception of the Chicago line. What are we losing already? And here we are a country not diminishing its debt, but increasing it every year. The National Railways are doing business in the United States at a loss. I think we have had enough of it. There are 1,600 miles, from which you must deduct the 400 that I speak of, the line to Chicago. That leaves 1,200 miles on which we are carrying the business of those wealthy Americans at a loss to the taxpayers of Canada. I am against that from start to finish.

Hon. J. D. REID: Honourable gentlemen, I would not like to see this resolution passed without saying a few words on it.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: It is only an inquiry.

Hon. Mr. REID: I have great confidence in the future of the Canadian National Railway System, but I am certainly opposed to what is suggested by this inquiry, and for several reasons. The intention was, I think, to build the road to New London—I believe that was the name of the point on the Atlantic coast. The proposition originated with the Grand Trunk Railway Company fifteen or twenty years ago. At that time the Grand Trunk was a private corporation. It was looking for another port and for traffic to carry over its system and into the United States at the eastern end. The Grand Trunk spent about $7,000,000 on this proposition, but the work was stopped about 1911, and no more money has been spent upon it. I had occasion to examine into this matter, and, while possibly it would provide another port and bring the traffic over the Grand Trunk Railway system, still I could not bring myself to believe, nor was it impressed on me while I was Minister of Railways, that it would be in the interest of the Canadian National System as it now stands to proceed with an expenditure of $7,000,000 to complete that road.

The Canadian National Railway System as it stands at the present time is a combination of several railways; and I have always believed that when it was made into one system the intention of the Government of which I was a member, or any other Government that might succeed it, was to continue to improve and extend the Canadian National Railway System in Canada, in the belief that if it were properly developed in our own country the road would be made a success. If I thought for one moment that in order to make the Canadian National Railway System a success it would be necessary for us to go into the United States and build railways and spend money there, then I for one would be opposed to any further operation of the Canadian National Railways by the people of Canada. The Canadian National Railway runs in territory which is just as good as, if not better than the territory of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and I am confident that, with proper management, like that of the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Canadian National will before many years be an asset, without our having to build railways in the United States.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Private ownership.

Hon. Mr. REID: There is another reason which I would give for not further building railways in the United States. I would like to see our own country have the terminal ports for our great railway system. I would like to see every pound of traffic that passes over our system for foreign countries transferred at St. John or Halifax. The answer that is given to that proposition is that the haul to Portland or to New London, if you build this road, is shorter; but the Canadian Pacific Railway has made money in handling all its traffic at St. John. It is not simply a question of the loss of traffic on a few more miles to St. John, or the loss of the earnings resulting from the goods being transferred or held in our own country. If there are thousands or hundreds of thousands of tons of traffic to be transferred at an ocean port, the work gives employment to thousands of men, and material is required in the transportation of the goods. Thus we are giving employment to citizens of our own country; and, furthermore, we are keeping for our own country, instead of spending abroad, the money paid for freight. Therefore, if for no other reason, I would say, let us build up and use our own ports, in which we can control that traffic, instead of handing it over to the United States a short distance from Montreal.

There are other reasons too. One other reason is this. If we are going to spend money to get traffic in the United States to come over our own road, we ought to know and understand that a law has been passed in the United States providing that traffic that comes from a foreign country and off their own vessels, will be carried over their own railways through their own territory at a cheaper rate than freight that passes through a foreign country. I think that statute is known as the Jones Act. Now that we as a Government own this road, if the United States people believe that their railways are not going to get the traffic that is sent across Canadian territory and finally into American territory again, their Railway Commission will have some law enacted to make it impossible to carry freight on our road at a rate that will pay. They will look after their own traffic and will see to it that what originates in or passes through their territory goes on their own systems, and that they get the whole benefit from it. We place ourselves in the hands of the American Railway Commission if we practically abandon our own ports and route goods over American lines.

Then there is a question that I would like to ask the honourable leader of the Government: whether or not we have power to build railways in a foreign country. True, we are shareholders in a line entering the United States, and I do not suppose the people of the United States would object. In fact, when we took over this railway system we simply acquired the stock. But to start building railways in another country is something which I do not think we have power to do. If we have power now to build railways in the United States, we would have just as much right to build lines in England or any other country. Therefore I think we should hesitate before branching out on a policy of that kind.

The honourable member who spoke on this matter stated that if the Canadian National Railways would guarantee the bonds those people in the United States would produce the money. If I remember the Canadian National Railways Act, the directors of the Canadian National Railways have no power to guarantee bonds without the consent of Parliament. If Parliament approved, they might have power to guarantee the bonds, but I think that in putting through the statute of which I had charge, we inserted a clause providing that the Canadian National Board only controlled operation, and that if bonds were to be guaranteed or any new railways built, it would be necessary to obtain the sanction of Parliament, as honourable gentlemen will see is being done with regard to all the Bills that we are now passing. Therefore, as the guaranteeing of the bonds by the Canadian National Railways would mean that Parliament must sanction the guarantee, the Dominion Government would really be responsible for those bonds. My personal feeling is that I would not on any terms guarantee a bond for one dollar to be spent on any railways that are to be built or any new extensions to be made in connection with the Canadian National Railways, outside of Canada.

The honourable member states that we are losing $7.000,000. I do not think we shall lose a dollar, and I will tell the honourable gentleman why. At the time the Grand Trunk award was made this matter was brought before the arbitrators. They knew that seven or eight millions of dollars had been spent there, and I say—I do not think there is any doubt about it—that they did not consider that the line was worth anything, or it would have been finished long ago. I think they considered that with a great many other liabilities, and we paid when we took over the Grand Trunk. I think we got it with that expenditure practically as a bad debt. So I do not think we are saving $7,000,- or $8,000,000 by going ahead with the construction of this road now.

The honourable gentleman has laid great stress on the character of that territory, but we hear similar expressions about every extension or new railway that is proposed. There are a great many railways in the United States, and many of them in that very territory, and it surprises me that that portion of line down to New London has not been built long ago, if the territory is as good as it is said to be.

I am opposed unalterably to our having any more railways in a foreign country. We are at the mercy of that foreign country in the operation, control, and routing of traffic. If we have $5,000,000 to spare, I would rather see it spent in carrying out some of the contracts that were made by the old Canadian Northern railway and by the Grand Trunk railway many years ago —contracts which have not been carried out, and roads which have not been built, although ordered by the Board of Railway Commissioners. Take, for instance, the terminals at the city of Montreal. An order was made by the Board of Railway Commissioners to raise the tracks of the Grand Trunk railway going into that city. I think every honourable member will agree with me that the terminals in the city of Montreal, so far as the entrance and the station are concerned, are not suitable for such a great railway system. The order of the Board could not be enforced because the answer always was: "We have no money." In the city of Toronto there is the same trouble. The answer is: "We have not money to complete these contracts that were made." If we have not the money to carry out works that we feel are absolutely necessary in our own country, and which can be carried out just as quickly and easily if the Government guarantees the bonds, we should not run into an expenditure of money in a foreign country.

We have unlimited territory in our own country into which we could extend branch lines that would bring in traffic that would be treble what has been spoken of here this evening, and we would have the long haul all the way from the West to the eastern ports. If this were done, the result would be better than we could expect from the haul from Windsor to Montreal on the Grand Trunk. Give us one-quarter of the traffic on that line, and let us haul it all the way from Alberta or Saskatchewan to the East, and it will pay a great deal more than the short haul.

I hesitate to oppose any suggestion made by any honourable member to assist or benefit the Canadian National System. I am as anxious as any citizen of Canada to see it made a success, and to give any help possible to the Management towards that end. But I do oppose, and always will oppose, any suggestion that we should go over to the United States and expend money and develop part of that country in order to make the Canadian National railways a success. If I ever come to the conclusion that Canada is not big enough to develop the Canadian National Railway within its own borders, I will gladly admit it.

I do not object to the deficits at the present time. I knew there would be deficits, because the system had to be linked up, and I give credit to the Management for what they have done. The only suggestion I have had to make was that we should not build railways or do work on lines that would lose money until expenses and receipts more nearly balanced. If the Management of the Canadian National Railways keep on doing the good work they have done, the future of the system is assured; but I implore them, in the interest of Canada, not only now, but for the next fifty or one hundred years, to stand by Canadian ports and to build them up. If that is done, Halifax and St. John will be equal to Portland at least, and I would not be surprised if they became very much larger cities. My advice would be: "Do not spend money at present on this line." It would really be encouraging the railways to build up another American port, and saying to them: "You have the right to abandon St. John and Halifax"—a proposition that I will oppose as long as I am able.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, we should be grateful to the honourable member (Hon. Mr. Robertson) who has put this inquiry on the Order Paper for drawing the attention of this Chamber to the situation which confronts us. An asset of $7,000,000 lies across the line unproductive.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: $5,000,000.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: $7,000,000.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The matter has not come before the other Chamber, as far as I am aware, and it is but just that the public and Parliament should be informed of the facts. I know that at the inception of the work of the Canadian National Board under the Presidency of Sir Henry Thornton the question now under discussion had to be considered, because our charter rights were about to expire in some of those States. I do not know what our situation is to-day, or if we are near the time when those charter rights will end. I will move the adjournment of this debate in order to ascertain what conclusions the Board of Management of the Canadian National Railways has come to, in relation to this projected line.

The debate was adjourned.

PORT OF TORONTO ADVANCES

INQUIRY

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN inquired of the Government:

1. What amounts, if any, have been advanced to date for the port of Toronto?
2. If so, has the interest on these advances been paid regularly?
3. If not, why?
4. Is it the intention of the Government to collect these arrears, if any?
5. If so, when?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have an answer from the Department of Marine and Fisheries, as follows:

1. No advances have been made by the Department of Marine and Fisheries. All expenditures by the Government for Harbour facilities at Toronto have been made by the Department of Public Works.

I find, by an answer to a similar question in the House of Commons, that the expenditure by the Public Works Department from 1912 to 1923 inclusive was $7,068,366.47. This being an expenditure by the Public Works Department, I would draw the inference that no interest is expected upon the expenditure.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: So the money is lost.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The money is spent.

INCOME WAR TAX BILL

FIRST READING

Bill 143, an Act to amend the Income War Tax Act.—Hon. Mr. Dandurand.

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have been asked to submit this Bill for a second reading, and to take it up in Commitee this evening, if such a proposal meet with the unanimous consent of the House. For that purpose I would ask leave of the House to move the second reading of the Bill.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Honourable gentlemen, I have no objection to this Bill getting its second reading, but is a very important Bill and requires very careful examination. I think there is likely to be a considerable discussion on the Bill, and I would suggest to the honourable gentleman that he take the second reading to-night and refer the Bill to the Finance Committee.

The main difficulty about the Bill, so far as I have anything to say about it now, is in connection with making the Income Tax a lien on a man's assets. This is creating interminable confusion all over the country from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I draw my honourable friend's attention to the fact that his complaint is against the lien which existed last year, and that this Bill contains a clause qualifying it. We could perhaps read the Bill a second time this evening, and put it down for the Committee stage to-morrow. In the meantime, my honourable friend will have an opportunity of looking into the Bill. I draw the attention of my honourable friend to the fact that "section 25 of the said Act, as enacted by section 10 of chapter 52 of the Statutes of 1923, is repealed and the following substituted therefor."

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Yes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: So that henceforth the lien will only avail after a date has been fixed, and all encumbrances, mortgages, or privileges which precede the mailing of the notice of assessment will rank ahead of this lien. I think this means a considerable improvement upon last year's legislation.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: May I point out the hardship that was created under the Bill of last year? The Bill made provision for a lien upon all land owned by parties chargeable with the payment of Income Tax. The consequence was, no lien being registered in the registry office of the district within which the land lay, an inquiry in Ottawa as to the lien upon the land was necessitated. For instance, I myself had a very important transaction in the city of Vancouver, and a requisition was made upon me to satisfy the purchaser that there was no lien. Under the Act of last year there would have been a lien upon every foot of land that the individual owned from the Atlantic to the Pacific, entirely irrespective of the title being clear in the registry office. The consequence was that inquiry had to be made in Ottawa, and there was no machinery by which one could telegraph from any centre in Canada and get a certificate. This necessitated a search being made not only in the Department of Finance, but in the Customs Department, to satisfy those who served requisitions that there was no cloud upon the title. It is incomprehensible to me how honourable gentlemen on the other side of the House, astute lawyers particularly like my honourable friend from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) and my honourable friend from Sarnia (Hon. Mr. Pardee) permitted that Bill to pass.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: What about the Opposition?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We were relying to such an extent upon the Government submitting legislation which would be practicable and which was in the public interest that we did not pay very much attention to it. But I must say that in all my experience of legislation I never encountered anything that operated to such an extent as the legislation of last year to cast a cloud upon a title. I am very glad this Bill has come before us this year, so that we may analyse the situation and bring this feature into conformity with the registration laws of the different provinces.

A question might possibly arise as to whether the Dominion Government by the legislation of last year had authority to supersede the priority which all charges against land had in the registry offices of the Dominion. A very serious constitutional question could have been raised, and now is the proper time, it seems to me, to investigate this subject, so that we will not be again charged with allowing legislation to pass through this House at any rate by which every foot of land in the Dominion may have a cloud upon the title.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: That is only a part of the difficulty. It is a lien on the whole of a man's assets. Under the change, instead of making it a first charge, and making this lien supersede registered mortgages and judgments, the lien upon the land will now come in after registered judgments. But it is still a lien upon a man's assets, and a man purchasing personal property is supposed to purchase it quite safely if he has no notice of a lien. But suppose a man is selling goods—he has horses or cattle or hay—this lien is on his personal property, and his neighbours cannot safely deal with him. If it is known that there has been a lien registered, they must make inquiry as to whether or not the lien has been satisfied, every time they buy a dollar's worth of property. The thing is difficult, and the reason that I wanted the Bill to go to the Finance Committee was to see if we could not get two or three lawyers to put their heads together and work out some rational system. You want to do two things. You want to secure the tax. I think it is a good thing to secure the tax if possible, because if A escapes paying, then B and C must have their taxes increased the next year to make up for what A escapes. So I am not complaining at all of the endeavour to secure payment of the income tax. But while you are doing that you have to see that you do no injustice to others, and it is not too easy. I spent some little time trying to see if I could devise a scheme, but I am not prepared to suggest offhand what would be the best thing to do about it.

Then there is the fixing of the amount. Is the Deputy Minister of Finance going to fix an arbitrary amount himself and have it recorded in the Registry Office, and have a lien placed on a man's land? Suppose then there is a change; that is, a change by way of reduction, or by way of increase. There is no machinery provided for such a change. In each district—I would say, in each county, because there are local officers who are collecting the income taxes—there ought to be some ready way provided for clearing up in time, within a few hours, the question as to where the lien stands, with regard not only to a man's real estate, but also his personal property. So I suggest to the honourable gentleman again that in my opinion he would lose nothing by allowing this measure to go to the Finance Committee. I would like to hear from Mr. Breadner and see if he cannot make some suggestion.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Has my honourable friend read the amending clause regarding the lien?

Hon. Mr. ROSS: Yes, I have read it.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Does not that settle the whole thing? Does not that answer every one of my honourable friend's objections?

Hon. Mr. ROSS: What?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The new clause.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: Read what answers them.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Section 7.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: Honourable gentlemen, I think that before the discussion goes any further it would be well to put it in order. I understand that the honourable leader of the Government has asked leave to move the second reading of the Bill, but has not moved it yet.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would move the second reading. While on the second reading we may be able to discuss the whole question and decide whether to send the Bill to a special committee or refer it to the Committee of the Whole to-morrow. I move now, with the leave of the House, the second reading of this Bill.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: I am waiting now for the honourable gentleman's explanation.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Honourable gentlemen, the section now proposed to be substituted for section 7 seems to me to answer all my honourable friend's difficulties. Section 7 provides:

7. Section twenty-five of the said Act, as enacted by section ten of chapter fifty-two of the statutes of 1923, is repealed and the following is substituted therefor:—

"25. (1) Any assessed tax, interest or penalty remaining unpaid after the date of the mailing of the notice of assessment shall constitute a lien upon the assets of the taxpayer notwithstanding lack of notice, registration or publication.

(2) Except as hereafter provided the lien hereby created shall be deemed to attach at twelve o'clock midnight of the day of the mailing of the notice of assessment and shall rank for every purpose after any transfer or security validly executed on or prior to the day of the mailing of the notice of assessment and before any transfer or security validly executed after the day of the mailing of the notice of assessment.

(3) The lien hereby created shall not have priority over any sale or pledge of personal property made to a bona fide purchaser or pledgee, for value, without notice of any unpaid assessment of the vendor or pledgor, unless the sale is within the provisions of any Bulk Sales Act or similar statute.

(4) The lien hereby created shall be applicable to any assessed tax, interest or penalty payable in respect of income of the 1924 taxation period and each period thereafter.

(5) The lien shall be void after the expiration of five years from the end of the taxation period in respect of which the tax, interest and penalty is payable.

(6) The Minister shall make such regulations not inconsistent with this section as he may deem necessary for carrying the provisions of this section into effect."

It seems to me that the only interest that is conserved, the only lien that remains, is the lien of the Crown because of the non-payment of arrears of taxes. That comes in only after any sale or pledge or personal property. There is no reason why the Crown should not preserve its lien, and nobody will be hurt by this proposed amendment.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: But suppose that shortly after "twelve o'clock midnight of the day of the mailing of the notice of assessment" there is a transfer or security executed. How is a person to know that the income tax constitutes a lien?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I am reading this just at the moment.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: We have all read it three or four times.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: If my honourable friend has read it three or four times, I am very much inclined to think there is something in what he says.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The honourable gentleman has read it three or four times and does not see any way to adjust the matter, though, as we all know, he is a good lawyer. Would he allow a surveyor to say something about it? My idea is that the Government should have no lien until it had registered it properly in a Registry Office.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: But that is not in the Bill.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: No, but let us put it in. We are here to make amendments. Let us provide that, as regards third parties, they would have no lien on a person's property until the lien had been duly registered. Like anything else, in the Registry Office. I could get a certificate of search if I were buying a person's property, for instance, and I would then see that he had not paid his income tax, and that there was so much against the property. The amount would be registered. If a man did not go to the Registry Office to ascertain whether or not there was any lien, it would be his own fault.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: Then there is this point. Suppose a notice, or preferably a certificate, was for $3,000 and the vendor of a piece of land claimed that $1,000 was paid off. What machinery have you for a partial release of that land? You can always get such a release in the case of mortgages on land. If a man paid off half his mortgage he would get a partial release and it would go on record. There is no machinery for that in this Bill.

Then there is this other point. A difficulty arises with regard to the person who buys personal property. The Act as it stands now provides that on a certain day a notice shall be sent, and, counting from 12 o'clock midnight, the lien created goes in ahead of everything except what is on record.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: But something might come in after that, and you might have trouble with regard to it. I am not clear as to who gives the notice. There is certainly lacking anything like machinery for dealing with this matter on the same basis as mortgages, for instance, are dealt with. Possibly a new section could be drafted. We might take the advice of the honourable gentleman who has just spoken and require the lien to be registered, and provide that from the time the registration is made, instead of from 12 o'clock midnight, the lien becomes just like a mortgage.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: That is it.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: And we might provide also that when a man pays a part of that lien he shall be entitled to a partial release, to the extent of the payment made; that on filing a record of that partial payment the lien shall be reduced accordingly. Something like that might be worked out. The clause is not satisfactory in its present form. In fact, it has already done a great deal of harm, because some mortgage companies, for some reason best known to themselves, have started to call in mortgages and have caused a great deal of inconvenience to people who thought that they had money on mortgage for a long term of years, provided they paid their interest. They are now called upon to pay the capital. I do not know how such a provision got in last year, and I am very sorry it was passed. I was asked shortly after going home how we came to make such a provision. I said we had not done so, but was told we had. That was the first I knew about it. I do not know whether it was passed here in the last minutes of the Session or not, but nobody that I discussed it with knew anything about it.

Hon. F. F. PARDEE: Honourable gentlemen, I want to corroborate all that the honourable gentleman opposite (Hon. W. B. Ross) has said. There is no doubt that the passing of this Act last year caused a great deal of trouble and annoyance in the case of companies who are in the loan business. It appears to them, as it appears to me, that the Government ought not to be placed in any better position than any third party without notice. If the Government has a lien upon any land, why should it not be registered, so that those who hold subsequent liens may have notice of it and be governed accordingly? The Government is just as much bound to take care of its own interest as any private individual, and if a private individual has made an advance or has a lien upon a certain piece of land and has not seen fit to register that lien, why should he be protected as against a third party without notice? For my part I cannot see why he should be, and I do not think that this is good legislation.

Let me mention just one fact. Suppose that in the city of Sarnia we are making an advance, what have we to do? We have either to telegraph or telephone to London to ascertain whether or not the person who is asking for that advance is in arrears with his taxes or otherwise. Suppose, as will often be the case, the local tax office holds up a statement of the taxes of that particular person for two, three or four days, what is likely to happen? It may be of the greatest advantage to that man to have the advance made on a particular day. As honourable gentlemen know, it is often the case that if a lien is not paid off on a particular day a bonus is exacted. He may save many dollars by paying off on that day and escaping the bonus. The negotiation of the loan is protracted if the explanation is not received, either by telephone or telegraph, and that is what most frequently happens. The borrower escapes, by reason of the fact that under this Bill the Government is not required to register its lien, as every other lien holder is. It is a first lien and the mortgagee suffers. I say that is not good legislation. In my opinion there is altogether too much parental legislation, both in this House and other legislatures. I cannot understand why the Government should step in and protect itself in this way. My contention is that, so far as the Government is concerned, it ought to look after its own interest by registering its lien, so that holders of all subsequent liens may thereby be notified. For my part, I think the honourable gentleman from Middleton has made a most excellent suggestion, and I may inform the House that I have now in my room many resolutions from law associations in various counties of Ontario, asking that this legislation be not passed, and pointing out exactly the difficulties that have been brought to our attention to-night. In my opinion this legislation ought to be referred to a Committee and be most thoroughly scrutinized, and action taken accordingly.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: I would like to know from the honourable leader of the House and from the senior member from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt) how they contend that the privilege can be created.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Will my honourable friend permit me? I was going to take the first opportunity of saying that on reflection I quite agree with my honourable friend from Middleton. So the honourable gentleman may leave me out of the question.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Very well. Now we have one repentant. Then I will address my remarks exclusively to the honourable leader of the House.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: He will repent too.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: How is it that this Parliament cannot create a lien on property in the Province of Quebec, except of course through the Legislature of that Province? It is a most extraordinary thing. Of course, taxes due for Federal purposes are privileged, but that is by virtue of a Provincial statute. How can we create a lien? And, if we can, what is the use of the provincial autonomy?

Another thing. I understand that the suggestion now is that whenever a notice is given there should be a registration?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Either you have a lien and it is registered, so that people may know of it, or else you create it in the dark. Nobody wants to have it in the dark. It seems to me that nobody wants to be in the position of not knowing, for instance, what a vendor owes. If you are going to register the lien, how will you proceed? The same law must apply to all persons in the country. Just as soon as notice is mailed of the amount due for your income tax, that amount must be registered against your property everywhere.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Not by virtue of this proposed amendment.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: But I understand that you are going to proceed according to the civil law. If you are going to register the lien, you must register it according to the law of the province—Quebec, for instance; and no mortgage that requires to be registered can be registered unless the amount is stated. It must be a fixed registration, to be valid. Therefore it would be necessary in registering to specify the amount of income tax due by every man in the Province of Quebec. That would be the result of it all. It seems to me that this law is a very serious one, and is apt to create a great deal of trouble and perhaps harm, and we should proceed very cautiously with it and examine it with the greatest care.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I would like to ask the leader of the Government if the lien is of any use anyway. Is there any case on record in which the Government has taken any proceedings or collected any money by virtue of it? If I understand the Act, there is a penalty for the non-payment of income tax. If they have this lien also, what is the use of it? Has it ever been of any benefit?

I look upon this legislation as one of the many regulations the Government has passed to retard the trade of the country. Let me give my honourable friend an illustration. The Department of Agriculture has some absurd regulation providing that a man who manufactures bacon in one province cannot send to another. In the city of Winnipeg there is a gentleman who manufactures bacon of a very superior kind—so superior in fact, that he gets 10 or 15 cents a pound more for it than is paid for ordinary bacon. I am not allowed to go to that man and buy a pound of that bacon and eat it in the city of Ottawa. The Dominion Government purchased some of this bacon and put it on the market in the city of Chicago, to show what a superior brand of bacon we could manufacture. One of the inspectors went to the manufacturer and said: "Some of this bacon has been put on exhibit in the city of Chicago. I want to know the reason why, and if you don't tell me you will be prosecuted. He said: "Why, I never exhibited it; I sold it to the Dominion Government, and they exhibited it." The Provincial Government also bought some of the bacon and put it on exhibition. Still we have this regulation saying that this man must not ship a bit of this bacon into the province of Saskatchewan or the province of Ontario, and he tells me his business is being ruined.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Why?

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: He cannot ship the bacon outside the province of Manitoba. because of some absurd regulation saying that he must do this or that or something else, or he will be fined. The hogs are killed under Dominion inspection, and have the stamp upon them. He says he will have to leave the city and go somewhere else where he can extend his business, because he is not allowed to do business in Canada or in the province of Manitoba. These absurd regulations are multiplied to prevent people doing business, and it is about time that sort of thing was stopped.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, I do not believe that this legislation should be condemned so peremptorily, because I believe it contains considerable merit. The question is asked: how will the public know that there is a lien? how will the public know that the income taxes have not been paid? Under the general law any loan company will have to satisfy itself, when loaning money to anyone, that here is no preceding lien. It will obtain a certificate of search; it will find from the registry office how the land stands upon which the lien is to be created. If this legislation passes as it is, it would not take long for the public to find out the situation of the person borrowing, and they would do so at far less cost than that of a search certificate. Anyone entering into a transaction who wants to inform himself will only need to apply to the District Inspector of Taxation to find out what the situation is, and he will be given a certificate, the form of which has already been prepared, and which will read as follows:

Certificate

Re Section 7 of Chapter , of the Statutes of 1924.

This is to certify that John Jones, of the city of Toronto, is not in default in the payment of any tax, interest, or penalty assessed under the provisions of the Income War Tax Act, 1917, and amendments.

(Signed),

Inspector of Taxation.

There are Inspectors of Taxation throughout the land, and they are easily reached. They are very well known by everyone who has anything to do with lending money and satisfying themselves as to the standing of borrowers.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: It is like the certificate in the case of succession duties.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: If the law is passed, is my honourable friend of the opinion that there would be a lien legally in the province of Quebec?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I think the case has been settled many times by the Privy Council. For instance, under the Insolvency Act it was held that provision could be made for mortgages or liens or things of that kind because they were accessory to a matter which fell within Dominion jurisdiction.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: All I can say is that this is a Federal Act imposing taxation for the whole country, and I do not see why the incidence of the collection of the tax should not fall under the Federal jurisdiction. However, as I intend to follow the suggestion of my honourable friend from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross), we may discuss all these technical points in the Committee.

My honourable friend has spoken of the Committee on Finance. He will realize that mostly legal questions are involved. A Committee composed of all the members of the legal profession in the Chamber has been appointed to deal with certain Bills concerning amendments to the Criminal law, and perhaps it would be better to refer the Bill to that Committee. At all events, I throw out the suggestion that if the Bill passes the second reading I am disposed to send it to that Committee.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: It is not entirely a question for lawyers. I would like to see business men on the Committee. That is why I suggested the Finance Committee.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Let us deal with it here.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: There are business men on the Finance Committee, and some lawyers too. One conundrum after another comes up—a man may have property in nine provinces, and may be paying income tax in respect of earnings in nine provinces. Are all these taxes recorded against one piece of property in each province? It is not a simple thing.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I draw the attention of the honourable gentleman to the fact that that is only one phase of the Bill. We will send the whole Bill to the Committee, and the Committee will report.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

CUSTOMS TARIFF BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND moved the second reading of Bill 127, an Act to amend the Customs Tariff, 1907.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, this Bill contains a certain number of clauses, the first of which extends the effect of the British Preferential Tariff:

To any territory administered under a mandate of the League of Nations by any British country, to which British country the benefit of the British Preferential Tariff has been extended; and from and after the publication of such Order in Council in the Canada Gazette the British Preferential Tariff shall apply to goods the produce or manufacture of such territory, subject to the provisions of this Act.

"Subject to the provisions of this Act" means subject to the passage of an Order in Council to that effect.

Paragraph (f) of the Act has the effect of withdrawing that benefit whenever the Government judges it proper to do so by Order in Council.

Clause 2 of the Bill amends section 5 of the Customs Tariff, 1907, as amended by section 1 of chapter 42 of the Statutes of 1923, by adding thereto the following:

Provided that in computing the ad valorem rate of duty on tea purchased in bond in the United Kingdom, the value for duty shall not include the amount of the Customs duty payable on tea for consumption in the United Kingdom.

The Customs Act provides that goods purchased from other countries—foreign to that country—are valued on the duty paid value, even if purchased in bond, for computing the ad valorem duty. This Bill proposes that tea which pays a specific duty when imported from Great Britain, shall be valued without the Customs duty added. In many cases when the British duty is added to the value of tea, it brings the computed ad valorem rate below 15 per cent, and therefore the tea would not be entitled to the discount of 10 per cent on shipments into a sea or river port of Canada under the Act of 1923.

Section 3 of the Bill declares that certain amendments are made to chapter 26 of the Statutes of 1914 by repealing a certain number of the articles in schedule A, and decreeing other rates of duty of Customs set opposite each of said items.

These changes mainly comprise reductions on implements of production and material used in the manufacture of agricultural implements; also on equipment for blast furnaces and steel plants, including fire bricks, which get a drawback under the drawback clause contained in Schedule B of the Customs Tariff. The underlying policy is aid to agriculture, mines and forests. The fisheries are taken care of by the Sales Tax, which is not before us. It is recognized that agriculture, which is the largest industry in Canada, was the first to suffer from the readjustment of prices after the war. Prices of agricultural products everywhere reverted to the pre-war levels, while the people engaged in agriculture had to continue purchasing at nearly war-time prices.

The estimated reductions under this Bill are about $1,000,000. The changes themselves are so arranged as to cause the least disturbance to trade, because, as I have said, agriculture gets its implements at a cheaper rate, the manufacturers of agricultural implements obtain their raw material more cheaply, and in some cases free of duty, and the steel manufacturers, in regard to equipment for their plant and for blast furnaces, obtain certain reductions and drawbacks which help them in carrying on their work. On the whole I believe that the effect of this measure will be to help agriculture, the basic industry of Canada, without in any way impairing the work of the manufacturers in this country. With these few remarks I beg leave to move the second reading of the Bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: As this is a Bill which can hardly be amended by this House, I would suggest that we take the Committee stage now, if there is no objection.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Then, perhaps we might ask for some explanation as to the principle involved in the first part of the Bill. Do we understand that this gives the Government power to extend the British Preferential Tariff to all countries administered by Great Britain under a mandate from the League of Nations?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I will read the clause. This is in regard to "additional extension of British Preferential Tariff." It provides that the Governor in Council may—

(e) extend the benefit of the British Preferential Tariff to any territory administered under a mandate of the League of Nations by any British country, to which British country the benefit of the British Preferential Tariff has been extended; and from and after the publication of this Order in Council in the Canada Gazette the British Preferential Tariff shall apply to goods the produce of or manufacture of such territory, subject to the provisions of this Act.

The legislation that is before us is introduced at the special request of the Prime Minister of New Zealand. Honourable gentlemen are perhaps aware of the fact that New Zealand has a mandate for the administration of the Island of Samoa. New Zealand gives Canada a preference which is of great advantage to our trade. Our exports to New Zealand in the fiscal year ending the 31st of March last amounted to $12,735,620. As against those exports, our imports from New Zealand were $2,179,727. The Island of Samoa, which is not a very large island and has a population of only 35,000, produces cocoa and cocoanuts, and it is expected that under the preference that Island will be enabled to do business with Canada. The balance of trade is so largely in our favour that the Government felt it could well afford to comply with the wishes of New Zealand.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: But that is quite evidently a roundabout way. The result will be to extend, and perhaps considerably, the British Preference. It may extend it to certain European countries whose products might seriously affect our manufactures. This seems to be a very serious departure.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It will not go beyond the British countries that have a mandate such as New Zealand has over the Island of Samoa.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Has my honourable friend fresh in mind the countries in Europe that are at present administered by Great Britain?

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: The mandated countries?

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Yes.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: The mandated countries which are administered by Great Britain will be some portions of Africa, and Mesopotamia, and Palestine. It is a small portion of the Island of Samoa which is under mandate by New Zealand as a part of the British Empire. But giving the preference to New Zealand's mandate in Samoa would not allow anything to come in from a European country.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: No, no, but the law gives the Government power to extend that preference to all the countries that are under British protection.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: To extend it to the mandated countries; but no European countries are mandated to the British Government.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: May I suggest to my honourable friend, in view of the fact that there appears to be a little difference of opinion, or some doubt as to the desirability of passing this Bill just as it is, that we ought not to go into Committee to-night.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Very well. Then I will move for the Committee stage to-morrow.

The motion of Hon. Mr. Dandurand was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at 3 p.m.

NATIONAL COAL RESERVE IN ALBERTA

On the Notice of Inquiry:

By Hon. Mr. Pope:

That he will call the attention of the Government to the extraordinary rumors and information, of apparently undoubted authorities, re the National Coal Reserve in Alberta, commonly known as the Hoppy Mines, covered by the Isenburgs lease, and extended area, by the action of the Government, and will inquire from the Government for any and all particulars affecting any locations within the area, by whom, and when made, whether the parties were reinstated by paying up their arrears and how long the arrears had been extended, if any new locations have been made, and why, when, and by whom, if there is any correspondence between the Government of Canada and that of Washington, U.S.A., if so, the nature of it, insofar as it is connected with the Isenburgs lease, located within the National Coal Reserve of Alberta?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have from one Department a partial answer to the inquiry of the honourable gentleman, and am awaiting an answer from another Department. In the meantime I would ask the honourable gentleman to postpone his inquiry, and I shall confer with him as to the document that I have in hand, to see if it satisfactorily covers the questions that he asks.

Hon. Mr. POPE: Do I understand that the honourable gentleman's suggestion is that this be deferred until to-morrow??

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: We might defer it till to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. POPE: Very well.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS ON VANCOUVER ISLAND

MOTION FOR RETURN

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON (for Right Hon. Sir George E. Foster) moved:

That an Order of the Senate do issue for a Return showing:

1. The total receipts and expenditures of the Canadian National Railways on Vancouver Island for each year of its operation including 1923-24, under the two heads of passengers and freights.

2. The mileage now under operation and the points between which the roads are operated and the frequency of the service. The total capital expenditure to date upon the system now being operated, and the total expended on the portion wholly or partly graded but not tracked and operated.

The motion was agreed to.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON LEGISLATION

MOTION WITHDRAWN

On the Notice of Motion:

By Hon. Mr. David:

That a Special Committee composed of the Right Honourable Sir George Foster, Sir James Lougheed, Honourable Messieurs Dandurand, Beique, Blain, Daniel, Belcourt, and the mover, be appointed to confer and act with a like Committee of the House of Commons to consider and report upon the best means to be taken in order to increase the efficiency of the work of both Houses and to reduce the cost of the holding of sessions of Parliament, and that a Message be sent to the House of Commons accordingly.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: In view of the declaration made by the honourable the Speaker of the Senate and by the honourable leader of this House, and with the permission of honourable gentlemen, I wish to withdraw my motion, which I will renew in another form later on. I hope that the Government will before next Session do what is required to amend the procedure, particularly of the House of Commons, in order to shorten the speeches and cut down the expenditures.

The motion was withdrawn.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROCEDURE ON BRANCH LINE BILLS

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. GRIESBACH: I should like to draw the attention of the Government to a matter of some importance. The country, particularly the western country, is very much interested in the fate of the Railway Bills now before the Senate Committee, and I fancy that the National Railway Company is anxious to know, as the people in the particular districts in the West where branch lines are proposed certainly are anxious to know, what is going to happen. They would like to make their plans for the future upon the basis of definite information as to whether or not these lines are going to be built. I understand that in the Committee of this House considering the matter some of these Bills have been approved, tentatively at all events, if not actually. I would like to urge that they be brought before this House and dealt with without further delay.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It had not occurred to me that we were advancing in the season when the construction of some of these railway branches might be advanced. Under these conditions, I will bring the matter to the attention of the Committee when it meets, and probably a certain number of the Bills that have been dealt with may in the judgment of the Committee be reported to this Chamber.

INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES BILL

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE AND REPORTED

On motion of Hon. Mr. Dandurand, the Senate went into Committee on Bill 7, an Act to amend the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, 1907.

Hon. Mr. Fisher in the Chair.

On section 1—statutory declaration to accompany application for appointment of Board:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I move the adoption of this clause, which passed without any criticism last Session. I suppose that no objection has arisen in the mind of any honourable member this Session. The new words in the section are underlined. It is to provide for cases in which employees and employers have been unable to come together because one of the parties has refused to enter into negotiations. This is a slight amendment which will help in the administration of the Act.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Section 1 of the Bill amends section 15 of the Act. I desire to offer now an amendment to section 2 of the Act, which, if it is taken into consideration, must be taken into consideration now.

This Bill has been sent to the Railway Committee for the purpose of enabling all the interested parties to be heard. We have had very conflicting views expressed. One thing struck me, namely, that the Act in its application went further than was intended by those who framed it. We had the proprietors of mines before us who stated their case very clearly. There are a great many people now engaged in mining in this country in a very modest way, from the prospector up to the man who employs perhaps fifty or one hundred men. The purpose of this Act, if I understand it rightly, was to affect public utility corporations. It was quite evident when the representatives of the asbestos mine owners were before us that it would be absolutely unjust to amend this law as the Bill proposes, and make it apply to them. They told us that if they had to maintain for 30, or 60, or perhaps 90 days the same wages which they were paying their men, it would mean ruin to them, and that they might lose their properties.

After that we heard representatives of the Unions, and I understood from them that they never thought the Bill would apply to these people. The application of the Bill to small mine owners did not seem to be of any interest to them, and in my judgment it should not apply. Mining in this country is of paramount importance. We have a very large barren area which separates the East from the West. That has been a great weakness of Canada, because up to the present time nothing could be grown in that area, no settlers could be induced to go and establish themselves there. But this area may turn out to be the richest and most profitable part of the country, but that can only be so if people have the courage and the initiative and the freedom to go out to seek mines and to proceed in a modest way to develop them. If you are going to tie these people down by legislation and tell the poor miner who has just started and has only his prospects that if he is in trouble with his men he cannot close down but has to continue to employ his men at the same wage for 30 or 60 or perhaps 90 days, he will certainly be discouraged. Everybody seems to be in accord with the opinion that the Bill was not intended to apply to small mine owners at all. As far as I understand it, it was intended for public utility corporations.

I move now that paragraph c of section 2 be amended. The purpose of the amendment is simply to restrict the operations of the law to coal mines. The law now reads as follows:

"Employer" means any person, company or corporation employing ten or more persons and owning or operating any mining property.

My amendment is simply to change the last three words and to say:

—owning or operating any coal mining property.

Hon. L. C. WEBSTER: I also have had representations made to me on behalf of the asbestos mining corporations. As you are aware, the greater portion of the asbestos that is used in the world is mined and exported from the province of Quebec. The companies operating these asbestos mines in that province are adverse to the proposed legislation. They have sent me a communication which states:

That should conditions necessitate a change of any kind nothing can be done in less than about sixty days and whether the employer can afford it or not operations must be continued or become liable to a penalty of from one hundred to one thousand dollars per day etc., and the application of this penalty would should labor troubles arise cause the owners to sustain very heavy losses and in the case of small operators probably loss of title to their property and while it may be said that the penalty applies to either party using these conditions for the purpose of delaying change there is no way in which the penalty can be made applicable to employees with regard to a change affecting hours this would be impossible to agree to as sudden orders to stop shipments come at any moment necessitating curtailment of hours at time at the mines and it would be impossible owing to limited storage space to continue operations as suggested in the Bill in case of depression in prices or shipping instructions being deferred when frequently occurs it would become imperative to close down or reduce wages there would be no other alternative as the majority of mines are not paying propositions except in good times and conditions that would force the companies to keep going would put many out of business and would only react on labour understand this Bill as originally introduced was intended only to apply to public utilities and asbestos is certainly not a public utility.

This is the feeling of those engaged in this business, and I feel that their request should be very carefully considered.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Could the honourable gentleman from Stadacona inform the House as to whether or not a Board has ever been established in the asbestos industry without the consent of or against the will of the employer?

Hon. Mr. WEBSTER: I am not familiar with the details.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: It might be of interest to honourable gentlemen to refer to what has been the practice in the past. So far as my knowledge of the administration of the Department of Labour goes, it has never been held that metalliferous mining—the asbestos industry, as an example—was to be regarded as a public utility within the meaning of this Act. The Act does permit and provide that wherever the employers and the workmen in any industry agree to adjust their differences by having them referred to and investigated by a Board, the Minister may appoint the Board, and it can operate; but I am unaware of any case in which a Board has ever been forced upon a mining industry outside of coal mining, which I think is admitted to be a public utility and an industry in which the public are directly interested. If it is true—and I hold that it is true—that the law in force for the past seventeen years has never worked any hardship upon the mines that are now mentioned, the amendment to the Act in this respect is quite unnecessary. The honourable member from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Webster) has, I think inadvertently, overdrawn the picture. He has indicated that it would be impossible for the employer to work his mine part-time if the amendment now before the House were to pass. That is an entirely erroneous impression. It always has been and always will be the right of the employer to operate or not to operate his plant, his mine, his railroad; but if he does operate, then this law simply provides that agreement as to the number of hours constituting a day's work, or the rate of wages to be paid, shall not be changed unless the provisions of the Act are complied with. It does not in any way prevent the employer from operating his property or not operating it. The principle may be applied to any industry. Take railroading for example. It has its busy season and its slack season. When there are no cars to move, trains do not run. Men are called when there is work for them to do, and they are not called and are not paid when there is no work. If they are called they are to be paid a certain rate of wages and work under certain conditions. The provision is quite elastic and is perfectly fair to both parties. So it is not quite a proper presentation of the case to say that if in the asbestos industry, for example, the operators felt that they should shut down their mines for a week, they could not do so under the Act as it is now or as it is proposed to amend it. There is no restriction upon the employers in that connection.

In a general way, I would make one observation to which I hope honourable members will give heed, and it is this. I think we all appreciate that at this present moment there is a cloud hanging over the country. Uncertainty prevails as to whether or not the public service is going to be carried on without interruption. That situation indicates a spirit of unrest which is abroad in the country, and under present conditions, and in view of the situation, I do not think it is necessary for this Parliament to undertake to interfere with a law that has worked satisfactorily and has caused no hardship to anybody during the seventeen years of its existence, and in which, so far as I know, no employers affected by it have sought a change up to this moment. I respectfully submit to the House that it is quite unnecessary, and, indeed would have the effect of disturbing the mind of every interested workman in this country—and there are approximately a million of them in Canada—to make a change without just cause, and without giving due notice and submitting and fully discussing the reasons for the proposed change.

I submit also that, inasmuch as this Bill was referred to a Committee last week and the interested parties were given a hearing there, the amendment intended to be made to the Bill should have been mentioned and submitted at that time, so that the representatives of both sides of the question might have ample opportunity either to support the proposed amendment or give their reasons in objection thereto. I know that one gentleman representing a certain class of employers, the asbestos mines, did raise this question as a point of information, and the information was given him that never in the operation of the Act had it been interpreted, so far as was known, to apply adversely to them, and inasmuch as they had never suffered under it there was no necessity for a change. Furthermore I will state this, which I stated to the gentleman at the time, that in my humble opinion had it been compulsory for that industry to respect and comply with the requirements of the statute—in other words, had it provided for compulsory investigation—the difficulty that occurred in the asbestos industry a year or so ago would probably not have occurred, and the non-application of the Act to that industry was probably responsible for much of the difficulty that arose at the time. I submit, honourable gentlemen, that we ought not at present to disturb sections which have not been brought into question before, which have worked satisfactorily for seventeen years, and under which nobody has suffered.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would ask the leave of the Senate for the Deputy Minister of Labour to come to the floor of the House.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: I am fully in accord with the amendment of the honourable member from Montarville (Hon. Mr. Beaubien), and I realize its importance, not simply because I know it is so necessary for the asbestos mines, but because we are now at the commencement of perhaps the greatest silver and gold mining development that America has ever seen, and I am satisfied that the Bill as intended would be adverse to that mining industry.

In regard to what the last speaker has said about this Act having been so beneficial in the past and the mining interests not having suffered by reason of it, I think that is true; but, in view of the great developments which are now taking place, and the still greater which are to take place, they can picture men of small means undertaking to develop properties who would be very badly tied up in the event of this section being passed. It would at once place them in the position of having, in the event of trouble, to go out of business altogether. I submit that at this particular time nothing should be done to interfere with those great developments. Most people in Canada fail to realize what we have in the mining field at the present time. You will understand it when I tell you that gold has been proven to a depth of a mile in the ground, and that gold deposits extend over an area of several hundred miles in Northern Ontario and Northern Quebec. Anything that is done to interfere in the slightest degree with that development is not in the interest of the country, and I consider that the amendment which is brought in by the honourable member from Montarville is opportune and most necessary. I think that only one mining industry should be included in the operations of the Act, and that is coal mining, because that is an altogether different proposition.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Honourable gentlemen, I did not think that when this Bill was taken from the jurisdiction of the Committee of the Whole House anybody lost any of his rights. I understood that the purpose was purely and simply to hear the interested parties, and that the Bill would revert to the Committee of the Whole where any honourable member could propose an amendment. If that is the case, the Bill being now for the first time in Committee of the Whole, it seems to me that an amendment is not out of order. That is my first point.

My second point is this. The honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Robertson) blows hot and cold at the same time, but he does it very skilfully. I admire his plausible method of procedure. He comes before us and says: "Now honourable gentlemen, do not disturb this legislation: it has been working like a charm for years past." He says that on one hand, while on the other he would insert an amendment in the Act. "Do not disturb this Act: it is fine; but let me disturb it." Do you see? He comes before us and says: "Nobody is complaining; accept the amendment; the Act in its application has been working perfectly well; therefore, my colleagues, do not lay a sacrilegious hand on it: but allow me to do it." That second part he does not absolutely insist on, but he does it just the same. Honourable gentlemen, there would be no reason for a discussion if there were no amendment to the Act. It is quite evident that the Act has worked quite well without amendment. So that is no plea for the amendment. Indeed, it is a plea against the proposed change. There is an old French saying that applies in this case: "Le mieux est l'ennemi du bien"—the better is the great enemy of the good. Let us be convinced by the words of the honourable member from Welland that the Act has been working well, and let us not touch it—it is so rare that human legislation works to the satisfaction of everybody. Therefore we might throw out the amendment. But, honourable gentlemen, I do not want to go even that length—I will be quite frank in stating why. For my part, I think that this Act can work only if it inspires confidence; otherwise it is worth nothing at all, for the very good reason that there is no sanction to the law.

The only purpose of the Act is to bring disputants together. If you do not bring them together in a proper atmosphere, what is the use of bringing them together at all? So I am prepared to give my honourable friend from Welland everything that can possibly be given him. Back of him are, I know, the big labour unions, strong—so strong that they can stand before this Parliament as they did before our Committee yesterday, and say: "We do not want your protection: we are strong enough: we are not here to protect ourselves, but have come as representatives of our great organization to protect the public." That was the situation.

Really, I heard not without surprise these men reading us a lesson. They said: "We very much suspect you people of listening to the voice of the employer, and we come here to protect the public." So be it, honourable gentlemen, as far as I am concerned. I think we desire peace. We want to do all we can to inspire confidence on both sides. All that we can give to the labour unions let us give it to them. On the other hand, let us hope that when there is in our opinion any danger of frightening away the confidence of the other party—for it takes two parties to make a bargain—let them in the same spirit listen to what we have to say.

I do not want to have the amendment eliminated, but I submit that you should restrict it to coal mining, to which, I understand, it was intended exclusively to apply. Then you would be protecting many small people, some of whom are much smaller than are certain employees, who earn $3,000, $4,000, $5,000, and even $6,000 a year. Many of the poor miners who go into the wilds do not get as many hundreds of dollars as these people get thousands. Let us not forget that the miners are prospecting for Canada as well as for themselves. Let us not deter them or apply to them an onerous law that was intended to apply only to large bodies of employers like coal-mining operators.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Honourable gentlemen, since my honourable friend has honoured me with personal mention, I want to say that I take off my hat to him, when he practices the art in which he credits me with having some skill. The difference between the amendment just moved, to which I have taken respectful objection, for reasons stated, and now included in the Bill the amendments which were already before the House, and to which I have given my support, is that the desire for the changes proposed by the Bill arises from grievances that were bound to exist because the present Act was not operating fairly and equitably. The amendment now proposed, to which I have taken respectful objection, is one which arises out of no abuse or injustice which the employers whom it is sought to protect have ever complained of or suffered. Therefore I submit that it is not exactly a fair representation to say that in supporting one amendment and opposing another I am inconsistent.

The honourable member has made reference also to an implication—not a statement, but an implication—that came before the Railway Committee when this Bill was under consideration there, in a presentation made by one gentleman who appeared before the Committee. That implication, which perhaps was misunderstood, indicated that there was a feeling on the part of those representing labour that at least some gentlemen who had been either presenting or supporting certain amendments to the Act were doing so at the instigation of employers. I want to make that clear, because I know what was behind it, and what was the thought in the mind of the gentleman who made the statement. He had in mind the words of an honourable member of this House, who introduced at a previous Session this same amendment, which has to do with the appointment of a Chairman. I will read the honourable gentleman's words so that all may draw their own conclusions as to whether or not the thought in the man's mind when he was speaking before the Committee the other day was justified. I know that he had in mind no particular member except the honourable gentleman whose utterance I will read. When this Bill was under discussion in the Senate a year ago an amendment was proposed by the honourable gentleman, who in submitting it said:

> By the provision of subsection 3 of section 8 of the Act of 1907, where the employer and the employee do not agree upon a third arbitrator, the appointment is in the hands of the Minister of Labour. Now, it has been represented to me by very important employers that this is not a very satisfactory condition.

It was upon the strength of those words that this gentleman indicated to the Committee the other day that Labour had a right to feel that some of the gentlemen opposing the Bill now before the House were doing so, not because of their own judgment, but because of representations which had been made to them. I say there is no reason why objection should be taken to that statement. It is a statement of fact. Probably other gentlemen in this House, and I myself, have taken the view that we should do certain things because of representations made to us, and because we believed that it was the right course to follow. I think we ought to refrain from imputing motives to any honourable gentlemen in supporting or opposing legislation here.

I have no further comment to make upon the proposed amendments except to say that no abuse or unfair treatment has occurred under the Act, and that the Act has operated without injustice to any in that regard for the past seven years, and that I hold and sincerely believe that it is not desirable to disturb this legislation unnecessarily at the present time in view of conditions now existing; and I respectfully submit that the House ought to await some concrete evidence of unfairness to employers or of the necessity for an amendment to that section of the Act before tampering with it.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Honourable gentlemen, it seems to me that this is a perennial Bill to amend this Act. Everyone appears to think that it is someone's duty to bring in a Bill each Session—I think one has been brought up ever since I have been here—for some new tinkering with this law. So far as labour legislation the world over is concerned, I have never heard so much praise bestowed on any other legislation as I have on this Industrial Disputes Investigation Act; but even if we had Utopian legislation, there would always be someone who would want to amend it. They say dozens of legislatures want to amend the Lord's prayer, but they dare not do it because they do not think public opinion has quite arrived at that point yet. This Act, we have been told from both sides of the House, has been reasonably satisfactory to the public—reasonably satisfactory to labour and reasonably satisfactory to the employer. I have read these sections, and, although I think I have some notion of law, I cannot remember from one day to another what they really mean. I think that no amendment of any kind should be made to this statute by Parliament, unless it is established before us that there is some concrete abuse to be corrected, and that we should not pass any section of this Bill, as we shall only be disturbing the law as it stood before the Bill was introduced.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: May I ask the honourable gentleman from Welland if it has been sought to apply the Act to mining companies other than coal-mining companies? If so, with what result? I should like to know if objection was taken by any companies against which the Act was sought to be applied.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I think I can answer my honourable friend. I have the figures. The Act had hardly been passed in 1907 when three metal mines—employers or employees—in order to settle their differences, applied for boards of arbitration. The Deputy Minister of Labour has rapidly gone through the official statistics, and we find that the owners or the employees of seven metal mines came to Ottawa to arbitrate their differences. From 1907 to 1923 there were 24 cases arising out of troubles in the metal mines. Of course, I am excluding the coal mines. I think this is quite conclusive as to the utility of the Act to meet the demands of labour for arbitral justice. In these twenty-four cases, twenty-three Boards were granted at the request of labour, and one at the request of the employers.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Would my honourable friend tell us how many of these metal companies have objected to coming under the provisions of the Act?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: May we not put the question in another way? Is it not true that in all those cases the Boards were established by reason of both parties consenting to the dispute being investigated in that manner, and that in no case has a Board of Conciliation been established when either party was opposed to it, except in the case of a public utility?

Hon. Mr. GORDON: I may venture to say that in the cases mentioned by the leader of the House only large corporations which had probably been in operation for some time were involved. If this amendment is passed it will apply to cases in which ten men are employed.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The law is not altered on that score.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: I think it is.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: It applies to ten men or over?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: It always did.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: I venture to repeat what I said, namely, that all these mining companies that referred their disputes to Conciliation Boards were large operating companies. In many cases in which there are at least ten men, who are really only prospectors starting to operate, they may be classed as miners. That is what I am afraid of.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Conditions with regard to mining have not changed, and they are not going to change. The operation of these mines has been carried on by companies with large sums of money behind them, and from the knowledge I have, I believe that that is the case in the county of which my honourable friend speaks. The difficulty has been that the work has been confined practically to prospecting. During all these years the Act has worked very properly in those regions.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: I am not presuming to know more about the matter than my honourable friend, but I do know that at the present time there are in Northern Ontario a number of men, in groups of not more than ten each, who are practically only prospecting, and who, until they have something to show, cannot get capital to carry on.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: That confirms what I say.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: It may to a certain extent, but picture this. Here is a man out with ten other men engaged in sinking a shaft for the purpose of finding out whether he has a mine or not. He has only a certain limited amount of money available. Trouble arises between that man and his men, and under this amendment he has to continue to pay them wages at the existing rate until the time of settlement, which may be 30, 60, or 90 days. He has not got the money to pay them.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: He should not start sinking the shaft then.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: That may be my honourable friend's opinion, but I know of men in that locality who should not have done things which looked to be stupid, but who went on and won out. That is an aspect of the case that my honourable friend does not know, and he might consider it stupid for these men to come along and spend a little money. In the case of one of the best mines we have in Northern Ontario the advice given to the man who was trying to find out whether he had something or not was to quit and spend no more money. He went on against that advice, and a very short time afterwards he discovered a marvellously rich mine.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: That has happened many times.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: Certain contingencies may arise by which you will deprive that man of the opportunity of accomplishing what he has set out to do, and I think that is something that should not be done.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: If the amendment does no harm, and may do a great deal of good, as has been established, why oppose it?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Is my honourable friend referring to the amendment limiting the application of the provision to coal mines?

Hon. Mr. DAVID: Yes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My answer is that when the Act has done so much good in that direction, why should it be amended? Here I state twenty-four cases of metal miners who have gone before Boards, thus preventing in perhaps nine-tenths of the cases a strike and stoppage of work. Why then intervene? Cases are mentioned in which the Act possibly would not operate. If the Act would not operate in some cases, the Minister of Labour would find out that there was no reason for granting a Board, and no Board would be granted. We have had this Act for seventeen years, and no hardship has been caused to anyone. No one can point to a case like the one imagined by my honourable friend, so why amend the Act to restrict its operation when on the whole it has worked satisfactorily?

Hon. Mr. GORDON: Simply for the reason I gave a while ago, that whereas heretofore hundreds of men have been doing this work, from now on there will be thousands doing it, and the more people you get engaged in any work the more chance there is of trouble

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Does my honourable friend really believe that in the West or the central part of Canada, where a small group of ten or fifteen men accompany a prospector and decide to live together and work in the wild country, a strike is likely to be declared at a certain moment? Is there any possibility of such a thing happening and those people asking for a Board of Conciliation? Is it not in the well-settled industries, where hundreds of men are employed, that such a thing takes place? We have never heard of a small institution employing a few men appealing to the Federal authorities for a settlement of their difficulties.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: This amendment would perhaps be better understood and appreciated if it stood over until after we deal with section 2. The amendment is a very different thing if you deal with it in the light of section 2. As it is now, these small mines, if they find their market has gone to pieces—and that is what I am told happened the asbestos mines—can close down and say to their men: 'We will work at reduced wages, and when the market is up again, we will go on at the old wages." But if you pass section 2 that will not be possible, because no change in wages could be made until after the men asked for a Board and an award was made. Two or three things might happen in the meantime: the market might be up and down two or three times during that period.

I see an objection to the law as it will stand if you amend it under section 2 and make it applicable to these small mines, and particularly to the men who are trying to get mines. These men who go off into the woods have to live from hand to mouth and get along in the best way they can. To say that they cannot make any change at all if they get into a corner, without having a Board and perhaps spending 60 or 90 days in getting a dispute settled, simply means that they cannot do business. I think it would be well to let this amendment rest until we look into section 2.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: I have no objection to suspending my amendment. I think the honourable gentleman is right. If you pass section 2, the Bill becomes objectionable, and the people want relief. If you do not pass it then the law is not objectionable, and the people may not want relief.

May I ask the leader of the House why he so constantly says that the law is perfect, that everybody commends it, that there are no complaints? We are not talking of the law as it exists: we are talking of the amendment. We are ready to subscribe to what you say. The law is all right: leave it alone.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No, no. I cannot say that when I am before the House with amendments.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Certainly not.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I say the law is all right. If my honourable friend convinces me that it is wrong on the point which he attacks, I am with him. When it comes to my amendment, I am ready to defend it on its merits.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Your amendment is good and his is bad.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Surely my honourable friend knows that we are discussing the possible danger of an amendment. The evidence of that is that the law has been in force for nearly twenty years during which time the mining people have not complained. This proposal has not become law; it is only the menace of a law; and they come and complain in advance. Surely there is a reason. So let us drop the question of the Act. The Act is not before us to be judged at all, and let not my honourable friend get behind the Act, which we do not want to attack. As soon as we attack the amendment, its advocates run for cover behind the Act, and hold it up and say: "Behold, this Act has been perfect." Very well. We agree to that.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Let it alone.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Can you say that of the amendment. Leave the Act out of the question. It is all right. It is not on trial. It is the amendments that are on trial. If we eliminate the question of the Act, all that you have said cannot to my mind be accepted as having much weight—with all respect; because all the authority that you have cited refers to the Act, and everybody admits it. But what authority have you for the amendment? That is what I want to know.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend must not forget that there is on the Statute Book an Act which he says is satisfactory.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Yes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If he makes that assertion, which I accept at 100 per cent, what does it mean? It means that my honourable friend subscribes to the principle which is contained in clause 57, which says:

Employers and employees shall give at least thirty days' notice of an intended change affecting the conditions of employment with respect to wages or hours, and in the event of such intended change resulting in a dispute, until the dispute has been finally dealt with by a Board and a copy of its report has been delivered through the Registrar to both the parties affected, neither of those parties shall alter the conditions of employment with respect to wages or hours.

My honourable friend says the Act is all right, and that is what it provides. He subscribes to that. We say, if that is all right, then the law should be obeyed. My honourable friend has stated that it could not be enforced; that he could disobey it; that manufacturers could wriggle out of it. We are here to see to it that the employers obey the law. We have passed an Act which is obligatory upon the workman, who at the time of the passage of the Act was not so strong as he is to-day. We said to him, "You shall obey that law," and we put in a penalty clause. The wage-earner has had to obey that law. He was amenable to it. Now the manufacturer, or the owner of a public utility, is told that he must obey the law; that he shall accept a certain principle; that he shall not do certain things. We come now before Parliament and say that the law which was passed by both branches of the Legislature and signed by His Majesty's representative shall be respected in spirit and in letter. My honourable friend was one of the first to say, "We have no objection to the Act, because there are no teeth in it." He will remember his words. We are now asking Parliament to put in the teeth. Parliament did so for one of the parties, the wage-earner.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: What teeth?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The sanction.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: What sanction?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The sanction was in clause 59.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Where does the honourable gentleman find the sanction in clause 59, as against the wage-earners?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I will show where the sanction against the wage-earner is, by quoting the clause:

Any employee who goes on strike contrary to the provisions of this Act shall be liable to a fine of not less than ten dollars nor more than fifty dollars, for each day or part of a day that such employee is on strike.

If clause 58, which concerns the employers, had used the same language, we should not be proposing the present amendment. Clause 58 does not provide that any employer who changes the wages or hours contrary to the provisions of this Act shall be liable to a fine. Although section 57 had imposed a prohibition on both parties against altering the conditions, sections 58 only said:

Any employer declaring or causing a lockout contrary to the provisions of this Act shall be liable to a fine of not less than one hundred dollars, nor more than one thousand dollars for each day or part of a day that such lockout exists.

Therefore, notwithstanding the prohibition in section 57, against altering the conditions of employment with respect to wages or hours pending an investigation and a report, there is no sanction to be found in the penalty clause in the event of that prohibition being disobeyed. Now we say that if the principle contained in clause 57 is just, namely, that neither employer nor employees shall alter conditions as to wages or hours pending the investigation and report, then the employer as well as the employee should obey. I am surprised to hear honourable members of this Chamber contending: "We have imposed that prohibition upon employer and employee alike, but we will allow the employer to defy it, because there is no penalty to reach him." I cannot understand that position at all.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Would it not make everybody happy to take out that sanction against the employee? It is no good anyway. You cannot collect the fine.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: It is not worth a cent.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: It is worth nothing. So why not take it out for both parties? Then they will be even.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Honourable gentlemen, I agree with the honourable member from Welland that this Act has worked satisfactorily, and I think it would be a misfortune to amend it in any shape, except possibly, as has just been suggested, by removing that penalty clause against the employee. The Act is not compulsory in character. It has not been applied as obligatory upon the parties. Its intention is to establish a Board for the purpose of laying the actual facts of a dispute before the public, in order that a sane public opinion may exert a proper influence on both employer and employee. The report of the Board, if a Board is established, has no other effect. The Board may make any report, but employer or employee may disregard it.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: It gives good advice.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: That was the object of the law, and it has been working in that way. Now you want to introduce a penalty clause. So far as I am concerned—and this is a very strong reason with me—I am satisfied that it is not within the jurisdiction of this Parliament to introduce a penalty clause into that Act; and it was not within the jurisdiction of Parliament to introduce the clause to which the honourable leader of the Government has referred.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: It is no good anyhow.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The constitution is clear on that point. Civil rights are within the jurisdiction of the provinces only. Now, is not the right of contract one of the main civil rights? I contract with my employee and agree to pay him so many dollars a month. Am I to be prevented by the Parliament of Canada from changing that contract or, if I change it, shall I be penalized for doing so? I am perfectly satisfied that this is altogether outside the jurisdiction of the Federal Parliament.

Where is the propriety or desirability of raising a question of this kind? What will you do if, for instance, section 57 is amended as it is sought to have it amended by the Bill presented, as passed by the House of Commons? You would have this situation, that some companies would contest the right of Parliament to enact this legislation and there would be a disturbing element. When we are assured by both sides of this House that the Act has worked satisfactorily for seventeen years, why not leave the Act as it is and let it work satisfactorily? I am absolutely of the opinion—I repeat it—that the clause which seeks to penalize the employees is ultra vires. Even if it were not I would be in favour of eliminating it from the Act, and leaving the Act otherwise as it is.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: That would be fair to everybody.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would like to put a question to my honourable friend. At the meeting of the Railway Committee we heard the representatives of labour, who told us that by reason of the uniformly fair application of the Act they had gradually succeeded in convincing the labour element whom they represented that there was merit in it. Now, conditions have changed since 1907. Wage-earners who were striving for better conditions and better wages took advantage of the Act to accomplish their purpose. Now it is the turn of the employer, and he is trying to reduce wages. Of course, as hitherto, there will be resistance, and there will be a conflict. Here is a Conciliation Act. Does my honourable friend think that employers, by disregarding the requirements of the Act before the parties have been brought together, imposing their will on employees by reducing wages contrary to the letter and the spirit of the Act, will create such a situation as will enable a Board to bring the disputants into a conciliatory state of mind? The point that struck me in the argument of the labour leaders was that this Act is essentially a means of conciliation, tending to bring the parties together in an honest effort to compose their differences. Does my honourable friend think that the employer who, before the inquiry begins, or while it is being conducted, seeks to impose his will by reducing wages, will help towards a settlement being effected under this Act?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I am ready to answer the question, and I think it is quite easy. As I have said, it is admitted by both sides that the Act in its present form has worked satisfactorily. Have we observed that employers were inclined to disregard its provisions and act unfairly towards their employees? On the contrary, have not employers been as conciliatory as possible and obeyed the moral requirements of the Act? The statute, apart from any penalty clause, imposes upon both parties the obligation of seeking a settlement of their differences. Both parties have accepted that. We have it from the employees that they were against the idea of the Act, but they have learned to recognize its fairness and respect its provisions. No penalty clause has been imposed on either party. Now, where is the disturbing element? We must not suppose that employers will in future act otherwise than they have done in the past. If in the past the Act has worked properly, it must be supposed that it will act properly in the future. Why therefore, import into it any disturbing element for the benefit of either the employer or the employee? I quite agree that this provision should never have been put into the Act. Let us make it better for the workingman, and both parties will remain in their present state of mind, and will, I am satisfied, use the Act for purposes of conciliation.

Hon. L. C. WEBSTER: May I ask the leader of the Government whether there is an opinion in the Department of Labour as to the validity of the proposed amendment? In view of the statement made by the last speaker, I would assume that there is some doubt as to the validity of the proposed amendment and I would like to know whether an opinion has been given by the Minister of Justice on this point.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I do not see that the amendments being introduced alter to any extent the principle already contained in the Act. If these amendments are unconstitutional, most of the remainder of the Act could be attacked in a similar manner. We have had no judgment of the Privy Council upon the Act itself or any of its provisions. The Court of Appeal of Ontario has maintained the validity of the Act. Of course, it will be said that the Privy Council or the Supreme Court might pronounce differently, but so far the Act, which has been on the Statute Book since 1907, has not been attacked before the courts, and we are proceeding to amend it—not as often as my honourable friend from Hamilton (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton) has said, because I can find only three amendments since 1907—in order to perfect it. I do not believe that at this moment we should question our own jurisdiction, or that we should stay our hand in trying to perfect the Act.

It has been stated that there have been under the Act no prosecutions of employees or employers. I have a statement of prosecutions under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, and I find that there were two convictions of employers for illegal lockouts, and against employees there were two convictions for illegal strikes, one for inciting to strike and aiding strikers, three for striking illegally, inciting strikes, and aiding strikers, one injunction to restrain a union from encouraging a strike, and two injunctions to restrain board procedure.

Hon. Mr. GRIESBACH: Has the penalty been collected against employees? If so, how much?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have not had any information on that point.

Hon. L. C. WEBSTER: May I ask if these amendments do not go further in interfering with provincial rights than the matter that has already been referred to the Appeal Court of Ontario?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would not think so, because clause 57 has never been attacked. It declares:

> Employers and employees shall give at least thirty days notice of an impended change affecting conditions of employment with respect to wages or hours; and in every case where a dispute has been referred to a Board, until the dispute has been finally dealt with by the Board, neither of the parties nor the employees affected shall alter the conditions of employment with respect to wages or hours.

There you have a prohibition against doing a certain thing. The penalty clause against the employees covers the whole of 57, and clause 59 covers it partly, and has been on the Statute Book since I think 1909.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: We have been discussing almost the whole of the Bill on an amendment to the first clause. In order not to repeat an argument, perhaps I may be permitted to speak now on clause 2. The constitutionality of this clause has been doubted. The honourable leader of the House, when the Bill first came up, submitted to the House a judgment in Toronto Electric Commissioners vs. Snider, O'Donoghue and McGuigan. I understood the honourable gentleman to state that this was not a judgment of the court of last resort, but that of a very respectable tribunal, upholding the constitutionality of the Act. Perhaps the honourable leader's interpretation of that judgment went a little far. The judgment was rendered on an injunction, the purpose of which was to stop an investigation, and nothing else.

That there should be power in this Parliament to order an investigation there is no doubt; and I desire to read a paragraph of the judgment which states very clearly that it was not the intention to uphold any other power in the Act than the power of investigation. This is what the case was about:

> The plaintiffs ask the following relief: (1) a declaration that the defendants are, without lawful authority, acting as a Board of Concilation and Investigation into alleged disputes between the plaintiffs and certain of their employees;

(2) An injunction restraining the defendants and each of them from proceeding with the investigation or in the alternative for a perpetual injunction in the terms of an interim injunction granted herein by the Hon. Mr. Justice Orde.

Before rendering judgment this is what the tribunal said:

It is not, I think, necessary for the decision of the case at bar to pass upon the constitutional validity of any sections or provision in this Act which do not deal with the powers of the Board, and consequently it is not necessary to consider the constitutional validity of sections 56 to 61 which deal with strikes and lock-outs prior to and pending a reference to a Board of Inquiry.

Therefore it is quite evident that this judgment can have no bearing whatever on clauses 56 to 61, and in particular clauses 57 and 58. But there is an authority which I have at hand, and which is of rather recent date. It comes from the Department of Justice. This House has been asking for a long time to be provided by the Government, for the enlightenment of its members in weighing the provisions of this Act, with an opinion from the Department of Justice. This is what Mr. Newcombe says—

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: To whom is that letter written?

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: I have not got that. I know it is a copy of a letter. I think it was asked for by Mr. Church, the member of the lower House for Toronto North.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Was it produced in Parliament?

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: I do not know. I know it comes from Mr. Newcombe, and was handed to Mr. Church. This is what it says:

Referring to your letter of the 31st ultimo, with regard to an application which the Minister of Labour has received for a Board of Conciliation and Investigation concerning a difference between the Toronto Hydro-Electric Power Commission and its employees of the classes described as electric workers, I find that the Toronto Hydro-Electric System is managed by a Board of Commissioners consisting of the Mayor, a member appointed by the Municipal Council and a member appointed by the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario, and it may I think properly be described as a municipal institution in the Province.

I observe that in the letters to which you have directed my attention I have questioned both the interpretation of the Industrial Disputes Investigations Act, 1907, and the authority of Parliament with relation to provincial or municipal employers and their employees. You suggest that in this particular case the authority of the Minister should be determined as precisely as possible.

It is I think apparent that the real purpose of the Industrial Disputes Investigations Act, 1907, is to regulate relations as between employers and employees of the respective classes to which the Act is intended to apply, with a view to the prevention of lock-outs and strikes. The Act provides for the establishment of a Board of Conciliation and Investigation, which is empowered to enquire into the dispute and all matters affecting the merits and the right settlement thereof, and if possible to bring about a fair and amicable arrangement; failing this to report the facts and circumstances, the findings of the Board and its recommendation to the Minister, and pending the reference and enquiry employer and employees are respectively prohibited from lock-out or strike. Penalties are provided for breach of the latter provision, but these are a necessary incident, providing sanction and establishing the compulsory character of the Act; and, while doubtless they operate by themselves as criminal enactments, I entertain very serious doubt that the Act in its general scope and intent can be sought to apply the Act in relation to municipalities and their employees, or to disputes in relation to matters of a merely local or private nature in the Province, I am very doubtful indeed that effect can be given to its provisions compatibly with the exclusive authority which is committed to the provincial legislatures.

The question is one which cannot be precisely determined except by judicial authority, and I can only say that upon my best consideration of the whole case I would anticipate an adverse judgment from the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council if the question came before that tribunal as to the authority of the Minister to subject the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Toronto to the operation of the Act.

The honourable leader will notice that there is weighed the right of this Parliament, and through it of the Minister, to deal with an Act which concerns not only a municipal corporation, but also a company within the jurisdiction of the province. The purpose of this Act is to constrain both parties to maintain an agreement involving civil rights. For that reason I think the Act is certainly ultra vires; at all events, if the Act is passed, it should only be passed subject to a favourable opinion from the Supreme Court.

Just one more word. My honourable friend has taxed me with holding his own opinion as to the law itself. I did not intend to state, even if I did so, that I considered the law perfect by any means. This law is not on trial. He forgot altogether about the amendments which alone are on trial, and therefore the authorities which he brought before us in relation to the Act itself are without any weight whatsoever. Whatever may be my opinion as to the law, the people who approved it in the past did not approve the amendments. Therefore I say to the honourable gentlemen: Do not call them as witnesses; you can only have them as witnesses on a law which is not on trial at all; we are now judging on their merits amendments to the law. That is what I meant, and that is all.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Mr. Chairman, I submit humbly and with respect that we are losing time. I take it that this Chamber is not going to decide that this Act, which has been in operation seventeen or eighteen years, is ultra vires because someone has questioned its constitutionality. We have got to carry on and secure the administration of this Act until some more competent court declares it ultra vires. It seems to me that all this discussion of constituticnality is an absolute waste of time. Parliament assumed to enact this legislation, and has helped to enforce it for seventeen or eighteen years, and Parliament cannot of its own motion declare it to be ultra vires.

With regard to the amendment now proposed by the Government, the effect of which will be to impose upon the employer a penalty somewhat in the nature of that imposed upon the employee, the question presents itself to me in this way. It has been suggested that the Government should not make that amendment, but one, which I understand my neighbour is about to propose, removing the penalty imposed on the employees. I do not think we have any evidence to show that the imposition of the penalty has not had a very good effect. I am inclined to think it has had a good effect. The same argument seems quite as justly applicable to the employer as to the employee. I think the Act would be more efficacious if a penalty were imposed on both parties. The validity of the Act has been questioned all along, and we have spent a couple of hours to-day discussing it. There is an impression that the Act does not amount to much. Why not then put into it a penalty which would compel both parties interested in enforcing the Act to try to carry it out? The very fact that the Act is questioned imposes upon Parliament the duty of putting into that Act some teeth, as the honourable gentleman from Montarville (Hon. Mr. Beaubien) has said, to assure its having some results. My own opinion, therefore, is that the Government amendment should be carried, and that until some court decides that the Bill is unconstitutional it is the duty of Parliament to treat such action as being perfectly within our power. It does not behoove Parliament to admit that an Act which it has passed and acted upon for seventeen years is ultra vires. We cannot act on that assumption until some court of justice declares the Act ultra vires.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The purpose of the amendment in clause 1 is to meet the case of a divergence of opinion where the parties have been unable to come together.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Does it not mean this, that the employees are dissatisfied, they want a conference with the employer, and the employer refuses to enter into negotiations? I thought that was up last year and we refused to pass it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No; it passed. This only refers to an application for a Board. It relates, as my honourable friend will find if he reads the whole clause, only to the procedure regarding the statutory declaration which must accompany the application for a Board.

Hon. L. C. WEBSTER: Before clause 1 is passed I wish to move an amendment which affects section 8 of the Act, whereas clause 1, as I understand, deals with section 15. The amendment that I wish to move is as follows.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Is it an amendment to clause 1 that my honourable friend would move?

Hon. Mr. WEBSTER: It affects section 8, which is prior to section 15, the section we are now discussing.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would ask my honourable friend to allow this clause of the Bill to be dealt with first. When it has been dealt with he may bring in an amendment to another clause.

Hon. Mr. WEBSTER: But if section 15 is not coming up at all, I want to have my amendment considered by the House.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But we cannot consider two clauses at the same time. We must first concentrate our attention on clause 1, and when we have disposed of it we may proceed further. Will you put the motion, Mr. Chairman?

The Hon. the CHAIRMAN: In the first place, is it the wish of the Committee that the amendment should be suspended?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: May I ask, Mr. Chairman, what is the amendment?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It relates to coal mining.

The Hon. the CHAIRMAN (reading):

Paragraph c of section 2 of the Industrial Disputes investigation Act, 1907, is hereby repealed and the following substituted therefor:—

c. "Employer" means any person, company or corporation employing ten or more persons and owning or operating any coal mining property—

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Do I understand that the honourable leader of the House wants all the amendments suspended until we at least adopt section 1 of the Bill?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would like to have the consideration of this Bill proceed on regular lines. We are now dealing with section 1. If there is no objection to section 1, we shall agree to it, and then proceed to section 2, which contains an amendment to section 57 of the Act. Then my honourable friend may move an amendment.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: I have no objection, provided we have the right to come back with our amendments, even after you have passed section 1, 2 or 3 of the Bill. Regularly, the amendments should go first. However, we will pass section 1.

Section 1 was agreed to.

On section 2—new section 57—relation of parties to remain unchanged pending proceedings before a Board.

Hon. L. C. WEBSTER: I move this amendment:

If either of the parties fail or neglect to make any recommendation within the said period, or such extension thereof as the Minister, on cause shown, grants, the Chief Justice of the Province in which the dispute—

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No, no, that has nothing to do with this clause.

Hon. Mr. WEBSTER: Then I do not know where it comes in.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: That is another thing. That would be a new clause inserted in the Act.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It is not an amendment to the clause before us.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: That is another thing: that is an addition—a new clause.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I understand that the Committee is on clause 2 of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Then I move that clause 2 of the Bill be amended by striking out all after the word "therefor" in the fifth line, and substituting the following:

It shall be unlawful for any employer without the consent of a majority of the employees evidenced in writing, signed by them or their authorized representatives, or for any employee to make any change in the conditions of employment with respect to wages or hours, unless the party making the change has at least thirty days before doing so applied for the appointment of a Board to which the dispute shall be submitted and, as regards wages, the Board may declare its decision retroactive to any date not anterior to that on which the change was made. On the failure of either party to abide by the decision of the Board, the other party may have recourse to a strike or lockout as the case may be.

It is the same amendment which I proposed last year, and which was adopted by this honourable House, with the exception that I have introduced into it now the words "at least thirty days," which were not in the amendment last year. This is seeking to give the employers or the employees the right of changing the conditions of their employment by giving notice of the change, one to the other, at least thirty days before applying for the appointment of a Board, and I think it is fair to both parties.

I think I appreciate, as much as anybody can, the benefit of this Act. I am in sympathy with the workers. I believe that their conditions have been very much improved within the last fifty years, and that they were entitled to such improvement. I am in sympathy with their associations, and I think that this law has had a good effect. But I cannot reconcile myself to the unfairness of denying the employers or the employees the right, if they choose to do so, of changing the conditions of employment after giving 30 days' notice to the other parties or the employers being compelled to pay the increase before the award is made. As was mentioned the other day, it meant $500,000 a month for one company, and it may take three months, or four months, or six months before the award is made, and in the meantime the employer would be obliged to pay this large amount of wages to his employees, which would never be recovered. I fail to see the propriety or reasonableness of any law of that kind. I move this amendment because it is shocking to the sense of justice that any law of that kind should be on the Statute Book.

I have no doubt that in the future, as in the past, employers especially will be responsive to public opinion, and will be inclined to make concessions, and great concessions, to their employees, and I would approve of their doing so; but between this and being compelled to pay, for months and months, wages which should not fairly be paid, is going too far, in my opinion.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, we had this argument already with the representatives of labour in the Committee which was appointed to hear them, and I desire to put their view on this proposed amendment as fairly as possible before this House. They say, and I think we all agree, that this Act was passed to try to prevent strikes; to try to maintain harmony between employer and employee. For that purpose the Act organizes the machinery that allows the parties to be brought together around a table with arbitrators who are there to make an effort to reconcile the conflicting interests. That is the object of the Act—to bring together those two parties, capital and labour, in order that peace may reign in the land.

As a result of the working of this Act we have had a statement made by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association in the present month, June, with this result:

> The Association Committee expresses great satisfaction with the Lemieux Act for settling industrial disputes, and points out that out of 580 disputes referred under the Act there have been only 36 cases in which strikes were not averted.

Now, is not this an extraordinarily advantageous result of legislation passed by this Parliament?

What do the labour people answer to this proposal of my honourable friend? That the Act had stated, from 1907, that, there should be no change; pending a bringing together of the parties for a free discussion of their difficulties; that until a report was made the situation should remain unaltered. In virtue of this amendment the employer would give notice to the employees that he had applied for a Board, and that 30 days hence he would reduce the wages. The Board would then have to be organized, would have to start its sessions, would hear witnesses, and if it had not succeeded in bringing the parties to an adjustment of their difficulties within those 30 days, then when the fatal hour intervened the conditions would be changed, the wages would be lowered, and the next day there would be a strike. Well, that is just what the Act wants to prevent—a strike. It is just that rupture which the Act seeks to avoid.

My honourable friend says that the employer may be paying large sums of money, and yet he is held up pending the inquiry, and is obliged to pay the old wage reluctantly until the report is made, and as a result half a million dollars in wages may go into the hands of the employees against the will of the employer. That is true, but that is looking only at one side of the problem and it is an exeptional case where an employer will pay $500,000 for a month pending inquiry. The employers in the case cited were the railway companies—the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National Railways. They are the largest employers of labour in the country. So that the case is an extreme one. But let us admit that that increased wage represented $500,000 in a month, that the inquiry lasted two months, and that a cool million dollars was paid to the wage-earners which the employers would otherwise not be obliged to pay. Now, that is the debit side: the companies have paid $1,000,000. It is true that they could perhaps have taken time by the forelock, and knowing that there would be a demand for a Board, and that the inquiry would last two months or more, they could have foreseen that necessary delay, and made their decision for a reduced wage in time to cover that outlay. But let us say that they were in such a position that they could not take time by the forelock, and that they would have been made to pay $1,000,000 in a couple of months. We must remember that this is an extreme case, connected with our biggest institution, employing the largest number of people; yet, although the railway companies of Canada paid that $1,000,000, they were still the beneficiaries jointly with all the people of Canada. They paid the million; that is the debit side. But, on the other hand, they got no strike, no disorganization; their business continued, while if they had refused to go into that arbitration they would have had a strike, for a large majority had voted for a strike, and how long the strike would have lasted we do not know. Surely a strike of a month, paralyzing all of our railway systems would represent more than a million dollars, and the whole of the business of Canada would have been dislocated.

There are three parties to this matter: the employer, the employee and the public. We are dealing with public utilities. I take the extreme case of my honourable friend, which is the largest example that he can give, representing a large outlay and a large loss; but I say that that is a very small sum compared with the fact that the company maintained its system, maintained harmony and goodwill, and gave satisfaction to the men.

In the case that my honourable friend mentioned, what happened? The Board decided against the men, but the men had gone to that arbitration and had met their employers; they had come together; and, although they had voted by a very large majority two months before in favour of a strike, they agreed to the verdict of the Board and accepted the lower wage. I do not know if that return was compensation for the increased wage that they had received for two months, but I appeal to this Chamber to answer this question: did not the railway companies get far more in return by the satisfaction given to the men, by avoiding a strike, and by securing that their affairs would run on smoothly?

The labour leaders who were heard in the Committee were against this amendment, because it makes against the conciliatory spirit, and threatens the vitality, the essence, of the Act itself, which is conciliation. If the Senate of Canada thinks that the employer should have the right to reduce wages from the moment that he decides to do so, it is perhaps as well to accept the principle purely and simply rather than to say 30 days; because what would be the effect on those people who are to confer peacably around a table for an adjustment of their differences on hearing the news coming to them that while they were trying to adjust their differences the conditions were altered and the wage scale was lowered?

I do not believe that the proposed amendment makes for happy conditions, for harmony between capital and labour; and for this reason I would press my honourable friend not to insist on his amendment.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I have very few words to say in answer to the honourable gentleman. The employers had the right under the Act to change conditions and wages, as they did change them. They were not obliged to continue to pay the increased wages, but they did so by way of conciliation; and though it involved an amount of a million dollars, it might have involved three or four millions if it had continued for three or four months, and I doubt if they would have continued for that length of time.

Now, I would be willing, and I think we would act wisely, to leave the Act as it was; but I am moving that amendment because the Government, or the honourable gentleman, is seeking to change the operation of the Act. He wants to put the employers under a severe penalty clause, and thereby make it to the interest of the workers to act in such a way as to defer as long as possible the report of the Board. If this amendment be adopted we may have Boards rendering their decision within a month or two, both parties being interested in trying to have the decision as soon as possible, whereas we might have employees interested in prolonging the delay as much as possible, and have the award thrown over for four or five or six months. Where, then, would be the fairness of forcing the employers in the meantime to pay the additional wages?

We are now discussing the question as regards the railway employees, but we must not lose sight of the other cases. If this Act is to be applied to other companies, especially to mining companies, it might affect a great number of companies that would not be in a position to continue to pay the advanced wages. They would have to stop operations if compelled to continue to pay high wages, or they could be penalized and proceeded against under the Act. Where is the fairness of a law of that kind?

I think that the honourable gentleman need not be afraid that railway employers and large employers in industry of all kinds will not be conciliatory. They are interested in being conciliatory with their employees, and it would only be as a last resort that they would change the conditions; but to deprive them from their right to change conditions after one month's notice is going too far, I think, and for my part I could not consent to withdraw the amendment.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I think this controversy clearly shows the wisdom of leaving the Act alone until we find that some hard case has arisen, or there is some real reason for amendment. Many people are busy all the time in trying to get this Act amended.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But I may tell my honourable friend that we have had those conditions.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: The necessity for this clause has not been shown here. I do not agree with the amendment, and I certainly do not agree with this clause, but I would rather vote for the amendment than for the clause. I think, however, we would be doing far better to leave the law alone.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Honourable gentlemen, in view of the remarks of the honourable member from Hamilton (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton) and also some made by the honourable member from Montarville (Hon. Mr. Beaubien) some time ago, there is evidently a feeling in the minds of honourable gentlemen that there has been no reasonable justification or necessity for the amendments now before the House, as presented by the Government.

I do not want to weary the House, but I do want to make it clear that these amendments were sought last year, and are before us again this year, not simply because of any desire to discuss the Act and attempt to amend it, but because of a very real and realized injustice which the railway employees in Canada experienced first in 1921, and nearly experienced again in 1922.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Nearly experienced, you say?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Yes. On June 16th, 1921, all the railways in Canada, through the Railway Association, gave notice to their employees collectively through the various organizations that on July 16th, 1921, or 30 days thereafter, a perpendicular decrease in wages aggregating an average of about $13 per month to each employee—there being approximately 200,000 of those employees—would arbitrarily go into effect. Now, honourable gentlemen, 200,000 employees suffering a reduction of $13 a month would mean, roughly, $2,600,000. It is fair to say that that action of the railway companies, which the Department of Justice of the Government of Canada has said was contrary to the law of Canada, forced upon the railway employees of Canada a loss of $2,000,000 a month. That is a fact. That is the reason why the employees subsequently approached the Government and said, "Won't you please change the Act so that it will apply equitably and equally to all concerned?"

Now, the question arises whether or not the amendment is necessary to bring about that result. Let me briefly show how the Act has worked in years gone by to the detriment of the employees, and the loss they have sustained by reason of complying with the requirements of the law. When a wage increase has been made on our Canadian railways—and this question has not arisen in any other industry—it has always arisen first with the men at home feeling the need. They began to talk about it, and then brought it to the attention of those who represented them and had to speak for them to the employer; and it frequently occurred that it took months from the time the pinch was felt before the request was made to the employer for the increase that was sought. Then negotiations were begun with the employer, after they had been carefully prepared and submitted. Then the employer, with the 30 days notice that must be given him under the law, sat down and discussed these proposals, and weeks went by in negotiations. At the end of that time an agreement was not reached, and under the law the employees had to apply for a Board. For 17 years they complied with that law, and waited until the matter was referred to a Board, and the Board made its report as the law required.

Subsequently, after all those weeks, and frequently months, of delay, the Board would render a decision, and it would then be for the respective parties to accept or reject the recommendations made. The records of the Department of Labour over a long term of years show that in a large majority of cases the investigation and calm consideration usually resulted in the recommendations of the disinterested tribunal being accepted by both parties, and an interruption of public service avoided.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: In whose favour was it?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: It was usually determined on the merits of the case. Now, I want to point out, honourable gentlemen, that in every one of those cases, extending over that long period of years, the employees invariably lost heavily—a loss that cannot be estimated in dollars, because it is impossible to compute it—by reason of the postponement of the effective date of the decision, or agreement, as the case might be.

It was explained to the Railway Committee of this House, and emphasized by a number of gentlemen appearing for the employees the other day, that for many years labour was opposed to this Bill because of the unfairness perpetrated on workmen by reason of that very fact that it postponed the day of settlement, to the very substantial advantage of the employer every time. That went on from 1907 until 1920, in fact until 1921, when a condition set in in Canada that had never existed before, namely, that there was a drop in the cost of living. Ever since that Act had been in force our experience in Canada was that gradually there had been from year to year a slight increase in the cost of living, sometimes more and sometimes less, and therefore the trend of wages was always upward. It was therefore always to the advantage of the employers that the date of settlement and of payment should be postponed as far as possible—and I am not blaming employers for that for a moment; not at all.

The exception that the men take to what has occurred since then is that just as soon as the sun began to shine on the other side of the mountain, and just as soon as the cost of living began to decline a little, the employer thought that wages should be reduced a little; and nobody can blame him for so thinking, for conditions warranted a change of some sort. But we do say that the employer should have approached the situation as the employee would have to approach it, and had approached it for 16 years up to that time, and should not have put into force a reduction of wages which was contrary to the law, as stated by the Department of Justice, and have taken from the men $2,000,000 a month. If I take from another man's pocket what rightfully belongs to him, under the law I am subject to a penalty. Yet it is held here by some gentlemen—and I am sure it is a mistaken view—that the railway company has a right to go into the pockets of the employees and take out of their pockets that money, and not be subject to a penalty.

I feel strongly on this point, and on calm reflection I do not think you will blame one for urging that whatever law may be enacted by the Parliament of Canada to govern the activities of employers and workmen, the object should be to maintain industrial peace, and especially to encourage the spirit of conciliation; but that object will never be accomplished by the enactment of the amendment that my honourable friend from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) suggests, or by retaining the Act in its present form.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: This matter was discussed last year, and I have forgotten what the answer was. If the railways make what you call a perpendicular cut in wages to-day, and then there is a Board, would not the arbitrators ante-date their award if the increase was found to be just?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: They are required to do that if it is the right thing.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: No, it is entirely within the jurisdiction and power of the Board of Conciliation to make its recommendation as it sees fit as to the effective date.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Then where is the injustice? Supposing there is a cut, say of $13, made to-day, then there is a Board appointed, and the Board say that the cut was not justified, and they award $13, will not the railway have to pay it?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Yes.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Then where is the loss?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I say yes, but I want to amend my answer. The railway company may exercise its own judgment as to whether it pays it or not.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: It does pay it according to the award, always.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: No. My honourable friend raises the question as to whether a railroad company in Canada has ever refused to accept an award of a Board. I want to say yes. Only last year a Board of Conciliation rendered a unanimous report covering not only one railway company but practically all our railway companies in Canada, affecting a large class of men that number more than 20,000 in the railway service of this country. The unanimous report of that Board recommended an increase in wages for that class of men, but the railways unanimously and collectively refused to accept the recommendation of the Board.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: And what happens?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: The increase did not go into effect, because they refused, as was their right, to which I am taking no exception.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Was there a strike?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: No, there was not. The men capitulated after the Board rendered its decision—it was coming on to the fall of the year, and they felt that it was not desirable to make trouble—and subsequently I think some compromise adjustment was made, although I am not sure of the details, because I was not directly connected with it. So the grievance the men have had is that they think that when the railway companies—I do not want to single out railway companies particularly, but they have been the only offenders in this regard—when the railway companies or the employers want to reduce wages, they should call in the men, or the representatives of the men, and attempt to reach an agreement, as the men have to do when they seek a revision. If they cannot reach an agreement, let them apply for a Board, and the Board will be established and will sit and adjudicate upon the case, and will render its decision. Both parties will then be on an equal footing. But do not say to the employer, because the tide is turning and the trend of wages is downward instead of upward: "You are going to have an advantage that was denied to the employees when the tendency was upward instead of downward."

Hon. Mr. GRIESBACH: My understanding disappears at a certain point in this discussion. What is the essential difference between the clause as it now stands and the clause as proposed with respect to the difference in conditions occasioned by the fact that wages have been going up instead of down?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: If the leader of the Government will permit me—

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The question seems to be addressed to my honourable friend.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: The law requires that if an agreement is not reached, a Board must be applied for. During the fifteen years when it fell to the lot of employees to seek changes, they always applied for a Board, as the law required. When the time arrived that the cost of living turned downwards—1921 being the first year when we experienced that —the railway companies desired to decrease wages in keeping with an adjustment in the United States which resulted in a strike of 400,000 men over there. But instead of it resulting in a strike here, although the men would have been justified, they applied for a Board, even though that obligation rested on the employing company which was seeking the change. One of the amendments sought is to require the party seeking the change to make the application.

Hon. Mr. GRIESBACH: Did I understand you to say that the existing law did require it?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Yes.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Now there is a fine.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: We are getting now to the point where the real meat is found.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Where the teeth come in.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: There was no penalty for the violation of the Act. That was admitted in the Department of Justice at that time. Two penalties are provided: one against employers, for indulging in a lockout, and one against workmen for indulging in an illegal strike; but in this particular case the employing company put into effect a wage reduction, for which there was no penalty.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Does not the honourable gentleman know that a breach of a statute is an indictable offence?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Then my honourable friend has no objection to putting it in the Act.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: It is in the Criminal Code. We do not need to add a superfluous clause.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: There is one point that ought to be cleared up.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Only one?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I think we have got it down to that. The amendment provides that when a Board is granted the arbitrators may make their award relate back. If that is so, take the case of the railway company that has reduced the wages for three months, and that has $3,000,000 or $4,000,000 belonging to the men, the company cannot escape paying that, because you are arguing this case on the assumption that the legislation is intra vires. They are both parties to the arbitration, and the Privy Council has decided in two cases, that where there is no other way of enforcing an award, the party interested can make them pay. It is true that is involved in the amendment, and that making the award retroactive takes the sting out of nearly everything that is said with respect to everything else that is urged against the amendment. Now, take the employer. There is an award, and it relates back, and the men can collect it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It is not an award; it is simply a recommendation, a report.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I do not care what it is. It must be something. Both parties have agreed.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: It could not form the basis of a civil action.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Why not?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Both parties have agreed to sit around a table and to submit the facts and allow the arbitrators to give their opinion to the Minister of Labour.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: It is like the League of Nations.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: If it does not relate back, and has no effect, I think the whole thing is moonshine and that we had better drop it.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: After all the proceedings you can take under the Act have been taken, and are terminated, everybody comes out with just the same rights he had when he went in. Anything that is done under the Industrial Disputes Act does not give or deprive anyone of any right he had when the investigation began.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: But there is an important point in connection with the amendment that I should like to dwell upon briefly. In his amendment the honourable gentleman seeks to be absolutely fair, and to treat both parties equally up to a period of thirty days after the application is made. It may be a peculiar position for me to take, nevertheless I try to see these things from the standpoint of what I believe to be in the public interest, as well as from the standpoint of a more or less personal interest. Let me demonstrate what would occur if the honourable gentleman's amendment were the law, and that the thirty days had expired from the time an application had been made by employees for a Board. Those employees are members of an organization financially strong and well fixed, and are only chafing because of the restrictions which this Act places upon them. They, however, comply with the law, and make an application before the Board, not caring whether it sits or not.

Thirty days go by, and immediately they say: "We are free under the law," and, as we say on the railroad, "Pull the pin," and the strike is on.

I submit, honourable gentlemen, that that is not a good law for this House to pass. I think it would be better that the clause as it stands in the proposed Bill should continue in force, and that until that investigation is completed, and a disinterested tribunal has filed its report and you have had time to sit down carefully and realize your obligations, the pin should not be pulled. Many organizations and bodies of labour men would be glad to be relieved of that obligation, but I say it is not in the public interest that it should be done. That is one of the reasons why I hope the amendment of my honourable friend will not prevail.

I supported his amendment last year—it did not go that far—because I felt that it was the best that could be done under the circumstances; but he did not propose to make it equal on both sides and operative both ways. Knowing the weaknesses and frailties of workingmen as well as other men, I think it is undesirable, and indeed dangerous, to pass the amendment that my honourable friend has submitted. If that be true—and I am quite sure honourable gentlemen will agree that it is true that it would be unwise to leave open the loophole on that side—is it not equally correct to say that if the employer desires a change in existing conditions or rates of pay, as covered by the agreement with his employees, he should likewise comply with the requirements of the Act? If he would reach an agreement with his employees, let him apply for a Board of Conciliation and Investigation and not disturb conditions until the Board has investigated and made its report. Honourable gentlemen will appreciate and can visualize what would happen if a Board were endeavouring to compose differences and in the midst of the Board's investigations that thirtieth day arrived and either party or both were just waiting for the clock to strike, that they might jump at each other and have a row. That Conciliation Board's prospects of success would be very remote. I am satisfied, therefore, that on reflection honourable gentlemen will agree that if the law is right in principle—and I am sure we all concede that it is, because experience has proven it to be—it is not wise now to make a change that would interject a fighting spirit, instead of the spirit of conciliation. Knowing full well, as I do, that the honourable member from de Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Beique) has moved his amendment in a sincere desire to find some medium course that would be helpful towards obtaining good results from the standpoint of conciliation, I am sure he will realize on reflection that the amendment would not have this effect, and I hope he will reconsider it. I move, Mr. Chairman, that the Committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again, and I would suggest that my honourable friend—

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: No, no.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: No, no. Question! It is nearly six o'clock.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: Honourable gentlemen, I do not know whether you are disposed to sit for five minutes longer—

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Certainly. We will sit until 6.15, and try to reach a vote.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER: But before the vote is taken, if it is desired to take a vote in a very thin House, I would like to say a word on the subject. I have been a listener, both last year and at the present Session, to the debate on this whole question. I have not said anything on either side. I have been trying sometimes to get out of the fog, and have been more often in it than out of it. However, I see my way pretty clearly now, and I desire to say to this House, in a few words, how I view the situation. I am not unmindful of the troubles that have occurred between labour and capital during the last fifty years; and I am not oblivious, either, of the fact that during the last twenty-five years the relations between labour and capital have vastly improved and that the temper of the two sides has veered around almost entirely. From mortal combatants on a field of battle they have changed to men who as human beings had interests in common and were ready to compromise. They had to have a sort of feeling that either of them might be wrong, or that both of them might be right, and that in either case probably a compromise was the best way of solving the difficulties. The human element has prevailed. Everybody knows, and it has been acknowledged on both sides of this House, that from 1907 there began on the labour side a spirit of gradual approach towards the contemplation of that law as a thing which might be advantageous to labour and under which employees might work for their own benefit. They were absolutely suspicious of it at first, and they remained to a certain extent suspicious of it year after year, but gradually they overcame their prejudices, lost a good deal of their suspicion, and came to work under the law as well, I think, as any body of men have been induced to work under any law. They have, in the main, kept the spirit of the law. They have obtained its advantages and have suffered whatever disadvantages came to them through their compliance with the statute. Therefore we find to-day a mightly improved spirit as between these two vast sections of our people, upon whose good relations with each other depends so much that third body of the people, the main body, who are always affected one way or another by these disputes between capital and labour.

I would hate to see anything take place to-day which would be a sort of reversion from that feeling of gradual approach to the Act by the labour and industrial portion of our people, and their appreciation of its usefulness. These new amendments proposed by my honourable friend and others are offered in the very best spirit and with the very best intention, but unless there is some mighty good reason or great urgency at the present time, I think it would be a pity to make any break which would lead the labour element to the conclusion that, after all, they had not been getting where they supposed they were getting—towards a basis of human agreement, one party with the other, without strife and war. This is the only consideration that weighs with me.

I ask any honourable member of this House whether, after studying the history and statistics of this Act and receiving the impress of the lesson from them, he does not think there has been a great improvement. Has not the labour element obeyed that law in its essence and its spirit in a very satisfactory way? Is it absolutely necessary now to run the risk of breaking that spirit of agreement and unity by forcing this proposed legislation? Could it not at least be left over until there are actual transactions which make the changes in the statute necessary as well as advantageous to the country as a whole? I hate war in every respect, and I think there is no more foolish way of trying to settle disputes between labour and capital than by strikes, in which the third party has to take the worst consequences and neither of the disputants, by stirring up the spirit of warfare and contention, get in the long run any advantage. The farther away we get from that method, the better.

With reference to the amendment of my honourable friend, I think that what the former Minister of Labour (Hon. Mr. Robertson) has said bears very strongly upon this. At the end of the thirty days both parties are told: "Boys, you have been trying to come together, but have not succeeded. Now, at the end of thirty days, the employer may reduce the wages and you are both free to fight." The labour man will have an incentive to go into that fight. To my mind, it is taking a bond off him and leaving him in a position in which he may not obey the purpose and intent of the law. He will probably find a jumping-off place, and the result will be a rupture and a fight which may continue for a long time. Now, in the fights that take place the third party is surely always the party that suffers the most, and has to put up with all the inconvenience. Here you have hovering over this capital to-day a possible rupture in one of the great services of this country. You have on one side labour in those different positions, which says, "Our salary is not sufficient; it has been looked into; we have got a decision of the Civil Service Commission; it has come to a certain point; there has been a betterment, but it is not what we ought to have." On the other hand, you have the Government, and you have the institutions under the law, which have come to a conclusion and made an award. But one side is not agreeable to that award; and suppose that break takes place, and suppose that mighty service from one end of this country to the other immediately ceases to function, we can hardly sense what would be the condition of this country during the next week or fortnight or month or two or three months, if a struggle of that kind should go on. That illustrates the immense importance of trying to keep along the line of order, and of human sympathy, and of compromise.

It is with reference to these things that I hate to see a break made, as I feel it will be made if we insist on some of these amendments which are now before this Chamber.

In a very imperfect way I have given you my view, which is simply this, that for myself I shall vote against the amendment of my honourable friend, because it will be not only ineffective, but it will incite to worse things than would happen if it was not a part of the statute.

On the other hand, I am much impressed with this, that when you have established the spirit of a law, the next thing to do is to see that it is made effective, and if a law cannot be made effective without a penalty, a reasonable penalty ought to be put on. Why should it not be? It seems to me that the argument is sound and clear and irrefutable that if Parliament had come to the conclusion that a principle is right, it is a fair thing to impose a penalty in order to make one side or the other adhere to the principle of the law; otherwise, it would be better to take the principle out of the Bill and not put it in effect. On that account I think it is proper to place the penalty in the Bill, and I hope that this honourable House will at least give it the very deepest consideration. But do not let us in these times undertake legislation which, certainly to my mind, will have the effect of making much worse the conditions as between labour and capital.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Do I understand from what the right honourable gentleman says that he considers the amendment proposed perfectly equitable?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: What amendment?

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: The amendment which we are now discussing.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The amendment of the honourable member from De Salaberry?

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: No, I am talking of the amendment in the Bill. I want to know from the right honourable gentleman whether he believes in all sincerity that the penalties imposed on workmen, when they are 3,000 or 4,000 or 6,000, can be collected.
