BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1995–96

The House resumed, from March 2 consideration of the motion that Bill C–73, an act to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year beginning on April 1, 1995, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mr. Stéphane Bergeron (Verchères, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak to the budget that was brought down Monday by the Minister of Finance.

Not that I am particularly pleased with the provisions it contains, far from it. Nevertheless, I feel it is my duty as a parliamentarian to engage in a critical analysis of the budgetary measures proposed by the government and to report on my conclusions in this House. I admit it was not very difficult to be critical of a budget I would qualify as insidious and inequitable.

This budget is disappointing in several respects, and perhaps I may elaborate.

I think that first of all, it can be said that the budget contains no specific measures for economic recovery and job creation, which is unusual, to say the least, considering the government's emphasis on these issues. Need I recall that during the election campaign in 1993, the Liberal Party promised it would champion job creation and fight unemployment?

My constituents, Quebecers and Canadians are still waiting for this vigorous recovery and the jobs promised in the Liberal Party's red book, which the Prime Minister brandished repeatedly as a sure fire recipe for prosperity. There is nothing new in this budget to create jobs and worse, the Liberal government has, without any compunction, made cuts in the only sizeable job creation program it managed to come up with so far, and I am referring to the infrastructure program.

This program was supposed to create nearly 45,000 jobs—temporary jobs—over a period of three years. The budget intends to cut about $200 million from this program over the next three years, which will inevitably result in the withdrawal of equivalent amounts by participating provinces and municipalities. So altogether, $600 million less will be spent on job creation over the next three years.

What is more, the government is virtually cancelling out the expected effects of the infrastructure program by laying off some 45,000 public servants over the next three years. This is exactly the number of temporary jobs that this program was to create, before it was announced that the program would be spread over five years.

Clearly this budget is continuing the practice instituted by the previous government of going after the unemployed instead of tackling unemployment itself. For instance, despite a significant surplus in the unemployment insurance fund, the government is announcing cuts of 10 per cent in the unemployment insurance budget. Needless to say the federal government is on the wrong track if it thinks that this sort of measure will help find work for the some 800,000 people who are unemployed and looking for work in Quebec.

While the fight against the deficit is being waged on the backs of the unemployed and public servants in the government's budget, and I will definitely come back to this point later on, we must also recognize that it is being waged at a cost to the provinces.

With its brief passages in French alluding clearly to the referendum, the Minister of Finance's speech spoke of the dynamic and changing nature of Canadian federalism based on the pseudo decentralization project, which is nothing more than a hollow promise and a huge operation to dump the federal deficit into the laps of the provinces. They will have no choice but to cut public services and increase income or other taxes or pass the cost on to the municipalities.

Not wanting to spoil its chances in the upcoming referendum, the federal government is taking great care to put off its sinister plan to make massive cuts in transfers to the provinces until next year, that is, until after the referendum. It will be cutting $2.5 billion in 1996–97 and $4.5 billion in 1997–98. And the $7 billion cuts announced in the 1995 budget will be in addition to the $48 billion cuts in transfers to the provinces since 1982 and the $2 billion cuts in the 1994–95 budget.

The worst part of it all is that the provinces will have to continue to meet the standards defined by Ottawa. Those that fail to do so will be immediately deprived of what remains of federal funding, that is an increasingly paltry amount.

Furthermore, this so–called decentralization program will certainly not eliminate duplication, there will always be two ministers of health, two ministers of natural resources, of the environment, of revenue, etc. The alleged project to give more power to the provinces is hollow, because the federal government is not withdrawing from areas that come under provincial jurisdiction in exchange for a share of the taxes we pay to Ottawa. Is federalism cost effective?

For Quebec in 1996–97, these forecasts represent a reduction of almost $700 million or 27.1 per cent of the cuts made to all the provinces. The federal government's way of proceeding in this regard will obviously have a definite impact on public finances in Quebec. Deprived of part of its revenues, which I might add were earmarked for welfare, health and post–secondary education, the Quebec government will be left no alternative other than to make drastic cuts in its own spending, not to reduce its own deficit, but simply to make up for the shortfall due to the drop in federal transfers. Quebec will obviously not be spared in the round of cuts planned for 1997–98. In looking at the Martin budget, the more one reads the more one realizes that it is more of a curse than a blessing to the people of Quebec.

The same can be said for the federal public service and more specifically for the Outaouais which feels it has been given an especially rough ride by the federal budget. The government has shown itself to be extremely insensitive in announcing the elimination of 45,000 jobs in the Canadian public service over three years. Of these 45,000 jobs to be cut during the next three years, some 14,000 will be in the Hull–Ottawa area, nearly one third of jobs cut in the whole country. It is easy to see that this decision would have a direct and very negative impact on the economy and social life in the area.

Of the cutbacks expected to total $29 billion over the next three years, the federal government intends to cut nearly $16.9 billion from the management and operations of its programs. So the federal deficit will to a large extent be reduced on the backs of federal public servants, especially those in the Outaouais region.

Even more unacceptable is the fact that the federal government knowingly made the Outaouais region economically dependent on it. Seeking to generate in Quebec and especially in the Outaouais a sense of belonging to Canada, the federal government began by creating the National Capital Commission in 1958. Pierre Trudeau's Liberal government, eager to give concrete proof of French Power as a means of hampering the sovereignist movement in Quebec, proceeded to implant a large number of federal government buildings on the Quebec shore of the Ottawa River in the 1970s. Probably taking the region for granted, the federal government seems to have no qualms about leaving the region to fend for itself in the wake of the disastrous cuts it announced. To repeat the jest made by the Quebec finance minister, which I feel hit the mark, the federal government is acting like a guy who gets a girl pregnant and then takes off.

I agree with the Coalition des associations économiques de l'Outaouais, which is of the opinion that the federal government must assume responsibility for the region. It must help to absorb the shock of budgetary decisions on the Outaouais region, just like it does when there is a shortage of fish in the Atlantic or a drought in the Western prairies, by giving the region a one–time payment to be put in a fund for diversifying the region's economy. Unless I am mistaken, the budget makes no mention of such a compensation which, by rights, should be paid to the region. Does the government intend—and I see that the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, who is responsible for looking after the region, is sneaking out—does the government intend to give—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order. As we all know, the rules of the House stipulate that no comment can be made either about the presence, and most especially about the absence, of members of the House, in view of all of the various demands and responsibilities of our positions.

Mr. Bergeron: Mr. Speaker, I apologize. Unless I am mistaken, the budget makes no mention of this compensation which, by rights, should be paid to the region. Does the government intend to make good on the request made by the Coalition des associations économiques de l'Outaouais? We are still waiting for an answer, and from what I can gather, we will not get one today either. Obviously, these massive public service staffing cuts are underhanded and pernicious, because they were made unilaterally in an autoritarian way.

In the months leading up to the budget, the government obstinately refused to reach an agreement with the Public Service Alliance of Canada, which represents 70 per cent of federal public servants. This union, however, was ready to negotiate and to hammer out what could have been a mutual and fair agreement with the government. No matter, the government rejected the union's proposal out of hand, not even bothering to negotiate.

The people are justifiably concerned about the quality of the services they are entitled to, which will now be provided by a heavily mortgaged public service. Would it not have been better for the government, instead of slashing its own public service as it did, to put in place mechanisms allowing it to stop wasting Quebec and Canadian taxpayers' money?

What does the government do to avoid wasting public funds, duplication and overlap? Of course, the government did not take any action to achieve this goal. That is why I strongly believe that, had it been otherwise, the cuts in the federal public service could have been less severe.

To get back to the glaring contradictions and questionable priorities in the federal budget, I note that the Liberal government has announced a $532 million cut in the international aid budget. This decision is quite surprising, since he himself pointed out very recently in his foreign policy statement that international aid was crucial to meeting three objectives: prosperity, employment and international security.

Having cut the international aid budget by over 25 per cent, how can the government claim it is adhering to the principle of moral responsibility toward international aid for developing countries, in order to reduce poverty? The fact is, it cannot, Mr. Speaker.

Furthermore, how can they favour international trade development, when Canadian businesses are subsidized so that they are kept artificially dependent on the government? In fact, these subsidies hurt their competitiveness at the international level. This leads me to believe that because he did not have the courage to go further in reducing business subsidies, the minister will help keep these businesses in an unhealthy state of dependence that will hurt their development and hinder access to international markets.

In closing, I would like to say a few words about the budget measures with respect to agriculture. Clearly, the federal budget does not affect all farmers across Canada the same way. The federal government announced the abolition of the $560 million Crow rate subsidy that helps finance Western grain transport.

However, this measure comes with a financial compensation package in the order of $1.6 billion for losses in land values, as well as $1 billion in credit guarantees for grain purchases. In addition, Western farmers affected by the cancellation of the Crow rate subsidy will receive $300 million over five years to facilitate the transition. On the other hand, Canadian milk producers, almost 50 per cent of whom are in Quebec, will see their federal subsidies cut by 30 per cent over the next two years.

I find it hard to understand the logical basis for compensating Western farmers for the loss of the Crow rate subsidy, while industrial milk producers, most of whom live in Quebec, will not be entitled to any compensation from the federal government. Is this a case of double standard? I am afraid so.

After crying wolf for several months to prepare the population for draconian budget measures, the Liberal government finally gave birth to a budget that is neither flesh, fish, nor fowl, that defers until later many of the real solutions, and that insidiously ignores many of its potentially perverse and negative effects.

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I must say that I was really disappointed with the Bloc's presentation. Perhaps nothing more should be expected from someone speaking on behalf of a party which has already made fundamental choices for ideological reasons and is therefore impervious to the truth.

The truth is that, last year, 433,000 new jobs were created in Canada. This is actual job creation, not just idle talk. In Quebec, 116,000 jobs. In the National Capital Region, a net total of 16,600 new full time jobs were created in 1994. These are the facts, not a bunch of unsubstantiated claims like those made by the previous speaker.

Yesterday, when the hon. member for Verchères said 14,000 public service jobs would be lost in the Outaouais region, he showed his profound lack of understanding of the region. The truth is that the total job loss resulting from the budget over a three year period will be approximately 3,000, not 14,000.

In all of Canada, 45,000 jobs will be cut but this does not mean people actually losing their jobs because in many cases these jobs will be filled by other employees reassigned as a result of the attrition process. I cannot expect the hon. member opposite to have deep knowledge of government, but I would ask him to at least stick to the facts and analysis. The truth about the budget tabled this week is that it is the only way to promote job creation in the long term.

When the hon. member says that this budget will result in the loss of a few thousand jobs throughout the National Capital Region, he makes it sound like job creation would necessarily ensue if the deficit in the federal budget were allowed to continue to build up. If that were true, Canada would have achieved full employment a long time ago, given its accumulated deficits.

The truth is that this is the only way to avoid hitting the wall like New Zealand did. In just a few months, New Zealand had to cut its public service by two thirds, not a mere 14 per cent like us. Our public service will continue to operate with 86 per cent of its employees in three years. Because New Zealand acted along the lines of what the hon. member opposite recommends, it had to cut its public service by two thirds. These are historical facts, not empty words like those spoken by the hon. member.

By shrinking the size of the federal government, which was long overdue, by forcing ourselves to streamline and downsize government, we are ensuring that the 1994 job creation effort can continue.

If we had carried on with the deficit that we had, the rise in interest rates would very quickly have prevented investments in the private sector, thereby also preventing the creation of jobs. What we did was to foster the economic climate which will promote investments and new jobs in the private sector.

The member opposite has no idea of what is going on in the Outaouais, which is my region, when he says that the federal government is keeping it in a state of dependency. If you look at the 1971 census figures, you will see that, back then, one third of all the jobs for our region were in the public service. By comparison, last year only one fifth of the jobs in the Outaouais were in the public service.

In other words, 80 per cent of the jobs in our region are not in the public service. In the national capital region, there are more jobs in the service sector than in the federal government. It is based on that necessary economic diversification that our government developed a plan for the region which will allow the private sector to create jobs that are needed and that will reduce the excessive burden on taxpayers, since the federal public service had become too big.

I have a question for the member opposite regarding dairy producers. Quebec provides 48 per cent of the milk production in Canada and it exports that production elsewhere in the country. Should the province separate, where would it sell its milk, which costs two to three times more than the milk which we could get from the United States? It goes without saying that the rest of Canada would buy its milk at a cheaper price. Quebec's separation would totally destroy its dairy industry. While the federal government adjusts prices at the national level over a certain period of time, the member opposite wants to destroy the dairy industry in Quebec.

As regards public servants, the actual number is 3,000 for the Outaouais, taking into account the five provincial and three federal ridings. We are told that Quebec would absorb the federal public servants, there are 50,000 of them, plus the other 50,000 public servants they already have. They put the 3,000 public servants from the Outaouais and the 100,000 for all of Quebec in the same boat. These people would want us to believe that they will absorb all these public servants, a measure which would cost them $4.4 billion.

Given the analysis made by the hon. member, my question is this: Does he know Quebec sufficiently well to hope to create a better future than the one that we, federalists, have found to be adequate for over 125 years?

Mr. Bergeron: Mr. Speaker, I have a problem with the minister's somewhat sweeping statements. When he says that more than 400,000 jobs were created across Canada, when he says that thousands of jobs were created in Quebec, he implies that it was all thanks to the federal government.

Last year, the federal government did not set up a single job creation program, with the exception of the infrastructures program, which is a program of temporary jobs. The government is just riding the wave of economic recovery. Jobs are being created and it says: Look at that, we created those jobs. This is entirely misleading. The federal government had nothing to do with it, and I think it is rather absurd that the minister should go around bragging that they created those jobs.

The government planned to create 45,000 temporary jobs through the infrastructures program and then turns around and cuts 45,000 jobs in the Public Service. I heard the minister say that only 3,000 jobs would be lost in the Outaouais. I hope he is right. We are going to keep tabs on those figures and the region will as well. We can only hope the cuts will not go over 3,000.

However, that does not deal with the real problem. The minister says he knows the Outaouais area well, but if he took a more active part in the activities of the Commission on the future of Quebec in this area, he would realize that his knowledge of the Outaouais is partisan and incomplete, since a number of people who appeared before this commission kept telling us—these are not my words—that the region's economy was dependent on the federal government.

The minister quoted some figures just now. He said that, at one time, one of every three jobs in the Outaouais was in the federal public service. It is now one out of five. With the cuts being made by the government, it may go eventually down to one out of ten. My point is that considering the economic dependence the federal government has artificially created in the Outaouais, is the federal government—and the minister did not answer this question—is the federal government prepared to offer financial compensation by investing in an economic diversification fund, to compensate for the number of jobs lost in the public service? To get back to the notorious question, if I can call it that, because it is more like, I will not use the word misleading, but a very—

An hon. member: Very pernicious.

Mr. Bergeron: —pernicious, thank you, a very pernicious statement that sovereignty would destroy Quebec's dairy industry. First of all, I want to say that I am dismayed at the minister's lack of confidence in Quebec's dairy industry, and furthermore, the minister ought to know that the milk produced in Quebec is probably the best quality milk in North America. There are no two ways about it. It is the best. No doubt about that. If you want to buy a quality product, no problem. Milk from Quebec can meet the highest standards in the world.

That being said, this can work both ways, since in Quebec we eat a lot of beef from Western Canada, which is probably more expensive than beef we could buy elsewhere. In the event of a sovereign Quebec, if the market dries up for Quebec dairy producers, we will buy our beef elsewhere. Business is business.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order! Before we proceed, I must inform the House that at the beginning of today's sitting, we forgot to inform the House of the absence of the Speaker. I therefore order the clerk to make the appropriate entry in the Votes and Proceedings. Resuming debate. The minister of Intergovernmental Affairs.

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to participate in this debate. This is a budget of very strong measures, because this is what it takes to break the deficit's hold on our policies. This budget contains the most draconian measures taken by a government in 50 years.

[English]

The budget achieves our deficit goal without increasing personal income tax rates. For the second year in a row the government has refused to reduce the deficit on the backs of individual Canadians.

I am particularly pleased to have the opportunity to explain the process and significance of the program review, one of the core elements of the budget.

Last September in Quebec City the Prime Minister outlined the four key elements of the government's jobs and growth agenda. This week hon. members have witnessed with the unveiling of the 1995–96 budget the details of one of those fundamental elements, the program review.

Last year the Prime Minister asked me to lead, in co–operation with my cabinet colleagues, the most fundamental review of government operations in two generations. The review was meant to be and was an exhaustive examination like none ever undertaken before of every government program and service, with a view to getting government back to basics and focusing on the priorities of Canadians.

I worked closely with my colleagues and I want to take this opportunity to congratulate them once again for their commitment to the exercise designed to get government right.

Unlike previous governments we listened to Canadians and the result we have seen in the budget tabled by my hon. colleague, the Minister of Finance, demonstrates that we have the courage to set the country on a new, much more secure course.

I believe the Canadian people will agree that the budget and the program review results are ushering in a new approach to government.

• (1030)

It will be a dramatically changed national government. It will be a government that is getting back to basics, a government that reflects the priorities of average Canadians, a government that is affordable, a government that protects the most vulnerable, and a government that responds to the true needs of Canadians.

[Translation]

The Prime Minister detailed our intentions last September before the Quebec City Chamber of Commerce saying that control over the size and cost of government was vital to economic growth and job creation. It was in this perspective that the program review was developed and became one of the basic components of the budget.

This review will enable the federal government to focus on its major priorities, to return to basics while enabling it to reduce its expenditures in an orderly fashion. The review was guided by three objectives.

First, to strengthen public administration of federal programs and services; efforts in this regard will lead to a smaller but more efficient federal administration, which will provide the programs Canadians consider important. Secondly, to help modernize Canadian federalism; the government should provide only those programs and services it is best suited to provide. Thirdly, to help the government attain its financial objectives.

This involved, therefore, totally rethinking what government did and what Canadians could allow themselves. In the future, departments will have to drop all but fundamental responsibilities. They are amalgamating like programs and services found within a department or spread among several departments. They are eliminating job duplication and costly overlap. They are reducing the operating costs of programs through new approaches, while raising standards of service. They are funding necessary programs through cost recovery and user fees.

It must be stressed that the aim of the program review was not to identify or make cuts solely in response to financial needs. On the contrary, we asked each minister to review their programs and activities according to six criteria.

First, public interest: Does the program or activity continue to serve the public? Second, the role of government: Is it necessary or legitimate for the government to be involved in the area of the program or activity? Third, federalism: Is the present role of government appropriate, or should consideration be given to transferring it to the provinces? Fourth, partnership: What programs or activities could be transferred wholly or in part to the private or volunteer sectors? Fifth, efficiency: How could the efficiency of the program or activity be improved? Finally, financial capability: In financial terms, can we afford all of the resulting programs and activities?

[English]

I can briefly summarize at this point that we undertook an unprecedented review of government activities because this government believes first and foremost it is crucial that we get our own house in order. As we have seen, this budget focused on cutting spending, not on raising taxes. Second, we began from the premise that the priorities of the government must reflect the priorities of Canadians. We did not want a blind slash and burn exercise.

The approach we took in our program review was guided by three fundamentals: one, its fundamental objective to sustain growth and job creation; two, its fundamental challenge to get the economy right; and three, its fundamental requirement to refocus government on priority roles.

Program review encompassed about $52 billion worth of government spending. The result is that over the next three years program spending will decline by almost 19 per cent, more than $16 billion. Some departments will see their spending cut in half.

The Department of Transport over three years will be cut by 50 per cent. The Department of Natural Resources over the same three years will be cut by 49.8 per cent. The public service will be reduced by 14 per cent, 45,000 positions over three years.

Program review will lead to long lasting structural change in what the government does. These are not, as my hon. colleague the Minister of Finance stated Monday, the phoney cuts we saw so often in the past, measures that pretended to define a slower rate of increase in spending as actual cuts.

The cuts in this budget are real cuts in real dollars. They were accomplished by refocusing government programs on basics, eliminating overlap and duplication, improving the efficiency of our operations and shifting market interventions away from direct subsidies. Let me give some examples.

In the past, agricultural subsidies have been tied to specific commodities which resulted in a large number of programs. The emphasis will now shift from income support to income stabilization.

Fisheries and oceans will focus its resources on science and regulation to ensure conservation and sustainable fish stocks. We will discuss with the provinces the possibility of eventual devolution of freshwater fisheries management.

Finally, assistance to business will be considerably reduced. Assistance will shift to repayable loans.

In many departments there will be fundamental change in how programs and services are delivered. For example, an immigration fee will be charged to newcomers and sponsors will have to provide financial guarantees.

Environment Canada will concentrate more on science and policy and finding new ways to deliver services. Environmental protection remains a priority in order to ensure the health and safety of Canadians. Pollution prevention will become a priority in partnership with the provinces, territories and industries.

A large number of specific measures are based on a common philosophy and foundation.

For example, we have taken important measures in this budget to substantially reduce business subsidies offered under all government programs. Subsidies will be reduced by close to 60 per cent over a three year period. Some programs will be discontinued or drastically reduced. For example, we will be eliminating the transportation subsidies offered under the Western Grain Transportation Act, the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act and the Maritime Freight Rates Act.

Some programs will be restructured or merged, for example, regional development organizations will be more geared to the needs of small and medium size businesses. Some activities will be transferred to other public administrations. For example, several responsibilities concerning inland waters will be turned over to the provinces; recreational harbours will be divested to municipalities; the forestry and mining development agreements with the provinces will be revoked, since the provinces have indicated that development of these resources falls under their jurisdiction; the operation of airports will be transferred to local authorities.

Some activities will be commercialized or privatized: the remainder of the government's share in Cameco and Petro–Canada, Canadian National, the Air Navigation System, Canada Communication Group. Cost recovery and user fees will be implemented for some services.

• (1040)

Treasury Board will put in place a new spending management system which will improve the management of public funds.

[English]

The program review has allowed us to put our house in order in order to tackle the challenges of the next century. It fundamentally changes not only what we do but how we do it. The program review allows us to restore fiscal health to the nation's finances and also to make necessary spending reductions in an orderly way. The program review actions in the budget only start what will be an ongoing process of reform and renewal of the federal government.

Clearly, as announced in the budget, these results will have a major impact on the public service. All regions of the country are affected by the cutbacks and reductions. This is no less true for the national capital region. I want to say that as the Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal and as a member of Parliament in the national capital region, I am particularly and acutely aware of the difficult period many public servants across the country are going through at this time.

The departure of employees who over the years have demonstrated loyalty, professionalism and dedication is the most painful part of any restructuring process. Decisions that affect people's livelihood are the most difficult to make. Departures are never easy. Let me reiterate this government's commitment to deal with employees in the fairest and most sensitive way possible. We will continue to work with the unions and local governments to ease the transition. We hope to keep layoffs and the number of employees on unpaid surplus status to an absolute minimum.

Some individuals will be accommodated through normal attrition. Some will take advantage of the departure and early retirement incentives announced by the President of the Treasury Board. Some individuals will transfer to the private sector as some operations are being privatized. Others will find work in the private sector. No doubt there will be a period of change and uncertainty as we move to what I firmly believe will be a revitalized public service in the coming years.

I deplore the fact that the representative for the Outaouais region, Mr. Blais, and some members of the opposition are misleading the local population and are creating more uncertainty. They are proclaiming that the budget cuts 14,000 public service jobs in the Outaouais region.

In fact, the total number of jobs that will be affected in all of the national capital region, on both sides of the river, will be 12,000 to 13,000 over the next three years. This means, therefore, that the real number of public servants in the Outaouais region that will be affected is more like 3,000. I cannot accuse them of telling untruths, since the difference between their current claims and the true figures is only one job to five, which is about par for them.

I am happy that regional players, including Hull mayor Ducharme and Outaouais urban community president Croteau, have taken a clear, credible and realistic stand on this budget.

With the various measures I mentioned and the co–operation of the private sector and all economic stakeholders in the region, we will manage to minimize job losses while at the same time diversifying the region's economy.

As the member of Parliament representing Hull—Aylmer, I have had the privilege of rubbing elbows with people of this area. I was able to observe how imaginative they are and how enthusiastically they tackle new challenges. I want to salute their courage in these tough times.

The budget is further proof of the flexibility of federalism; it is not stuck in status quo. The budget stresses our commitment to provide the people with good government in Canada. And this entails the challenge of bringing the deficit down and streamlining government. As part of our commitment, no region will be receiving preferential treatment nor be subjected to more cuts than the others.

The new Canadian social transfer combines into one lump–sum transfer three formerly separate transfers, thereby lightening the administrative burden of the provinces. This transfer will ensure maximum flexibility in developing provincial programs suited to the needs of the regions. The new lump–sum transfer limits the restraint the federal government can impose in exclusive provincial jurisdictions.

This new and more flexible formula does not affect the quality of services provided to Canadians.

The terms and conditions set out in the Canada Health Act will be maintained and the provinces will have to abide by the provisions of the act with respect to health care.

At the same time, we remain committed to fiscal equalization, one of the cornerstones of the Canadian federal system, through which Quebec receives nearly $4 billion per year.

The budget marks the beginning of a new era, an era in which the federation will be managed differently. Management will be simpler, more efficient and, yes, more sensitive to provincial jurisdictions. The budget give provincial governments full scope to meet the needs of the people.

The budget is convincing evidence of the fact that the federal system is a progressive, co–operative and dynamic system. Less than a year and a half into this Parliament, we have already tabled two budgets to substantially reduce public expenditures, something Ontario and Quebec will also have to do. We also restructured government organization. The measures outlined in this budget are the most stringent federal measures in fifty years.

[English]

We have abandoned the across the board cuts used by previous governments which proved to be counterproductive and ineffective. This budget is a rational way to bring the size and structure of government into line with our needs.

We agree with Canadians that a balanced budget is the goal and we will get there by setting realistic and achievable targets. This budget leads by example. We are cutting government first.

We believe this budget truly marks the beginning of a new era.

[Translation]

Mr. Ghislain Lebel (Chambly, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I have been listening to budget speeches for at least 30 years. Except for a brief 8–year period of Conservative government, the Liberals were in office for most of those 30 years. I have yet to see a Minister of Finance table a budget in this House and say that it is not a good one. All were guided by the same concern for fairness and justice. Not one of those ministers said that what he was proposing was not good. What I do not understand is that, after 30 years of good budgets, the end result is bad.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lebel: I was never able to understand that equation: the sum total of the good is a negative figure. And right now that figure is almost $600 billion. The Minister of Finance tells us that all those who were here before him were in the wrong and that what they suggested made no sense. He adds that his budget is a real one and a good one. Sure. However, one the predecessors of the finance minister is the current Prime Minister, who also contributed to the growth of the deficit.

The minister just told us that there are people in the national capital region, in Ottawa–Hull, who are happy about the cuts made in the public service. The minister more or less acted the way he did with Saint–Jean. He eliminated 400 jobs and, at the very last minute, he managed to save 20 and claim that it was a miracle on his part. Let the minister bring those Hull and Aylmer residents and ask them in front of us whether they agree with the loss of 45,000 jobs in the public service. Let me give you an example. At the taxation data centre, in Saint–Hubert, there is a 6–month backlog to process the returns of businesses conducting R & D.

Currently, there are businesses on the verge of experiencing major financial problems because they are not receiving their due from the federal government. The public servants cannot process their claim. And the minister would want us to believe that the budget tabled on Monday is the greatest thing since sliced bread. I do not believe that and let me tell you something else. Next year, the minister will once again say: "The others before me, including myself, did not do well. However, I know what I am doing this time".

The minister should explain certain things. I remember one month when the unemployment rate dropped one tenth of one per cent. The Minister of Finance was elated. The economy was picking up and everybody was happy. The following month, economic activity rose by one per cent. Now, that was even better; things were really looking up. But I simply cannot understand these people. How did the minister manage to fool Outaouais residents and make them accept the elimination of 45,000 jobs, when in fact such a loss is a terrible thing. I would appreciate an answer from the minister.

Mr. Massé: Mr. Speaker, I am very happy that opposition members have asked me these questions, because they will give me the opportunity to set the record straight. Over the years, Canadian budgets may have resulted in a large deficit but, at the same time, they have produced what the UN calls the best country in the world, with one of the highest rates of income per capita in the world, a country that enjoys considerable peace and harmony compared with other nations, a country where life is good and incomes are high. That is what successive Canadian budgets have given us.

During the quiet revolution that took place in Quebec in the sixties, we as Quebecers managed to change our structures, values and policies within the federation as it was back then. This gave us the country we now have and want to keep, because it served us well. Speaking of the last budget, 433,000 jobs were created in 1994, including 116,000 in Quebec. What are the factors involved in creating jobs in a country?

Most jobs are not created directly by governments, whether it is Ontario, Quebec or the federal government. However, government policies produce a climate allowing the private sector to create jobs. Clearly, the confidence generated and the policies adopted by the Liberal government last year allowed the economy to create over 400,000 jobs, including more than 100,000 in Quebec. That is what our government has accomplished.

I am so pleased that the hon. member has brought up the matter of Saint–Jean, a community where we had reached with the former Liberal government in Quebec an agreement that the local population found acceptable, which would have kept the college open and continued to create jobs, which was, in fact, a hope for the future. When the new government, of which our Bloc colleagues, under the direction of their leader, are a mere extension, arrived on the scene, it decided, for its own ideological reasons, that it wanted no part of any agreement. These ideological reasons were disclosed by a minister, who has kept a pretty low profile since then.

In one month, we met with local representatives who know that the region needs the college and whose goal is not to promote their ideology but to create jobs and generate economic activity in the region. We agreed with these people to keep the college open and maintain the core that will eventually become a dynamic institution that will continue to benefit the region. I am still very proud of what we did in Saint–Jean, despite the Parti Quebecois government and its ideology.

• (1055)

Third, I was asked if people in Hull agree. In fact, people in Hull think about what is happening in their community. They know how to evaluate the role of government, how to use it and how to enjoy one of the lowest unemployment rates and one of the highest rates of income in Quebec. They have voted Liberal for decades because they know which party has best served their economic, political and social interests.

[English]

Mr. Jim Gouk (Kootenay West—Revelstoke, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, during the last election the Reform Party ran in many ridings where civil servants would be affected by layoffs. The Reform Party was very honest and said we do have to downsize government. There will be some changes.

The Liberal Party ran against us in those ridings and said: "That brutal Reform Party. We would never do that. The poor civil servants. We would protect their jobs". The word that comes to mind is hypocrisy.

The minister is going to downsize his department. He is quoted in the Ottawa Sun this morning as saying that job cuts based on race or sex are illegal according to the charter of rights.

He says that the department recognizes the need for employment equity, respecting the various proportions that exist now and if possible will increase them.

Is the minister going to use this downsizing of the government to try and bring in some form of equity balancing, or is he going to do it by merit the way the laws of the land say he has to do it?

The article suggests that he is asking the department how it is going to do it. Who is in charge? Is it the minister or is it the bureaucrats? I would like to hear his answer.

Mr. Massé: Mr. Speaker, once again these are questions I am glad to answer. In my own campaign in Hull and Aylmer I indicated—the speeches and the transcripts are there for you see—the government would have to be downsized.

I was criticized by part of the electorate but in the end this was not hypocritical, this was the truth. It was told government had to downsize. Knowing the truth, it elected me with more than 53 per cent of the vote in the area. It knew what it was facing and agreed this had to be done.

On the second question, we have here two objectives that have to be realized. The first one is that equity in its largest sense has to be satisfied. There is no doubt that we have to apply equity when we do any move in government, including restructuring government.

However, it is quite clear, and this is what I indicated to the Sun yesterday, when we make an exercise like that in a government, the managers who have the responsibility to manage that department will make the choices according to merit and ability that will keep with them the best civil servants.

There is no doubt also that whatever the categories of people, by sex or creed or colour, merit is distributed very equally in the population and that heads of personnel will come to a result that I am sure will conform to the principles of equity.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): It being 11.00 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(5), the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Harold Culbert (Carleton—Charlotte, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, a safe and efficient transportation system is extremely important to all Canadians regardless of the mode of travel.

A proper transportation system will allow our citizens to travel safely and efficiently while providing the tools to enable our goods to reach our various markets.

As our markets become increasingly global, we will depend more and more on transportation systems to stay competitive both in price and delivery. In Atlantic Canada particularly we need a modern highway system that is both safe and efficient in order to compete in the North American market.

I encourage the hon. Minister of Transport and our government to continue to work with the provincial transport ministers to develop a transportation policy that will meet the needs of Canadians today and for the future.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Osvaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ): Mr. Speaker, last February the member for Longueuil reported on an advertisement by the Canadian embassy in Poland for potential immigrants from that country to Canada. The ad stated that Polish people would only be required to know English to immigrate to Canada.

Now, the Canadian embassy in Portugal is guilty of the same thing. The Canadian Embassy placed an ad in the Lisbon newspaper Expresso to inform potential immigrants to Canada of the conditions for admission. Although it states that knowledge of French and English would be considered an asset in applying to immigrate to Canada, this ad was written exclusively in English.

Here is another significant example illustrating that Quebec should have exclusive jurisdiction over international relations. Quebec should be able to project internationally a true image of its identity and of the reality in Quebec.

AWARDS

Mr. Jake E. Hoeppner (Lisgar—Marquette, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise in the House today to pay tribute to two of my constituents: Ivan Traill and Velda Bradley of Neepawa, Manitoba.

Ivan was awarded the Community Service Award. This former school principal started the student exchange program and the Fulford ski trail and worked on both the 1976 and 1992 summer games. He served on the elder hostel program and on the building committee for the Neepawa United Church. Ivan also helped bring cable television to Neepawa and is very active with the local access channel 12.

Velda received the Citizen of the Year Award. She is well known for her pastoral work throughout St. Dominic's Roman Catholic Church and very active in the Neepawa Ministerial Association.

Both these individuals deserve congratulations for their efforts. They have shown that one of the greatest rewards a person can achieve comes with the satisfaction of helping others.

TRIBUTE TO CAROL SHIELDS

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate Canadian author Carol Shields for the award she has just won.

[English]

Last week the U.S. National Book Critics Circle awarded its 1994 fiction prize to this author for her most recent work entitled The Stone Diaries.

The Stone Diaries is a warm, witty story of a fictitious Canadian woman's life. This work has attained both national and international recognition. It was awarded the Governor General's Award for English language fiction in 1993, the McNally Robinson Award for Manitoba Book of the Year and was short listed for Britain's prestigious Booker Prize.

Carol Shields was also chosen author of the year by the Canadian Booksellers' Association. A native of Winnipeg, Mrs. Shields also holds numerous literary prizes for her other works.

[English]

She will be presented with the award on March 23 in New York.

My colleagues join me in congratulating Carol Shields once again and in encouraging her in her literary pursuits.

INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S WEEK

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this week men and women around the world are celebrating International Women's Week. On this occasion, I would like to emphasize the important social contribution made by women internationally and praise their many successes.

[English]

Status of Women Canada has selected "Creating a World of Equality" as this year's theme.

Internationally Canada has been a leader with respect to the advancement of women's rights and the empowerment of women in developing nations. Nationally Canada has made great strides in this area.

[Translation]

The fact remains however that we all, men and women, have much more to accomplish in this regard. As a Liberal member of Parliament and father of three young women, this week is especially meaningful to me. I remain full of hope that my daughters and young women everywhere will live in a world which will allow them to achieve their full potential, where "Creating a World of Equality" is becoming an increasingly important guiding principle.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Ms. Paddy Torsney (Burlington, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to voice my objection to today's court hearing of the CBC's application to televise the trial of Paul Bernardo.

• (1105)

As the member of Parliament for Burlington, a riding that has been greatly affected by the crimes Mr. Bernardo is accused of committing, I believe that justice would be better served without the glare of television cameras.

I question why the CBC would apply to televise this case. Is it possible the corporation believes that Canadians wish to emulate the U.S. system with its phantasmagoric coverage of trials like that of O. J. Simpson? I say it is wrong.

Canadian courts are open and accessible. Individual Canadians interested in knowing more about our court system can attend all the various levels and can watch televised Supreme Court of Canada trials where witnesses are not heard.

It is not worth experimenting in this case. We cannot afford to take risks, intimidate witnesses and exacerbate the Mahaffey and French families' pain. Justice must be served. The trial must run smoothly. The trial should not be televised.

REFERENDUM ON QUEBEC SOVEREIGNTY

Mr. Gaston Leroux (Richmond—Wolfe, BQ): Mr. Speaker, Robert Young, a respected political scientist from the University of Western Ontario, has stated that Canada would engage in negotiations with Quebec soon after a "yes" in the referendum.

Contrary to some recent studies which predict chaos and certain doom after a victory for the "yes" side in the referendum, the scenario described in Mr. Young's book is based to a greater extent on a deep respect for the most rudimentary principles of democracy. The political scientist does not hesitate in the least in stating that Canada would accept the decision of Quebecers and swiftly recognize the new country.

In spite of the federalist strategy intended to strike fear into the hearts of Quebecers, experts on Canadian politics are for their part now making their views known: Canada would in its own interest respect the choice made by Quebecers.

CROSS–COUNTRY SKIING

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today on behalf of the constituents of Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt to draw the attention of the House to the visitors' gallery where His Worship, the Mayor of Oliver, British Columbia, Rick Wilson, is watching the proceedings today. As well, 20 members of the British Columbia cross–country ski team are in the area to compete in the Canadian junior cross–country ski championship being held at Camp Fortune.

I would like to give special mention to some of the team members. The first is Tara Moran who won a silver medal in the five–kilometre classic technique at the recent Canada Winter Games and another silver medal yesterday at the Canadian cross–country ski championship. I would also like to congratulate Gavin Murdoch and Chad Bergen who won silver medals yesterday as well.

Competitions like this one serve all Canadians. Aside from having the opportunity to hone athletic skills, the competitors foster national unity and understanding by bringing Canadians together from all parts of the country.

On behalf of all members of Parliament, I welcome the British Columbia visitors to the nation's capital and wish the cross–country ski team continued success.

PREMIER OF ONTARIO

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the provincial premiers whining about the federal budget is exceeded only by their inability to do simple math.

In Ontario it is a favourite pastime for Bob Rae to blame Ottawa for Ontario's economic woes. In his effort to get his pre–election posturing in an upright position, the Ontario silver spoon socialist continues to pout.

Where was Bob Rae when the federal government increased its education and health transfers to Ontario by 26 per cent between 1990 and 1994? He was shirking his responsibility by only increasing his provincial programs by 17 per cent, a full 9 per cent less than the federal government transferred to Ontario.

Bob Rae's outstanding contributions to Ontario are doubling the debt to over $90 billion, downgrading Ontario's credit rating three times and running annual deficits of over $10 billion.

NORMAN BETHUNE

Mr. Andy Mitchell (Parry Sound—Muskoka, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to join Bethune Memorial House in celebrating the birthday of Dr. Norman Bethune, born in my home town of Gravenhurst on March 3, 1890.

Dr. Bethune was a medical pioneer known in North America for tubercular research, in Spain for the first mobile blood service, and in China for building hospitals, training nurses and doctors, and treating the wounded.

His life was declared to be of national historical significance in this country in August 1972. His birth home was purchased and turned over to the Canadian parks service, which restored it as an interpretive memorial. The house has been open since 1976 to visitors from around the world, especially China where Dr. Bethune's humanitarian works were considered heroic.

• (1110)

On March 3, in conjunction with Frontier College, the Gravenhurst Public Library and Muskoka Literacy Council, Bethune Memorial House hosts a celebration of reading with story telling in honour of Dr. Bethune.

I wish all participants well as we celebrate Dr. Bethune's birthday.

VISION AWARENESS WEEK

Ms. Hedy Fry (Vancouver Centre, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is important for me to bring to the attention of the House that March 6 to March 11 is Vision Awareness Week in Canada. This year's theme is "Hope is in sight: good vision and literacy, there is a clear connection".

It is a sad fact that many Canadians cannot read well simply because they cannot see well. One in six children has a vision problem that makes learning and reading difficult. If our children cannot focus on the chalkboard or on words in a book, how can we expect them to learn to read?

This problem is not unique to children. Three–quarters of adults with poor literacy skills also have problems with their vision.

The difficulty is that not all vision problems are easily detected. We know the earlier problems are detected and corrected, the faster we can get children and adults alike on the reading track and the faster they will be literate.

Awareness is the key. I ask my colleagues to join me and 2,800 optometrists in reminding Canadians—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order, please.

SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the income security minister Jeanne Blackburn yesterday denounced in no uncertain terms the federal government's withdrawal of funding for provincial welfare, education and health programs. In spite of the $7 billion lost over three years due to federal cuts, the government of Quebec will still have to provide assistance to 240,000 children whose parents have turned to welfare as a last resort.

Like a blind executioner with an axe in hand, the federal government is hacking away at social programs without realizing the impact these cuts have on people. With a single stroke of the pen, Ottawa is forcing the Quebec government to make painful choices among social services without so much as suffering the terrible consequences of its decisions.

It is high time for Quebecers to protect themselves from such unilateral cuts. The only solution available to us is to repatriate the taxes we pay to Ottawa and then decide among ourselves how much of the joint assets we shall share.

CHILD CARE

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Human Resources Development has fumbled the ball on his plan to reform the child care system in Canada.

Various child care programs cost over $8 billion per year, yet many still live in poverty and our courts are filled with charter challenges by families fighting the discriminatory nature of government policy.

My private member's Bill C–247 provides for a straightforward tax deduction per child to any taxpaying parent, regardless of the method of child care chosen or marital status. By empowering people to take more responsibility for themselves, the bill will give them tax free money to do so.

In the social reforms paper the minister addressed day care spaces and flexible work arrangements for parents but said nothing about current taxation inequities, charter challenges or stay at home parenting. "Such a move", he said, "would have been too racy", with which I am sure the member opposite would probably agree. I fail to see what is so racy to the member for Halifax about a tax break for overburdened parents.

It is obvious that someone with a different agenda—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order, please.

FRESHWATER FISHERY

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian freshwater fishery has an important role to play in the economy of the country, in particular the economies of the northern regions of the provinces.

The Standing Committee on Fisheries and Oceans has completed a much needed review of the operations of the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation and has made recommendations to the minister of fisheries.

Those recommendations go too far according to reports I have received from groups involved in the fishery in Saskatchewan concerned about the future of the industry and therefore the future of those regional economies.

Changes can and must be made to the freshwater fishery that will improve participation, opportunity and income for the people involved.

The minister of fisheries has received a request for a meeting with Saskatchewan fisheries groups. To ensure a complete understanding of this important issue from the perspective of those involved in the fishery and the communities dependent upon the freshwater fishery, I urge the minister to accept that invitation and meet with them as soon as possible.

INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S WEEK

Mrs. Dianne Brushett (Cumberland—Colchester, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, March 6 to March 10 is International Women's Week, a time set aside to honour the contributions of women in our society.

• (1115)

My riding of Cumberland—Colchester is replete with women who have made outstanding contributions, not only in their communities but in Canada and the world beyond.

The Colchester Historical Society in its recent edition of Colchester Women has recognized the contributions made by outstanding leaders like Abbie Gray, Dr. Janet Baker, Rev. Wilena Brown, and Dr. Annie Dickson. The legacy of such women is an inspiration to those who follow in their footsteps.

Studies indicate that the higher the education of the mother of the family, the more likely the success of the children. As we head into International Women's Week, I encourage women everywhere to build the future of this country by striving to attain their educational goals. The hand that rocks the cradle is truly the hand that rules the world.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, over the past decade, individuals have been called upon to assume a heavier tax load than corporations. This week's budget perpetuates this state of affairs by imposing a higher increase in taxes on the middle class than on corporations, in particular through increased excise taxes on gasoline. In 1995, individuals will pay four times more income tax than corporations.

My question is for the acting prime minister. Will the acting prime minister acknowledge that the budget calls upon individuals to assume a heavier tax burden than businesses, since 65 per cent of all of the income tax increases it contains will hit individuals?

[English]

Mr. David Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am very surprised that the hon. member has so misinterpreted the budget. We are very proud of the fact that this budget has absolutely no increase in personal income tax rates.

We have taken several steps to increase the contribution from the corporate side to the basic revenue structure of this country. We have made changes in the large corporate income tax rate. We have made changes in taxation with the banks. For the first time, given also the increase in profits in the private sector, I think we will find there is a tremendous shift to the corporate side away from the average family.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, that was exactly what I was talking about. How can the parliamentary secretary talk about a fair budget when we know that the only additional effort being required of banks and financial institutions is a temporary tax of some $100 million staggered over two years, although the combined profits of the six biggest banks were $4.3 billion last year alone? When is the government going to impose a real minimum tax on the earnings of profitable large corporations?

[English]

Mr. David Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this government is making every effort to make sure the banking industry and the financial institutions pay their fair share.

A number of measures that were first introduced last year have been reinforced this year. The tax structure is not temporary but permanent. These institutions will be paying their fair share. We will insist upon it.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance himself talked about implementing a minimum tax on the profits of corporations during the last election campaign.

Considering the finance department's commitment to closing tax loopholes and creating a fair budget, how can the parliamentary secretary justify that the 1995 budget does not touch tax havens, nor does it touch flags of convenience, which allow rich taxpayers and large corporations to avoid paying their fair share of tax, or that the budget does not tighten up family trust rules until 1999?

[English]

Mr. David Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in rapid succession the member has been able to misinterpret about three different measures in the last budget.

First, starting with the capital base of corporations, we have a tax structure now which eliminates many of the loopholes whereby corporations managed to escape taxes on the income side. Second, we did not sign any tax treaty with any country which provides for a tax haven. It is just the opposite. We ensure taxes are collected from Canadians and Canadian businesses doing business overseas. Third, measures involved with the family trust take place immediately. The other ones on the capital tax side take place in 1999.

• (1120)

Mr. Michel Daviault (Ahuntsic, BQ): Mr. Speaker, after getting themselves elected on a promise to create jobs and restore hope, the Liberals have literally broken their promises in the 1995 budget and, like the Tories, they feel that the unemployment problem will only be solved by eliminating the deficit. There are no jobs in the finance minister's two small clouds.

Since we still need over 800,000 jobs in Canada to reach the pre–recession employment rate, how can the Acting Prime Minister justify the total lack of active job creation measures in the budget?

[English]

Mr. David Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, again the opposition has misinterpreted the budget. We announced measures starting last year with the infrastructure program.

We have been very aggressive in creating jobs. With the better climate we have provided in Canada over 443,000 jobs have been created. I am sure the hon. member would like to read the red book more carefully than he has in the past. On page 16 and again on page 19 we emphasized the double track our new government had to take. That is to say, we had to create jobs and reaffirm our commitment to Canadians and at the same time we had to begin the deficit reduction program.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Daviault (Ahuntsic, BQ): Mr. Speaker, given the current employment situation, how can the Acting Prime Minister justify the fact that the only program introduced to stimulate employment, the infrastructure program, has been extended until just before the next election campaign, thus cutting federal job creation funds by $200 million this year?

[English]

Mr. David Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, one of the prime reasons we have extended the infrastructure program and pushed $200 million of work into the future is the very sensitive issue of environmental assessment. I am sure there is no member in the House of Commons who would wish us to ignore environmental assessments and to push projects through without their being properly evaluated. As these projects are properly evaluated, they will come onstream as originally planned.

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in spite of all the spin doctors and all the puff pieces, there is growing evidence that the financial markets have not been fooled by the budget. This week the Canadian dollar has fallen steadily and dramatically. Interest rates have risen on all forms of Canadian government securities.

Today the Globe and Mail says that the finance minister calls the cuts good politics. Will the minister tell us why the government has chosen good politics when the situation requires good economics?

Mr. David Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if the opposition member would care to read through both the financial press and the general public press and look at the opinion polls such as Angus Reid presented this week, he will see that the budget has been accepted widely by Canadians as well as by financial experts. In fact, only yesterday Standard and Poor's reaffirmed our AAA rating. We are very proud of the reception we are getting.

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Moody's, Standard and Poor's, and other financial firms continue to provide warnings about the financial situation of the Government of Canada. They continue to evaluate our securities.

Yesterday, Standard and Poor's lowered its outlook on our foreign currency debt from negative to stable, saying that it reflects the possibility of a downgrade should the slow pace of deficit reduction fail to ease the government's debt and interest rate burdens over the next few years. The budget does not get the job done.

Will the minister admit that the cuts in the budget are inadequate to control the growth in debt and interest payments?

Mr. David Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is just the opposite. We all remain very concerned about the debt. That is why we took the dramatic actions we did on Monday. I want to remind the member that Standard and Poor's addressed itself to the 3 per cent foreign currency debt. On the other 97 per cent it gave a AAA.

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the government knows the cuts are inadequate. Yesterday in Toronto when the Minister of Finance was asked about additional cuts to the CBC, he joked: "Is this being televised? Because if it is, it is a very different answer".

What additional cuts are being planned to deal with the failure of the budget? Cuts to the CBC, cuts to old age security, cuts to unemployment insurance, cuts to health care. Why will the government not tell Canadians about these cuts in public and on camera?

• (1125)

Mr. David Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, no further cuts will be introduced due to the failure of the budget because the budget is not a failure.

The Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister have indicated that as one goes about reviewing an organization as large as the Government of Canada, naturally one will continually come across better ways of doing things. We will continue to do things better.

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Quebec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, Monday afternoon, heritage deputy minister Michel Rochon communicated to CBC president Anthony Manera the Cabinet's budget decisions for the next three years, I repeat, the next three years.

Does the Minister of Canadian Heritage continue to deny that budget decisions have been made concerning the CBC's fate in the next three years? If not, does this mean that he has once again failed to honour one of his commitments, namely to provide the CBC with multi–year funding?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I think that our hon. colleague still does not understand the difference between a budget decision and the program review. It would seem this is where the confusion stems from. I have publicly explained these matters both in and outside this House.

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Quebec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, how can the minister justify logically and rationally his decision to strike a committee of wise men and women to look at the CBC's mandate, after giving members of Parliament the mandate to do just that last August?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, our colleague does not seem to grasp too well what was referred to the heritage committee. Had she done me the courtesy of listening, perhaps she would understand better. This may explain why the hon. member and her colleagues never understand anything: they do not listen.

I think that our colleague has a gift for telling the future. We had not yet outlined how we intend to review not only the CBC's mandate, but also that of the National Film Board and Telefilm Canada. This means she will have to wait for the review mandate to be clearly spelled out. I can assure her that it will not be the same as the mandate given the House of Commons heritage committee.

[English]

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is time to clear the air on the CBC issue.

On Tuesday the Minister of Canadian Heritage stated that the president of the CBC resigned for personal reasons, but last night Mr. Manera directly contradicted the minister. He resigned not for personal reasons but because the minister has secret and specific plans for cuts to the CBC over the next three years.

Given that the budget is a three–year document and given that we have a copy of the minister's plans precipitating the president's resignation, how can the minister justify not coming clean with Canadians about his plans regarding the CBC?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am asked to deal with two issues in the question, one on the motivation of Mr. Manera's resignation. I am not speculating about the motivation for his resignation. He can speak for himself.

As to the second matter, I think I have been clear in the House. The budget contains some indication for the next fiscal year. It is 4 per cent which amounts to $44 million. The figures for the second and third year are derived from the program review.

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it seems very odd that the president would resign if that in fact were the case.

When budgetary information is withheld from Canadians, it creates uncertainty and confusion. In this case, it has caused the resignation of the president of the CBC who accused the minister of failing to disclose the information to Canadians about future cuts to the CBC. The minister denies it. They cannot both be telling the truth.

Since this is the second time the minister has placed himself in a compromising position, will he clear the air and promptly submit his resignation to the Prime Minister.

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to know where our colleagues in Reform are coming from. One day they say they want to destroy the CBC. They want to privatize it. They do not want to see it any more.

I stand here saying we will defend the CBC. It will be a strong institution. It will be on the information highway and we are not going to have privatization. This is what I stand for.

MONEY LAUNDERING

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

Yesterday, we learned that the RCMP's lack of co–operation with Swiss authorities had resulted in the release of two Canadian nationals who had been charged with money laundering and detained for six months in Switzerland.

Today, for the second time in a year, the U.S. State Department indicated that Canada is one of the countries where money laundering is most prevalent and easiest to do.

Since Canada is truly a sieve when it comes to money laundering, what is the government waiting for to legislate and put an end to that illegal activity?

[English]

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, with the ease of international money transfers, money laundering by the underworld is a concern for all industrialized nations.

Through the inference of the Solicitor General, Canada is collaborating with other nations around the world to form a united front against this insidious threat to our economic security and, frankly to our laws against crime.

The Solicitor General, through his collaboration with the United States of America and European nations, is working closely with authorities abroad to take effective steps to deal with money laundering in Canada.

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, as was confirmed yesterday, the Canadian government is certainly not co–operating with Swiss authorities. I also urge the minister to read the U.S. State Department's report. It has plenty to say about this issue.

Does the minister realize that, because of the lack of legislation, each year $10 billion are being laundered in Canada, and does he realize that his failure to act only encourages such illegal activity?

[English]

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the incident referred to by the hon. member, the reports also indicate that action has been taken. We are collaborating with authorities abroad to make sure that effective steps are taken in that case.

In so far as legislative change is concerned, we believe that the legislation in place at present is sufficient to meet the challenge. As I have said in the past, the Solicitor General, working with other nations, is taking effective steps to make sure that happens.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the minister of public service renewal acknowledged that job cut decisions based on race or sex are illegal under the charter of rights and freedoms.

Yet he indicated that government personnel managers might turn a blind eye to the charter and it is more likely that minorities will keep their jobs when the government implements public service cuts.

Will the minister acknowledge it is his duty, like every other Canadian, to respect and abide by the charter of rights and freedoms?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is very easy to indicate exactly what the facts are before questions are asked.

The newspaper quotes me verbatim as saying: "Mr. Massé said he had been assured workers' rights will be respected. 'The charter of rights indicate when you are doing a restructuring in industry you have to designate your surplus workers on totally objective reasons,' he said. 'You cannot use equity reasons of that type in order to designate them".

That indicates exactly what was said. It is totally in conformity with the charter of rights and with our policies.

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the minister is trying to obfuscate the problem because the charter of rights does not allow discrimination based on sex and gender and that is exactly what he has said in the article.

Will the minister confirm that he will give specific direction to government personnel managers to abide by the charter of rights and freedoms and tell them that employment equity plays second fiddle to the charter of rights and freedoms?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I do not give orders to directors of personnel. That is something deputy ministers in departments do.

The member opposite has to recognize that in this case we will apply the rules as we normally do.

Mr. Jean–Guy Chrétien (Frontenac, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister.

In its budget, the government intends to spend $3.5 billion to compensate Western grain producers for eliminating the Crow subsidy which totals nearly $600 million annually. This compensation will be a direct incentive for the diversification of agricultural production in Western Canada.

Considering current budgetary constraints, how can the Liberal government justify replacing a grain transportation subsidy of $560 million with financial compensation and guarantees totalling $3.5 billion?

[English]

Mr. David Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, a number of actions were taken on the agricultural front dealing with both the WGTA and the dairy subsidy. I remind hon. members these are two different agricultural sectors. We had a question from the Reform Party yesterday from a different perspective.

We are working with each of these communities to make sure that we do things properly. The dairy subsidy is being approached in an entirely different way than the grain transportation subsidy. As we work our way through the communities we will continue making announcements to make sure these subsidies are both reduced and properly looked after.

Mr. Jean–Guy Chrétien (Frontenac, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I may recall this is a ratio of 6 to 1. How can the Liberal government justify this inequity which deprives Eastern producers of any form of compensation, although they will be the first to suffer as a result of competition from Western farm producers who are being subsidized by the federal government to diversify their production?

[English]

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture and Agri–food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would remind the hon. member for Frontenac that the changes made to the Western Grain Transportation Act are one time and final. As of August 1 this year the western grain transportation support will be over and done with. The dairy support—it is one of the hon. member's concerns—will still be 85 per cent in place as of August 1, 1995.

The changes we have made to the agriculture and agri–food budget have been fair and equitable. They will be effective.

I would also remind the hon. member that Quebec has not been unduly affected by the budget. If I look at the changes in the research branch, the reduction in staff in the province of Quebec at the end of all this—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order.

THE BUDGET

Mrs. Karen Kraft Sloan (York—Simcoe, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Reform Party, in criticizing the budget and management of the economy, has been speculating that Canada will not be able to sustain the economic growth rate required to meet the deficit target.

Would the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance provide the doom and gloomers on the other side of the House with real facts and figures on Canada's economic growth?

Mr. David Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity the question from the hon. member for York—Simcoe gives me to tell the House that the economy is coming along quite well.

Statistics Canada said this week that the economy has improved and that we have had the fastest growth rate in five years. It was 4.5 per cent throughout the year. For the first time in 40 years we are now competitive with the United States on every measure. That is why our exports are driving the economy.

Most important—and all members of the House will appreciate this—finally consumer confidence is growing. With a 7 per cent increase in retail sales I believe every Canadian feels he or she is participating in the renewal.

PENSIONS

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, let us not forget what we have learned today, that the Liberals now define spending cuts as a better way of doing things.

The Liberals' two–tier pension plan through trough regular and trough light will continue to make millionaires out of defeated cabinet ministers. On Monday, the President of the Treasury Board acknowledged that members of Parliament contribute double what is normal in the private sector to their own plan. He said that in the House.

How can the Liberal government justify this double standard of asking Canadians to sacrifice while most ministers continue to stuff their mattresses?

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is funny that members of the third party talk about stuffing mattresses. They do not say anything about double dipping, even though a few of them understand it quite well.

The cuts we announced in the budget of 19 per cent over the next three years are very substantial cuts. In one year, we cut the MP contribution by 33 per cent. On top of that, salaries of members of Parliament have been frozen for six years. Therefore the compensation package overall for members of Parliament has been going down.

It has been going down to help meet our deficit reduction targets, to help get our fiscal house in order.

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, for the information of the President of Treasury Board, we would support any legislation he introduces to eliminate double dipping.

On Monday, the Prime Minister said he cannot reform the MP pension plan retroactively because "there is a rule in democracy that we do not pass retroactive legislation".

Considering the fact that the Liberals applied retroactive legislation to the Pearson contract, public service contracts, the EH–101 contract, the Canadian taxpayers working overseas, can the minister explain why the Liberal fat pack is not subject to the same rules as those Canadians?

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it has been said many times in the House why the Pearson deal and others were changed. It was a bad deal for taxpayers.

What is a good deal and a show of leadership is when the members of the House cut their compensation packages. That is what has happened in the case of MPs' pensions.

CONTENTS OF THE BUDGET

Mr. Réjean Lefebvre (Champlain, BQ): Mr. Speaker, a government member admitted that members of the Liberal caucus were informed of the contents of the federal budget a week before it was tabled in the House on Monday, which gave them a chance to prepare for cuts that would affect their ridings.

Would the Acting Prime Minister confirm what was said by the hon. member for Guelph—Wellington, in other words, that budget secrecy was violated by her colleagues in the Liberal caucus.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order. I must ask the hon. member to rephrase his question so that it concerns more directly the area for which the minister is responsible and not what another member may or may not have said.

Mr. Lefebvre: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask whether the Minister of Finance briefed the Liberal caucus before the budget was tabled?

[English]

Hon. David Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the comments of the hon. member for Guelph—Wellington were taken out of context.

She was referring to the fact that we have had the most open budget making process in Canadian history. The Minister of Finance should be congratulated for consulting widely, not just with his parliamentary colleagues but with industry and all Canadians.

She was referring to the fact it was well known because my colleague, the President of the Treasury Board and the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs had talked about the downsizing of the public service. It was in the public domain. It was not a leak of the budget.

I should tell members that all of us in the ministry were only informed of the budget's contents shortly before the minister presented it to the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Réjean Lefebvre (Champlain, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister why only Liberal members had this opportunity?

• (1145)

Hon. David Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the hon. member listened to the answer.

I have been around for budgets before in other governments. The fact is that the Minister of Finance followed the true parliamentary tradition in terms of developing the budget in secrecy but did consult widely with all Canadians.

In no way did the comments of the hon. member on this side of the House conflict with what the Minister of Finance brought forward last week.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Minister of National Defence announced an eventual 20 per cent cut to his general staff by 1998. This is too little too late. Canada will still have a ratio of generals to troops double that of Germany or the United States.

Can the minister justify the fact that even his target reductions leave his ratios out of whack?

Hon. David Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad that the Reform Party is supporting what we are doing in terms of streamlining the Canadian Armed Forces from top to bottom. I welcome that.

The previous government did announce a reduction at the general officer level by 20 per cent in 1991 and that has now gone through the system. We announced, consequential to the white paper and from the budget, that there would be a further reduction of 25 per cent at the general officer level and 20 per cent of the colonels.

Contrary to what the hon. member said, this does bring us more into line with our NATO allies with respect to the officer to general ranks ratio.

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, let us take a look at that.

Currently we have 12 generals per 10,000 troops in the Canadian Armed Forces. The United States and Germany have 5 generals per 10,000 troops in their forces. With the government's reductions that ratio will change to 11 generals per 10,000 troops.

Does the minister really expect the Canadian people to believe this is a cut at the top?

Hon. David Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member mentioned two countries in which their armed forces are structured somewhat differently with respect to the way the general officers are apportioned in their tasks. However, he did not mention other countries in the NATO alliance in comparison with which we have a better ratio.

URANIUM

Mr. Morris Bodnar (Saskatoon—Dundurn, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, uranium production employs hundreds of Canadians in Saskatchewan and other parts of Canada. Exports to the United States last year amounted to $500 million.

The industry has been concerned that recent U.S. arrangements with Russia might threaten to destabilize the U.S. uranium market by providing for U.S. imports of large quantities of low cost Russian uranium.

Would the Parliament Secretary to the Minister of International Trade advise the House what steps his minister is taking to protect the Canadian uranium exports to the United States.

Mr. Mac Harb (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we have taken vigorous action on this issue. Back in March 1994 we initiated consultations with the United States on this issue. Our motives are to ensure that the export of Russian uranium to the United States does not unfairly discriminate against uranium exports to the United States. We were given assurances by the Americans that would not be the case.

Throughout it all we have worked closely with the industry in Canada. We are pleased to report that the outcome was a very positive one. We will continue to monitor the situation very closely. It is our hope that it will be an open and fair market for all concerned.

OLD AGE SECURITY

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Sherbrooke, P.C.): Mr. Speaker, I want to return to an issue that I and my colleague raised earlier this week in the House of Commons. It has to do with old age security benefits.

The Deputy Prime Minister answered unequivocally that old age security benefits would not affect women who are 65 and older even though the budget plan, a government document, states unequivocally that the basic principles for reforming OAS shall be the provision of OAS benefits on the basis of family income.

How does the government square that response with the stated principle in this document? If that is the answer, what then does the document mean?

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Human Resources Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member raises an important question. It is for this reason, as he well knows, that the federal government will be meeting with provincial counterparts in the fall to discuss the issue of pensions.

It is interesting the hon. member would mention the principles but would not speak to the fact that some of the principles include undiminished protection for the less well off seniors, greater progressivity of benefits by income level and control of program costs.

Pensions are a very important part of this government's generous and compassionate approach toward social security.

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Sherbrooke, P.C.): Mr Speaker, I am glad my hon. colleague referred to a meeting the government will have with the provinces. I assume this is not improvised and that the government will have prepared.

Are the hon. member and the government ready to table here in the House of Commons studies and documents that the Government of Canada will have prepared with projections on what the application of this principle of applying OAS benefits to family income would have?

I want a clear answer. Will the government, yes or no, table all the documents it has prepared for this meeting?

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Human Resources Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am quite surprised that the member, being a former cabinet minister, would not know that we are duty bound to meet with the provinces every five years to review the friendship plan.

We are not only going to consult with provinces, we are going to go further, as we always have since we have formed the government, to consult with Canadians about this very important issue.

It is important that the pension plan of this country be sustainable. That is something that we are going to make sure happens.

HIBERNIA PROJECT

Mr. René Canuel (Matapédia—Matane, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the acting prime minister.

In spite of the government's wonderful speeches, the budget has not put government spending in order. Within the natural resources department alone, the Hibernia project will swallow up $172 million this year, not to say $66 million more in interest free loans.

Why has the natural resources minister not taken the opportunity with this budget to dump the Hibernia project immediately, this money pit which will never be profitable and will only ever eat up hundreds of millions of dollars that could be better spent elsewhere?

[English]

Mr. George S. Rideout (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Natural Resources, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the member well knows we are an 8.5 per cent participant in the Hibernia project. It is a project that has been studied with clear indication that it will be a viable project when it is done. It will contribute to our energy security when it is finished.

[Translation]

Mr. René Canuel (Matapédia—Matane, BQ): Mr. Speaker, does the parliamentary secretary realize that the private sector's complete lack of interest in Hibernia confirms that this money pit will never be profitable? Do you admit that your government will have a lot of trouble handing it over to the private sector?

[English]

Mr. George S. Rideout (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Natural Resources, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, maybe we can do the math for the member opposite. We are seeing private sector involvement to 92 per cent. That seems to be a very strong commitment by the private sector to this project.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Ted White (North Vancouver, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, here is another one of those isolated incidents for the minister of immigration. It is just one of three isolated incidents that are currently underway in my riding.

After a five–year crime spree, including an armed home invasion and drug trafficking, a Mr. Vu Van Li had his deportation order overruled by the famous Mr. Lam of the Immigration and Refugee Board who said that Mr. Li just needed to take anger management courses.

• (1155)

Will the minister not admit that irresponsible IRB decisions like this are putting the safety of law–abiding Canadians at risk?

Ms. Mary Clancy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should have showed along with his party support for Bill C–44 which deals with the problems of criminality in immigration.

As the hon. member well knows, we cannot comment on individual cases. I know that the hon. member with his interest and his party will also support the reforms announced yesterday by the minister of immigration to the Immigration and Refugee Board to make it a better and more viable institution in this country, and we know we would have this party's support for this kind of policy.

Mr. Ted White (North Vancouver, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the changes announced yesterday by the minister look more like a fast track way to let more criminals into the country than to address the way of controlling entry.

Mr. Li was involved in an armed home invasion in 1989, assault with a weapon in 1990, and drug trafficking in 1994. Day after day we bring up isolated incidents like this for the minister.

When is the minister going to agree that rearranging the deck chairs on the Titanic of the IRB is not going to solve the problem and when will he scrap the IRB as Reform has suggested?

Ms. Mary Clancy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, again, yesterday saw major reforms in policy announced by the minister to the Immigration and Refugee Board.

Today the chair of the Immigration and Refugee Board will be announcing further changes within the administration of that board. While there have been problems in this board, this is a good board and it serves Canadians well.

If the Reform Party and the hon. member for North Vancouver are so concerned about criminality it might have behoved them to support Bill C–44 when it was in the House.

INDIA

Mr. Gurbax Singh Malhi (Bramalea—Gore—Malton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

Recently several Canadian citizens have been arrested or harassed while travelling in India.

There is evidence that the Indian authorities are detaining individuals without charge. Coincidentally this harassment and unfounded police interrogation are directed particularly at Canadians of Sikh origin.

Will the minister on behalf of the Government of Canada send a strong message to the Indian government to put an end to this practice and human rights violations with minorities in India?

Hon. Christine Stewart (Secretary of State (Latin America and Africa), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian government is very concerned about the detention of some Sikh Canadians who have been travelling to India.

To be more specific, recently there was a case in which a Canadian was held for about a week and others recently for shorter periods of time.

Our high commissioner in New Delhi has followed up on every case of detention that he has been aware of and through him and other officials here in Ottawa we have relayed to the government in India our concern about this issue and hope that it will be dealt with.

LABOUR

Mr. Dale Johnston (Wetaskiwin, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour.

A strike is now looming between CP Rail and two unions. Negotiations could break down by Monday and CP has said that in that event it would use replacement workers.

What is the minister doing to ensure that negotiations do not break down, thereby avoiding a potentially bitter labour–management dispute?

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Human Resources Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, following the release of the Hope report the parties were urged to resume negotiations and settle their differences through collective bargaining.

I am pleased to report that bargaining has resumed at all three railways with intensive talks being held at CP Rail in an effort to conclude an early settlement.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est, BQ): Mr. Speaker, we learned from the budget that allocations to Canada Mortgage and Housing will be cut by almost $215 million in 1995–96. More than half this amount, over $105 million, was earmarked for public housing.

My question is for the acting prime minister. Would he not agree that, by cutting public housing subsidies this way, the government is directly attacking the basic needs of the most vulnerable families in our society, contrary to the promises made in the red book?

Hon. Alfonso Gagliano (Secretary of State (Parliamentary Affairs) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to confirm, in this regard, that the federal government will continue to support and subsidize public housing, at a cost of $2 billion a year. This is for some 660,000 public housing units occupied by over a million families including many natives living on and off reservations.

However, deficit reduction requirements dictated cuts in this sector as in all other sectors, departments and services. The Minister of Finance acted responsibly, and Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation had to accept these cuts.

LOW LEVEL FLIGHTS

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I have a brief question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

The federal environmental review panel has recommended that the Department of National Defence be allowed to double the number of low level training flights over Labrador and Quebec. However it has imposed a number of conditions, including the early settlement of land claims, the establishment of an institute to study and monitor the effects of the flights and the establishment of a joint management board for the George River caribou herd.

The minister is aware that the panel refused to listen to issues raised by aboriginal people relating to their land. Is he prepared to recommend rejection of the report? What steps is he willing to take to ensure that the conditions are met as established by the panel?

Hon. David Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the report of the environmental panel was given to the Minister of the Environment and me a few days ago. We decided to make it public at the earliest opportunity.

As to the future of low level flying on the east coast out of Goose Bay, that will be decided by cabinet in due course.

PRIVILEGE

BUDGET SECRECY

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Sherbrooke, PC): Mr. Speaker, you will remember that yesterday, as recorded in Hansard, I raised a question of privilege. I informed the House that I would raise this matter today after question period. Furthermore, I advised the whips of the other parties in the House, including the member for Guelph—Wellington, of my intention to raise this question of privilege because it is a question that relates to comments she made.

I rise today on a question of privilege. My query comes after reading a column that interestingly enough is entitled "Question Period". Question period is published in each weekly edition of a newspaper very well known here on the Hill, called the Hill Times. Members of this place will be familiar with a specific column, a vox populi, very similar to other vox populi we see in other media, where four individuals are asked a question, often of members of Parliament, often of individuals who work on the Hill, and they offer a response.

This week's question was: "Is there too much secrecy surrounding the budget?" The Bloc member for La Prairie, for example, answered:

> The government has to maintain secrecy around the budget, not to favour certain investors. But there should be more transparency about the budget, to give a better idea of it without giving precise measures and details.

That is what the member for La Prairie is reported to have said.

Two other respondents, the members for Ottawa Centre and Provencher, also echoed their hon. colleague's understanding of secrecy. However, and this is the point of fact, the member for Guelph—Wellington gave a very troubling answer. In response to the clear and concise question: "Is there too much secrecy surrounding the budget" she is quoted as saying:

> I don't think so. There were some MPs who were told beforehand if major cuts were coming to programs in their ridings. They asked for that in caucus so they could prepare to ask questions.

I will just repeat the words because they are serious: "some MPs were told beforehand". Needless to say, I find this statement very troubling. I want to explain why I find it troubling but I also want to explain why I feel this to be a prima facie violation of my rights and privileges as a member of Parliament.

I want to quote another parliamentarian on this same issue who outlined the importance of the budget being confidential until budget night. By the way there is some real irony in this quote. This is a quote that I draw from the Debates at page 2283 of Hansard of December 12, 1979. It reads:

> The confidentiality in which the details of a budget are kept secret is a constitutional practice which forms an integral part of a parliamentary system. Such practice is based on the principle that no individual, whoever he may be, must know in advance the details of a budget which he could use for personal gain.

That quote is from the right hon. Prime Minister, speaking in the House of Commons in 1979. I am sure the Prime Minister intended to include the Liberal caucus in his designation when he said "whoever".

To facilitate your work, Mr. Speaker, I also reviewed the past occasions when the House had to deal with budget leaks. Not to undermine the seriousness of any budget leak allegations, I am sure you will also agree that with the incidents of the past came also odd and unusual circumstances.

You will remember a photographer having snapped a picture of the Minister of Finance at the time, Mr. Lalonde, reviewing budget documents, and that incident being the object of debate in the House and another question of privilege. I also remember, Mr. Speaker, and I know that you were in the House at the time, a colleague of mine who had one of his documents fall into the hands of the media before the formal announcement of the budget.

In the past, when dealing with such rather isolated incidents, your predecessors ruled: "There was some doubt whether the convention of budget secrecy falls within the area of privilege". In fact, that is a quote which can be found in Jurisprudence parlementaire de Beauchesne, with which I am sure other members are familiar.

I quickly realized, and I am sure you will too, Mr. Speaker, that the very nature of this revelation makes this case a precedent which stands by itself. Never have we had, as far as I know in any research that we have done, any situation where a specific member of Parliament has boldly admitted to having obtained privileged information relating to the budget before it was formally announced. Nor are there any precedents where a whole caucus of this place, according to the statement made by the hon. member for Guelph—Wellington, was actually informed in advance of the contents of the budget. I have not found any precedents in that regard.

Mr. Speaker, we have nowhere to turn but to you. We are not in the presence of a leak of a titbit of information to a controlled number of people for what has never been more than a very short period of time, like the situations we have faced in the past. Neither have we ever been in the presence of what I reasonably fear to be a concerted effort on the part of someone to give a great deal of information to the largest body of members in the House, namely the Liberal caucus, at a day and time we can only yet still ignore.

I will not get into all the questions that this situation brings up, and you will know that there are many dimensions to this question. They are all very grave. Most of the time they have called for the resignation of the Minister of Finance.

I want to raise a very specific issue in regard to this principle. I am putting this question of privilege because I believe that the matter I am talking about poses a grave hindrance to my ability to accomplish my duties as a member of Parliament for the riding of Sherbrooke.

It is greatly troubling to me, should such actions be found to be true, that the people of my riding and all Canadians would find disrepute and maybe even contempt for this place. In such circumstances I fail to see how any of us would be able to accomplish our work properly. That is surely a question of privilege for myself and for every person here.

Even more sad is what this could mean for free speech. I respectfully ask that you consider in your ruling whether debate in this House can be truly free, frank and sincere if members are led to believe that the contents of the budget that are supposed to be secret for all, without exception, when in the end the truth is revealed to us that the members of the governing party were privy to a special complicity with the Minister of Finance.

The budget is at the heart of why we sit in Parliament. It is at the very heart of what this parliamentary institution is all about. We are here to vote on behalf of our constituents the moneys that allow us to live in a democracy and not pursuant to the whims of an all powerful despot.

That is why the first Commons took away powers from the monarch and that is why this member is claiming back those privileges today. I respectfully ask that you consider this matter, Mr. Speaker, with great attention, urgency and severity.

In conclusion, what we are facing today as a question of privilege is a situation where certain members of the House of Commons, namely the Liberal caucus, according to a public admission by the member for Guelph—Wellington, received privileged, secret information before budget day to the detriment of the members who sit on the opposite side of the House.

Based on that fact, Mr. Speaker, I ask you to rule on this question of privilege.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there are two issues before the House. First, is this a legitimate question of privilege? Second, was there a breach of the secrecy of the budget?

I will deal with these two issues in reverse order. We should all be reminded that the member who has just raised this question of privilege knows about cabinet secrecy. I would have hoped that in his remarks he could have borne that in mind a little more than he did. I am sorry that he failed in that regard.

I wish to bring to members' attention the question of the secrecy of the budget. There was no breach in the secrecy of the budget. On reading the article yesterday in the newspaper, I telephoned the hon. member for Guelph—Wellington and spoke to her about her comments in the Hill Times.

I asked her to put her response in writing and to send it to me so that I could share it very briefly with the House today. In the memorandum she sent to me, which I am perfectly willing to table with the Clerk later with the consent of the House if such were forthcoming, is the following:

> To: Don Boudria, Chief Government Whip
> From Brenda Chamberlain, M.P.
> Re: Our Conversation
> In reference to your question, I was referring specifically to the caucus briefing which was held approximately one hour prior to the tabling by the President of the Treasury Board of measures to deal with downsizing in the federal public service.

That downsizing document was tabled on February 21. It has nothing to do with the budget document. There may well have been issues tabled by the President of the Treasury Board that were later reflected in budget decisions.

That may be so but it was not information that was given to Liberal members of Parliament and denied to anyone else. As a matter of fact, the tabling occurred at ten o'clock that morning. That is easily verifiable and I am sure all hon. members, including the member in question, were here that morning.

The hon. member remembers well that the document was tabled. I read from the letter in question:

> This announcement took place one week before the budget and dealt with downsizing in the federal public service, which was part of the federal budget. If you have any further questions please do not hesitate to contact me.

I will certainly table the letter if it is the wish of the House.

The second issue is the following. Is it in fact a question of privilege? I wish to bring to members' attention Beauchesne's sixth edition, page 13, citation 31(5) which says:

> Budget secrecy is a political convention, and if breached,

It was not as we have just identified:

> —the Minister may be attacked through a substantive motion, but not through a question of privilege.

That was ruled that way on April 19, 1983.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring to your attention the following decision made on November 18, 1981 by the then Speaker, the late Madam Sauvé: "Certainly the matter of budget secrecy is not dealt with through questions of privilege and there are very important precedents which I will recall to hon. members". She then cited a whole number of cases where it has been ruled not to be an issue of privilege.

In summary, there has not been a case of breach of budget secrecy and there is not a question of privilege now before the House.

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would have preferred to speak before one of the government members replied, who would then have been able to respond to my comments as well.

Like the hon. member for Sherbrooke, I wanted to quote what was said by the Prime Minister when he was in the opposition, on a similar question concerning a budget leak. I will not repeat the same quote, but I would like to quote what was said by the hon. member for Saint–Maurice in Hansard of July 24, 1975: "The tradition of secrecy ensures that all Canadians will be kept at the same advantage or disadvantage with respect to any budgetary matter and that any announcement will be made first in this House and not privately to those who rightfully have no access and should have no access to that information".

When, as the hon. member for Sherbrooke pointed out, we look at what was said by the hon. member for Guelph—Wellington, the members of the Liberal caucus must have known how the budget would affect their respective ridings before it was brought down.

I do not think a member of Parliament should have advance knowledge, before Parliament and members of this House, of the consequences of budget cuts for his or her own riding. This raises a number of questions for me, as a parliamentarian, and my constituents will have a few as well.

If it is true that the Liberal caucus had advance knowledge of this budget, there must be Liberals who obtained some personal or political gain from that knowledge. They were able to prepare answers for their constituents before anyone else, and that is a personal gain.

Furthermore, what assurances does Parliament have that the minister did not, following his presentation of the budget to the Liberal caucus, change parts of his budget in response to undue pressure from members of his party? How can we be sure? We cannot.

I do not, and the official opposition does not think the hon. member's response to the comments by the hon. member for Shefford was satisfactory. Mr. Speaker, correct me if I am wrong, but in the past, when there were leaks or alleged leaks, the matter was usually referred to a committee of the House for clarification.

Considering that the hon. member's reply fails to satisfy members on this side of the House, I would like the Chair to take the matter under advisement and refer it to a committee, for thorough clarification of an issue that goes to the very core of the Canadian parliamentary system. It is the government, through such practices, that is making trouble in this Parliament.

[English]

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Sherbrooke for bringing this matter to the attention of the House. It certainly is a very serious concern in light of citation 31 of Beauchesne's:

> Budget secrecy is a political convention and if breached, the minister may be attacked through a substantive motion, but not through a question of privilege.

Certainly this is a very serious matter.

Representing the Reform Party in this House we ask questions of a general nature regarding rumours around the budget and we are told that the specifics or even generalities could not be dealt with in this House until the budget was tabled.

It comes as some shock to me to find out that one caucus in this House was made privy to the details of the budget. According to this article in the paper, the question is whether there is too much secrecy surrounding the budget, not the documents that the hon. government whip was talking about. This is a very serious matter.

Never at any time was our caucus approached by the departmental officials of finance or the minister on whether we would want a briefing on details that would affect even our individual ridings.

Were I as a member of Parliament to have known that there would be a Crow buyout in the budget prior to its tabling, I could have communicated to people back in my riding of this matter. It affects the value of land. It affects the transactions between farmers who may have been actually selling their land at that time. It is a very serious matter with millions of dollars at stake.

I am rather shocked and I want to assure this House that my caucus was not made privy to any of the details of the budget in any manner, particularly as it related to situations of cuts that would affect our riding.

I add my concern and ask the Chair to deal in a very severe way with this important matter.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will deal very directly with the allegation made by the hon. member for Kindersley—Lloydminster, supported by the hon. member for Sherbrooke. There was absolutely no question of a budget leak in this case.

There is no evidence that has been adduced by the hon. member to support that, absolutely no evidence.

Mr. Charest: Read the Hill Times.

Mr. Milliken: I have read the Hill Times and I know the hon. member read the Hill Times. The answer that was given has been fully explained in a reply, given in writing, by the hon. member for Guelph—Wellington which was read by the chief government whip a few moments ago.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I have listened attentively, as all members have on this issue. A question of privilege is an important matter and a serious matter for all parliamentarians. I would ask that we keep the discussion in the parliamentary fashion that we have thus far, that we might conclude this matter.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, certain hon. members of the opposition were invited to a briefing on the budget well in advance, a briefing that was not provided to government members. I had no idea what was in the budget until I walked into the House and heard the budget being delivered.

That was not the case with certain members of the opposition who were invited to a briefing. That is standard practice and there is no suggestion in the answer that was given by the hon. member for Guelph—Wellington as explained in the memorandum that she has tabled here that there was anything but that procedure followed. She has explained that the procedure she was talking about when she answered the question dealt with events long before budget day.

I refer once again to citation 31 of Beauchesne's which has already been quoted. I need not read it again. I want to remind the Chair that when we had a case of a budget leak with the hon. Michael Wilson during the last Parliament, a major leak in which the whole document got out, there was a question of privilege raised and debated for an entire day in this House on that very issue.

There was never anything referred to a committee. The Chair never made a finding that there had been a breach of the privileges of the members of this House, even though there had been a complete leak of the budget. I think the hon. member for Sherbrooke was in the cabinet at that time.

What I am saying is that there is no evidence of any leak here today in respect of the budget. If there were, according to the citation of Beauchesne's and in accordance with the practice followed in respect of Mr. Wilson's major leak, the whole thing went out. In light of the precedent established then, I submit there is nothing that the House should do to take note of this unless the hon. member for Sherbrooke wishes to set down a motion condemning not the member for Guelph—Wellington but the Minister of Finance for allowing any information to get into her hands.

In the face of the denial, I suggest such a motion is not supported by any evidence and it would be a waste of the time of this House, as is the question raised by the hon. member.

• (1225)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Sherbrooke for a final comment, but I wish to apprise the House that I would hold that comment to a minimum amount of time. The Chair does not want to restart the whole debate. I have listened attentively. It is an important, serious matter. It will be dealt with as its seriousness requires.

Mr. Charest: Mr. Speaker, thank you for your patience. I do not want to rehash past events. For the benefit of all members of the House, let us focus on what is really at issue here. I feel compelled to stress this because there is a very important distinction in the situation we are facing today relative to precedent.

The precedents referred to are on the notion of confidentiality, budget secrecy as applied at large. We are facing a new situation today in which certain members of the House of Commons were informed beforehand according to this bold admission.

Mr. Speaker, that is the evidence you have. May I point out according to precedent that is the prima facie evidence you have before you today. That is the reason I think you will find here a question of privilege.

The parliamentary secretary has hoisted himself on his own petard when he rises in this place to say there is no evidence and then goes on to explain the rebuttal of the evidence that happens to be in front of this House. To make that statement is so gross as to deny that this statement actually exists in a document that was distributed to the public at large.

This is the last point I want to make. Let me read the quotation because it goes directly to the heart of this matter. The member for Guelph—Wellington said: "I do not think so. There were some MPs who were told beforehand if major cuts were coming to programs in their ridings".

The last phrase goes to motive: "They asked for that in caucus so they could prepare to answer questions".

My colleague from the Bloc Quebecois—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order. I think the Chair has heard all the arguments from the members who participated.

[Translation]

As I said earlier, I realize that a question of privilege is a serious matter for all parliamentarians. As is customary, the Chair will certainly prefer to wait until the hon. member for Guelph—Wellington is present to hear what she has to say.

[English]

The Chair will certainly want to give an opportunity to the member for Guelph—Wellington to express her point of view more before making a definitive ruling.

I want to thank the well experienced hon. member for Sherbrooke for raising this question of privilege and the chief government whip, the member for Berthier—Montcalm, the member for Kindersley—Lloydminster and the member for Kingston and the Islands for their participation.

The matter raised by the hon. member for Sherbrooke, if founded, is more an issue of contempt that a question of privilege. That being said, the Chair will take the matter under advisement, review the hon. member's comments as well as all related parliamentary practice and precedents, and report back to the House as soon as possible.

Mr. Charest: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. government whip kindly offered to table a document that the member for Guelph—Wellington apparently sent to him. I suggest to the House that there be unanimous consent so that document could be now tabled.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

Hon. Sheila Finestone (Secretary of State (Multiculturalism) (Status of Women), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, next week, on March 8, women and men around the world will celebrate International Women's Day.

This day was designated in honour of these early campaigns to improve working conditions for women. This day has become a global celebration of women's accomplishments and advancements. But it was born when women were struggling to achieve the very basics of equal rights.

[English]

In the ensuing years women have made many important gains, overcoming many obstacles to achieve through merit their rightful place in the workforce. They have overcome professional barriers in virtually every field of human endeavour. They have overcome many stereotypes and have excelled in fields where doors were closed before such as medicine, law, politics, cultural industries, military, business and so on.

Women have demonstrated conclusively that no task is beyond them, given fair and equitable access. Women have also achieved success in the business world. A recent study conducted by the Canadian Federation of Independent Business found that almost 40 per cent of small businesses are operated by women, up from 30 per cent in 1981.

Women have steadily progressed in closing the wage gap. The average Canadian woman now makes 72 cents of what a man earns. More important, for university graduates the gap is gone. Young women and young men starting out in their careers with the same university education earn the same salary.

Although women have made inroads into almost every profession they still face multiple challenges. Sexual harassment in the workplace continues to undermine and marginalize the position of women. Many still face obstacles to advancement: either the famous glass ceiling that stops women's progress at middle management levels or the corporate philosophy that is overly hostile to family considerations.

The recent Statistics Canada study on the wage gap was quite revealing on this point. While young women start off on an equal footing, wage–wise, when they graduate from university, they steadily lose ground as they get married and have children.

Even most of the independent and ambitious women who go boldly into the business world hit the wall of sexual discrimination. And a study by the Canadian Federation of Independent Business revealed that 42 per cent of women entrepreneurs experience difficulty getting financing. This despite the fact that women entrepreneurs are generally more successful than men.

We must address these issues. After all, women work for the same reasons men do—they want and they have to. Women's contributions to our economy, and to our society, are indisputable and indispensable.

[English]

It is estimated that if all employed women were to leave the workforce, the number of low income families in Canada would more than double. Given their key role, I think it is time society recognized their worth. We must pursue a fair distribution of unpaid work in the home where women still carry a disproportionate burden of work.

We must persuade industries to develop family friendly workplaces to help root out sexual harassment and discriminatory practices. We must urge banks in particular and the financial community in general to recognize the achievements of women entrepreneurs and give them the fair and equitable consideration and support they deserve.

Women do not want a free ride. They want their fair share. I think that has become fairly obvious. Governments must continue to have a role in the drive for women's equality, even in the face of restrictive fiscal constraints.

Violence against women, sexual harassment, inequalities and inequities in employment opportunities, the wage imbalance and gender discrimination must all be addressed. I am pleased the government is continuing to push forward on all these fronts.

I congratulate my colleague, the Minister of Justice, for such initiatives as the sentencing reform bill, the firearms control legislation and his quick action to address the defence of extreme drunkenness.

I congratulate my colleague, the Minister of Finance, for his budget commitment to remove barriers to the success of small businesses and to provide practical assistance to them to survive and grow. It is essential that small businesses have access to the financing they need to continue being Canada's number one creator of jobs.

To this end the budget announced that the government would be working with the banks to develop meaningful performance benchmarks for small business financing, benchmarks that will be used to monitor future progress which will include women.

We must also continue to support women in their family responsibilities. The new Canada social transfer announced in the budget offers the potential for a more flexible framework for child care funding. We need improvements in the accessibility of child care and in the quantity and quality of child care, public and private, in all regions of the land and based on choice in those areas.

As my colleague, the Minister of Human Resources Development, begins his work with the provinces to develop shared principles for the transfer, I know he plans to focus on the needs of women and their families in general and on their requirements for child care in particular.

I will also continue to work with my colleagues to ensure that government policies and programs are examined through a gender equality lens, so that their impact on women is considered at every stage of the policy development process.

A particular focus must be on the needs of women from different ethnocultural communities, aboriginal women, women with disabilities, and those living in rural or remote areas. We must continue to help them achieve their independence. These are all challenges that we must confront if we are going to achieve our ultimate goal of fairness and equality. This September fourth's United Nations World Conference on Women will be a unique forum for advancing women's equality. It will produce a global Platform for Action to accelerate progress towards equality.

[English]

I look forward to working with the men and women of the world at this conference as we lay the groundwork for eliminating the barriers facing women around the globe. More important, to all my colleagues I say I look forward to coming home from the world conference, getting to work and collaborating with all our stakeholders at the regional, provincial, federal, private and public levels to implement the platform of action for Canada. Our society, and that includes all Canadian men and women, has a responsibility to begin laying the further groundwork for equality right now.

The ongoing push for equality may be entering its most difficult phase. It will require that women stand up for themselves and boldly take the position that is rightfully theirs. It cannot be done by government alone. It cannot be done by one voice, by the voice of opposition on either side of the House.

It will require them to be forceful and advance their views. It will require men to play their role as full partners in this adventure in growth and development. At the very least I would suggest that men acknowledge the current of history. They must recognize that from now on society will be that of equal partners because we have earned that right from the very start.

While some men may still resist this idea, I say to them that equality of the sexes is not only attainable but is desirable from all points of view and for all concerned. Is this not what we all want both for our sons and our daughters?

We need to leave behind the battle of the sexes where women's gains are interpreted as men's losses. We have to accept that when women finally achieve equality everyone will be better off. We will all stand to gain.

I close in reminding everyone that it is purely mathematical because when women who make up 52 per cent of our population are able to make a full contribution to society, 100 per cent of the population will benefit.

On this International Women's Day I want to send a message of hope to all Canadians, women and men. I say to them that by working together we can reach our full potential, every one of us; by working together we can shape our joint future.

[Translation]

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Québec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, on March 8, women from Quebec, Canada and the world over will celebrate International Women's Day. Some of us will spend the day with our loved ones, our families, our colleagues from work or with the women's groups and organizations that we are involved in.

Others will watch from the sidelines, wondering when governments are going to stand up and take action to improve the living conditions of women.

The federal government would have us believe that it is attentive to women's needs. However, its daily actions speak louder than its words, speeches and policy statements. Let us call to mind just some of the Liberal government's acts.

The Liberals' first budget, February 1994, announced unprecedented cuts to the unemployment insurance system. With one stroke of the pen, they took more than $5.5 billion out of the pockets of the unemployed over three years.

The Liberals decided to take their unemployment insurance cuts in a totally new direction and to hit workers with unstable jobs, who cannot do without unemployment insurance. This hurt women most of all. Women have the dubious honour of holding the majority of unstable jobs.

They reduced the benefit rate and access to them. They dramatically shortened the length of time that benefits can be claimed. They took drastic measures, asking the unemployment insurance fund to foot a disproportionate chunk of the deficit fighting measures.

In his proposed social program reform, the Minister of Human Resources Development went as far as suggesting that eligibility for benefits be subject to a family income test. Since we know that women earn about 72 per cent of what men earn, we know very well who will be penalized by such a measure.

We know that women earn less than their partners and that they often hold unstable jobs. Often, they are the ones who lose their jobs and go on UI. They are maintained in this dependent condition. What a move towards equality.

Women immediately saw what the minister was driving at: women whose spouse's income is above a certain limit are disqualified in spite of the fact that they have been contributing to the UI fund. Attacking financial independence dearly won over the years, the government now wants to turn women into second–class citizens having to depend on their spouses for their every need.

That is why so many women came forward when the Standing Committee on Human Resources Development held its hearings on the social reform package.

They unanimously denounced the minister's proposal, forcing the committee to recommend that he not pursue this issue. We will see in the fall if the minister will choose to ignore the committee's recommendation and implement his proposal anyway. In that case, he can expect fierce opposition on the part of women and the Bloc Quebecois.

Monday's budget also speaks volumes about what this government has in store for women.

The Liberals strike again. Monday's budget contains further cuts, cuts totalling at least $700 million in UI funding and $7 billion in transfer payments to the provinces for welfare, health and education. In reality, what will be hacked is cash transfers to the provinces, with a 40 per cent cut in direct federal contributions to health, education and welfare.

What will these blind cuts translate into in actual fact? Either cuts in health and education services or cuts in welfare, which will mean yet more women losing theirs jobs. Pension reform was also announced. Again, the government is contemplating tying old age pension benefit entitlement to family income. This government is certainly bent on subjugating women to their spouses. Poverty is obviously a sin for which this government wants to make women pay dearly.

The number of public service positions was cut back. Again, women at the lower echelons will be penalized. Also, what is the use of reviewing the Employment Equity Act if it will not be enforced? Coloured, disabled and native women are highly likely to lose their jobs, as they are at a disadvantage to begin with and at the lower echelons. The 160,000 Canadian women on UI and 230,000 Canadian women on welfare were not smiling on Monday night, they were afraid. The 100,000 single parents who rely on social assistance shivered when they realized that they might be deprived of what little they have left.

What about the election promise made by the Liberal Party regarding the creation of 150,000 new day–care spaces? The 1994 budget provided that $120 million would be invested as early as this year. Today, all we know about that promise is that the Minister of Human Resources Development is discussing with the provinces. If these discussions are anything like the ones the minister is having regarding the social program reform, the Holy Spirit will have to step in to ensure that this promise is fulfilled.

Another measure directly affecting women is the increase in the fees for adult immigrants who apply for permanent residence in Canada. This is more or less tantamount to an immigration tax of $975 for immigrants, a number of whom are women, in addition to the basic amount of $500 which they must pay just to have their application looked at.

This government wants to mark International Women's Day. Great! However, the government is hiding the plight of many women and the fact that it is not giving them any chance to improve their lot. Women must always fight to be treated with fairness and ensure that the organizations which represent them get meagre financial support. By the way, these organizations face new financial constraints, with government cuts of close to $1.5 million directly affecting them. How will they survive? The government could not care less.

I should point out here the courage and the determination displayed by women's organizations in their daily struggle. We have to constantly urge this government to act rather than to make nice speeches, or at least to act according to its rhetoric. This government proclaims to be an international leader in the promotion of equality for women, but it should first ensure that Canadian women are not victims of backward measures because of its own decisions. This government seems to deny women's reality and we wonder about its strategy to ensure that women have better working conditions and can make gains in the workplace?

Some positive measures are needed, including job–creation programs designed for all Canadians, not just 48 per cent of them, such as the totally inadequate infrastructure program.

[English]

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to speak on International Women's Day. As the secretary of state mentioned in her remarks, this day was designated in honour of early campaigns to improve working conditions for women. I would like to take this opportunity to acknowledge the efforts of some of these women.

In December 1993 the Manitoba legislature granted Dr. Charlotte Ross a licence to practise medicine. What makes this event unusual is that Dr. Ross obtained her medical degree 118 years earlier. Charlotte Whitehead Ross has links to this House. Her father, Joseph Whitehead, was the member of Parliament for the constituency of Huron North in the Confederation Parliament of 1867.

After being refused entry to any medical school in Canada because she was a female, Charlotte Ross obtained her medical degree in Pennsylvania in 1875. She practised medicine in Quebec for five years and then in Whitemouth, Manitoba, for another 32 years. She was the first female physician in both provinces.

The Manitoba legislature denied a request to license her in 1887 but she continued to practise unlicensed until 1912, four years before her death. She was a true female pioneer, a woman who was forced to confront state sponsored chauvinism with no employment equity or human rights legislation to protect her. In the proud tradition of western pioneers, Dr. Ross did what so many other prairie settlers did when confronted by arcane government regulations, she ignored them. Charlotte Ross' defiance undoubtedly helped make it easier for other women to follow in her footsteps.

In marking International Women's Day I am extremely proud to acknowledge the accomplishments of my great–grandmother.

Another woman who deserves recognition for her contributions in pioneering a role for women in the workforce is a constituent of mine, a friend and a mentor, Mrs. Ivy Pat Dillon. Prior to World War II at a time when the only job most women could get was as a secretary or a clerk, Mrs. Dillon worked as a manager for a company in the fledgling aerospace industry. She did not get there because of any affirmative action program or government initiative. Pat Dillon was a success because of her talents and her abilities.

Many other women of that era had to leave promising careers because they were expected to leave the workforce when they got married and raise a family. My mother was one of those women. She chose to give up a nursing career to raise a family of nine children. While she may not have climbed the corporate ladder, she made an enormous impact on her family, friends and community in many ways as a wife, a mother and a volunteer worker.

These women all overcame the challenges of a society that was very different from today's. Was it discriminatory? Without question, but societies evolve. It is just that some things take longer than others.

The greatest single factor in changing men's attitudes about equality in the workplace is not legislation. Rather, it is the fact that women have shown that they can compete with men on equal footing.

As a female baby boomer I have experienced amazing changes in the attitudes of both men and women toward the concept of equality. My working career has taken me from a clerk typist earning $210 a month to being an owner–operator of a small business, to a senior government administrator, to a self–employed realtor and finally, to a parliamentarian. During my career I have faced a wide variety of attitudes from males and females.

In her speech the secretary of state commented on the fact that women entrepreneurs experience difficulty getting financing. I can attest to that personally. When I approached a bank in 1980 to get financing to expand my business, I was shocked to learn that it wanted my husband to co–sign for the loan. This was required despite the fact that my husband had nothing to do with the business, despite the fact that the business was successful, and despite the fact that I had been mayor of that community for three years.

I am happy to report that this attitude has changed. Perhaps it is because women are now in management positions. The last two managers of my local Royal Bank have been female.

However some attitudes have not changed. One of the most chauvinistic individuals I have ever encountered I met last month. This gentleman was of the opinion that no woman who is married should be permitted to work. He thought that married women who work are responsible for unemployment among men. Not surprisingly, he did not get a very sympathetic ear from me.

What I did find extremely sad about this attitude was the fact that the male who held these opinions was only 29 years old. He is a product of affirmative action mentality. He believes that as government has legislated more opportunities for women, it has been at his expense. He views himself as a victim of discrimination.

We cannot legislate attitudes. For women to show their male colleagues that they belong, they have to prove they can compete with them on a level playing field.

I am proud of the fact that to gain my seat in this House of Commons I proved I could compete on a level playing field. Unlike some of the female members from the government side, I was not appointed as a candidate. To secure the Reform Party nomination in my constituency, I ran against five male competitors. At a nomination meeting attended by over 600 voting delegates, I won a first ballot victory. In the subsequent election, all other candidates from the major parties were males. Obviously, I won that election.

There was no special consideration because I was a woman. I competed on a level playing field. That is the way it was supposed to be and that is the way it has got to be. If we want a society where men and women are viewed as equal partners, we cannot accomplish this by punishing young men of today for the sins of their grandfathers.

I am pleased to see the statistics that women graduating from university today will earn the same salary as their male counterparts. It is a reality that these women will lose ground when they absence themselves from the workforce to have children. The logical way to address this problem is for these women and their spouses to draw equally upon their registered personal savings plan to make up the difference.

The alternative would be for medical science to develop a way for men to share the joy of childbirth. However, even if science could develop the technology, it would not be of much use. I think all mothers would agree that men do not have the pain threshold to survive childbirth.

In this celebration of International Women's Day, I share with the secretary of state the goal of true equality of the sexes. I just do not accept that legislation is the way to accomplish it. It gives the impression that women are incapable of obtaining equality solely based on their performance.

Yes, women today will experience chauvinism and discrimination in their lives. But as one of my staffers says, a woman has to work twice as hard as a man to get half the credit. Fortunately, this is not particularly difficult. I believe it is a good sign on the road to equality to know that this quote comes from a male staffer.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE AND HOUSE AFFAIRS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the 65th report of the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs regarding the associate membership of standing committees.

I move that the 65th report of the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs be concurred in.

LIGHTHOUSE KEEPERS

Mrs. Jean Payne (St. John's West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to present a petition signed by over 200 residents of my riding of St. John's West. The petition is in relation to a decision to destaff lighthouses in Newfoundland.

The undersigned residents of Canada draw to the attention of the House that Newfoundland and Labrador has one of the most treacherous coastlines in Canada. Even with the latest technology many lives have still been lost while navigating these coastal waters. Many lighthouse keepers have assisted mariners with lifesaving measures above and beyond the capabilities of technology. Therefore the petitioners call upon Parliament to recognize the valuable service provided by light keepers and to reconsider the destaffing of lighthouses.

Earlier this week I made a statement regarding this important issue. I fully support this request and ask Parliament to reconsider the decision.

JUSTICE

Mr. Hugh Hanrahan (Edmonton—Strathcona, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege to present a petition on behalf of approximately 15,000 Edmontonians. I also understand that there are several petitions being presented on the same issue that equal approximately 64,000 names.

The petitioners would like to draw to the attention of the House the inadequacies of the Young Offenders Act. They request that a complete and thorough review of the existing legislation take place aimed at changing sentencing and repeat offending.

It is my pleasure to submit this petition and to also inform my constituents and Edmontonians that I thoroughly concur with these petitioners.

GOVERNMENT SPENDING

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to rise to present four petitions to the House with a total of 545 signatures.

The petitioners are praying and requesting that Parliament reduce government spending instead of increasing taxes and that it implement a taxpayer protection act to limit federal government spending.

It is my pleasure to support this process and I am pleased to present these petitions to the House.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am pleased to present a number of petitions today. The first four petitions collectively contain well over 3,000 signatures.

The petitioners are requesting that Parliament not attack the recreational firearms community and support only legislation which severely punishes one who uses a weapon, including a weapon other than a firearm; protects the rights and freedoms of the law–abiding recreational firearms community to own and use firearms responsibly; passes careful scrutiny to see that it will improve public safety in a cost effective manner; repeals present firearms control legislation which features tortuous language and which has been characterized by the courts as one of the most horrifying examples of bad draftsmanship.

EUTHANASIA

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the petitioners of the fifth and sixth petitions which I have here wish to draw Parliament's attention to the consequence of legalizing euthanasia.

The petitioners request that Parliament not support euthanasia or doctor assisted suicide.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the seventh petition requests that Parliament oppose amendments to the Canadian Human Rights Act or Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms which provide for the inclusion of the phrase sexual orientation because such an inclusion will provide certain groups with special status, rights and privileges.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the last petition I present today on behalf of my constituents concerns the Canadian Wheat Board.

The petitioners request that Parliament continue to give the board monopoly powers in marketing wheat and barley for export.

GOVERNMENT SPENDING

Mr. Ted White (North Vancouver, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have five petitions to present today. The first one is signed by Mrs. Sisko Hamer–Jackson and 312 other residents of North Vancouver. The second one is by Mr. F. G. Williams and 26 other fellow Canadians. The third one is by Ross McCarlie and 25 other persons. All three are on the same subject.

The petitioners are praying and requesting that Parliament reduce government spending instead of increasing taxes and implement a taxpayer protection act to limit federal spending.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Ted White (North Vancouver, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, on the other two petitions that I would like to present today, the first one is signed by Helen Hughes and 26 other North Vancouver residents.

It calls upon Parliament to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act to protect individuals from discrimination based on sexual orientation.

The last petition that I have to present today is sent in by Arlene Boreham and 41 other people in North Vancouver.

The petitioners pray and request that Parliament not pass Bill C–41 with section 718.2 as presently written and in any event not include the undefined phrase sexual orientation as the behaviour people engage in does not warrant special considerations in Canadian law.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege today to present two petitions.

• (1305)

The first petition asks Parliament to ensure the presence of provisions in the Criminal Code prohibiting assisted suicide and make sure they are vigorously enforced.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition wants to extend the protection for the unborn child by amending the Criminal Code to extend the same privileges to them as to born children.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Harold Culbert (Carleton—Charlotte, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition that has been duly authorized by the clerk of petitions and has signatures on it from my constituency in the Woodstock and Hartland area.

Those signing are petitioning Parliament to ensure that the present provisions in the Criminal Code of Canada prohibiting assisted suicide be enforced vigorously and that Parliament make no change in the law that would sanction or allow the aiding or abetting of suicide or any activity designed to terminate human life.

Mr. Andy Mitchell (Parry Sound—Muskoka, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have three petitions today.

The first one deals with potential changes to the Canadian Human Rights Act in terms of sexual orientation. The petitioners are opposed to that.

The second petition also deals with the sexual orientation issue in the human rights act. These petitioners support that potential government action.

Mr. Andy Mitchell (Parry Sound—Muskoka, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the third petition relates to the potential firearms legislation before the House. These petitioners express concern about the provisions as presently before the House.

BILL C–41

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to present a petition signed by numerous residents of the Kingston area requesting that Parliament delete a section from Bill C–41.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if Questions Nos. 87, 130 and 132 could be made Orders for Return, those returns would be tabled immediately.

I may say that in respect of Question No. 87, the hon. member for Calgary Southeast has been complaining recently, I will put it politely, that she has not received this information. I am pleased to table it and I hope the week we are not sitting will afford her an opportunity to read the material, given its rather voluminous nature.

I am tabling only one copy here today because of the bulk. The other two copies are in Journals. I am also tabling the Orders for Return of the other two orders agreed to by the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is it the pleasure of the House that Questions Nos. 87, 130 and 132 be deemed to have been made Orders for Returns?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Text]

Question No. 87—Mrs. Brown:

For 1992 and 1993, what was the total amount of funds received by individuals and groups from the Canada Council, who were these individuals, for what specific projects did they receive funding and how much did they receive?

Question No. 130—Mr. Strahl:

With regards to the determinate and indeterminate federal employees declared surplus in all the departments and agencies of the federal government, what are the reasons/categories for their surplus status, how many employees are in each category by department/agency, and how many employees in each department/agency are receiving pay without actually performing work?

With regards to determinate and indeterminate employee reclassifications across all departments and agencies within the federal public service, what was the number of reclassifications by month and by department/agency across the public service from November 1993 to the present, and what were the reclassifications by level, by month and by department/agency across the public service, from November 1993 to the present?

(Return tabled.)

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I wish to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 33, because of the ministerial statement, Government Orders will be extended by 28 minutes.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1995–96

The House resumed consideration of the motion that Bill C–73, an act to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year beginning on April 1, 1995, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I want to remind the House that pursuant to Standing Order 74 we are now at the next stage of debate in which members will be entitled to a 10–minute maximum intervention without question or comment.

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Bill C–73 is the Borrowing Authority Act of 1995–96. Unfortunately it is becoming an annual event in the House of Commons that we debate the Borrowing Authority Act every year after the budget.

Every year since the early 1970s we have had to introduce a borrowing authority in order for the government to carry out the intentions and the policies introduced by the Minister of Finance in his budget.

During these last 30 years or more the borrowing authority has now increased our indebtedness up to $550–odd billion. We know unfortunately that we are going to be doing the same again next year as we increase the borrowing authority another $30–odd billion, $25 billion the subsequent year, and on and on.

When will it stop? That is what we want to know. We have been asking questions in the House of the Minister of Finance, of the Prime Minister, of any member of the government who is prepared to give us a simple, straightforward answer. When can we expect this budget to be balanced?

In due time, the Liberals say. We have been waiting for over 30 years. They created the problem in the 1970s which was carried on by the Tories in the 1980s. They are going to perpetuate it in the 1990s. How long before we stop having this annual rite of debating borrowing authority to dig ourselves further and further into the whole?

One day foreign lenders and the international investment community will not worry about our borrowing authority. They will say that we are not going to get it. They are the ones who are going to say it is all over. It is not going to be this House of Parliament that is going to say we can go out and borrow more money. The international lenders will say that is it, we are cut off. Then what?

The Reform Party has been trying to tell this House to balance the budget in three years. If foreign lenders tells us there is no borrowing authority we will be balancing this budget in three weeks. The Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister refuse to balance the budget or even tell us when we are going to stop this annual fiasco of more and more borrowing.

We had the Minister of Finance table a budget the other day. This was the toughest budget we have had since the second world war. This was really going to cut the fat and get down to the real nitty–gritty of managing the nation's finances.

The following day the President of the Treasury Board tabled the estimates and guess what, spending is going up again. Even though this was the toughest budget since the second world war spending is going up again. Let us stop fooling the Canadian people and let us get the job done. That is all we ask.

The polls are now showing that half of Canadians took one quick look at the budget and felt it was not tough enough and not quick enough to balance the budget. They said for goodness sake, can this government get its act together and get the job done.

All the Minister of Finance could do was increase taxes again; more taxes again on gasoline which affects every person in this country more or less, certainly almost every family. Remember that we have no inflation in this country any more. That means when the government increases taxes on gasoline it is going to affect every family because virtually every family has a car.

This means that these families are going to have to squeeze their budget because the government is going to take more from them. They will have to do with less and adjust their budgets downward in order for them to accommodate the fact that the government is reaching further into their pockets because this government cannot do its job of living with less, doing with less and spending less. It has said that it needs more money and Canadians are going to give it whether or not they like it. That is the fault of the way in which this country has been managed for the last 30 or more years. The government could also tap the taxpayer for more money. That is not going to work any more.

We could always tap the international investor for money but that is not going to work any more. The day is rapidly approaching when we are going to have to say that we have to live within our means. We must do it now or or we must do it as soon as we can to get the budget balanced and be able to return to some idea of prosperity in this country.

There was another budget introduced about 10 days ago called the taxpayer's budget. The Reform Party said the job can be done in three years. Not only can the job be done in three years, it can be done without increasing taxes period.

Let us compare the taxpayer's budget with the Liberal budget which spends more money liberally and leaves the taxpayer with less money. Remember I said the taxpayers were going to have less money. There is no inflation in this country. The taxpayer is now going to have less money because the government wants more. It will squeeze $9.9 billion out of the taxpayers this coming year. Next year it will be $1.3 billion. The subsequent year it will be $1.4 billion. These are the figures of the Minister of Finance, by the way.

That will carry on ad infinitum until the date we can turn things around and say: "Here is a tax decrease". The extra $1.4 billion a year will carry on every year. That should be compared to our taxpayers' budget which said the job could be done and there would be no more taxes.

What about the deficit? According to the figures of the Minister of Finance, in the year 1995–96 the deficit will be $32.7 billion. The Liberal government has been around for 18 months. The deficit was $40–odd billion when it arrived. After this draconian or toughest budget since the second world war—and this is the minister's second budget—he will only get it down to $32.7 billion.

The following year it should be $24.3 billion and maybe $20 billion after that. Who knows after that as the country goes into an economic decline, with UI and other costs like welfare going up and tax revenues going down? They know that will happen. My goodness, are there no business people over there? Tax revenues will go down, expenditures will go up and we will have lost control of the budget again.

What about the taxpayers' budget? The figure in 1996–97 would be $23 billion, not the $32.7 billion of the Liberal government. In the subsequent year we would be down to $11 billion, while they would still be up at $24.3 billion. And, hallelujah, in the following year at the end of 1997–98 we would be down to zero, a balanced budget, and the Liberals would still be around $20 billion.

If they are still over there in that year, we will still be over here talking about another borrowing authority. However if we are over there and they are over here they will not have to worry about borrowing authority speeches after all. We will not need them.

What will the Liberal budget do for job creation? We already know that it is not too rosy in the public sector. There will be 45,000 less jobs. In the private sector there is more debt and less jobs. That is fairly simple. We know that already. Whereas in our budget we acknowledge there will be a negative impact on the public sector because we will have to do what those folks are doing because we will have to fix the problems you created.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I would ask the hon. member to direct his comments to the Chair. I feel left out again.

Mr. Williams: Mr. Speaker, I would not want you to be left out. I apologize. If the Liberal government remains over there it will have its work cut out. Jobs will be denied because of the fact that debt will still be mounting.

On it goes. We produced a 58–page document, almost as big as the one the Liberals produced with all the masses of the public service, statistics and budget analysis right across the country as they spent millions of dollars. What did it all matter? We now find out that the big consultation before the budget was at the Liberal caucus just before the budget was brought down. Perhaps that was the big consultation that influenced the Minister of Finance. All this consultation across the country was for show.

A borrowing authority as an annual event has to stop. That is what we are saying. We cannot afford any more. Therefore let us make a commitment or let us make a real resolution in the House that we may have this one and perhaps two more debates on borrowing authority and no more.

Mr. Andy Mitchell (Parry Sound—Muskoka, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate having the opportunity to talk about the budget. I would like to start by congratulating the Minister of Finance.

The Minister of Finance has put forward a responsible, well developed and, something members opposite have a hard time with, fair budget.

It is a fair budget, a responsible budget and a good budget because the government recognizes that it has a dual responsibility when dealing with Canadian affairs. It recognizes that it has a fiscal responsibility. That is why the budget is prudent. It recognizes that we operate in a businesslike way but recognizes that we are not a business. It recognizes that we need to get full value for each of the dollars we spend.

In addition, the government recognizes that it has a social responsibility and that certain things are done in government not just to earn a profit but because they are the right things to do. We do them because we recognize as a government that we have responsibilities and obligations to individual Canadians. We intend as a government to adhere both to our fiscal responsibility and to our social responsibility.

I do not think there is any question in terms of fiscal matters that our responsibility has been carried out and carried out well. For the first time in almost a generation a Minister of Finance established a deficit target last year. Not only did he hit that target. He did far better than what he said he would be able to do.

Second, the minister set a medium term objective of 3 per cent of GDP in the next two years. He set out a strategy that will see us do that. It is a clear and concise strategy. It is an achievable plan that will see our deficit reduced to 3 per cent of GDP.

Despite what members opposite might say, this is not a smoke and mirrors budget. These are real cuts. This is not what happened in the past where the talk of reduction was simply that we would spend a little less than the increase we had planned. These are real cuts in actual spending and they are being done with no personal income tax increases. They are real reductions, despite what the member opposite said.

In the first year we will cut expenditures by $3.9 billion. In the following year, 1996–97, it will be $5.9 billion. In the third year of the plan it will be $7.2 billion. That is a decline in a three–year period of almost 19 per cent. It is the largest decrease in government since we demobilized after the second world war.

The minister in establishing the budget did two very important and prudent things. First, his estimations in terms of growth and interest rates were very prudent. In terms of growth he projected a smaller amount than what the average private sector suggested. In terms of interest rates, both short and long term, he set his projections higher than what the private sector was suggesting. He built in a cushion to ensure that the budget is fiscally responsible.

Second, he set up contingencies in the next two years: a contingency of $2.5 billion in the first year and a contingency of $3 billion in the second year. He has made what I believe is an important commitment, that if he does not need the contingencies to achieve his deficit reduction targets the moneys will be used to further reduce the debt.

The minister has gone about setting a budget like we do when we set our household budgets or our small business budgets. He has taken what was in front of him, set out a reasonable plan over a reasonable period of time, built in contingencies and come up with a strong, workable plan.

In addition to the fiscal responsibility the minister has recognized the social responsibility. Although we are to cut some funding from social programs, it is important to remember than when the budget is fully implemented we will be spending as a government more than $50 billion on the social safety net of the country, more than $50 billion to protect the men, women and children of Canada. That is an important principle which the minister understands. It is an important Liberal principle and I am proud to sit with a government that recognizes it.

It is a budget that is fair and equitable because it asks all segments of Canadian society to participate in the exercise. It does not ask one part of Canadian society to carry an unfair burden. It is not suggesting that some segments should not have to participate at all. That is why the budget covers a wide range of areas.

Large corporations have been asked to participate by providing some increased revenue. They have been asked to participate by a decrease in subsidies going to businesses.

The federal government is putting its own house in order first. It is going to cut its expenditures by 19 per cent. That is the largest part of the cut.

Individuals have been asked to participate as well, as they should, not through increased income tax, not through taxing RRSPs, not through taxing dental and health benefits, but through a modest tax on gasoline.

He asked the provinces to participate as well. He asked them for a 4.4 per cent participation which is only half as much as what the federal government is doing itself. I think that is important. It is absolutely ludicrous when provincial premiers suggest that we as a government should totally exempt them from participating in the deficit reduction exercise.

Finally, as members of the finance committee which did a prebudget exercise unlike what the member opposite suggested, we adhered to the three principles that came out of the committee meetings. The first was that expenditures should be the largest portion of the action, not taxes. We did that with a 7:1 ratio. Second, we had to get our own house in order first. We did that with a $29 billion three–year cut in our own expenditures or a cut of 19 per cent. The third was that we would be fair and equitable. We did that by having all segments of Canadian society participate.

In conclusion, let me say unequivocally that I support the budget. I support the Minister of Finance. I support the government. We have achieved the dual objectives of fiscal responsibility and social responsibility. I am proud of what the minister has accomplished.

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I thank you for this opportunity to comment on the budget tabled by the Minister of Finance last Monday. Beyond the rhetoric and eloquent speeches, a cold hard look at this budget uncovers the extent and consequences of the federal system's inability to reform and to respond adequately to the aspirations of Quebecers and of Canadians.

Author Jean–François Lisée recently published two works whose titles are evocative of the con job the government has just pulled, the havoc it has wrought, and they are in the back of my mind as I analyse the unseen side of the finance minister's budget, the hidden aspects of its condescending rhetoric which does not tell us the truth about what is really at stake.

First of all, this budget misleads Canadians when it purports to be hard on everyone. This is not the case. It attacks the neediest members of our society, who will bear the brunt of the major cuts, and leaves undisturbed the large corporations and banks. Large corporations will still be able to escape the tax man, and banks will be taxed very minimally, compared to their astronomical profits.

Second, this budget misleads Quebec and the provinces, when it claims to be courageously attacking the federal deficit, when in fact it is offloading the greater part of that deficit onto the backs of the provinces. Seven billion dollars in expenses have been transferred in this manner, but no power went with it.

Third, this budget is destructive of social programs, and in particular health programs. The official speech conceals the truth of the matter, when it implies that the principles underlying the Canada Health Act are not affected and remain unchanged. Some treat when the federal government orders the meal for Quebec and the provinces and leaves them to pay the tab.

Fourth, and this is the most disturbing, this budget flies in the face of the government's claim to be embracing flexible federalism, the latest version of its favourite theme. There is no flexibility in this budget, other than that demonstrated by the Minister of Finance when he sidesteps his responsibilities and dumps them onto the provinces. Everything else remains unchanged. National standards, spending authority, overlapping of departments in areas of provincial jurisdiction.

With this new budget, the government is once again waging an all out war on the least fortunate members of society. For the second year in a row, the unemployed and the small wage earners are bearing the brunt of the cuts, while major corporations and banking institutions go nearly unscathed.

The finance minister announced new cuts to the unemployment insurance program, while he will only temporarily increase capital tax for major banks. He will beg banking institutions for a paltry $100 million, while, in 1995, the Royal Bank alone recorded profits of around $1.2 billion.

Moreover, this government refused to listen to all those, including the Bloc and the Conseil du patronat du Québec, who were asking for the elimination of all business subsidies. The finance minister chose instead to cut $300 million from social housing instead of using the $1.5 billion still earmarked for business subsidies.

Is this the federal approach?

Major corporations and banks can rest easy. The finance minister clearly indicated in his budget that, once again, the unemployed and the poor will be stuck with paying the bill for the inefficiencies of this unworkable federalism; at the same time, he maintains, until the end of the century, the privileges enjoyed only by the rich through family trusts.

The budget is very clear: within the next two years, the federal government will deprive the provinces of 7 billion dollars worth of transfer payments for health care, post–secondary education and the Canada Assistance Plan for which provinces will have to pay out of their own pocket. This is what we call offloading your deficit onto the provinces. Indeed, the federal government should put its financial house in order, but not at the provinces' expense.

Quebec is being loaded down with a big chunk of Canada's deficit, while, for its part, the federal government keeps interfering in Quebec's jurisdictions. Quebecers will keep on paying the cost of all the duplication inherent to the federal system. We will still have two health departments, two human resources development departments, and two environment departments, to name only a few.

This is the new Canada promised by this bad budget. This so–called decentralizing budget is, in fact, nothing but an empty shell, since the federal government will continue to intervene in areas of jurisdiction belonging to the provinces.

The irony in all this masquerade is that, while cutting by 27.1 per cent the transfers to Quebec, the federal government continues to impose to the provinces the same national standards, in particular those coming under the Canada Health Act.

In 1979, when that bill was proclaimed, the federal government was paying 45 per cent of health and post–secondary education costs. Since transfer payments where frozen in 1992, the federal share has been reduced to 29 per cent. With the new measures contained in this budget, the share of the federal government will be down to a new record low of 15 per cent.

How can the minister have the nerve to want to impose national standards when the federal share of health care has dropped 35 per cent since 1979, despite a substantial increase in health care costs, and will decrease again more than 55 per cent with this new budget?

It seems to me that the federal government will have no choice but to leave to the provinces complete management of the health care system.

I said earlier that this budget will mean the floundering of our social progams as we know them today. We all know that Quebec and the provinces are faced with very steep increases in the costs of health care. This is mainly due to the following factors: aging of our population, new and more expensive medical technologies and a substantial increase in the cost of drugs.

Just like previous budgets when the government froze all transfer payments, in this budget, the government announces massive cuts to transfers to Quebec and the other provinces of funds earmarked for health.

It does not matter if these transfers are combined with others to create one single envelope, the result will be the same: there will be less money for health care and the government will be jeopardizing the fundamental principles of our health care system.

The finance minister should have been honest and open with the Quebec and the Canadian people. He should tell them that these cuts to the provinces mean the end of our health care system as we know it now, because that is the real issue here.

Look, for example, at the recent statements made by the prime minister and the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, who contradicted the Minister of Finance who said, and I quote: "The conditions of the Canada Health Act will be maintained. For our government, those are fundamental."

How can the Minister of Finance still imagine and argue that Quebec and the other provinces will be able to continue to deliver the same quality of health care services to the people? How can Quebec and the other provinces implement the five principles of the Canada Health Act imposed by Ottawa when the Minister of Finance passes on to them billions of dollars of deficit by means of cuts to the social programs?

The Minister of Finance should have shown courage and tell upfront to his fellow Canadians: "Unfortunately, because of the errors we have made, mainly in the Chrétien and Lalonde budgets, we can no longer afford our health care system as we know it now".

Instead of assuming his responsibilities, the finance minister is trying to get out from under them. The government shuns its responsibilities when it passes its deficit on to Quebec and the other provinces. This government is misleading the Canadian people by not telling them that the health care program is doomed because of this budget.

Let me conclude by saying that this budget is misleading, since it does not mention the cuts that are still to come. It widens the gap between the rich and the poor in our society and puts an end to a good number of features of our social programs.

Canadians must know that. Quebecers in particular must be aware of it before they make a final judgment on the federal regime, which obviously fails to solve its own problems and, even more, to renew itself according to the expectations of Quebecers.

[English]

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture and Agri-food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is certainly a pleasure to comment for a few minutes this afternoon on the budget that was presented this week.

I want to start by passing on the comments that I made to members of the press in my riding when I spoke to them on budget night. When asked what my reaction was I said it was one of excitement because this is not the first budget that I have seen. I certainly have not been present for the considerable number that some members in the House have, but this is the seventh one.

This budget fulfils the expectations and hopes for the majority of Canadians. I have been telling my constituents for the last number of weeks and months as they offered suggestions to the government that our challenge was to meet the requirements out there with fair and equal treatment for everyone along with being effective. We met those criteria.

We know that two situations in Canada today are clouding the issue. One is the uncertainty of the future of the province of Quebec. I am pleased to say that the majority of the people in Prince Edward—Hastings say: "My Canada includes Quebec".

Fortunately for all of us, more and more Quebecers are realizing that every day and they have every reason to. More and more Quebecers are realizing that a strong central government is what is good for this country and what is good for everybody. All of us will be better off as Canadians and as human beings if we are part of the family we call Canada.

The finance minister pointed to the second cloud which is the debt and the deficit. I do not have to remind anyone of the size of that: over $500 billion in debt, a $42 billion deficit a year ago, some $80,000 a minute to cover the interest on it, and I could go on.

I need to say no more in emphasizing the fact that the government has a tremendous challenge. Our country has a tremendous challenge. This challenge can only be successfully met with competence, compassion, reform and hope. We made a great step toward that on Monday night with the budget.

We have been honest with Canadians by saying that we too know there is a lot more yet to do. What we did on Monday night was done by pushing the needed measures as close to the edge as possible and doing it without playing havoc with the economy which is growing at a faster rate than just about any other country in the world. Certainly it is the fastest of any of the G-7 countries. Things are on the move. Perhaps they are not moving as fast as we would like but they are certainly on the move and they are going in the right direction.

We knew we were being watched. We were being watched by the international community, by the money markets, the domestic financial institutions, the domestic money markets, the business community. We were being watched by everyone, including all Canadians.

We did what was needed but we did not enjoy it. I can say we did not want to do it because it is not nice to say that we are going to reduce employment, that we are going to have to make some changes. When I say we did not want to do it, it was not because it did not need to be done. It did need to be done. As the Prime Minister has said so clearly and so often, we did it because it was necessary.

It reminds me of some advice I gave to the finance minister leading up to the budget and the slogan used by the prominent company, Nike: Just do it. And we did it. We did it by making $7 worth of cuts for every $1 increase in revenue. We did it after having listened to Canadians in the greatest consultation process that has ever taken place leading up to a budget.

We did it without increasing income tax. We did it without taxing dental and employer provided medical plans. We did it without making many changes that would affect to any great extent registered retirement savings plan contributions.

We did it without taxing lotteries. Many people thought we would. A number of people said not to tax lottery winnings. I told them that if they were to win a million dollars and had to pay tax on it but did not want to, I knew some people who would take their ticket for them.

We did it without changing the capital gains tax for small business and farmers. In so doing we again recognized the importance of small business and farmers in the Canadian economy.

Yes, we did it on the revenue side by increasing the tax on gasoline 1.5 cents a litre. I think that is fair and equitable from coast to coast. We also did it by cutting the size of government. Yes, I recognize that people in Prince Edward—Hastings riding in the civil service will have to contribute and will be contributing.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order. It being 1.43 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 73, it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and to put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the bill now before the House.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Some hon. members: On division.

(Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to a committee.)

• (1345)

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, because of the ministerial statement we should be starting private members' hour in 15 minutes. However, if members are agreeable and with unanimous consent perhaps we could start private members' hour immediately.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The Chair might be of some help if the chief government whip would approach the Chair for a moment.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Pursuant to what we discussed briefly earlier, if you were now to seek unanimous consent you would find that instead of suspending the House for 15 minutes, which is what we would normally do at this time, we could perhaps start immediately with private members' hour, as no other bill is before the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The House has heard the suggestion of the chief government whip. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): It being 1.50 p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

INCOME TAX ACT

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.) moved that Bill C–247, an act to amend the Income Tax Act (child care expenses), be read the second time and referred to a committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I rise today to present my private member's bill C–247, an act to amend the Income Tax Act on child care Expenses.

This bill would give all parents a tax deduction of $5,000 or $3,000 per child to assist them with the increasing costs of raising their children while at the same time eliminate the current tax discrimination against stay at home parents and those who do not use day care. All parents would have the same deduction available to them regardless of their incomes, status, marital status, labour force, or chosen method of child care.

I would like to read an excerpt from a discussion paper that was sent to me, not by a special interest group but by Cheryl Stewart and Sandra Evans of Ontario. It reads:

> We are Canadian mothers who work at home full time nurturing our children.
> We both had successful careers in the paid workforce prior to choosing to stay home and raise our children.
> We are concerned about the direction that this process is taking toward institutionalized child care and how it is virtually ignoring other forms of care—particularly those who choose to care for their own children.

According to Statistics Canada, 68.5 per cent of women in two–parent families with children under three, and 62 per cent with children between the ages of three and five, remain at home on a full time basis or work part time. When all women in two–parent families with children under 16 years of age are taken into consideration, 57.6 per cent have decided to either remain at home full time or work part time.

These figures show us there is a large percentage of women who have made their choice to stay at home with their children. Despite this fact, they are not entitled to the same tax treatment as those who use day care.

As a direct result, our courts are filled with cases of individuals and families alike who feel that the Canadian income tax system discriminates against them. Calgarians, Jim and Laurie Boland, for example, were told in Federal Court that a parent that chooses to be at home with a child is not entitled to the same privileges as those who pay for child care.

The judge ruled that the Income Tax Act admittedly denies the Bolands equal benefit under the law but because stay at home parents are not "a discrete and insular minority" they are not protected by the charter of rights and freedoms.

This is just one example of people fighting a system that does not reflect the realities of society. Currently provisions in the Income Tax Act make the child care expense deduction only to families who pay institutions to look after their children. The deduction can only be claimed by the lower income spouse of a married couple, which makes it useless when one parent stays home to raise the children.

In other words, if you put your child in receipted day care, the government will reward you, but if you opt for a different arrangement like most Canadians do, you are on your own. It is just a matter of time before the courts overrule this decision. Maybe it is time for the legislatures in Canada to set the agenda as opposed to responding to court decisions.

You only have to look at how the Thibaudeau decision on child support payments sent the Minister of Justice scrambling. The fact is that this legal discrimination must and should stop. As the dynamics of the family continue to change, parents should be free to choose the method of child care that best suits their situation, as opposed to having government reward one choice over another. It is the choice that I am trying to emphasize today. Flexibility and freedom of choice should be the key elements of our approach to child care.

It is obvious that people cannot afford non–subsidized day care and have limited choices other than to stand in line and wait for a spot in a subsidized program. Why not give them the financial means and the options to choose other forms of child care? Provide all families with the $5,000 tax deduction, leave the money in their hands and let them choose whether to stay at home; unregulated day care, nannies, relatives or friends are the best options for them.

Interest groups all talk about the need for more flexible child care. Here we have true flexibility. Leave more money at the source and stop financially encouraging families to choose outside receipted child care.

Let us look at this from a different perspective, a different angle. Currently there are 360,000 child care spaces in Canada, 150,000 of which are subsidized for low income families. Is the answer more spaces as the Liberal government thinks, or is it more choices as I think?

The purpose of my bill is to amend the Income Tax Act to allow the deduction of a fixed amount of $5,000 or $3,000 as child care expenses, depending on the age of the child, regardless of the income of the parent and the amount of child care expenses actually incurred. Quite simply, the bill provides for a straightforward income tax deduction per child, up to age 14, to any taxpaying parent regardless of the method of child care chosen.

Therefore, Bill C–247 is based on three fundamental principles: funding the family, not the institution; giving freedom of choice to parents for their preferred method of child care; addressing the shortcomings of our current system and the subsequent increases in the financial burden on Canadian families.

The fact is that Canadian families have been taxed to the hilt. With Bill C–247 parents would be free to choose how to best spend their money. If they choose to send the kids to day care, so be it. If they choose to have one parent stay at home to raise the children, let us give them the freedom to make that decision. My main concern is to treat everyone equally. Leave money in the hands of the people who earn it and need it, and let them make their own choices on how to run their lives.

The vast majority of federal funding for children's programs in Canada is provided in the following ways. There are actually six different mechanisms by which people get assistance.

The child tax benefit went into effect in January 1993, replacing the former family allowance program as well as the refundable and non–refundable child tax credit. This program delivered benefits of $5.2 billion between July 1993 and June 1994.

The Canada assistance plan, which comes under the human resources department, shares in the cost with the provinces and territories of providing social assistance and welfare services. This program delivered benefits totalling $2.8 billion in the year 1993–94.

The third mechanism is the child care expense deduction. It is a tax measure intended to assist parents with the cost of receipted child care. This program cost Revenue Canada just over $330 million in fiscal 1993–94.

The fourth mechanism is the equivalent to married tax credit, which is a non–refundable tax credit available to single parents to help ease the burden of raising children alone. Only one child can be claimed. This program cost the federal government just over $565 million in fiscal 1993–94.

The fifth mechanism is the goods and services tax credit of $213 million per year.

In addition, the Liberal government in the red book promised to spend an additional $1.4 billion with the provinces to create 150,000 regulated, non–parental child care spaces over the next three years. This is apparently on hold with the latest budget. Hopefully that will be confirmed later on today.

Currently in Ontario there are about 7,000 vacant child care spaces in non–subsidized day care, while 25,000 people are on waiting lists for subsidized day care. If we put stay at home parents or any families that do not use outside receipted day care on the same financial footing as those who do, then some of those child care spaces would be freed up as parents choose different options and the list of 25,000 would shrink.

The government could then take part of the revenue that it was going to spend on more spaces and target it specifically at the poor families in the form of subsidies and benefits. That would be a true social program for the truly needy, a welfare assistance program that helps people who are in need, if it is a demonstrable need.

We are considering spending billions of dollars to apply a national program and national standards to families that are different in composition, situation, work and educational schedules, income, age, cultural and linguistic profiles, urban and rural settings, and the list goes on. The only common denominator I can see is that these people all have children.

Does it not therefore make sense to give families the economic tools to make their own decisions depending on their own specific needs? Let us consolidate the list of programs which I outlined and adopt Bill C–247 for all wage earners and introduce a social welfare package that, I submit, would be of significantly less cost.

If one totals the programs I have mentioned, it is over $8 billion. We can certainly have a two–level plan and make the cost for the social and welfare programs a lot less.

Using Revenue Canada statistics, using the government's main statistics bank, for taxes filed in 1993 it is estimated that Bill C–247 would cost the federal government $3.6 billion in tax revenue losses. One can call them tax expenditures.

The government may come up with another set of figures that says $6 billion but maybe the cost is $4 billion or $5 billion. What is a billion these days? People seem to throw it around like it does not matter.

The question that begs to be asked, however, is where that money comes from. Where does the money come from for this new program that everybody gets a deduction? The answer, 92 per cent of my bill is related to families with incomes above $30,000.

Simply put, one needs income to claim a tax deduction. Last year the $5.2 billion child tax benefit which was designed to help lower income families paid out $2.1 billion to families with incomes in excess of $30,000.

If members narrow the targeting of the child tax benefit to those making $30,000 and under, that would free up $2.1 billion to pay for Bill C–247. Do not forget I said there is a two–tier system, over $30,000 and under $30,000. We have just freed up $2.1 billion to help cover the costs of Bill C–247.

Where does the additional $1.5 billion come from? If I stick to my $3.6 billion in costs, which I could round up to $4 billion if the government would like me to, a portion can come from the $1.4 billion. We have found $2.1 billion now. A portion can come from the $1.4 billion that will be spent on subsidized day care, the future spending they will not have to spend. Leave the current day care facilities in place and reduce that list of 25,000 people who are waiting. They can go to the ones that are empty in the private day care centres or they might choose other forms of day care.

Eliminate the need for the equivalent to married tax credit, the $565 million, because quite simply with Bill C–247 single parents would be left with more of their own money and be able to claim more than one child as is currently the case.

They would not need this assistance because as the recipients of child care payments, they would have the offsetting deduction to eliminate the tax payment. There is another $560 million.

The final costs would be made up through the elimination of handling charges on the money that is redistributed by Ottawa through tax credits. The beauty of a deduction is that the money stays at the source, leaving more disposable income for people, lower processing fees for Ottawa and greater netbacks for everybody.

I believe that the power of the lobby for day care is overly evident in governmental policy to date. In his social reforms discussion paper, the Minister of Human Resources Development addressed day care spaces and flexible work arrangements for parents but said nothing about current taxation inequities, charter challenges or, more specifically, stay at home parenting.

One of the biggest single problems that this government has is that it always fails to identify the right problem, just like the deficit and the debt. It wants to lower the deficit. However that is just a contributing factor to the debt. It should be attacking the debt and how to solve that problem.

Such a move would have been too racy, the Minister of Human Resources Development said on a Calgary talk show, to consider a proposal of deductions for children. I fail to see what is so racy about a tax break for people who work just as hard in the home, but it is obvious that someone with a different view has the minister's attention.

The red book deals once again with the day care spaces but not with other significant issues affecting families in the 1990s. For example, it specifically addressed a child care system that enables parents to participate fully in the economic life of the country. That is on page 35, for members opposite.

In other words, do not stay at home, work. What about people who choose to directly participate in the lives of their child? Is this not valuable? When the Tories were in power they proposed Bill C–144 which basically stated that parents of children six and under would be able to double the child care expense deduction of $2,000 in 1988.

For the benefit of larger families the plan would have removed the $8,000 family limit for child care expenditures.

Parents staying at home to care for their children or those without receipts for child care expenses would have been able to claim an additional $100 tax credit per child in 1988 and $200 in years after that; not significant amounts, but recognition of the problem was a step in the right direction.

Bill C–144 was hammered by the lobby groups for subsidizing for profit care and spending money on tax breaks as opposed to subsidized spaces. It died on the Order Paper, on October 1, 1988.

Day care advocates continue to claim that true equality for women cannot be achieved until a universal day care system is in place. I argue that a balance must be struck to encourage a system that enables parents to participate fully in the economic life of the country and/or if they so choose to participate fully in the raising of their children.

The key word and the key problem this bill is attempting to resolve is choice, eliminating the discrimination. The current legislative agenda does not recognize that people want the freedom and resources to choose what is best for their children. They are tired of governments and government bureaucracy trying to influence their actions through old–fashioned social engineering.

I recognize that child care comes under provincial jurisdiction. This is the federal contribution to that system. In conjunction with provinces they could discuss the various ways and means of developing the social safety net to target those who are truly in need.

Bill C–247 is of national interest as it addresses the highly contentious issues of national child care, funding for child care spaces, the discriminatory aspects of the Income Tax Act for individuals using non–receipted child care, the stay at parent. It encourages the focusing of social spending to the truly needy and provides families that are not in need of social programs with tax incentives to spend their money the way they see fit.

The time has come to bring tax laws up to speed with the modern era. We must modify present tax laws, not only to bring about greater fairness but to reflect the changes that have occurred in our society.

The Bolands from Calgary challenged the discriminatory nature of the Income Tax Act. The Schachtschneiders challenged the discriminatory nature of the Income Tax Act in its apparent favourable treatment of common law couples as opposed to married couples. Ms. Thibaudeau challenged the discriminatory nature of the Income Tax Act in its treatment of child care payment recipients.

Unless we act now the only way these issues will be truly addressed in the House is if the Supreme Court or the federal courts render a decision that contradicts or negates existing legislation. We have an opportunity as legislators to initiate discussion and action on this issue which, after all, is how things are supposed to work.

The Income Tax Act is by no means perfect. Bill C–247 would go a long way in addressing the reasons for the charter challenges. Contributions to the work force should once and for all be on the same level as contributions in the home. I recommend that we stop playing one off the other and start giving stay at home parents financial, political and social respect. They deserve the opportunity to work not only in the home but in the workplace as well. They deserve the opportunity to live the lifestyle they choose to live on their own without having to consider tax implications and the costs, the netbacks or the net benefits they are receiving.

As I mentioned, the five or six existing programs are just like the Income Tax Act. They make up part of the Income Tax Act, with 2,137 pages of convoluted, mixed up mishmash that is difficult to understand. If we took those six programs, combined and consolidated them to make two, one for over $30,000 and one for under $30,000, this government and parliamentarians would be proud to present a system of child care better than what we currently have.

Mr. David Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Calgary Centre for the opportunity to present the views of the government on this issue. I appreciate the time being set aside during private members' hour to give him, his colleagues and other interested people the perspectives that I, as parliamentary secretary, can bring to bear on this issue.

Members will recall that the Reform Party's alternative budget presented last week called for massive spending reductions, including $15 billion on social programs.

It is surprising, therefore, that Bill C–247, tabled by the Reform Party member for Calgary Centre, proposes action that would increase federal and provincial tax revenue costs by a whopping $6.5 billion annually. That is right, an extra $6.5 billion a year at a time when all Canadian governments are striving to reduce both their deficits, and Canadians' tax bills. Maybe the The Taxpayers' Budget should have been entitled Out of The Taxpayers' Pockets.

Bill C–247 is also surprising given that Reform's budget says that government must "build on the Canadian tradition of self–reliance—and make assistance available only to those who are genuinely incapable of providing for themselves". However, Bill C–247 does not limit assistance to those who need it. Rather, it would allow fixed child care expense deductions of $5,000 or $3,000 for all, regardless of the income of the parents or the amount of child care expenses, if any, actually incurred.

In effect, Bill C–247 would actually create a new child tax benefit. And sadly, because it would depend on a taxpayer's marginal tax rate, the benefits would actually be greater for those in high income brackets than for those in lower brackets.

Unlike the measures proposed in Bill C–247, the current child tax benefit targets substantial assistance to low and middle income families with children.

Delivered monthly and tax free, it provides a basic annual credit of $1,020 per child, plus $75 for the third and each additional child.

That assistance is reduced by 5 per cent—2.5 per cent for one–child families—of family net income over $25,921. Also included is a work income supplement of up to $500 per family with net family income under $25,921. This helps to meet the extra costs associated with participating in the work force.

A supplement is provided for parents who choose to remain in the home to raise their pre–school–aged children. This year, the supplement is $213 for each child 6 years old or younger. Assistance for families is also provided through the child care expense deduction.

It recognizes for tax purposes the child care expenses that taxpayers must incur in order to earn income, to attend a recognized educational institution full time or to take a vocational training course.

The deduction acknowledges that these taxpayers have less of a capacity to pay taxes than other taxpayers with an identical income, but who do not have child care expenses. As a result, up to a limit, income used to pay for child care expenses is not taxable.

The deduction is applied to earned income in order to ensure that tax assistance is provided for child care expenses incurred to earn that income.

This reflects the general view that parents not employed outside the home are expected, and indeed have a responsibility, to look after their children.

Bill C–247 would completely change the nature of the current deduction. It would also be prohibitively expensive at a time of fiscal consolidation. As such, we can neither afford, nor should we even entertain, the amendments proposed by the member for Calgary Centre. I therefore urge this House to deny passage of this bill.

Mr. Osvaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak to Bill C–247, an Act to amend the Income Tax Act (child care expenses) tabled on May 6, 1994 by the member for Calgary Centre.

The purpose of this bill is to amend the Income Tax Act to allow the deduction of a fixed amount of $5,000 or $3,000 as child care expenses, regardless of the income of the parents and of the amount of child care expenses actually incurred.

The existing statute does not apply to stay at home parents. Only those families whose children attend profit making establishments are allowed the child care expenses deduction.

The bill means that parents can decide how they want their children cared for and deduct a fixed amount of $5,000 for children seven and under and $3,000 for those aged eight to fourteen, regardless of their income and the actual expenses incurred.

Upon initial examination, this bill seems to make sense. However, I would like to have more detailed information on what it will cost, given that the deductions now allowed represent the major part of day care costs for the government. I would also like to know how many families and children would benefit from this bill. The government must manage its resources wisely. Given their scarcity, I would think that priority must be given to women who work.

That being said, statistics show that in 1961, in 65 per cent of families with a child under the age of six, one parent stayed at home. In 1991, this sort of family structure represented only 12 per cent of families. Nowadays, over 70 per cent of pre–school age children attend day care regularly while their parents work.

Child poverty is increasing dramatically. The government's cuts in social programs have further worsened the situation.

In addition, the cost of raising children at home is rising. Who would dare to say that those parents who stay at home are not working? And yet, the monetary value of this work is not recognized.

In this sense, the bill provides a modest financial benefit for families in which one parent stays at home to care for the children. We know that there are very often no more vacancies in day care centres.

The present income tax regime is unfair to single income families. The child care expenses deduction applies only to two–income families, whatever the total. Families may claim a maximum of $5,000 per child, for children less than seven years old, and a $3,000 deduction for children 7 to 14 years old. No deduction is allowed for one–income families because the legislation assumes they have no child care expenses to pay. These are the families who need financial support, particularly single parent families which, in most cases, are mother and children units. Children in those families are the first ones to be struck by poverty.

In our modern world, we can see that, for a great many families, it is vital for the mother to work outside the home. This participation in the workforce is sometimes threatened by the lack of child care services.

Under certain circumstances, women are forced to stay home and that can cause serious problems. These women suffer from isolation and lack of social recognition. Therefore, the government should take the necessary steps to ensure their social and economic equality. Years spent at home caring for children result in a considerable loss of income and great difficulties when reintegrating the labour force.

According to what I have just heard the hon. member for Calgary Centre say, it seems the Reform members support this bill for very old–fashioned reasons. Even though I tend to agree with this bill, I cannot share the philosophy and the line of thought of the hon. member sponsoring it. His objective seems to be to promote a more traditional and conservative view of the family. He would like to see women stay home in greater numbers. I think this would be a move backwards that would profit neither the women themselves, nor society which would no longer benefit from their valuable contribution in important areas.

On the other hand, we must examine this bill in the current context of the government social policy which is very regressive. There is a blatant lack of an overall and fair child care program. And if we consider that a great number of women choose to stay at home to raise their children, the bill proposed by the hon. member for Calgary Centre makes sense, of course, if that is the free choice of these women. Then, the government must respect this choice, recognize the economic value of the work of these women at home and give them this modest financial benefit.

This bill is far from being the ideal solution, but it gives the opportunity to revive the debate on child care.

Our society wants children, but parents who have them and raise them are penalized.

I support this bill only inasmuch as the mother or the couple choose that kind of child care of their own free will. If they do so, they should not be unduly put at a disadvantage by the federal tax system.

Surveys show that the general public supports some kind of government financial assistance to families where one parent stays home to take care of children.

The government and our society should find a comprehensive solution to that problem. I certainly hope the Minister of Human Resources Development will examine this whole issue of assistance to families and particularly children, because it is urgent. The federal government should work hand in hand with the provinces to provide more child care services.

I should add that comparative studies in the United States, Canada, and Europe suggest that it is inadequate and unfair to hand out money to families to pay for child care instead of using tax dollars to fund a child care system, which is probably the way of the future.

In conclusion, I would like to say that, eventually, we should also examine the issue of assistance to families who take care of the elderly, the chronically ill, or the handicapped.

[English]

Ms. Margaret Bridgman (Surrey North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have been asked by my colleague from Port Moody—Coquitlam to present some aspects of our position in the debate on Bill C–247, an act to amend the Income Tax Act relating to child care expenses.

As stated earlier, the purpose of the bill is to amend the Income Tax Act to allow for the deduction of a fixed amount of $5,000 or $3,000 according to the age of the child, regardless of the income of the parents and the amount of child care expenses actually incurred.

The bill allows the deductions to be claimed by one parent, either parent where the child is living with both parents or each parent when the parents are living apart and the child spends some time with both parents. In the case when parents are living apart, the deduction would be split between the two parents according to the amount of time each parent spends with the child. The real purpose of the bill is to allow parents the freedom to choose the method of child care for their children.

Today's economic realities mean that the role of government has to be entirely rethought. Thirty years of more and more government social spending has only produced less and less security for Canadians. We in the House must face the challenge of turning our welfare state into a secure society which requires a new philosophy of social security.

In discussing the issue of child support payments, it is best to lay out some principles and then determine if the bill adheres to the principles. There are five principles that we should be following in the debate.

The first one would be the self–reliance of Canadians and to recognize the family as the primary caregiver.

The second one would be to empower families, community and charitable organizations to play an increasing role.

The third one would be to focus social spending on the need.

The fourth principle would be to entrust resources and responsibilities to the level of delivery where it is most effective or decentralized.

The fifth would be to reduce spending and limit government spending.

• (1430)

On the first principle we must realize the increasing importance of families and their role in the nurturing of children and the viability of the economy.

Reformers support policies that allow families to be recognized as serving a unique and important role and to be given a choice in the method of child care their children receive.

There is a clear and fundamental philosophical difference between the Liberals and the Reformers on the whole child care and day care debate. Liberals believe in a state run day care and promised $120 million for day care in their red book, which incidentally was not met in the recent budget. This promise was essentially fuelled by special interest forces and would result in increased cost to all taxpayers. It is also an anti–family choice.

Reformers oppose a state run day care. We believe that day care is most efficiently run by the private sector and that government subsidization of day care, the nanny state, is not financially sustainable. In these views we are supported by a majority of Canadians who according to a recent Maclean's poll prefer to raise their children in the home. They also believe that parents must have the right of choice.

The second principle to follow is that a dollar left in the hands of a family is more effective, more efficient and more desired than in government programs. The present child care expense allowance is intrusive. It interferes with parental decision making by discriminating against those with families where one parent stays at home to raise children. The bill would empower families with a real choice.

The third principle is focusing on social spending on need. It may appear that the bill does not focus on need since the bill provides a deduction regardless of the income of the parents. It should be noted that the bill is intended to work within a flat tax system.

The fourth principle is to entrust resources and responsibilities to the level of delivery where they are most efficient and most effective. Under this principle it would be prudent to eliminate the child tax credit and replace it with a tax deduction.

Why should more money be sent to Ottawa, churned through the government bureaucracy and then funnelled back to Canadians? This results in less money being available to those who are really in need.

Under a tax reduction the parents would determine the best use for the money. They could apply it to their own needs. It would make them choose responsibly and they would see the direct result of the money.

The fifth principle the bill addresses is the reduction of government spending because the cost of a tax reduction would be offset by the elimination of the tax credit. The bill would allow parents to stay at home resulting in greater employment opportunities. There would be no need for a national day care program. Savings would also result because funding would be directly to individuals and families and not to institutions and professionals.

In conclusion, the bill recognizes that families are the best hope for a bright future and that healthy families, not dysfunctional types, are a source of strength for future generations.

The bill moves away from the folly of state run day care programs generated by special interest groups that favour government intervention and social engineering. We must rethink our responsibilities and our priorities.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The member for Calgary Centre had given an indication that he wanted a few minutes under right of reply.

The House must understand that no other member can speak after the member closes under right of reply. I hope he can do this in the matter of two to three minutes.

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, there are two comments I would like to make, just to wrap up. When we heard from the Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance, basically he said that the program would cost an extra $6.5 billion.

I want it entered into the record that what he is not doing and has failed to recognize in my comments is that this bill would consolidate the current existing programs which add up to slightly over $8 billion and offset the cost of this program. Even if we use $6 billion as the cost, what he has failed to do in his budgetary planning is to recognize that those people who make $30,000 or more get $2.1 billion of the child credit out of that $5.2 billion. We must subtract that from the $6.5 billion.

With the lack of need to spend the $1.4 billion on future day care facilities, given that the present ones would be sufficient to handle the demand for the waiting list of 25,000 people, those would be additional funds that would be available. Although the Liberals now are not going to spend that money, which they promised they would in the red book. It looks like another broken promise from their election trail.

In summary, it is an important mathematical dollar item to consider. We have to consider whether the current system with six different ways of providing child care assistance in this country is sufficient. Is it meeting the needs of the people? My presentation today has shown sufficient cause for the need to address this. It is not sufficient.

There are some solutions. I have offered some. It may not be the total answer, but it offers a solution through consolidation and giving people the choice, helping to put the money in the families' hands and letting them decide how to spend that money. After all, they earned it in the first place. They should know better how to spend it, not the state and not funding institutions.

This government should consider a method of child care support and child care payments in its social engineering and its social package that would truly leave more money available for people. Let them have the choice. Also, reduce the overall cost. Despite what the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance said, if we consolidated this plan it would save this country $1 billion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): There being no further members rising for debate, and the motion not being designated as a votable item, the time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Paper.

Mr. Silye: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. For those members present in the House, I would like to seek unanimous consent. I know this bill is non–votable and was deemed as such by the subcommittee. However, after due consideration by all members in this House, would the members give unanimous consent to make C–247 votable?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Silye: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would like to move that the bill be not now read a second time, but because of discriminatory challenges to the Income Tax Act and Parliament's commitment to end child poverty by the year 2000, that the subject matter of the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Human Resources Development and that accordingly the bill be withdrawn.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Accordingly the order is dropped from the Order Paper. It being 2.40 p.m. the House stands adjourned until Monday, March 13, 1995 at 11 a.m., pursuant to Standing Orders 28 and 24.

DIVORCE ACT

The House resumed from Friday, November 25, consideration of the motion that Bill C–232, an act to amend the Divorce Act (granting of access to, or custody of, a child to a grandparent), be read the second time and referred to a committee.

The Deputy Speaker: When the matter was previously before the House, the hon. member for Elk Island had the floor. He has seven minutes left in his intervention.

Mr. Ken Epp (Elk Island, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to continue my speech. It is the first time that I have had 108 days to contemplate the next sentence in the middle of a speech. I shall carry on. I am not going to waste my time.

We are dealing with a very important matter. It is very important to recognize we are dealing with the lives of real people. Quite often in this place we can sink into a way of thinking and we forget the people behind the rules and laws we are passing.

It is the same when we deal with a budget. The budget affects real people. This is another bill that does the same. It is a bill that deeply affects the lives of people, grandparents in particular but also grandchildren. It also affects the parents.

When I was contemplating what to say next, I decided I would try to put a human face on my remarks. I want to share the importance of the legislation before us concerning the rights of grandparents to have input into the lives of their children's children. Nothing is more precious than this.

I would like to share correspondence I received on this subject. I received a very moving letter after I had participated in the debate last November 25. This letter came from people in Ontario who told a story of how they have been separated from their grandchildren. They simply asked for a measure that will safeguard the vital connection and relationship between grandchildren and grandparents.

We live in a age in which many people are disconnected. Many young people, many children have had their roots ripped away from them for one reason or another. The connection to grandparents is a very important connective root for these people.

This lady said: "For us it is over three years since we have heard from our only grandchildren". I read this letter several days after receiving it. Just as many MPs do, I work on correspondence in the evening and I answered this letter quite late at night. This is what I said: "I am sitting here at 10.25 p.m. miles away from my wife and son in Alberta, my daughter, son–in–law and only grandson in Saskatchewan and half way around the world from another son and daughter–in–law in Rwanda. When I read your letter I detected the pain you must feel. I cannot imagine the hurt you feel when you cannot talk to, cannot touch, cannot hug and spoil your own grandchildren. My family is so precious to me and I am sure that you feel the same about yours". I really felt the pain that evening because the story so touched my heart.

When we contemplate legislation that will grant grandparents reasonable and fair access to their grandchildren, there can be no reasonable doubt in the minds of parents or of the courts, if they are involved, that there is anything detrimental to the children, but only favourable to the children, we then proceed to provide this.

Many people across the country are watching this on television right now. Certainly here in the House we have observers that have been touched by this issue. It is incumbent on us as legislators to do all we can.

I received another letter from this lady after Christmas. She said: "Nothing new has happened regarding news from or about our grandchildren. It was our fourth Christmas of not hearing, despite our sending cards and letters, even by registered mail. We feel so helpless in all this". This is the crux of the matter. There is a helplessness and nowhere to turn for assistance.

We are not asking for anything in this legislation that will be a great hardship on anyone. We are asking for legislation that will grant a point of connection between children and grandparents.

I cannot help but relate this to my own situation. I really cannot tell members how much I really love my little grandson. I might as well tell the whole world that he will soon be having a little brother or sister. It is such a tremendously touching experience for us. We are so privileged to have a wonderful, loving relationship between our children, our son–in–law and our grandchild.

I cannot, for the life of me, see why anyone would put a barrier between children and their grandparents. Therefore we are not dealing here with people who have a normal relationship. That is true for probably 95 per cent of people whose relationships are not torn. As in almost all legislation, we are trying to introduce measures that will accommodate those people where a relationship is broken and there has to be some kind of intervention.

We are asking all members of the House to support the bill. In this way people who cannot reach out and touch and hug their grandchildren will be given at least occasionally the privilege of doing so. We are asking that those parents who would stand between their children and the grandparents to carefully think about what they are doing when they introduce these barriers.

Barring a response from parents we need legislation that would require them to give to some disinterested party, like a court if necessary, their reasons. If there is a valid reason for maintaining the barrier I am sure that the courts would understand. If there is not a valid reason then we believe it is in the best interests of children and grandparents to be able to see each other, to talk to each other, to send and receive letters, to send and receive phone calls in order for them to be able to communicate and to build on their relationship.

In conclusion, we have so many young people in our society who are anchorless. They have had so many disruptions in their lives. Nothing is more solid than a familial relationship between children and parents, between children and grandparents that will give them, on an ongoing basis, a sense of security and belonging.

I urge all members to support the bill. Let us do what is right for the children of our country.

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, 1994 was declared the International Year of the Family. The theme as defined by the United Nations is Family, Resources and Responsibilities in a Changing World.

In making this proclamation, the United Nations outlined some basic principles. The first of these principles is that the family is the basic unit of society and therefore deserves special attention.

The widest possible protection and assistance should be given to families so that they can assume their responsibilities in the community. Another principle is that families take different forms and serve different functions from one country to another and within each country.

This is very important. Changing social and economic conditions are bringing to the fore new issues affecting families, particularly children. One of the realities that cannot be ignored is that many marriages in Canada now end in divorce. A related fact is that many children are directly affected by these divorces although it is difficult to determine the exact number because there is no official information about out of court custody decisions. We know, for example, that in 1990 approximately 34,000 children were involved in divorce cases in which the courts made custody decisions.

From a social policy perspective, this means that Canada's laws, policies and programs should take into account the many diverse needs of families today. More specifically, our laws restricting divorce should reflect our society's changing needs and continue to ensure that the best interests of the children are met. That is why I am pleased to be given the opportunity to comment on Bill C–232 which proposes amending the Divorce Act to promote grandparent access.

I want to start off by saying very clearly that I believe the relationship between grandparent and grandchild is something very special, especially after the parents divorce. Grandparents can be an important resource to children. They can offer care and support and buffer children from the many changes and stresses associated with family breakdown. I therefore agree wholeheartedly with the basic principle that a child's continued contact with grandparents, indeed with all members of the child's extended family, is something that very often is in the best interests of the child.

I emphasize that the best interests of the child test is a standard that has come to be accepted both in Canada and internationally as the appropriate standard to apply with respect to matters relating to children. It means that laws directly affecting children should focus on the needs and best interests of the child rather than on the rights of adults.

In applying this standard it is important to acknowledge the writings of sociologists and psychiatrists on the subject of the effect of divorce on children. Researchers generally agree that the breakdown of the parents' marriage brings about a major crisis in the lives of most children and adolescents. It is an acutely stressful event for a child. Equally important is the fact that researchers also highlight the detrimental effects on children of ongoing conflict and litigation.

There is widespread agreement that the most tragic and clinically vulnerable children are those who become the object of continued acrimonious custody or access battles. It is not difficult to imagine how upsetting such a court battle would be to a child with the stress, uncertainty and loyalty conflicts that would accompany the litigation and with the child right in the centre. I bring this up because Bill C–232 seeks amendments to the Divorce Act which effectively would provide grandparents with independent standing to apply to the court for access to, or custody of their grandchildren at the same time the grandchildren's parents are getting a divorce.

This bill proposes that grandparents be allowed to make a custody and/or access application under the Divorce Act without being required to obtain leave of the court. Currently under the Divorce Act third parties, including grandparents, must have leave of the court to make an application for custody of or access to any or all children of the marriage. The requirement that grandparents obtain leave of the court to make application ensures that only where the truly serious disputes exist will recourse be made to the courts. In other words, it discourages the use of litigation.

I am concerned that despite its good intentions this bill, which would allow grandparents to make a custody or access application under the Divorce Act as a right, could have the effect of encouraging grandparents to formally apply for court imposed access orders. I realize this is not its primary goal; rather it is an attempt to formally recognize a grandparent's legal right to access. It may however have the unintentional effect of increasing custody and access disputes and promoting litigation. I do not believe that would be in the best interests of children because, as I mentioned earlier, the best interests standard means focusing on the needs of children rather than on the rights of adults.

I want to emphasize that I do appreciate the grandparents' overwhelming desire to ensure that they continue to see their grandchildren. We have to remember however that formal court intervention is not always required and should not be encouraged.

Surely it is preferable to encourage that arrangements for grandparent access be worked out on the basis of trust and co–operation. I believe that in many cases, indeed in the overwhelming majority of cases, regular contact between grandparents and children of a broken marriage can continue without the need for court intervention.

In my view, marriage breakdown is a traumatic personal experience for the parents and children. Children who are already experiencing the distress of a parental divorce do not need to be additionally upset by a courtroom dispute between the parents and grandparents concerning grandparent access rights.

Another important point which should be made is that it should be recognized there are limitations as to what a court order can accomplish and what the law can do to enforce it. It would be ideal if a court order awarding grandparent access could ensure that meaningful access would occur without further problems. Unfortunately this is not the case.

A court cannot order people to change their attitudes, feelings or manner of relating to one another. In reality, attempts to enforce an access order often lead to more conflict and often even more litigation.

As I said earlier, I support wholeheartedly the idea that children should have continued and ongoing contact with their grandparents. However, I fear that Bill C–232 could have the effect of encouraging grandparents to formally apply for court imposed access orders. I do not think that would be in the best interests of a child. I truly believe there are more efficient and less stressful ways to work out post–divorce access arrangements without the need for court intervention.

The law is a blunt instrument. A court imposed judicially enforced order for grandparent access cannot take the place of a relationship that is allowed to occur and develop naturally.

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, here we are in the second hour of debate on the bill tabled by my colleague from the Reform Party. The aim of this bill is to amend the Divorce Act, by simplifying the procedure for grandparents to obtain legal custody of their grandchildren.

At the moment, grandparents wishing to obtain custody of their grandchildren must submit an initial application to the courts for leave to debate the legal custody of their grandchildren.

Grandparents are currently treated like any other interested person. All persons other than a spouse must first obtain leave from the court to apply for a custody order. Grandparents have no special status in divorce proceedings, and the aim of a preliminary application is to verify the claims by the grandparents and to decide if it is in the best interest of the child for them to intervene.

Bill C–232 would eliminate the need for grandparents to make this preliminary application and would enable them to become a party to the dispute in the same way as the spouse.

I would first like to say to this House that I am deeply saddened by the number of cases in which grandchildren lose contact with their grandparents following a divorce. Divorce proceedings are extremely stressful, and the break up of the nuclear family is traumatic for children. It can have the effect of altering their personality or behaviour. Children losing contact with their grandparents, in addition, face further hardships.

Children kept from their grandparents by mean parents, who use them to take revenge on one another, become the innocent victims in a form of hostage taking. They become the bargaining chip of parents whose meanness is matched only by their self–centredness. Nobody wins in this sort of game.

In this light it is therefore easy to understand why my colleague's bill elicits such sympathy. At first glance, it seems to resolve the problem of the additional trauma children must face when their parents divorce. However, despite appearances and its commendable objectives, it creates more problems than it solves.

Let us take a good look at Bill C–232. The proposed amendments aim to make it simpler for grandparents to request custody when parents divorce. In fact, grandparents would no longer be required to obtain leave of the court to present a request for custody of their grandchildren. Bill C–232 amends section 16 of the Divorce Act and places parents and grandparents on the same footing when it comes to custody requests. Six people will be involved from the outset instead of two.

This six–way struggle could become an eight–way or sixteen–way struggle, since the Divorce Act does not define "grandparents".

What about de jure grandparents? Does the term "grandparents" include both biological grandparents and grandparents by right? What about a single mother who marries the father of a child, which she later adopts, and therefore gains a share of parental control? Can the single mother's parents be considered the child's grandparents under the Divorce Act? What about remarriage after a divorce where custody is shared?

Take the example of the parents of Julien and Laurence. These children have four biological grandparents. Their parents divorce. The two parents remarry spouses who each have a child, Isabelle and Christine respectively. Isabelle and Christine each have four biological grandparents. If joint legal custody is given to Julien and Laurence's parents, these children will become part of two reconstituted families.

If one of the new couples divorced, no less than eight grandparents would be able to obtain custody of the children. If both couples divorced, twelve grandparents could be involved, I kid you not. Julien and Laurence's four grandparents could each demand custody of their grandchildren by way of two distinct divorce proceedings. Just imagine the legal wrangling.

If its main goal is to foster relationships between grandparents and their grandchildren, Bill C–232 is ineffective. It simplifies the procedure for grandparents but complicates the issue when both parents retain custody and there is no reason to take it away from them. In fact, with respect to their access to information regarding the education and welfare of the child, grandparents are given more rights at the time of the divorce than during the marriage. It is as though they have acquired parental authority, without the spouses being deprived of it.

The children will be subjected to a more complex dispute involving a greater number of parties. Everyone will make their pitch, claiming to act in the best interests of the child, but it is still the child who suffers.

With respect to parental authority, this is an exclusive power of the provinces under section 92 (13) of the Constitution Act of 1867. This concept of civil law is the prerogative of Quebec.

In granting more rights to grandparents, in interfering with the concept of parental authority at the time of a divorce proceeding, this bill represents an out and out encroachment on the jurisdiction of the provinces. It looks like Bill C–232 is trying to accomplish indirectly what direct action has failed to accomplish.

The common law provinces have no legislation explicitly protecting personal relations between grandchildren and their grandparents. The other provinces have been concerned with protecting the relations between a child and his parents. This is a laudable goal, but it is not enough.

Quebec, on the other hand, has enacted legislation promoting harmonious relations between grandparents and grandchildren. Article 611 of the Civil Code of Quebec allows grandparents who are denied such relations to make an application to the court for a decision on the terms and conditions of their relations with their grandchildren. Such an application can be made at any time. The spouses can be engaged in divorce proceedings or not. The application can be made even if the parents have never been married.

Article 611 of the Civil Code is the real solution to the problems created when there is interference in the personal relations between grandchildren and their grandparents. In Quebec, the recourse of grandparents is clear if the dispute is about a deterioration in harmonious relations attributable to the parents. Notwithstanding its honourable intentions, Bill C–232 is no more than a stopgap solution to the failure of certain provinces to bring in legislation in the area of civil law.

There is another aspect of Bill C–232 that concerns me. Clause 1(2) gives grandparents the right to make inquiries, and to be given information, as to the health, education and welfare of the child.

If this amendment was made to the Divorce Act, the grandparents of children of divorced parents would have the right to be given information that the grandparents of children of non–divorced parents cannot obtain.

Furthermore—and we think this is very serious—section 1(2) of the bill directly encroaches on Quebec's jurisdiction over the protection of medical and school information. Quebec already has its own Act Respecting Access to Documents Held by Public Bodies and the Protection of Personal Information.

Following her consultations with legal experts, my Reform colleague admitted in this House on November 25, 1994 that this provision of the bill, and I quote: "—may also contravene privacy acts or rights of the child—"

She went on to say: "Therefore while procedurally it cannot be removed at this time, I trust when the bill gets to committee this clause can be deleted".

I must congratulate my colleague on her honesty. She admits she was wrong about the impact of her bill and tries to compensate by hoping that the Standing Committee on Justice can improve it. Unfortunately, it is not Bill C–232's only shortcoming. I cannot support a flawed bill.

In closing, I wish to reiterate my position on the fate of children whose parents are divorcing. I find it appalling to see some parents relentlessly prolonging the suffering of the young victims of such circumstances.

The governments of common law provinces should make laws facilitating relations between grandchildren and their grandparents, as was done in Quebec, which is a pioneer in family rights.

[English]

Mrs. Sharon Hayes (Port Moody—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to address this bill today. I would first like to acknowledge the presence in the gallery of many grandparents. I welcome them here. These are people interested in this issue and I encourage them to listen and to work with us as we look to this legislation.

I also recognize their contribution, especially as seniors or grandparents in our society, to the past, the present and hopefully the future of this country.

Bill C–232 addresses the issue of granting access and custody to grandparents. This is a very real issue in our society. There are a growing number of grandparents and a growing complexity of marriage breakdowns and blended families within society.

As chair of the family task force of our party, we have done a fair amount of work looking at families and the importance of families in society. In that process we have determined a definition of family that we are using as a benchmark, those individuals related by ties of blood, marriage or adoption, where marriage is the union of a man and a woman as recognised by the state. It very much includes relations of blood, which means that grandparents are an important part of family and should remain so.

I will illustrate something that happened this week within my riding. We have a unique French community, one of the original French communities in British Columbia. It was established with the logging industry on the banks of the Fraser River at the turn of the century.

It was a thriving community, a mill town, called Maillardville. Every year we have the festival du bois which recognizes the importance of that in our community. This year there was a rededication of the original Millside school. It has been renovated and changed with the changing neighbourhood.

I talked with seniors, many of them watching with pride as being part of this community. In that crowd there were also second and third generation people, seniors who had attended that school in the 1920s. It was a French community of people who had shared in that community throughout their lives and watched their children and grandchildren raised there.

Through them and through their activity within their families, they have managed to maintain the language, the culture, the knowledge and the pride of their heritage, the sense of belonging in and around their community, the sense of history, the values they share and a sense of permanence within their families in this changing world.

There was an understanding between those generations. It was not an externally imposed understanding but an internally shared understanding between the members of families.

Is that typical in our society? Unfortunately it probably is not. We have had changes because of the tremendous new pressures in this society. Seventy–five per cent of mothers of school aged children now have full or part time work which keeps them out of the home. The average number of working hours in the 1950s was 48 in order to earn an average family income.

Today an average family income requires two people on average working 65 to 75 hours every week. The stress on families is tremendous. Therefore, as we have heard today, there is a high incidence of divorce and separation within families. With that comes the stress, the uncertainty, the conflicting loyalties, et cetera, that we have heard.

It is interesting that we have the same number of husband–wife households now as we had in the 1940s. Eighty–seven per cent of households are husband, wife and children. However, many of those households are second and third marriages or blended family units.

We do have single parent families in our communities which are very much a reality. The term single parent family denies that a family had two parents at one point and four parents at some point related by blood. Single parents should not be deemed as alone and isolated in our society. There are relations and support within society for them.

There are the factors of immigration and the mobility of families across the country. These put further stresses on ties of blood but these separations are not as complicated by the tensions that we find in family break–up situations.

Death, separation and divorce are three real factors of our society and they all lead very much to the breakdown of fundamental family ties. What we are asking today is what we can do about it.

In this Chamber we should be asking about the government's role in doing something about this very real problem in our society. This Chamber recognizes in many ways that one of its primary responsibilities in society is to recognize the importance of heritage.

We hear in eloquent speeches the importance of heritage for our native peoples. We hear the importance of heritage for our visible minorities and our many cultures. However, I would like to see what the importance of heritage is in our laws for Canadians generally.

In family law there is an overlap between provincial and federal jurisdictions. Provincial law dictates what happens within relationships when a parent dies or when there is abuse within the family or when parents separate.

In B.C. when those situations come into the legal process, grandparents may be granted access by application to the courts on the same basis as anyone else. Within that province, as in most provinces, there is no recognition or privilege of any kind by the state given to a blood relationship outside of parenthood. There is a presumption that perhaps the court will make this decision but in law there is no recognition of that blood tie.

What we are looking at today is part of the Divorce Act. Forty per cent of grandparents who have access problems fall under the Divorce Act legislation. Anyone, blood or otherwise, can apply for access, and all non–parents must be given permission by the court to have that access. A parent comes into that situation with same status or same right of access as a bus driver or a neighbour. Their status in law is the same.

We have just come through the International Year of the Family. There are a couple of publications from that period, "A Focus on Canada: Families in Canada" and a look at the statistics in our society, "The State of the Family in Canada". These were extensive studies that looked at Canadian families. They made reference to care of the elderly, reference to relative care, divorces and marriage. There was no mention made of grandparents in Canadian families.

This is in contrast to the fact that within those studies it was pointed out that the most common choice of child care in Canadian homes was by a relative in the relative's home or a relative in the child's home. Grandparents probably made up a large proportion of that. They are a very important part of what is happening in our society and yet they are not recognized as such.

In aboriginal communities blood ties are recognized for many generations, not only one or two. It is only within the last few years that our immigration laws have been changed to not include grandparents.

As a legislative body we have recognized the importance of blood connections through multigenerations in other cultures. What have we done in the Canadian population? We have recognized child care by grandparents in unspecified statistics. They are disguised in a general statistic.

The recognition of rights of access in the laws both federally and provincially is no different than those for any non–parent or any person in society other than the parents.

I have discovered that within tax laws and support in foster care in the provincial jurisdiction, strangers have more support than grandparents when the state mandates the care of a child. Grandparents have been marginalized in our society.

This morning I heard about the rights of the child and the rights of the parent and even the rights the grandparent. What do we do when these things conflict? It is time the government recognizes the importance of family, not multiculturalism or state run day care or even government programs, but looking at what creates a strong society. Strong families create a strong society. Strong families create strong cultural ties. Strong families create a just society. Strong families create a strong economy. A child's best interests are society's best interests because that child is going to grow up in that society.

One step is to recognize the rights of access by grandparents in law and the right of inquiry as to the well–being of their grandchildren and their right to know about their health, education and general welfare. Bill C–232 is the right step in the direction to empower families and underline their importance in our challenging and increasingly difficult role.

Mr. Stan Dromisky (Thunder Bay—Atikokan, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to address this House regarding Bill C–232, an act to amend the Divorce Act proposed by the hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam.

This bill attempts to address the needs of many concerned, frustrated and in many cases emotionally distraught grandparents who wish to have, according to their perceptions, a more sustainable and meaningful relationship with their grandchildren.

This bill contains two main amendments to the Divorce Act of 1986. The first aim is to eliminate the need for grandparents to obtain leave of the court when making a formal application for access or custody of their grandchildren. The second area of emphasis is within the granting of rights to grandparents to make inquiries and to be given information on the health, education and welfare of the child or children.

• (1145)

Many people feel that these two amendments to the Divorce Act are long overdue and that many problems would be resolved. The problems to which I refer are those created by divorces, separations, the early death of one of the spouses or any other cause that results in grandparents being denied access to their grandchildren. In any one of these stressful situations the suffering of the child may be more devastating over a lengthy period of time than that endured by any given adult involved.

In many cases the grandparents, provided they are loving, nurturing types, can provide a sense of stability, security and comfort for the bewildered children. This is exactly what happens in many cases.

However, as the number of failed marriages increases, so do the number of court custody cases. My colleague from Hamilton Mountain has already informed us that in 1990 approximately 34,000 children were involved in divorce cases in which the courts made custody decisions. Many more go through varying degrees of distress as custodial care is decided mutually outside the courts.

In my community I have anxious grandparents who have no confirmed knowledge of the whereabouts of their grandchildren. This happens when a spouse passes away and the remaining nurturing parent moves to another community. It is also a common occurrence in separation cases in which the custodial parent moves away from grandparents. Such situations should not exist.

In most cases the court may order the custodial person to notify any person granted access to the child of a change of address at least 30 days before the change. There may be many reasons for strained relationships between parent and grandparent that are child centred. Often a dominant grandparent may incessantly try to impose his or her value system, customs, behavioural codes, et cetera, on the grandchild. This results in a pattern of ongoing confrontation between the adults with the suffering child squeezed between them.

In all such cases the child is the victim no matter how honourable the adult intentions may be. Although there are many factors causing the aforementioned disturbing situation, and even though we are aware of the potential harm to the children concerned, we must not endorse knee–jerk legislation that fails to address the issue in a rational and thoughtful manner.

It is important to note that presently grandparents are not by any means prevented from obtaining court orders that give them access to their grandchildren. Existing legislation pertaining to the access of grandparents contained in the Divorce Act, 1986, states in subsection 16(1):

> A court of competent jurisdiction may on application by either or both spouses or by any other person make an order respecting the custody of or the access to any or all children of the marriage.

Subsection (3) states:

> A person other than a spouse may not make an application under section 1 or 2 without leave of the court.

The intention of the amendments is an attempt to formally recognize a grandparent's legal right to access. Such a right without some screening process would result in a flood of custody and access disputes and wealthier lawyers.

Supporters of the amendments should be aware of the limitations on what a court order can accomplish and what the law can do to enforce it. It has already been stated that a court order cannot order people to change their attitudes, feelings, or how they relate to one another. Certain personality types will always be in conflict with each other because of certain personality traits and characteristics. In reality attempts to enforce an access order often lead to more conflict and litigation.

It is paramount to keep in mind that all legitimate and credible claims for access or custody have and will continue to have access to the courts, providing they are credible in nature. In this context a credible or legitimate case refers to claims wherein a close relationship between the kids and the grandparents existed for a significant period of time and a truly serious dispute exists between the grandparents and the spouse in custody of the children.

Presently every claim must undergo a screening process to ensure its legitimacy prior to gaining admission to the courts. The provision ensures that unnecessary and unwarranted litigation is avoided, thus saving Canadians vast amounts of money.

We also need the check to ensure that grandparents who are overly intrusive and controlling do not interfere unduly with the parental responsibility of the parents in question. Opening the door for harassment of parents will not benefit children in any way, shape or form.

Another important caveat pertains to the second major proposal in Bill C–232 whereby private information regarding the children is granted to those who have been awarded access. If it becomes a reality, we would have created a very unfair scenario, one in which grandparents from within divorced families would have access to confidential information while grandparents of intact families would not be granted the privilege.

When grandparents strongly believe the child is being neglected or abused there are other avenues of proper and acceptable action available in Canada. For example, family service centres, the Children Aid Society or the police can be asked to assist in a process of protecting the child's welfare.

As a grandparent I am truly blessed for my wife and I have unconditional access to the loving relationship of four wonderful grandchildren. We can only imagine the pain that some grandparents must endure who have been denied access to their grandchildren.

In our case our oldest daughter is divorced. With open arms, we welcomed her and her three children to live with us. The joy of witnessing each unfolding stage of development is indescribable. The meaning of family continually evolves as three generations share the solving of problems, resources and time and do our best in respecting and honouring each other's needs.

The amendments presented in Bill C–232 are directionally correct. I bring to the attention of colleagues the case of the death of a parent or parents, parental abuses, and even personality conflict between parents and grandparents. The rights of grandparents are governed by provincial laws that can vary widely.

In British Columbia grandparents can apply for access under the family relations act. Alberta has no legal recourse for excluded grandparents. Quebec and only Quebec has enshrined the rights of grandparents in family law since 1981.

The use of courts is a lengthy and very costly process. It is obvious that provincial and federal governments must co–operatively harmonize family laws and the Divorce Act to bring grandparents into a loving relationship with their grandchildren.

For the sake of all those concerned, may co–operative effort result in positive directives as quickly as possible thus avoiding unnecessary costly litigation and unwarranted intrusion into the lives of parents, grandparents and grandchildren.

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this is a piece of legislation that I look upon as an opportunity for the House of Commons to co–operate.

I listened to members opposite say that the bill is directionally correct. I have also listened to the bill being called knee–jerk legislation. Somehow, when I heard that term, my heart fell a little because it did not sound to me like a bill that was likely to get a co–operative view from all parties.

I would like to talk about the family in a general sense. Is the family in Canada under siege? We are treating families poorly.

There are popular myths about Canada and the family today. Popular myths say that most people prefer looser family arrangements than the old–time family ones. There are popular myths that say divorce does not really have that big an effect on children and that alternative lifestyles compete very nicely with the traditional family.

• (1155)

Another myth is that the one parent working and one parent at home model of family is old fashioned, out of date and somewhat demeaning to the partner who is left at home. Another says that day care is a really good or almost better substitute than care in the home.

I would like to explore the myths in very straightforward terms. First, 70 per cent of Canadians feel the traditional family is the best way to raise children. A very recent poll says that the popular myth that other forms of family recognition are as good is just not true.

The second myth is that divorce has minimal effect on children. As a counsellor I have seen the effect divorce has on children. Children are far more likely to blame themselves in the event of divorce. There is almost universally increased poverty after a family splits up. Interestingly enough children from divorced families are more commonly involved in divorce when they become adults.

Are alternate lifestyles as good as the traditional family? Alternate lifestyles are neither happy nor healthy. They often recruit youth to that end. Who could possibly recruit youth to an unhappy, unhealthy lifestyle? I could not. The traditional family produces the most stable, well adjusted, law–abiding citizens from all socioeconomic groups.

On the myth that day care is as good as normal family care, a meta–analysis of the issue was done. How does day care fare under the age of five? This meta–analysis compared different areas of childhood development: cognitive or in other words how smart kids were, social, emotional, behavioural and attachment to other individuals. This is summation of the results. It found that infants and young children who received substantial non–maternal care, that is care greater than 25 hours per week, were affected socially, emotionally, behaviourally and in terms of attachment to the mom. On all four counts the children were affected negatively.

New data coming to light indicates that day care outside the home is not as good as care in the home. The data is not coming from wackos. It is coming from individuals looking at data from the U.S., Canada, Sweden; all over the world.

As legislators how do we treat the family? As I sit in the Chamber a novice politician I try to look at how we treat the family. Divorce is pretty easy in Canada. We have poor maintenance agreements so a dad can disappear and not look after children he has sired.

We make welfare very easy for single moms to access. Our attitude as legislators seems to be that the state can provide whatever might be missing if the family breaks down. However, if the extended family is willing, able and capable to take up the slack, if grandparents are available, willing and able to take up the slack, we say line up. Line up behind whom? Line up behind social workers, line up behind family counsellors, line up behind lawyers and line up behind judges. The significant bond that exists must line up. As a legislator I think that is wrong.

I looked at the bill and said that it could well push a veritable army of bureaucrats and people who are not concerned about the child into the background and bring grandparents to where they rightfully belong in the foreground for the best wishes of the child.

• (1200)

This is the opportunity in my view. A non-partisan private member's bill is available for an open, free vote in the House of Commons. It is not a good enough bill, I have heard a couple of people say it could be improved. Let us go to committee with this bill. Let us improve it, let us pass it and let us bring the grandparents to where they belong, in line with their grandchildren.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Macleod will have three minutes if he wishes the next time the matter comes up for debate.

The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96, the item is dropped to the bottom of the order of precedence on the Order Paper.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

FIREARMS ACT

The House resumed from February 27 consideration of the motion that Bill C-68, an act respecting firearms and other weapons, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Deputy Speaker: Colleagues, on February 27 the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville sought to move an amendment to the motion for second reading of Bill C-68, an act respecting firearms and other weapons.

A question was raised regarding the procedural acceptability of the proposed amendment. The Chair heard arguments from the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, who is the government whip, and the hon. House leader for the Reform Party before reserving his decision. The Chair wishes to thank those hon. members for their helpful comments.

The proposed amendment, is asking the House not to proceed with the second reading of Bill C-68 on the grounds that its provisions link the licensing and registration of firearms with the creation of offences relating to firearms. This kind of amendment is known as a reasoned amendment.

The honourable Chief Government Whip argued that this motion was out of order as a reasoned amendment because it was not opposed to the principles of the Bill. However, Speaker Lamoureux, in a ruling on August 30, 1966, noted that opposition to the principles of a bill is, and I quote:

> only one of the several possible forms of a reasoned amendment.

[English]

Speaker Lamoureux pointed out that several forms of reasoned amendment were listed in May's Parliamentary Practice, 17th edition, at page 527 and that May indicated only that a reasoned amendment "may be declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy or provisions of a bill".

Indeed, one of the other forms of reasoned amendment listed is that it "may express opinions as to any circumstances connected with the introduction or prosecution of the bill, or otherwise opposed to its progress".

Finally, Speaker Lamoureux cited Abraham and Hawtrey's Parliamentary Dictionary, which states in very clear terms what a reasoned amendment is. It reads at page 162 as follows:

> This form of amendment seeks—either to give reasons why the house declines to give a second or third reading to the bill, or to express an opinion with regard to its subject matter or to the policy which the bill is intended to fulfil.

The Chair finds, after careful consideration, that the proposed amendment respects the definition offered in Abraham and Hawtrey and one of the forms listed in May, and further that it follows a long line of similar amendments presented in this House which have expressed an opinion regarding the policy or the provisions contained in a bill. Consequently, the Chair rules the amendment in order.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.) moved:

> That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word "that" and substituting the following therefor:
> This House declines to give second reading to Bill C-68, an act respecting firearms and other weapons, because the principle of establishing a system for licensing and registration of all firearms and the principle of creating a variety of offences are two unrelated issues that should be addressed separately.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): When Bill C-68 was last before the House the hon. member for Jonquière had 17 minutes remaining.

[Translation]

Mr. André Caron (Jonquière, BQ): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to continue my remarks on Bill C-68.

• (1205)

When I spoke on this bill previously, I said straight away that I agree with the principle of gun control and that, on the whole, I support the justice minister's bill. Later, I will raise specific concerns I feel my party should address in a parliamentary committee.

I was somewhat surprised with the type of debate that took place in this House around the gun control issue. I heard some speakers mention individual freedoms. Some spoke of the right for every Canadian citizen to own firearms. Others perceived the proposed measures as unjustified government interference in people's private lives.

To some extent, we are having a societal debate here. Many representations were made and many letters were sent to my office by Canadian citizens who oppose this legislation. I read almost all of them to have a good idea of what the problem is.

I think that this debate is about looking at society differently. It is a matter of individual freedom against public interest. No one in Canada, I think, opposes the right of the government to control firearms, to ensure that anyone who owns weapons, handguns in particular, be identified and be required to justify requesting permission to own such weapons. The problem right now is with the registration of firearms which are hunting weapons.

Some say: "I am an honest citizen and I am not going to cause problems for others with my firearms. Consequently, I do not see why the government wants to know if I own such firearms and determine whether I am allowed to do so". Those who use that argument forget something important, namely that our society—we are not talking here about American society in the 19th century, but about society in Canada and Quebec in 1995—has changed. Customs have changed, as well as the concept of community life, and I believe that one of the main thrusts right now is that society is opposed to violence.

Society is opposed to violence against women and children. Actions which were condoned 25 or 30 years ago are now being denounced and can trigger criminal proceedings. Society tells us, legislators, to control violence. If violence can sometimes show itself in such brutal and damaging ways, it is because some people are armed. It goes without saying that the vast majority, maybe 99 per cent, of those who own firearms will not commit violent crimes. This control which we want to implement over firearms may deter only a small number of people from misusing their firearms, or from using them with bad intentions.

But I want to make it clear that, in my opinion, this bill is a message. It is a message which society is sending to itself. It is society which no longer wants to live in a climate of violence, which wants peace and safe streets, and which wants to make sure that, if a neighbour, a person across the street or those people whom one meets in one's daily activities are armed, they will have had to state that they own firearms.

Owning a gun does not necessarily mean a person is violent, but society tells us that it wants to know who has guns, so that the message is clear. To own a gun is, in a way, a right, but there is also a duty involved. Guns must be used carefully, so that no one is ever at risk.

That being said, I think it is important to adopt the kind of bill before us today, even if it means curtailing certain individual freedoms. I think that, to a certain extent, society is ready for this bill.

Some aspects of the bill are not entirely satisfactory, however. Before my time expires, I would like to comment on these aspects. There is the matter of prison sentences. The bill provides for a minimum prison sentence of four years for serious crimes committed with firearms. The bill also contains several provisions that would increase prison sentences for individuals convicted of contravening this legislation, once it is passed.

I question the use of prison sentences and their effectiveness. The other day, I read in the paper that Canada ranks third among a number of western countries for the number of persons incarcerated per population of 100,000. Countries like Germany, France or the Netherlands have incarceration rates that are lower than Canada's. There is no indication, however, in the newspapers or in reports on the subject, that in these countries violence has greater impact or that people are not as safe as in other countries where incarceration is the measure of choice to control crime.

Incidentally, the two countries where incarceration is used most often are Russia and the United States. The United States has opted for incarceration as a way of exercising social control, as a way of controlling crime. If we look at what is happening in the United States, we do not get the impression that American society is less violent or less dangerous than German or French society.

I think that incarceration is not the right way to deal with the crime rate, and that is why I question some provisions of the bill that seem to reflect this emphasis on the deterrent effect of more severe prison sentences. There may be other ways to approach this problem. This is a very complex issue, and I think my party should raise it in committee.

There is also the matter of sentencing. It is said that judges do not have enough leeway. The minimum sentence is too high to allow sufficiently for the circumstances involved. I think judges should be allowed greater flexibility in setting the minimum sentence. Obviously, when a crime is committed with a firearm, this is an aggravating circumstance. However, there are situations where a judge may have to penalize individuals because under the law, he must determine a minimum period of incarceration. This does not mean justice will necessarily be served in every case.

There is also the time frame. This is important in connection with the requirement to register a weapon and license it. If we add up all the possible time periods, and take into account the number of people currently owning firearms, we are talking about a period of almost seven years.

Obviously, enough time must be allowed for the appropriate administrative measures to be taken to ensure an effective registration and licensing system is in place. However, I think seven years is a lot. This is a very long time, in view of the urgency of the situation and the value of the firearms control measure of registration. It would be preferable to shorten the time period so that people with firearms could take note of their responsibilities and register their weapons as quickly as possible.

There is also the whole matter of costs. There are fairly low fees for registration and there are fees for licensing, which is renewable every five years. I think many people who opposed mandatory registration of firearms mentioned that significant amounts would be involved. Of course, if we add everything up, we arrive at a figure of perhaps several tens of millions of dollars. Not a mind boggling figure, but a reasonable amount, to some extent.

Clearly, if we could lower the administrative costs of licensing and registration, it would be easier on people who have to keep an eye on their spending. But I do not think that the $50 or $60 fee currently provided for under the proposed regulation is high enough to prevent people who would like to own guns from assuming their responsibilities and from registering them, a measure designed to let society know who is armed.

There is another aspect. Some categories of guns—for example the infamous AK–47—will remain in the hands of their present owners. In my opinion, these kinds of weapons have no place in a democratic and free country. They have a history in several countries. They have served all sorts of purposes, not always noble. I think it would have been appropriate for the minister to immediately recall these weapons.

Those are the main points I wanted to make about this bill, which is legitimate in a free and democratic society. In a society favouring non–violent values, it is important to know who owns firearms, because they increase carnage when violence breaks out. As well they are a symbol of violence.

These days, no one can walk the streets with a gun without alarming citizens. This was not the case 30 years ago. In my own town, which was closer to a medium size town than a small town, I recall that, at 17 or 18 years of age, we went through town carrying our .22 calibre rifles to go target shooting in the fields. People did not make a fuss because most of them knew each other and knew who was who. They did not think we were violent. Nobody worried about it. But now, no one can walk the streets of my town, Jonquière, with a .22 rifle without the police hearing about it.

In my opinion, this indicates a shift in society's values and I believe that the time has come for us in Quebec and in Canada to know who is armed, who owns guns, and why, so that people become fully aware of their responsibilities as gun owners.

[English]

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I listened to my hon. colleague's speech on Bill C–68 with great interest, recognizing that the great thing about this Chamber is that we hold a wide divergence of opinion on controversial subjects such as gun control. I do respect his opinions.

However, I want to raise a couple of issues brought out in his presentation. He said we will not solve the problems of crime through imprisonment and that he is therefore opposed or has some difficulty with the more stringent and tougher measures in Bill C–68 on the criminal misuse and abuse of firearms.

He is opposed to deterrence through longer prison sentences. He mentioned there are better ways to deal with this than prison sentences. As is so typical when we debate bills, the Bloc fails to mention better ways. It consistently criticizes but does not bring forward any constructive criticism in the form of viable options.

For years we have tried to rehabilitate some of these violent offenders but basically there are those in society for which rehabilitation simply does not work. That is proven time and time again by the high incidence of repeat offenders. Some of our most violent and horrendous crimes are committed by people who have already served prison sentences and have been let out on early parole only to recommit.

Since the member raised the issue that there are better ways than longer prison sentences to combat crime and the criminal misuse of firearms, what are those better ways?

We are now debating the motion put forward by my hon. colleague from the Reform Party to split the bill in two. It was unclear from the member's presentation whether he is in favour of splitting the bill in two.

Reform feels there are two separate issues in the bill. One is more restrictions on law–abiding gun owners with the minister's firearms act and the second is more amendments to section 3 of the Criminal Code which deals with the criminal misuse of firearms which we feel are two separate issues.

I wonder if the member could enlighten the Chamber as to what his feelings are on splitting the bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Caron: Madam Speaker, I thank my colleague for his question. With respect to the matter of imprisonment, I, of course, am not advocating that prisons be abolished or shut down. I do think, however, that the bill puts a little too much emphasis on imprisonment as a solution.

We may, for example, wonder why there are 49 inmates per 100,000 people in the Netherlands, compared to 116 in Canada and 519 in the U.S. I do not think that violence is commonplace in the Netherlands. I think that some societies do not see jail terms as a deterrent in the same way as we do in Canada and the U.S.

The question I ask myself about this bill is whether the proposed solution of systematically increasing jail terms for crimes committed with firearms is effective.

My colleague's second question deals with Reform's amendment to split the bill in two and make a distinction between hunting rifles owned by ordinary, law–abiding citizens, as my colleague would say, and handguns more often used in committing crimes.

I think there is no reason to make such a distinction because, in my opinion, a firearm is a firearm. A misused firearm can cause definite, serious harm to people. It does not matter whether one gets shot with a 12 gauge shotgun, a hunting rifle or a pistol. I think that, in our society, it is important that all those who have the power to harm others with their firearms be aware of this responsibility and let society know that they have this potential power.

Although these people will not, of course, misuse their firearms, that is still a possibility. There is no reason to make a distinction between presumably law–abiding citizens—and I agree that they are—and less respectable people who own handguns or other types of firearms. I do not think that a distinction should be made.

In my opinion, some handguns should be completely banned or recalled, even if they are collector's items, because they are potentially dangerous.

I do not see how it would be prejudicial to a citizen to register his hunting rifles. Many things are registered. Many of our possessions are registered and I do not think this violates anyone's rights.

I will not vote for the amendment put forward by my Reform colleague because I do not think it should be adopted. In my opinion, all weapons are potentially dangerous and their owners should be aware of this. One way to make them aware of this is to require them to let society know that they own firearms and will live up to their responsibility to use them properly.

[English]

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Madam Speaker, there are laws that presently exist for people who are negligent in the use of firearms. There are laws on the books that should be enforced and in some cases are.

After 61 years of registration of handguns, today one can get a handgun in the right bars across the whole country; there are even rent–a–guns. It is running rampant and the registration has failed to do anything.

Can the member please explain to me how spending another million or billion dollars, whatever it takes to register shotguns and rifles, is going to make one iota of difference when it has not made any difference in the past.

[Translation]

Mr. Caron: Let there be no misunderstanding, Madam Speaker. I believe that this bill is a message that society is sending to itself. It is citizens saying to each other that they want to live in a non–violent environment, in a less violent environment. They are saying that it is not good, that it is not acceptable in our society to possess firearms, to be able, as my colleague pointed out, to go to a bar and buy a handgun, something that I personally have never done, but that it seems is possible.

In addition to its practical effectiveness in controlling firearms, the bill that we are examining is symbolic, it is a message that society is sending to itself. It is not insignificant that hundreds of thousands of people have signed petitions calling for better control of firearms in Canada. There is a problem, contrary to what my colleague is implying in his question.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): We will resume debate. We are now at 10–minute speeches only, no questions and comments.

Mr. Brent St. Denis (Algoma, Lib.): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to speak at second reading of Bill C–68, the Firearms Act.

My preparations for this began earlier last year but most seriously last fall with the tabling of the initial proposals in late November. Quite frankly I was really surprised at the degree and depth of response from my constituency. I represent the riding of Algoma in northern Ontario where we have a long tradition of hunting, target shooting, recreational uses of firearms and other reasons for having firearms.

I was surprised at how deep and emotional the response was to the issue. I have had a chance to meet with over 1,000 legitimate gun owners over the last few months and have received letters and phone calls from over 1,000 gun owners and have met many of them in groups and in private. I must emphasize that legitimate owners and users of firearms are law–abiding citizens who respect the law, who want the same kind of country that people in the cities want, a country that is safe for everybody.

I have to admit they make a good point when they say to me: "How do these new laws help the country become safer? How do these new laws not become a punishment for us?" We owe it to the legitimate gun–owning community to explain to them clearly, to provide them with details which indicate that they are not the victims in the situation but are partners with all Canadians in trying to make our country safer.

We have a way to go yet in providing full explanations. I am very hopeful that through the committee process, through this debate and future debates that many of these concerns will be addressed.

I have told the gun–owning community over and over again that I believe in parliamentary process. I believe that appropriate measures with respect to firearms control can be taken that respect the needs of rural and urban Canadians.

The balance between rural and urban Canada is difficult to find at the best of times but this is an instance where we must work together to find the balance. The primary purpose of my job with respect to Bill C–68 is to help my urban colleagues, urban members to understand better the needs of rural Canadians with respect to firearms legislation.

The issue is not really a partisan issue because it seems to cut urban–rural in all parties. At the same time, I do not want it to become a split between urban and rural Canada. It is an opportunity through the parliamentary process for both rural and urban Canadians to understand better the needs of the other.

It is incumbent on us to listen carefully to rural Canadians, those who legitimately use firearms, that they not become the target of this legislation. They must become partners. I look forward through this process to bringing forward ideas, amendments, proposals that will hopefully address these concerns. I will be seeking the co–operation of urban members in this regard.

I believe deeply that the minister has been listening to rural members, as he listens today. I believe we can, with good judgment, find solutions to this matter that will be helpful to all, including myself, a member representing a rural area. That is not to say all of my constituents are in favour of not doing something about gun control. I have constituents that are in favour of these measures. It cuts both ways. In my efforts to represent my constituents, I must remember that both sides are represented in my communities.

I have some serious concerns with Bill C–68 that I will raise through the committee process and at third reading. I have invited my constituents, to the extent that they can, to participate in the process with me. I have guaranteed them my commitment to carry forward their concerns.

To start with, I would like to specifically talk about gun registration. My constituents have many concerns and worries when they have before them a plan to register their firearms. They worry that this will lead to the eventual confiscation of their firearms, particularly their long guns. They worry that the registration system will be an insecure information system to which criminals and others will have access, information concerning the firearms they possess.

They worry about the cost, to themselves as individuals and the cost to the country. They worry that the system will be cumbersome and that they will have to jump through hoops. They worry about privacy. The fact that they own firearms is a matter private to them and their families.

They wonder what impact registration will have on family violence and what impact it will have on the criminal element in our society.

We owe it to the legal gun–owning community to explain their concerns item by item. I do not believe we have adequately done that. We have an opportunity in the weeks and months ahead to do it. As I have in the past I will call on my colleague, the Attorney General, to help with those explanations.

Rather than go into the details of some of the things that I would like to see changed here, I will communicate with my constituents item by item as these matters come up. In view of the limitation of time, I wish to say that I have faith in the parliamentary process. I owe it to my constituents, not only on this issue but all issues to bring forward a balanced point of view.

I have tried to convince my constituents, the gun–owning community in my riding, that we have an opportunity with Bill C–68. I know many of them are upset. Much misinformation is out there but we have an opportunity here to correct some of the problems with existing legislation and to develop a system that hopefully will mean this is the last time we have to debate gun control in Parliament.

If we do a good job now as parliamentarians, if we do a good job listening to our constituents, and if the committee is prepared to listen and respond, as I am sure it will, then we can finally put this to rest.

As we have seen with the leadership in our budget, by the leadership of the government on the east coast and in many others areas, including measures that the Attorney General is dealing with in terms of high risk offenders, we too can respond to Canadians and come up with a solution that will be satisfactory. It may not be to everybody but it will to most.

In conclusion, I would like to acknowledge that at this very moment one of my constituents, John Rochon from Elliot Lake, is now in Argentina at the Pan American games. He is one of our shooters. He is a past medalist for our country and I wish him well. His wife, Donna, is at home waiting for news of progress in Argentina. It is people like John Rochon that are exemplary.

Lionel Houle is an elderly gentleman in Massey, Ontario who came to me with concerns about passing on his guns to his children. It is people like that who have convinced me that the gun–owning community in Canada deserves our respect, deserves to know that we care about their point of view. They are prepared to partner with urban Canadians to put this issue to rest once and for all and to obtain a solution that is effective for the entire country.

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Madam Speaker, it my pleasure to speak on the motion my colleague for Yorkton—Melville has put forward.

The motion recognizes the problems with Bill C–68 and the fact that the bill deals with two distinct areas: crime control, which everyone supports; and a repressive gun control scheme which will cost hundreds of millions of dollars, will not reduce crime and will turn thousands of Canadians into criminals for simply not registering their guns properly.

It is vitally important that the House legislates clearly and supports only those bills which deal effectively and efficiently with the problems of the country. The justice minister could have brought forward this kind of bill, but he put the two issues together. He knew that Canadians were sick and tired of violent criminals who use firearms. Therefore, Bill C–68 has tougher penalties, including minimum sentences of four years for certain crimes.

The bill also penalizes gun smugglers and provides a deterrent against smuggling crimes. Under the proposed legislation profits from smuggling and smugglers' vehicles can be seized. In addition gun smugglers can expect tough jail sentences when they are convicted. These are the types of measures that Canadians are calling for and I fully support those elements of the bill. In fact, I would like to see many of these penalties extended even further.

Unfortunately the legitimate desire of Canadians for crime control are exploited by Bill C–68 in order to forward the personal agenda of the justice minister. He has stated very clearly that he believes the army and police are the only ones in Canada that should be able to own guns. It is on the public record. Obviously the minister is using Bill C–68 to promote his own wish list and crack down on legitimate gun owners.

When the justice minister speaks about Bill C–68 he suggests there is wide support in the Canadian public for all elements of the bill. He cites polls and claims they support his views. What questions were asked? If you ask Canadians if they support legislation to reduce crime, of course they will say they support it. What are the facts?

This weekend I listened to a presentation by Brian Evans in Alberta and he made it very clear how the questions that are asked can determine the answers. He was quite open about showing the fallacies of the polling system. Again I remind the minister that John Diefenbaker probably stated best what polls are for.

What would Canadians say if we asked some of the following questions: First, do you believe that Canadians who do not register their guns should be subject to up to 10 years in prison, according to section 92 of the legislation? This means that a hunter who does not register his guns could be locked away for as long as multiple murderer, Denis Lortie, 10 years. How can this sort of extreme be justified?

Second, do you believe it is fair that under new rules allowing police to search for unregistered guns, all persons who do not "give the police officer all reasonable assistance" can be found guilty of an indictable offence and liable for a prison term of up to two years? This means that a farmer's wife who does not help the police to convict her husband by co–operating in a search for unregistered guns could be locked away for two years. Again this absolutely unbelievable.

Third, do you believe that the government should spend at least $85 million to institute universal firearms registration? Of course the estimates go up into the hundreds of millions, depending on who you talk to. There is no evidence that this will reduce crime. When similar systems were tried in other countries they failed miserably.

The devil is in the details. When Bill C–68 is viewed in the light of these types of questions, we see how flawed this legislation is. In the justice minister's attempt to crack down on legitimate gun owners he is doing a fundamental disservice to all Canadians. Parliament cannot allow this to happen.

The motion proposed by the member for Yorkton—Melville gives us an invaluable opportunity to get back on the right track and refocus our efforts on crime control which is the real issue in the eyes of Canadians. If we do this, then I am certain we will have all–party support for those measures that increase penalties for criminals. On the other hand, when it comes to universal firearms registration, splitting the bill will allow us to approach this debate in a direct way. If members of the House support the proposed motion, then maybe we will really see what the level of support for the minister's universal firearms registration plan is.

In my own riding of Red Deer, the minister has told me by letter that 67 per cent of constituents support his universal gun registration program. Unfortunately though, when I invited the minister to test his theory by participating in an open town hall meeting in Red Deer, he would not come to my riding. Why not? If the minister believes his own claims then he should receive overwhelming support. I will tell you why not. The minister will not come to Red Deer because he knows my constituents do not support his registration process. He will not come because he knows his claims are ridiculous.

How do I know my constituents do not support universal registration? I have had over 5,461 constituents sign petitions against this legislation; I have had over 1,200 letters in the last two months; I have had hundreds of phone calls and contacts out on the street; all of this against universal firearms registration.

Some might ask whether I have had any from the other side. Yes, I have. My office has received fewer than 20 letters and I have received fewer than 10 phone calls supporting this bill. That is over 230 constituents to one against this bill. I ask: What clearer indication can I have as an MP? It seems astonishing to me that the justice minister could make such an outlandish claim that the people of Red Deer support this legislation by a margin of 2:1.

I travelled my entire constituency this past 10 days from early morning until late at night. I had six town hall meetings and many other meetings. I met many people. All of them are opposed to this legislation. Not one person has told me he is in favour of it.

There is no doubt in my mind that Bill C–68 will cause many problems if passed in its current form. Even with major amendments in committee this bill will still turn thousands of Canadians into criminals.

It has been made very clear that a number of justice ministers, including those from Alberta and Saskatchewan, will oppose this legislation and the enforcement of it. It will cost hundreds of millions of dollars if we count the enforcement costs. It will impose a tax on legal gun owners through registration fees and will threaten the private property of approximately seven million Canadians.

This legislation is unacceptable. Therefore I urge the House to act responsibly and adopt the motion of the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville. Let us split the bill into two portions.

The first part will contain those parts of the bill dealing with crime control. We will send out a tough and unified message that violent criminals and smugglers will be punished severely for their crimes. That is what the Canadian people are saying. I have heard that message in Montreal and Toronto, and I have certainly heard it in the west. It is the same message. They are against crime and are demanding crime control.

The second part of the bill will deal with the government's very unfair universal firearms registration system. In the interests of Canadians we will strike down that proposed legislation. I believe that will be right across the board as well.

We have an opportunity to clarify what the minister has mixed up. It is our responsibility as members of Parliament to do this. I request the support of all members for the proposed motion.

Ms. Roseanne Skoke (Central Nova, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I rise today to debate at second reading Bill C–68, an act respecting firearms and other weapons. Bill C–68 is 124 pages long and contains 186 legislative provisions which include amendments to the Criminal Code of Canada and creates a new separate statute, the firearms act.

Moreover this bill would completely reorganize the gun control system putting provisions of a regulatory type in the proposed new firearms act while leaving the Criminal Code penalties in part III of the Criminal Code. It would also reorganize the classification of firearms and other weapons and the means by which controls are imposed on their acquisition, possession, use and transportation.

The three pillars of the existing system, controls on access, controls on particular kinds of firearms, and criminal penalties, would continue to exist but their forms would change. In particular much of the balance of the system would shift to controls focusing directly on persons rather than on kinds of firearms.

The Minister of Justice in opening the debate at second reading stage urged this hon. House to adopt the legislation in principle before sending it to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs for detailed consideration clause by clause. The justice minister outlined three principles that motivated this government to introduce Bill C–68.

The first principle is that Canadians do not want to live in a country wherein the people feel they want or need to possess a firearm for protection.

The second principle is that if we are to retain our safe and peaceful character as a country, those who use a firearm in the commission of a crime will be severely punished. For example, those who smuggle illegal firearms, those who traffic in illegal firearms and those who profit by putting guns into the hands of criminals must know that penalties for such conduct must be certain and significant.

The third principle is that as a government we must acknowledge and respect the legitimate use of firearms by law–abiding Canadian citizens.

It would include but would not be limited to the respect for our Canadian heritage and culture regarding the traditions of hunting not only as a favourite pastime but as a very important economic activity contributing directly to the prosperity of many regions in Canada, and those whose livelihoods are solely dependent upon firearms. Government must acknowledge and respect the use of firearms for farming, ranching and hunting. We must not interfere with this. Also to be acknowledged are those who collect firearms and those who enjoy shooting sports and so on.

The third principle in summary recognizes and respects the rights and interests of law–abiding Canadian citizens. However while these legitimate interests are acknowledged and respected, Bill C–68 requires that they be carried on in a context that is consistent with public safety.

The three principles as outlined by the justice minister are fundamentally sound. They are consistent with the objectives of good government, a peaceful and safe society and an effective response to the criminal misuse of firearms and enhanced public safety.

It must be understood that the universal registration of firearms is a fundamental strategy, a fundamental support system that the government intends to use to achieve the principles and objectives previously outlined. It is at this point that controversy and a divergence of opinion ensue in debate.

There is popular public opinion calling for more stringent gun control measures principally in reaction to recent violent crimes. On the other hand, there is also public opinion that certain restrictive gun control measures are inappropriate and will not adequately solve the problems of violent crimes.

Specifically my constituents of Central Nova have expressed to me concerns and interests regarding the effect and impact Bill C–68 and universal registration will have upon them as law–abiding gun owners. By letters, by petitions and by 800 constituents attending two separate public forums they expressed their concerns, fears and apprehensions regarding the federal government's firearms control program which was announced on November 30, 1994.

Constituents of Central Nova raised issues regarding the fundamental strategy of the universal firearms registration. The concerns raised were: first, that registration would potentially lead to confiscation of their guns; second, that registration would interfere with the property rights and charter of rights, specifically to the right to security of person and property; third, that the ownership of a gun is a right and not a privilege; fourth, they failed to see the positive effects of gun registration in deterring and reducing crime in Canada.

I trust that to satisfy my constituents' concerns the constitutional validity of universal firearms registration and prohibition will be examined and considered in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Some Central Nova constituents also raised a concern regarding the cost of registration both to taxpayers and gun owners. There appears to be much public misinformation in this regard. The Minister of Justice was quite clear on debate that the cost to gun owners in the first year of the five–year implementation period is expected to be zero. If for some reason it is not zero, it will be a nominal amount in the range of $10. The estimated cost of implementing the universal registration system over the next five years will be $85 million. This estimated cost will be reviewed in detail by the standing committee.

Potential non–compliance with Bill C–68 has been raised as an issue and how such non–compliance will be enforced. In my riding in discussing the issue of future non–compliance reference was made to past non–compliance. Reference was specifically made to the failure of police and crown prosecutors to enforce existing provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada regarding the usage of a weapon in the commission of an offence. Concern was expressed that crown prosecutors were irresponsible and failed to uphold public trust by plea bargaining and failing to enforce the existing provisions.

It should be noted that this concern is addressed by Bill C–68. Bill C–68 will toughen the penalties of the criminal misuse of firearms. With the restructuring of the Criminal Code there will no longer be plea bargaining of charges relating to the use of firearms because the penalties will be woven directly into the sections which provide for the offences themselves.

The firearms owners of Central Nova raised the concern that they were offended by having to consult the Criminal Code to determine the manner in which their private ownership of firearms was to be regulated. This concern has been addressed by Bill C–68 by the government changing the Criminal Code to toughen sanctions and by contemplating a separate statute, the firearms act, to deal with the regulatory aspects in relation to firearms acquisition, use and ownership.

Further concerns were raised in my constituency from the gun clubs and target shooters. These are highly skilled people, very law abiding and conscientious in their sport. These Canadians want to continue in those sports.

The justice minister has assured this honourable House that when Bill C–68 goes to the justice committee following second reading debate he will ask the committee to look at specific changes in the law. This is unprecedented and should be commended for being open to change and scrutiny of a government bill. The Minister of Justice stated in Hansard:

> First of all, to ensure that we are accommodating all of those sporting competitions with handguns, we have already made it clear that the .22–.32 calibre Walther used by Linda Thom at the 1984 Olympics will not be covered by the ban. We want the committee to take the advice of the International Shooting Union to determine whether there are other handguns that should be exempted so that legitimate sporting activities will not be threatened.

Second, I will ask the committee to examine the question of whether there are black powder shooting events that might be affected by this legislation. It is not our intention in any way to limit historical re–enactments with the use of reproductions. We do not believe we have done that but we will ask the committee to look specifically at that question and to let us know whether additional technical amendments are required to make the meaning clear.

Third, we will ask the committee to look at the question of relics and heirlooms, recognizing that there are families and individuals who want to pass on to the next generation firearms that they have acquired and that have a specific sentimental or historical value to the family. That should be respected. We will ask the committee to fashion a way to allow it to happen consistently with the imperatives of public safety.

These three items were of concern to my constituents of Central Nova. I am satisfied that the justice minister will see that they are properly addressed.

The Minister of Justice stressed that Canadians will have the opportunity to make their views known when the legislation is reviewed by the House of Commons Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. I trust that the concerns of my constituents will be addressed. I urge all my constituents to partake in the legislative process by making their views known to the House of Commons committee.

Mr. Gilbert Fillion (Chicoutimi, BQ): Madam Speaker, on February 14, the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada tabled in this House his firearms bill to strengthen control over such weapons. It was high time. I support this bill, although my feeling is that it does not go far enough. I consider it is about time a country such as ours enacts legislation to protect all citizens.

We all know that gun–related crime has increased dramatically. We all remember the tragedy that occurred in the Quebec National Assembly, ten years or so ago, and the dreadful massacre at l'École Polytechnique, just a few years ago. Every day that goes by we hear about firearms being used to assault, threaten, intimidate and kill. Possessing a firearm gives criminals a great illusion of power, authority and strength.

In November, the president of the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police commented that the issue of legal possession of firearms was not a game. The public, including hunters, competitive shooters, collectors and shooters, all people for whom I have great respect and law–abiding citizens, should consider these controls as reaffirming their rights and responsibilities. It is up to them to act on reaffirming their rights and responsibilities.

There is no doubt that a more structured control system, providing among other things for the registration of all firearms, will help make this country a safer and more peaceful place to be for all of us. Indeed, weapons are dangerous and there is a need to legislate in this respect. The Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada is on the right track with Bill C–68. However, I firmly believe, as stated previously, that this bill does not go far enough and that the minister should use coroner Anne–Marie David's report, released on January 26, as a model.

As Ms. David suggested, has the time not come to revise the wording of regulations concerning the safe storage, display and transportation of firearms so as to make it more easily accessible to all? While ignorance of the law is no excuse, is it not the justice minister's role to make it easier to understand? Time has come to review regulations and require businesses to lock up, and even render inoperative, any firearm for sale.

Also, restricted firearms should only be stored in a vault. These regulations should not authorize weapons without a safety locking mechanism to be delivered to anyone. I would even add that the Minister of Justice should amend the Criminal Code to provide that firearms will systematically be confiscated if regulations are not complied with.

Instead of spending millions of dollars on useless bodies such as the one on Canadian unity, should the government not invest these moneys in education and information programs for the public at large and for specific groups such as hunters, gun collectors, members of shooting clubs and others?

Several provisions in this bill need to be clarified. By spreading over an eight–year period the registration process for gun owners and firearms, did the Minister of Justice simply give in to the gun lobby, or did he want to please some members of his caucus? I am sceptical as to the deterring effect of such a reform.

The gun lobby encourages people to buy arms to protect themselves. Yet, it is proven that people are safer when they are not armed. A firearm kept in a house is 43 times more likely to kill a member of that household than an intruder. Why wait eight years, considering that a homicide is three times more likely to be committed in a home where a firearm is kept, while a suicide is five times more likely to occur?

Canadians, health specialists and particularly crime prevention experts all ask, and rightly so, for greater control over firearms. In Canada, 42 per cent of women killed by their spouse are shot, four times out of five with a gun or a rifle. Moreover, 78 per cent of these firearms are legally owned. Again, I ask the question: Why spread the whole registration process over an eight–year period? I am convinced that, as elected representatives of the public, we could help save human lives simply by reducing as much as possible that registration period.

Is it really reasonable to allow 13,000 military–type automatic weapons in the country, considering that such firearms are designed for rapid fire in a combat situation?

More than 560,000 Quebecers and Canadians signed a petition asking that military–type weapons be banned. Yet, the new legislation allows gun collectors to own such firearms. Why? Why this fixation about firearms?

According to a recent survey, 84 per cent of Canadians, including 71 per cent of gun owners, support a ban on military weapons. Again, I find it unacceptable to make it perfectly legal for the owners of these 13,000 firearms to keep such weapons.

We need a more rigid form of gun control.

• (1310)

In my opinion, current legislation is inadequate, and Bill C–68 still does not go far enough, both in terms of its restrictions, as well as its deterring and punitive effects. It is our role to protect members of the public, often against their wishes.

[English]

Ms. Hedy Fry (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Health, Lib.): Madam Speaker, not only is it an honour for me to speak to the bill, I am enthusiastic and I would like to applaud something that is long overdue. The bill addresses the health and safety of Canadians. As Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Health, health and safety are extremely important to me.

Guns threaten, guns injure, and guns kill. I understand that guns are an important component of life in many parts of Canada: for hunters who live in isolated parts of the country and for people who play some competitive sports. Guns are also very important to the tourism industry.

The bill is not intended to harm that group of people or to stop any sport or tourism or person who wants to hunt in any sporting way. The bill is something most responsible gun owners would support. The firearms act seeks to bring into line those people who by their irresponsible use of firearms create a bad name for law–abiding gun owners, which is why the bill is supported by 68 per cent of gun owners. Those who operate within the law and act responsibly in storing and using their guns see nothing to fear in the bill.

The Canadian Centre for Justice Statistics and the Department of Justice have compiled a lot of startling data on the issue of guns. I bring them to the attention of the House today because they are what frightens me about the whole issue. Firearms cause suicide. Some 1,100 suicides a year are committed with guns, which means that 78 per cent of firearm deaths are suicides. In 1990, 300 of the suicides were committed by 15 to 25–year–old youths. People who commit suicide with a gun have a 92 per cent success rate, compared with only 35 per cent if other means are used.

As a physician and a mother this is totally unacceptable to me. It is alarming and it is sad. I know as many health and social workers know that suicide attempts by young people are often only a cry for help by very desperate and frightened youth. As a physician I have treated many of those desperate and frightened youth who would not be alive today if they had access to guns.

Firearms not only decimate our youth but firearms create other household tragedies. Firearms victimize women. Over 40 per cent of women killed by their husbands each year are shot. Every six days a woman is shot to death in Canada in her own home by a legally owned gun.

In March 1992 the Department of Justice showed that 78.3 per cent of domestic homicides in Canada involving the use of firearms were by legally owned guns. I stress that they were legally owned guns. We know that domestic violence is endemic in society but firearms transform violence into murder. One fit of anger, one violent rage combined with access to a gun, can result in a dead woman.

These are not the only disturbing statistics about violence with firearms against women. In 1993, 75 per cent of female victims were killed in a private residence; 85 per cent of the guns used to kill women were specifically rifles and shotguns; and 82 per cent of the rifles and shotguns were legally owned at the time of the shooting.

Is this the type of society we want to maintain, where women and children are not safe in their own homes? Is this the freedom espoused by those who oppose the bill? Is there any freedom at the end of a gun? I would argue that there is not.

Deaths by firearms are preventable deaths. Injuries by firearms cost our public health care system millions of dollars a year. Over 1,000 firearm related deaths and injuries are treated in Canadian hospitals each year. The cost of this is estimated between $15 million to $30 million per year. Therefore in my book firearms present a major health hazard; in the book of anyone interested in public health and safety. Even if the value of human life lost is not very important to the members of the third party, I am sure that the cost to the health care system might make them think twice because it is enormous. I believe $30 million a year is enormous. They did not factor into their recent budget the cost of firearms related injuries to the health care system.

One of the things that alarms me about firearms is that at the moment we do not have any data on the number of firearms in this country. Anyone who knows anything about public health will know data gathering is extremely important in preventive measures in health. The epidemiology of any disease or any health hazard, whether it be a virus, a bacteria, a poor sewage system or a gun depends on the amount of data we have.

There are very limited data right now on guns. We do not know exactly how many guns are in Canada. The gun lobby says there are 22 million. The Department of Justices says there are six million. It profoundly disturbs me that we have no real figures to answer this question. We know how many bicycles, how many cars and how many dogs there are but we do not know how many firearms there are. This is completely unacceptable.

This act will give us the database we need to take the preventive health measures we need to make this a safe and healthy society. By mandatory registration we will take the guns out of the closets and put them where we can find out exactly how many there are.

When police are called to an incident in a home they will know if they are walking into a risk or not. When police try to go to homes where there is domestic violence they will know whether they have to remove a gun because the woman in that house is in danger. Guns are lethal weapons and so it makes sense to have them registered, traceable and retrievable by our police forces in the case of use or abuse.

Some of my constituents have questioned the potential costs of this registration. I can understand that in a time of fiscal control we do not want to incur costs to the government. However, the justice minister tells us it will cost $85 million over seven years to register these guns.

To the members of the third party, I do not believe $85 million over seven years is too much money to spend on saving lives and decreasing disability, especially when balanced against the savings to the health care system. I hope even the members of the third party can figure out the mathematics of that simple equation.

Another concern raised by my constituents was they would be restricted from using firearms in the film industry, a major industry in British Columbia. I am pleased to say they can rest assured this new bill will not prohibit that.

Some other members of my community are concerned because they will not be able to export their replica firearms or that the investment value of their antique firearms will be decreased. Article 22 of this bill provides for the transfer, that is the sale, barter or donation of firearms, to persons who hold licences to acquire and possess that particular class of firearm. Their collections will not be devalued or frozen because they can continue to trade and sell their firearms with people who have the same type of firearms.

More important, in a democracy we must follow the will of the people. The majority of Canadians, 86 per cent of all respondents to a recent Angus Reid poll, said they support strong gun control measures, 68 per cent of whom are firearm owners. Eighty–four per cent of respondents support a total ban on military weapons, 71 per cent of whom are gun owners. Seventy–one per cent of Canadians support a ban on handguns, 54 per cent of whom are gun owners. It is clear Canadians everywhere think gun control is very important.

People talk a lot about the right to bear firearms. Nowhere is this in the Canadian Constitution. The responsibility to store, register and use firearms reasonably and safely is incumbent upon anyone who feels it is their right to own a gun.

Peace, order and good government are what the Canadian Constitution is all about and what Canada stands for. With this bill we will ensure that we continue to have peace, order and good government and that a cause of death and disability will be removed.

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague for his amendment to this bill. It is too bad the other members of the House are not knowledgeable enough about what we are talking about to address the splitting of this bill. I have not heard anything in that direction since it was announced over an hour ago that this is what we were supposed to be speaking about.

There comes a time during every government when those creating the legislation must face up to the reality of an issue and not the politics of an issue. This is one of those times.

The justice minister has tabled what he terms a firearm control measure, Bill C–68. Unfortunately this bill goes far beyond control and borders on the unreal. Realism in any bill means that the goals and the attentions of the proposed legislation are within guidelines established by and for the people governed by democratic values.

This bill allows neither governing by nor for the people. It certainly is not democratic in values or purpose. This bill seeks to be all things desired by a select group of individuals and special interests and removes democratic choice and ultimately democracy from law–abiding citizens who choose to hold private property deemed by the few and select to be tainted goods.

Instead of attacking the problems of criminal intent, this bill attacks the rights of peace loving and law–abiding citizens who safely use and own property without concern for due process and democratic values.

That is why this bill must be split. There are two paths in this bill. One addresses the need for safety and security of the person. It binds the law–abiding people of this land together, a path that mandates the state to protect its citizens from the ravages of those who believe power is purchased with violent, threatening and immoral means. No Canadian will have a problem travelling this roadway.

However, this bill also has another path, one of control demanded by the anointed few who have hoodwinked this government. They have blinded it with dreams of power by demanding it place them above the freedom of Canadians to choose.

This second path gives the power of right and wrong, good and evil to the few who believe those not accepting their mandate or their way are the criminals. To the select few, those who are law–abiding, hard working, family oriented, loving and caring but who choose to purchase and own a rifle or shotgun cannot be trusted, say the few, and will turn into immoral and radical outlaws.

This bill offers strict, swift and sure punishment for those who break our laws or who threaten to intimidate our citizens. This bill also offers dictatorial powers to the few individuals who believe theirs is the only understanding and the only truth.

This bill must be split along those thoughts so that Canadians can decide whether criminals must pay for their crimes and whether Canadians will allow the decree of the few to dictate to the many.

This can be easily done. All that is required is for this government to stand up for the principles of democracy cherished by the citizens of this land and make the decision to put the wishes of the many ahead of the demands of the few elites and special interests.

Perhaps this decision may not be as easy as stated, for all Canadians know this government only listens to the chosen social engineers and elites who continually confirm they know best.

Perhaps this government was controlled and dominated for so long by the politically correct who live and breathe and function in their ivory towers and have no inkling what really exists below their utopian vision of never–never land that it cannot choose of its own free will to place the people of Canada ahead of its favourite few chosen friends.

• (1325)

In either case, whether the government has the political will to really consult Canadians or not, Canadians will know of the lack of vision and understanding the government possesses. The justice minister saw nothing wrong with the extraordinary order in council powers this bill would give his cronies.

The members of this party are so blinded by false polls and false idols of power promised by special interests that they are overlooking the clauses and language in this bill that create an all powerful super structure of select dictatorship within their own government.

The members of this government who publicly state they support this bill are telling their constituents in private they will not vote for this bill. That is another reason why this bill must be split.

This bill is causing constituents to lose faith in politicians. Canadians want accountability from their members and this bill will only weaken further the faith of constituents. Constituents have had enough the two tailed explanations offered by Liberal members.

Splitting this bill will allow those deserving the wrath of taxpaying Canadians—criminals who believe power does come from the barrel of a gun—to be quickly shown that power comes from the will of the people.

At the same time it will give those members opposite the opportunity to fully explain the other portions of this bill which the members opposite have no doubt been instructed not to mention to voters.

Why is it every time we on this side of the House mention rifles and shotguns those on that side of the House speak of handguns? My guess is that many voters do not know that Canada currently has the toughest regulations regarding registration, ownership and purchase of handguns of any country.

The government knows many Canadians accept the ponderings that handguns are on the same scale as rifles and shotguns from their members when those same Liberals know that current regulations concerning handguns require police investigation, mental fitness exams and questioning associates in the community to determine whether an applicant deserves handgun ownership.

These same members opposite do not state the current requirements in this House for fear Canadians will fully understand that handgun ownership is already extremely difficult. Instead they say handgun ownership in the same breath with rifles and shotguns to further dilute the truth.

Splitting this bill will allow law enforcement agencies to immediately demonstrate to violent criminals that society will not and cannot tolerate crime. Splitting this bill will allow immediate passage of the crime control clauses.

Splitting this bill will allow the removal of those sections that declare law–abiding, chosen private property owning Canadians villains. It will allow Canadians to no longer fear being classified as criminals because social engineering elites have decided that law–abiding Canadians cannot choose what is right and decent and honourable for them.

We will no doubt continue to hear words such as murder, abuse and mayhem from the members opposite in the same breath as crime control. That is acceptable as long as those words are aimed at the proper target, those who truly are criminals, those who believe that power and control from the barrel of an illegally obtained handgun is the end all and be all to their existence.

Members opposite will try to convince Canadians that family oriented, loving and caring Canadians who choose target shooting, hunting or competitive shooting as a sport are the same as hardened criminals who place Canadians in grave or mortal danger.

We all know those words are further attempts at giving the elite the means to control our society through the portions of Bill C–68 never mentioned by members of this government

We all know those members opposite are being extorted to hide the true facts about the order in council clauses of this bill. They give absolute authority to the few elite and the few among the Liberals who still believe that total control from the top is the end all and be all of their mandate and that true democracy by way of frank and open debate with those who have opposing views is and must be opposed at all costs. That might convince Canadians they have a choice, intelligence and an opinion.

In conclusion, there has been a wake–up call to politicians from all Canadians indicating to each and every one of us that they will have a voice from this day forward in what comes out of the House, and so they should. I encourage them to continue to be involved in this very contentious issue.

Mr. Paul DeVillers (Simcoe North, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate on Bill C–68, an act respecting firearms and other weapons. As is the case in many rural ridings, the legislation has elicited a great deal of interest among my constituents.

Everyone participating in the discussion should do so with the following three points in mind. First, the government promised to toughen firearms legislation during the last election campaign and was elected with a strong mandate. Second, opinion research indicates a very high level of support among Canadians for the legislative initiative. Third, firearms owners have legitimate concerns about the proposed law. If we do not work with these axioms in mind, we will not have the constructive and open debate this important issue merits.

The Minister of Justice introduced a broad set of measures intended to increase public security in Canada. While I have difficulty fully appreciating all the benefits of registering rifles and shotguns, I nonetheless support most of the provisions in the bill.

Most Canadians, even the most sceptical, would admit there is some good in the legislation.

However, this debate is about how we can improve this bill even more, to make it acceptable to a larger number of Canadians. As we saw with the GST, for instance, if a new bill is not widely accepted, it will fail to do what it is supposed to do.

During the past few months I have received hundreds of cards and many telephone calls, faxes and letters representing the two poles of this debate. I met a number of constituents personally and also attended regularly the meetings of a special firearms owners advisory committee.

Of the approximately 500 residents of Simcoe North who communicated with me on this bill, about 10 per cent supported the bill and 90 per cent were opposed. The majority of the latter group expressed their views through a mail–in campaign.

[English]

Despite the opinion research showing strong support in every region of Canada for the measures contained in Bill C–68, it is clear that large numbers of hunters, target shooters and gun collectors are very dissatisfied. As legislators I feel we should do our utmost to balance these concerns with the will of the majority of Canadians. If we can eliminate the dogmatic rhetoric emanating from those with entrenched positions on either side of the issue and debate the matter with a rational approach and an open mind, we can make important progress toward this balance.

An example of a compromise that would not water down the bill in any way but would certainly render it fair in practice and in perception is the following: Bill C–68 could be significantly improved by removing from the Criminal Code the penalties in section 91 for non–registration in cases where the contravention is not wilful, for example where there has been an oversight. This type of non–registration would be more justly dealt with under the newly created firearms act.

Penalties for wilful non–registration in section 92 could remain in the Criminal Code. This simple amendment would take nothing away from the strength of the bill but would ensure that law–abiding Canadians are not recorded as having criminal records due to an omission, oversight or ignorance of the law. In my opinion the amendment would dispel much of the concern felt by many firearm owners.

I have received a legal opinion that not only would the amendment be constitutional but it would actually improve the constitutionality of the bill. I have requested an opportunity to appear before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs to seek its support for the amendment. Barring a chance to appear before the standing committee, I propose to move a motion in the House during report stage debate.

We have all witnessed the atmosphere of suspicion and misinformation around discussions on gun control. Quite frankly, much of the problem is due to a lack of information about the repercussions of the bill. We should not be surprised that gun owners get upset when their members of Parliament are unable to answer very basic questions like: how much will it cost?

The question is a legitimate one, and I would like to be able to give a clear and precise. In the absence of detailed information, individuals and organizations that have a vested interest in giving Canadians the worst case scenario have been quick to provide their own answers to these questions, sometimes drawing alarmist conclusions that have been greatly exaggerated.

For instance, in my riding people say it will cost between $86 and $102 to register a firearm. However, the Minister of Justice figures that it will cost only $10 for up to ten firearms. If we cannot prove they are wrong, many people will think these agents of the gun lobby have absolute credibility.

[English]

The firearm debate has had a very polarizing dynamic. We have very determined firearm owners on one side and equally determined people on the other side who would rather not see guns in society. Both have legitimate and compelling concerns.

It is for this reason we as parliamentarians must try to take the middle road. Although the middle of the road approach may not satisfy extremists at either end of the spectrum, it will be satisfactory to the majority of Canadians. Canadians pride themselves as a fair and just people, but we must not forget our heritage and that even today firearms activities such as hunting, targeting shooting and collecting are important components of the Canadian identity particularly in rural areas.

The proposals embodied in the bill were introduced last November. In response to input from individual firearm owners and organizations that represent them, the legislation we are debating today contains important improvements to the original proposals. For example, owners of firearms in the restricted category will now be able to buy and sell to others in the same category. In addition to other provisions for divesting of restricted firearms, this will ensure that owners of restricted firearms will have a reasonable choice of options if they choose to retrieve their investment.

These substantial amendments to the original proposal demonstrate there is still room for compromise without undermining the basic principles of the bill. That is why I am proposing an amendment to remove from the Criminal Code the penalties in section 91 for non–registration in cases where the contravention is not wilful. The amendment will make the legislation more just and will increase the degree of compliance without reducing its impact.

In addition to universal registration, Bill C–68 contains many excellent provisions that will undoubtedly improve public safety. I cannot say that I support every aspect of the legislation without reservation, but if I had to give it a grade it would be a b plus, and that is a decent pass.

I intend to vote in favour of Bill C–68, but in respect of the legitimate concerns expressed to me by firearms owners in Simcoe North and in view of my personal reservations I am seeking remedial action in the form of the amendment I described.

Mr. Bernard St–Laurent (Manicouagan, BQ): Madam Speaker, our concerns with regard to the legislation on gun control are shared by many of my fellow Canadians. We cannot, however, remain insensitive to the statistics on the number of shooting deaths.

Firearms are involved in over one third of the homicides in Canada. Most of the homicides in the past six years were committed with shotguns or hunting rifles. In three cases out of four, a murdered wife was slain with a hunting shotgun or rifle.

Closer to home, in Quebec, between 1990 and 1992, there were 1,293 deaths attributable to shootings—an average of 425 deaths annually. Three deaths by shooting out of four, in Quebec as well, were suicides, for a total of approximately 300 suicides annually. These sombre statistics are very eloquent. They cannot therefore be ignored. It was essential to ensure a strict application of the provisions of the Criminal Code on the use of firearms. Moreover the regulations in force under the old legislation governing the acquisition, storage and transportation of firearms were incoherent and difficult to apply.

The Minister of Justice had to make them understandable and accessible to everyone. But, did he do so? Let us take the time to consider a few paragraphs.

The Bloc Quebecois favours gun control without discriminating against those who use firearms reasonably and responsibly. I gave some statistics earlier. Here are some more. A descriptive study on suicides, homicides and accidental deaths by shooting was done on a data base available in the files of the coroner. For example, a number of files were examined by the Quebec coroner. The tally of deaths caused by firearms: from 1990 to 1992, 38 accidental deaths; from 1992 to 1993, 572 suicides; from 1991 to 1993, 227 homicides.

The goal of this study was to obtain information on the firearm used, its owner and the situation leading to the incident, in addition to the characteristics of the victims and the circumstances of the incident.

Thus we can see that guns are the preferred means used by people who want to end it all. Let us look at the specific aspects of this kind of death. Between 1990 and 1992, a gun was used in 26 per cent of all suicides. This percentage varies by age group. Thirty–seven per cent of all people under 20 years of age use a gun to commit suicide. In the 20 to 29 age bracket, this percentage drops to 27 per cent, and bottoms out at 25 per cent for people 30 years of age and older.

What is the age of the victim? The rate at which people 10 years of age or older use a gun to commit suicide is 5.2 per 100,000. However, we find the highest rate in the 15 to 24 age bracket, which is 7 per 100,000. Men, in a proportion of 92.7 per cent, use guns to commit suicide, compared to women who, naturally, make up the difference of 7.3 per cent.

I would like to continue by citing an interesting statistic which, unfortunately, concerns my region. The average annual suicide rate varies from 1.9 to 16.5 per 100,000 depending on the region. The rate is highest in the north of Quebec and in Abitibi.

As you can see, guns are not always put to good use in my riding. The riding of Manicouagan has a very high unemployment rate, which exceeds the average in other ridings.

Geography has somewhat isolated us from big centres, and this is an added stress weighing on residents and is also one of the contributing factors to the high suicide rate. The isolation factor should be considered in the analysis. However, this region is graced with all of nature's splendours, and, like the North Shore region, offers its residents so much untouched nature and free access to the oldest sports on earth: hunting and fishing.

As you guessed, residents of the North Shore need their guns to hunt. They can put them to a full and healthy use and they have proved this for many years.

• (1345)

With or without regulations, these people are able to make proper use of their weapons—for recreational purposes, needless to say.

Although it is important that Bill C–68 meet one of the goals established, namely gun control—no one in the Bloc Quebecois is against this—, we must be very careful not to dig too deeply into taxpayers' pockets under the pretext of exercising some control.

We must ensure, among other things, that the registration fees collected by the department are not a kind of hidden tax. The Bloc Quebecois is very wary of this.

Although we certainly agree with the principle that firearms must be better controlled and monitored, we should also be honest enough to admit that since a large number of firearms are used by suicidal people, gun control and registration will not solve the problem of suicide. Let us not forget that those who try to kill themselves with firearms may do so because they already have them in their possession; if not, the vast majority of them will simply use something else.

In closing, yes, the Bloc Quebecois is in favour of better gun control. We must, however, avoid imposing extra costs on people like those in my riding who do not need them. These people are fed up with having to pay more and more all the time.

With all its facilities designed to control the system, the department is certainly in a position to control travel costs, so that Quebec taxpayers, including those in Manicouagan, do not have to pay excessive costs.

[English]

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont, Lib.): Madam Speaker, when the Minister of Justice announced his firearms control program in November 1994 he did so after extensive consultation with individuals, groups, organizations and various government departments.

The overwhelming support of the Canadian people for the program shows that the minister listened well and responded to the concerns expressed during that consultative period. Headlines, editorials and columns in newspapers across the country almost unanimously repeat the theme "Gun control law on target".

When we look at our neighbours to the south we see a society that has enshrined in its constitution the right to bear arms. This emphasis on rugged individualism is characterized in part by the fascination with guns in the United States. Its citizens have embraced an all–pervasive, gun–toting culture.

Canadians do not share the American fascination with guns. Our society is essentially different from theirs and in an overwhelming fashion this has been communicated to the Minister of Justice. The minister has proposed legislation which is a reasonable response to the desire of Canadians to maintain a different social and cultural attitude toward guns. Canada must not slip into the gun mentality of the United States. As the minister said: "Canadians do not want to live in a society where they feel they need to own a gun for protection".

I do not believe it is possible to devise gun control legislation that will satisfy all Canadians. However, I do believe that with this legislation the minister has taken a colossal step in the right direction. He has used a two–pronged, balanced approach in attacking the public safety problem on the one side and the use of weapons in criminal activity on the other. The law will not resolve all our problems, but as a Montreal Gazette editorial stated: "It is a superb and courageous proposal for gun control. It is almost everything that anti–crime advocates could ask for".

The legislation is also a reflection of the wishes and even the demands of the Canadian people, that we toughen our laws and our positions, that we make things tougher for criminals and that we improve the level of safety in the streets and homes of our nation.

The government was given a mandate in the last election to strengthen gun control laws. The Liberal program made that promise. It is most appropriate that the Minister of Justice, with the support of Parliament, move to fulfil it.

Debate on this legislation will provide opponents with the opportunity to seek changes in the areas to which they object. However at the end of the day the will of the majority must prevail. It is most distressing to have Reform Party members indicate that they are not content to seek change but that they will flaunt the will of the majority and put themselves above the law.

It is distressing to hear statements that reflect a kind of wild frontier mentality. "I do not like the law, therefore I will break it". At this point, it is not simply a question of guns or gun control but rather a question of democracy.

The legislative proposals have been dealt with in detail by members who have spoken previously but I feel I should mention some of them again in brief. On the get tough on criminals side of the ledger, there will be a mandatory minimum sentence of four years in prison for the use of a firearm in the commission of any of 10 specific violent offences. This is not only a suitable penalty for such crimes but should also serve as a deterrent to the use of a firearm in the commission of crime.

There will be increased penalties for illegal importing and trafficking of firearms. These will be accomplished by increased border controls and surveillance measures.

On the other side of the ledger—the enhancement of public safety—there are two main items: a law applying to certain types of handguns, the restricted buying and selling of others and a national registration system for all firearms.

This registration will be administered by the RCMP in co–operation with the provinces and territories. Virtually no one has a problem with the get tough on criminals part of the legislation. If there is a criticism, it is that the mandatory sentences are not severe enough.

However when we get to the area of handguns, opposition grows. I believe that the treatment of handguns is eminently defensible. Target shooting and collecting are both legitimate exercises and adequate provisions are made for both of them in the bill. These handguns and certain other prohibited firearms are also able to be bought and sold among existing owners. On the issue of handguns, I want to include a quote from Ontario Judge Hugh Locke.

When delivering a decision involving possession of a restricted weapon, Justice Locke said: "Handguns are the scourge of the human race and their unlawful possession must be totally discouraged. Such weapons are useful for one purpose and one purpose only. They are employed to kill and maim human beings. Our society is plagued with those who feel handguns are a normal part of one's equipment. They are not".

On the subject of registration, nowhere in the legislation does it say that Canadians have to give up their guns. However it does say that Canadians must register all of their guns. Granted, registration is an inconvenience and will have a cost attached but the whole registration process allows for seven years before it is fully mandatory and the cost is minimal.

The minister recognized that the proposed legislation may not yet be in its best or final form. There are concerns about cost, about the treatment of relics and heirlooms and the legitimacy of certain types of guns. The House of Commons Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs will hold hearings so that concerns such as these may be addressed.

Opposition on the basis of slogans such as "registration today, confiscation tomorrow", promoting the idea that a tyrannical government is disarming its citizens to make it easier to suppress and oppose them is nonsense. It is fanatical nonsense and seriously diminishes the credibility of those who espouse such beliefs. When we discuss legislation of this nature, I believe it is important that we talk to the people on the front lines, the ones who live it on a daily basis.

P.E.I. is considered to be quite a peaceful society even by Canadian standards. I would like to put the following letter on the record. This letter is from Transition House and was written by Joanne Ings, executive director:

> As you are aware, the P.E.I. Transition House Association operates Anderson House, the Island's only emergency shelter for women and children seeking refuge from family violence. Since Anderson House opened in 1981, we have sheltered 1,800 women and over 2,000 children.
> The impetus for gun control legislation came from the shocking murders of women engineering students in Montreal in 1989. The P.E.I. Transition House Association has been a strong supporter of the legislation since its inception. We believe that stricter controls will save lives, particularly lives of women and children who live in violent family situations where unregistered firearms are present.
> Many of the women and children who stay at Anderson House are from rural P.E.I. and we have learned from these families that the threat of the use of firearms is a real fear. We understand that the registration of shotguns and other firearms will not stop family violence but statistics prove that registration is a deterrent and does result in fewer deaths by firearms.

If one life will be saved by the passing and proclamation of Minister Rock's legislation it will be worth it. We ask that you support this bill for the safety of women and children in violent family situations and in memory of the women of Montreal.

I believe that the sentiments expressed in this letter are those of the vast majority of Canadians. I believe that the legislation being debated is a compromise which advances the cause of public safety in the community without imposing unreasonable constraints on anyone's personal freedom.

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure today to be speaking to this motion to sever Bill C–68 because I think most members enjoy speaking to legislation that makes sense.

A very sensible approach would be to separate Bill C–68 so the House can thoroughly examine the two distinct segments. The section of Bill C–68 that deals with the criminal use of firearms is the only part of the bill that could have a significant effect on improving public safety.

However, this section of the bill, part III, will likely be ignored in public debate. Like many pieces of Liberal legislation there are aspects that are a step in the right direction. However like most government legislation, most of part III does not go far enough and some sections are actually regressive. Because part III has the pretence of being a step in the right direction it will be ignored as critics and supporters of the bill debate the merits of universal registration. I believe it is extremely important that the House thoroughly review part III and that is why this part and the other relevant sections of the bill must be reviewed separately from the registration section.

My Reform colleagues and I wholeheartedly agree with any legislation that would get tough with criminals who use firearms. Unfortunately this bill does not make the grade.

Last June I introduced a private member's bill C–260 that dealt with the criminal use of firearms. In that bill I called for the inclusion of replica firearms in section 85 of the Criminal Code. I did this because crown counsels had informed me that one of the reasons that so few section 85 charges went forward was because it is so difficult to prove that the object that was used in a crime was actually a firearm. The way the legislation has been written the crown had to prove that the object that looked like a firearm was actually a firearm.

Unless the firearm was fired during the commission of the offence or unless the criminal was arrested at the scene of a crime or immediately after in possession of a firearm it was unlikely that a conviction could be won. There was no other way the crown could prove that the object that looked like a firearm actually met the legal definitions of a firearm. Since the crown could not prove that it met the legal definition of a firearm a charge under section 85 could not be laid.

The inclusion of a replica in section 85 would fill that void. My private member's bill treated a replica the same as an actual firearm. There would be no need for the crown to prove that the object was a real firearm.

When robbery victims have what looks like a handgun shoved in their faces they are not in a position to determine if the gun was real or just a replica. The terror they felt at that moment is not mitigated if they learn later that it was just a replica. Does the inclusion of replica in Bill C–68 solve this problem? Unfortunately it does not. It is that ever so typical Liberal small step in the right direction. Someone who uses a replica firearm during—

COMMONWEALTH DAY

Mr. Gurbax Singh Malhi (Bramalea—Gore—Malton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to rise in the House today to draw the attention of my hon. colleagues to the importance of Commonwealth Day. The theme of Commonwealth Day 1995 is tolerance.

The Commonwealth stands as a symbol of international co–operation and as a model for all nations of the globe to work in friendship promoting diversity and harmony through tolerance.

Our nation has benefited greatly from its membership in the Commonwealth and in turn Canada has lent its strong support to this venerable institution.

TRAGEDY IN BLANC–SABLON

Mr. Bernard St–Laurent (Manicouagan, BQ): Mr. Speaker, first of all, on behalf of the Bloc Quebecois, I wish to extend our sympathies to the families affected by the tragedy that struck Blanc–Sablon, in my riding of Manicouagan, on Friday.

At two o'clock Friday morning, tonnes of snow came tumbling down the mountain to devastate the tiny North Shore village of Blanc–Sablon. A father and his son were killed. It is a miracle that the mother, who was buried under the snow for hours, survived. Had it not been for the outstanding courage of local residents, who defied extreme cold and winds of over 100 kilometres per hour, the toll could have been even worse.

Again, this goes to show that, in Quebec, there are exceptional people prepared to face exceptional circumstances, and the Bloc Quebecois salutes the extraordinary solidarity displayed on this occasion.

ELVIS STOJKO

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today to congratulate Elvis Stojko on winning his second world figure skating championship.

Elvis displayed unbelievable athletic ability, the grace of a true champion and the humility of a real sportsman. Residents of Barrie in my riding are especially proud as Elvis trains at the Mariposa Figure Skating School under coach Doug Lee. We all have something to be proud of in this young man as he demonstrates the spirit and rich culture of Canada, something our Secretary of State for Multiculturalism would do well to note.

Elvis Stojko, Brian Orser and Kirk Browning, all Canadian and all world champions have placed Canada number one in the world, seven in the last nine years and the tradition continues.

I am sure all members will join with me in paying tribute to this outstanding young Canadian.

UNITED STATES BORDER CROSSING FEE

Mr. John Maloney (Erie, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to express my grave concerns on President Clinton's budget proposals to charge a $3 per vehicle and $1.50 per pedestrian border crossing fee to enter the United States. The proposal has not been withdrawn as we were led to believe but has been altered to put undue pressure on U.S. border communities to encourage implementation.

These proposed fees violate the spirit and intent of the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement and NAFTA. These proposed fees would stifle economic development and economic integration of communities and regions on both sides of the border to the detriment of us all.

These proposed fees would seriously discourage tourism and open travel between our respective countries. They would hamper visitation between families who in a literal sense straddle the border.

These fees are questionable economics and questionable diplomacy in an era of increased trade and goodwill with our friendly neighbour to the south.

I strongly urge the Prime Minister to advise the President of our strongest objection to this unwise, counterproductive and unacceptable tax.

Retaliation is not an answer. Friends do not treat each other this way. Withdrawal of the proposed fees is the only solution. The constituents of Erie riding, of the Niagara peninsula and indeed of the whole country deserve and demand nothing less.

TAXPAYERS BILL OF RIGHTS

Mr. Alex Shepherd (Durham, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to inform the House of my private member's initiative which I have called the taxpayers bill of rights and is currently being drafted.

Summaries of this legislation have been submitted to professional bodies and interest groups across Canada. I would like to thank them for their comments and suggestions. People from British Columbia all the way to Newfoundland have written to me and expressed their support for this initiative.

Greater financial accountability for existing and future programs, the protection of taxpayers from the onerous powers of collection authorities and the establishment of a taxpayers' ombudsman are part of this bill.

Finally and most important, it establishes a cap on the amount of taxation an individual can be subjected to and it provides for refunds over this threshold amount. A gradual reduction of thresholds by 1 per cent per year over the next 15 years will give taxpayers the assurance that we have put limits on the tax grab on disposable incomes.

INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Quebec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, March 8 was a perfect opportunity to remember that, over the years, Quebec and Canadian women have made great progress in their efforts to reach equality. All women should be pleased with the progress made, and we should take the means available to us.

I want to salute every woman who quietly goes about her task but whose contribution is essential to our common well–being. I also thank the pioneers and those who played, and continue to play, an active role in women's organizations, so as to ensure better conditions for their fellow women.

Finally, I want to express my solidarity and my admiration to all the women, in many countries, who fight to have their most fundamental rights respected. To those women, I wish to send a message of courage and hope.

ALAN WINTER

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have been asked by a British member of Parliament to raise the Alan Winter case in this House.

Alan Winter was a school trustee in British Columbia who ran a government funded foster home. He was declared a dangerous offender and sentenced to 16 years, yet was released only five and one–half years later on agreement that he leave Canada.

British MP John Denham was outraged to learn recently that this child molester who faced 28 sexual assault charges in 1987 was now living in his riding of Southampton. Mr. Denham writes:

> People in Southampton were appalled to learn that he has served only a small part of a lengthy sentence for appalling acts against children. They were equally concerned to learn those agencies responsible for child protection had no knowledge of his presence in the city.
> I would be grateful if you could make every effort to raise my concerns and those of my constituents in the Canadian Parliament. I believe that if Mr. Winter was not fit to be released into Canadian society he was not fit for release into my country either.

CHICKEN INDUSTRY

Mr. John Murphy (Annapolis Valley—Hants, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Atlantic Canada's chicken industry is in a period of transition. Close to 90 per cent of the province's chicken production comes from my riding of Annapolis Valley—Hants.

In Nova Scotia we have an active and resilient industry that has chosen not to sit still. For example, in my riding much work is being done to capitalize on opportunities in the value–added sector. However, we are grappling with a number of important and potentially divisive issues.

We need to determine how to maintain fair prices for producers and processors. We need to resolve trade concerns with the U.S. relating to the GATT and NAFTA. All provinces must pull together and work in co–operation in order to enhance our national position.

I urge all affected participants, including the federal government, to strive toward achieving a stronger domestic chicken industry. At the end of the day we will all benefit from an industry that works in co–operation and is solid in all regions.

ORDER OF CANADA

Mr. Morris Bodnar (Saskatoon—Dundurn, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of the House the accomplishments of Peggy McKercher and Dr. Louis Horlick of Saskatoon who received the Order of Canada on Wednesday, March 1.

Peggy McKercher was made a member of the Order of Canada for her voluntary service to the residents of Saskatoon. She has spent many hours volunteering for many organizations, including the Meewasin Valley Authority of which she has been chair since its inception. Under her leadership Meewasin has created one of the most beautiful riverfront areas in Canada and has established Wanuskewin Heritage Park which is world recognized for its historical and archaeological importance.

Dr. Louis Horlick was promoted to officer of the Order of Canada. Dr. Horlick, a cardiologist at Royal University Hospital and Professor Emeritus of Medicine at the University of Saskatchewan, is well known for his advocacy in the area of community health and cardiac care. He is respected by students and colleagues alike as an inspiring teacher. As a researcher he has made many contributions to the science of cardiac care.

Let us all take the example of Dr. Horlick and Mrs. McKercher to heart. Their dedication to the community, the fellow citizens of Saskatoon, Saskatchewan and to raising the standard of quality of life that we as—

NATIONAL CURLING CHAMPIONSHIPS

Mr. Reg Alcock (Winnipeg South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, every day is a wonderful day to be from Manitoba and today is no exception. Yesterday, Manitoba completed a clean sweep of all national curling championships.

Our junior rinks skipped by Chris Galbraith and Kelly MacKenzie are men's and women's junior champions. Connie Laliberte from my home club won the Scott Tournament of Hearts. Yesterday, the team of Kerry Burtnyk, Jeff Ryan, Rob Meakin, Keith Fenton and Denis Fillion won the Labatt Brier.

I know that all members of this House wish they were from Manitoba. I know they will all join me in wishing Kerry's team the very best of luck in the World Curling Championships to be held in Brandon, Manitoba.

INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

Mrs. Eleni Bakopanos (Saint–Denis, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, last week, I celebrated International Women's Day with a breakfast for representatives of local organizations working with women in my riding.

• (1410)

The riding of Saint–Denis is very lucky to be able to count on such high quality services from these organizations. Women in poverty, dealing with violence in the home or recently arrived in Canada are some of those they serve.

I take this opportunity to draw attention to the fine work done by these organizations and encourage them to continue their efforts.

Canadians only stand to benefit from the full contribution of women in our society. This struggle for equality does not seek to condemn men but to work with them in creating, as our slogan for this year says, a world of equality.

There is still a way to go before equality is achieved, but women's voices are being heard; we cannot ignore them any longer. One day, equality will become reality.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Jean H. Leroux (Shefford, BQ): Mr. Speaker, this year, Quebec will experience a shortfall of $118 million in unemployment insurance.

In the past, federalists sang the praises of Canadian federalism saying that Quebec was a net beneficiary of the unemployment insurance program. The fact is that Quebec's rate of unemployment under the federal scheme is systematically higher than Canada's. This is what we get out of federalism.

The government in Ottawa is hindering job creation in Quebec, in particular, by putting only 15.9 per cent of its investments there, although 23 per cent of its revenues come from there.

Not only did the latest budget hinder job creation by precluding the transfer to Quebec of full powers in manpower training, but it proposed no active job creation measures.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this morning Canadians read about a woman who came to Canada from the United States and then claimed refugee status. She was turned down and removed back to the U.S. until she could get a taxpayer funded legal aid assisted appeal.

The initial hearing stage took so long that the claimant now has a two and one–half year old daughter born in Canada who is a Canadian citizen. This child will have to remain in Canada while her mother is removed to the U.S.

The Reform Party would never have allowed this travesty to occur. We would not accept refugee claimants from the United States. We would not allow claims to go on and on for two and one–half years. We would not allow children born of illegal immigrants to automatically acquire Canadian citizenship.

The minister calls our proposals hard hearted. In fact, these measures would have prevented this latest immigration outrage and would have saved taxpayers tens of thousands of dollars. If this government had the interests of genuine refugees and taxpayers at heart, it would adopt our proposals and stop a system that encourages abuse.

SKATING COACH HAROLD SHER

Mr. Andy Mitchell (Parry Sound—Muskoka, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today to pay tribute to one of my constituents, Mr. Harold Sher. Mr. Sher has been a precision skating coach in my riding for the past 15 years. His most recent competition epitomizes the success he has enjoyed.

Sher's four teams from the Bracebridge figure skating club made a clean sweep of first–place finishes at the northern Ontario sectional and invitational competition held last month. The four teams came away with eight gold medals. This outstanding success qualifies the teams for the Canadian championships to be held in Calgary later this spring. Last year his adult team, the Muskoka Blades, won silver at this championship, while his junior blades won gold in the consolation round.

I wish Harold and all of the skaters the best of luck as they go for gold in Calgary next month.

HAVELOCK COUNTRY JAMBOREE

Mr. Peter Adams (Peterborough, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, August 10 of this year will be the first day of the sixth annual Havelock Country Jamboree. It kicks off country music week in Peterborough city and county.

The jamboree is a success story in our region. It is a showplace for musical talent. It is a boost for local businesses. It attracts thousands of tourists to and generates publicity for the Peterborough area.

Last year the jamboree helped Havelock minor hockey, St. John Ambulance, the scouts, the Terry Fox run, the March of Dimes and the local food bank.

It is great that grassroots ventures like the Havelock Country Jamboree can generate so many benefits simply by bringing pleasure to thousands of people. Our thanks to Jack Blakely and all his helpers.

FIREARMS REGISTRY

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, less than two weeks ago, on Tuesday, February 28 the Saskatchewan Legislative Assembly unanimously passed the following resolution:

> That this Assembly transcend party lines and join together in demanding the federal government immediately withdraw Bill C–68, the Firearms Act, which will effectively impose a costly and unnecessary national firearms registry that will have no effect on controlling violent crimes in Canada, and that this Assembly send an all–party delegation to make representation to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs outlining this Assembly's intense opposition to the proposed firearms registry; and further, following adoption of this motion, that Mr. Speaker forward to the federal Minister of Justice a copy of this resolution with the relevant transcripts from today's proceedings.

FISHERIES

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, turbot is the last remaining species which can be fished off the coast of Newfoundland in the wake of the scourge of overfishing on cod, ocean perch and plaice. For this reason, it is imperative that we protect turbot stocks. The official opposition, therefore, supports the government's decision to put an end to the overfishing of turbot, which led it to board the Spanish vessel Estai.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bouchard: My question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. Drawing on information gathered by inspectors who have boarded the Spanish vessel Estai, will the fisheries minister tell us whether officials from the Department of Fisheries and Oceans have found any irregularities which could be used to support Canada's position?

Hon. Brian Tobin (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the Leader of the Opposition for raising this question and for the considerable support that the Bloc Quebecois has given to the government regarding this issue.

Concerning the catches found aboard the Estai, we found that up to 70 per cent of all of the fish caught were small and immature. This is an important issue for the fishermen of Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, New Brunswick, Quebec and Prince Edward Island. This is clear. Atlantic fishermen have unanimously called on the government to take effective action.

[English]

As the Leader of the Opposition has asked, we have commenced inspection aboard the vessel. Based on the preliminary estimates, not the completed and full inspection, more than 70 per cent of all stock found aboard the vessel is very small, sexually immature fish not capable of reproduction. Some 30 per cent were less than 14 inches, 21 per cent less than 12 inches, and 22 per cent less than 9 inches. A good chunk of the fish are smaller than this pen.

The Speaker: I am going to let the hon. member conclude, but I beg him not to use any props even though it is only a fish pen.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, knowing the House has a good imagination, I can say that a healthy fishery is conducted on animals, living resources of the sea that are between 24 and 28 inches. Many of the fish being caught are smaller than the palm of my hand. That is no prop; that is my hand. This has to stop.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

• (1420)

Mr. Speaker: I will take that as a wave.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, to demonstrate the seriousness and the firmness of Canada's position, will the minister confirm that his government will not free the seized vessel before the European Union resumes negotiations with Canada, which is the condition the Union would impose on us?

[English]

Hon. Brian Tobin (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the government is proceeding today to do all things required in a very normal and appropriate way in Canadian law. That is the action we are taking today and that is the action we shall continue without fail over the hours and days ahead.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my next question is directed to the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

Could the minister tell us whether or not Canada has taken diplomatic steps to reach a peaceful resolution of the conflict with the European Union that will respect the pressing goal of protecting and conserving current stocks of turbot threatened by overfishing on the part of European ships?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is absolutely clear that the Government of Canada wishes to continue on the path of diplomacy and to explore all diplomatic avenues at our disposal, for example discussions with representatives of the European Union and, in particular, with Spain.

It is clear that our ambassador to Spain, our ambassador to the European Union and officials of my department here in Ottawa have contacted the ambassadors of the countries in the European Union to explain our position, to state quite clearly that it is our goal to conserve fish stocks and to reach an amicable agreement as soon as possible.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint-Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): Mr. Speaker, when he tabled his budget, the Minister of Finance announced that he would release later this year an old age pension reform proposal. In fact, if we follow the minister's logic, his goal of a sustainable old age pension system can only lead to a reduction in the benefits paid under the current system.

Does the Minister of Finance admit that his old age pension reform proposal, under the pretext of putting in place a sustainable system, is aimed at depriving thousands of seniors of benefits?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Not at all, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint-Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister of Finance admit that his old age pension reform proposal is aimed at making seniors poorer and replacing the current pension system with a social assistance program for seniors? Will he tell us the truth?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Not at all, Mr. Speaker. The reason why the Minister of Human Resources Development and I intend to release these documents is precisely to avoid the catastrophe the hon. member has just described.

[English]

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pursue the issue of pensions because last year the Liberal government promised that a white paper on aging would be presented to the House before last month's budget. However, like so many of the government's policy initiatives, Canadians are still waiting for the white paper. The promise has been broken.

My question is for the Prime Minister. When can Canadians expect to see this long awaited paper on aging? Will it be tabled before the government embarks on any changes to the CPP or to OAS?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there will be a paper on aging. The Minister of Human Resources Development is working on it. It is very much in line with the reform of social programs.

We said that we have to enter into negotiations with the provinces. There will be discussions with members of the House. There will be committees and eventually resolution of the problem by the House.

I can assure everybody that our goal is to make sure we maintain a very good social security system for retired people in Canada.

• (1425)

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is really no secret that the current Canada pension plan is in big trouble. The Minister of Finance stated that unless premiums are radically increased public pensions will not survive to the 21st century.

It is also no secret that when the government wants to act it can. Look how the Liberals acted to protect their own lavish pensions, for example.

My supplementary question is for the Prime Minister. What changes does the government have planned for CPP? Is it higher premiums, increasing the retirement age, or both? Canadians deserve an answer.

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as usual Canadian people will have their answers after we have had public discussions with them and with members of the House.

I hope members of the Reform Party will have good ideas about it, but I do not think they will get them from Mr. Gingrich in Washington.

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the delays are disconcerting. We were promised studies but nothing is happening. Canadians do not think the government will be able to provide adequately for their future. They want the government to give them the tools to care for themselves.

Before the ink was even dry on the last budget the government is again floating the idea of taxing RRSPs. Canadians are worried and confused about how they should provide for their retirement security.

Simply, will the government consider replacing CPP with an RRSP style program that gives Canadians more control over their economic future?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I see the problem of the Reform Party. It is trying to build up some straw bonhomme, as we say in English, to shoot at.

Our social programs will be reviewed thoroughly with the participation of all members of the House of Commons. Unfortunately members of the Reform Party will not do a lot to make sure the poorest in society are protected. They will make sure the rich do very well.

SOCIAL PROGRAM REFORM

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development.

Now that the federal government has announced its decisions concerning social program reform, the Quebec government is requesting that a federal–provincial conference of ministers responsible for manpower be held as soon as possible to discuss the consequences of the federal measures announced, in particular the reduction in transfer payments.

Does the Minister of Human Resources Development intend to call as soon as possible this spring a conference on the impact of his social program reform, as requested by Quebec?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I am very pleased to see that the Quebec government has finally decided to participate in federal–provincial discussions on social security. I think that it is a step towards resolving several problems with the social safety net. I hope that the hon. members of the Bloc Quebecois will now follow the lead of their Quebec colleagues and show the same spirit of co–operation as the Quebec government.

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out to the minister that the last federal–provincial conference on this issue was scheduled for April 18 and that the previous government was in power at the time.

Here is my supplementary. Will the minister finally agree to comply with the Quebec National Assembly's unanimous resolution, made on April 14, 1994, to abide by the unanimous consensus among all stakeholders that Quebec has to have exclusive jurisdiction over manpower training?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as I have said many times in the House, we have already put forward an offer to all provinces for a new rationalization of our manpower training programs. Several provinces have indicated an interest in responding. We have already signed an agreement with the province of Saskatchewan. We are well into negotiations with several other provinces.

With the new found interest of the Government of Quebec in working with us on social security reform, I would hope we could have serious discussions. I would be more than happy to sit down today with Madam Harel and the Government of Quebec to discuss exactly that.

TAXATION

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, at the world summit on social development in Copenhagen last Thursday the minister of human resources spoke about his government slapping a tax on automatic teller machine use and an electronic information tax. Is the minister prepared to pop this trial balloon right now?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, at this very important conference of 190 countries both government officials and NGOs were discussing how we could come to grips with the questions of unemployment and poverty. One of the most serious issues was how to deal with the rapid rise of currency speculation where a trillion dollars passes boundaries every single day; 80 per cent of it is pure speculation.

One of the areas discussed was how we could provide deterrence to that kind of large scale disruption of financial markets, disruption of investment and certainly disruption of people's lives. It is very strange when it appears the Reform Party is trying to defend currency speculators.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, that comment is really something else. The average person who goes to an automatic teller machine in Canada is not exactly a currency speculator.

The minister of human resources has stated on a number of occasions that the answer to our unemployment problem lies in information technologies. What does he think he is doing with comments like this? He is discouraging people who are looking at new information technology when he is talking about putting a toll gate on the information highway.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there is no question new technology provides enormous potential for growth, productivity and development. It is also equally important that as any new technology is introduced, whether it is the automobile, the steel plough or today's new technology, people are affected by it.

The question that was being examined at the Copenhagen conference was whether there can be fair distribution of the benefits, the growth and the wealth being created to ensure all people have equal opportunity for jobs, equal opportunity for a good life and equal opportunity for their children's security.

It is simply a matter of how we ensure proper distribution of benefits, something totally beyond the understanding of Reform Party members.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte–Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in its foreign policy statement, the government pledged to get closer to the objective of allocating 0.7 per cent of the GNP to foreign aid. Yet, the recent budget provides for cuts of $1.3 billion over a three–year period. The net result is that Canada will spend less than 0.29 per cent of its GNP on humanitarian assistance, thus reducing its aid to levels unseen since the sixties.

How can the Minister of Foreign Affairs justify his government's decision to reduce food aid to the poorest nations of the world, to a degree well beyond the average level of reduction announced in the last budget, while at the same time forgiving debts of $800 millions incurred by less needy countries?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is quite right as regards the need to temporarily reduce the budget allocated to international development assistance.

However, the hon. member is absolutely wrong when he concludes that food aid will be cut. Indeed, he is referring to a document which only gives a partial idea of the moneys which will be allocated to food aid, whether through the efforts of the government within multilateral organizations, or through bilateral assistance programs. I can assure the hon. member that our food aid efforts will remain very significant.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte–Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I read the budget tabled by the minister's colleague, the Minister of Finance. Are we to understand that the scope of the budget cuts affecting Canada's aid to the poorest nations of the world is the direct result of the government's new foreign policy, which gives priority to trade, at the expense of these countries?

• (1435)

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no. It is obvious that even the hon. member does not think it is the case, since he is choking while asking the question.

LABOUR

Mr. Monte Solberg (Medicine Hat, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

The current labour situation in the railways could easily lead to a national strike or railway lockout. This would have immediate and devastating effects on the Canadian economy.

When will the minister take action and introduce back to work legislation?

[Translation]

Hon. Lucienne Robillard (Minister of Labour, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, yes, the railway sector is experiencing some difficulties with labour relations. But I was delighted to learn that Canadian Pacific has reached an agreement in principle with three of its unions, which represent nearly 3,000 employees, on a wage increase, a change respecting job security and social benefits. This agreement is to be submitted to the members for ratification.

I hope that for management and labour, this will be a first step towards reaching an agreement. At this stage it is definitely premature to talk about back–to–work legislation.

[English]

Mr. Monte Solberg (Medicine Hat, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Canadian farmers took a tremendous hit in the budget and they are willing to do that if they know the government will back them up when it comes to getting their product to market.

What they would like to know is whether this government is willing to introduce back to work legislation as soon as possible to help them a little after the government has knocked the pins out from underneath them.

[Translation]

Hon. Lucienne Robillard (Minister of Labour, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we abide by the Canada Labour Code, and we are urging the parties to negotiate and reach an agreement, which does not mean we are not monitoring the situation very closely. We hope that the parties will negotiate and reach an agreement. That is the position of this government.

BLOOD SUPPLY SYSTEM

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Health.

Since she was appointed, the minister has answered all our questions about the blood system in Canada by saying we have the best system in the world. However, the facts keep challenging the minister's position on the actual quality of the system.

How can the minister claim we have the best blood supply system in the world when, in an unprecedented move, the Red Cross suspended the director of the Quebec City centre after it failed a Health Canada inspection?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first of all, Justice Krever has conducted a thorough study of our blood system. In his interim report, he said it was as safe as any system in the world.

Of course we intend to make it the safest system in the world. We did not wait for Justice Krever's report to take our responsibilities very seriously. For instance, we inspect blood centres annually, and as you can see, this suspension came as a result of one of our inspections, and the Red Cross took certain steps in this instance.

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, how can the minister claim she is doing a good job, when 15 months after she was appointed, we are still finding irregularities in Canada's blood system of such proportions that they justified suspending the director of the Quebec City centre?

[English]

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is not Health Canada that asked for the suspension of the director of the Canadian Red Cross in Quebec City. That was a decision of the Canadian Red Cross in Quebec City.

Health Canada has been doing its job in inspecting all facilities once a year. Every time it inspects a facility, it reports on any irregularities it may find and insists the Red Cross take action to correct them.

ACCESS TO INFORMATION ACT

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

Recently on the occasion of the 10th anniversary of the Access to Information Act, the information commissioner identified serious problems with the act, recommended a full review and made recommendations for amendment. In 1987 the justice committee recommended 87 amendments to the act which were never acted upon by the previous government.

I want to ask the minister if he agrees with the commissioner's recommendation and will he order a full review and update of the act?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I acknowledge the hon. member's longstanding interest in the field of information and privacy law. I assure him I am very much aware that the modernization of that law is long overdue.

The Department of Justice is already at work identifying areas where reform can be made. We are reviewing the recommendations from the "Open and Shut" report of 1987, as well as recommendations from the commissioner's most recent annual report in which he made some very good suggestions.

We are examining ways modern information technology can render more effective and less expensive the release of government information. We are also looking at ways to involve the public in consultations.

The agenda before justice is busy. I assure the hon. member and the House we will be coming forward with reforms.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Bonjan Inthavon, a Laotian gang member with a violent criminal history, has been released into the Fraser Valley area in B.C. This thug had been ordered deported. Since the minister's department unbelievably granted him convention refugee status, it is now left to the minister to follow his own legislation to protect Canadian citizens.

Will the minister show some leadership and act immediately under section 19 of the existing legislation to have this criminal removed from the country, as his own officials have already recommended?

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my department did not grant refugee status to that individual or to anybody else. That is adjudicated by the IRB.

The recommendation by our officials to remove this individual according to this section of the act has not yet arrived on my desk. The moment it does I will have no problems acting on it whatsoever.

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian people are looking for assurances in this matter. On March 1 the IRB appeal division turned down Inthavong's appeal of his deportation order and declared his removal order valid in law, citing the importance of safety and good order of Canadian society. The individual can appeal even further.

Why does the minister not follow the law that gives him the obligation to remove people who, there are reasonable grounds to believe, will engage in acts of violence or are likely to participate in organized criminal activities?

Give the Canadian people the assurance that you will act when it falls on your desk—

The Speaker: Hon. members will always remember to address the Chair.

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the member was too busy trying to figure out how to ask a question because I gave him the answer he was looking for in the first round.

I said very clearly that the file has yet to come from Vancouver to my desk. Over the weekend I asked for that file. I have considered the details and I have no problem with respect to moving on this according to that course of action.

Furthermore, I find it highly ironic that this member continues to get up on individual cases and says get tougher with some of the individuals who abuse the system and yet did not have the courage or the guts to support Bill—

The Speaker: I am sure no hon. member would want to have their courage questioned, especially in this House. Our courage is well known.

PEACEKEEPERS

Mr. Jean–Marc Jacob (Charlesbourg, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Foreign Affairs. Following the Copenhagen summit for social development, the Croatian President agreed to the European and U.S. proposal to allow peacekeepers to stay beyond March 31, although their number will be reduced from some 15,000 to 5,000. Meanwhile, the situation in the former Yugoslavia continues to deteriorate seriously.

Given the Croatian President's agreement, does Canada intend to keep Canadian peacekeepers in the reduced contingent in Croatia after March 31?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question, which allows me to express the Canadian government's satisfaction with President Tudjman's decision.

Certainly, we have always felt that, in order to keep the peace in that part of the former Yugoslavia, it was important to maintain a UN contingent to act as an intermediary between the Croats and the Serbs.

A decision as to whether or not we will continue participating in this peacekeeping operation will be made in the next few weeks. As we have done historically, we intend to consult with the opposition parties before referring the issue to cabinet.

Mr. Jean–Marc Jacob (Charlesbourg, BQ): Mr. Speaker, with regard to Bosnia, can the Minister of Foreign Affairs let us know the government's position on Bosnia, where the ceasefire is increasingly being ignored by the belligerents, some of whom have deliberately fired at the UN special envoy's plane?

[English]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we are very concerned by the evolution of the situation in Bosnia. Canada supports the Contact Group peace plan. We hope that the parties will accept this peace plan because we believe it is the only one that could lead to a peaceful solution in the former Yugoslavia.

Obviously some parties still believe that through attack and war they could enhance their position on the ground. We think this is folly. We believe that the only solution is a peaceful one, by accepting the Contact Group proposal.

JUSTICE

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, during this past week in Alberta three more women, one of whom happens to be a former student of mine, were sexually assaulted at knife point, physically beaten and totally traumatized. Two of their attackers were identified by the victims, yet the same brutal, violent perpetrators were released within hours of their arrest.

My question is for the Minister of Justice. When will the minister enact legislation necessary to prevent fully identified brutal rapists from being let back on to the streets?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will not comment on the facts of the specific cases to which the hon. member has referred. I will assure him that the Criminal Code and its provisions in respect of bail, imprisonment, and parole entirely takes into account the need to protect society.

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, that is about as comforting as nothing. I have never in my life believed for a moment that a person could rape and hold a victim at knife point, be arrested at breakfast and be let out by lunch. What kind of justice is that?

When will the minister at least instruct his department to not allow bail for violent rapists?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member would allow fact and analysis to overcome emotion and politics, then perhaps he would focus on the responsibility for prosecution in the province of Alberta.

Mr. Thompson: Have a knife held at your throat and see what emotion you have.

Mr. Rock: It rests with the provincial Attorney General.

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, last Friday the Solicitor General announced the launch of a national flagging system to deal more effectively with high risk offenders. This announcement has been described as a significant move in the right direction.

• (1450)

Can the Solicitor General tell us who will use this system and how will it help protect our communities?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we look forward to this system being used by crown attorneys across the country. It will enable them to have all relevant information about potential high risk dangerous offenders at the time of prosecution.

Therefore it will help them to develop appropriate strategy for charging and prosecution, particularly for bringing dangerous offender applications at the time of prosecution. If the court accepts such an application the offender will be incarcerated indefinitely.

I believe this will certainly add to the protection of our communities.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is about international money speculators and the newly emerging group of global gamblers.

My question refers to comments made by the Minister of Human Resources Development. We were encouraged when he said that in an effort to raise funds to help laid off workers, single parents and young people to find work, the government is contemplating a tax on financial transfers.

My question is for the Minister of Finance. When will he release the details that he plans to take to the summit in Halifax on this new tax proposal?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as the member knows, the Tobin tax, named after the person who originally formulated it, has been around for quite some time. It is an idea that has been widely debated. It is one that would require some support from all of the industrialized countries to make sure that it is put into effect.

As to the agenda for the upcoming meeting, the Prime Minister will be making that information available in due course.

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops, NDP): Mr. Speaker, we hope to hear whether the government intends to put it on the agenda.

My supplementary question also refers to comments made by the Minister of Human Resources Development. He indicated at the UN summit on social development that the problems of Canadian child poverty are a direct result of a lack of a national child care program, similar to that found in Sweden.

The child care program was not mentioned in the budget. Could the Minister of Finance give us some indication what the government plans to do now to initiate and develop this promise that was made in the red book.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member for Kamloops would look carefully at the budget papers, he would see that we have put together what we call the human resources investment fund. It is a way of replacing many of the old programs of the previous government and includes a commitment to child care.

I can report to the hon. member that we have already started discussions with the aboriginal community to begin dealing with development of child care spaces on reserves. We have made an open offer to the provinces to have a similar discussion with them when they are ready to talk with us about it.

We still plan to continue to meet our red book commitment on child care.

MIL DAVIE SHIPYARDS

Mr. Pierre de Savoye (Portneuf, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry.

It will be remembered that Ottawa had agreed to approve the recovery plan of the last shipyard in Quebec on the condition that MIL Davie workers sign a new work agreement. Well, this condition has now been met, since a new work agreement was approved yesterday.

Now that the workers have signed a new work agreement with MIL Davie, does the federal government intend to live up to its part of the deal concerning the shipyard's recovery plan and help to modernize its infrastructure?

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the decision made by MIL Davie workers certainly was a positive first step towards accomplishing what needs to be done, which we are all concerned about. We have indicated on several occasions that we are not prepared to grant massive assistance to any company.

Mr. Pierre de Savoye (Portneuf, BQ): Mr. Speaker, am I to understand that the Minister of Industry admits that he must now take his responsibilities and confirm that the federal government will participate in MIL Davie's recovery plan by putting the company in charge, as a transitional measure, of developing a multipurpose Smart Ship?

[English]

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is very interesting to hear the formulation of this question. I am sure the member knows that the shareholder of MIL Davie is the government of the province of Quebec.

• (1455)

I find it difficult to understand why the responsibility of the shareholders should not be recognized in what is essentially a commercial problem.

CANADIAN INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT AGENCY

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the budget is eliminating 45,000 public service jobs, with thousands from most departments.

Can the Minister of Foreign Affairs explain why CIDA is being cut by $300 million but is only losing a ridiculously low 11 positions out of 1,241?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I want to assure the hon. member that the cuts in personnel will be around 15 per cent.

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the government said it would be cutting executives from the top of the ministries, not from the bottom.

Can the Minister of Foreign Affairs explain why the number of senior executives who earn over $80,000 a year will be cut from 92 positions to 90 positions according to this year's estimates? Is eliminating only two positions the minister's idea of cutting from the top?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has looked at the document that has been published. I do not quarrel with him. I think the document is incomplete.

We are looking at a substantial reduction over a three–year period. As this is completed, taking into account the human element, he will see that the reductions will be by 15 per cent and will apply to senior officials in CIDA.

THE ATLANTIC GROUNDFISH STRATEGY

Mr. Derek Wells (South Shore, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development. There are concerns with the current TAGS appeal process. This has been acknowledged by the minister who committed a few weeks ago to quickly address the concerns of thousands of fishermen with the appeal process.

Can the minister report to the House on what concrete action he has taken to ensure that the appeals process is fair to all TAGS applicants?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member both for the question and for the interest he has shown in this very important program to help the fish workers and fisher people in Atlantic region.

As a consequence of his representations and those of the member for Burin—St. George's a few weeks ago, the minister of fisheries and I last week established an independent review panel to provide a full, impartial, arm's length review of all TAGS applications for those that feel the program has not met their needs exactly.

As announced last week, the program will be up and running by the end of the month.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to again pursue the case of Bojan Inthavong with the minister of immigration. This young thug from my community participated in the murder of a 17–year old youth. He was ordered deported and two years later had an appeal. It was dismissed. During the interim he was given refugee status.

Now I understand that a judicial review may be forthcoming. I would like the minister to explain what is the value of a judicial review after a deportation appeal has been dismissed?

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the judicial review has nothing to do with my department but it indicates there are certain individuals who flagrantly break the law and abuse the regulations.

It is precisely for that reason that we have Bill C–44. It is not the be–all–and–end–all but is one piece of legislation that tries to come to grips with individuals that abuse the refugee stream. It would allow the government to pull the individual from the refugee stream and move that individual into an immigration inquiry with subsequent deportation.

This side of the House not only wants to protect legitimate refugee claimants but also wants to rid the system of those who fraudulently abuse the system, making it worse for those who are legitimate.

Why does the Reform Party not support Bill C–44?

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Laurent Lavigne (Beauharnois—Salaberry, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence.

Last week, we learned that Charles Scott, an individual who openly admits to being a white supremacist, teaches hand to hand combat to soldiers of the Canadian Forces.

• (1500)

How can the minister of defence justify that an acknowledged racist trains Canadian soldiers on a voluntary basis, and does the minister endorse the comments made by Major Doug Martin, who does not see any problem since that individual is not paid for his work?

[English]

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this occurred in 1992 at CFB Chilliwack and involved the reserve forces.

A former British commando was brought in for instruction. He happened to bring someone else along. Neither was paid by the Department of National Defence and the kind of instruction that was given to those young men was not in conformity with the normal training of the armed forces.

I have asked our officials to look into why the commanding officer at the time did not report what was obviously some behaviour that was not ordered by the military and not paid for by the armed forces.

PRIVILEGE

BUDGET SECRECY

The Speaker: On Friday before we broke, the hon. member for Sherbrooke brought up a question of privilege.

At that time the Chair said we would wait to make a decision until we heard from the member who had allegedly made certain comments.

I have received notice in writing that the hon. member for Guelph—Wellington would like to speak to this question of privilege.

Mrs. Brenda Chamberlain (Guelph—Wellington, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to respond to a question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Sherbrooke on March 3, 1995.

On March 2, I was contacted by the chief government whip. He informed me that a possible question of privilege could be raised in the House. Following the conversation, I prepared a written statement for the chief government whip and for all members of the House of Commons.

This statement was put on the record by the government whip on March 3 and I thank him. The Hill Times column discussed at length by the hon. member for Sherbrooke on March 3, 1995 contains a quote by me regarding the budget.

In my comments to the Hill Times I was referring to the measures announced by the President of the Treasury Board on February 21, 1995. These measures were presented publicly prior to the budget and resulted from concerns as expressed by members of all parties, including the Liberal caucus, for the future downsizing of the public service.

The number of public servant reductions was not known until the budget, although measures such as the early retirement incentive and the early departure incentive were announced earlier.

While never informed of the details, we were told the budget would be tough but fair. I was not privy to any confidential information, nor am I aware of any other member's having knowledge of the contents of the budget before it was presented to all Canadians.

We know the importance of budget secrecy. It is a tradition, respected and practised by the Minister of Finance. I appreciate the opportunity to provide my response to the question of privilege raised the previous sitting day.

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it would be valuable for the entire House to have clarified in the question of privilege whether the article as reported in the Hill Times is inaccurate. The heading says: "Is there too much secrecy surrounding the budget?" The member did respond to that.

The quotation talks about major cuts to programs rather than a downsizing of the civil service which was announced prior to the budget in a general way.

There are some specifics quoted in this paper that were not responded to by the member. This House deserves a more clear response. Either this is wrong or else the member is not clear in her response.

• (1505)

The Speaker: I have had the opportunity to reread Hansard of Friday, March 3. I will be seeing the television recordings later this afternoon.

I will reserve my decision now that the hon. member for Guelph—Wellington has explained what she said. I will come back to the House with a decision at the earliest possible time if necessary.

COMMONWEALTH DAY

Hon. Christine Stewart (Secretary of State (Latin America and Africa), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today is Commonwealth Day, observed every year on the second Monday in March by all its member countries to celebrate the Commonwealth, its value and principles.

Built on common traditions, the Commonwealth successfully demonstrates the continuing importance of multilateral co–operation. Its strength is unity with diversity.

The Commonwealth now consists of 51 countries and 1.5 billion people of different languages, races, faiths and traditions. It serves as a forum for both governmental and non–governmental dialogue on a vast array of subjects from health and justice to youth, education and development.

Last year Canada hosted the very successful Commonwealth Games in Victoria, celebrating sport, art, culture and friendship.

Canada has been part of the Commonwealth since its inception in 1931 and takes pride in its many accomplishments. The first secretary general, Arnold Smith, a Canadian, helped strengthen the foundations on which the Commonwealth continues to stand.

Last year was a momentous year for the Commonwealth with the return of South Africa following its first free elections. The Commonwealth had pushed hard for an end to apartheid and Canada believes it should continue to act as an instrument to promote democracy and human rights.

Later this year the Commonwealth heads of government will meet in New Zealand, giving the leaders an opportunity to discuss world issues in an informal, unstructured manner. We value this opportunity to renew our relationship with other Commonwealth nations and to elaborate on Canadian foreign policy objectives.

I urge all members to join me today in saluting the Commonwealth.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean H. Leroux (Shefford, BQ): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of all the Bloc Quebecois members, I am pleased to note that today is Commonwealth Day. Last year, my colleague for Laurier—Ste–Marie had the opportunity to express, on this commemorative occasion, the importance of Canada's membership in the Commonwealth and to note that a sovereign Quebec would wish to remain a member of this organization in order to maintain and strengthen its relations with the 51 member countries.

The Secretary of State rightly noted South Africa's return to the Commonwealth. As you know, Mr. Speaker, Canada applied enormous pressure to bring about the end of apartheid.

This is therefore the time to remind the government today how regrettable it is that it decided to turn its back on the promotion of human rights and democracy, despite what the Secretary of State would have us believe, by setting a course according to its commercial interests alone, with South Africa just now having had its first free elections.

It is this same mercantilistic logic that prompted the government to cut more than $1.3 billion over three years in international aid, thus dropping its assistance to the planet's poorest people and countries to nearly 0.29 per cent of its GNP. This action confirms the government's change in course.

How can this government, which committed itself, in its statement of foreign policy, to moving closer to objectives of 0.7 per cent, justify that, within the international budget, programs intended for the most disadvantaged that are being cut more than those with a mercantilistic focus?

Are we to assume that the international aid program, which has earned Canada the profound respect of the international community, will also be based on the new Liberal policy of promoting business first and foremost? The government will definitely have some accounting to do when it participates in the next Commonwealth meetings in New Zealand. Canada must give meaning to its membership in the Commonwealth.

[English]

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy today to have the opportunity to speak on Commonwealth Day, celebrated in 51 countries around the world.

As the secretary of state mentioned, Canada has been a proud member of the Commonwealth since 1931. Over the years Canada has established a leadership role in the Commonwealth and provided an example for other countries to follow. It must therefore appear strange to our friends and partners in the Commonwealth that there are still separatists in Quebec who want to break up this great country.

I think everyone will see in the referendum this year, though, that the vast majority of Quebecers would rather stay to build a nation of prosperity and harmony than pursue their own narrow interests. With the referendum behind us a united Canada will continue to be a model for the Commonwealth ideal of unity with diversity.

Since this is Commonwealth Day it is only fair that we consider the renewal of this partnership and its institutions. As all parliamentarians now admit, Canada must do more with less. Therefore it is essential that the Commonwealth review its goals and practices to make sure that all member countries are receiving the greatest possible benefits. I trust that the minister will carry this to the meeting in New Zealand.

The Commonwealth has proven over the years the value of international co–operation through multilateral organizations. All member states can benefit through such a process. It is therefore fitting that Canada should set aside one day a year to remember Commonwealth Day.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (D), 1994–95

REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I think you will find unanimous consent for the following motion:

> That, notwithstanding the resolution of this House adopted on March 2, 1995 to refer vote 30d of the estimates of the Department of Finance to the Standing Committee on Finance, the said vote 30d of the said estimates is hereby withdrawn from the Standing Committee on Finance and referred to the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

The Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

PETITIONS

LEONARD PELTIER

Mr. Peter Adams (Peterborough, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions on a similar topic. In the first petition, with 200 signatures, the undersigned draw to the attention of the House that at the time of Leonard Peltier's extradition from Canada to the U.S. the information provided to the Canadian government regarding Mr. Peltier's case was fabricated by U.S. authorities.

Since that time new information has emerged that indicates Leonard Peltier was framed for a crime he did not commit and has spent the last 18 years in prison for. Clear evidence was suppressed, as found out under the freedom of information act. Perjury was rampant throughout the trial. Key witness Myrtle Poor Bear recanted publicly.

Therefore, the petitioners request that Parliament lobby the U.S. government for Mr. Peltier's return to Canada.

The second petition is similar. It has over 400 signatures. The petitioners request that Parliament hold an external review of the 1976 extradition hearings and that he be brought back to Canada for asylum.

Mr. Robert Bertrand (Pontiac—Gatineau—Labelle, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am presenting today a petition from Heidi Peterson of Quyon, Quebec, in my riding and 40 other petitioners requesting that Parliament oppose any amendments to the Canadian Human Rights Act or the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms that provide for the inclusion of the phrase sexual orientation.

Ms. Jean Augustine (Etobicoke—Lakeshore, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have two petitions to present.

In the first one the undersigned petitioners of Canada draw the attention of the House to the fact that the inclusion of sexual orientation in the Canadian Human Rights Act will provide certain groups with special status, rights and privileges. These special rights and privileges will be granted solely on the basis of sexual behaviour. Inclusion would infringe on the historic rights of Canadians such as freedom of religion, conscience, expression and association.

Therefore they petition Parliament to oppose any amendment to the Canadian Human Rights Act or the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms that would provide for the inclusion of the phrase sexual orientation.

The second petition is more or less in the same tone. It calls on Parliament not to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act or the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in any way that would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships or of homosexuality, including amending the Canadian Human Rights Act to include in the prohibited grounds of discrimination the undefined phrase sexual orientation.

VOICE MAIL

Mr. Gérard Asselin (Charlevoix, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to table in this House today three petitions signed by 96 residents of the riding of Charlevoix. The petitioners are opposed to the plan to use voice mail for seniors services. I would like to inform the House that I share the opinion of the petitioners.

[English]

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege today to present two petitions.

The first petition has a total of 125 signatures from Calgary area constituents calling on Parliament to reduce government spending and implement a taxpayers protection act to limit federal spending.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition has a total of 32 signatures from Calgarians who ask Parliament to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act to protect individuals from discrimination based on sexual orientation, sending a clear message of equality for everyone.

Mr. Philip Mayfield (Cariboo—Chilcotin, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present eight petitions signed by over 2,000 constituents from my riding of Cariboo—Chilcotin.

The petitioners are of the opinion that existing gun controls on law–abiding responsible firearms owners are more than enough to ensure public safety.

Therefore they call upon Parliament, first, to support laws that will severely punish all violent criminals who use weapons in the commission of a crime; second, to support new Criminal Code firearms control provisions that recognize and protect the right of law–abiding citizens to own and use recreational firearms; and, third, to support legislation that will repeal or modify existing gun control laws that have not improved public safety, or have proven not to be cost effective, or have proven to be overly complex so as to be ineffective or unenforceable. I concur with the petitioners.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

Mr. Philip Mayfield (Cariboo—Chilcotin, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I also present a petition signed by over 700 constituents from the city of Quesnel.

The petitioners pray and request that Parliament reduce government spending instead of increasing taxes and implement a taxpayers protection act to limit federal spending. The petition is presented with my concurrence.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Philip Mayfield (Cariboo—Chilcotin, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I also present a petition signed by 25 people from Quesnel.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to oppose any amendments to the Canadian Human Rights Act or the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms that provide for the inclusion of the phrase sexual orientation. The petition is presented with my concurrence.

I also present a petition from constituents in Williams Lake. The constituents request that Parliament not pass Bill C–41 with section 718.2 as presently written and in any event not include the undefined phrase sexual orientation. The petition is presented with my concurrence.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Philip Mayfield (Cariboo—Chilcotin, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I present a petition containing over 100 signatures mainly from Quesnel in my constituency of Cariboo—Chilcotin.

The petitioners pray that Parliament act immediately to extend protection to the unborn child by amending the Criminal Code to extend the same protection enjoyed by born human beings to unborn human beings. The petition is presented with my concurrence.

Mr. Philip Mayfield (Cariboo—Chilcotin, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present three petitions signed by over 250 constituents from Williams Lake, Quesnel, Horsefly, 100–Mile House, 150–Mile House and Alexis Creek.

The petitioners pray and request that Parliament reduce government spending instead of increasing taxes and implement a taxpayers protection act to limit federal spending. The petition is presented with my concurrence.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, these petitioners recognize that the majority of Canadians respect the sanctity of life. They want the government to prohibit assisted suicide. They do not want the law to be amended in any way to make suicide legal.

VIOLENCE

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I wish to present another petition in which the petitioners point out that unnecessary violence and abuse of all forms, be it verbal, physical or other, in society in general, on radio or on television has become a serious problem. They point out that it is neither necessary to inform nor to entertain.

The petitioners want government to ensure the CRTC controls these kinds of abuse and violence. They applaud some of the initiatives taken recently to modify and reduce abuse and violence on radio and television.

SENIORS

Mr. John Maloney (Erie, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I am pleased to present a petition on behalf of over 70 senior citizens from the Fort Erie area of my riding.

The petitioners ask Parliament to consider that many senior citizens have difficulty living on their current incomes. They ask that their voices and concerns be taken into account when we initiate federal policy.

The seniors ask that we as parliamentarians prevent cuts to the social benefits of senior citizens.

CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Harold Culbert (Carleton—Charlotte, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I wish to present a petition signed by some 144 constituents of Carleton—Charlotte from the Nackawic, Temperancevale, Millville, Prince William and Dumffries areas.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to request that the government disallow the defence of extreme intoxication as used recently in the courts and amend the Criminal Code accordingly.

Mr. Derek Wells (South Shore, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to table a petition signed by 520 people mostly from Lunenburg, Queens and Shelburne counties in my riding of South Shore.

The petitioners are opposed to the implementation of further gun controls, specifically registration; further restrictions on the sale of ammunition; and the restriction or prohibition of certain handguns.

They feel the legislation unfairly targets gun owners and will do little to deter the criminal use of firearms.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

Mr. Lee Morrison (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have only one petition to table pursuant to Standing Order 36. It is signed by 115 constituents mainly from the town of Assiniboia.

The petitioners pray that the government not consider further tax increases. They pray and request that Parliament reduce government spending and implement a taxpayers protection act to limit federal spending.

Unfortunately the petition is moot, the budget disaster having already happened.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Monte Solberg (Medicine Hat, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have several petitions to present today. The first one is in opposition to any move by the government to include the term sexual orientation in the Canadian Human Rights Act.

It is from petitioners ranging from Moncton, New Brunswick, to Dover, New Brunswick, to Ottawa, Ontario, and right into British Columbia. I am very proud to say that I support the petition.

Mr. Monte Solberg (Medicine Hat, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am also proud to present today a petition from the people of New Glasgow, Nova Scotia, and area who are very opposed to Bill C–68.

They wish the government to pursue other means of enforcing current firearms legislation and not to introduce new legislation that would turn law–abiding gun owners into criminals.

The Deputy Speaker: Order, please. There are so many members waiting that perhaps the member could present the others at another time in order to be fair to everybody.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, it is my duty and honour to rise in the House to present a petition, duly certified by the clerk of petitions, on behalf of 25 constituents of Galiano Island.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act to protect individuals from discrimination based on sexual orientation.

• (1525)

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present petitions from constituents of mine, people from Ottawa and all across the country.

They contain hundreds of names and call upon Parliament to act quickly to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act to prohibit discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation and to adopt all necessary measures to recognize the full equality of same sex relationships in federal law.

Mr. Stan Dromisky (Thunder Bay—Atikokan, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition from constituents of Thunder Bay—Atikokan and Thunder Bay—Nipigon requesting that Parliament not amend the Canadian Human Rights Act or the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in any way that would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships or of homosexuality, including amending the Canadian Human Rights Act to include in the prohibited grounds of discrimination the undefined phrase sexual orientation.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Stan Dromisky (Thunder Bay—Atikokan, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition requests that Parliament reinstate the VIA Rail passenger train service in Thunder Bay with appropriate connecting service throughout the country.

The petitioners pray that Parliament will view the reinstatement of VIA Rail as a positive step for the environment, economic development in the community, and the comfort and safety of its citizens. I strongly support the latter petition.

Mr. Wayne Easter (Malpeque, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I present a petition on behalf of a number of residents of P.E.I.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to desist from passing additional restrictive legislation with respect to firearms or ammunition and to direct its attention to the apprehension and adequate punishment of those who criminally misuse firearms or other deadly weapons.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have three petitions to present today. The first one is from Banff and area. It requests that sexual orientation not be included in section 718.2 of Bill C–41.

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition is from petitioners from the Strathmore area. They ask that Parliament support laws that punish all violent criminals who use weapons in the commission of crime and support code firearm provisions that protect the rights of law–abiding citizens to own recreational firearms.

The Deputy Speaker: I am sorry but there are too many people waiting.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have several petitions to present. I will lump them together.

The first petition with 474 signatures is on sexual orientation. The petitioners pray and request that Parliament not amend the Canadian Human Rights Act or the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in any way that would tend to indicate societal approval of same sexual relationships.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition on euthanasia with 309 signatures. The petitioners pray that Parliament not repeal or amend section 241 of the Criminal Code in any way and uphold the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada on September 30, 1993 to disallow assisted suicide or euthanasia.

RIGHTS OF GRANDPARENTS

Mrs. Daphne Jennings (Mission—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I present even more petitions on behalf of Canadian grandchildren to be able to see, talk with and visit their grandparents.

The petitioners ask that Parliament amend the Divorce Act to include a provision to help recognize children's access to their grandparents.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I appreciate your trying to arrange for the maximum number of members to present petitions.

Since the 15–minute rule is an arbitrary rule and we regularly alter the standing orders to meet the needs of members, could I suggest that today we do not see the clock to allow people who have been away for the past week ample opportunity to present petitions on behalf of their constituents?

The Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent not to see the clock?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: No.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have five petitions to present today. I will be brief. Two of them reflect on sexual orientation, saying that Parliament shall not include sexual orientation.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I also have two petitions asking for limitation of federal spending.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have a final petition to present that talks about deterring young people from committing crimes by changing the Young Offenders Act.

Ms. Roseanne Skoke (Central Nova, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have 20 petitions containing the same subject matter. They contain 3,300 signatures from my riding of Central Nova.

The petitioners support the ownership and responsible use of firearms. They believe that there are already adequate existing laws governing the ownership, sale, use, transportation and storage of firearms. They oppose any new firearm registry or registration fees, new costs, or any further restrictions on firearms.

They ask Parliament not to enact any new firearm registration fees, costs or any further restrictions on the ownership, sale, use, transportation or storage of firearms.

I have already placed the concerns of my constituents on record today at second reading debate.

The Deputy Speaker: Unfortunately the time to present petitions has expired.

• (1530)

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if Question No. 131 could be made an Order for Return, the return would be tabled immediately.

The Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that Question No. 131 be deemed to have been made an Order for Return?

Some hon. members: No.

[English]

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Deputy Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FIREARMS ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion that Bill C–68, an act respecting firearms and other weapons, be read the second time and referred to a committee; and of the amendment.

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I will continue my comments on Bill C–68 concerning the inclusion of replica firearms in this bill and whether it will solve the problem. Unfortunately it does not. It is just a small step in the right direction.

Someone who uses a replica firearm during the commission of an offence will now be subject to the minimum one–year consecutive sentence. In reality, this will generally be the maximum sentence as well. It is a good first move but unfortunately that is as far as this bill goes in addressing the situation.

For serious violent offences where a firearm is likely to be used such as robbery, hostage taking or sexual assault with a weapon, to get the new minimum sentence of four years the crown will still have to prove that the object used was a firearm.

In the case of a robbery there will be a witness who saw the criminal waving an object that looked like a firearm. Security cameras will show the criminal waving an object that looks like a firearm. However, unless the firearm is fired or the offender is immediately arrested, there will not be any convictions under this section. In the majority of instances the crown will still be faced with the impossible task of proving that the object met the legal definition of a firearm.

In reality, C–68 will mean that criminals who pull off robberies with real firearms will likely only get an additional one–year sentence for possession of a replica firearm during the commission of an offence as the criminal will claim the object he used was only a replica and the crown will not be able to prove otherwise. This is simply not good enough.

A second aspect of this bill that the Liberals are giving a great deal of acclaim to is the new minimum sentence of four years for any of 10 specific violent offences with a firearm.

My private member's bill called for a minimum sentence for using a firearm during the commission of an offence to be raised to five years. This sentence was to run consecutively to the sentence for the actual crime. Therefore, I suppose those of us calling for a greater minimum sentence should be happy with the minimum of four years.

In all honesty I would be satisfied if the government had introduced a minimum four–year sentence for using a firearm during the commission of an offence if this sentence had been consecutive to any sentence for the actual offence. However, this is not what the government has done. Instead it has created a combined minimum sentence of four years for both the crime and the use of a firearm.

What difference is this going to make? Not much. What about repeat offenders? Unlike section 85 which calls for an increased minimum sentence for repeat offences, there is no such increase for those criminals who repeat their violent crimes with firearms.

The amendments I would suggest are a joke. The minister's press release makes it sound like the government is getting tough on criminals who use firearms but in reality these changes will not result in increased sentences for those who use firearms. At best it will maintain the status quo. In some cases, the length of the sentence will likely decrease.

A four–year minimum sentence for manslaughter with a firearm is a joke, pure and simple. The average sentence for manslaughter is already four years. How is this minimum going to have any deterrent effect? It is not.

My private member's bill called for a minimum five–year sentence for the use of a firearm during the commission of an offence to be served consecutively to any sentence for the offence itself in a first offence and a minimum of 10 years for a second offence. The difference is very simple. Under Bill C–68 a first time armed robber will more likely serve a four–year sentence which is a decrease from the current going rate of five years. Under my bill a first time robber using a firearm would likely serve a four–year sentence for the robbery and an additional five years for using a firearm for a total of nine years.

Which one sends a greater message of condemnation of using firearms during the commission of an offence? Which one is likely to deter criminals from using firearms during the commission of an offence?

The concern I have in separating these two parts under C–68 is that part III will be left out of the discussion. It is very important to Canadians that part III, the criminal use of firearms, be dealt with separately from the national registration.

In dealing with C–41 there have been two words that have taken over the debate: sexual orientation. I would suggest that national registration is going to take over the debate of this gun control legislation and the criminal use of firearms is going to get lost in the discussion.

It is very important that we separate those two and allow for Canadians, the committee and all parliamentarians to take a close look at what this government is suggesting for maximizing the deterrence to the criminal use of firearms.

I feel it does not go far enough. We should have ample opportunity to deal with that and not just talk about the national registration program.

[Translation]

Hon. Sheila Finestone (Secretary of State (Multiculturalism) (Status of Women), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, our standard of living, our social and economic standing make us the envy of the whole world. The elevated status Canada enjoys is not a coincidence: it is the result of women and men of strong will who imprinted principles and values on our country as it grew.

[English]

If one principle has guided this House since the beginning, it is an unwavering commitment to preserve a peaceful nature in our society. At times this commitment has meant taking a stand on some very controversial issues. It has also meant introducing groundbreaking legislation such as this bill on firearms control, Bill C–68.

Controversy has never kept us from protecting the values and the ideals Canadians so rightly deserve and consider their own. These values include the rights to liberty and personal safety which are now enshrined in our charter of rights and freedoms.

In this respect, the firearms control legislation introduced by my colleague the Minister of Justice will undoubtedly make history. Every effort has been made to ensure that Canadians who use guns responsibly will be able to continue to do so.

For example, the Minister of Justice has asked the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs to consider whether or not some handguns, for example those used in target shooting competitions, should be exempted from the proposed ban. This kind of careful consideration given by the minister will help ensure that the legitimate use of firearms is permitted.

However, we all know that firearms are often used irresponsibly. This bill addresses the use of weapons and the violence they inflict on our society. It not only deals with firearms but also with the shadow of fear they cast upon all of us. In fear and in violence there are no rights and no freedoms, just victims.

Some disregard violence due to firearms because they claim it does not reflect the Canadian spirit. Indeed, Canada does not have a tradition of individuals carrying firearms for self–protection. Hopefully what one might call the gun culture that prevails in the United States will never cross our borders. Nevertheless, violence is real. Statistics can only begin to describe the pain and suffering firearms inflict on their victims.

Over the last 10 years firearms were responsible for 32 per cent of all homicides committed in Canada. Every year on average, 1,400 Canadians lose their lives to them. Of those deaths, 1,100 are suicides. Many of those lives could have been saved if firearms were not so readily available to individuals in distress.

Since 1970, 470 children have died in Canada as a result of mishandled firearms. Those figures are shocking to most Canadians. Those children deserved a future. Those children deserved the right to dream. Those children should never have been exposed to this kind of danger.

That is why firearms control and registration are so important to Canadians. Denial will shelter no one from a stray bullet. Every Canadian will benefit from this legislation.

Statistics show that Canadian women support this legislation wholeheartedly. From statistics we know that in this country every six days a woman loses her life to a bullet, most often at the hands of someone she knows. Almost always it is in her own home.

In the years between 1974 and 1992, 42 per cent of women murdered in domestic incidents were shot by their husbands. Eighty–five per cent of domestic murders with firearms are committed with either a rifle or a shotgun. Eighty–two per cent of the guns that are used to kill women are legally owned at the time of the shooting.

An hon. member: Registering them will not help.

Mrs. Finestone: If this sickening truth cannot impact on your attitudes across this floor—

The Deputy Speaker: The member is an experienced member and I would ask her to please address all of her remarks to the Chair.

Mrs. Finestone: Mr. Speaker, it is the sickening truth that firearms are the weapon of choice for men who murder their wives. I was trying to point out that my colleagues across the floor need not laugh at this moment. It is a serious moment in this debate.

In 1987 the English writer Martin Amis wrote: "Bullets cannot be recalled. They cannot be uninvented. But they can be taken out of the gun". I would add that the safest way is to take the guns away.

As a government we must introduce strong legislation to maintain the peaceful nature of our communities. This responsibility begins with the implementation of tighter firearms control laws. I unconditionally support the legislation presented by my colleague the Minister of Justice.

This bill reflects the wishes of the majority of Canadians. According to surveys, up to 70 per cent of all Canadians want stricter gun controls.

Several large national groups, such as the association of chiefs of police, have endorsed this initiative. Teachers' federations have stated that measures, like the Minister of Justice's bill, were needed to counter violence in our schools.

[English]

Nationally, women have spoken out on this issue for years. Women's organizations from across the country and from a wide variety of societal and cultural backgrounds have been calling for tougher gun control laws for a long time. They have asked for tighter restrictions and I am proud to say that we are now responding.

Perhaps the most eloquent support for this initiative and for the Minister of Justice came from Suzanne Laplante Edward who said: "I think this guy is going to go down in Canadian history. This man just wants Canada to be safer". Mr. Justice Minister, we all agree with that statement. She knows what she is fighting for. Her daughter was killed at l'École polytechnique five years ago. Since then Mrs. Laplante Edward has worked relentlessly for firearms control.

Indeed this legislation is an achievement. It is the kind of initiative that brings about positive social change and preserves our quality of life.

It takes decisive action against automatic firearms. As of January 1, 1995, 21 types of assault guns will have been prohibited. Handguns with no legitimate purpose will be prohibited.

The firearms control legislation recognizes the need for increased and more effective sanctions for the misuse of firearms.

Contrary to an observation made just a few moments ago, four years is the beginning and not the end of the term. It introduces stiff minimum penalties that will serve as true deterrents. For the first time, mandatory minimum sentences of four years in prison in addition to a lifetime prohibition from possessing a restricted weapon are introduced for a series of violent offences including sexual assault with a weapon and aggravated sexual assault.

Anybody charged with criminal harassment, better known as stalking can be temporarily prohibited from owning a firearm. That will save women's lives.

• (1545)

Third, the package sets tougher regulations on lawfully acquired firearms. It creates a national registration system for all firearms. Let us not forget that it is often a legally acquired firearm that is used in domestic violence. The shotgun over the mantelpiece is even more threatening to women than the illegal firearms across our border. Keeping track of property for the purpose of information and regulation is commonplace in our society.

I am going to finish with a quotation from an editorial in La Presse:

[Translation]

The editorial asked whether we could imagine a citizen owning a car without being licensed to drive, without a licence plate, without insurance, without driving within the speed limits, parking the car any which way and anywhere and leaving the key in the ignition? Of course not. So, why must we accept that a gun owner be entirely free to purchase, own, hide, store and use the gun of his or her choice.

There are six million—

The Deputy Speaker: The minister's time has expired. Unless there is unanimous consent for the member to continue I have to go to the next speaker.

I wish to inform the House that because of the ministerial statement, Government Orders will be extended six minutes, pursuant to Standing Order 33(2).

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Quebec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I will start by analyzing briefly the arguments in favour of the bill and then I will address the problem of violence against women within this debate.

First, I wish to remind this House that this bill is supported by a great many social groups and professionals in the police, legal, health and social communities. I will name only a few, which come under the umbrella of the Coalition for Arms Control.

They are the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police, the Federation of Canadian Municipalities, the Canadian Bar Association, the Canada Safety Council, many churches, the Quebec public health network, the Quebec hospital association, many universities and school boards, many unions, the AFEAS and other women's groups and community organizations. Such agreement on an issue that may seem controversial has rarely been seen in Canada and Quebec.

The intense lobbying campaign now under way would suggest that the population is very divided on arms control, but such is not the case. The polls clearly show that the reality has always been otherwise.

Allow me to quote a few of these polls. In December 1989, better arms control was supported by 72 per cent of Canadians and 87 per cent of Quebecers. By January 1991, this support had climbed to 80 per cent of Canadians and 90 per cent of Quebecers. Two years later, in September 1993, universal weapon registration was favoured by 86 per cent of Canadians and 91 per cent of Quebecers. Regarding the sale of firearms, 77 per cent of Canadians and 87 per cent of Quebecers were of the opinion it should be governed by stricter legislation.

As for those directly concerned, i.e. firearm owners, in September 1993, sixty–eight per cent of them supported the idea that all weapons should be registered. This goes to show that the public fears firearms and wants firearms to be better regulated.

Several reasons militate in favour of stricter gun control. The Coalition for Gun Control listed a few. Here are some of the reasons stated: people are safer in a gun–free environment; firearms facilitate suicide; there is much more violence involving firearms in Canada than in most European countries. The current legislation is inadequate in many respects, including accessibility to military assault weapons, absence of a registry of all firearms in circulation, lack of a ceiling on the number of firearms that one can buy and lack of control over the sale of ammunition.

All these reasons justify much closer monitoring of the possession and use of firearms.

Now, moving to a more specific concern of mine: violence against women. There is a direct link between the violence women are subjected to and firearms. I will start by addressing spousal abuse.

It will be recalled that Statistics Canada published the results of a comprehensive survey in October 1993.

It showed that one Canadian woman in every four had been abused by her current spouse or a previous spouse and that 45 per cent of abused women were abused by men they knew. A study conducted by two researchers from the Canadian Center for Justice Statistics and published in March 1994 dealt with the most extreme form of spousal abuse: homicide. Among their findings, the most striking are the following:

For each man killed by his wife, there are on average 3.2 women killed by their husbands. From 1974 to 1992, married women were nine times more likely to be killed by their own spouse than by a stranger. The number of women killed by their spouses after separating is high. During the 18–year period covered by the study, from 1974 to 1992, 1,435 women and 451 men were killed by their spouses. The 1,435 women killed accounted for 38 per cent of all adult women who were murdered, while the 451 men killed by their wives represented 6 per cent of murdered adult men.

Let us now see the link between violence against women and gun control. Another study conducted by Statistics Canada and entitled "Family Violence in Canada" shows that, between 1974 and 1992, forty–two per cent of women murdered by their spouses were killed by a firearm. These eloquent figures are supported by the findings of Mr. Maurice Cusson, director of the École de criminologie at the Université de Montréal, and his research assistant, Mrs. Raymonde Boisvert. In a study entitled "L'homicide conjugal à Montréal: ses raisons, ses conditions et son déroulement", the authors examined the reasons behind, and the circumstances surrounding every spousal homicide committed on Montreal Island between 1954 and 1962, and also between 1985 and 1989.

The authors first found, as women's support groups have been saying for a long time, that control by men is the dominant factor in spousal homicides. This is true for both periods, that is before and after the quiet revolution. The authors also note that homicides triggered by this need to control are always committed by men and that the victims are almost always women, the only exception being homosexual couples.

Out of the five elements identified by the authors as being intrinsic to homicides based on a power relationship, there is the vulnerability of the victim, and this is where firearms come into play. The authors concluded that "the victim must be deprived of adequate defence mechanisms to protect herself from the attacks of her spouse. This raises the issue of power, which usually rests with the man, who is physically stronger than the woman. More often than not, that power is increased by getting a firearm".

The authors of the study see the acquisition of a firearm by the spouse as a danger signal which should not be overlooked. Another study, conducted by the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women, showed that, between 1980 and 1989, 72 per cent of women killed by their spouses were shot with a rifle or a gun. These figures are much higher than the percentage of murders committed with this type of weapon.

The new legislation provides that these weapons will be subject to registration and thus to much stricter controls. We must now consider the following: would these women have died if our firearms legislation had been similar to the legislation before the House today?

Let us draw an analogy here. What spousal suicide and spousal homicide have in common are the location—the home—and the means used. The Quebec suicide prevention centre has concluded, from experience, that the suicide rate is higher in homes where guns are available.

A press release issued last October says that 92 per cent of suicide attempts where a gun was used are fatal, while suicide attempts using other means are fatal in only one–third of the cases. We have established a link between access to a weapon and spousal homicide. If we can save just one life by restricting access to firearms, we will have accomplished something.

I support Bill C–68 because I want to eliminate the means used most frequently to kill women. The measures the bill contains will restrict access to guns through compulsory registration and licence renewal for responsible individuals only. Persons previously convicted of violent crimes and stalking will no longer have access to guns and ammunition. Furthermore, I think the minimum four year prison sentence will act as a deterrent to using guns in domestic situations. This is a win–win situation, for women, first of all, and for society in general.

Mr. Harold Culbert (Carleton—Charlotte, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take the opportunity to comment on Bill C–68, the firearms act, on behalf of my constituents in Carleton—Charlotte.

Carleton—Charlotte, located in New Brunswick, is over 200 miles long. A good portion of it lies along the 49th parallel bordering on the state of Maine. It consists of all of Carleton county, all of Charlotte county, a sizeable portion of York county and a portion of Sunbury county. The economy of these regions is extremely diverse. It is based on agriculture and food processing, forestry and pulp and paper mills, the traditional fishery, aquaculture and fish packaging, manufacturing, tourism and the service industries.

As you can imagine, Mr. Speaker, there are not large urban centres but rather rural areas built around service to the citizens. The towns and the villages have developed over the centuries to provide these services to surrounding rural areas. Hunting and pleasure fishing have been a way of life for the citizens of Carleton—Charlotte since the area was settled in the mid to late 1700s.

Hunting still plays a very important economic role in the region for outfitters, service industries and guides. Almost every farmer and many rural residents own firearms, not only for hunting or sport but also for the protection of their livestock from predators.

Over the past few months I have held several meetings, some large and some small, regarding the firearms proposals which are now in Bill C–68. There has been complete support throughout Carleton—Charlotte for stiffer penalties for the use of firearms in the commission of a crime, including the minister's proposal for a four–year mandatory prison sentence for the use of a firearm in 10 specific violent crimes. Also the initiative for stiffer penalties for illegally importing and trafficking in firearms as well as stricter border controls on firearms is most commendable.

The section dealing with the prohibition of various types of assault weapons is also fully supported. However the 105 millimetre or 4.14 inch or under barrel length handgun ban has been questioned. It has been suggested that the full length of the handgun could have been emphasized instead of the barrel length only.

My constituents appreciate the fact that the minister has requested the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs to determine which handguns in the prohibited class could be exempted due to their use in recognized shooting competitions.

To say that they have major concerns with the universal registration system for legal hunting rifles and shotguns would be stating it mildly. Those who have commented to me on this subject rejected this section vehemently. As indicated, I have hosted meetings which were well attended and smaller meetings where I was able to speak candidly with individuals. In all cases the registration system is the portion of Bill C–68 which elicits the most serious concern and the strongest objection.

The general consensus indicates that the proposed universal registration system, which will include the owner's legal hunting rifles and shotguns, will be hard to administer and extremely difficult and expensive to enforce.

Many of my constituents believe that this system will make criminals out of innocent, law–abiding citizens who either do not register their legal rifles or shotguns or those who are unaware of the necessity to do so. These citizens are responsible, respectable people who enjoy hunting as a sport. They value their rifles and shotguns and take great care to secure them.

However these responsible people could, through no fault of their own, be charged with a criminal act; for example, a person who is unaware that a rifle or shotgun is stored in an attic and does not know that they are required to register it. For many years now handguns have required registration. This is not new for handgun owners.

• (1600)

Currently an FAC, or a firearms acquisition certificate, must be obtained prior to purchasing any new firearm. It has been suggested that the FAC system be upgraded to include full registration for new firearms, instead of trying to initiate a universal registration system for all firearms. As I understand it, a thorough check is required and the name of the applicant, the description and the serial number of the firearm is kept on record at the retail outlet but not forwarded on to a central registration centre. I believe that it would be very useful for the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs to review this possibility in an attempt to streamline the registration system.

Other alternatives were also suggested, including a program which would include issuing an owner's certificate only to ensure that the holder is a qualified and legitimate owner.

Another point was that although one person may own all of the legal hunting rifles and shotguns in a family, the individual's spouse, sons and daughters, who would use the firearms for hunting purposes, would have to purchase individual firearms licences at $60 every five years. This happens in many cases where the entire family enjoys hunting. I would suggest that the standing committee review the possibility of a family package for these cases.

Finally, hunting plays a very important role in the economy of my constituency and throughout New Brunswick. Many outfitters have benefited from and created employment for others through this tradition. We must ensure that the system adopted is fair and equitable for the responsible firearm owner. We must protect this important aspect of our economy. These assurances can only be provided by the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, through its review of Bill C–68, by bringing forwarded the appropriate changes.

I would be pleased to assist the committee in any way possible to ensure that we have fair legislation which will be supported and will achieve the goals for which it was intended, to make our communities and our streets safe for my family, for your family and for all Canadians.

Mr. Philip Mayfield (Cariboo—Chilcotin, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin today by expressing my appreciation for the presence of the Minister of Justice who is listening to the debate. I find it commendable that he would be here to listen to the speakers.

I rise in the House today in support of the Reform Party's motion proposing amendments to Bill C–68, an act respecting firearms and other weapons.

For several months now the people of Cariboo—Chilcotin have been campaigning non–stop against a bill they have seen as not only intrusive, but an invasion of their rights and their privileges as Canadian citizens.

I received over 800 letters and 70 petitions since the Minister of Justice tabled his firearms legislation late last year. They all had the same message: get tough on the criminal, not on the legal, law–abiding gun owner. These are impassioned letters and the message being given is a simple message. It is a message that has been sent to Reformers, Liberals and Bloc members alike. It is a message which has not been heeded in Bill C–68 and it is a message to which the Reform Party is trying to respond with this amendment.

Bill C–68, as it now stands, is, as my colleague from Prince George—Peace River noted, really two bills combined into one. On the one hand it gets tough on criminals that commit crimes using firearms and replica firearms by increasing minimum sentences to four years in prison. This is a measure for which the Reform Party has been calling. As the Reform blue book clearly states: "If elected a Reform government will introduce legislation by which the criminal misuse of firearms will be severely punished". Reform has called for minimum mandatory jail terms for firearms related crimes. I am encouraged that these concerns have been at least partially included in Bill C–68. This truly is getting tough on the criminal.

If these measures are brought into law independently, the government can count on the support of Reform Party MPs and our party membership across the country. On the other hand, Bill C–68 places what many Reformers and even some Liberals agree are excessive and unnecessary restrictions on the legal, law–abiding gun owner.

I refer particularly to the proposed firearms registry, along with the many accompanying provisions that could make criminals out of gun owners. It could make criminals out of them simply because they do nothing. This provision, as I noted earlier, has raised a great deal of concern within my riding and many others.

The current handgun registry has had little if any effect on crime. The proposed firearms registry will only follow in its footsteps, adding more rules but doing nothing to solve the problem. However, this is an issue to which I will speak at another time.

As for the amendment, the Reform Party has given the Minister of Justice and the House an historic opportunity. It gives all members of Parliament the choice to stand together and to show Canadians our common commitment to fighting crime. Despite our political differences we share a desire to get tough on criminals. Together we can quickly pass strong anti–crime legislation.

The amendment will also provide us all with the chance to focus at a later date on the one issue that divides us and threatens this entire package. That issue is the firearms registry. The use of a registry in firearm ownership is a radical departure from Canadian tradition and one which should be carefully examined.

In light of the experiences of countries such as England, Australia and New Zealand we are very much afraid this is a lost cause before it even gets started. Two years ago the Auditor General made this statement on the topic of Canada's gun control policy. He said: "Evaluation of the [gun control] program is essential to give the Canadian public and members of Parliament the assurance that its objectives are being met".

Clearly the gun registry has not undergone the sort of significant, non–partisan evaluation needed to contribute to the debate. Until this happens there will be ongoing divisions within the House over the registry, slowing up the positive aspects of Bill C–68 in the process. If this is the only issue that seriously divides us as parliamentarians, let us deal with it separately. Let us deal with it in the best interests of all Canadians.

In closing, as members of Parliament we have long hoped for the day when we can come together in a spirit of co–operation and common direction in the interests of our constituents. By adopting the Reform amendment the House can, even on this one issue, work in unison for the betterment of all Canadians. Let us not let what divides us hold back what unites us.

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, when the gun control issue heated up last year after a string of gun–related crimes, culminating in the fatal shooting at the Just Desserts restaurant in Toronto, emotion ran so high that it was very difficult in the confusion to properly dissociate the weapon of the crime from the underlying and growing issue of violence in our society.

Responsibility for these crimes was quickly linked to the availability of firearms and to every firearms owner. Under the proposed gun and crime control bill a very high number of my constituents understand the fact that responsibility for crimes involving firearms is being unfairly attributed to the law–abiding gun owner on the same basis as the criminals.

The government is right to introduce legislation containing tougher sanctions against individuals convicted of murder and to step up efforts to deal with the smuggling of firearms. Such measures are necessary if we want to control crime and prevent an increase in the crime rate. We must ensure compliance with existing legislation on the wrongful use of firearms and their proliferation in our society. However, I have serious reservations about some of the points proposed in the bill.

[English]

In my riding, being a rural one, almost everyone owns a rifle or a shotgun, yet the incidence of violent crimes involving firearms is practically non–existent. They are responsible and law–abiding citizens including natives, trappers, sustenance and sports hunters, gun club members and gun collectors that have all proven their ability to own and use a firearm. Stricter gun control will not necessarily result in a decrease in the number of crimes involving firearms in this rural part of Canada. These law–abiding firearm owners should not be burdened or inconvenienced with additional gun control measures that will not reduce crime or improve public safety.

Self–respecting firearms owners will not willingly accept a further erosion of their right to privacy. They are afraid that when the data base is complete, it may provide, on request, information on their financial situation, marital status, mental health and mobility, all because of regulations that may profoundly intrude on their privacy, and at their own expense.

[English]

My constituents have been asking all along that the bill be divided into two parts: legislation that directly affects law–abiding gun owners and legislation that affects the criminal use of firearms. They have, as I have, also requested a free vote on the issue. We know that this will not be the case and therein lies my dilemma. I am wrenched between the loyalty to my party and representation of the views of my constituents. It will not be an easy call.

Eighty–five million dollars was forecast by the government to implement the national firearms registration system. The federal government has pegged the number of guns in circulation to be registered at 7.5 million. This number differs by a wide margin with the Ontario Federation of Anglers and Hunters calculations of 15 million as well as with those of the National Firearms Association. That is why the projection is unrealistic while I find the cost still prohibitive.

The National Rifle Association in the United States has already expressed concern that American hunters who will be required to register at the border will not come to Canada if they have to register their guns.

If we implement tough proposals do we not risk creating a new kind of relationship between the government and law–abiding gun owners, a climate of non–compliance or civil disobedience? We must keep in mind that the legislation is counting on all gun owners to voluntarily register themselves with police and to register all of their firearms by the year 2003.

Anti–gun control proponents could use any illegal avenue to stay out of what has already been dubbed the registration swamp. We must avoid red tape and restrictions on law–abiding gun owners if we cannot yield any evidence that stricter controls would make our communities safer.

[Translation]

The adoption of pro–active prohibition orders has also raised objections from many firearms owners. The penalty would apply to all members of the household if one member is affected by such an order. Should we impose prohibition orders on law–abiding firearms owners because a close relative committed a crime using a firearm? Many people think this is very unfair.

[English]

From another perspective on the issue, I hesitate to endorse new gun control legislation before the provisions of the Criminal Code can first be fully applied and enforced. We know that Bill C–17 is still in the early stages. Insufficient time has passed since its adoption to assess the effectiveness of its measures.

Law making, to be meaningful, must go beyond the legislative process and must be enforced. Every gun control or enforcement measure requires resources for its implementation. This will be an extra burden on the RCMP, the QPP and the OPP. If the threat of massive non–compliance is carried out, our federal court system will become so clogged that it will take years to process each individual case.

A number of inquiries conducted in various countries have shown there is no connection between the percentage of crimes involving firearms and the degree of regulation of firearms in that country. In countries with a very low rate of violent crimes or homicide, like Japan and Switzerland, the presence or absence of firearms is irrelevant. However, making young people socially responsible, giving them a good education and warning them against criminal behaviour is a major factor in producing low crime rates.

Countries that have tough firearms legislation have shown an increase in the rate of violent crimes. Countries whose citizens have a healthy cultural life and have very close family ties have the lowest rate of violent crimes committed with firearms, whether such arms are available or not. There is no evidence that more regulations have reduced the number of violent crimes.

[English]

Such findings are important. Homicide is a societal problem unrelated or at least marginally related to public access to firearms. The government should therefore concentrate its efforts toward identifying the real causes of crime in our society.

Bill C–68 is not only a registration bill but also a crime control bill. Imposing minimum mandatory sentences of four years for serious crimes committed with a firearm will go a lot further in deterring violent crime. Judges will be given strict instructions to no longer be lenient with the criminal element of our society and not to accept plea bargaining from defence attorneys. Measures such as these will make potential criminals think twice before they commit a reprehensible act.

The anti–tobacco and alcohol smuggling campaign of 1994 has proven to be very successful and the same methods of controls should be applied. The one–year minimum sentence will also send a very strong message that the illegal importation of firearms will be severely punished.

A huge majority of Canadians also agree that military and paramilitary weapons should be prohibited as their usefulness is totally unjustifiable in our society.

In essence, Bill C–68 responds extensively and quite adequately to Canadians' wishes to strengthen the Criminal Code for crimes involving firearms. I totally share this feeling with my urban colleagues. There are legitimate concerns since crimes committed with firearms are in effect concentrated in urban areas.

However I feel that this bill does not heed the concerns of rural Canada. A law–abiding citizen could end up with the same black mark on his or her record as a criminal found guilty of a real crime involving a firearm.

In addition, one must really question the constitutionality of the information that will be stored on the magnetic strip of the credit card style of permit. Canada is a country that prides itself in respecting the privacy of its citizens. Is the federal government not probing too deeply into people's lives? Furthermore, if this bill is adopted as is, it will be most interesting to see how the Supreme Court of Canada will react to this point as this law no doubt will be challenged.

I am reserving final judgment on this bill until I am given an opportunity to study the forthcoming amendments. I owe it to the 6,000 constituents who have taken the time to write, to sign petitions, or to verbally express their views on this controversial issue. Hopefully the speeches heard in this House will serve to enlighten the members on their final vote.

[Translation]

Mrs. Madeleine Dalphond–Guiral (Laval–Centre, BQ): Mr. Speaker, today we are debating on second reading Bill C–68, an act respecting firearms and other weapons. The current Liberal government is making it a key piece of its legislation.

The famous red book to which our colleagues across the floor so often refer promised tough legislation in the area of gun control. The Bloc Quebecois, like most Quebecers, has always been in favour of tighter gun control.

A number of recent tragic events have made all of Quebec aware of the inescapable reality that firearms are dangerous and kill readily.

Murderous rampages are a fact in our society: 1984, Assemblée nationale, three killed; 1989, Ecole Polytechnique, thirteen women killed; 1992, Concordia University, three professors killed. These events are etched in our collective memory.

Bill C–68 is therefore a step in the right direction. It proposes measures to ensure better control over the purchase, possession and storage of firearms.

It provides for more severe punishment for the possession of a prohibited or restricted weapon. It also introduces new offences and denunciatory sentences for the illegal importing and the trafficking of arms. It will now be prohibited to import or sell .25 or .32 calibre handguns and handguns with a barrel length of 105 millimetres or less.

Finally, the bill establishes a national registration system for all firearms, to be administered by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in co–operation with provincial and municipal forces.

This system will help police forces to combat the criminal use of guns: first, orders of prohibition for certain weapons will be enforced; second, the fight against smuggling will be stepped up by controlling the kind and the quantity of firearms entering the country; third, compliance with the rules for the safe storage of firearms will be ensured; fourth, it will be easier for police forces to track stolen weapons or those used to commit crimes.

Setting up the gun registry is a positive move. We nevertheless deplore that this system will not pay for itself, as was initially promised by the government and demanded by the official opposition. In fact, the Liberal government estimates that, over a period of seven years, it will cost $85 million to implement the system.

The Bloc Quebecois has no problem recognizing that this system will help fight against the illegal sale, possession or use of firearms. However, the official opposition believes that the period for registering firearms must be shortened. In spreading the deadline over an eight–year period, the government has chosen to compromise the attainment of the goals of police forces.

The Bloc Quebecois has no doubt that the Minister of Justice and his government caved in to the repeated attacks of several pro–gun lobby groups. Does the power of money compare to the power of AK–47s?

How else could we explain that over 13,000 military type automatic weapons, including over 4,000 AK–47 machine guns, will remain uncontrolled?

What kind of moral of logical justification could there be for owning such a firearm? Partridge hunting? We could lose a lot of feathers if that were the case. Personal protection then? In that case, we have powerful enemies. The desire to own collector's weapons? Is an AK–47 a work of art? Unless, of course, we want to turn it into a symbol of our civilization.

The government did not have the courage to do its homework. It evaded its responsibilities by asking the Standing Committee on Justice to find solutions to problems the government itself created.

For example, the government has asked this committee to find an acceptable solution in the case of firearms that have special significance for some people as family heirlooms, so that owners can bequeath their firearms to their children as part of their inheritance. That may be a legacy of love.

• (1625)

Given the situation, the Bloc Quebecois can only support wholeheartedly the recommendations made by coroner Anne–Marie David. The Liberal government should do the same.

Coroner David suggests that the Minister of Justice should amend the wording of the regulations on the safe storage, display and transportation of firearms to make it more consistent and easier to understand for the whole population. She feels that the current regulations are confusing and that not distinguishing between unrestricted and restricted weapons contributes to the confusion.

What Boileau said in the 17th century is more valid than ever: "A well–formed thought can be conveyed clearly, and the words to express it come easily".

Coroner David also notes that the current regulations allow weapons to be displayed. Is it unreasonable to believe that such a display can be an incentive to steal weapons or arouse the curiosity of some people who may be tempted to handle them?

The regulations contain another flaw: How can we approve regulations that authorize the transportation of unloaded unrestricted weapons on the back seat of a vehicle, as long as they are under the supervision of an adult?

According to Anne–Marie David, such leniency is an incentive to steal and contravenes in some cases the provisions of the Act Respecting the Conservation and Development of Wildlife.

The government must therefore launch an extensive information campaign to clearly explain the amendments to the regulations. It is aimed at the public at large, but should target certain groups in particular, such as hunters, collectors and sharpshooters.

According to coroner David, it is imperative that this publicity campaign be conducted under the aegis of a provincial committee and, sadly, that the federal government contribute the financial resources necessary to the success of such endeavour.

As we can see, this bill has no teeth, but its flaws have to be remedied, if the federal government really wants this legislation to have not just teeth, but good sharp ones.

The official opposition remains committed to producing legislation that will ensure tighter gun control. Support expressed by individuals, organizations and community social action groups fighting against violence, is extensive.

A large coalition originating from Quebec has taken a stand for closer monitoring of the sale, possession and use of firearms. Both public and parapublic organizations have come forward; the vast majority of police forces and police associations are in favour of increased gun control.

As the member for Laval Centre, I am particularly proud of the level of awareness displayed by the residents of my riding and my city, as evidenced by the resolution passed by the Laval town council on November 9, 1994, in support—unequivocal support—of stricter gun control measures.

[English]

Ms. Mary Clancy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to stand and make my contribution to the debate on the question of the adoption of the new legislation on gun control in this country. I say to anyone in this House who is in question as to where I stand on this issue, I stand most strongly and most passionately in favour of the adoption of this bill. I do so for a whole variety of reasons. Many of them are emotional because it is an emotional debate.

I think that all of us, wherever we stand on the gun control debate, were horrified just before Christmas when a young girl in the United States went for a sleepover with her friends because her parents were going to be away overnight. At some point in the evening she found out that her parents were going to be able to come home. She and her friend went back to the house. When she heard her parents coming in she hid in the closet. When her father came in the front door she jumped out of the closet and yelled "boo" and her father shot her to death. What a terrible tragedy. It would not have taken place if there had not been a gun in that house.

I think many of us remember the case in Michigan several years ago of a 9–year old paperboy who went to collect paper money, something he did every week. Most of us pay our paperboys or girls every week. The owner of the house, not realizing who it was, thinking it was an intruder, shot him to death.

We remember the Japanese exchange student in the United States who was out with some friends on Halloween, experiencing a long and treasured tradition in the culture of the United States and Canada, going door to door, trick or treating. He too was shot and killed by a homeowner who thought he was an intruder.

All of these examples take place tragically in the United States. I believe most passionately they take place there because there is a gun culture in that country that does not exist in this one. I intend to fight most passionately to see that kind of culture never takes hold in this country. That is not the culture that belongs to bona fide hunters, farmers or sport shooters.

I am going to quote someone I saw on CTV not too long ago. The man's name is Dan Matheson. Any who watch Canada AM will have seen him. He does sports, the weather and shares the anchor desk. One day not too long ago he said he had taken his little boy fishing. I cannot remember if I have the exact cost, but it somewhere between $30 and $50 to get a fishing licence to go fishing with his son. He said: "I just do not get it. I pay this to go fishing with my son. What is the complaint to register a gun? That is a whole lot more dangerous than a fishing rod".

The whole question of gun mentality in this country is misunderstood. There are members in this House who have misused the statement that there is a right to bear arms. There is not now any right in any Canadian constitution to bear arms. Not in this country. Not now and please, God, not ever. We have already seen the results of violence.

The hon. member opposite spoke most eloquently of some of the examples in Montreal; the example that haunts all Canadians over the age of reason on that December night, the École Polytechnique.

Violent actions are not only occurring in the streets at the hands of criminals, they are occurring in the homes of our neighbours. Death and injury by guns in the home are now a greater problem than the criminal misuse of firearms on the street. This relates directly to the questions of violence against women.

The greatest threat of homicide is not at the hands of a stranger. The majority of gun homicides, 86 per cent, are caused by family members, friends or acquaintances. One woman in Canada is killed with by gun every six days, most often in the home by someone she knows. We have evidence that a significant number of offenders act impulsively, suggesting that the simple availability of a gun can determine whether a homicide will occur.

I have tremendous respect and affection for the Minister of Justice but he does not go as far as I would. It is probably because I am an urban member. It is probably because I am a woman. It is probably because I do not have a cool head when it comes to the question of guns and gun control.

Last session I saw a bill brought forward that had many good points. I sat on the legislative committee that dealt with that bill. I saw it watered down until it effectively meant very little. That is why I am so proud to stand on this side of the House with this minister, with this government, to support this bill. It is tough and it is also fair.

I have been to gun clubs where I have walked in and said: "Gentlemen, I am your worst nightmare". No one in the House is more strongly opposed to guns than I am. There are many who are equally strongly opposed, but none more strongly opposed.

I have left those gun clubs with those people perhaps not agreeing with me but understanding my point of view and understanding the point of view that is the most important, that 70 per cent of the people of this country agree with the Minister of Justice. They agree with the Prime Minister. They agree with members on this side of the House because they apply a little intelligence to the equation and they understand the situation.

If we want to talk about legitimate polls, as the member from Calgary appears to be, he could speak to his own minister of justice in Alberta who commissioned a poll. Those of us who know a fair bit about polling know that we can commission polls so that questions will turn up the response we want. That minister was not a particular proponent of this government's law and yet even that poll showed that 62 per cent of the people in Alberta favoured gun control.

Mr. Thompson: Out of 300.

Ms. Clancy: To hon. members opposite, if they want to get their poll done right maybe they should re–educate their attorney general. In Alberta 62 per cent said yes.

Mr. Silye: He is not here to defend himself.

Ms. Clancy: I can only pick on people who are not here. It is too easy to pick on those opposite. If hon. member's opposite would like to calm down and listen, I would be happy to conclude.

This is a very serious issue. This is a very important issue to the women of this country and to the children of this country. It is very interesting that we talk about guns and their different categories. We talk about automatic weapons, semi–automatic weapons and some of the particularly horrible instruments of mayhem I saw when I travelled with the Toronto police force some months ago.

The hon. member opposite says they defended this country in the second world war. Our guns were turned on an enemy in the second world war that was trying to subjugate an entire culture and an entire belief in democracy. I do not think we should be turning those same weapons on our fellow citizens, which we have been.

Let me get back to my original point, guns, automatic weapons, semi–automatic weapons, those awful instruments of mayhem. Many are going to be banned. Let no one misunderstand that for women in this country an ordinary shotgun in a gun case or hanging over the mantelpiece is an object to be feared. It is an object to worry about for oneself or for one's children, given the circumstances in far too many families.

Again, I am very proud to stand with this government and this minister on the whole issue of gun control. I stand here knowing this is a promise made to the people of Canada, important to the people of Canada. First and foremost, this is a promise that will be kept to the people of Canada.

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the issue of gun control has become one of the more emotionally charged debates to be addressed in this House.

As the member for Calgary Centre, I cannot believe how quickly such an important subject has digressed into the realm of us against them, between interest groups, spin doctors, media pundits, urban and rural ridings, men and women. We have lost sight of who we are trying to protect.

Not one person in the House enjoys picking up a newspaper and reading about a man, woman or child being shot by another person. No one enjoys walking the streets at night with a feeling of fear in their stomach. Emotionally we are all on the same wave length and so it is time to start thinking and acting rationally, not just emotionally and politically, as the justice minister said today in question period.

The purpose of the motion we are debating today is to split Bill C–68 in two. One bill would cover the Criminal Code amendments dealing with the use of firearms during the commission of a crime while the second bill would deal with the issue of a national firearms registration system. The rationale is simple. The Minister of Justice has lumped these two separate issues together under the banner of crime control.

I do not believe criminals will register their guns and I believe the current firearms acquisition certificate system is adequate in the control of legitimate firearms owners. Therefore we should separate this bill. Even some members of the Liberal caucus support our motion.

At a town hall meeting on March 5 the hon. member for Lanark—Carleton stated he would like to see Bill C–68 split wherein the anti–crime and anti–smuggling components of the legislation would be dealt with separately from the issue of gun registration. They are two separate issues. I fully expect the Liberal member will vote in favour of our amendment.

I am prepared to support measures that genuinely reduce crime, but the burden of proof is on the Minister of Justice to prove gun registration will work. Therefore, before debate on this bill concludes I would simply ask some Liberal members to answer a few questions.

How will a firearms registration system truly protect society in light of the fact that other systems around the world have shown that it does not really make a difference? How will the government gauge the success of the program? How will the high costs be reconciled with making criminals out of innocent people?

I have some serious, common sense questions regarding who benefits from this program. The Minister of Justice has said registration will reduce crime and better equip the police to deal with crime in Canadian society by providing them with more information they often need to do their jobs.

Criminals will not register their weapons. I find it rather unlikely that policemen on the streets will approach a suspect's house any differently if the computer says the suspect does not own a gun. Caution will still be the rule.

I would like to take a moment to read part of a letter from two Calgary policemen:

> On Saturday, November 26, 1994 my partner and I were dispatched to a noisy stereo complaint in northwest Calgary. After knocking on the door for an extended period of time, my partner and I were confronted by a man at the door with a loaded, sawed–off shotgun which he pointed at my partner's chest. The man was subdued, arrested and charged with four weapons related offences.
> During our investigation we determined that the man was prohibited from owning or possessing any firearms until 1998 because of a weapons offence in 1992. The weapon he had in his possession was also a prohibited weapon.
> Of all the four offences the man was charged with, only one, assault with a weapon, is an offence where police can take the criminal to jail. Pointing a weapon, possession of a prohibited weapon and pointing a prohibited weapon are minor offences in the Criminal Code, the criminal version of a speeding ticket.
> How will registration possibly change what happened to us?

The man was legally prohibited from having a gun but he had one. Does a police officer have to get shot to make us realize that we have to get tough on these sorts of offenders?

According to the Department of Justice, in over half the cases in which possession charges are laid by police they are dropped once they get to court. That is the reality outside of planet Ottawa.

Addressing the inherent weaknesses of the Criminal Code and the charter of rights and freedoms should be our number one priority.

• (1645)

Handguns have been registered in Canada for 60 years. In spite of this, using the minister's own statistics, handgun crimes have been on the increase. There is no evidence to indicate that universal registration of shotguns and rifles will be any more effective.

Are we really worried about hunters, target shooters and collectors? Maybe the Liberals are but I cannot accept that these people are responsible for the violence on our streets. It is the criminals using illegally obtained weapons who are responsible for gun related crimes. They should be the target.

The Liberals like to use the logic that if you have to register your car you should register your gun. If you register your gun you will become more responsible, less inclined to have an accident and less likely to have your weapon fall into the hands of criminals.

When we look at vehicle registration, what effect does it have on preventing theft, promoting responsible use and reducing accidents? Does vehicle registration prevent drunk driving?

In Calgary a teenager was recently sentenced to six years for running down and killing a police officer with a registered stolen car. Is the owner of the stolen car responsible for the death of Constable Sonnenberg? Should car owners have to take more responsibility ensuring that their vehicles are stored safely? Should we apply the same legal impediments to car ownership that the minister wants to apply to gun ownership? Would this have saved Constable Sonnenberg? Of course not.

No matter what steps we take to prevent our property from being stolen, criminals find a way to get at it. No matter how much registration we have the simple truth is that people will continue to break the law. Let us start focusing our legislation on discouraging those who might and punishing those do.

Let us send a collective message to potential criminals that this country does not tolerate violence and violent offenders. From now on the punishment will match the crime.

Becoming a legal firearms owner in Canada today is by no means a cakewalk. Applicants must obtain a firearms acquisition certificate which is an extremely probing form containing questions about personal matters such as drug and alcohol abuse, job loss and divorce, to name a few. Applicants must then furnish the names of two people from the prescribed list of occupations and relationships who can verify the information in the application. This is followed by a 28–day mandatory waiting period during which a firearms officer can conduct an investigation on applicants. Upon completion the applicants must then pass a course or test on the safe handling and use of firearms and the laws relating to them. The applicant is then photographed and his or her certificate is processed centrally by the chief provincial or territorial firearms officer. What more can you do?

In the time it takes one legal gun owner to go through this process, thousands of stolen or smuggled guns will change hands in the streets. That is the problem. If this government would take more time to identify the right problem, it would find 60 per cent of the solution.

The national debt is the problem. The deficit is a contributing factor. That is why we have to get to a zero deficit, not just 3 per cent of GDP. The lack of deterrence for the criminal misuse of firearms is the problem. Registration is not even a contributing factor.

The Liberals are identifying the wrong problem. The Minister of Justice stated in the House that last year an estimated 375,000 weapons were smuggled into Canada. In the same breath he went on to say last year approximately 3,800 firearms were lost or stolen by those who lawfully own them in Canada. In the years since 1974 a cumulative total of 65,000 firearms have been stolen or lost, not recovered.

There were 3,800 stolen or lost weapons as opposed to 375,000 smuggled guns, yet the main emphasis of our new gun control laws will be registration for legal gun owners. I believe that instead of throwing millions of dollars toward registration we should look at all possible ways to beef up our security at borders.

Let us do everything in our power to stop the 375,000 guns from finding their way into hands of criminals. Let us send a clear message to the people who bring them across the border that if they get caught, they will not just get a slap on the wrist or a fine, but a guarantee of time behind bars.

Currently we have mandatory sentences for firearms offences that are not enforced because they are plea bargained away. Therefore a mandatory sentence is utterly meaningless and useless. I can see the need for a crown prosecutor to have some latitude in handling a case. The flexibility that plea bargaining offers is intended to lead to a conviction. I realize it is necessary, but not the outright elimination of a mandatory sentence. It should be a reduced sentence.

A national firearms registry flies directly in the face of today's reality which is that the vast majority of people want less government regulation and intrusion in their lives, not more. A 10–year jail term for failure to register and the right to register a firearm and the right to search and seizure without a warrant are incomprehensible.

Are we headed for a police state if this bill passes in its present form? Is the minister not willing to separate the bill and debate the two separate issues? He knows full well that they are two separate issues. He knows that this party would support the amendments to the Criminal Code to make it tougher on crime. He knows he would get our support.

Why bother with this national registration issue with the same bill? Separate the two. Have the courage and conviction to have a true and honest debate. People are sick and tired of hearing about the rights of criminals. They want them caught. They want them off the streets. They want them punished and, above all, they want laws that will make people think twice about becoming criminals in the first place.

Mr. Sarkis Assadourian (Don Valley North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, 128 years ago our founding fathers came together, gave this House power to enact laws, to ensure peace, order and good government in Canada.

Even President Clinton on his visit to this country on February 23 said Canada has shown to the world how to balance freedom with compassion and tradition with innovation. Canada set the example for the rest of the world on many occasions. This certainly is one of those occasions when we can say to the world that we set the standards and we make the examples for the rest to follow.

On October 25, 1993 the people of Canada voted for the Liberal Party. In the red book we made a promise to make our streets safe and offload the guns. Bill C–68 goes in that direction.

Public support for this bill has been enormous, 80 per cent to 85 per cent. Even in Alberta we are told 62 per cent of the population supports the bill. In my riding of Don Valley North, which I am proud to represent, 90 per cent of the population supports this bill.

In my riding I received only seven or eight representations opposing the bill. Out of those, one of them was a U.S. citizen complaining about the bill. When I asked him why he does not complain to U.S. senators, he said he lives here and has to complain to me.

Many of us receive many letters from various organizations and individuals regarding Bill C–68. I received maybe 200 letters from various parts of the country. One said in part: "It has come to my attention that someone has sent a number of misleading letters to various members of Parliament and some Reformers, including yourself".

These letters are on the subject of government policy proposals and gun controls. One says in part: "Many of these letters bear my name and address and are signed but were not written, signed or sent by me. My signature is false. I believe you have received one of these letters as I have received correspondence from you on this topic. I hereby request that you remove me from your mailing list".

I am not saying that all the letters are forged but I am sure that 15 members received letters that are the same. They have not sent a letter to anybody but somehow someone took the liberty to send letters to members of Parliament so they can say they received 200, 300, 1,000 letters, and that is how they can make public opinion saying people oppose it. The fact is that people support this bill.

I want to raise the issue of rural and urban communities. In the last byelection in a riding in Quebec 62 per cent of the riding was rural and 38 per cent was urban. In that byelection nobody ever raised the issue of gun control. It is obvious that rural Canadians support the bill. They are happy with it and they want to go forward with it so we can build a new Canada, safe and sound for everybody.

• (1655)

On September 17, I invited members of Parliament in metro Toronto to attend meetings with the constable in charge of the gun depot in metro Toronto. He showed us 13,000 handguns, machine guns, AK–47s or M–16s, whatever the case may be. Some of them were legally owned, stolen from their owners so they could be used in crimes. They showed me replicas so similar it was hard to say which one was which.

Don Valley North is one of the few ridings in the country that has no gun shop. We would like to keep it that way.

Most people complain about the registration section of this bill. When this bill was presented last year I phoned the city of North York and asked how many dogs are registered there. The answer is 18,710. We asked the minister and members of this Parliament how many guns we have in the country. They tell us anywhere from 4 million to 15 million.

Four million to 15 million guns can do more harm to the country and its citizens than 18,000 dogs in North York. If we can register the dogs, the cats, the cars, why not the guns? I cannot understand. No one has been able to explain it to me. I am a reasonable person, more than the hon. member on the other side who shouts meaningless sentences. He should answer to Canadians why he opposes legislation when 80 per cent to 85 per cent of Canadians support it and want to go ahead with this bill.

Many guns used in a crime these days are stolen from rightful owners; as I said before, 3,800 guns. If legislation goes through the way it is, we will know exactly where the guns come from so we can follow up, trace them and hold the owner of a gun responsible.

It is my pleasure to support this bill to the best of my ability. I can assure the House, even my colleagues in the Reform Party, that the Don Valley North population supports this bill 100 per cent. We will make sure that by passing this bill Canada will be a safe place.

In the last two years Canada was rated the best country by the United Nations and we will make sure it continues to be one of the best and safest countries in the world.

[Translation]

The Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Bourassa—The budget; the hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake—Low level flights; the hon. member for Kamloops—Royal Bank of Canada.

[English]

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this debate has taken on quite a bit of emotion. I would like to approach it from the standpoint of the gun control advocates who I believe are intelligent, compassionate people, who truly believe that stricter control of firearms will make our streets safer. I believe also that the justice minister truly has those thoughts in mind. I do not think he has any nefarious reasons to be doing what he is doing.

We desire to split the bill into two components. One component Reformers would very quickly support. The other I do not think we would.

On the issue of registration I have looked beyond the borders of Canada to find out what registration did in countries where it was tried. This is the only mechanism I have to compare Canada with other countries. By the justice minister's own recollection there is no statistical basis for doing what we are doing. I looked beyond our shores. I am really addressing this to those who honestly believe registration will work.

New Zealand registered all firearms. Over quite a complex process it registered its firearms.

I went through the history of it. Back in World War I it had reason to be concerned about firearms coming into the country and it registered them. After registering firearms for many years it looked at registration and asked whether it achieved the purpose for which it was undertaken. I have heard the justice minister say that the reason its registration system failed was that it had a poor computer system.

That may be the reason but New Zealand said the registration was of limited value because compliance was poor. Moving from spot to spot was not reported so that even if a person had registered the registration went astray. It was also found that it was only useful if the serial number were registered. Many weapons were not registered by serial number but by model number. Even if the law–abiding citizen took the time to do that it was a failure. It was found that many people never registered, did not comply. As well it was found that the cost was unjustified. It was much more expensive than expected. That is a very important issue in these days of financial restraint.

New Zealand abandoned its registration system and went to a system of licensing much like a pilot's licence. An individual who wanted a weapon had to be registered. It depended on the level of use whether or not the individual went for the high or lower level. There is a lesson to be learned by Canada from the experiences in New Zealand.

Second is the overall registration of firearms. I made a comment on national radio that Australia had tried registration of firearms. I got a blast from the consul's office saying that I said the wrong thing. It was wrong. It was not tried overall in Australia. It was only tried in various Australian states.

The state that closely resembles Canada is the state of Victoria. In 1984 Victoria decided that all firearms had to be registered. There were some massacres, some murders in Australia. Public opinion was inflamed just like it is in Canada today. Registration was to be the answer, according to Australian politicians.

In 1984 registration was to be phased in over a three–year period. The Australian police resolved that the spread of firearms should be contained. They actually had a very specific way to contain firearms. The initial statement made by the Australian police was that no home should have more than three firearms. Computerized registration would be the mechanism to justify that. If a home had just cause it could contain more than three firearms.

The resulting legislation did not include the three–firearm position. It was only registration of firearms. They moved off the three–firearm position into registration. The police still said they thought it would help.

Registration took place. Interestingly enough they found that it was very much more expensive than they had thought. Now we are getting into the more modern computer age which is very expensive. They found in terms of compliance that 58.9 per cent of the population complied but 41.1 per cent did not comply. Worse and most condemnatory of the process was that there was no effect whatever on criminal misuse of firearms. They had good statistics to follow it through. For the same three reasons New Zealand abandoned its firearm registration. Australia did the same.

I obtained the conclusions of the firearm registration officer through access to information. Generally they are not publicly available. The officer charged with the responsibility was asked whether he had done a good job. In summary he said: "I do not believe registration is the answer to the problem. I would therefore recommend that firearms registration be forthwith abolished and together with the firearms consultation committee a far–reaching, effective and proper system of education be introduced as a prerequisite to obtaining a shooter's licence". He went on to describe a system very much like that of New Zealand.

That country is not strange and foreign to Canada. It is a country that is parallel to Canada. It tried it and it flopped. What happened to the firearms officer when he presented the report? He was fired. The report was buried and the political masters carried on with registration and registration persists today.

I have a political message for members across the way. In New South Wales, Australia, a Labour government tried to put through very similar, draconian firearms legislation as we have in Canada today. This is the part that should change their minds. National opinion polls are 70 per cent for the government. They fought an election on the basis of the issue and the Labour government was ousted from New South Wales. Prime Minister Unsworth announced that he would not be standing for leadership of the parliamentary Labour party. "Guns cost me", he said. "Clearly as leader I must accept the major proportion of the blame for this defeat, particularly in terms of my decision on the gun issue".

What happens if a Canadian's lifestyle is taken away and turned into political activism? Members of the Liberal Party have no idea what it is doing when it does this to the lifestyle of Canadians. They may get individuals in urban areas to give them all kinds of support. However, when they find out that registration will be expensive, will affect only law–abiding individuals and will have no impact on criminal misuse, they will do what they did in New South Wales.

It is not necessary. It is absolutely incredibly stupid. I would simply say that we should split the bill. Let us have crime control but let us not have registration, or it is gonzo to the Liberals.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise on behalf of my constituents to give my full support to Bill C–68. It is a bill to restrict the availability of guns and thereby reduce the number of crimes with guns.

It is an undeniable fact that where guns and ammunition are less available there are less crimes with guns. Where guns and ammunition are more difficult to obtain, there are less crimes with guns. It is not no crimes with guns but less crime with guns.

Nobody on this side has made the suggestion that strict gun control will eliminate all crime with guns. It is true that professional criminals and gangsters will always get their guns, but the overwhelming majority of crime with guns is not committed by professional gangsters. It is committed by ordinary people who under stress or with some other problem strike out at another person. If a gun is available they use it.

Mark Lepine, before he killed 13 young women at École polytechnique had no criminal record. He was not a criminal. However, because the gun laws were loose he was able to get a semi–automatic military assault rifle and kill 13 women. He was not a criminal.

Valery Fabrikant, who killed four professors at Concordia University in Montreal, had no criminal record before he committed that crime. However, because he was able through looseness in the gun laws to get a gun he killed four other people.

In the context of family violence, quarrels, tensions, abuse of liquor and drugs, some mentally unbalanced people who lose control will strike out and, if guns are easily available, they will use them. In the legislation we are trying to make sure they are not easily available and to make it much more strict in being sold to the public.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Allmand: The level of debate from the Reform Party is the kind of thing we are listening to now. I listened to the hon. member make his speech. I would appreciate the opportunity of having the same chance.

When we make it more difficult to obtain guns crimes by these people are reduced because of strict gun laws. They do not have strict gun laws in most states in the U.S. They have a much higher rate of crime with guns. Some cases are completely ridiculous to read about.

I remember reading recently about a case in a certain American city where two automobiles collided at an intersection. The drivers involved in the collision lost their cool and became angry. Both of them pulled guns from their glove compartments, got out of their cars and shot each other.

In Canada we would be just as angry and lose our cool just as quickly, but because we would not have guns in our glove compartments we would probably get out and punch each other out or hit each other in the nose. The same excessive damage would not be done because guns would not be as easily available to people in that state of mind.

Contrary to what many have said in opposition to the bill, it will not stop legitimate hunting by responsible hunters. Nor will it stop competitive shooting by responsible sportsmen. These allegations are scare tactics. Whenever we have a bill to strengthen our gun laws we hear the same old rhetoric by the gun lobby and those who blindly follow the gun lobby.

I have been through four gun bills in the House during my period in Parliament. Each time we have set about to make the gun laws more restrictive to protect the public by preventing crimes with guns, we have heard the same old myths put forward by the gun lobby.

It can be demonstrated that despite the rhetoric after each gun law has passed there has been an increase in hunting licences available to responsible hunters. This gun law will not stop responsible sportsmen, hunters and shooters who belong to gun clubs and are competitive shooters from practising their sports.

I ask my colleagues in the House not to be freaked out by members of the gun lobby. They are not as important as they believes they are. They are not as numerous as they believe they are. They do not have the power they think they have.

They have threatened many members in the House before against voting for the strengthening of gun laws. They have threatened them during election time and have failed. I have been threatened, as I say, four times by members of that lobby. They have had no effect on me whatsoever. They have also threatened colleagues of mine from rural areas and have no effect on them whatsoever. They should be disregarded. They talk nonsense for the most part.

Mr. Hill (Prince George—Peace River): Tell that to the Tories.

Mr. Allmand: The Tories were defeated for many other reasons and not for their gun laws, let's face it. If you think they were defeated for their gun laws you are really dreaming in Technicolor.

The Deputy Speaker: I ask the member to address his remarks through the Chair.

Mr. Allmand: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Among the myths of the gun lobby is that when we attempt to ban or restrict guns only criminals will have guns. There is no class of persons born criminal and there is no class of persons born non–criminal. People do not have an identifying mark as criminal or non–criminal.

As I just said a few minutes ago, ordinary individuals in situations of stress, alcohol, drugs or whatever often strike out at other people and if guns are available they use them. It is not because they are professional criminals. As I say, the overwhelming number of murders in Canada committed with guns are not committed by professional criminals and gangsters but by ordinary people like Fabrikant and Lepine who did not commit any crime before in their past lives.

Another myth we hear over and over is that guns do not kill but people kill. Of course a gun is the most lethal type of means by which to kill another person. Yes, it is possible to kill someone with a baseball bat, but frankly I do not know anybody in this House who would rather have somebody chasing them with a lethal weapon instead of a baseball bat. Of course it is possible to kill people with poison, a knife or a baseball bat, but a gun is manufactured to kill, to kill animals or to kill people. Guns should be controlled and this bill will give better control.

With respect to registration, previous speakers, especially those from the Reform Party, asked how it will protect society and why we are doing it. We have had registration in this country for many years. Restricted weapons, especially handguns, have been registered for a long period of time and it has been successful. The rate of crime with handguns in Canada has, for the most part, been much lower than the rate of crime with long guns because handguns have been much more strictly controlled.

With the registration of all weapons, including handguns and long guns, it will be easier to conduct criminal investigations. The police will know who have guns and who do not. It will be easier to trace weapons used in crime and the criminals who had access to those guns. It will be easier to take preventive measures against violence with guns. For example, in a family that has a history of family violence, the police will know whether the husband or another family member has a gun registered in their name and that gun could be taken away.

It is true as some who oppose this bill will say that not everyone will register their gun. However, a large number will. Such a measure will help the police to remove guns from dangerous situations, especially situations where there has been a record of family violence.

With respect to the ban on most handguns, that is, handguns that are not used for competitive shooting, handguns such as the Saturday night specials, the very small and very easy to conceal handguns, these have no purpose except for use in crime. If someone is actually taking part in competitive shooting, then the gun is registered; the person belongs to a gun club and that is permissible. The other types of handguns which are very small and are not used in competitive shooting will be banned under the legislation and they should be banned.

The bill provides for an increase in the penalties for the misuse of guns, for the smuggling of guns and for the illegal sale of guns and ammunition. I support that but I do not believe that increased penalties are the answer. Increased penalties deal with the situation after it has taken place. The crime has been committed. Someone is dead. They have found the criminal and they will give them a stiffer penalty.

What we are trying to do with this legislation is to prevent the crime from taking place in the first place. We are trying to make guns more difficult to obtain and to screen the applicants who want to own guns. Doing that will prevent the crimes from taking place. It is a preventive measure.

To rely simply on long, tough, hard penalties as is done in most of the United States does not work. They have absolutely no effect whatsoever. The crime rates with guns are much higher there than they are in Canada, especially in Louisiana, Texas, Florida, Alabama and Mississippi.

In conclusion, I assure the House that as chair of the standing committee on justice, despite my strong views in favour of this bill, I intend to be absolutely fair with all sides who take part in the discussion before the committee. I want to assure those who oppose the bill that they will be fairly treated. Those who wish to amend the bill will be fairly treated. Those who support the bill will be fairly treated.

When I act as chair of the committee the most important aspect is the tradition of Parliament of the rights of minorities to have their say. I want to assure all members of this House and the general public that as chair of the justice committee everyone will be given their full right to be heard.

Mrs. Daphne Jennings (Mission—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to take part in the debate on Bill C–68. I hope the Minister of Justice is listening to the constructive suggestions which have been advanced in this debate. My colleagues on this side of the House have put forward ideas and suggestions which would make parts of this bill much better. However, we strongly oppose one part of the bill.

Today I want to address mainly the part on a national firearms registration system. I hope when we get into final debate on it that those on the government side who oppose the clauses that establish the regime of gun registration will stand with us to defeat those sections. If this were to happen it would be a great day for freedom in this Parliament and a great day for individual freedom in all parts of Canada.

I have spent most of my adult life in the teaching profession. One thing about teaching is that in order to explain something to others, it is essential to understand it yourself. For me, that means getting back to basics.

Therefore when I analyse legislation I ask myself: What is the problem the legislation is attempting to address or to cure? Once I am able to discern what the problem is, then I can go through the legislation clause by clause to see if the problem is being addressed correctly. This methodology seems to work most of the time. When it does not work, it usually is because I see the problem as advanced by the government in different terms than the government does and then can address it quite differently.

In splitting the bill, crime control I agree is what we need. When I look at Bill C–68 I am puzzled as to what exactly it is that the minister is trying to get at. What harm is he trying to cure? If we take the legislation as a whole there are stiffer penalties for those who commit crimes, anti–gun smuggling deterrents and then a gun registration system for rifles and shotguns. This for me is the meat of the bill.

If the harm or the problem is too many offences being committed with guns, then the first two parts of the legislation, stiffer penalties and anti–smuggling, make sense. I can see some room to make them better but I basically agree. But what about the registration system which this legislation imposes? What is that aimed at? Here again I must support splitting the bill.

Every time I review the remarks of the justice minister when he is trying to justify the system I wonder how he can relate one to the other. He tells us there are pretty scary statistics out there dealing with the use of guns. Every six days a woman is murdered by someone using a gun. Over 1,000 suicides per year are the result of gun usage.

After reciting these statistics we are always told these are the reasons we need gun control. but we are never told two things. First, how will the registration of rifles and shotguns reduce these numbers? Second, what percentage of these acts take place with guns that through this legislation would be required to be registered? Again, I must stress crime control and a national gun registration do not relate.

The justice minister knows very well that the registration system will not reduce the number of murders or suicides by firearms one bit. What he should know is that Canada is a large and diverse country, a country which in many ways starts at the borders of metropolitan Toronto. This country is not metropolitan Toronto.

The justice minister should read the legislation that is presently in place in relation to gun control. He will find that present laws in Canada are among the toughest in the world with respect to firearms. Here is what you have to do if you want to own a firearm in Canada:

Take an optional federal course and mandatory test to qualify for a firearms acquisition certificate. Submit to a thorough police examination of your social history, employment and psychological history when you apply for your FAC. Go through an interview process with police and provide solid references. Wait a mandatory 28 days before your FAC is approved and issued with a photograph.

If you want to hunt you must take a separate mandatory hunting course which also covers firearms handling and safety. Submit to another provincial written and practical test on firearms handling. Abide by strict federal laws that govern dozens of firearms handling and safety situations. They include: storing firearms and ammunition separately and under lock and key; rigid transportation standards; and tough guidelines for using firearms.

These rules are important but their effect has not yet ever been analysed. This was pointed out in the Auditor General's report of 1993. I believe the minister should wait to see how effective the controls put in place as recently as 1991 have been before he embarks on increased controls.

This registration system has many drawbacks and it is important that they be set out and discussed. It is expensive. The lowest estimate for its development and implementation is in the range of $80 million to $90 million. Oh yes, we are told that this money will be recovered from the gun owners who are required to register and we are also told the cost of registration will be quite reasonable to encourage those with guns to register. Which is it, Mr. Minister?

We are told one of the great pluses for this legislation is that it helps police. When they are answering a call at a dwelling place they will know whether there are firearms on site. We are told this will aid police and make it safer. Are we to conclude from this that the police will now enter homes where guns have been registered with their own guns drawn anticipating a gun battle? This will make our lives safer or the homes of our law–abiding citizens safer? I do not think so.

However, all these criticisms of the registration system pale into insignificance when one considers the potential for computer crime as it relates to the registry. This area is so serious, of proportions of such magnitude that we must look at it.

Weekly we are informed of some computer whiz–kid who has broken the code to allow access to highly classified material, government controlled or otherwise. Just a few weeks ago the police in Toronto uncovered a fake credit card ring. One reason given for the success of the criminal venture until it was closed down was the access to corporate computers which the alleged criminals had acquired.

We were told in the summer that authorities in the western world could not stop or prevent computers from being accessed by the criminal element. We are told that the police around the world sometimes do not even have the information as fast as the criminals do. We are very foolish if we think they will not access this information. Now we are going to establish a computer based program which will show the location of every firearm registered in Canada. What a gold mine for criminals and organized crime.

Break the code for this registration system and this will be the home shopping channel for criminals. Imagine establishing a system whereby the location of virtually every gun in Canada is shown. Is there anything else we can do to make it easier for those who wish to steal guns?

What of the innocent people who register their guns? Are they sitting ducks—no pun intended—for criminals who break the code and enter the gun registration system? Why would we create such a monster if it is not going to do any good, if it is not going to reduce the number of crimes of violence, murders, attempted murders or suicides?

Create the shop at home channel for guns, rifles and shotguns. I do not think so. However, I am certain there is a part of our population that would not object if Rogers Cablevision carried this channel.

There are good parts in this bill which should be studied in committee and perhaps even made stronger. This is a very good reason to split Bill C–68.

First, I agree there should be a separate criminal offence for committing or attempting to commit a crime with a gun. The problem with it is as proposed is that it may very well be bargained away as part of a plea bargain for a guilty plea for some other charge.

Members of the justice committee should take a hard look at this. They should try to determine whether they can legislate that the offence not be subject to a plea bargain or find some other solution. A clear message must be sent to the criminal community in Canada that if criminals carry guns and commit crimes, they will be punished for the crime and for carrying the weapon.

I am also supportive of those parts of the bill which would attack the problem of gun smuggling in Canada. We live next to, arguably, one of the most violent nations on the face of the earth. It is vitally important that those who patrol our borders be given real powers to deal with those who would import guns illegally into Canada.

Again, this is something the justice committee should look at in detail. Should the people who patrol our borders be given powers to be more than revenue collectors? Should the provincial police or RCMP in particular provinces be required to maintain a presence at the borders? A true police presence at our borders would, to my way of thinking, reduce smuggling. I am not saying we should arm our customs agents, but they should be backed up by trained police.

There are other matters which must be looked at in this legislation, for example the position of those who wish to will their gun collections as part of their estate. I believe we should facilitate this. The requirement for those entering Canada to take part in marksmanship contests to obtain a temporary certificate should be looked at to see if it is realistic and workable.

Most of all, I urge members opposite, members from outside metropolitan Toronto as well as inside, to look at Canada and see it for what it is, a vast country where hunting and other outdoor activities are both a way of life to some and a recreation to others.

The registration system proposed in this bill as it sits will not accomplish the goal set for it. Therefore, when it comes time to vote for this bill, or that part on gun registration during clause by clause analysis, vote down those clauses that pertain to the registration system.

Mr. Alex Shepherd (Durham, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in the debate on Bill C–68, an act respecting firearms and other weapons.

The riding of Durham has both a rural and an urban component. Being neither a gun owner or user myself, I have gone to the shooting clubs and have listened to the concerns of legal gun owners. I have taken both gun owners and those abused by guns to meet with the Minister of Justice.

I have studied the crime statistics of both the justice department and the gun lobby. I have spoken with our police chief, the local firearms registration officer, judges, police in the field, homicide detectives and finally, I visited Millhaven penitentiary and spoke with murderers in their cells who actually used guns in the commission of crime.

Tougher penalties for the use of firearms in the commission of a crime, tougher controls of cross–border smuggling and trafficking of firearms are all supported by the people of Durham, including legal gun owners.

Rather than looking at the strengths of the legislation I would like to focus on what I see as some weaknesses. Hopefully these matters will be addressed at the committee stage of the bill. I would like to address the matter of the registration of all firearms. As you know, Mr. Speaker, handguns in Canada have had to be registered since the 1940s. I note this has contributed little to the reduction of the use of handguns in the commission of crime.

Primarily the issue for me is one of cost benefit analysis. What are the costs? Who is going to pay? What are the benefits of the system? This revisits the very foundations of our democracy which is that government has entered into a contract with the people. This is Locke's Two Treaties on Government. In the 15th century Locke determined that a fundamental democracy was one where people consented to be governed based on an unwritten contract with their government, a contract that implied a basic consent of the people not only to be governed but also, most importantly, to be taxed.

People want to revisit their contract with government. They want to know how taxes are consensual. They want to be part of the process. They want to be included with regard to the taxes they pay and the programs they finance. Across the nation people are demanding more accountability from governments.

Taxpayers want to know how much programs are costing and specifically who is paying for them.

As you may know, Mr. Speaker, I intend to introduce a private member's bill early this spring, the subject of which will be a taxpayers' bill of rights. I note that if this legislation was in place, the current bill would have some additional and much needed information attached to it. Specifically the program would be costed fully during its implementation stage. It would detail the specific costs and would allocate them to the years during implementation. It would also show the anticipated revenues from registration charges to gun owners. Finally, the Auditor General would have certified the costing methods used as being reasonable.

The taxpayer is tired of discovering years after the implementation period of the waste of their money. I would like to quote from the Auditor General's report of 1993 concerning the previous gun registration system that is only a couple of years old: "We found several weaknesses in the methodology, which significantly reduce the extent to which the government, members of Parliament and the Canadian public can rely on the evaluation to be assured that the gun control program is effective".

I am afraid we are about to repeat the errors of the past. I note it has been stated that the proposed new registration system may cost $85 million. However, there is great confusion. The current registration system for handguns costs $60 million per year and includes only 560,000 handguns. There are a minimum of five to six million long guns in Canada.

I have a study here by Professor Gary Mauser at Simon Fraser University that states it could cost $82 per firearm, $496 million, or half a billion dollars. It has been suggested the first year be free to encourage registration. However the taxpayer knows that nothing is free. In studying budget projections, I can see no allocation of funding in the Department of Justice's budget for this program. We need a better fix on how much this program is going to cost.

The taxpayer has the right to know this now. Clearly we can no longer afford the luxury of introducing programs for which we do not know the cost. The taxpayer wants to see better fiscal responsibility and in some ways we have done that in the recent budget.

This leads me to the second part of my analysis, which is the study of the benefits of the system. Benefits would have to be clear and obvious. They would have to promote the common good. They would have to demonstrate that there was clear correlation between registration and the intended results.

At this point I found gun owners generally reasoned people. They have tried to understand why the registration system is thought to be needed and so important today. I would further like to point out that a democratic society is judged not on how it treats its majorities but rather how it treats its minorities.

It is clear to me that the opinions of the majority who do not know the facts are of questionable validity. Most surveys would indicate that the average person is more concerned about crime control than gun registration.

I further note that both gun owners and taxpayers generally are a minority in this debate. It is clear to me that without convincing a sizeable portion of their numbers of the effectiveness and affordability, the registration system will fail.

Here are the stated goals as I understand them of the registration system: that it will allow firearms removal from domestic violence situations; that it will afford law enforcement agents better information when approaching a household for investigation purposes; that it will lead to safer storage practices.

My time today will not let me deal with these issues at length, however the result is that it is totally unclear whether some of these objectives are not already available in the current law and are not being enforced or whether the objectives can be met at all with the registration system for long guns.

I can find no clear documentary evidence from the justice department that makes this case. If I cannot make this leap of faith, neither can long gun owners. This is the real danger of the legislation, that we are placing a sizeable group of people in the category of believing that the system is unwarranted. They see the imposition of fees as an unwarranted tax, the proceeds of which will be wasted on further bureaucracy with no tangible results.

I spoke earlier about the concerns of taxpayers. Needless to say gun owners are taxpayers. I said that they wanted to revisit their contract with government. Do we have examples of where people believe taxing systems exist without consent and how they have reacted? We have only to look at the dreaded goods and services tax, clearly a tax that lacked common consent.

A recent study by the accounting firm Peat Marwick concluded that over 50 per cent of taxpayers would avoid paying this tax if given the opportunity. Police officers in my riding have avoided giving minor speeding tickets because they believe that the three–price increase in one year is just an unwarranted form of taxation on the working class.

The conclusion is that we are developing a system of justice in Canada where people pick and choose the laws they are governed by. This is mainly because they do not feel that they consented to them in the first place.

I do not think this system of justice is sustainable. I believe that it will lead to chaos. Clearly our democracy must be one of inclusion rather than exclusion. Our society is becoming more complex and technical.

I would like to end my comments by quoting from one of our own political philosophers, Mr. George Grant. In his book Twilight of Justice he observed that one of the changes to a more technical society in Canada, that the need for control of humans in a technological society increases with the complexity of society. Technique causes the state to become totalitarian, to absorb the citizen's life completely.

Finally, the definition of liberal, which I am, is favouring individual liberty. I hope the committee will take the time to discuss some of these matters.

Mr. Lee Morrison (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have owned firearms off and on for more than half a century. I have been a reasonably good citizen but now in the eyes of the Minister of Justice and certainly in the eyes of the popular press, I have become a threat to society, a menace to peace, order and good government.

I am going to be subjected, if these laws that are now before us in Bill C–68 are all lumped together as one—the administrative bureaucracy and the criminal sanctions—of running the risk of being a common criminal. That, to my way of thinking, is neither just nor sane.

If I or anyone else chooses to inconvenience the bureaucracy by failing to comply with the purely administrative requirement, the result will be a criminal record and the penalty could far exceed that which some drunken hoodlums recently received for murdering a harmless old man in the province of Saskatchewan. This is absurd.

The justice minister says that he has actually separated the administrative from the criminal because we have these two sections in the one bill. That is smoke and mirrors if we are still talking about draconian criminal penalties for failure to observe an administrative law. That, in my humble opinion, does not give separation.

I own a few firearms even today but I hardly ever hunt. I do not belong to any shooting club. I do not belong to the NFA. If I lost my guns tomorrow it would not make a big difference to my lifestyle. However, I would be losing something a lot more important than hardware. I would be losing a big piece of my civil liberty.

The justice minister says that the right to own a particular type of property, firearms, is really just a privilege. I submit that Canada's top lawyer has an unbelievably feeble grasp of history and of the common law. Omission from the British North America Act or the charter of rights and freedoms does not mean that a right does not exist. Our legal system is based on British common law and on the sanctity of customary rights.

When Sir William Blackstone codified the common law he noted that every individual has certain absolute rights, including the right to personal security, personal liberty and the right to own and use property. Does that sound familiar? American revolutionaries did not invent those concepts. They merely enshrined in their constitution the rights which as Englishmen they already had.

Blackstone went on to list five auxiliary rights without which the absolute rights could not be protected and maintained. One of them was the right to own personal arms. When Americans passed their famous second amendment to the constitution, their right to bear arms, it was only a modest extension of a right which they had before the revolution.

In Great Britain there has been a steady chipping away at this right, starting in 1870 and accelerating after the first world war. It was supposedly because of the threat from Bolshevik or anarchist terrorists. However, just as in Canada today, public hysteria was fanned by the government and, just as in Canada, laws have become progressively more intrusive, complex and downright repressive. Today they have almost achieved the justice minister's ideal where only police, soldiers and the trusted elite of society have legal firearms. However, there is no shortage of firepower in the U.K.

A few months ago I talked with a Scottish gun dealer and he told me that Great Britain is awash with guns. You can buy one faster and more easily in a pub than from him, and cheaper because there is no tax.

What is accomplished as gun laws are made tougher and tougher? What affect does the hassle and the expensive bureaucracy have on crime? Very little.

I have reviewed firearms legislation and crime statistics from various states south of the border and from several other countries. Now I am going to bore the House with some of the dull facts that the justice department's social engineers cheerfully ignore.

Consider the prairie provinces. Since gun controls began in 1978, the annual homicide rate has averaged about 3.2 per 100,000 people, of which about one–third are committed with guns.

In the four border states of Minnesota, North Dakota, Montana and Idaho the rate was 2.7 per 100,000. That is 16 per cent less. Those are all wide open. The justice minister would probably say those are lawless states where you can own and carry almost anything short of a bazooka.

The District of Columbia, with the most stringent controls of any North American jurisdiction except Mexico has the unbelievably high murder rate of 80 per 100,000 per year, the highest in the western world. How can there possibly be such problems where guns are strictly controlled?

Maybe it has something to do with cultural and economic forces. Maybe it has something to do with organized crime, drug dealing, racial tension, grinding miserable poverty and a collapsed public education system.

Gun control is an artificially induced smoke screen. It is a cynical ploy to distract the public from the real issues, not the least of which is the breakdown of our criminal justice system. The government helped create this highly emotional issue and now it is playing it for all it is worth. This issue has absolutely no relation to crime control and it is absurd that the justice minister has made the mixture. It is a lot easier to make scapegoats of decent citizens than it is to admit that our justice system is misdirected.

To give the devil his due, this bill does contain some good features actually aimed at criminals instead of ordinary citizens; the four–year minimum sentence for violent offences committed with a firearm, for example, although those receiving this penalty will still be eligible for parole.

In 1978, I told anyone who would listen that we had started down a long slow road to public disarmament, that future violent crimes would serve as excuses for more bureaucracy, that registration by serial number would follow and that the last step would be piecemeal confiscation of weapons, picking off gun owners one at a time. It is all coming true.

Half a million handguns are going to be effectively confiscated, no matter how the minister tries to sugar coat his proposal. Confiscation of registered long guns will begin, as it is already begun with handguns, through a process of natural evolution and will probably be spurred by some horrendous crime such as the Montreal massacre.

Public hysteria is a wonderful tool for government. Early in 1941, before Pearl Harbour, the Government of Canada confiscated the arms of Canadians of Japanese origin living on the west coast. Remember, we were not at war and these were Canadians, but their guns were taken away.

The political establishment was delighted and the tame establishment press bayed its approval, just as it is baying its approval for the proposals on the table in the House today.

• (1750)

This bill is a classic example of the theory of government which states that everything not compulsory shall be forbidden. It is a bit of statism, and a bit of statism, like a bit of cancer, is not good for you.

James Madison said it best: "There are more instances of the abridgement of freedom of people by gradual and silent encroachments of those in power than by violent and sudden usurpations".

Mrs. Rose–Marie Ur (Lambton—Middlesex, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to take part in today's debate on second reading of Bill C–68, an act respecting firearms and other weapons.

Canada has had a long history in the monitoring and controlling of firearms. Canada has had laws restricting the possession and the use of firearms since 1877. These were a nationwide permit system for the carrying of small arms in effect in 1892. All handguns have had to be registered since 1934. In 1951 a centralized registry for restricted firearms was established under the control of the commissioner of the RCMP.

The classification system of prohibitive weapons and restricted weapons including all handguns and non–restricted long guns was introduced in 1968. This scheme was significantly enhanced by a number of amendments in 1977. The major addition was the creation of the firearms acquisition certificate, FAC, a screening system for those wishing to acquire any firearm including non–restricted hunting rifles and shotguns.

A new administrative regime involving local firearms officers and chief provincial firearms officers appointed by the provinces was also established. Currently the provinces administer the FAC system and most overall gun control. This regime was relatively untouched for over 11 years until the passage of Bill C–17 which received royal assent on December 5, 1991.

To my knowledge the last set of regulations pertaining to Bill C–17 came into force on January 1, 1994 and prescribed the criteria for competence in the safe handling and use of firearms. Barely a year after the implementation of Bill C–17's last set of regulations members are being asked to consider yet another firearms bill.

I propose to offer my comments on what I consider the positive aspects of Bill C–68. I will also offer my opinions on the parts of this bill which require more consideration by the justice committee and I will give my reasons as to why certain sections of this bill should be deleted in their entirety.

The most positive feature of this bill is its no nonsense approach to the criminal use of firearms. To that extent I applaud the proposals to create new offences for the criminal use of firearms, including the minimum four–year sentence for using a firearm in the commission of violent offences and the minimum mandatory sentence of one year for the use of a replica firearm, mandatory jail sentences for the possession of stolen firearms and stiff penalties for illegally importing and trafficking in firearms.

For years Canadians from all walks of life have been demanding stiffer mandatory sentencing provisions for the use of a firearm in the commission of violent offences. Bill C–68 addresses this concern. Mandatory sentencing provisions for the use of a firearm while committing one of the 10 key violent offences of attempted murder, manslaughter, negligence causing death, robbery, kidnapping, hostage taking, sexual assault, aggravated sexual assault, extortion and discharging a firearm within intent to cause harm will be increased from one to four years. Offenders convicted of these offences will also be prohibited from possessing a restricted weapon for life.

I am concerned that section 85 charges might continue to be plea bargained away notwithstanding an increase in minimum sentencing provisions. The justice department's own research shows that two–thirds of section 85 charges laid are either dismissed, stayed or withdrawn because of problems of evidence or plea bargaining.

Bill C–68 also creates a new prohibitive category consisting of certain calibre handguns with a barrel length of 105 millimetres or less. In effect this will result in the prohibition of 58 per cent of the handguns currently in existence in Canada. Like all other owners of prohibited firearms, individuals who possessed these handguns on or before February 14, 1995 will be able to buy and sell only among themselves. Owners of these handguns will be able to use the handguns for the purpose for which they were originally obtained, whether target shooting or collecting. They will be required to demonstrate every five years that their handguns continue to be so used.

These measures are a definite improvement over the action plan of November 30, 1994 which had contemplated a complete prohibition against any use or trade in these prohibited firearms. To his credit, the Minister of Justice has announced his willingness to have the justice committee consider whether handguns in the prohibited class that are used in recognized target shooting competitions should be exempted from the ban.

I am also grateful that the minister has asked the committee to examine the whole question of whether there might be a separate exemption provision for firearms that may have special significance to families as relics or heirlooms.

The minister has also suggested that the committee study the issue of whether technical amendments are necessary for historical re–enactments or heritage events using black powder reproduction firearms.

In each of these cases the Minister of Justice is to be commended for his flexibility. I am deeply disappointed, however, that the minister has remained steadfast in his insistence upon the establishment of a national registration system for all firearms, including non–restricted hunting rifles and shotguns.

Bill C–68 includes provisions for the initiation of universal firearms owner registration where the current FAC will be replaced with a graduated firearms possession certificate, FPC, starting in 1996. Although initially voluntary, by the year 2001 possession of any firearm without an FPC will result in a Criminal Code offence that would carry a sentence of up to five years, one year in excess of the mandatory term proposed for the offence of using a firearm while attempting to murder.

As the second half of the proposed universal registration system, the bill would require every Canadian to register his or her firearm individually. Each firearm is to be identified by make, model, manufacturer's serial number and other identifiers, and a special firearms registration card, FRC, is to be issued for each firearm registered.

We should not be surprised that law–abiding firearms owners are deeply resentful over this registration proposal, which can only be described as intrusive and cumbersome. As more and more makes and models of various types of firearms are either reclassified for regulation or banned outright, we cannot blame some firearms owners for suspecting that the real reason behind registration is a gradual confiscation of most firearms in Canada. Over half of the current legally owned handguns in Canada will be banned as a result of Bill C–68.

It should be obvious by now that criminals do not register their firearms. A universal firearms registry, even if it were fully subscribed to by all legal firearms owners, will not reduce criminal activity involving firearms, nor will it improve public safety. Neither law–abiding firearms owners nor other taxpayers deserve to be burdened with any expense or inconvenience that has no demonstrable effect on reducing crime or improving community safety.

Canadians want tougher measures to be taken to reduce crime. This bill addresses that through mandatory sentencing for the use of firearms in the commission of violent crime.

During the third week of November 1994, when Decima Research asked on behalf of Maclean's and CTV what the main reason for the increase in violent crimes is, the greatest number of responses, 40 per cent, said the justice system is too lenient. Only 5 per cent of the over 1,600 respondents said that a lack of tough gun controls was the cause.

Non–firearm owning Canadians are beginning to understand that additional gun controls will only serve to penalize responsible firearms owners unnecessarily and will not reduce crime. The minister insists that a new registration system is the support structure for the government's firearms control package.

I quote from a February 14 news release from the Department of Justice: "A universal registration system will help combat smuggling by monitoring the types and quantities of firearms coming into Canada". How can that be so when by definition smuggling involves evading the very authorities that would be doing the monitoring at Canadian borders?

If we are prepared to spend more money on gun control, let us spend it wisely. It has been suggested by the solicitor general of Ontario that a national task force on firearms smuggling be set up at key border points. I strongly support this proposal. A well co–ordinated task force involving all levels of police forces, additional customs officers and the support of all three levels of government would yield real results in the reduction of smuggled firearms into this country. That is where the real problem exists. It is not in the continued harassment of law–abiding firearms owners.

I sincerely hope the justice committee will insist upon an objective, dispassionate examination of the utility of a national registration system as set out in the bill. I hope that at the end of its study it would conclude that the current system requiring a firearms acquisition certificate is more than adequate and that if anything has to be done to curb the criminal use of firearms, the work has to be done at Canada's borders and in our court rooms.

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased today to stand in the House to speak on the Reform motion to split Bill C–68. It reads:

> That all the words after the word "that" be deleted and the following substituted therefor:
> This House decline to give second reading to Bill C–68, an act respecting firearms and other weapons, because the principle of establishing a system for licensing and registration of all firearms and the principle of creating a variety of offences are two unrelated issues that should be addressed separately.

I concur with the motion and I encourage members opposite to support Reform in the motion to split the bill.

I will read an excerpt from a letter from a constituent, Mr. Ole Raasok of Irma, Alberta. He specifically asked me to mention his name and to read his letter if I had the opportunity. He wrote:

> I was living in Norway when the Germans invaded our country in April 1940 and took control of government in June 1940 after Norway's capitulation.
> In the fall of 1940 all gun owners were ordered to register their shotguns and rifles if they wished to hunt. As law–abiding citizens wanting to hunt, we were dumb enough to register our guns.

I am reading from a letter sent to me by a constituent who was raised in Norway and who experienced registration. I encourage all members opposite to listen carefully to what this gentleman has to say. I believe we should not make light of individuals who have had similar experiences. He continued:

> The following year we received an order to deliver all of our guns to the police. There was no use in trying to hide them because the guns were already registered and the government had the numbers. The guns were never returned and no compensation was made for them. I believe this is the hon. justice minister's plan.
> I became a lieutenant in the reserve army before I immigrated to Canada in 1951. In that capacity I had full command over 160 men who all had their own weapons in their homes. There was never any talk of registration or permits to transport or use guns. Statistics show that Norway has one of the lowest criminal use of firearms in the world.

I have read only part of the letter from my constituent. I have heard many members opposite say that any idea or any suggestion by Canadians that registration and tougher gun control would lead to confiscation is ridiculous.

Whether it is the intention of the government to move to confiscation after registration, I have no idea. I would tend to think not. However I believe it is healthy for people in a democracy to have a certain level of distrust for government.

My constituent has seen the effect of not having a healthy level of distrust. I ask hon. members opposite to understand that many Canadians have this concern. Some do not trust this government and others will not trust future governments. It is important to listen to these concerns and it is important in a democracy to have a certain level of distrust.

History has shown that Norway is a prime example that registration leads to confiscation. Is this what the minister has in mind for Canadians? This question is often asked of me in my constituency. It was not just every now and again but every day over the past 10 days. Every single day I had constituents ask me whether the minister had in mind confiscation after registration.

Earlier statements made by the minister suggested that he would prefer to have guns only in the hands of the police and the armed forces. The statement was made shortly after the House started sitting about a year ago.

I fully support the motion put forward by the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville because it will separate the so–called crime bill into two different parts. It is logical to split the bill because we are dealing with two different issues. On the one hand is the aspect of targeting crime and on the other hand is the anti–gun sentiment of the legislation which I do not support. The motion is necessary because it focuses on the real problem of crime.

We as members of the Reform Party support a crime bill. We support measures that would get tougher in dealing with the criminal use of firearms, including penalties for smuggling.

However we do not support targeting law–abiding Canadians simply because they own guns.

From day one Reformers stated that legitimate law–abiding gun owners were not the problem but rather that the problem stemmed from the criminal use of guns in the commission of crime. We need to ask why the minister has chosen to put these two parts of the issue together in the same bill. While I cannot answer the question for certain I believe it is a legitimate question. When we consider that Canada already has some of the toughest gun control laws in the world it is particularly an appropriate question.

To link tougher gun control to crime fighting might sound politically appealing, but there is no statistical evidence to support the legitimacy of the idea. If the minister could provide us with some evidence we would not oppose the original legislation. The reality is that he cannot provide the information because it does not exist.

Several constituents have come to me saying that they had written a letter to the Minister of Justice asking specifically for any evidence he might have to show that more gun control would do anything to help prevent crimes committed with guns and to show that a registration system would prevent even one death. So far none of the constituents have had an answer to their letters. That is a shame. It is a serious question and they are not getting the answer.

Another concern has been raised often in my constituency concerning the computer system that will be set up to accommodate the central registry. The concern of my constituents in this regard is about the central registry and a hacker accessing the system.

We know hackers are very capable. They have accessed military secrets in the United States. They can get the names and use them in two ways. First, they can be used to find the locations of large collections of guns so that they can be more easily stolen. Second, criminals could determine from the lists where easy targets for break and enter may exist, where they feel the guns are not there and therefore they are easy targets.

My constituents have many other questions over past weeks and indeed over the past year. However I will close by saying that I would like answers from the minister to the two areas of concern expressed by my constituents. I do not believe he can give an answer in terms of the motive behind the registry, not necessarily the minister's motive but the motive of future governments. Also there is the possibility of the computer system being broken into and guns being stolen or a break and enter taking place.

The Deputy Speaker: I am sorry but the member's time has expired.

Mr. Paul Steckle (Huron—Bruce, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House this evening to address a matter that has attracted a great deal of concern in my constituency of Huron—Bruce.

On November 30, 1994 the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada announced the government's action plan on firearms control. This was a series of proposals designed to generate comments and constructive criticism from Canadians so they might have an equal partnership in forming the bill before the House today.

The people of Huron—Bruce seized the opportunity to comment on the issue, causing my Parliament Hill and constituency offices to be flooded with thousands of calls, letters and visits.

Among the proposals was a mandatory minimum sentence of four years in prison in addition to a lifetime prohibition against possession of a restricted weapon when convicted of committing any one of or a combination of ten specific offences with a firearm. Among those offences, attempted murder, armed robbery and sexual assault with a weapon were included. Also included in the proposals were new Criminal Code offences with strict new penalties for illegal importing and trafficking firearms, enhanced border controls with improved inspections, and permit requirements for import, export and in transit shipments of firearms within Canada.

I take this opportunity to commend the minister for putting forth the aforementioned crime control measures. I would however like to draw attention to Bill C–68, an act respecting firearms and other weapons that is currently being debated in the House.

The act encompasses most of the original proposals released by the justice department, including a new mandatory registration system and a ban on a variety of specific handguns and replica weapons. As I have mentioned before, the proposals prompted a massive outcry in my constituency. In response I have spoken and met with many groups and individuals in an attempt to acquire an understanding of their views.

The process has allowed me to speak directly with my constituents, thus giving me a good understanding of their thoughts and views. As an avid hunter and sportsman I am pleased to recognize the government taking the initiative to punish individuals for the illegal use of firearms. However I am not able to support further restrictions being placed on the legitimate and safe gun owner.

Bill C–68 is a bill that resulted from many tragic events in recent Canadian history such as the massacre at Montreal's École polytechnique in 1989 and a recent drive–by shooting in Ottawa. The events have fuelled the fires of public demands for changes to the Criminal Code with respect to the illegal use of firearms.

The most recent package of gun control measures is known collectively as Bill C–17. The process of putting the legal aspects of the bill into place has only now just begun. Unless the new law is successfully implemented the changes contained in the legislation run the risk of becoming little more than symbolic gestures by the government to satisfy public opinion.

Good policy development and the delivery of adequate laws also include effective implementation and enforcement. There has not been enough time for the regulations contained in Bill C–17 to be fully realized. Thus the effectiveness of the regulations is also not fully understood. One can therefore reason that if this is true it is also too early to impose or evaluate the effectiveness of further controls such as a national registration system that would require more time and would place further stress on the already sparse financial resources of the nation's taxpayer.

There are clear constraints in public funding when it comes to our police forces that are already responsible for protecting our citizens under other provisions of the Criminal Code. It has been estimated by the justice department that implementation of a registration system could cost up to $85 million with an annual maintenance cost of $10 million, not considering annual increases.

Public safety will only be endangered if we dilute our resources. As a result we as members of Parliament must take care in allocating the limited funds we have in this area to ensure they are spent in the most effective and practical way possible.

It must be reiterated that gun control only plays a small role in our overall criminal justice system. Other aspects of the Criminal Code need to be fortified to effectively combat violent criminal activities.

As a legitimate gun owner I am already subjected to a large number of controls. By law, to purchase a firearm I must complete a firearm acquisition certificate course, pass a formal examination and submit to a thorough police examination of my social, employment and psychological history. I must also provide the police with character references that they can investigate to ensure I will use my firearms in a responsible manner. In addition, there is a mandatory 28–day waiting period before I receive my FAC with picture identification.

If I wish to hunt, I must first pass a mandatory hunting course which covers firearm handling and safety. I must then also submit to a provincially regulated test which further reiterates these points.

In addition to these regulations, the province of Ontario has strict ammunition purchasing regulations in effect. Once I have the gun and the legal ability to hunt, I must then adhere to stringent laws regarding separate storage of the firearm and the ammunition under lock and key, rigid transportation standards and tough guidelines for using firearms.

This clearly demonstrates how heavily the legitimate gun owners are already regulated. These regulations, like all gun control regulations, are very difficult to enforce. The police simply cannot search each household to see if these rules are being observed.

The UN estimates that firearm owners represent approximately 27 per cent of the Canadian population or seven million people owning up to 27 million firearms which is considerably more than what people are telling us in most of this debate.

Perhaps the government should concentrate its efforts on implementing innovative and cost effective methods of enforcing the laws currently in place. One such example could be a community based group of gun owners checking the homes of other gun owners in their area. This would alleviate the suspicions that many Canadians have of government intrusion in their daily lives and would assist in the enforcement of the safe storage aspects of Bill C–17.

Third, I would argue that crime control would be a more effective method of obtaining further public security. We must punish the criminal element and leave the law–abiding citizens alone. Firearms owners possess and use their firearms in a safe and responsible manner and do not contribute to crime or violent death and injury statistics.

In addition, the Canadian Centre for Justice Statistics reports that in 1991 two–thirds of all accused murderers were known to have criminal records, the majority for previous violent offences, and were already prohibited from legally owning or acquiring a firearm.

To further illustrate my point of the small number of firearms involved in deaths in this country, I would offer the fact that in 1991 only one person out of every 400,000 Canadians died as a result of a fatal gun accident compared to one person out of every 14,000 who died as a result of a fall. I am suggesting that we have adequate controls in place but we are simply not enforcing them.

Under Bill C–17 all firearms are required to be trigger locked in a locked cabinet separate from the ammunition. An analysis of fatal gun accidents in the United States could not locate even one instance where a child victim or shooter discovered a locked gun, unlocked it and shot themselves or someone else. Studies also indicate that at least one–half of all accidental shootings involved the consumption of alcohol just prior to the incident. How will the registration system prevent this from occurring?

Canadians must bear the responsibility of using their firearms in a responsible manner. The Government of Canada should not be asked to shoulder this burden. We must congratulate firearms owners in this nation for their initiatives into the area of the safe handling of firearms, not condemn them for their efforts. In Canada, while firearm ownership has increased, the accidental death rate has reduced by 80 per cent between 1986 and 1991.

In conclusion, people are demanding that we take action to further protect them from violent crime and other illegal activities present in certain areas of our society. The problem that the minister and indeed the entire government faces is the question of what response is most appropriate.

In his recent report, the Auditor General expressed concerns over the lack of evidence to justify the fact that the Canadian government passed more gun control legislation between 1977 and 1995 than in the entire preceding 50 years. The Auditor General also questioned the enforceability of the laws contained in Bill C–17. He also expressed anxiety over the lack of uniformity across the country regarding the FAC screening system.

These concerns are only a few expressed by the Auditor General and others concerned with this issue. I call upon the minister to consider the Auditor General's comments and the comments of all Canadians. Hunters and collectors compose a large part of our population and generate revenue for our economy each year through licensing fees, conservation efforts and the recreational hunting industry.

Canada's first explorers were from Europe, coureurs des bois who served the vital function of opening the new world to settlers. Hunting and responsible gun ownership is an intricate part of our rich heritage.

I suggest to the minister and to the House that firearms can co–exist with all Canadians in an allegorical guns and roses relationship respecting individual rights and privileges without further imposing unnecessary, cumbersome and expensive regulations on legitimate firearms owners and our nation's finances. The process must begin here with us.

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, of course I would like to see support for the amendment to split this bill. That is the way we should proceed.

I received some information with regard to the registration system recommended by the minister. The minister has said both inside and outside this House that it is going to be a simplified system, that it is going to place a tool in the hands of the law enforcement agencies to help them do their job and maintain a safer society. All the law–abiding gun owner will have to do is pick up a card at the post office or one of the stores in his or her community, fill in the make, model and serial number of their firearm and mail the card in.

Last week I visited three of the RCMP forensic laboratories and spoke with their technical experts on this matter. Either the information they have is not getting through to the minister or he is ignoring it. When I asked them about this concept of having the gun owner fill in a card and send it in, they laughed.

I also found out that these labs have what they call a standard collection of firearms, meaning they are one of a kind. No two firearms are the same in the collection. These standard collections are in every one of their labs across the country.

In this one lab the technicians had examined the long guns of which there were just under a thousand. They found that 20 per cent of those firearms did not have serial numbers and 1.7 per cent could not be identified.

I do not know how the justice minister is going to create a registration system when 20 per cent of a standard collection that is fairly representative of the firearms in this country do not have serial numbers. How are we going to register a firearm that does not have a serial number?

When I asked these questions the technicians' response was that they would have to be brought in. Brought in where? To the labs that do not as yet have but would have the technology to handle the thousands of firearms that would have to be brought in.

Already they are examining the feasibility of what form and what type of system ought to be used to place a serial number on a firearm. Certainly it is going to cost more than $10 a firearm. Certainly it is not going to impose a simple constraint on a gun owner to fill out a form. I ask the minister, how in the world can a serial number be written on a card if there is no serial number on the gun?

I was also told that many firearms in this country are over 100 years old. A firearm does not wear out. A firearm is usually maintained fairly well by the owner. Many of those firearms do not have the manufacturer's name, the calibre, or any identifying marks other than perhaps a model number or a serial number.

I was shown a firearm that had been imported from Russia. There are thousands of them in Canada, according to the information given to me. All it has on it is a serial number consisting of two Russian letters and three numbers. There is not the calibre, the make or any other identifying features on that firearm.

If we are going to develop a registration system which is truly going to be a workable and a valuable tool in the hands of our law enforcement agencies, we had better take a careful look at what we are going to do.

It is important, proper and wise that we consider the amendment before the House now. If the minister will consider splitting this bill, let us put our efforts together to devise a bill directed at the criminal use of firearms. If there are people who honestly and sincerely believe that universal registration will help, let us examine it before we go forward. Let us not hurry into something that our technicians are telling us will not work and will certainly cost a lot more than $85 million to establish.

I ask the minister if he would consider these proposals. This kind of information is going to be laid, lock, stock and barrel, before the standing committee, through witness after witness we will bring forward, from either the RCMP or the city police forces from across this country which have to deal with the problem. They are now faced with a situation in which they have to give a legal opinion in court instead of a technical opinion. I will give the House an example.

If the minister goes forward and creates an offence for a person in possession of a handgun based upon its calibre, such as the .32 and the .25, that will create a serious problem. The reason for that is simple. Although the offence, the charge, the information in court will indicate that the individual is in violation of a section by virtue of the fact that they are in possession of a .32 calibre, all the defence counsel has to do is ask the technical witness about the calibre of the handgun?

Although marked on its side that it is a .32 calibre, the definition of calibre, according to these technicians, is not what is marked on the side, but by the size of the projectile it fires. The .32 calibre, according to them, fires a .30 calibre projectile.

I asked them what they would say on the witness stand when asked about the calibre. They said they would simply tell the court that it is designed as a .32, its markings are that of a .32, but it fires a .30 calibre projectile and they would let the judge decide. If they had respond yes or no to whether the firearm is .32 calibre, they said they would not respond. I asked them if they have ever considered a career in politics.

My point is that there are a host of technical difficulties. When it comes to placing the identifying features from a firearm on to a registration card that the police will be able to identify without question, if they come across an individual with a firearm in the back seat of a car or in the trunk of a car for example, they are not going to be able to positively identify that firearm.

All we have to do is look at the Terence Wade report in which he outlined the problems within the present handgun registration system. Approximately 30 per cent of the information contained in that system is simply useless.

I understand from some of the legal opinions I am hearing that soon the challenges in court will render the handgun registration system invalid within a court of law because it cannot be relied upon.

• (1830)

There are so many different types of firearms that we are going to have an extreme degree of difficulty registering them to the point at which the registration card issued can identify one specific firearm out of the 7 million to 20 million that exist in Canada today.

I point out difficulties that the registration system will have. It flies in the face of what the justice minister has said in terms of simplicity.

If it is going to be as simple as the justice minister has indicated, then it is not going to be worth the powder to blow it in the hands of the police officers as an enforcement tool.

Let us take a look at this. Let us go forward with the portion directed at the criminal use of firearms. Let us take a second look at the other part.

The Deputy Speaker: According to the rules there is a six–minute extension of the debate because of the statement made earlier.

Mr. Bernie Collins (Souris—Moose Mountain, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, having served on the committee and being a member of the wildlife federation and coming from a rural riding of Saskatchewan, I am very concerned with the bill in its present form.

I support the minister with regard to the criminal element, the four–year mandatory sentence for the commission of a crime with a firearm. The use of a fake firearm in the commission of a crime and a one–year mandatory sentence I support wholeheartedly. Those actions that would take into consideration smuggling and other offences involving guns and other illegal activities I support wholeheartedly.

However, I have some strong reservations with regard to registration. If I am going to ask the citizens of Souris—Moose Mountain or any other area to spend $85 million, we have to consider what we are going to do for that cost.

I am prepared to register. I have owned guns all my life. I am a wildlife member and a firearms safety instructor. I was never impressed with the FAC formed some years ago. Now we have a four–page document. The government might as well have made it 30 pages and we could have had a light history of each of us as we own handguns.

In Saskatchewan most of the people who own handguns handle them safely, especially those who are members of handgun clubs. They have to adhere to all the rules and regulations.

As wildlife members we have to make sure that under Bill C–17 we store our guns and ammunition properly. We do have a responsibility to one another. As a hunter, in order for me to go on any other person's land I have to respect it. That is a privilege, not a right.

Many of us think it is a right and not very many farmers post their land because they expect that each of us going on that land does respect each other's property.

However, within the framework of the legislation as it comes forward, the reservations I have are that if we impose the opportunity for someone to enter into my home and check to see whether I have certain compliances, I would rather they do that with a search warrant.

Make no mistake. Legislation is not easy but it is all encompassing. Friends of mine have smaller barrelled guns that are virtually at the end of their time. They have spent great amounts of money on them and treasure them as relics. Those will now go to the criminal element because they will not register them or they will have to get rid of them.

If we are going to confiscate, compensate. People would accept that. When I was on the committee I did not say anything about handguns. I think we have to very careful of the direction we take in this regard.

I am very concerned. Rather than speaking to the media, this is the place where we should exercise our opportunity as members of this House on both sides to speak very clearly about how we feel.

I do not believe I would gain any points by going before the news media, trying to unravel where we are going. I credit the minister and the justice committee will review both the directions of my friends opposite and members on our side.

I will have the opportunity to vote against this bill. I cannot support it in its present form. However, that does not mean to say that I will not take a look at the changes that will come forward and address them to see if they meet the needs of the Canadians I represent.

I appreciate the opportunity to be frank and honest about a bill that I know the minister has great concern for, and great concern for all Canadians. Let us take a look at the changes and let us register our concern and our final judgment on it.

ADJOURNMENT PROCEEDINGS

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Osvaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ): Mr. Speaker, on March 1, in a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, I objected to the $975 fee announced in the budget that will be charged to anyone who wishes to immigrate to Canada, in addition to the $500 they have to pay to have their file processed by immigration officers.

Canada is now one of the most expensive immigration countries. This unfair and unacceptable decision adds to the incredible increase in all fees connected with immigration and citizenship. By the same token, I want to condemn office closures and personnel cuts at the Department of Citizenship and Immigration and the drastic reduction in the number of IRB commissioners.

These exorbitant fees are the equivalent of several months or even a year's wages for immigrants from poor countries. Refugees could not even afford to pay $500, so how could they pay an additional $975? Most of them arrive in Canada without any money. Sometimes they lost everything they had in their country of origin. When they arrive here, they have to get winter clothes, food and accommodation for their families. This tax is cruel and inhumane.

With this measure, how can Canada claim to honour this country's humanitarian tradition with respect to displaced or persecuted persons, as specified in the Immigration Act? Furthermore, the vast majority of refugees throughout the world are women and children. This measure will make sponsorship and family reunification even more difficult.

I want to take this opportunity to condemn the treatment of refugees scheduled for deportation at the Malton detention centre near the airport in Toronto. Last Wednesday, a citizen of Uruguay who was to be deported had to be taken to hospital after he tried to commit suicide. I mentioned the case of twelve people of Hispanic origin who were ill treated.

I again want to ask the minister to investigate these allegations and to deal with those who are responsible for this very serious and unacceptable situation.

[English]

Ms. Mary Clancy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, newcomers to Canada have access to the universal social programs that are paid for by all Canadians.

Immigrants and refugees also have access to our extensive integration and settlement services, the best in the world. The cost of these programs is $271 million a year, a great part of which goes to the province of Quebec. We are talking about language training, assistance in job searches and help for families enrolling their children in schools. The list goes on.

Canadians have told us through consultations that they want those who derive benefits from Canada's wide range of programs and services to help pay for them. Refugees and immigrants have said they want to help as well.

We recognize that not everyone will be able to afford the fee. For that reason we have created a new loan option that will enable refugees to get the financial assistance they need. Like the loan option for travel, we expect that they will repay those loans at the 95 per cent rate at which they repay the others.

Newcomers to Canada make an investment in their future, a Canadian future, and this is a small price to pay for living in the best country in the world.

LOW LEVEL FLIGHTS

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP): Mr. Speaker, on March 3 in question period I brought to the attention of the House the report of the federal environmental assessment panel which reviewed low level military training flights in Labrador and Quebec. Approximately 6,000 to 7,000 low level training flights a year are currently being conducted out of Canadian forces base Goose Bay.

These flights are allowed under a 10–year multilateral memorandum of understanding agreement signed by Canada and the NATO allies which expires in 1996. The assessment panel report recommends that the government accept the Department of National Defence proposal to negotiate a new agreement that would more than double the number of flights, establish a new practice bombing range and expand the flight training area.

This would effectively concentrate the flights over traditional lands that have been used and occupied by the Innu nation for more than 9,000 years. After 10 years of experience observing the effects of these flights, the Innu contend that the noise adversely affects the wildlife, especially caribou, which they rely on for food.

The noise also causes the Innu mental and physical stress and disrupts their culture and traditional way of life. Many Innu boycotted the hearings because they felt these concerns as well as issues relating to aboriginal rights and land claims negotiations were not being adequately dealt with by the panel.

Although the panel did not adequately address the issues raised by aboriginal people, it did acknowledge that research concerning environmental effects on the flights was lacking. On this point the report is very clear: "So little is known about much of the wildlife in the training areas and the effects of overflights on them over the longer term that much uncertainty and hence concern remains. As a result the panel could not draw conclusions on the longer term effect of low level flying on the natural systems".

The panel therefore recommended that the project proceed only if key conditions are met and certain issues are dealt with. The first condition is that before a new low level flying agreement is signed and the flights are allowed to continue, the government must establish an independent institute to study and monitor the effects of the flights.

The panel also recommended that as soon as possible the government establish a joint management board for the George River caribou herd and settle aboriginal land claims in the affected area.

In question period the Minister of National Defence gave no indication of whether he agrees or disagrees with the report, if he would recommend that cabinet accept the report or what measures the government will take to ensure that the panel's conditions are met.

The government's own assessment panel admits the impacts on the environment and aboriginal rights are unknown and DND's avoidance procedures probably will not work. Does the government think that these flights should be allowed to continue when their effects are unknown? When one does not know the impact of something, it may not be wise to proceed.

It is important for the Innu people whose lives will continue to be affected by this program to know now if the government will accept the panel's report and, if the government does accept the recommendations in the report, what steps will be taken to address the issues identified by the panel and ensure that its major conditions including land claims negotiations will be met. This is an important point, especially since it appears clear that the provincial government of Newfoundland, because of the land claims dispute, will not enter into land claims negotiations with the Innu people. It is very important to know how the Government of Canada will respond to this very important matter.

The government must ensure that it does not address the economic interests of one group while ignoring the economic interests of another.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, you will perhaps recall that the Department of National Defence had requested an environmental assessment be initiated to study the impact of an increase in the activity of low level flights at CFB Goose Bay.

The panel known as the FEARO panel has submitted its report to two of my colleagues, the Minister of the Environment and the Minister of National Defence. The panel has made every effort to hear from groups and individuals interested in putting their views forward. It has made recommendations to the government after considering their views.

[Translation]

The panel concluded that stopping the military flights would be very damaging to the region's economy. It recommended that this activity be allowed to continue, under certain conditions set out in the report. According to the seven members of the panel, there was little concrete evidence, at that stage, that the flights had a substantial negative impact on the environment, human health or the community.

[English]

The federal government is now studying the advice of the panel and will prepare a response to the panel's recommendations. It will be made public on completion.

ROYAL BANK OF CANADA

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have a chance this afternoon to speak about the tax system and in particular how it affects banks in Canada. I want to lead off first of all with a comment from the "Budget in Brief" or the budget itself.

I remember the Minister of Finance in his speech talked about the fact that the government was going to get tough. It was going to close off some loopholes. For example, the large corporation tax rate was going to increase by 12.5 per cent. I remember my friends on the Liberal benches were cheering at that point. There was a a lot of applauding and actually a couple of half–effort standing ovations.

This was a 12 per cent increase of the large corporation tax rate. The tax rate of large corporations will rise from 0.2 per cent to 0.22 per cent. Granted that is 12 per cent but it is a tax going from 0.2 per cent to 0.22 per cent. Anyone who knows anything about mathematics would say this is infinitesimal and yet technically it is an increase. My gosh, we are hardly getting tough when the tax rate goes from 0.2 to 0.22. Yet that is the kind of impression the government left, that it had gone to all kinds of trouble to close loopholes.

I am prepared to say this afternoon that the government did not close any loopholes. Even the old family trust, the one that is favoured and is considered the mother of all tax loopholes, is still there. Basically it was just tinkered with and that privilege will continue.

Let us talk about the Royal Bank. If there is one corporate sector that is held up it is the banking sector. I want to challenge people opposite and perhaps anyone watching to take a look at the annual report of the Royal Bank of Canada for 1993. When looking through this report, and granted I am not an accountant or a tax lawyer, but I have read a lot of annual reports and financial statements, to me it says the bank does not pay income tax. Page after page says basically that.

When I spoke with the bank I was told that is not technically correct. It actually pays tax. I have got to say today that the Royal Bank does pay some tax. The Royal Bank pays all the usual taxes that corporations pay but we have to realize that the Royal Bank is included in a number of subsidiaries. When we add up all of the subsidiaries which include things like Royal Bank Mortgage Corporation, RBC Dominion Securities Limited, Royal Trust, the Royal Bank Canada (Barbados) Limited, the Voyageur Insurance Company and many more—the consolidated umbrella of all of the aspects of the Royal Bank—it does pay income tax. As a matter of fact, it paid about $509 million in 1992.

However, what we would call a bank that we go into with tellers where we get a mortgage, a car loan or whatever, actually lost money. Therefore, in spite of all of its fees and so on, it did not pay income tax. It did pay a minimum corporate tax and did pay the corporation tax of 0.2 per cent which the government has now raised to 0.22 per cent. While the bank, including all of its subsidiary operations did pay income tax, for clarification the Royal Bank per se, unconsolidated, did not pay income tax. Therein lies the difference.

Did the budget change any of that? No, it did not. As a matter of fact, the budget changed very little of our tax system. I would be remiss this afternoon not to say that the large share of our accumulated debt—more than 45 per cent—comes from all of the tax loopholes we have in the system. That is what has caused a lot of our debt. Yet the government did not take any steps in any substantive way to close these loopholes.

I would be interested to hear what my hon. friend has to say in terms of whether the Royal Bank has paid income tax or not. Remember—

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance.

[Translation]

Mr. David Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, several banks reported record profits in 1994. This has led observers to wonder whether the banks are paying their fair share of taxes.

Banks pay a considerable amount of taxes. They pay income tax and are subject to two federal capital taxes, including the large corporation tax which applies to all corporations with more than $10 million in capital, and the capital tax for large financial institutions which acts as a minimum tax.

During the period 1991–93, the six largest banks and their mortgage loan affiliates paid nearly $1 billion annually in federal income tax and capital tax. The banks also pay income tax, capital tax, property tax and other types of taxes to provinces and municipalities.

Members are probably aware of measures that were introduced in the last two budgets to ensure that banks, and financial institutions generally, continue to pay their fair share of taxes. This year's budget introduced a special tax on the capital of large deposit institutions, including banks.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to 24 petitions.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

FINANCE

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to table the 13th report of the Finance Committee dealing with the borrowing authority.

I wish to thank members from all parties for their co–operation.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present two petitions today. The first one calls upon Parliament to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act to protect individuals from discrimination based on sexual orientation.

The second petition asks for the opposite.

SEXUAL ORIENTATION

Mr. Réal Ménard (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 asking the Canadian government to conform to the decision of the courts, which have ordered that the Canadian Human Rights Act be interpreted as also prohibiting discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation.

The petitioners therefore ask Parliament to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act in order to protect people against discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation, and I support this petition.

JUSTICE

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure this morning to present a petition containing 5,703 signatures from the lower mainland.

There has been great concern not only in my constituency and my area but across Canada for dangerous offenders walking our streets. These petitioners are asking Parliament to enact legislation against serious personal injury crimes being committed by high risk offenders by permitting the use of post sentence detention orders and specifically by passing Bill C–240.

It is my honour to present this on behalf of my petitioners.

GOVERNMENT SPENDING

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions to present today. The first petition comes from 1,520 petitioners of the riding of Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt.

• (1005)

They call on Parliament to reduce the federal deficit by reducing government spending and refrain from any form of increased taxation. The government has ignored that already.

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition deals with 1,032 petitioners from Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt who call on Parliament to oppose further legislation for firearms acquisition and possession and to provide strict guidelines and mandatory sentences for the use or possession of a firearm in the commission of a violent crime.

This brings to date 2,958 petitioners from my riding. I support both these petitions.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to present a petition with 38 signatures from citizens of the town of Elkford calling upon Parliament not to enact any legislation that would allow doctor assisted suicide. I concur with this petition.

JUSTICE

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions today.

The first, certified pursuant to Standing Order 36, is signed by residents of Ontario and Saskatchewan, some from the town of Wilkie, Saskatchewan, North Battleford, Saskatchewan.

The petitioners note that Robert Latimer of Saskatchewan was sentenced to life in prison for second degree murder with no chance of parole for 10 years. The petitioners believe the law should be flexible and based on the individual. They believe that his sentence is unfair and out of proportion.

The petitioners request that Parliament grant Robert Latimer a pardon, conditionally or unconditionally, for his conviction of second degree murder in the death of his daughter.

SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP): Mr. Speaker, the second petition is signed by many Canadians from all parts of the country.

The petition collected by members of the Council of Canadians notes that the petitioners have a right to health care if they are sick, to education if they need training, to a pension if they are senior, to insurance against joblessness if they are a worker, to assistance if they are poor or homeless, to day care services if they are a parent working outside the home and to access to cultural institutions.

The petitioners note that social programs form the very fabric of Canada and that cuts to social programs are not necessary since tax breaks and subsidies to wealthy individuals and profitable corporations have caused close to half the debt while social programs have caused less than 6 per cent.

The petitioners call on Parliament to maintain and enhance social programs which are the right and heritage of all Canadians.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mrs. Diane Ablonczy (Calgary North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions to present today on behalf of the citizens of Calgary North.

The first petition prays that Parliament will ensure that the federal Human Rights Act will not be amended to include the phrase sexual orientation as a prohibited grounds of discrimination.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mrs. Diane Ablonczy (Calgary North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition prays that Parliament ensure that the present provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada prohibiting assisted suicide be enforced vigorously and that Parliament make no changes in the law that would sanction or allow the aiding or abetting of suicide or active or passive euthanasia.

HATE CRIMES

Mr. Pat O'Brien (London—Middlesex, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty to present a petition which calls on Parliament to oppose amendments to the federal Criminal Code to include hate crimes legislation.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Question No. 92 will be answered today.

[Text]

Question No. 92—Mr. Harper:

What will each department or agency spend on television, print or radio advertising during the 1994–95 budget year?

Hon. David Dingwall (Minister of Public Works and Government Services and Minister of Atlantic Canada Opportunities): The following is the amount spent on or committed to advertising for the period April 1, 1994 to November 1, 1994 by departments and agencies through the Advertising Management Group (AMG).

If a department or agency is not listed, it is because there was no advertising activity undertaken for them by AMG in the stated period. Previously, departments were required to submit advertising plans to AMG annually. However, this was not the case for fiscal year 1994/95.

On May 11, 1994, Public Works and Government Services Canada (PWGSC) released new guidelines for advertising and public opinion research contracting. AMG retains contracting authority for these services, as well as responsibility for providing advice and services to departments to ensure consistency with overall government priorities. The new system is being developed and will be implemented in fiscal year 1995/96.

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from March 1 consideration of the motion that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government; and the amendment.

• (1010)

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Reform Party will be splitting its time.

As this House debates the budget we are discussing the very future of this country. We have already mortgaged our children's future. They will not be paying for their own social programs. They will be paying for ours.

How can government members sit here so smugly knowing that during the course of this Parliament the amount of money that we will have to make in interest payments will increase from $38 billion to over $50 billion? This increase of over 30 per cent is an additional burden that will continue to grow. Billions fewer dollars will be available for social programs and government operations.

The government says this is good. Liberal members say it is all right that one–third of government spending is for yesterday's programs. They claim they are at least slowing down the rate of growth of interest payments. I do not see how it can be considered much of a consolation knowing that the country is going bankrupt at a slower rate.

All this budget does is delay the inevitable. The fact that this budget was viewed as tough is not so much a compliment to this budget, rather it is a scathing indictment of previous budgets. If previous finance ministers had been sufficiently courageous to make the necessary cuts in the past, by today's standards those cuts would have been insignificant. Because they chose not to make those required cuts, today we have to cut deeper.

The current Minister of Finance is now faced with tougher choices. He could have and should have made the rights ones. Short term pain for long term gain. Instead he took the more masochistic route of a little pain this year and even more pain in the following years.

The latest budget alludes to some of the changes that are coming but it does not have the courage to address the problems in detail, head on.

The city of White Rock in my constituency has one of the largest concentrations of seniors in the country. Almost one–third of the population is over 65 years of age. The budget tells Canadians the government will be releasing a paper later this year with changes required to the old age security and guaranteed income supplement programs to ensure their affordability. These changes are to take effect in 1997.

The budget documents make it clear that significant changes are coming. While it promises undiminished protection for all seniors who are less well off, it gives us no numbers. What does this government consider to be well off? Is it $15,000, $20,000 or $25,000?

The Minister of Finance criticized the Reform Party for our taxpayers' budget which stated we would reduce the money paid to seniors by $3 billion. The minister stated this would affect all seniors earning more than $11,000. When we include OAS, GIS and the Canada pension plan and the fact the government pays out $34 billion a year to seniors, $3 billion accounts for only 8.7 per cent of this total.

Is this Minister of Finance suggesting that 91 per cent of Canadian seniors earn less than $11,000? Maybe the $11,000

We also note the government's plan to reform the provision of old age security benefits on the basis of family income. What a great idea. If the government had been listening it would have realized the Reform Party made that a part of its zero in three package over two years ago. Reformers recognized the unfairness of the existing system at that time. Unfortunately it has taken the Liberals two years to recognize a good idea. Now it will take them another two years to act on it.

At this rate by 1997 the Liberals will realize the value of our 1995 taxpayers' budget. However, we will not have to worry about their waiting another two years to act on it because by then Canadian voters will have unburdened them of the challenges of providing the country with fiscal leadership.

In defending the budget the Minister of Finance frequently commented on his belief of addressing matters with short term goals. This philosophy of short term goals also appears to include short sightedness.

There is no better example of this than the impending crisis with the Canada pension plan. We have heard the plan will be bankrupt within 20 years unless rates are doubled. The budget states that in 35 years rates will almost have to triple.

• (1015)

In order to deal with this impending crisis the budget says that the government should—actually the budget does not say anything. It appears this is too far in the future for the government to be concerned. Besides, why should cabinet members be concerned about the Canada pension plan when they have protected themselves with their own gold plated pension plan?

What does this impending crisis in the CPP mean to the average Canadian? For salaried employees who make approximately $35,000, this means their contributions will have to jump from $850 a year to almost $2,500 a year. Every employee will have $140 less each month to spend.

However, it is not just the employees who will suffer, but the small business person as well. A small business that employs 10 employees who each make about $35,000 a year will have to come up with an additional $16,000 a year in premiums. For a lot of small businesses I would suggest this is a significant portion of the profit margin.

The time to act on the problems with the Canada pension plan, old age security and guaranteed income supplement is now. Those people who are entering the job market today are the ones who will have to deal with the pension crisis in the year 2030. It is incumbent upon us to give them some idea of what they can expect for a pension and give them the opportunity to plan their lives accordingly.

We know the system has to change. We know there has to be more individual responsibility for looking after one's retirement. Let us be honest with Canadians today and develop guidelines for them to plan for themselves in an appropriate manner.

More important, let us show Canadians some leadership and get rid of gold plated MPs pensions. If this government has moved as far as it intends to move on MPs pensions, that is okay too. My colleagues and I are not too concerned about fighting the next election with the slogan: Liberals say the only way to get rid of the obscene MP pension plan is to vote Reform.

I have a word of caution for those MPs who think they have it made because after the next election they will be collecting their pensions. A Reform government would make any changes in the new MP pension plan retroactive.

As the baby boom generation approaches the pension years, it is absolutely necessary for us to get Canada's pension plans in order. Forget short term objectives. Think long range. As we continue to debate this budget we cannot think of today. We have to think of our children and their children who will be paying for our largesse.

It is extremely unfair for our generation to ask future generations to pay our bills. The bottom line is simple. If our social programs are worth preserving, then they are worth paying for. It is a disgrace that the largest expenditure in the federal budget is interest payments.

While the self–deluded government congratulates itself for a booming economy it is criminal that during a period of rapid growth the percentage of the budget that is consumed by interest payments will increase from 25 per cent to almost 33 per cent. This is the same error made by the previous Tory regime. In the boom years of the late 1980s it failed to bring the debt and deficit under control. When the business cycle took a downturn the deficit skyrocketed.

What is this government going to do when the economy hits the down cycle? The Liberal strategy of maintaining the status quo will lead to economic disaster. The government has taken a small step in the right direction. Unfortunately what was needed was an Olympic distance long jump.

I found it somewhat amusing when the Minister of Finance announced during his budget speech that he was bringing in the fourth largest deficit in Canadian history and his party gave him a standing ovation. What would number one have brought him, cartwheels in the aisles?

There is nothing to be proud of in this budget. Are the Liberals really proud of the fact that we now spend more money in servicing the debt than we do in transfers to individuals for social programs? Do they really think this is a good thing?

What about our borrowing habits? Are the Liberals really happy that foreigners own over $300 billion of Canadian debt? Think about it. With this latest budget Canadians will be paying more money out of this country each and every year to our foreign creditors to pay our interest charges than we will spend on our old age security program. Is this something to be proud of?

The solution is simple. If people do not want budgets that are tailored for Bay Street or Wall Street, get rid of the deficit so we do not have to keep going back to them for more and more. Instead, this government is intent on going back and humbly asking for a little less each year.

In summation the Liberals say the polls show that Canadians are happy with the budget. However they should look closely at the results of the Angus Reid poll where 39 per cent of Canadians felt that the level of government spending cuts were right; 43 per cent believed that the government cuts did not go far enough; and 83 per cent of Canadians are expecting further cuts.

It is time for the government to be up front with Canadians. Make the cuts that have to be made, get our budget balanced and start making inroads into our obscene debt. Our children can expect nothing less.

The Deputy Speaker: My colleagues, before we have questions or comments an error was made. In fact it was the Liberals' turn to speak. With your permission we will finish the questions and comments on the speech of the member for Surrey—White Rock—South Langley and then we will go back to the side that should have had the floor.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it was interesting yesterday in question period when I raised the question with the Minister of Human Resources Development whether he was actually floating a trial balloon with the idea of increasing taxes.

One of the difficulties we and I think all Canadians have is that we do not have any idea what the real intention of the government is. It keeps on talking about perhaps we should be taxed more or, as the Prime Minister says, perhaps the health act has to be completely changed, perhaps it has to be downgraded. The health minister says it will not happen and then the Prime Minister turns around the next day and says it might. It seems to be absolutely unclear as to what the intent of this government may be with respect to the health program and tax increases.

I have felt the frustrations from people in my constituency. I wonder if the hon. member has had the same feelings of frustration from her constituents over the fact that the government just does not seem to be coming clean with respect to tax increases.

Ms. Meredith: Mr. Speaker, we are being faced with our constituents who are trying to find out what there is in the future for them, what they can be planning for.

With the concern of health cuts and what not, the situation is that the provincial governments are having to reduce services because they are unable to go to the people with user fees and whatever to provide the same level of services. The concern is that the government promised that those services would be maintained yet in this budget the government is reducing its equalization or transfer payments to the provinces for those issues.

Constituents hear the government telling them one thing and see the government doing something completely different. There is concern and very much uncertainty out there.

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Surrey—White Rock—South Langley made an interesting comparison between the effect of the Reform taxpayers budget and the Liberal budget.

The hon. member said that the Reform budget has the motto short term pain for long term gain, whereas the Liberal budget takes the masochistic approach of short term pain followed by long term pain. It is a very interesting statement and I appreciate it very much. I know the hon. member explained it in her speech but perhaps she could explain it again so that perhaps the Liberals will understand why that is and why that comparison was made.

Ms. Meredith: I thank the hon. member for the opportunity to remind the government when it talks about making smaller cuts that what it is talking about is increasing the interest payments in the year 1997 to $50 billion. When the government is spending $50 billion on interest payments it means there will be less money to spend on social programming.

The only alternative the government has is to take the long term approach by taking short term pain by making the cuts now, making sure that interest payments do not escalate to the level they will be escalating.

• (1025)

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will be speaking for 10 minutes and will be sharing my time. Thank you very much for recognizing my opportunity to speak.

I believe that the Minister of Finance has done a masterful job of calming and appeasing the the bond holders, the people who move capital around the world, Wall Street, all the currency speculators. He has done a masterful job because it was only—

Ms. Meredith: With sun glasses on.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): It was only about a week and a half ago when I was actually inspired by the Reform Party's budget.

I challenged the Reform members saying they did not put enough focus and attention on the human deficit. All they want to talk about in this Chamber is the federal deficit. They do not seem to communicate their concern enough, in my judgment, about the human deficit that is being inflicted not just upon our communities and our country but all countries of the world because of the monetary system that has evolved which many sovereign countries right now do not seem to have a handle on. We are one of them.

The day I spoke in the House on that issue I received a paper from Professor Morris Miller. His paper is entitled: "Where is Global Interdependence Taking Us? Why We Need a New Improved Bretton Woods". I will read directly from the paper:

> By early 1994 there was a perceptible rise in the level of concern with the focus placed on the business of derivatives that are estimated to be outstanding in the amount of about $16 trillion. The size and volatility has provoked a congressional committee hearing and prompted The Economist to devote the cover and lead editorial of the May 14–20, 1994 issue to the theme "Your financial future" and to ask what the fuss is all about. The reason given is that
> "the industry is new, global and already very big: the telephone number figures for the supposed value of outstanding derivatives, $16 billion–plus, make the eyes spin—.Lastly, there are fears that the derivatives fuel financial market uncertainty by multiplying the leverage, debt based buying power, of hedge funds and other speculators, an uncertainty that could, if things went wrong, threaten the whole of the world financial system".

I want to quote from an article which appeared in the Sunday, March 5 Toronto Star business classified. It is the cover story "Billion–dollar boys":

> The Royal Bank is Canada's biggest player in international currency trading, turning over $20 billion U.S. or more every working day. That translates into $325 million a year in revenues and a healthy chunk of the $150 million in profit the bank earns from its treasury operations.
> It is a 24–hour a day, 365–day a year floating crap game where the players never see each other, rarely talk to each other, yet can often tell by the buying patterns on their monitors which bank in which city is offering them the business.

I started off by saying that I believe the Minister of Finance has done a masterful job in calming and appeasing the bond holders. I say that because the reaction from all of these players has been extremely positive.

However, I share the view of many in this House and even members of the opposition who ask the question: What will we do 30 months from now when the interest bill on our national debt might be $50 billion to $60 billion? What will we do when we have sold off federal assets coast to coast? What will we do when we have privatized everything that is left to be privatized? What will we do when transfers to universities and hospitals have been cut back? How will we pay the bill?

I suggest to the opposition that what we should do is not unlike what world leaders did after the second world war when they organized the United Nations conference on monetary and trade reform called Bretton Woods. Professor Morris Miller talks about that in his paper. That is the challenge for all of us in this room.

The world monetary system is not working. It is broke. We are in a canoe going down the river and all of a sudden we are in the rapids. We all want to be responsible. We do not want to tip the canoe. That is why I think the Minister of Finance has done a masterful job in cooling out these croupiers, these international casino operators that move capital and control our currency. Exchange rates and interest rates are up and down with no public accountability. They are not just doing it to us, they are doing it to all sovereign states.

Who are the losers? A certain group in our community is getting a whole lot richer and another group is getting a whole lot poorer. We all know this. How are we going to challenge these casino operators? How are we going to get at them? Canada cannot do it alone. Canada must have the support, not just of the G–7 countries but of all countries, even the new countries since Bretton Woods, that got together and said: "Hey, we have a mess on our hands".

I see lots of things in the budget that are very tough for people who will lose their jobs. The Minister of Finance has stated that. What could he do? This is the best he could do with the situation that has evolved.

Mr. Abbott: Oh, really.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Absolutely. One thing that the Minister of Finance stated in the budget that has not received a lot of attention is the responsibility the financial institutions in the country have toward small and medium sized business. He challenged the financial institutions to become more supportive, more compassionate and caring toward the small business community. We all agree that in that community rests the best hope for putting Canadians back to work.

In a couple of weeks we will begin meeting with the banks again and challenging them. I for one will be asking them: "How is it that you can operate private casinos, most of them in my city of Toronto, pushing unaccountable billions and billions of dollars a day but we cannot seem to figure out a way to deal with small business". The Minister of Finance has issued that challenge.

I realize my time is up but I would appeal to all members to let us start directing our attention toward a new Bretton Woods.

• (1035)

Mr. Ghislain Lebel (Chambly, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the comments made by the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood, and I realize that they are not different from those made by other hon. members who debated the budgets tabled in the last 30 years: reassure investors; reassure the big banks; reassure everyone except the Canadian voters, taxpayers and workers.

We remember their red book slogan. Strangely enough, they do not quote the red book as they usually do. Every time we put a question to the people opposite, they reply that it was in the red book.

You will note that, since the budget was tabled, they tend to ignore the red book more often than not. Their rallying cry in 1993 was "jobs, jobs, jobs". In Quebec and across Canada the Prime Minister repeated one single slogan: "jobs, jobs, jobs". I saw him do just that in answer to a few questions during the leaders' debate. Whether the question had to do with turbot or ski slopes, his answer was always the same: "jobs, jobs, jobs".

What does the famous budget that was tabled recently have to say about "jobs, jobs, jobs"? Nothing at all. They reassured everyone. They reassured investors and foreign markets—that is very important. However, the 29 million Canadians needing to be reassured are never mentioned. Therefore, I wish to ask him what he is doing to create jobs?

[English]

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I realize that I cannot flash the red book around because some people would consider it a display. I want to read from it. At page 109 it states:

> New multilateral regimes are needed to address many emerging global issues: the management of global fish stocks, the protection of the world's atmosphere, the maintenance of biodiversity, the control of population growth, the resettlement of refugees, and the equitable sharing of global wealth and resources. A Liberal government will foster the development of such multilateral forums and agreements, including an improved Law of the Sea, a new agreement on global warming, an improved international code of human rights, and a new agenda for development that matches the Secretary General's Agenda for Peace.

I would like to think that when the red book talks about an equitable sharing of global wealth and resources, that deals directly with my remarks today.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I was rather surprised, if not disappointed, that the hon. member again brought up the issue of the so–called human deficit, as though human deficit means that if governments are not prepared to make the cuts today they are somehow more compassionate than if they make the necessary cuts to be able to protect the ability to fund these programs.

I submit that the government with this budget has gone further to lose the ability to control our currency and we are becoming involved in the international currency casinos, as the hon. member has stated.

Pragmatist that he is, I wonder if he is being realistic in suggesting that Canada, as a bit player in the global world economy, can actually bring about the kind of restructuring he is talking about. Second, what is his position on the so–called Tobin tax, that is, trying to recapture some taxes in the actual exchange of currency around the world?

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I want to deal with Canada's role on the world stage. I had the privilege of working for a prime minister who, the history of the world will show, was one of the great leaders on the world stage and helped move Canada forward on that stage with the respect of nearly everyone.

• (1040)

The popularity of, the current Prime Minister is even greater than my former boss'. His relationship with President Clinton is extraordinary. I am optimistic that if they get together with a few other leaders—the problems are the same for all—we can get the process started.

In response to the second point on the Tobin tax I say briefly that part of a new Bretton Woods would have to look seriously at the Tobin tax.

Mr. Pat O'Brien (London—Middlesex, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it has been two weeks now since the Minister of Finance presented his budget. I appreciate the opportunity to reflect on it and to share some of the views of my constituents after having two weeks to consider its implications.

The people of London—Middlesex have been very congratulatory toward the Minister of Finance. Despite the remarks of some members in the opposition they are very pleased the minister actually met the deficit targets he had set. There may be debate about those targets but he announced the targets and actually met them. He is the first minister to do so in years. This was very positively received by my constituents.

An hon. member: He has exceeded them.

Mr. O'Brien: He exceeded those targets. They see this not as the ultimate end but as a major step in the right direction, contrary to what we have witnessed over the past several years.

What the minister has done in the budget is put the Canadian family on a diet. We have gained an unhealthy, crushing weight which must be lost. We know that. It is the deficit and the debt. This weight was not gained suddenly. It was not gained overnight. No one party, no one group of our society is at fault here, despite the views of some that look for simplistic answers and are quick to point the finger. This crushing weight was gained as a nation and that is how it must be lost. It must be lost gradually. It will not be effectively lost in any sudden downsizing or slash and burn approach to the problem.

Similarly it is a sensible way for an individual to lose weight. Canadians are all too familiar with the problem, many of them being overweight, as I confess to be. It is the sensible approach to take in trying to deal with the serious economic problems we face.

In October 1993 two visions were put before the people of Canada about this serious problem. There was the gradual, determined downsizing approach of our party and the more dramatic, sudden effort to downsize put forward by the Reform Party. In a democratic way the people of Canada spoke on October 25, 1993. They made it very clear with the results by passing judgment on the previous government's efforts in this regard. They very clearly chose between the two options presented by the Liberal Party and the Reform Party.

It is clear to me as it is to most Canadians that this nation deliberately chose a sensible, gradual approach to downsizing and to eliminating the deficit and debt. Given the reception of the budget in the two weeks since it was presented, Canadians have once again endorsed this approach.

Acceptance of this budget is very high. National and international financial experts have lauded it as balanced, as fair, as a common sense way to deal with our problems. I am not necessarily enamoured of experts, frankly. The people I am most interested in hearing from are the people of Canada. Roughly 70 per cent of them—this has varied by a point here or there from day to day—have consistently said they are pleased with the budget brought in by the Minister of Finance.

There are those critics that feel the budget was too easy, too soft and not tough enough. It is interesting because in consulting very widely with my constituents I have not heard that from the poor in the country. I have not heard it from the unemployed. I have not heard from the disadvantaged that the budget was too easy or too soft. I would submit that it certainly was not too easy or too soft.

Then we have critics who suggest that the budget is much too fair and is draconian in what it is attempting to do. I do not hear that from people who are trying to find work and are looking to us to help create jobs.

The unemployed with whom I have spoken know full well that if the government is to help create the climate for jobs and help them find meaningful employment, it will be done by putting our financial house in order.

I was gratified to hear from some of the unemployed in my riding that they understand the minister had to make the tough choices he made and the road to their personal economic future is that the nation's finances must be put back in order.

We hear seven or eight provinces claiming to be the hardest hit. How seven or eight provinces are hardest hit by the budget is beyond me, but that is exactly what we have been hearing.

When I hear a cry from one side that it is much too tough and from the other side that it is not tough enough, I am inclined to say that many of my constituents believe the budget is well balanced. It is tough but fair and the minister got it about right.

They do not like all of the budget. I do not like each and every single thing in the budget. Certainly Canadians do not like the pain that is in the budget for them individually, be they farmers in western Canada or some of my farm constituents, be they business people—

Mr. Cannis: Nothing is perfect.

Mr. O'Brien: That is right. Nothing is perfect and no budget is perfect. However Canadians generally accept that the budget is tough and fair and that the cuts undertaken were necessary.

Let me come to my constructive criticism that I have had the opportunity to make personally to the Prime Minister. In certain cases we could be selectively tougher. That is the way I would put it.

I hope future budgets will be a little tougher on wealthy individuals and corporations. I applaud the move to be tougher with the banks, but perhaps we will have to go further. Quite frankly the signal I hear from the minister and from the government. There is a message in the budget for the banks, for wealthy individuals and for corporations that there are other budgets to come and if they are not going to do more to help the economy of the country get going tougher measures can be brought in. This is something I will be watching closely as a Canadian and as a member of Parliament on the government side of the House.

The specifics of the budget are well known, but let me recall for Canadians two or three of the most important points. The key interim deficit target, as I said, was met and exceeded as my colleagues have pointed out: 3 per cent GDP by 1996–97.

The debt to GDP ratio, the size of the debt relative to the economy, begins to decline in 1996–97. The cartoon many of us saw was very appropriate. It was of Canada moving along the road, suddenly hitting something called the Martin budget and making a significant turn in the road. The budget represents a significant turn in the road. We are now on the path to getting out of the deficit and debt spiral we have put ourselves in for too long as a country.

For every dollar in new tax revenues $7 in expenditure reductions were made. That is the kind of downsizing Canadians are looking for from government.

To those who say that the budget was too tough, I say reflect on the debt load of the country. We do not want to see a collapse of our social programs. The cuts that were undertaken are necessary to ensure the social programs put in place by past Liberal governments, with I acknowledge many ideas coming from the NDP, will be preserved.

• (1050)

To those who say the budget was not tough enough, I say consider the reduced spending, the downsizing of government and the hitting of our targets. Indeed it was a job well done. Seventy per cent of Canadians support the budget. That is the reality.

I know it is not politically popular in certain parts of the House to acknowledge that fact. I understand that, but the reality is that it has been a widely accepted budget. It is one that Canadians can look forward to seeing repeated in years to come by the minister and the government.

Mr. Jake E. Hoeppner (Lisgar—Marquette, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I always enjoy hearing the hon. member for London—Middlesex talk about fairness in the country and in the budget. I remind him that during the election the government promised to keep article XI of the GATT negotiations. It had to break that promise. Fairness is fairness; it could not do much about it.

In the federal budget the government announced a three–year withdrawal of funding for genetic evaluation and milk recording programs because they were contrary to GATT. It seems to me the same week the U.S. government announced an additional $600 million of funding toward these programs. Is that fairness? Is that the type of protection the government is to give its dairy farmers?

I know we do not need subsidies, but surely to goodness there should be some fairness. Or, are government members trying to make sure they have a good supply of chocolate milk from the president? We could be running short of fairness and I am wondering how he would justify it.

Mr. O'Brien: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question from my colleague.

On article XI, 20 per cent of my constituents are agricultural people in rural settings. As the hon. member well knows, one of the first issues the government dealt with was article XI. My constituents and I submit that most Canadian farmers understand, as the member said, we could not do much about it. Canada stood alone and voted to maintain article XI. I do not know what else the government could have done than to stand alone, virtually totally alone in the world on something that important.

For my colleague's information, my riding of London—Middlesex in southwestern Ontario is one of the most active dairy farming parts of Canada. Before the budget the concern brought to me was that the government would somehow give into pressure and suddenly totally end dairy subsidies.

Frankly as late as last week some leading dairy farmers in my riding advised me that the 15 per cent cut followed by am additional 15 per cent cut was the kind of gradual, common sense reduction that would allow them to adjust. They were relieved that the government had the common sense not to suddenly end the subsidy because there were those calling for it.

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member said that he was proud of the government's budget, that he was proud it met the deficit target for the first year, and that the budget must be balanced slowly.

If the budget must be balanced slowly, how will the government explain to Canadians in two years when interest payments will have increased from $39 billion a year to $51 billion?

The member for Broadview—Greenwood asked the question a few minutes ago. What will we do when Canada faces federal government interest payments of $50 billion to $60 billion a year? His answer was that we would hold a world meeting like the one held after the second world war to deal with the problem.

Does the hon. member think the problem should be dealt with in a world meeting which may or may not happen? Or, should we face the reality of government overspending and deal with the problem in Canada by setting a definite target for deficit elimination, complete elimination, and meeting it, not just reducing the deficit?

Mr. O'Brien: Mr. Speaker, the question is whether we should concentrate on the problems here or have a world meeting, The answer is pretty easy and obvious. Of course we should do both. Canada does not stand alone in the world. No country, not even the greatest economic giants, can isolate itself from the global world situation.

Obviously we have to do both and the Minister of Finance has done just that. That is why the budget is being applauded both at home and by international experts throughout the world.

Mr. Gilbert Fillion (Chicoutimi, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I must inform you that I will be sharing my speaking time with my colleague from Manicouagan.

On Monday, February 27, the Minister of Finance tabled his 1995 budget before this House. Make no mistake about where I am coming from. I am, of course, in favour of streamlining public expenditures. I am also for a fair and efficient method of taxation by which the rich pay more and the less fortunate are protected.

How can this government keep hitting on the same group of people time after time, with each new budget measure, penalizing middle income taxpayers and digging into their pockets for millions and millions of dollars when it would be so easy to deal with the real problem and collect substantial amounts in a jiffy by making those who can afford it pay their share?

With its new budget, this government will cut $560 million in subsidies paid to railway companies with respect to grain transportation. At the same time, milk producers are seeing their subsidies cut without any compensation. It will be no news to anyone if I tell you that half of milk produced in Canada comes from Quebec. Yet, let it be known that our province is not as fortunate as Western provinces. No one told us about the rise in the price of milk, bread, butter and other dairy products that will result from this budget.

Who will foot the bill, if not the little people? Stop cutting essential public services and social assistance, which are so vital in these times we are going through. Why wait until 1999 to enforce the 21–year rule with respect to taxing capital gains on investments in family trusts? Why not start right now? Can you tell me why this four–year delay is necessary? Must I remind you that the Liberal government is thereby forfeiting hundreds of millions in revenue each year? Can we afford to do without such revenue at this time? Not likely.

And what about tax havens? There is nothing whatsoever in this budget concerning the 16 tax treaties Canada has signed with countries considered as tax havens. What are we to make of a $100 million temporary tax on the capital of banks, when the Royal Bank's net profit for 1994 was $1,169,000,000? The same year, it paid its president $2,740,000. I wonder at what rate that salary was taxed.

What is the result of that nice performance? The Royal Bank laid off 3,500 employees.

Let us recover the unpaid taxes and GST payments. According to the auditor general, thousands of companies owe several billion dollars in unpaid taxes on their profits. This is unacceptable.

Can the Minister of Finance put himself in the shoes of an ordinary person, who does not share his philosophy and certainly not his definition of philanthropy?

The speech made by the hon. member is laudable, honourable and perhaps justified, but can the same be said of his motives, or are those merely related to the referendum?

The money saved by making cuts to the UI program and transfer payments to the provinces is now used to finance part of the provinces' spending on welfare, post–secondary education and health.

I do not understand why these cuts do not apply to 1995; they are being postponed until 1996, 1997 and 1998.

Does the minister really think that no one will notice? I am convinced that, faced with the same situation, the federal government would have noticed.

On February 26, it was reported in the media that Quebec was deprived of $650 million in the national defence sector. What better way to correct that injustice than to eliminate 285 direct jobs at the Bagotville military base? The same could be said about the Saint–Hubert base. Yes, 285 jobs and, in the process, an elementary school with 10 classrooms. The fact is that over 1,000 people will be affected by these cuts. Once again, a decision was made without those affected being consulted. Entire families will be uprooted from their community. Following these cuts, how many small businesses from my region will have to lay off people or even shut down? The local population just does not accept that decision. It would be more appropriate to refer to my region as the queen of unemployment rather than the kingdom of Saguenay.

That decision will result in the loss of several million dollars for the region. While the province of Quebec is starting to recover from a hard recession, our region of Saguenay—Lac–Saint–Jean is sinking deeper and deeper into an inescapable economic slump. Our young people are leaving in droves.

Just take a look at the most recent data released by Statistics Canada. Last month, our unemployment rate jumped by one per cent, while it went down by one per cent just about everywhere else in the country.

The ICI organization in my region summed it up well when it stated that, and I quote: "Our region is a group of distinct communities which, as everyone knows, contribute a lot, in their own way, to the social, cultural, economic and political enrichment of Quebec and Canada".

What better way to thank that region and its residents for their support than to cut over 285 jobs in the military sector?

In addition to holding many surprises for the years following the referendum, the 1995 budget does not deal with the real issue. It does not deal with unemployment.

The Liberal government refuses to use the surplus in the UI fund to implement concrete job–creating initiatives. The government wants to reduce the deficit, but it does not resort to concrete measures and prefers to transfer the problem to the provinces.

• (1105)

I realize once again that, with its budget, the Liberal government is showing all Quebecers that the federal system does not work and that it would be much wiser on our part to get rid of it.

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Sherbrooke, PC): Mr. Speaker, I have a very simple question for the hon. member for Chicoutimi. He referred at length to the budget and to the connection he sees with the forthcoming referendum in Quebec.

Since he brought this up, I wonder whether the hon. member for Chicoutimi is in favour, as his leader seems to be, of changing the question for the referendum. The issue is relevant to this debate on the Budget, since he mentioned it himself. Furthermore, it creates a climate of uncertainty, as Premier Parizeau clearly admitted in his various speeches and statements on Parti Quebecois policy.

Considering the impact of this issue on the economy of the country and on the budgetary process, I would like to know whether the hon. member for Chicoutimi personally favours changing the question, or whether he would agree that this is a lot of window dressing, in other words, an attempt to manipulate the electorate. The option has not changed. It is still the same. The option is independence or federalism, and as far as I know that has not changed; but as far as change in the referendum question is concerned, we can expect, or at least we have the impression that there is some trickery afoot. I would be interested to hear the hon. member's position on this matter.

Mr. Fillion: Mr. Speaker, first of all, I am not so sure the question as such has a direct connection with the budget. However, I will respond to the issue raised by the hon. member for Sherbrooke and tell him that, for the time being, everything is on the table.

If the hon. member for Sherbrooke had any suggestions for the Government of Quebec as to the form and substance of the question to be asked in the referendum, he could have participated in a democratic exercise in which the National Assembly of Quebec gave all residents a chance to be heard. He failed to participate in this exercise which would have given him a chance to explain his position before the public.

I could also mention the outcome of the election in Brome—Missisquoi. I think voters made it quite clear to the hon. member for Sherbrooke that what he represented was not what they wanted. His party came in fourth or fifth.

My position is that, with our natural resources, with our culture and with everything we have developed in Quebec in recent years, the people are ready for this question, and they are ready to say yes.

[English]

Mr. Lee Morrison (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, sometimes I wonder how much longer we will have to endure this same tiresome line from the Bloc, constantly referring everything that happens in this House to the specifics of how it will affect Quebec. Never mind the country, just Quebec. Frankly, it drives me nuts.

He mentioned the milk subsidies and the 30 per cent cut over two years. He said the west received a much better deal because it received restitution for the cut of the Crow benefit. I wonder if he realizes or if he chooses to ignore that the cut to the Crow benefit was 100 per cent and immediate. He is talking about a 30 per cent cut over two years.

He also states quite correctly that 50 per cent of fluid milk production comes from Quebec. I wonder what he thinks will happen to all that subsidized milk production if he gets his dream of independence and the Canadian market is cut off, as it naturally would be—

The Deputy Speaker: I think the question is clear.

• (1110)

Mr. Fillion: Mr. Speaker, first, I must say that Quebec has been trying for over 100 years. Quebecers delegated members of Parliament to this House to defend their ideas.

We realized, at the end of debates, that our very simple questions were getting very little response. Whether it is agriculture, rail transportation or natural resource development, Quebec has always had to fight harder to achieve its goals. Today, with what we are offering Quebecers—and rest assured that we will be able to sell our dairy products, regardless, because they are quality products—

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. Debate resumes with the hon. member for Manicouagan.

Mr. Bernard St–Laurent (Manicouagan, BQ): Mr. Speaker, we were promised a tough budget focused on renewal. Tough, it was for sure. But it was tough for the disadvantaged, once again, with social programs being blithely cut directly and indirectly. As for the renewal part of it, it did not quite make it. There was no provision for job creation. Let us look at a few examples to justify my remarks.

I represent the riding of Manicouagan. In this riding, social programs take on considerable importance because the rate of unemployment is higher than the national average and also because the distances between villages is a serious impediment to the region's economic development.

When I say the rate of unemployment is high, it is true. And when the minister once again with a vengeance went after the most disadvantaged, that is the unemployed, well, the people in our area were affected on February 27 by the tabling of this budget. Already, in a region like ours, where, east of Natashquan, 85 per cent of the population depends on fishing, the people had to work 12 weeks in 1994 instead of the previous 10, in order to qualify for unemployment insurance.

In my riding, and more particularly east of Natashquan, managing to have six weeks' work was quite an achievement, given that the department of fisheries, on the other hand, was cutting quotas in order to preserve stocks. I do not question the merits of this, but people were losing weeks of work on the sea so stocks could be preserved. When you try to relate these two, that is, preservation of stocks and therefore fewer weeks of fishing, on the one hand, and the need for more weeks of work to be eligible for unemployment insurance, on the other, things do not add up once again.

In his February 27 budget, the Minister of Finance found another way to go after the people of Manicouagan. Just like that, he said that he was going to cut their unemployment insurance cheques by 10 per cent. In a way, he makes no distinction between people who live in Manicouagan, Saint–Hubert, Laurier—Sainte–Marie or Charlevoix.

In addition, my region is affected by the $300 million cuts to the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The unemployment rate is very high, as I said, and, consequently, many people live in housing managed by the CMHC. For unemployed people, and for those who have gone a step further and receive social assistance, finding low–rental housing is of capital importance. With one stroke of the pen, the minister added another hardship to the lives of the needy who, like you and me, will always be in need of lodging.

There are vital needs that the government must not play with if it wants to maintain the standard of living, such as food and lodging. In one speech, the Minister of Finance went after both simultaneously.

By skimming 10 per cent from unemployment insurance cheques, he took away quality and a good part of the food. By cutting the CMHC's funding by $300 million, he deprived many households, many families, often single–parent families, might I add, according to the statistics, of decent housing. Therefore, how much respect can the government really have for the population if it is not even committed to keeping just the basic elements that make up society's standard of living? If that is not taking it out on the needy, I do not know what is.

People in my riding will also be affected by changes to the health care and education system, but naturally, in an indirect way. Indirect because the minister calls these indirect cuts "decentralization". Allow me to explain. The minister anticipates that transfer payments to the provinces will be cut by $7 billion. Now, we all know that the provinces use that money to provide health care and education to their population. Yes, there is duplication, because the provinces are already administering these programs. But it is not decentralization, it is dumping the deficit in the provinces' backyards.

They are offloading the deficit because the provinces will get $7 billion less but will still be expected to provide the same services. However, the federal government is careful not to withdraw completely from health care and education for the simple reason that it wants to standardize these areas and raise standards so that it will be a little more costly for the provinces to operate in these fields.

They cut their financial support every year but still manage to give just enough to impose standards that end up costing a lot of money. They cut financial support without giving the provinces any additional decision–making powers. The minister calls this "decentralization", but in truth it amounts to offloading their deficit onto the provinces.

When people get sick in my riding on the North Shore, where the roads are inadequate, they must be transported by plane. We must give financial help to some doctors so that they can travel to remote areas like the North Shore. One does not choose to get sick in Kuujjuaq or Natashquan any more than in downtown Toronto.

There is also the gasoline tax. Again, the Minister of Finance did not discriminate, but that is not necessarily a good thing. Let us not forget that unemployed people looking for jobs hope that any dollar they put in their gas tanks will yield results. This measure will affect them indirectly once again. The budget does not say anything about job creation. The Liberal government got elected on its red book promises by shouting from the rooftops that they would create jobs.

In the first year of his mandate, the Minister of Finance and all the other Liberal members proclaimed to all and sundry that they would address the deficit by creating jobs. Yet, the February 27 budget showed us the true face of the Liberal Party, which does not do anything to create jobs. Instead, they went after the most needy while protecting their friends and being careful to keep up appearances and look good, which is important to the Liberal Party, of course. When I say that they are protecting their friends, I am referring among other things to family trusts.

However, I will not elaborate on this, because I do not have enough time.

This budget is a skilful political juggling act but in fact, there is nothing in it which really addresses the real social problems by creating jobs.

• (1120)

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member talked about the cuts in transfers to provinces under the Liberal budget. He talked about them as being downloading, which they are.

In the Reform taxpayers' budget, the alternative budget Reform presented, we also had reductions in transfers to provinces. We transferred the tax points along with the reductions. We transferred the ability of the provinces to raise the revenue to compensate for this reduction in transfers to provinces.

Let us use the analogy of a chicken and an egg. The government now transfers eggs to provinces so they can pay for some of their programs, done through transfer payments. Instead of transferring individual eggs to the provinces, the Liberals transferred a carton of eggs except they removed two. Therefore they transferred 10 eggs instead of the dozen. They cut the transfers.

There are also strings attached because of the regulations under the Canada Health Act. Instead of transferring the carton with fewer eggs Reform transferred the whole chicken. That is the program. We transferred the revenue producing ability to the provinces. Instead of transferring individual eggs and keeping the chicken as the Liberals have done in their program, Reform transferred the whole chicken so that revenue is in the hands of the provinces. They can fund these programs.

This would be popular in Quebec. Quebecers want more control of their future. Quebec generally is in favour of decentralization to the provinces.

I would like the hon. member to respond to what the Liberals have done in cutting transfers and not cutting the revenue producing ability as compared to what Reform proposed in the taxpayers' budget of cutting transfers to provinces but giving provinces the power to collect that revenue instead of the federal government and therefore giving provinces much more control over their own programs and their own resources.

Mr. St–Laurent: You know, Mr. Speaker, each minute the House sits is very important and certainly costs taxpayers a lot of money. I have great respect for the Reform Party's hypothetical budget, but if we start hypothesizing about hypothetical budgets in the House of Commons, we better change its name to House of Utopia.

I think our taxpayers deserve more respect than that. I have respect for the Reform Party and its budget, but unfortunately—or perhaps fortunately; Canada will decide after the referendum—this party is not in power. Let us look at more factual matters, matters before us today and that we have to deal with. Much as I respect Reform Party members, the fact remains that their Party's budget is nothing more than a piece of paper for the time being.

[English]

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Human Resources Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, one of my most rewarding duties as a member of Parliament is to visit schools in my riding and meet with students.

Three weeks ago I participated in such a visit. As usual I found the questions asked by the students quite interesting, the Quebec referendum, unemployment insurance and the environment.

I was struck by a very distressing thought. Each of these students has a huge debt hanging over their head. Because of the size of our national debt, those young students are starting out life with a $19,000 mortgage. Unlike past generations that could build their hopes and dreams on the solid granite of public finances, these young people are building their dreams on quicksand.

• (1125)

I cannot accept that. I entered politics to give a voice to young Canadians too often forgotten by past governments. It is fundamentally unfair to expect young Canadians to pay a debt incurred by past generations. It is particularly irresponsible for Canadians who have lived beyond their means for so many years.

That is why I am so proud to be a member of this government. This is a moment of great importance in our history. For the first time in many years Canada has a government and a finance minister ready to do what must be done in order to control the deficit.

The minister's budget speech was nothing less than a call to arms to all Canadians. We must band together to defeat the deficit and the debt. Steadily, silently these two economic forces are robbing our government of the strength and sapping it of the vitality it needs to foster growth, care for the needy and invest in the future.

For too long governments have postponed tough decisions. For too long governments have been pretending everything was fine while borrowing another $30 billion and $40 billion from our children. Now we have finally turned the corner.

A nation that has been sleep walking toward the precipice of bankruptcy has awakened with one foot on the edge of the cliff. Our government has the will to do what is necessary. As important, it has the support of the Canadian people.

Canadians are willing to support this government because they have seen the positive results of our financial stewardship. In the first year of our mandate 433,000 new jobs were created, all of them full time. Canada's economy grew at about 4.5 per cent, the fastest of the G–7. Manufacturing output is up over 9 per cent and inflation is at its lowest rate in 30 years.

At the local level the results are as encouraging. In Toronto unemployment dropped from 12 per cent to 9 per cent between January 1994 and January 1995. In my area of York region unemployment insurance claims have dropped from 70,491 to 13,773 in the same period.

When I speak to people in my riding I sense a renewed sense of hope, a sense of confidence. Business people are investing again, Canadians are working again.

Canadians know that our recovery will be threatened unless we get our financial house in order. They realize everyone must make sacrifices. Canadians must all share the burden of debt reduction.

Our government will reduce spending but it will also rationalize its operations, targeting spending to where it can do the most good. For every $1 of new tax revenue there will be $7 worth of cuts in expenditure.

Above and beyond deficit targets, this budget is about reinventing government. It clarifies the role of government within a new socioeconomic order in which the old rules do not apply.

To improve Canada's social safety net our government will introduce a number of innovative measures. It will establish the Canada social transfer. The CST will replaced established programs financing and the Canada assistance plan. It will cut unnecessary red tape, ensuring that the provinces will have maximum flexibility to design the programs that meet their needs.

• (1130)

The budget also calls for the creation of a human resources investment fund. The fund would involve a broad approach to employability issues. The functioning of the Canadian labour market would be in congruence with UI reform and the consolidated transfer.

The human resources investment fund could encompass support for a wide range of employment development services including assessment, counselling, training, work experience, self–employment and community development; the development of occupational standards; national labour market information; sectoral councils; child care for working parents; a national workplace strategy; programs and services responsive to the needs of aboriginal Canadians; assistance for persons with disabilities; and assistance for students and adult learners.

The restructuring and redesigning of programs could be based on principles established by the social security reform and linked to increased flexibility in the use of the UI fund. These principles include tailored programs to individual client needs, delivery involving community partners and the private sector, the use of modern technologies, national standards and priorities.

The government intends to reform the UI system to bring it into line with the new economic realities facing the nation. A greater emphasis will be placed on helping Canadians acquire skills and find work. We will move away from traditional UI and focus on investing in people. We will replace despair, dependency and defeatism with ambition, autonomy and advancement.

The government has signalled its intention to protect senior citizens. At present old age security and the guaranteed income supplement cost Canadians over $20 billion a year. It is estimated the cost will increase by 60 per cent over the next 15 years as the population ages. Clearly Canadians would want us to do something about it.

The 1995 budget sets out the principles that will govern the reform of OAS and GIS: undiminished protection for less well off seniors, continuation of full indexation of benefits, OAS benefits to be provided with reference to family income levels, greater progressivity of benefits by income level and control of program costs. This will be a very important step toward achieving intergenerational equity.

These are all positive developments in the evolution of the nation. The budget holds the promise of a better tomorrow. It says to Canadians that the sacrifices we make today are for a greater good. Sound public finances are the bedrock of a prosperous future. Freedom from debt is the greatest legacy we can leave our children.

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Sherbrooke, PC): Mr. Speaker, let me first congratulate the parliamentary secretary on his last phrase. He said that freedom from debt was the greatest legacy we could leave our children, if I understood correctly. I only wish he had said that in the years he was sitting on this side of the House. However that is another story.

I want to put a question to the parliamentary secretary who I know is very much in the loop in terms of what is happening within government. I asked him a question about 10 days ago in the House relative to pension reform that he talked about in his speech. He evoked principles relative to pension reform. I am very interested in the issue. It is one that needs to be tackled head on. I agree this is something that requires the immediate attention of the country if we are to resolve some of the difficult issues.

I am assuming the government is not improvising pension reform, something so important that the parliamentary secretary chose to speak to it. For example, he mentioned a 60 per cent increase in expenditures over 15 years. That is not a number he invented or drew out of a hat. It must have come from somewhere.

Given the importance of the issue to all Canadians and the consequences evoked—and I believe there is a bit of a hidden agenda in the budget—I have a very direct and simple question for the parliamentary secretary. In fairness to Canadians is the government willing to have all Canadians participate in the debate so we will all know what the choices are?

I guess whether he answers will be an indication of whether there is a hidden agenda. Will the government agree to table in the House of Commons for all of us to see, read and reflect upon the studies the government has undertaken with regard to pension reform?

Mr. Bevilacqua: Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member that it is a very important issue. A lot is at stake in the issue of social security reform.

Unlike past governments that ran away from the challenge of discussing major issues such as training, unemployment insurance, child care, and reforming and modernizing the system, we decided to engage Canadians in the dialogue and to consult with Canadians.

The hon. member can rest assured the government will consult Canadians on any measure we take related to the issue of pension reform. It will consult all members of the House in the same manner and fashion as we engaged in prebudget consultations, social security review and many other issues ranging from defence to external affairs. The government has created many opportunities for Canadians to participate in dialogue with the Government of Canada.

With reference to the specific question on pension reform, the hon. member has clearly read the budget documents. He has read the five principles outlined. From the day the Minister of Finance tabled the document until today nothing has changed on the government's agenda.

Mr. Jake E. Hoeppner (Lisgar—Marquette, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I enjoyed the parliamentary secretary's kind words, but there is a saying on the farm that kind words and good intentions do not feed too many animals.

I am just wondering how he can say that the government is after financial stewardship. At the research station at Morden, one of the most successful research stations in Canada, 40 per cent of the jobs were cut. It took away the buckwheat program and the potato program. It moved them up north where they could all freeze. Is that good financial planning?

I see their pension funds have not been cut too drastically. However, does he know of a program called the Canadian polar commission? The polar commission takes $1,081,000 from the government. It employs six people and half the money goes to salaries. The commission spends on the dissemination of information. The amount of transfers to people looking into this matter is $20,000.

Is it financial responsibility to spend $20,000 out of $1,081,000 on the actual work and the rest on salaries? I would like to see some improvements there.

Mr. Bevilacqua: Mr. Speaker, at the expense of sounding immodest, we have to look at the record. When we look at job creation under the government we see 433,000 new jobs. We also see a government that is looking at a number of issues including program reviews. It is looking at the programs that are working and the ones that are not. It is creating a climate for new jobs.

• (1140)

If the hon. member had listened to the speech of the Minister of Finance speech, he would have found that we are hitting all the targets we have set. We are moving toward achieving the results that Canadians wanted during the election campaign.

The red book is being honoured and Canadians seem to be extremely happy with the performance of the present government. Perhaps the hon. member should join in the applause.

Mr. Andy Scott (Fredericton—York—Sunbury, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am anxious to participate in the debate on the 1995 budget because I believe it represents an historic occasion in our country's evolution.

It is not the kind of budget I would normally want for Canada. I would rather enhance programs than reduce them. I would rather be involved in introducing new programs than analysing the effectiveness of existing ones. As Liberals I am sure most of us agree that the budget was born of necessity, not ideology.

Our social programs are threatened by our cumulative debt and our annual deficit. I am not one of those obsessed by debt. My banker can attest to that. However, I am very protective of our sovereignty as a nation and our ability to design and implement public policy and programs that reflect Canada's values as a generous and civilized nation.

Because we borrowed to finance our programs we have allowed foreign lenders to affect domestic policy in a manner that simply is unacceptable. We must reclaim our ability to pursue a style of governance that reflects Canadian values: compassion, equity, tolerance and pluralism. These are Canadian values. Many elements of the Canadian way of life may be uniquely Canadian. Our responsibility is not only to these ideals as they affect us as a nation. Our responsibility is to these ideals as a world leader, as a country that others turn to.

Another threat our social programs face is much more practical. In 1995–96 debt charges will consume $49.5 billion of our annual spending. Over the last 15 years interest payments have grown from $8.5 billion to $42 billion and have devoured over $445 billion of taxpayers' money, dollars I would much prefer to see placed in the hands of Canadians in need, dollars better spent on social housing or literacy instruction, dollars we need to eradicate child poverty, and dollars we need to meet our international obligations as a nation of great wealth and advantage. The thought of how much better we might use these dollars causes me to accept the need to reduce the deficit.

The unproductive nature of interest expenditure is partially responsible for the resistance of Canadians to broad tax increases. Our citizens pay more but see less in return as we finance past expenditure.

Even as I speak in favour of deficit reduction, I call on our government to exercise compassion and creativity as it implements the budget over the next 12 months. All Canadians must share in the mission of reclaiming our fiscal and monetary autonomy. In return, government has the responsibility to be fair, creative, thoughtful and forthright.

The approach I endorse contrasts dramatically with that outlined by the Reform Party in its recent attempt at a budget proposal. While the Reform Party's position does not surprise me, I do find shocking that my colleague from Saint John would support it. Does the fact that she supports the view we have not eliminated the deficit quickly and decisively enough also mean that she supports the approach as outlined? The Reform agenda would destroy the fragile but real recovery we are experiencing in New Brunswick. It is sad its prescribed medicine would only push us back into the sick bed of dependency it speaks of so often.

The government is committed to a balanced but disciplined approach to deficit reduction. Canadians have been asked to help and I believe there exists an acceptance of the need to bring revenue and expenditure closer together.

• (1145)

The Minister of Finance is committed to seeing social tax expenditures scrutinized with the same vigour as has been applied to other social spending. He has acknowledged the need for more comprehensive tax reforms.

The government has spoken of Canada's commitment internationally on the need to come to terms with currency speculation and sharing more fairly the benefits of new technologies.

Not only does the government need to balance spending reduction with tax fairness, it is also necessary to be prepared to do things differently, to be more creative, to consider solutions quite outside conventional thinking in the application of the budget.

Significant change does not come easily in large bureaucracies. Through no one's fault inertia is a powerful force and change, particularly dramatic change is seldom seen. Canadians from all walks of life have been asked to change their thinking, to expect less and contribute more.

I believe we will meet that challenge but in return, government must be prepared to change its thinking, to listen seriously and consider outside, sometimes unconventional, solutions.

As a member of the parliamentary committee on human resources development, I can attest to the fact that many Canadians believe for example that the federal government should show leadership in eliminating overtime and considering a shorter work week. This would soften the effect of expenditure reduction on our employees while setting an example for other governments and the private sector with the view of sharing better the jobs that currently exist in this country.

A second area where government must show leadership is in our approach to economic development. We must carve out clearly in a mixed economy the role of government and apply available resources and regulatory power toward that end. We must be prepared to use our legitimate power to make the market work for as many Canadians as possible, whether it is increasing the availability of capital to small and medium sized businesses, direct financial support for community development, pushing more forcefully the need for private sector retraining and upgrading, or taking a more vocal stand internationally on questions of employment standards or tax fairness.

If the government can no longer afford to offer as much protection to those for whom the market does not work, it must accept a larger role in ensuring that the market works for more Canadians.

I said at the start that I was anxious to participate in this debate because it marks the beginning of a new era for Canada. Some Canadians have said we are getting meaner. Others, unhappily, say we have not been mean enough. I am an optimist. I believe we can find that place where we gradually disentangle ourselves from the vulnerable relationship we have with the money markets but where we also recognize the vulnerable relationship many Canadians have with us.

Yes, we can find that balance but ultimately it is not in the numbers. The balance we seek and must find lies in the hearts and minds of Canadians, in our compassion, our creativity, our generosity and ingenuity.

As a member of the committee that travelled Canada for the social security review, I can assure the House that Canadians have ideas, ideas born of a desire to eradicate poverty, to teach people to read and offer shelter and jobs. They want us to listen, to work with them, to be more inclusive both in our policy development process and in the results we hope to achieve.

Over the coming months the government will be engaged in discussions with the provinces among others on the question of the social transfers. Much of what Canada will look like in the future will be affected by these discussions. They must be driven by a vision for the kind of Canada we want and can afford for our children.

To engage in the exercise without considering affordability would be irresponsible and frankly silly. However, to engage in the exercise without a national vision would be equally irresponsible. What is more, it would be an abdication of our responsibility to those whose vision and determination have brought us to where we are: the country recognized objectively as the best place in the world in which to live.

What is better than that? We have to stop beating ourselves up. We have to stop beating each other up. All this talk of crisis and catastrophe should not cause us to lose sight of the comparative credibility and objectivity between the United Nations and some analyst with the Wall Street Journal.

• (1150)

We have a debt and deficit problem. We will fix it. We are a wealthy, safe, generous nation with a magnificent future. For those who think otherwise I can only turn to the vocabulary of my 10–year old son and say get with the program.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Liberals constantly talk about the whole issue of cutting slowly.

I wonder if the member has had a mortgage on his home. I will assume that he has, along with probably 90 per cent of Canadians. Let us say it is a $50,000 mortgage and he is paying $500 a month. He probably knows that when he first starts paying on the mortgage very little goes toward the principal. Most of his $500 payment is going toward the interest. I also wonder whether the hon. member has had the opportunity perhaps through an inheritance or hard work on his part to put $10,000 toward the mortgage and seeing that instead of the money going toward interest that suddenly he is paying more on principal.

In other words, going slowly on deficit reduction simply does not work. To get the deficit to a point where it is not continuing to add to the burden of the debt there must be prompt, aggressive action so that we will not be doing away with our ability to fund the social programs, so that we will be able to reverse the situation that is forecast and planned for by his government of increasing interest payments from $38 billion to just under $51 billion. That $13 billion is eating up the ability to fund social programs.

Surely there must be some Liberal in this House who has had the experience of making an abrupt payment down on the principal of a mortgage. Can the hon. member not see that that principal might not apply to Canadian finances, therein being able to correctly and properly protect social program funding.

Mr. Scott (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Kootenay East for his question.

I am painfully familiar with mortgages. I was not kidding when I said my banker knows I am not obsessed with debt. Having said that, I do not think that in the interests of making a payment on the principal of my mortgage that I would be prepared to feed my family any less or take away from the college trust fund or my life insurance.

The reality is we have to engage in this exercise in a very practical, common sense way. Perhaps it is a regional problem, I am not sure but over and over again we hear particularly from our Reform Party colleagues that we are not moving quickly enough. I can only say as an Atlantic Canadian that to move any quicker would place us exactly in the position we are trying to escape from in terms of generating economic activity in our region. We benefit from social programs. We benefit from transfers.

To respond to earlier analogies with regard to chickens, the fundamental problem with the argument that if we give every province the chickens is that not all chickens are the same size. Consequently, part of what this nation is about is sharing the coop so to speak.

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has referred to this government taking control of Canada's finances again and the importance of that happening. I applaud him for recognizing that.

When we look at the Liberal budget and examine where the biggest change in transfer payments has taken place, has there been an increase in transfers to provinces? No. There has been a reduction of at least $4.5 billion in transfers to provinces. Has there been an increase in transfers to individuals? No. In fact the biggest threat of this Liberal budget is in transfers to individuals through social programs. These programs are not sustainable because there has been no definite target for elimination of the deficit.

The largest change in transfers of government money in this budget is in fact in transfers of money to bankers. When this member talks about Canada regaining control of finances, how can that possibly be happening when this budget in fact involves an increase in transfers of $12 billion to bankers, some of which are foreign bankers. More and more are foreign bankers.

I would like the hon. member, who happens to be on the social programs committee, to explain to me how this budget fits in with his stated goal of Canada taking control of its finances. Being on the social programs committee, can this member explain how social programs will be funded down the road when $12 billion more will be spent on interest payments within two years, and then ever increasingly more beyond the two years?

Mr. Scott (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, it is merely a question of balance. It would be ridiculous to annihilate social programs in the interests of saving them. Consequently, we have to find the place in the system where we strike the balance that allows the programs to be affordable.

I have great faith in the wisdom of Canadians. They were presented with the option put forward in this budget of a target of 3 per cent at the end of the third year and were also presented with the option put forward by the Reform Party. They picked our solution. I have some faith in the good judgment of not just the Minister of Finance and my colleagues in the government, but also the good judgment of Canadians who chose a balanced approach.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, a point of order. I believe that every member should be permitted to speak in this house, particularly on issues like this debate.

However, I note that in the last House our party had one independent member, the hon. member for Beaver River. When she was in the House the Conservatives consistently dealt her out of being able to enter into debates.

I wonder if the Chair might be able to explain to the House under what rules the next member is permitted to speak, considering that he, as a member of the previous government, did everything he could to stop our member from being able to speak.

The Deputy Speaker: The member for Kootenay East raises an important point. There are about 300 members in the House. On a mathematical basis, the unrecognized party members are entitled to speak about one every 25th slot. We are at that point now, approximately. I take the point of the hon. member for Kootenay East because I sat in the corner back there, too. I know exactly what the member is talking about.

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Sherbrooke, PC): Mr. Speaker, I will not pursue the point of order except to say that maybe the hon. member for the Reform Party should let go at one point in time. When does he think kicking someone around should stop, if that is the case? Or does he feel that we have abused our privileges in this place? Anyhow, we probably witnessed a new definition of what meanness is in this place, but for many reasons, I am a lot more interested today in addressing the issues relative to this budget.

This budget has the advantage of putting things into focus and perspective in regard to a few elements that are important to Canadians. First is where the Liberals really stand on these issues and what their real agenda is or is not. It puts into perspective the previous accomplishments of other governments and what their records mean and what do they not mean. It also brings into perspective the real issues we have to address.

I wish to begin by being as frank and straightforward as possible. There are things in this budget we agree with. There are things in this budget that we think are positive for the country. We intend to support those proposals that are positive and constructive.

I do not think it is very useful for us to enter into any phoney indignation on budget night in terms of what the budget is all about. It is not useful to stray around with inflated vocabulary that only rings false in the ears of the Canadian public when they try to look at this budget.

Frankly, in trying to assess how the government needs to deal with this issue, anything I have heard is that Canadians want government to succeed. Canadians want the government to do well in dealing with the budgetary and fiscal problems facing the country. They do not want to see the government face another crisis. On the contrary, they hope that it will make the right decisions. It is very much in that spirit that I would like to offer my thoughts and comments today.

The most interesting part—I happen to be one of the few members in this place who has a view on this because I happened to be in the other Houses—is that this budget also brings into perspective the policies and positions of the Liberal Party of Canada. That has to be one of the first assessments that we need to make about the budget.

To be brutally frank, it needs to be said that the budget is a denial of the principles espoused by the Liberal Party during its nine years in opposition, a repudiation of the policy it placed before the Canadian electorate 16 months ago, an abandonment of those people whose defenders the Liberal Party pretended to be.

For nine years Liberals purported to defend old age pensioners against any reductions in benefits, to fight for the jobless against changes in unemployment insurance, to maintain the annual increases in parliamentary grants to VIA Rail, to the CBC and to all the cultural agencies. They called for the expansion of day care.

The parliamentary secretary this morning even had the temerity to raise day care when if one reads page 40 of the red book as Canadians have, one will find there is a clear commitment to increase day care spaces by 50,000 a year the moment the economy goes beyond 3 per cent.

Is there anything about that in the budget now? That was the Liberal position. They vowed to stand shoulder to shoulder with single mothers, with poor families, with refugees and immigrants, with the regionally disadvantaged, with the sick, with needy children here at home or abroad, all of whom were to be given more, not less, financial support by a Liberal government.

Maybe I am naive but I am still young enough to be disheartened by the treachery and old enough to know that in time the Liberal Party will pay for this. It is said often enough but it bears repeating because it is true: Liberal policies in opposition were unrealistic. Their promises were irresponsible, their opposition to budgetary restraints of any kind in any circumstance at any time over nine years were not principled, but dishonest, totally political and wilfully ignorant of the national interest.

Everywhere they sought to obstruct—I was in that House for nine years—systematically and without question any cuts or reductions in expenditures. In fact when the government was elected in 1984, previous expenditures were growing at a rate of about 13.4 per cent a year. Program expenditures under the previous Liberal government were brought down to under 4 per cent a year. Did Liberals support that? No, not once that I remember.

What now? Do we congratulate them on having seen the light? Is their policy any more principled than the old policy? Is it any more credible? Is it any more reliable? That is the real question.

Liberals bitterly fought the Canada–U.S. free trade agreement. I remember that well. Under the present Prime Minister's leadership, they opposed NAFTA, the North American free trade agreement, in Parliament and promised on the hustings they would not ratify it unless specific amendments were agreed to.

They opposed the previous government's energy policies. They obstructed the changes in pharmaceutical patent protection. We are still not sure where they stand on that today. They fought the dismantling of the foreign investment review agency. They denounced deregulation and privatization. They also swore to abolish the GST, to scrap the GST. We even heard in their first budget—

Mr. Nault: It is coming. Don't be disappointed.

Mr. Charest: The hon. minister responsible for financial institutions says it is coming. Is that not what they said in their first budget, that they were going to accelerate reform of the GST? Is that not what the Liberal government said in its first budget?

What has happened since? Nothing, except the vain hope that the Deputy Prime Minister will resign if it is not done. That is the glimmer of hope they have offered to Canadians with regard to changes to the GST.

The vindication of these Tory policies lies not in their dubious embrace by today's government but rather in the results now being achieved in the country's productivity, its increased investment in exports and the new job creation.

Our economic growth today and in the foreseeable future is based for the most part on these Conservative initiatives so mindlessly and vigorously obstructed by the Liberals in opposition. It is one thing for the opposition to say that everything that is wrong with the country today was the previous government's fault. If we were to follow that line of thought, then they would have to admit that what is working would also be the previous government's fault.

Things as trivial as an increase of 40 per cent in trade between Canada and the United States, which is the number one reason we have job creation in the country today, that they fought against vigorously and at every turn. Things like changing the GST because it actually changed the federal sales tax for manufacturers in Canada. If we ask manufacturers today why they are more competitive, it happens to be because of the GST.

There is more than one side to this story. Those are things that are forgotten. For all of these policies they demonized Prime Minister Mulroney. They and their acolytes would not even concede the elementary assumption of civilized discourse in a democratic society, that their opponents acted in good faith for good motives but maybe with a mistaken policy. That usually would be the presumption. No.

As far as the Liberals were concerned, Tories wanted to sell out the country. We were bent on dismantling the federal government. We were going to balkanize the country, killing the Canadian dream. This was imposing the Thatcher–Reagan neo–conservative corporate agenda on Canada. That is what they were saying during the nine years in this place.

Now the President of the Privy Council is quoted in the Toronto Star of March 4 acknowledging that he cannot recall the Conservatives cutting anything like the $7 billion the Liberals plan to take out of the provincial social programs between 1996 and 1998. The same minister in the same article is quoted invoking the name of the Hon. Erik Nielsen, boasting that this budget was a mega–Nielsen exercise.

These are the same people who for nine years behaved in a way that is totally the contrary of what they are espousing today. As far as I know there is only one Liberal member of Parliament who has stood by his convictions. Only one Liberal member of Parliament has said he is offended by this. That is the hon. member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce who is quoted in the same newspaper article as saying it is a repudiation of everything the party stood for in opposition and promised in the 1993 campaign.

This is not the member for Sherbrooke. This is not a member from the Reform Party. It is not my colleague from Saskatchewan saying this. It is a Liberal member of Parliament sitting on that side of the House who was there for the last nine years, who was there before that also and still sits, for now, with the government. We await his vote on the upcoming budget in regard to these issues.

As for other Liberal MPs, their critical faculties and social consciences seem to have been dulled or blunted along with their political instincts, lulled by the most insidious narcotic known in politics: the polls, the fast results and public opinion polls.

The Minister of Finance now boasts that his budget policy is such good politics that there will be more of the same, more again and yet even more as we get closer to the election campaign. Let me offer some advice to members in the House. Save those quotes. Cut them out. Keep them close. As we approach the days of the election campaign you will find them very useful.

We will also find out in the next two or three years that the government has an intended raid on the treasuries of other governments. That is what the budget is really about. From 1995 to 1997 there is a series of delayed action bombs which it hopes will explode in provincial jurisdictions and take out provincial and not federal politicians.

Most of all, we should give credit to Canadians. If anyone deserves any credit in this country in regard to some of the good decisions that are being proposed it is the Canadian people who have spoken in a loud voice and with consistency in regard to these issues.

The bottom line in the budget is that the cost of servicing the debt is going up as fast as program expenditures are coming down. Fiscal improvement is the product of increased revenue from economic growth. That is what we are seeing. So far as balancing the budget is concerned it has to take place at some unspecified time.

The government has made hay of the fact that it has a 3 per cent commitment in terms of reducing the deficit to GDP. It even has the temerity of adding that this is the standard of the European Community. What it forgets to say is that in the European Community this standard is applied to national governments.

In Canada, in the federal system, the provincial governments also incur debt. This year alone it is estimated that they will add $16 billion to the annual debt of the whole country. This is a false standard and the marketplace has recognized it. In fact, if we were to speak objectively of the reaction to the budget, at first what seemed encouraging has since then soured. The bank rate since the budget has gone up. The prime rate has gone up and the dollar has fallen. Those are objective facts.

I will recognize that there are other factors out there in the international marketplace but if the government makes a pretence of telling us to look at the numbers because it is on course, it reveals to us that it is certainly not on course in terms of the provisions it has made.

One group of people had it right. One rating agency grasped the essence of the budget very quickly. It was the Dominion Bond Rating Service. This service looked at what was proposed in the budget and then went on to place Ontario's rating under negative review because the provinces stand to lose billions of dollars in federal transfers. It understood what had just taken place. The problem had now been transferred to the provincial governments. It then turned to Ontario and saw who was in trouble now. It was Ontario that was going to be losing the money. It understood the real impact of the budget.

Some apologists for the government and some wishful thinkers explained the budget as a triumph of pragmatism.

Let us not kid ourselves. When the government says it is taking a pragmatic approach, the fact of the matter, what we have actually seen, is that it is all improvised, an off–the–cuff, ad hoc, last minute approach, which is interestingly enough reflected in the decisions that are made, particularly with respect to provincial transfers for social programs. It will all come out of the same big transfer pot, so to speak, with as little connection as possible.

In its budget, the government even had the nerve to suggest putting the Minister of Human Resources Development in charge of negotiating new standards with the provinces. After his first mission—which was a flop, a complete fiasco, ending in humiliation, and ultimately disowned—he is asked to go and consult again with the provinces, while cuts have already been announced.

Mr. Speaker, let us not be naive. We were not born yesterday. Just between you and me, what is going to happen when they get together with the provinces? How do you think things will go? The provinces are going to say: "Look, you made the decision to cut. There is nothing left to negotiate. Give us whatever money is left and leave us alone." This certainly reflects a lack of planning.

[English]

This brings me to what I see as the first major weakness of the budget: there is no plan. It reflects nothing of what the Liberals said, did or stood for in the last nine years in this place. The budget reflects nothing of what is written in the red book. All promises have been thrown out the window. The red book has been scrapped and the government and the country are left with no plans and no priorities. What kind of a situation does that lead to?

• (1215)

This government is cutting R and D and the granting councils 14 per cent, the same way it is cutting small craft harbours across the country at a time when R and D is important for the country. This is a government of one of the only modern countries in the world to have closed universities. That is what happens when there are no priorities. That will be the first weakness of this government.

I have already alluded the second, this false objective of 3 per cent of GDP which frankly is not good enough and will not last. The country needs a very firm commitment to balance the budget with a timeframe.

The third weakness in the budget is in its approach. The budget and its unilateral ways go against the very essence of what federalism is about. Rather than setting national objectives for deficit and debt reduction, rather than sitting down with the provinces to avoid a situation, we are only off–loading debt into their yards.

How do we know a provincial government will not choose to increase taxes as a consequence of the budget? Where does that leave the taxpayer, the men and women, individuals who pay taxes today? There may be more than one level of government but there is still only one taxpayer. The approach is wrong and will not work.

The fourth area is the hidden agenda. Pension reform is the most glaring one. Here is a government that says it wants to undertake pension reform but will not share with the House of Commons the studies it has done in this regard when we know the impact and the consequences of what it is proposing are tremendous.

Let me give another example of the hidden agenda of this government with regard to the budget. The Prime Minister went on a TV show with Mike Duffy, stating as a matter of policy the government wants to reduce the cost of health care 1 per cent of GDP.

Mr. Duffy had a guest on his show last week, Dr. Jane Fulton, Ph.D., a professor of health policy and ethics at the University of Ottawa. I do not remember anything being said in the budget about cutting health care in Canada 1 per cent relative to GDP. This is not an ordinary member of Parliament who said this. It was the Prime Minister.

What does this mean? According to Dr. Jane Fulton: "I think if we have to talk between $7 billion and $10 billion, and every time we cut $1 billion out of any kind of public funding we cut about 10,000 jobs". I am not quarrelling that there need to be serious thinking and reduction of funding in health like in every other area of government.

What I find objectionable is that the government in this case has a hidden agenda. It is not coming clean with Canadians. Why did the Prime Minister not say this? Why did the Minister of Finance hide this from the House when he came forward with his budget? I am assuming the Prime Minister did not think this up. Did it just appear in his mind during an interview that this would happen? If that is the case, we all need to be enlightened with regard to this.

There is one advantage to the budget in terms of what it means to all the issues we are confronted with. It certainly puts into perspective the real accomplishments and the failures of previous governments. If this government likes to blame the previous government on anything that went wrong, it would also want to acknowledge the strong growth we have in our economy today was also because the previous government restructured our economy, brought forward the FTA, the NAFTA, the GST, privatized, deregulated.

These were the main features and the Liberals fought every one of them for nine years. Those enabled Canadians today to have economic prosperity and see some real job creation as we now go on to deal with some of the really tough issues we are confronted with.

This government has no compass, no plan. The last nine years were a complete farce. Whatever it was saying or purporting to present as positions were all thrown out the window. The red book has been thrown out the window.

• (1220)

I see my colleague here, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Foreign Affairs. Foreign affairs took a deep hit in the budget, contrary to anything the Liberals purported as being a position for ODA in the years they were in opposition. It does not resemble it at all.

Canadians will now watch very closely as this government tries to get its act together and await whether there will be a sense of priority and planning in terms of where this country is going.

Mr. Ghislain Lebel (Chambly, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the member for Sherbrooke on his fine speech. I would say he is quite loquacious.

I note that he is attributing the current rise in the interest rate to the budget tabled by the Liberals, whereas, about a month ago, he attributed it to the political uncertainty in Quebec. I am happy that the member for Sherbrooke is making amends and recognizing the real source of our difficulties.

I find him wordy; I like him; I think he made a fine speech, and I would like to ask him this. Why did he not give the same speech during the electoral campaign in Brome—Missisquoi just before February 13? He never opened his mouth there. He said nothing of all that, and yet he knew it to be true. He did not say a word. Are we to understand—and this is my question—that there was an agreement with the Liberals not to hurt them during the electoral campaign in Brome—Missisquoi?

Mr. Charest: Mr. Speaker, I will first comment quickly on my colleague's allusion to a comment I allegedly made about interest rates. I made no such comment.

I will stop immediately here and ask him his source.

[English]

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest and it sounded like a death bed repentance, a true confession, a catharsis for the hon. member.

I want to share this time with other members. The member talked very seriously about the implications of the reduction of transfers to the provinces.

The member well knows the transfers are a combination of tax points and cash and that under the existing EPF and CAP provisions, in certain provinces the amount of cash would be reduced to levels which would eliminate the leverage the federal government would have with regard to maintaining national standards with regard to education, health and so on.

I wonder if the member would admit or agree that the consolidation of the programs under one transfer, where there is a consolidation of tax points and cash, does assist the federal government to ensure appropriate national standards?

Mr. Charest: Mr. Speaker, the member for Mississauga South may be a little confused in what he is saying. If I understood him correctly, he was saying the proposed reduction in cash and tax point transfers would reduce the leverage to a minimum, the leverage of being able to ask for standards. He said how we think the government can impose some standards or allude to the fact that we should continue to do so.

If the government is to act unilaterally in this way and announce the cuts in advance I hope he is not naive enough to think it will sit down with the provinces and negotiate some sort of standard. There is nothing left to negotiate.

If the hon. member has ever been to a federal–provincial meeting he would find it quite startling to sit down with ministers of other provinces who will say to the Minister of Human Resources Development: "There is nothing left to discuss. You have made the decision on the cuts. What do you want from us?" That will be the dynamic of the meeting.

This points to one of the major weaknesses in this approach. During the election campaign our view was that if we were going to deal effectively with deficit and debt reduction, given that it is all the governments that enter into deficits and debts, it required a joint effort by all governments.

There should have been a formal process, a federal–provincial meeting, in which the government should have set joint objectives in terms of deficit and debt reduction and as a consequence of that, because it would imply reductions in transfers to the provinces, examine line by line areas of joint spending where the federal government uses its spending power to determine where each level of government should be intervening. That was the common sense approach we proposed. His government chose instead to act unilaterally.

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I found the speech of the hon. member for Sherbrooke extremely interesting, especially considering the member ran for the leadership of a party which took the hole the prior Liberal government dug $170 billion deep and proceeded to dig it even deeper to the tune of $420 billion.

I find it interesting how he would, in his first opportunity, attack a Liberal budget. In opposition people tend to attack government budgets. We did the same thing. There are some things about this budget that are worth while commenting on, such as the $9 billion in cuts the government has proposed which the opposition has been urging for over two years. It is soft, it is too slow, but that is another story.

I have three specific questions for the hon. member for Sherbrooke. When he was part of the Conservative government why did it or could it not reduce the deficit? What does he think currently is the biggest problem in this country, the debt, the interest costs to service the debt or the deficit? Does he agree or disagree with the Reform Party solution of a zero deficit in three years, working toward a balanced budget and protecting the taxpayers from increases by government with a taxpayers' protection act?

Mr. Charest: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for Calgary Centre for the question and for the opportunity to set the record straight, as the budget offers us an opportunity to put things in perspective.

He asked me, with respect to the Conservative government, what were the things it did or did not accomplish. Let me point them out in real, objective terms.

When we became the Government of Canada in 1984 program expenditure was rising at an annual rate of over 13 per cent. We brought that down to below or around 4 per cent. When we took over government in 1984 the annual deficit relative to GDP was in excess of 8 per cent. We brought that down to somewhere in the area of 5 per cent or 6 per cent.

I will go further because I know he will be interested in the facts and less in the rhetoric. A document was put out by this government, "Agenda, Jobs and Growth: Creating a Healthy Fiscal Climate". I am sure people can write to the Department of Finance to obtain a copy.

This Liberal document of October last has at page 8 a very interesting graph on the federal deficit as a percentage of GDP. If we watch the line very closely, as of 1984 when we became the government the line started to go down dramatically. That reflects the real efforts we brought forward as opposed to the inflated demagogy we have heard from time to time. We produced a surplus on the operating budget of the government of $13 billion over the nine years we were the Government of Canada.

Does that mean everything we did was right or perfect? Obviously the answer is no. Those are the facts as opposed to the fiction proposed by others.

Mr. Andy Scott (Fredericton—York—Sunbury, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I was quite happy to see the hon. member for Sherbrooke here because I wanted to discern his party's position relative to the budget. I was a little disappointed last week when his colleague from Saint John supported the Reform motion calling for the elimination of the deficit within the time of this Parliament.

I did not discern in his speech where he was going in terms of whether it was too tough or not tough enough. Before the last election he proposed the position that the federal government had to work with the provinces to come up with a joint strategy. Do I assume that is no longer the position? Certainly that was indicated last week.

• (1230)

Does the member for Sherbrooke share his colleague's position that the Government of Canada should eliminate the deficit inside this Parliament?

Mr. Charest: Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to answer the question.

There are four things about the budget we think are wrong and need to be addressed. There is no plan or priorities for the country any more with regard to deficit and debt reduction. That means we may run the risk not only of making tough decisions but wrong decisions.

The objective of reducing the deficit to 3 per cent of GDP is not good enough. There should be a clearly enunciated objective of balancing the books within a precise timeframe. Three years is a reasonable timeframe.

Third is its unilateral approach in terms of deficit and debt reduction, which is a complete negation of what a federal country is and how it operates. That puts us in the situation in which we well run the risk of the government's shovelling its deficit and debt problem into the yard of New Brunswick. If it chooses to increase taxes, if it chooses to cut service, we are not going anywhere unless there is a joint effort.

The fourth problem is the hidden agenda. Pension reforms, reform for health care as announced by the Prime Minister are not enunciated in these documents, not clearly laid on the table in terms of the agenda of the government in its document.

The Deputy Speaker: My apologies to the member for Strathcona. I am obliged to go back and forth across the House. Therefore I have to go to the government speaker now. I know the member for Strathcona has been waiting for a long time.

Mr. Harold Culbert (Carleton—Charlotte, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. Minister of Finance has tabled the budget Canadians asked for, a budget that is tough but fair, that will allow us to gain control of our deficit, one that has been growing out of control for decades.

We cannot afford to repeat these mistakes. Our government has looked to the future. It could be one in which Canadians are told which services they can and cannot afford by foreign creditors or it can be a future in which Canadians decide their priorities and watch them flourish. The government and the majority of Canadians have chosen the latter.

Our government has taken the necessary measures to ensure Canada's future will be bright and prosperous. Tough decisions had to be made and they were. Our government has produced a plan that is viable and attainable.

I would like to quote from the red book which is often used by opposition parties. Where our policy on Canada's fiscal situation was first outlined it says a Liberal government will adopt a two track fiscal policy, matching a drive for jobs and growth with a comprehensive approach to controlling debt and deficits. That is on page 16.

This is exactly what has been done, from our government's agenda of jobs and growth to the budget tabled by the Minister of Finance.

In producing this budget the minister has taken the time to solicit views of Canadians and all members of Parliament and has reacted to their concerns in delivering a budget that re–established its goal to meet the financial commitments and obligations, the same commitments made during the election campaign and reinforced during the 1994 budget.

The plan outlined by the hon. Minister of Finance will break the back of the deficit and enable us to reach our goal of 3 per cent of gross domestic product by 1997.

• (1235)

Projections indicate that our goal will be exceeded this current fiscal year when the deficit is expected to fall as low as $38 billion, $1.7 billion below our target of $39.7 billion for the end of the fiscal year.

As I listened to the Minister of Finance deliver his budget I realized that it reflected the message impressed upon me by constituents in Carleton—Charlotte. It was the same message impressed upon MPs across the country, including the Minister of Finance.

Canadians want to get their debt under control. They want to achieve this through cuts in government spending. The government has heard this message loud and clear. For that reason we have committed to cutting $7 in expenditures for every $1 in increased revenues.

To ensure fairness in the tax system, the government has closed a number of loopholes that benefit large corporations and banks and has avoided increasing the burden on individual and middle class Canadians and their families by refusing to increase personal income tax.

In 1994 a department by department review of all government programs was initiated in which every expenditure in each department was reviewed. As promised, the results of that review were announced in this year's budget.

The government has redefined its own role to ensure that departments focus on the priorities of Canadians. The new government operations will be smaller but more effective and more efficient.

This government has had the foresight to realise that small and medium size businesses are the future of growth in Canada. For this reason the $500,000 capital gains exemption has been maintained for small business and for farmers. Similarly, only minor changes were made to registered retirement savings plan contributions which benefit many working in this sector.

Government spending has been cut dramatically but in a way consistent with the values of Canadians, protecting the most vulnerable in society and cutting government first.

As I mentioned earlier, the budget also promotes the government's agenda for jobs and growth. In 1994 well over 400,000 new jobs were created, most of which were full time, permanent jobs. The economy grew at 4.5 per cent, the largest economic growth of all the G–7 countries. This type of growth will continue to flourish in 1995 as a result of the measures taken in the budget.

I quote from an article in the Ottawa Citizen on March 2:

> The boom is back. And, at least temporarily, without inflation. The economy, fuelled by exports and consumer and business spending, steamed ahead at a robust 4.5 per cent pace last year, Statistics Canada said Wednesday.
> And growth in the final quarter of 1994 was at a torrid annual rate of 5.9 per cent, the agency said in its latest report card on the economy, which suggests there is more growth to come, the analysts said.

The following quote was also published in the same issue:

> The Wall Street Journal, one of the coolest critics of Canada's economic policies, has been warmed a few degrees by the new budget. The influential business newspaper said in an editorial Wednesday that the finance minister's budget ought to be an inspiration to other countries struggling with overextended governments.

• (1240)

The minister has obviously listened to Canadians from Carleton—Charlotte and from across Canada and delivered a budget they wanted; a budget that is tough but fair and will be implemented equitably.

We can now look forward certainly to a better tomorrow for all Canadians in the future as a result of the budget tabled by the Minister of Finance in the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the hon. member who has just spoken, that everyone agrees, in fact, that there is a need to control federal government spending, which has been out of control for a number of years and which has brought us to financial disaster.

In a world where markets are said to be increasingly dealing with internationalization and globalization and where our producers need help in research and development to enable them to deal with worldwide competition, where, in his opinion, is the logic in suddenly stopping all research and development in the area of sheep production by deciding to close the one experimental farm that worked in this area and that had a national mandate across Canada? What message is being sent to sheep producers in Canada when they are told they will have no more support in research and development?

Why was the decision made to take everything away from this sector? Is this not what might be called a poor cut, as compared with others, which could be made where there would be no direct impact on an important sector of agricultural production, such as sheep production—a form of production making agricultural diversification possible, particularly in Quebec and Alberta? What, in his opinion, is the logic behind such a decision?

[English]

Mr. Culbert: Mr. Speaker, I should agree with the hon. member across the way in his question. He is quite right. Although we take pride in the fact that we must get our debt and deficit under control, we are not the first government that has set goals for bringing it under control. We certainly will be the first government in this century that will meet those goals. The Minister of Finance has made that commitment. The Prime Minister has made that commitment and the House has made that commitment.

Research and development is a priority of this government. It has been stated time and again. The government also believes private enterprise and commercialization can do, as proven in the past, the best job out there in business. Whether in research and development or small business or industry, they can do it much better than any government level can.

This government is supporting that. It is supporting a partnership with private business and industry. We will continue that support in the future.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have witnessed many budgets tabled in the House. Usually the next day constituency offices' telephones ring off the hook with complaints, support or whatever.

This year I checked with my constituency office on how many calls it received the day after the budget. My assistant in Parkdale—High Park told me it received one call. That caller said the minister did not go far enough in reducing the deficit.

• (1245)

Because the hon. member works very closely with and listens to his constituents, what kind of reaction did he have from them directly on the budget, positive or negative?

Mr. Culbert: Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague for the question. To be honest, it was an excellent one. Like he I expected my phone to be ringing on the budget. However I can honestly say it did not happen.

Last week we had an opportunity to be back in our constituencies. On Monday I had did an electronic town hall meeting specifically on the budget. The headline in the newspaper the next day was: "First attempt on an electronic town hall meeting" because we had done all the others personally "went very smoothly". There were many questions. Every person in the television studio was very positive about what the government had done in the budget and how it was done fairly and equitably right across Canada for all Canadians.

It was quite different from a radio interview I did on Friday morning. It was supposed to be on the budget. When I arrived at the radio station it was on Bill C–68 or gun control and I was facing a lawyer sitting there debating it from another perspective.

It showed the amount of negative concern there was toward the budget. I found out from my constituents exactly what the hon. member mentioned he heard from his constituents. It was accepted. It was supported. It was tough. It was fair but it was equitable.

Mr. Nick Discepola (Vaudreuil, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to congratulate the Minister of Finance, for delivering a courageous and innovative budget, which, most importantly, takes on the deficit yet respects the red book commitments. This was no easy task and the minister did a great job.

Having had the honour of sitting on the Standing Committee on Finance, I am very happy to see that the minister incorporated 80 per cent of the committee's recommendations into his budget. This means that the minister took into account the suggestions and concerns that Canadians expressed during the public hearings held nationwide.

This budget takes the steps needed to control the deficit. These budgetary measures are the most rigorous undertaken by a federal government in 50 years. They will permit us to bring the deficit down to 3 per cent of the gross domestic product by 1996–97.

This budget also allows us to meet our goals without increasing personal income taxes for the second consecutive year. The government refuses to reduce the deficit by offloading it onto Canadian taxpayers. Like Canadians as a whole, we believe that we must strive to balance the budget. We will achieve this in a responsible and realistic way without jeopardizing the strides we have taken regarding the economy and on the job front over the past 16 months and without discarding the values and priorities of Canadians.

[English]

We use forecasts that are more prudent than the private sector average. The budget anticipates the debt charges in 1995–96 alone will be $7.5 billion above last year's estimates.

This is why we must act now or risk missing our deficit target altogether. The budget takes some tough actions to prevent the probability of failure. To hit our targets we are implementing cumulative savings of some $29 billion over the next three years. This is the largest single set of actions in any budget since World War II. These actions mean changing the size and the shape of government. By 1996–97 program spending will fall from $120 billion to just under $108 billion.

• (1250)

The structural changes we are making will assure that significant deficit reduction continues in 1997–98 and, more important, beyond. The bottom line benefit will be dramatic. By 1996–97 the deficit will be lower than that of any G–7 country.

We have taken measures that will have far–reaching effects and are result oriented.

We have substantially cut spending while at the same time preserving principles that Canadians hold dear, namely economic recovery, protection of the disadvantaged and government streamlining.

If we want our efforts to put our fiscal house in order to be efficient and sustainable, it is imperative that we reconsider the role and structure of government and focus government activities on the priorities set by Canadians.

In this budget, government is brought down to a size we can afford. Cuts were not made blindly, contrary to what the opposition says. The measures announced by the Minister of Finance flow from the comprehensive review of departmental programs and activities we had announced in the 1994 budget and they will continue to pay dividends in the years to come.

Expenditures will be cut by half in some departments. After these measures have been implemented, the public service, including DND, will be reduced by 45,000 positions, or 14 per cent.

[English]

The budget reduces the deficit in a way that is consistent with the strong Liberal commitment to social programs. We remain absolutely committed to a fair and sustainable system of protection for seniors who have given so much to the country.

The budget states the basic principles of the so–called hidden agenda the hon. member for Sherbrooke alluded to before. There will be the following: undiminished protection for all seniors who are less well off, including those receiving the guaranteed income supplement; continuation of full indexation to protect seniors from the effects of inflation; provision of old age security benefits on the basis of family income, as is currently the case with the guaranteed income supplement; greater progressivity of the benefits by income level; and, more important, control of program costs.

The role of the state is to do only what it does best. Therefore, some activities should be transferred to other public administrations or entrusted to the private sector. If the federal government does not have to do something, it should not do it. And in the future, this government will not do it.

True, this budget is tough, but it is fair. The Minister of Finance strove to distribute budget cuts fairly among all regions.

We will not reduce the deficit without also reducing provincial transfers. Nonetheless, the cuts we are asking the provinces to absorb are not as deep as the cuts we are facing ourselves, that is, 3 cents for every dollar of provincial revenue.

This budget constitutes additional proof that federalism is dynamic, flexible and not stuck in the status quo. The federal–provincial transfer payments will be replaced with a new consolidated subsidy called the Canada Social Transfer, which will alleviate the constraints that the government may impose in areas of exclusive provincial jurisdiction.

By giving the provinces two years' notice before introducing the Canada Social Transfer, we honoured a red book commitment to "achieve the maximum degree of predictability and stability for each level of government". It is the Quebec government that is deferring all important decisions because of the referendum.

The Leader of the Opposition alleges that this budget is unfair to Quebec. No region suffered more cuts than any other. Under the Canada Social Transfer, transfers to Quebec in 1996–97 will decline by only $350 million. That is a 3 per cent cut compared with 1994–95.

Over that same period, we will reduce federal spending by 7.3 per cent, which is almost double the cuts affecting transfer payments to the provinces. It goes without saying that those who support separation cannot react positively to a budget which demonstrates that Canadian federalism works.

Bloc members oppose the reduction of the subsidy to industrial milk producers. Yet, the Leader of the Opposition himself said that, in an independent Quebec, he would willingly abolish that subsidy. Financial markets did not endorse the claims made by the Quebec Minister of Finance to the effect that the federal budget generates uncertainty. Indeed, all are unanimous in saying that the budget measures will help fiscal consolidation.

Even the editorialists from Quebec recognize that this budget paves the way to a federalism respectful of the provincial fields of jurisdiction. The budget was designed with the best interests of Canada and Canadians in mind, not those of Wall Street. Still, we managed to reassure the financial markets. It is now up to the Quebec government to put an end to the uncertainty by holding its referendum as soon as possible.

Mr. Jean–Guy Chrétien (Frontenac, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member for Vaudreuil is to be commended for the stand he took in his speech on this budget. He is to be commended, but I am somewhat critical of his choice of words. I think he should check the definitions in the dictionary, and I am referring to the fact that he called this a "courageous budget".

I would like to remind the hon. member for Vaudreuil that during the last election campaign, the Deputy Prime Minister made the following promise: "Give me a year, and we will get rid of the GST or at least make some changes to improve it. Give me a year, and if we do not, I will resign". Fifteen or sixteen months later, nothing has changed. The only suggestion the finance committee made was to hide it, to camouflage it and make it a little less blatant.

The hon. member's leader, the Prime Minister, the leader of his own party, the Liberal Party of Canada, said: "Give me a day, and I will make some thorough changes in the pension plan for members of Parliament". Fifteen or sixteen months later, nothing has been done yet. And what is on the table is a mere shadow of pension reform.

The present Prime Minister said during the election campaign: "During our first term, I will not raise taxes or personal income tax". So what did he do in last year's budget? They raised $500 million by de–indexing old age security pensions. What did they do this year? The hon. member for Vaudreuil must know that they raised, or will raise, $500 million by taxing every litre of gas an extra 1.5 cents.

But this is the question I would like to put to the hon. member for Vaudreuil, who has a number of dairy farms in his riding. He must be aware of a consensus among dairy farmers in Canada on one milk, one price. By removing 15 per cent of the subsidy on industrial milk this year and another 15 per cent next year, the government is widening the gap. How will he explain to the dairy farmers in his riding that the gap is getting even wider?

And how can he explain to the farmers in his constituency, and I say this in concluding, why in the west, now that the Crow subsidy worth $560 million has been abolished, farmers will receive $1.6 billion in compensation tax free, when our dairy producers will lose 30 per cent of their milk subsidy without receiving any compensation whatsoever?

Mr. Discepola: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to reply to the hon. member, because he started by saying that he did not think this was a courageous budget. He gave three examples which, I suppose, are his three major concerns, namely the GST, the pension plans and personal income tax. The last point raised by the member was the impact of the cuts to agricultural subsidies.

I am convinced that in the riding of Vaudreuil, and elsewhere in Quebec and in Canada, the three points raised by the hon. member are not unanimously perceived as the three major issues. The main concern is government spending and the lack of flexibility resulting from a debt accumulated over many years and which is very costly in terms of its financing.

As you can see in the budget, in spite of cuts of $29 billion over a three–year period, the interest on the debt will increase by roughly $7 billion. This is a courageous budget because, for the first time, a Minister of Finance meets his own objectives in terms of the debt reduction. This is a first in the history of our country.

For the second year in a row, the government has not increased personal income tax. The hon. member forgot to mention that point. As for the pension plan, the member is well aware that we introduced a bill which will be voted on in April.

When it comes to agricultural subsidies, the Bloc Quebecois always tries to compare the East to the West for political expediency. It must be mentioned that, in the West, the subsidy was completely eliminated. The farmers were deprived, without notice, of subsidies amounting to $560 million. This is why a transition period and a compensation are provided. In Quebec and in the East, we are only talking about an annual reduction of 15 per cent, over a two–year period. It is better to get 70 per cent than nothing at all.

In reply to the hon. member's question, I think this is a courageous budget because we tried to be fair. We did not ask more from the provinces than we were prepared to give. We did not ask the small and medium size businesses to do more. We tried to be fair and this is why the budget was well received across Canada, and even in Quebec.

[English]

Mr. Hugh Hanrahan (Edmonton—Strathcona, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to participate in this year's budget debate.

I feel fortunate to be able to have this opportunity to pass on the views of my constituents of Edmonton—Strathcona. The constituents of Edmonton—Strathcona voted for a Reform member of Parliament based primarily on three principles: justice reform, parliamentary reform and, most significantly, fiscal reform.

It is because of the fiscal reform that I became involved in politics. I wanted to ensure that the standard of living which I have enjoyed will be maintained and passed on to my children and to my children's children.

This budget presented by the Liberals does nothing to seriously address the national debt and deficit problem. It has been said that a new government receives only one chance to make the necessary changes, one window of opportunity. This government has had not one but two chances.

• (1305)

The first was a year ago when the government was more concerned about increasing the deficit through increased spending and claiming that the deficit was not a problem. It then spent the rest of the year producing discussion paper after discussion paper while doing nothing.

The second and final narrow window of opportunity which the government has had to balance the budget passed earlier this month when it failed to implement the necessary restructuring in its latest budget.

It is therefore amazing to me that this government can stand before the citizens of Canada and present such a disheartening and ineffective budget. It is another example of Liberal smoke and mirrors. The Liberals state this budget is exactly what the doctor ordered. If this is the prescribed medicine, it not only smells bad and tastes bad but it is totally ineffective. Canadians have been subjected to a clinical trial where they have received nothing but a placebo.

This budget has cut spending by $12 billion over three years with a cut of only $4.1 billion in 1995–96. What the government is not telling Canadians is that we are borrowing more money this year than we did last year even after these poorly placed budget cuts.

The reason for this is extremely painful. It is because the interest payments on the debt are becoming astronomically high because of previous Liberal and Conservative governments and this Liberal government's continuation to run deficit after deficit.

With this Liberal plan Canada will still be running deficits of approximately $25 billion annually by 1997. This is a sad commentary on the government's unwillingness to listen to Canadians. At the end of the day, the national debt will still rise by $100 billion and Canadians will have to cough up nearly $50 billion a year in interest payments. This is a $12 billion increase since the Liberal fat pack came to power.

The Liberals have also managed to introduce a budget which involves short term pain with even longer term pain. What Canadians wanted was a budget which not only controlled spending but a budget which made a concerted effort to begin the process in which the deficit can be eliminated.

This is what we introduced in the taxpayers budget. It was a budget that could have seen the elimination of our national deficit within three years. The Reform Party had its fair share of short term pain. However, it had a light at the end of the tunnel. It was a budget that reflected hope and prosperity, unlike the Liberal budget which reflects doom and despair.

The Liberals have merely postponed the tough decisions until 1997. If they are unwilling to do the right thing now, how can they expect Canadians to believe they will be willing to make the right decisions down the road when those same problems still exist and the tough decisions have become tougher?

They should be honest with Canadians. I know we were with respect to the Reform alternative budget. The Liberals should come clean with Canadians and explain the consequences of their fiscal indecision and ineptitude. It took the Liberals 12 years to add the first $100 billion to the national debt. By the end of this mandate, the Liberals will have added a further $100 billion in only four years. This Liberal fat pack is extremely efficient, efficient overspenders.

Middle class Canadians are asking the same questions the Reformers are. For example, is heating your home a tax loophole? Is having electricity in your home a tax loophole? Is having water a tax loophole? Is having a car a tax loophole?

If the answer to these questions is no, then my constituents, Albertans, and for that matter all Canadians would like answers to the following: Despite this government's promise to limit tax increases to the rich and corporations by closing the so–called tax loopholes, why is it that the middle class has ended up with the burden of paying the majority of this year's nearly $1 billion tax increase in which a $.5 billion gas tax is included?

Why does the Liberal Party exploit Alberta to the extent that it does? Liberal governments have been notorious for abusing Albertans and this government continues the Liberal legacy. First we had the national energy program. Now we have the termination of the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act through which nearly $200 million annually will be taken out of the pockets of Albertans.

While it is true this government did not raise personal income taxes, this government continues to speak out of both sides of its mouth. There is only one taxpayer and taxes did in fact rise by $1 billion this year and will rise by almost another $3 billion by 1997. Instead of tax increases, the government should have looked at the elimination of funding for non–priority items such as multiculturalism or regional development programs such as ACOA, WED or FORD–Q.

The government has taken a step in the right direction in terms of privatization. However, it did not go far enough. Every ministry has one or more areas in which the government is providing a service which is in competition with the private sector or could be done more efficiently by the private sector.

The Department of Canadian Heritage is no different. Due to time constraints I will focus my comments on the CBC. The CBC's primary mandate should be the provision of distinctive, culture specific information and drama programming. In an increasingly multi–channeled environment the current mandate to provide a wide range of programming that informs, enlightens and entertains is too broad. It is also clear that the mandate of the CBC is to provide Canadians with predominantly Canadian programming. However, what Canadians are being subjected to is extremely questionable in terms of meeting the prescribed mandate.

The issue is no longer whether the CBC has adequate funding, as that passed long ago, but rather the structure of the CBC. In particular, the organization has not adjusted to the realities of the marketplace. It is an outdated, highly concentrated and expensive organization.

We must constantly remind ourselves that the Canadian broadcasting environment has changed radically since the conception of the CBC. New technologies, new services, changing viewer tastes and fundamental changes in advertising behaviour have transformed the broadcasting environment. We must not forget that in a world where the CBC is no longer the only national service, does it make sense to use scarce public funds to subsidize the provision of commercial television programming?

In this new world of broadcasting consisting of many more options to television viewers, public broadcasting cannot effectively maintain its all things to all people objective. It is therefore essential for survival in this multi-channel universe that the public broadcaster be willing to reinvent itself. It is quite evident that the corporation is unwilling to do just that.

When the president of the CBC states that revenues are not its mission, we must therefore as parliamentarians address this area for it. Since revenues are not the mission of the CBC, what is?

How can a private company such as CTV make revenues its mission while still adhering to Canadian content legislation? Last year, CTV spent $488 million on Canadian content. The CBC spends $561 million on Canadian content programming. This is not a huge difference considering we spent over $1 billion for the operation of CBC and nothing on CTV. CTV spends close to the same amount as CBC on Canadian production. The difference is, one is government owned and one is privately owned. One is a drain on the public purse and one adds to the public coffers through taxation and profit.

Had the government privatized CBC television, it could have saved the taxpayers approximately $800 million. This number does not include the revenue which would have been generated from the sale of approximately $1.5 billion in assets which the CBC currently holds.

The government must balance its books, which means all areas of public financing must be evaluated for efficiency and cost effectiveness. It is for these reasons that the Reform Party will not support the budget.

Mr. Julian Reed (Halton—Peel, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to correct the record. I am sure the hon. member did not mean it when he said that it was the Reform Party's objective to do away with the debt in three years. I am sure he meant deficit.

Before the hon. member becomes overly defensive about fuel taxes and the impact on Alberta, he should also remember the tax expenditures that go to the oil patch and have gone there over many years. I do not have a figure for last year but I know that in 1990 the tax expenditures to the oil patch totalled about $850 million. It is only fair to put some of these things into perspective.

There has always been an element that would like to privatize the CBC. Most people who think that way think of Canada as a long narrow strip of land that ends at about 150–200 miles north of the American border.

Historically the CBC has been one of the ties that have bound Canada together. No private investor would put a repeater station at Wawa, Ontario, for instance, or be broadcasting to the most remote parts of the country. That is what the CBC does.

The people of Canada pay for that service through their taxes so that every Canadian can feel included and a part of this country. If we were to privatize the CBC, what would inevitably happen would be those unprofitable areas of broadcasting would of necessity have to disappear if station was to show black ink at the end of the day.

I would suggest to the hon. member the CBC does perform a very valuable function. The money can be spent more wisely.

Mr. Hanrahan: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has pressed a number of issues in my speech. With regard to the oil patch expenditures, while I agree that these have been made, they are nothing compared to the national energy program that took billions and billions of dollars out of Alberta.

I would not suggest, however, that we continue funding uneconomic programs, whether they be in oil or whatever commodity we are dealing with. With regard to the taxes on public as opposed to private, when the tax program was in place it was refunded directly by the private companies back to the consumer. In Alberta we have the majority of privately owned gas and electricity organizations. We are giving a tax free holiday to the publicly owned companies in Ontario and Quebec at the expense of Alberta and I believe Nova Scotia. This is grossly unfair to the consumer and to the average citizen in both of those provinces.

With regard to the comment on the CBC, let me deal with the historical aspect. I agree the CBC has played a significant role in the development of Canadian culture. We must remember that was back in the days when we had perhaps two, at most three television networks in the country.

The heritage committee right now is investigating the role of the CBC in a 500 channel universe. If we have a CBC which is costing $1.1 billion at a time when the government is rightly trying to restrict its expenditures, can we afford, when we are cutting back on health, when we are cutting back on education, can we afford the luxury—

The Deputy Speaker: I am sorry, the hon. member's time has expired.

The Budget

Mr. Lee Morrison (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, as I sat in the House on February 27 I felt I was in a time warp.

For 20 years we have been hearing the same biased platitudes from Liberal and Conservative finance ministers. The Lib con artists I call them, telling us that they have the deficit in hand, responsibility reigns and everything is going to be all right if people will just be patient and trust them.

When the current Prime Minister was finance minister he announced with a lot of heavy breathing that significant reductions in the deficit can be expected, and then proceeded to set a new record for deficit spending.

In 1982 Allan MacEachen said the government cannot responsibly add to the deficit, and then proceeded to set another record.

In 1990 Michael Wilson stated: "We will reduce the deficit to $28.5 billion next year. We will cut it in half to $14 billion in three more years and we will reduce it further to $10 billion in the next year after that". Plus ça change, plus c'est la même chose.

The government still lives in the same economic fantasy world as its predecessors. It believes it can spend and borrow itself into prosperity.

The Minister of Finance boldly stated in his budget speech that it is time to put our fiscal house in order, a line borrowed from a famous 1989 speech by the leader of the Reform Party. The minister has finally learned to talk the talk, but he made only a feeble attempt to walk the walk. He said that Canadians want clear action and then he proceeded to deliver mush.

Previous finance ministers were able to play budgetary games, sleights of hand for 20 years without making any real spending cuts. I acknowledge that the incumbent did make some real cuts. Thanks to the magic of compound interest he had no luxury of choice. He had to make cuts just to avoid immediate disaster. However he did not have the courage to cut as deeply as necessary to begin to solve the deficit problem.

The proposed $12 billion in cuts are going to hurt but they are going to be offset by additional interest payments which will continue to rise until they reach more than $50 billion in 1997.

What is his program after that? Continued half–hearted cuts until there is nothing left to reduce while annual interest payments continue to rise to $60 billion or $70 billion?

The hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood mentioned the same problem. He said: "We will solve this. We will have a new Bretton Woods agreement. We are going to have this great big international conference so we do not have to clean up our act at home. We will just bring in the IMF and it will solve all our problems for us".

Where does this insanity end? Does the government really intend to continue treading water until it drowns in debt? We cannot perpetually borrow money to give it away to people or entities that do not need it.

Speaker after speaker has risen on the other side of the House to tell us about their compassion. They ooze compassion. Please tell me what is compassionate about destroying the economy of the country?

Canada is like a patient with a gangrenous leg and a tender–hearted but incompetent doctor. That leg should come off but the doctor with misdirected kindness amputates only the foot. When that does not solve the problem, he cuts off a few more inches and then a few inches more, each time subjecting the patient to additional trauma. In the end, the poor devil dies anyway.

The finance minister is fortunate that unlike the incompetent physician, he cannot be sued for malpractice. They are so proud of their transfer programs over there but thanks to 20 years of deficits the biggest single transfer program is now payments to money lenders.

A lot of the transfer payments do not even stay in Canada but are delivered into the hands of financial institutions in Tokyo, New York and Zurich. The Liberals and Conservatives, with their bread and circus approach to governance, have sold us into economic slavery.

It is obscene that this most blessed of countries should be headed for economic collapse and that foreign money lenders are being allowed to continually suck our blood. This is the legacy of Lib–Con economic policy.

The Minister of Finance has refused to face reality in the name of compassion and caring. We are going to continue down that same steep and narrow path to national bankruptcy. What good will his reassuring words do when not too many years from now half or more than half of the national revenue must go into debt service?

What will be his after the fact excuse if the money lenders cut us off and we are no longer able to provide even basic government services, much less social programs? What will he tell the people of Canada when we are unable to help even the poorest of the poor, the old, the sick, the infirm, the weak? How will he explain it when there is no money left, when there is no medicare, when there is no welfare, when there are no old age pensions, no UIC, when there is nothing. Because that is the direction in which we are headed.

The government has again proven through its non–budget that it cannot be trusted with a credit card. For the sake of our children and our grandchildren, it is time to take that credit card away.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est, BQ): Mr. Speaker, actually, I agree with what the hon. member was saying when he described the following rather gloomy prospects for the Canadian economy: "We are headed for an economic collapse, and we are going down the steep and narrow path to national bankruptcy".

• (1330)

National bankruptcy is what we see looming as a result of the budget that was brought down this year. This is one of the reasons, just one but a major one, why Quebec would like to separate from Canada. Canada's budgetary and financial affairs are a mess and are leading straight down the road to disaster, to bankruptcy. This is more or less what was said by financial advisers on Wall Street.

Personally, I do not want to see the poor and the elderly in Quebec in a position where they cannot count on the support of social programs, as the hon. member pointed out. This Budget is terribly unfair to people who depend on social programs.

This Budget will cut $100 million annually in funding for social housing alone, a program that is targeted to the poorest members of our society. Single parent families, women, the elderly, people who live alone, welfare recipients: they all belong to the poorest social group in our society. This group will be affected by cuts of $100 million annually, while the banks get off scot–free or almost, with very few cuts, in fact $100 million over two years, the same Canadian banks that last year made a net profit of $4.3 billion. These cuts represent not quite 2 per cent of their net profits.

I may also add that family trusts will not pay a cent.

In concluding, I want to say that I fully sympathize with what the hon. member said, and I would like to ask him the following: If he were in Quebec, would he not agree that the best solution, at least for Quebecers, is sovereignty?

[English]

Mr. Morrison: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his very dramatic intervention. One thing puzzles me. I know the hon. member is an economist, yet in his intervention I detected hints of three economic theories all warring in the same breast. I heard a bit of Adam Smith. I heard a bit of Engels perhaps and a great deal of John Maynard Keynes.

As far as his immediate question regarding secession is concerned, is the hon. member suggesting that if they bail out and leave the sinking ship of state they will not be required to man any of the lifeboats? They could get off scot free after having benefited from the largess of deficit spending for lo these 20 years. Now they will leave us holding the bag and take nothing. Is this what the hon. member is saying?

The Deputy Speaker: I am sorry, you will not have an opportunity to respond as your time is up. Resuming debate.

[English]

Ms. Roseanne Skoke (Central Nova, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today in support of the budget tabled by the Minister of Finance.

The fundamental objective of the 1995 budget is sustained growth and job creation. The budget takes far reaching actions to reduce spending and to reshape the role of the federal government in building a stronger, more dynamic Canadian economy.

The budget is aimed at restoring fiscal health and refocusing government on key priorities and needs. It is about getting government right so that Canadians can get the economy right.

It is the biggest Canadian budget since post–war demobilization. It delivers on the commitment to meet our fiscal targets using prudent economic assumptions. It cuts the deficit largely through expenditure reductions. It restructures spending to keep the deficit on a downward track. It puts the government's own house in order to make it smaller, more frugal, better managed and innovative.

It defines a new role for government in the economy. It reforms federal transfers to provinces. It points the way to reform of unemployment insurance and the public pension system. It distributes the burden of restraint fairly among Canadians and the regions of Canada.

The deficit and debt are national problems. The budget distributes the burden of restraint fairly across all regions. Canadians in every region have strongly urged us to bring spending under control. Some individual measures obviously affect certain regions more than others, but looked at as a whole no region is being hit disproportionately.

The budget shows that federalism is flexible and dynamic. Although we are cutting the level of transfer payments, we have given the provinces ample notice as promised and the cuts are less than those we are imposing upon ourselves. The government remains committed to the equalization program, a pillar of Canadian federalism.

The new Canada social transfer will give all provinces greater flexibility in designing social programs while the principles of the Canada Health Act are maintained. The introduction of the Canada social transfer in 1996–97 will deliver funding to the provinces, cash and tax points of $26.9 billion. That is a drop of about $2.5 billion from what provinces could expect under the current system.

That is tough action but let us put it in context. It means that the total of all major transfers, including equalization which is not affected by the budget, will be 4.4 per cent lower than today. By comparison, the cuts in federal spending everywhere else will be 7.3 per cent, a much deeper reduction.

The Canada social transfer will represent a new approach to federal–provincial fiscal relations marked by greater flexibility and accountability for provincial governments and more sustainable financial arrangements for the federal government. By doing so it continues our national evolution toward more mature fiscal relations.

The government is meeting its fiscal target. In the 1994 budget we pledged that the deficit would be reduced to 3 per cent of GDP or $24.3 billion for 1996–97. In the budget we are taking strong measures to ensure that those targets are met even with higher than expected interest rates.

The budget also looks beyond the two–year target because our fiscal reforms will continue to pay off in the years after sustaining our progress toward the government's ultimate goal, a balanced budget.

Our cautious fiscal and economic assumptions make clear the need for tough measures. To hit our targets we are implementing cumulative savings over the next three years of $29 billion. These actions mean changing the size and shape of government. By 1996–97 program spending will fall from $120 billion last year to just under $108 billion. The structural changes we are making will ensure that significant deficit reduction continues in 1997–98 and beyond. The bottom line benefit will be dramatic.

The budget concerns itself with increasing tax fairness. The 1995 budget takes far reaching action to restore the fiscal health that supports a strong and growing economy. The plan also reflects the government's determination to puts its own financial house in order instead of placing the burden on taxpayers.

Over the next three years spending reductions will total $25.3 billion against $3.7 billion in revenue action. That is almost $7 in spending cuts for each $1 in new tax revenue.

Most important, there is no increase in personal income tax rates in the budget. Where tax action is taken it centres on improving the fairness of the tax system. As the finance minister said, the issue of taxes is more than a matter of rates; it is a question of equity.

The budget reflects the results of the program review that was launched a year ago. The budget agenda is not just a plan for smaller government. It is a plan for smarter government and for reforming the structure of the government and how it spends. The size of government will be reduced substantially over the next three years. Departmental spending will be cut by almost 19 per cent from 1994–95 levels. For some departments spending will be halved and in total these actions will deliver a three–year savings of almost $17 billion.

As a result of the sweeping reform of federal programs, the public service will be reduced by 20,000 people this year and by some 45,000 positions over the next three years. For the first time departments will have to prepare three–year business plans and submit the plans to the scrutiny of Parliament and the public.

The impact of the program review budgetary measures has been fairly distributed across all provinces. Some programs have been eliminated or significantly reduced. Other programs have been redesigned or consolidated. There are some particular measures that tend to be concentrated in specific regions.

Of concern to the Atlantic region, and more particular to my riding of Central Nova, is the Atlantic freight subsidy that is being eliminated. However to offset this a five–year, $326 million transition program is being provided. Dairy subsidies will be reduced by 30 per cent over the next two years. Forest resource development agreements with the province will be discontinued. The public utilities income tax transfer payment of $30.4 million to Nova Scotia will be terminated. Regional agency funding will decline by $562 million over the next three fiscal years. ACOA's share of the reduction is $173.5 million or a 31 per cent reduction.

The government remains committed to supporting economic incentives in Atlantic Canada. ACOA has proven to be the most efficient and effective vehicle for delivering on the commitment. In terms of the government's commitment to job creation as promised in the red book, ACOA has shown itself to be part of the solution, having helped to create some 42,000 jobs in Atlantic Canada. ACOA will continue to fulfil a vital role as a source of capital for the region for growing small and medium size business and as a leader for economic development in the region.

In conclusion, the budget marks the beginning of a new era. It underlines the need for an evolving, dynamic, co–operative federalism to meet the challenges facing Canada's economy and its people in a tough, competitive world. It is a challenging budget but also an equitable budget that deserves the support of all members of the House.

Mr. Jean–Guy Chrétien (Frontenac, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I listened very attentively to the speech on the budget given by our colleague for Central Nova. However, I must confess that I detected bias in her comments. This hon. member must be on the same team as the Minister of Finance.

She said a few minutes ago that she saw the budget as a source of jobs—there is nothing to be seen. There is absolutely nothing there, less than nothing for job creation in this country, on the contrary. The only good thing the Liberal government has done to create jobs was the $2 billion, which became—because it was a tripartite program—$6 billion.

That was the only good creative thing where jobs could be created, and it should be said that the jobs were temporary. There was $200 million left, and they were threatening to cut it. And the hon. member for Central Nova is telling us that jobs will be created out of this budget. On the contrary, there is nothing.

She spoke of the deficit and of the debt which had become huge, a major problem for the country. This is true. I, however, would remind her that, in 1970, when her team was running the country, the deficit was almost nil—$1 billion and some. It was "improved" again and again. There were of course Mr. Clark's nine months and the preceding government's nine years, but today's $550 billion debt, on which we pay $50 billion in interest a year, is the child of her own party, except for the nine years the Conservatives were in government, before the Liberals returned to power.

I conclude by asking my colleague how she is going to justify to her constituents the fact that they have widened the gap to obtain parity in industrial milk and unprocessed milk in Nova Scotia?

[English]

Ms. Skoke: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member raised a number of issues.

• (1345)

Let me set the record straight. I am not biased and I am certainly not confused. I have read the budget, I have scrutinized it and I am very proud to support the budget.

With respect to jobs and job creation we should not overlook the numerous job creation strategy programs the Liberals have implemented and are continuing with the budget. We have our youth service corps initiative and all our human resources development programs the people in my riding of Central Nova rely on on a very regular basis. They are creating jobs. I am proud to say we are now underway in implementing our youth service initiative program.

With respect to ACOA and its new role in terms of economic development in our area, we are very proud and pleased to have ACOA involved in economic and regional development and we are looking forward to working very closely with that agency.

We have our infrastructure program. Although there has been some reduction in the funding my riding has benefited significantly and created a number of jobs pursuant to this program and we are looking forward to future initiatives.

We also rely on small business in our area, which creates up to 85 per cent of the jobs in the country. The Liberals are being very active in terms of ensuring small businesses get the venture capital they need, ACOA will be taking a roll there, and also the measures they have taken in terms of ensuring banks recognize small business initiatives.

With respect to dairy subsidies, which affect my riding, there is only a 30 per cent reduction. There is equity in the budget. Every sector, every individual, every business, everyone has been affected by the budget. In terms of dairy subsidies for Nova Scotia there is only a 30 per cent reduction. It is time it became more competitive and cut its costs in terms of management and organization. It is not necessary for the 30 per cent reduction to be passed on to consumers. I trust it will not be in Central Nova.

Ms. Paddy Torsney (Burlington, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today in support of the budget handed down by the Minister of Finance.

The main basis for my support is this was a unique process. This was terrific way all Canadians could participate in the budget. Volumes and volumes of material and input from Canadians across the country were received and distributed among parliamentarians and among the general public. The information came in a variety of forms and forums. There were letters, organized mailings, budget workshops, radio call–ins and town hall meetings.

People put forward their ideas, their personal views, their fears and their projections for the future. Canadians took part in the prebudget consultation process and had their voices heard. No rebellion was necessary. True democracy worked and the budget is a result of that.

In Burlington we had a terrific prebudget consultation meeting. It was a great example of public participation, discussion and debate. We had incredible input and ideas from people of all ages, backgrounds and various work experiences. We provided information to them beforehand so they could make an informed contribution. They could weigh the options. They could think about the issues, unlike the Reform Party which asked people to simply check off which percentage and which columns they would like to have done.

Through discussion we reached consensus on many issues and we had good debate and the debate continues on some others. My constituents thought long and hard about the issues. They offered their considered input.

They did not want to have tax increases without government showing leadership and taking responsible action. They indicated, and I certainly support them, constituents give us their precious tax dollars and it is our job to make it work. We must bring some accountability to the process.

There was clear support among participants that spending cuts were inevitable. They asked us to take a good look at our existing programs and the funding mechanisms for them.

In other areas there was no consensus reached. These are complex issues and Canadians are thinking hard about them. The budget addressed my constituents' concerns.

There are some false perceptions out there and perhaps they serve some people's purposes. There is a false perception Canadians are excessively burdened by taxes compared with citizens of other countries. This is wrong.

• (1350)

The hon. member for Beaver River is on record as saying we are among the highest taxed people in the world. This is wrong. Canadian taxes as a percentage of economic activity fall below the average for the 24 industrialized nations of the OECD. However, that kind of statement does not take into account the services Canadians get in return for their hard earned tax dollars.

We must deliver value for money. One great example is our entire medicare program. Even so, Canadians and Burlington residents agreed personal income tax rates should not be raised. The government listened and there were no tax increases.

We are achieving our goals for deficit and debt reduction, but not on the backs of individual Canadians. Our solutions are focused. They are good, efficient government instead of increased taxation.

Canadians recognized difficult decisions had to be made while at the same time it was critical we make strategic investments, that we be smart about where we are going to spend money for the future and to balance our budget.

The Reform Party is quoted in the Calgary Herald, February 7: "Reform for its part would rapidly slash government spending as to create a fiscal balance while creating a huge social deficit in the form of greater unemployment and social polarization". This is not the Canada we want.

Our approach is to cut in a fair manner, to lead by example by looking at where to cut in government first. By reducing government spending and undertaking a full program review we have taken the responsible approach. The budget has a 7:1 ratio of spending cuts to revenue increases. These steps will lead the country into a brighter economic future. We are redefining the role of government.

In the area of unemployment Burlington residents are concerned about their neighbours, both in our community and in the broader Canadian context. People must get back to work. The budget continues with our Liberal four-point agenda for jobs and growth. New programs are being developed to ensure people acquire more skills, the youth internship program, the youth service corps. We must address youth unemployment particularly and the school to work transition. We must invest in our future generations now.

Burlington residents suggested the best way to improve job creation is to implement apprenticeship programs, keep pace with innovation and with changes in technology, encourage education and training, encourage free enterprise, eliminate bureaucratic paper work, especially for small businesses. The budget is connected to all our initiatives as a government and to our policies like the social security review.

The area of technology is important. We must be innovative. We must be ready for the future. We must spend wisely and work within our fiscal means. R and D is encouraged through the research and experimental tax incentive, one of the most generous tax incentives in the world. However, it is important it is not abused, and so we have moved to change that.

In the area of small business we must continue to invest in people and in growth. The 1994 budget undertook a small business policy review, realizing entrepreneurs are responsible for creating the majority of new jobs in Canada and for moving our economy forward. With consultation and the release of the report "Building a More Innovative Economy" we have received input from Canadians about how to proceed. The challenge of access to capital remains.

The 1995 budget encourages banks to do a better job of lending to small businesses by encouraging government to work with the banks to develop appropriate benchmarks. These must be achieved.

In my riding of Burlington our local economy is vital and continues to grow. We have many diverse, successful small and medium size businesses such as Colette's Café and Toshiba Office Product Centre, employing a small number of people but growing.

There are many more people, young and old, experienced and inexperienced, who have excellent ideas, great initiative and full support from their friends and families. All they need is financial backing. These are the people who are creating jobs in Canada. These are the people whose entrepreneurial spirit we must foster. They are creating the environment and the jobs for future generations. The government is committed to ensuring they do that.

We are committed to ensuring Burlington and all Canadian businesses are able to succeed, to grow and to add to their employee base. We have fine examples like the companies that started small, Zenon Environmental, Gennum, Thompson–Gordon and Laidlaw. They are leaders in the world in their own fields.

• (1355)

The 1995 budget also put some things in context for Canadians. Our inflation was the lowest of the G–7 nations and our economy grew at a rate of 4.25 per cent, the fastest of the G–7 nations.

Our export growth is strong; 433,000 full time jobs have been created since January 1994. The unemployment rate has fallen by 1.7 percentage points. Our cost competitiveness is the highest in 40 years and yet we remain burdened by high national debt and continue to pay off our interest.

There is optimism. Canadians know we have a rational plan for deficit reduction. We are taking the right steps. We will achieve our deficit targets. In the last year we not only achieved them, we surpassed them by $4.2 billion. We aspired confidence.

Now is the time for hard decisions. We must make forward thinking investments for the future. Our aim is sustainable jobs and growth, with sensitive cuts and responsible spending.

The budget shows our commitment to future generations. We cannot stand idle by the impact of our decisions or past actions. We must not squander limited resources, but use them in an intelligent and effective manner.

Precious Canadian taxpayers' dollars must be put to work effectively. This budget is a terrific step in that plan of action. Canadians are the winners in this budget. They made their voices heard and this budget is there because of them.

I thank the many residents of Burlington who participated in this process. We are all winners. We will have a stronger nation. We will all have better lives.

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I was overwhelmed by the speech of my colleagues about these mean Reformers here. There is a bit of paranoia among the government members about the budget.

There are a couple of things in particular about her speech that are really intriguing to me. The hon. member suggests the government is going to meet its targets and Canada will be forever thankful when the Liberals meet their targets, three per cent of GDP, approximately $25 billion a year. We would really like to thank this government at the end of its budget exercise for overspending by $25 billion a year. Somehow I am not sure a lot of folks out there think much of that.

What is the idea of overspending by $25 billion a year? Is that is a good idea or a bad idea?

Would the hon. member justify how this Liberal government can mess around with MPs' pensions and come up with $4 million on the old plan and $3.16 million in the new plan, like the minister of immigration. How can they justify that and cut all the other programs back? Maybe they could get rid of the paranoia over there.

The Speaker: Like many members, I am interested in paranoia. I am going to let the hon. member think about it for a bit. She will have the floor when we come after question period.

It being 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(5), the House will now proceed to Statements by Members.

STATEMENTS BY MEMBERS

INTERNET

Mr. Sarkis Assadourian (Don Valley North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday, March 7, 1995 Ernst Zundel, a leading Nazi propagandist, confirmed to the Globe and Mail that he is preparing a link to the global information network through a computer to be based in the U.S. or Europe.

His plans for Internet include posting the transcripts of his trials as well as material regarding the second world war, what the Canadian Jewish Congress calls Holocaust denial material.

Mr. Zundel's plan shows why it is necessary to regulate Internet. Other media outlets are accountable to someone. Internet is not.

I urge the House to condemn Ernst Zundel and Zundels afterward for racist and hate mongering activities. All members of the House must stand together and send a loud and clear message that promotion of hatred against any identifiable group is unacceptable and will not be tolerated by Canadians.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Québec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, to our dismay and indignation, we heard yesterday that Algerian Islamic fundamentalists took another young girl as the innocent victim of the intolerance that now rocks that country.

Since five leaders of the Islamic Front were sentenced to death by a symbolic tribunal of women gathered in Algiers to commemorate International Women's Day, other innocent women have been slaughtered.

The list of Algerian girls and women assassinated, tortured and raped by fundamentalists is getting longer as the months go by. The official tally of women assassinated by armed fundamentalists between the months of August 1993 and December 1994 is 112, including 6 students.

As parliamentarians, we insist on denouncing in the strongest terms possible these gratuitous and premeditated murders which violate the most basic rights of Algerians and which deprive them of the hope of being free and safe in their own country.

FORUM FOR YOUNG CANADIANS

Mr. Dick Harris (Prince George—Bulkley Valley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to give tribute to the Forum for Young Canadians and its participants who, as hon. members will know, are in Ottawa this week to learn more about the process of government at the federal level.

I know all members will join me in praising the organizers, the sponsors and the many volunteers who make this annual event possible. Special tribute goes to each one of the participants, our future leaders and in particular to my young constituents, Tashia Davalovsky and Lisa De Hoog.

I am sure all members will join me in welcoming them and wishing them the best in their visit to Ottawa.

MINING INDUSTRY

Ms. Hedy Fry (Vancouver Centre, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we all believe that developing a strong economic base for this country is the key to global competitiveness.

As a British Columbian, I urge the members of this House to recognize the importance of the mining industry to all Canadians. The government's 1995 budget made a first step toward improving our mining industry's ability to maintain and create jobs for Canadians.

Besides providing 400,000 direct and indirect jobs in Canada, mining sustains 150 Canadian communities and their one million residents, thus having a great impact on their daily lives in future.

Besides adding $10 billion to our annual trade balance, mining contributes $20 billion a year to the Canadian economy and accounts for 14.8 per cent of Canada's total exports. Mining is therefore a key engine for the export driven economy, jobs and growth benefiting all of Canada and not only those who live in mining regions.

Canada is seen by the rest of the world to be a country blessed with the wealth of natural resources. The interest and support of this House in developing an environmentally sound and sustainable mining industry—

PATRICIA MCCRAW

Mrs. Brenda Chamberlain (Guelph—Wellington, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on March 8, Guelph—Wellington Liberals met to elect a new president for the Guelph—Wellington Federal Liberal Association. At this meeting we also paid tribute to outgoing president, Patricia McCraw.

Patricia has been a longstanding member of the Liberal Party at both the federal and provincial levels. She has worked hard for her party and her country. Besides her work in politics, she volunteers for many organizations, including Canadian Save the Children.

Patricia's work and dedication has again proven that liberalism is more than a political party. First and foremost it is people, people who care deeply about Canada, people who are never satisfied with the status quo and who work hard to make their country the best in the world.

I join Pat's family and her many friends in thanking her for her service to our association and her commitment to me as member of Parliament. Well done, Pat.

JUDY FELD CARR

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the recent history of Syrian Jewry has been one of terror and bitter repression.

This grotesque chapter of modern history is now thankfully closed, due to the efforts of one Canadian, Judy Feld Carr. Over the past 23 years, she has worked unceasingly and surreptitiously to build an underground railway. She has raised funds to sustain these hostages, co–opt officials and to pay ransom. Because of her, 2,500 Syrian Jews are now free.

Judy Feld Carr and all those who supported her deserve our praise, our gratitude and our thanks. When this heroic story is fully told, may it inspire others to realize that one person can make a difference. Judy, you have made a difference, an incredible difference. You have earned a place in our hearts and in the history of humanity.

ARTISTS FOR SOVEREIGNTY

Mrs. Madeleine Dalphond–Guiral (Laval–Centre, BQ): Mr. Speaker, yesterday a number of Quebec artists spoke out in support of Quebec's march to sovereignty.

These artists wanted to express publicly their determination to see Quebec become a country. Singer Paul Piché delivered a clear message to Quebecers: "We know you. We imitate you.

desires and your hopes. We have faith in you. You can have faith in us; you are entitled".

The Bloc Quebecois is delighted by the artists' action, inspired not by political affiliation, but by a desire to express their profound convictions and to share, with their fellow Quebecers, aspirations that go well beyond the political.

COPYRIGHT ACT

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise on behalf of the constituents of Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt and local radio stations in my riding to warn the Minister of Canadian Heritage that his actions will kill jobs and small businesses.

The people I represent are suspicious that once again the Liberal government is attempting to fool Canadians, this time by introducing amendments to the Copyright Act. What the Liberals are really trying to do with neighbouring rights is to foist a killer tax on local radio stations.

The Minister of Canadian Heritage is silently planning to kill locally owned radio stations. They already pay royalties to authors and composers of music aired on their stations. Additional fees to performers and record companies is unjust.

Broadcasters maintain that free air play is what creates Canadian stars and sells records, not a Liberal government tax hidden in a bill of amendments. Canadians are confident that our culture can develop and grow without the Liberal government intervening with a radio station killer tax.

CARLETON CIVIC CENTRE

Mr. Harold Culbert (Carleton—Charlotte, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on the afternoon of Thursday, March 16, 1995 the Carleton Civic Centre will officially open its doors in Woodstock, New Brunswick. It is a wonderful new facility that will be enjoyed by the area's citizens for many years to come.

While this is wonderful news, the even more important component has been the method in which the goal of completing this facility has been realized. It is important to note that the completion of this project was achieved through true partnership. This partnership included groups, organizations, businesses, individuals, surrounding communities, as well as all three levels of government.

I congratulate the Carleton Civic Centre committee and all those who contributed to the success of this most worthy project.

MANITOBA SPORTS TEAMS

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise in recognition of two recent Canadian championship teams from Manitoba.

This past weekend Mr. Kerry Burtnyk and his team members, Keith Fenton, Rob Meakin who is a constituent of mine, and Jeff Ryan captured the brier in Halifax. It was Burtnyk's second win. He first won the brier 14 years ago. Mr. Burtnyk and his team will go on to represent Canada at the world curling championships in Brandon beginning on April 8. We wish him and his teammates the very best of luck.

I also wish to give my wholehearted congratulations to the University of Winnipeg Wesman women's basketball team. They won their third consecutive university championship this past weekend. The Wesman beat the University of Manitoba Bison squad 72 to 61. A healthy rivalry exists between these two teams. In fact it was earlier this year that the Bisons ended the Wesman's world record setting 88 game winning streak.

These athletes deserve recognition for their skill.

Ms. Shaughnessy Cohen (Windsor—St. Clair, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, come with me now to those wonderful days of yesteryear, back to the days when the NDP thought themselves a force to be reckoned with.

Where are the NDP members today? Well, I will tell you that eight out of nine members of the NDP caucus are going to vote against gun control.

I look to the left and see Buzz Hargrove and the CAW. They support gun control. I look to the left and see Bob White and the CLC. They support gun control. I look to the mainstream and 80 per cent of Canadians are what I see. They support gun control.

• (1410)

Where are the NDP? Oh, there they are on the right.

The Speaker: I see the NDP.

CUBA

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway, NDP): Mr. Speaker, speaking from the left, Canada has maintained unbroken diplomatic relations with Cuba for 50 years and has established important trade and investment links with Cuba.

The U.S. government and Congress have imposed an illegal and immoral blockade in Cuba. Now U.S. Senator Jesse Helms, chair of the foreign relations committee, is trying to target foreigners, including Canadians, who invest in Cuba, barring entry to the U.S. and cutting off preferential trade rights.

I call upon the Government of Canada to strongly condemn and lobby against this bill which would have a particularly grave impact on sugar product exports to the U.S. and investment projects in Cuba.

The Helms bill has been referred to as the Canada bashing act of 1995 by Cuban expert Jorge Dominguez of Harvard University.

Finally, the leader of the Reform Party may wish to raise this issue with his political soulmate Newt Gingrich during this love–in in Washington today.

QUEBEC SOVEREIGNTY

Mr. Richard Bélisle (La Prairie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in a study by the highly reputable firm of Rogers and Wells of New York, commissioned by the Government of Quebec, lawyers David Bernstein and William Silverman concluded that Canadian–American trade rules would not change with Quebec sovereignty.

According to these experts, the United States would renew Canadian–American treaties with Quebec, including the free trade agreement, in order to protect their economic interests.

Therefore, the rest of Canada will have nothing to say about trade between Quebec and the United States and even less effect on preventing Quebec from enjoying the benefits of the free trade agreement.

In other words, the day after sovereignty in Quebec, it will be business as usual.

CURLING CHAMPIONSHIPS

Mr. Jake E. Hoeppner (Lisgar—Marquette, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise in this House today to congratulate a fellow Manitoban on a great performance.

Manitoba's skip, Kerry Burtnyk, led his team to victory at the Canadian men's curling championships in Halifax over the weekend. The Manitoba team, which also includes Keith Fenton, Rob Meakin and Jeff Ryan, persevered through some tough competition to give Manitoba the Canadian men's curling championship.

This victory also solidifies Manitoba's claim to curling excellence. We now enjoy the men's and women's titles as well as the junior women's and men's titles.

Best of luck to the Manitoba squad at the upcoming world curling championships in Brandon starting April 8.

REFORM PARTY

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Reform Party has sent its boss to Washington to try and impress Republican leader Newt Gingrich with its brand of politics. This gives a whole new meaning to the expression "a meeting of the minds".

Let us read today's agenda for these public officials: Republican whip meeting, closed to the public; meeting with the undersecretary of state, no photo op; briefing with officials of the secretary of defence, no photo op; Concord Coalition briefing, closed; Progress and Freedom Foundation briefing, in camera. Finally, the leader of the Reform Party is enjoying a Heritage Foundation private luncheon and you guessed it, it is private.

We cannot understand why the leader of the third party prefers to have closed meetings. Yesterday, Washington reporters paid him the ultimate compliment by saying he was a Liberal.

PREMIER OF QUEBEC

Mr. Robert Bertrand (Pontiac—Gatineau—Labelle, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, during a press conference held at the end of the first day of the Parti Quebecois' caucus meeting, the Quebec premier stated that what the Martin budget says is that we will be pretty nice to you this year and that way we can be sure that you will be gullible enough to vote no. This statement is totally unacceptable.

By expressing himself in this way, Quebec's premier really shows how much he respects those who do not share his opinion. This deplorable comment is but one in a slew of pitiful and bigoted things that many separatist spokespersons have been saying recently.

• (1415)

After spending millions of dollars to give Quebecers a say in their future, with that statement alone, the premier totally negated the process's basis.

We are therefore obliged to state that separatists in Quebec only respect people who agree with them.

THE DEFICIT

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, we have asked and asked the Minister of Finance how long it will take to eliminate the deficit. He has been completely unable to give us an answer.

Now we discover that the President of the Treasury Board has it all under control. The year 2000 will be the year that Canadians will start to move out from under the deficit cloud, that is, if the cloud has not descended upon us by then.

The minister and his colleagues said they will "hum the same balanced budget tune". This is no time for a cowardly rendition of the "lower the deficit only if you can" song. It is time for the minister to produce the deficit requiem mass. By the way, would he please be sure to send a copy to the Minister of Finance as he seems to have been left out of the choir.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

NATIONAL DEBT

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, despite the spending cuts announced in the Budget, the government is faced with a substantial increase this year, from $42 billion to $50 billion, in the cost of servicing the debt. This increase is, of course, a direct consequence of our growing cumulative debt. In other words, the debt problem has not been addressed, despite the government's commitments.

My question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Will the minister confirm that even with the spending cuts announced in the Budget, the government's cumulative debt will total nearly $800 billion five years from now?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): No, Mr. Speaker, I believe the estimate given by the Leader of the Opposition is a little too pessimistic. We certainly intend to continue our efforts to put our fiscal house in order, but we did inherit a very substantial debt. In fact, that is why we took some very specific and very decisive steps in our latest Budget.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the figure I quoted is based on the data given in the Budget, on the minister's own figures over three years, projected according to the same parameters. He cannot deny those figures.

More specifically, I want to ask him whether he would agree that the debt problem will not be solved as long as nothing is done about the political structures of an ossified federal system that has turned Canada into a country that is overgoverned with, for instance, 40 per cent of federal spending targeted to areas that come under provincial jurisdiction?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, projections like those just made by the Leader of the Opposition are based on the assumption that the government does not intend to intervene. However, we have just made it quite clear that we intend to use budget after budget to introduce decisive measures to deal with the legacy we received from the previous government.

That being said, as far as government structures are concerned, we have again made it very clear in the Budget that we are capable of taking action in this respect. If anyone is in favour of the status quo, it is, unfortunately, the Leader of the Opposition and his party.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the minister was into his usual rhetoric, but I would remind him that the figures I just mentioned were computed directly on the basis of his own figures, assuming that he meets the objectives he has set, however inadequate they may be.

I want to ask him how he can deny the federal government's very obvious inflexibility, when we consider the $5 billion tax on employment, and I am referring to the surplus created by excessively high UI premiums, which the government will use to fund new incursions into the area of manpower training, instead of reducing UI premiums to stimulate job creation.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Human Resources Development and I have said repeatedly that we plan to reduce unemployment insurance premiums. In fact, one of the first announcements the minister made a year ago was in that vein.

Yes, we are creating a surplus, but I would have thought the Leader of the Opposition would welcome that. We inherited an incredible deficit, and we are turning it into a surplus. That is quite a feat.

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint-Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): Mr. Speaker, once again, the Minister of Finance has delayed the needed reform of the Canadian tax system instead of ensuring that all taxpayers and corporations pay their fair share of taxes. He chose once again to go after the middle class and the most disadvantaged in trying to address his deficit problem.

Given the extent of his budget problem, how can the minister deliberately spare the banks, which made over $4 billion in profits last year, by requiring from them a symbolic, temporary effort of only $100 million?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the $100 million tax is in addition to the large corporations tax, which we raised in our last budget. There is also the corporate tax that the banks are paying. I must point out to the hon. member that, if we look at government revenues, the fastest growing source of revenue is the taxes collected from large corporations.

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint-Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the minister tells us that he has asked the banks to make an effort, so I would remind him that the effort he requires from the unemployed is 120 times bigger than for the banks.

An hon. member: Shame!

Mr. Loubier: One hundred and twenty times bigger! That is his definition of fairness. So the question I am asking him is this: How does the minister explain his refusal to honour his election commitment, as reported in the Globe and Mail, to establish a real minimum tax on corporate profits, when CP, with profits of $422 million, did not pay a single cent in tax?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first of all, there is a minimum corporate tax, which, incidentally, we increased in our last budget. I must, however, tell you that we did not raise personal taxes in our last budget, and I would ask the hon. member to tell the chief of the head office in Quebec City, Mr. Parizeau, not to raise personal taxes, as he threatened to do a couple of days ago.

LABOUR

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour.

The current railway labour dispute is now a national lockout. West coast ports are also shut down due to a longshoremen's strike. Every few years we go through this fiasco where both sides know back to work legislation is inevitable. Unfortunately Canadian jobs and other industries are at stake.

Will the minister put an end to this charade and legislate everyone back to work now?

[Translation]

Hon. Lucienne Robillard (Minister of Labour, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we must look at each work situation from a different perspective and not lump airports, harbours and railways all together. They are different companies and labour relations vary from one to the other.

We are keeping abreast of these situations. As you know, Mr. Speaker, regarding railways, even CP was able to reach an agreement in principle with some workers. The situation which is of most concern to me now is that of the port of Vancouver, which we are following on an hourly basis, and I hope that the parties will go back to the negotiating table.

[English]

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Labour may have time to wait to sort this out but Canadian farmers do not.

Present shipments are in danger. They must plan for future crops now and should not have to worry about whether the rail system will be there when they need it.

I ask the minister again. When will the government introduce back to work legislation? When?

[Translation]

Hon. Lucienne Robillard (Minister of Labour, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Reform member to remain calm and to refrain from spreading panic among the parties concerned. As we speak, grain is moving in the west, in Vancouver this very day.

• (1425)

We should keep in contact with the parties and keep in mind that it is always better to negotiate an agreement than to envision legislating these people back to work.

[English]

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, we have been calm far too long. When is the time to get nervous? It is right now. To date there have been 13 work stoppages in 29 years. Our western grain growers cannot afford to bear the brunt of another strike. Canada's transportation system must be reliable or our customers will go elsewhere.

Once the back to work legislation is passed, will the government take steps to ensure the threat of future rail strikes is removed once and for all?

[Translation]

Hon. Lucienne Robillard (Minister of Labour, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as usual, the hon. member is going a bit too fast. At this stage, legislation is out of the question, so I will not answer hypothetical questions.

FISHERIES

Mr. Stéphane Bergeron (Verchères, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Foreign Affairs. The stalemate persists in the dispute over turbot fishing opposing Canada and the European Union. Yesterday, the Minister of Foreign Affairs listed a number of diplomatic avenues to reopen discussions with EU officials.

Can the Minister of Foreign Affairs inform us of the outcome of the diplomatic initiatives mentioned yesterday and whether these initiatives will get things moving again, so that the dispute can be settled?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we certainly intend to pursue as far as possible the diplomatic initiatives under way. The Canadian government's commitment to protect fishery resources threatened by overfishing could not be clearer. I can assure the hon. member that the Government of Canada will not go back on this commitment.

Mr. Stéphane Bergeron (Verchères, BQ): Mr. Speaker, as part of these diplomatic initiatives, is the Minister of Foreign Affairs contemplating travelling himself to Brussels to defend Canada's position and try to reopen discussions with EU countries?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am flattered by the hon. member's suggestion. Obviously, should my presence be required to achieve a negotiated settlement in this dispute, I will gladly do so. But for the time being, I think that the government officials responsible for that sort of thing are doing a fine job and will succeed in coming to an agreement with our European Union friends.

CANADA POST

Mr. Ken Epp (Elk Island, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Recently some very serious allegations concerning possible conflict of interest in the post office have come to our attention. It seems that a Liberal senator and the chairman and president of Canada Post are closely linked to the Ottawa developer who built the new Canada Post building.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether he will instruct the ethics counsellor to investigate this very serious issue.

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the question relates to something which occurred before this government took office.

[English]

I would also like to say that the CBC, which made the allegation, apologized to the person concerned.

Mr. Ken Epp (Elk Island, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this is a very serious allegation. It calls for immediate action. Within weeks of winning this lucrative Canada Post contract, the developer, Mr. José Perez, was billed $59,000 to finance the racing career of the son of the Canada Post chairman. At the same time, the Liberal senator was billing Mr. Perez $60,000 per year for business advice.

I ask again. Will the Prime Minister undertake to ask the ethics counsellor to investigate, give a full accounting to the House and open up these allegations?

• (1430)

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I just said that the problem was a problem of management of the previous administration. It is not a problem that occurred before we formed the government. At that time there were no ethics counsellors. I do not know if it is my job to get the ethics counsellor to look into the file.

If the member has accusations to make, he can make them outside the House and face the consequences. The CBC apologized because it had a reason to apologize. I do not think it was a well founded accusation, but if the member wants to make an accusation he can make an accusation and face the responsibility of making such accusations.

REFERENDUM ON QUEBEC SOVEREIGNTY

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Canadian Heritage. Mr. Jacques Michaud, the acting spokesperson for the Fédération des communautés francophones et acadienne du Canada, asked Quebecers to vote "no" in the referendum, arguing that they can thrive more fully by remaining within Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mrs. Tremblay: Will the Minister of Canadian Heritage confirm that his government has just granted a special, additional $500,000 subsidy to defend the federalist cause during the referendum campaign in Quebec?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, not so long ago, the hon. member accused the heritage minister of not supporting the French-speaking and Acadian communities adequately. But we are doing that. We are doing it to preserve the French language, in compliance with the Official Languages Act, and also the culture of these communities, and we will continue to do so.

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it is a good thing that I have taken the floor, otherwise I wonder what the minister would tell me.

Will the heritage minister admit that the only purpose of this specific $500,000 subsidy granted to the Fédération des communautés francophones et acadienne is to convince certain spokespersons of these communities to serve the federalist cause, by using public funds?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member would be well advised to refrain from making accusations in this House. She is saying that these communities are selling their support and she is condemning them for doing so. This is shameful.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

PENSIONS

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board.

During this time of government downsizing we have heard a lot of talk about fairness and equity. However today we read in the papers about an example that does not seem too fair at all. It is a special retirement allowance for deputy ministers. On top of the regular public service pension, deputy ministers get an extra 2 per cent per year without paying a cent of their own. That could be an extra $30,000 a year for life.

Why do the government and the minister hand out golden treasure to the top executives but give a lump of coal to the rest of the public service?

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there is certainly no lump of coal to the rest of the public service. We treat them fairly and equitably. We will certainly be doing that in the downsizing exercise.

The program was brought in by the previous government in 1988 because at the time it wanted to attract more people from the private sector to become deputy ministers. The private sector said: "You are not competitive in terms of your salaries". It said: "We will take the additional pension allowance as being part of a total compensation package and will help attract people from the private sector into deputy minister positions". That is the reason the government brought in the program.

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it does sound strangely like MP pension plans.

The government actually on that one refused to take its nose out of the trough. Now on the deputy minister level we find that there is also a two–tier system depending on which level of the public service one belongs to.

For the sake of morale in the public service and for the sake of the fairness and equity the government claims, it should cancel the program that gives extra benefits to top executives and make it the same for all public servants as it should be.

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, a number of representatives of the private sector advised the government of the day on this matter. They said: "If you really want to attract top people to serve the public of Canada you are going to have to be competitive, and your salaries are not competitive".

● (1435)

We have to look at it from a total compensation package point of view. On that basis that is why it has been offered to senior deputy ministers.

INTERNATIONAL ASSISTANCE

Mr. Philippe Paré (Louis–Hébert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

In its budget, the government announces a substantial cut in international development assistance, in particular food aid to the poorest countries on earth. In fact, it is reducing by 16 per cent the multilateral and bilateral food aid budget, which will fall from $300 million to $250 million this year.

How does the Minister of Foreign Affairs reconcile Canada's substantial cuts to its international assistance budget with the support it gave to increasing development aid to the poorest countries at the Copenhagen summit on social development?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's question is about the same as that asked by one of his colleagues yesterday. In response to that question, I said that the Government of Canada had two ways of providing food aid: through its multilateral programs and through its bilateral programs.

The figures quoted by the hon. member refer to only one form of food aid. He does not have the total picture on government spending in this regard. If he combines expenditures in both bilateral and multilateral programs, he will see that our contribution remains the same.

Mr. Philippe Paré (Louis–Hébert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, how does the minister justify such a substantial reduction in its direct assistance to the poorest countries even before completing the reform of CIDA recommended by the Auditor General of Canada?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like the hon. member to come and read carefully two questions that were prepared by his research office. He does not have to listen to my reply, but I must remind him that he should read it; he would then have the answer to his second question.

IRVING WHALE

Mr. Denis Paradis (Brome—Missisquoi, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

After hearing the hon. member for Bonaventure—Îles–de–la–Madeleine, can the minister assure this House today that refloating the Irving Whale, the barge that sank off the coast of the Magdalen Islands in 1970, does not pose an environmental threat to Magdalen Islands fishermen and residents?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I was expecting this question from the official opposition, but since it was not forthcoming—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Ms. Copps: I just wanted to remind hon. members that the first report proposing salvage measures, proposed in 1989, was rejected by the then Minister of the Environment.

I am very pleased to report that, since we came to power, 24 years after the incident occurred and six years after the first report was presented to the former environment minister—the hon. member for Lac–Saint–Jean—action will finally be taken this spring. We have opted for the alternative that was the least expensive and the safest for the residents of the Magdalen Islands and Prince Edward Island.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

The Liberals seem to have different rules for Canada's elite. Last night it was reported that children of diplomats and senior military officials were attending expensive private schools all around the world and the taxpayers were footing the bill for this extravagance.

Will the government commit to immediately bringing this benefit in line with similar benefits in the private sector?

• (1440)

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): The answer, Mr. Speaker, is that we do exactly that. It is quite clear that the children of those serving abroad have to attend schools that follow a curriculum which will allow them to continue their classes when they come back to Canada.

Canadian diplomats are receiving nothing more than diplomats of other countries. If the children of Canadian business representatives abroad are going to school, they are going to exactly the same schools as the children of our diplomats.

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. minister for his response. However the foreign services directive indicates that there is a double standard. Students are given three taxpayer funded flights a year. Students are even going to school on the French Riviera. These perks are more lucrative than in the private sector.

Not only is there a two–tier pension plan but we learn there is now a two–tier education plan: one for ordinary Canadians and one for the Canadian elite.

Does the minister not understand that Canadians will no longer tolerate these Liberal double standards for the Canadian elite?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the suggestion of the hon. member to review the treatment offered to children of our people who are abroad.

I challenge her to verify the allegations she is making here which I think are totally unfounded. It is very nice to take her lead from a very biased report that does not take reality into account.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Jean–Marc Jacob (Charlesbourg, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence.

We have learned that the number of francophones applying to become Canadian Forces officers dropped drastically after the closure of the military college in Saint–Jean was announced. Applications are down to 102 this year from 243 last year, a drop of more than 50 per cent.

Does the Minister of National Defence recognize that, as we had predicted, closing the military college in Saint–Jean will have the effect of discouraging francophones from becoming Canadian Forces officers because they can no longer train in their own environment and in French, as they could in Saint–Jean?

[English]

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to inform the House that recruitment for the armed forces is down right across the country. One of the reasons is that the economy is buoyant.

Historically when times are rough there is obviously less competition for the various places. As a result of improvement in the economy we find that the normal group of people who would be attracted to the armed forces has found other options.

With respect to Quebec, recruitment is down about 50 per cent overall. It is down 40 per cent in Ontario. It is down about 20 per cent in the west. It is about even in the Atlantic region.

I should say that part of the problem concerning recruitment to the military college was due to the uncertainty as to what would happen with young students coming out of high schools in Quebec. That uncertainty was created because of the opposition tactics by the official opposition and the government in Quebec City that refused to accept the agreement originally signed by the former Government of Quebec.

Now that we have the agreement in place and now that the parents of francophone students in Quebec know what is going to happen, we believe recruitment will pick up in the next few weeks and we will meet our target very shortly.

Mr. Jean–Marc Jacob (Charlesbourg, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I find the minister's answer extraordinary.

Does the Minister of National Defence recognize that the sharp drop in francophone officer candidate enrolment will inevitably aggravate the already serious problem of francophone under–representation in the senior ranks of the Canadian Armed Forces, thereby compounding the unfair treatment of Quebec?

• (1445)

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I find it extraordinary that the hon. member did not listen to my answer.

Because of the uncertainty surrounding the disposition of the site of the former College at St–Jean, the advertising for those students specifically in Quebec was delayed a number of weeks. Now that we have a deal that was signed a few weeks ago we know what exactly is available. Those students coming out of high schools in Quebec can take the prep year at the new civil institution in St–Jean.

In the last few days we have been heartened by what we have seen. Recruitment is picking up. It was merely delayed.

The hon. member talks about the decline in francophones overall in the armed forces. That is not borne out by the facts. About 27 per cent of members of the armed forces are francophone and fully 24 per cent of all senior officers are francophone, and that will continue.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, a shocking document has been released to the Vancouver Sun, the concluding document of immigration consultations in B.C. in which the minister's employees say the following: "We go about congratulating ourselves for our overexuberant acceptance of bogus refugees while the rest of the world snickers at us for the suckers we are. The lawyers are making a circus out of refugee claims".

The minister ignores Canadians, experts and the Reform Party. Will he also ignore his own employees or will he make change?

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I do not know where this member has been for the last little while, but this government has made a number of reforms not only to the immigration procedure but also to legislation like Bill C–44. Reforms to the IRB were announced last week. He was upset that we announced them during the budget process.

However, this government has moved on both IRB and immigration procedures. We support immigration. Immigration is positive for this country regardless of what this member and his party stand for.

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, if the minister needs more suggestions for change than those we have offered already, here is what his own employees have to say: "End inland refugee claims. Limit family reunification. End official multiculturalism and make personal suitability the key criterion for immigration to Canada".

Why did the minister hide this damning document? Will he admit that last summer's consultations were as bogus as the refugee system he so ardently defends?

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I cannot hide a document I have never seen. My department and my government do not stand for the comments he has made.

The answer to his request is no. This party is bogus to the reality of Canada and does not know how this country has been built. If it did it would not have the temerity to suggest what it does day in and day out.

Mr. Gordon Kirkby (Prince Albert—Churchill River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today in Washington the leader of the third party denigrated the Canadian Wheat Board.

Many Canadian farmers know they produce high quality products and that the wheat board has greatly assisted Canada's success in the grain trade. The farmers are deeply concerned about these remarks made by the leader of the third party.

Do the views expressed by the leader of the third party reflect in any way the views of the federal government?

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale (Minister of Agriculture and Agri-Food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the leader of the Reform Party is as much of a diplomatic disappointment in Washington as he is a political disappointment in Canada.

I want to assure the hon. member that the leader of the Reform Party in no way speaks for the Government of Canada. The Canadian Wheat Board is and always has been a fair international trading agency, as multiple studies by the United States have demonstrated. Decisions about Canadian grain marketing systems and policies will be made in Canada by Canadians, not in any foreign capital.

CANADIAN NATIONAL

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

The Minister of Finance was in Winnipeg recently speaking to the Winnipeg Chamber of Commerce. I understand he was asked a question about the status of CN pensions.

Would he say here in the House today what he is reported to have said at that meeting, that under any circumstances of privatization of CN that may happen in the future, pensions of CN pensioners will be guaranteed by the Government of Canada and CN pensioners have nothing to fear from privatization? Will he put that on the record here today?

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in dealing with the commercialisation of CN obviously we are going to take into account everything important to Canadians and the employees of CN. I want to reassure my hon. friend that as the process unfolds the interests of everyone involved will be protected to the extent that we can.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona, NDP): Mr. Speaker, why is the Minister of Finance not willing to state today on the record what he is reported to have said at that meeting in Winnipeg, that the pensions of CN pensioners would be guaranteed by the Government of Canada?

Get up and say it so people do not have to worry about their pensions. Say what you said in Winnipeg. Never mind him, I asked—

The Speaker: All questions should be put through the Chair.

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I understand the hon. member's frustration because we have all read of his experience at a meeting he attended to discuss financial matters in the west not very long ago. He only lasted, I am told, some five or ten minutes when they asked him to leave. It is obvious why one would do that.

With respect to the commercialisation of Canadian National, we understand the concerns of the pensioners of CN, the concerns of the employees. We also understand how important it is to taxpayers and to people across the country to have a viable enterprise, operating a coast to coast railroad.

The difference between what the government will do and what the hon. member and his party usually do is that they talk about doing things, we get them done to protect those interests which he considers important.

AIR TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, after months of procrastination, the Minister of Transport announced on Friday that Air Canada would be authorized to take advantage of the lucrative Hong Kong market. However, the minister's decision comes quite late, since there is less than a week left to negotiate arrangements for this year with Hong Kong officials.

Will the minister agree that the delay in designating Air Canada as the second carrier to Hong Kong is the only reason which could keep that airline from exploiting this lucrative market during the peak summer season?

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it took years of negotiations to provide Air Canada with an opportunity to fly to Asia. As you know, in January of last year, Air Canada was granted access to Kansai airport, in Japan.

This year, we managed to obtain landing rights in New York and in Chicago. We also made the decision to give Air Canada access to Hong Kong.

I realize that this is painful for opposition members, but I do accept the praises of Hollis Harris, who says that this decision is fair.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, regarding the same issue, I ask the Minister of Foreign Affairs whether he can confirm that negotiating four weekly flights for Air Canada is indeed a priority for the Canadian team which is currently negotiating with Hong Kong officials?

[English]

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the entire question of providing Canadian travellers, business people and tourists with access to and from Hong Kong is one which this government has worked on since the time it came to office.

• (1455)

It is extremely important that Canadian Airlines International have access to Frankfurt, that we open the routes that have been awarded to the Philippines, to Malaysia, to Vietnam. We have signed a bilateral agreement with the United States.

It is a priority of this government to negotiate arrangements to give access to Air Canada at Hong Kong.

If the member were the least bit fair about this he would look over the last 14 months at what has occurred in the aviation industry in Canada and he would probably recognize that more progress has been made in 14 months than in the previous 15 years.

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice will be at a meeting in Manitoba tonight at the request of Dauphin—Swan River constituents concerned about Bill C–68.

I have been advised that there are hundreds of people who will be denied entrance to this meeting.

Why is the justice minister meeting behind closed doors with only 50 or so people who are attending on an invitation only basis when there are hundreds who want to attend this meeting? Why is the justice minister refusing to meet with these people? Why is he locking them out of this meeting?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, every member of the House knows no minister has been consulting with the Canadian people more than the Minister of Justice.

He is doing it so well that there are plenty of demands for meetings with him. Obviously he cannot meet with everybody. I know the Minister of Justice has never refused good consultations on problems presented to the House. He has put forth more propositions for meaningful changes in his field in the last 14 months than I have ever seen.

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this is not the first time the justice minister has locked people out of his meetings. In Calgary last January there were more people standing outside the meeting in the cold than inside the building.

Will the Prime Minister instruct his justice minister to begin to listen to the people and meet their concerns about his gun control bill and stop locking them out of meetings?

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is completely wrong.

As the Prime Minister has said, no minister in recent years has met more regularly and more diligently than the Minister of Justice, particularly on the gun control issue.

He used his whole summer to go from coast to coast to speak with Canadians, to inform them of what he intended to do, to get their feedback and to get information in order to prepare this piece of legislation.

No one could ask for more.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mrs. Eleni Bakopanos (Saint–Denis, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Human Resources Development.

Canadians and, more specifically, Quebecers, have been telling us they want more effective programs and an end to overlap and duplication with the provinces.

What steps has the minister taken through the Unemployment Insurance Program to eliminate wasteful spending of public funds?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we are working very hard on a number of projects with the provinces to reduce duplication and overlap. For instance, we signed four agreements with the provinces to protect UI information and achieve substantial savings in spending on social services in each province.

In fact, I believe Mrs. Blackburn, the Quebec Minister of Income Security, is prepared to review the UI system in order to cut costs for her department. I hope this will be one example of close co–operation between the federal government and the provincial governments on reducing the cost of social services.

BASE CLOSURES

Mrs. Elsie Wayne (Saint John, PC): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister responsible for ACOA.

• (1500)

Will the minister advise the House how he can justify cutting a $30 million trust fund by $10 million? This trust fund was specifically transferred from the Department of National Defence and earmarked for the Atlantic communities affected by the base closures announced in the 1994 budget. What steps will the minister take to correct this situation?

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works and Government Services, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will take the question under advisement and relay it to the minister. She will get an answer in writing.

The Speaker: I have a point of order from the hon. member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley.

POINTS OF ORDER

Mr. Dick Harris (Prince George—Bulkley Valley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. On March 1 in the House I mistakenly stated that the member for London—Middlesex had made unacceptable comments about the children of the member for Medicine Hat.

It was the member for Victoria—Haliburton who made these remarks and not the member for London—Middlesex. I wish to apologize to the member for London—Middlesex.

Mr. Pat O'Brien (London—Middlesex, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to thank my hon. colleague for his apology. I was surprised how I could have been in the House at that time insulting anyone since it was my privilege to be having lunch with some other colleagues—with the Prime Minister—that day.

I appreciate his clarifying the record.

WAYS AND MEANS

TABLING OF NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 83(1), I have the honour to lay upon the Table a Notice of Ways and Means motion concerning certain measures announced in the February 1995 budget. I ask that you designate an Order of the Day for the consideration of the said motion.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed consideration of the motion that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government and the amendment.

Ms. Paddy Torsney (Burlington, Lib.): Madam Speaker, certainly the impact of my words have lost some of their oomph, as the hon. colleague says, given the delay.

I did want to say to the member opposite who is no longer in the Chamber that paranoia will destroy you, and I am not paranoid.

Mr. Hermanson: Madam Speaker, on a point of order, I believe it is not proper procedure to note members that are not in the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I am sure the hon. member will apologize for having done that.

Ms. Torsney: Madam Speaker, I do apologize for that.

• (1505)

As I was saying earlier it is important that we set clear targets. As anybody or any business that has been in a debt situation knows you have to set clear targets and meet those targets. That is certainly what the government is doing.

You do not cut off your nose to spite your face. We still have to make investments in the future. We still have to get out from underneath the debt and deficit situation. We will do so by making strategic investments, by setting clear targets and by continuing to meet those targets as we have in the last year and actually exceeding them. That is the conclusion of my remarks.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am speaking in this debate in order to point out a number of contradictions in the budget, in the way cuts are made, cuts I would describe as bad.

The first thing I would like to draw to the attention of this House is the cuts in research and development, particularly in the agricultural sector. In this period of worldwide change, this time of market globalization, it is very surprising for a government to be cutting out all research in such a draconian and definitive fashion in the area of ovine production—production for the development of sheep farming. This type of production is both ecological and a source of diversification for a number of regions in Canada.

The decision was made in the budget to close the experimental farm at La Pocatière. This is a federal experimental farm, the oldest one in Quebec, which, only two years ago, was given the exclusive mandate for research in sheep farming for all of eastern Canada and in fact for Canada as a whole. A few years ago, a new sheep barn was built there at a cost of $10 million—money simply forgotten today. We are told that this farm will be closed, despite the fact that the sheep industry should get the most out of investment in research and development.

This situation is in blatant contradiction with the Liberal Party program and the guidelines of the present government on support to the agriculture industry. It is a contradiction, and I believe the government should reverse its decision and continue to pay the cost of research and development in sheep production so that this industry can receive the support it needs to take its rightful place in the Quebec and Canadian market.

Another example of bad cuts in the budget is the substantial increase in port tariffs planned for the various harbours that come under Ports Canada and which are along the St. Lawrence River, among other places. They decided to raise port tariffs by 25 per cent and the ultimate result of this increase will be that a certain number of boats which would otherwise have docked in these ports will refuse to do so. For example, in Cacouna harbour, in my riding, the increase in port tariffs will achieve the opposite effect to that intended, which is to increase government revenues.

The result of the increase in port tariffs will be that fewer boats will dock there. This may cause an overall decrease. This is the kind of misjudgment of the situation which will have a negative impact on all ports, especially on the St. Lawrence, where 13 ports can be considered profitable when it comes to efficiency. This across–the–board increase in port tariffs will make some hitherto profitable ports stop being profitable and will make them a drain on the federal budget. I think that it is important that the federal government reconsider its decision to increase port tariffs by 25 per cent, because all users know that it will have an impact.

People who make calls for tenders, shipowners who entertain the idea of docking ships in Cacouna harbour or another could very well end up going to the east coast of the United States. We are going to eventually end up with even more harbour facilities which are not used as they should be and which will be increasingly in the red.

I think that these are examples where the government sets out in good faith to cut spending, but cuts in the wrong places and implements cuts which have negative repercussions for the economy of certain regions, like the one I represent, the riding of Kamouraska—Rivière–du–Loup.

Another example is transportation subsidies. Everyone agrees that these subsidies, which perhaps created an artificial market, must be abolished. The Minister of Transport was favourably disposed to recommendations that these subsidies be eliminated gradually, so that the impact on the regional economy could be evaluated. The Minister of Finance, however, has decided to cut them drastically starting July 1, 1995.

It is not possible at this time to predict the effect this will have on eastern Quebec and the Atlantic provinces. It is not known if it will be beneficial or disastrous, or if some businesses will not be forced to close their doors during the summer of 1995 because of this decision.

Why did the government not follow the recommendations of the industrial commissioners of eastern Quebec, of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, of all the stakeholders in this sector ultimately, and reduce these subsidies gradually over four or five years? That would have allowed the various industries, whether in the forestry sector, dairy production, furniture manufacturing, or processing, to adapt, to explore new markets and to meet the new challenges of competition.

I think that a decision such as this one will lead on the short term to an increase in unemployment. I need not tell you that our economy does not adapt very quickly to change. Some people will lose their jobs and will not find others right away because the first step will be to rebuild the regional economy, to create an industrial fabric corresponding to the new market conditions resulting from the abolition of transportation subsidies.

This is another example of how, in the budget, the federal government has ignored the complex nature of markets and is making decisions that will have a major negative impact on the short term. This impact could have been reduced by taking into account the recommendations made by the various stakeholders in the local economy.

I would like to give one last example, which I think is even more meaningful, namely the Federal Office of Regional Development's withdrawal from capital assistance programs for small business. Under the pretext of saving, we will kill a very lucrative small business start–up market.

For example, a small winery like the one in my riding obtained a subsidy to build a warehouse, which allowed it to expand its market and secure a significant market share. This type of assistance will disappear. Consultants will help businesses find their way around the bureaucratic maze, but this type of assistance will not help launch small businesses. In this regard, I think that the federal government made the wrong decision.

I gave several examples of less than effective cuts which will be counter–productive on the long term, so that we will end up with an even larger deficit and regions will become even more dependent on transfers. The results will be the opposite of what the government is trying to achieve.

Of course, the government argues that it has to do this in order to cut spending. But we have not looked at the other side of the coin. For example, why did they decide to give family trusts until 1999 before eliminating the tax deferral and preferred beneficiary provisions?

• (1515)

It is a little like coming home one night to find a burglar and telling him: "It is now 11 at night; I will come back tomorrow morning around five o'clock, but in the meantime, keep quiet and do not steal anything".

We are telling Canada's wealthy families that have taken advantage of family trusts that they have five years to empty these trusts. At the end of the day, they will still be able to make the most of this unacceptable tax dodge.

Another way we could have saved money is by eliminating duplication in the area of manpower where, in Quebec alone, $250 million is wasted every year. I wanted to give these two examples to show that, if the government had taken action in the right places, it would not have been obliged to resort to such senseless measures as cutting Canada's only experimental sheep production research farm, which is located in La Pocatière.

Mr. Osvaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ): Madam Speaker, I rise today to take part in this debate on the 1995–96 budget.

First of all, I must say that this budget is very disappointing. It is hard on the workers, the disadvantaged and Quebec. It does not contain any job creation measures. There is nothing in this budget for the 800,000 Quebecers on UI and welfare who want to work. In this budget like in his last budget, the Minister of Finance is announcing further cuts in unemployment insurance. Quebec however will get back less than it will contribute in 1995. It is clear that federalism does not profit Quebec.

This year, Quebec workers and employers will contribute $4.8 billion to the UI fund, but Quebec claimants will receive about $4.7 billion in benefits and various employment–related services. This will means a shortfall of approximately $118 million for Quebec. Just to restore the pre–recession level of employment, more than 800,000 jobs would have to be created in Canada.

In that sense, the budget offers no hope to the 1,200,000 jobless Canadians, based on Statistics Canada's figures.

Instead, the government sets itself a target of 45,000 job cuts in the federal public service, the most extensive one–time workforce reduction ever made in the public sector. Ottawa, Hull, Montreal, Toronto and many smaller cities and local economies will be hard hit by such a massive layoff of civil servants. I want to show solidarity with the Public Service Alliance of Canada and all government employees who will be laid off.

In addition, seniors' income is threatened by the government's announcement of an impending review of old age pensions scheduled for 1997 and designed to reduce program benefits.

In these times of drastic cuts in social programs, the government can almost certainly be expected to try and raise premiums, reduce benefits and tie pension income to family income. Thousands of seniors, UI and welfare recipients are very unhappy with this budget, particularly in my riding of Bourassa, where they are in great numbers.

The federal contribution to social programs, i.e. welfare, health and education, will be reduced from $17.3 billion in 1994–95 to $10.3 billion in 1997–98. This 40 per cent cut over three years will force the provinces to make further cuts with nothing offsetting these cuts.

On the other hand, costly duplication will be allowed to continue at the expense of the taxpayers, and so will squandering.

• (1520)

Also, the government does not go after the thousands of businesses which do not pay taxes, nor does it do anything about the tax havens accessible by virtue of tax treaties signed with other countries. This budget looks like it was drafted by Wall Street financiers. Tax on bank capital is increased, but only for a certain period. Consequently, banks will temporarily contribute about $100 million, while the Royal Bank alone made profits in excess of $1.2 billion in 1994.

As for family trusts, which Bloc Quebecois members denounced on many occasions, the minister maintains existing privileges for another five years. Over the next three years, the minister will cut $307 million from CMHC's budget, which is responsible for social housing, a very important issue in my riding of Bourassa, in Montréal–Nord. This unfair budget also reduces by $32 million the amount of subsidies to Quebec dairy producers.

The government also intends to reduce by $1.3 billion, over a three–year period, the budget for international assistance. That decision is in full contradiction with the white paper on Canada's foreign policy, which was tabled in February. I come from a developing country and I care a lot about this issue. It is a shame for our country, which will only allocate 0.29 per cent of its GNP to international co–operation, while the objective set by the UN is 0.7 per cent. This is the lowest level since the sixties. Meanwhile, at the recent world summit on social development, in Copenhagen, industrial nations, including Canada, just pledged to increase official development assistance. How hypocritical!

I also want to discuss the cuts affecting the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. Because of drastic increases in immigration fees, family reunification will become increasingly difficult. The most blatant example is the tax on immigration. From now on, all adults who want to immigrate to Canada will have to pay $975, in addition to a $500 processing fee, which means they will have to pay $1,475 just for the right to settle in Canada.

In many countries, this amount is the equivalent of a year's wages or even more. A family of four will have to pay about $4,000. Many people whose refugee status has been recognized cannot afford to pay $500 to obtain permanent residence. Some people arrive here without any money at all. How can they deal with this increase? It is unacceptable that future immigrants who never lived in Canada or visited this country will have to pay for the Canadian government's deficit.

The government overlooks the fact that the country of origin has already invested a lot of money in educating these immigrants who are a formidable asset to Canadian and Quebec society. Furthermore, people will have to pay $200 instead of $80 to obtain citizenship certificates. This is unacceptable. The government expects to collect more than $100 million per year as a result. This discriminates against workers and poor people from developing countries, like the head tax on Chinese immigrants in the 19th century, which was intended to discourage the Chinese from coming to Canada.

The government has shown no compassion at all for people who seek the protection of Canada under the Geneva Convention. The budget cuts will have a severe impact on the IRB. The number of commissioners who deal with refugees will drop from 175 to 112. The board's budget will be reduced from $82 million to $77 million. On the whole, the budget of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration is shrinking, despite the fact that fees for services rendered have gone up, sometimes by 200 or 300 per cent.

Because of office closures, staff cuts, the creation of two huge processing centres in Vegreville and Mississauga and other operating problems, the department is no longer capable of carrying out its mandate.

• (1525)

On top of that, we had the appointment a few days ago of Jean–Guy Fleury as executive director of IRB. Mr. Fleury formerly held a position with the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, a fact that was omitted from his biographical notes.

Why does the Liberal government want to establish this kind of association between immigration and intelligence and national security matters?

[English]

Ms. Mary Clancy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Madam Speaker, this is by way of a comment because I really cannot let some of hon. member's comments go unanswered.

With the greatest of respect to the hon. member and his background in immigration, his lack of comprehension of the policies of the finance minister and the minister of immigration and our policy initiatives which have taken place during the last several weeks is tragic.

The idea that the department of immigration would not reduce its moneys is simply ludicrous. Of course it will. We all have to. Every single person in this country has to make a sacrifice to ensure that the country will continue and that the institutions of this country will continue to serve all Canadians.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Ms. Clancy: Madam Speaker, I wonder if we could call a meteorologist. There appears to be some heavy weather on the other side.

At any rate, over the sounds of the empty barrels, for the edification of the hon. member for Bourassa, for the 3,000th time since the announcement was made I want to explain the situation with regard to the fee. Very briefly, the $975 will be charged to adults on landing. No one will be turned away. Government loans will be available. Immigrants and refugees have paid back their loans from this country at the rate of 95 per cent. To say anything less is insulting to immigrants and refugees.

[Translation]

Mr. Nunez: Madam Speaker, I notice a great difference in the position taken by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration when she was in opposition, on this side of the room, and her speech today, now that her side is in power. Why is she not giving the same pro–immigration and pro– refugee speech she gave before? Why has she changed so much? Today she is defending policies criticized by all of the organizations that assist refugees and immigrants. Everybody is against this immigration tax. Everyone opposes the $975 fee.

She tells us that no one will be denied entry over this fee, but she does not tell us that, to qualify for a loan, an individual must show that he or she meets the loan repayment conditions. In poor countries, few people earn $975 a month; sometimes they do not even earn that in a year.

[English]

Mr. David Iftody (Provencher, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I wanted to respond to a couple of points the hon. member from the Bloc raised.

With respect to the reductions of the dairy subsidies in the budget, I believe the member may have erroneously left the House with the impression that Quebecers and Quebec dairy farmers were the only ones who received these kinds of cuts. That is not true at all. In fact, I have just received information in my office of a Canadian analysis. Each one of the dairy farmers across Canada contributed equally to the reductions, in terms of those subsidies, to the tune of about $1,000 per farm unit. I can report to the hon. member that the reductions in Quebec are the same type that were received in my constituency of Provencher.

With respect to unemployment rates, at the outset of his speech the member raised concerns about the inequities in terms of contributions in Quebec to the unemployment insurance fund and those collecting unemployment insurance.

• (1530)

Perhaps the reason there are not as many people collecting unemployment in Quebec as there were last year is the federal government's small business initiatives and the federal infrastructure program.

[Translation]

Mr. Nunez: Madam Speaker, I would like to point out, for the benefit of the hon. member for Halifax, that several members of her own party do not agree with the immigration fees.

Ms. Clancy: That is not true.

Mr. Nunez: Yes it is.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Are you going to reply to the hon. member for Provencher?

Mr. Nunez: I would like to give the hon. member an answer. Once again, Quebec is hit harder than the rest of the provinces. In the dairy sector alone, cuts of $32 million, and dairy producers are concentrated in Quebec. For the first time ever, this year Quebecers will contribute more to the unemployment insurance system than they will receive in benefits. The shortfall in unemployment insurance is $118 million. And there is nothing in the budget to help job creation. What about the promises? What about the Liberals' promise to create jobs?

Hon. Sheila Finestone (Secretary of State (Multiculturalism) (Status of Women), Lib.): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise today to participate in the budget debate. During all my years in opposition, I heard many finance ministers deliver their budget speeches. From one year to the next, the same scenario repeated itself. The minister would make great forecasts and great promises only to tell us later that he had been completely mistaken.

[English]

Now the approach is different. This is a new era. For the first time Canadians can trust their government's economic assumptions.

The Minister of Finance has restored the confidence of the financial markets. He has also done something else of equal importance. He is restoring the confidence of Canadians and for that I salute him.

Today I want to talk about the implications of the budget for Canadian women. However let us be very clear. I am not only speaking to women; I am also speaking to men. Women's issues are everyone's issues. They are societal issues. They touch every citizen in the country.

Women are our mothers, our spouses and care givers. They are also taxpayers, consumers, workers and entrepreneurs. They balance the family budget. They manage businesses. They take jobs and they create jobs. They educate the next generation.

Women are very realistic. They know that as a nation we cannot spend more money than we make for a very long time. The time to pay back quickly catches up. Women understand that our country cannot continue to accumulate huge deficits year after year after year.

Now the time has come to face reality. The 1995 budget is the first step and only the first step. Our goal is to create good jobs and maintain our social safety net. We refuse to have decisions of prime importance for the nation taken by the bond sellers in New York, Tokyo or for that matter on Bay Street.

What lies ahead of us is a long journey, too long delayed. At the end of the journey we will emerge triumphant with our finances in order, a stronger economy, an ensured social safety net, and with renewed confidence in our abilities.

Before we reach that goal many sacrifices will have to be made by all Canadians. We will all have to tighten our belts. Everyone shall be called on to do his or her fair share to help eliminate the deficit.

Women really understand the need for fiscal restraint. They are ready to do their fair share but only their fair share, for fiscal restraint must never be used as an excuse to roll back the advances women have made in the past 20 years. Nor can it be given as a reason for delaying or postponing the further progress of women's equality.

The first piece of good news for women in this budget is that there is no tax increase.

We sincerely believe that the tax issue is not only a matter of tax rates; it is also a matter of fairness. By eliminating tax loopholes, the budget makes our tax system more equitable.

Second, the Canadian government wants to give the provinces more flexibility in managing programs like health care, post–secondary education and social insurance. We will achieve this goal through the Canada Social Transfer.

[English]

The minister stated that flexibility does not mean a free–for–all. There are national goals that still must be applied. We will combine flexibility with continued fidelity to our principles.

The government is absolutely committed to providing a fair and sustainable system of protection for Canadian seniors. This is also very important for women as they live longer and are often among the poorest in society. In order to ensure the sustainability of our pension programs, we will consult with seniors and Canadians in general on the nature of the needed changes later this year. That is part of open government.

Women's groups have a great interest in these consultations and I encourage them to make their views known. I have asked my department to specifically focus on this issue in the coming year because we all have to contribute to the fullest degree possible to the design of the program.

Women have a major stake in the budget measures, seeking to replace dependence with independence. An important element of that effort is the new human resource investment fund. We have to ensure that women's particular employment situations, their training and employment patterns, their incomes, family responsibility and life experiences are fully taken into account, both in the design of the new fund and the planned changes to unemployment insurance.

I am also delighted that the Minister of Finance has announced several measures to encourage small business.

Close to 40 per cent of small businesses in Canada are headed by women and their success rate after five years of operation is double that for men. That is the truth.

We can be proud of this success, which, however, did not come easily and without pitfalls. Businesswomen have to face what we call financial sexism. This does not come from me but from a new study released a few days ago by the Canadian Federation of Independent Business.

This study shows that women applying for business loans at financial institutions are turned down 20 per cent more often than men. It is a disgrace. And if they are approved, 95 per cent of the time, they have to pay higher interest rates on their loans. Do you find that fair? We certainly do not. All this, I remind you, in spite of the fact that women are very responsible and successful in business.

No wonder that, according to Pierre Cléroux, Vice–President of CFIB, these figures prove beyond any doubt that financial institutions are discriminating against women entrepreneurs.

Hats off to the Minister of Finance for stating in his budget speech, and I quote: "This government is determined that small businesses will have access to the financing they need to continue being our number one creator of jobs".

On behalf of all women entrepreneurs, I might say the sooner the better.

[English]

Let me turn to the principle of good government. There is no doubt in my mind that we have to redesign the role of government in the economy to fit the size of our pocketbook and the priorities of our people.

Last year, soon after being elected, our government undertook an extensive review of all programs and agencies it is responsible for. As part of this program review, the role of three organizations dedicated to women's equality, namely Status of Women Canada, HRD's Women's Program and the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women.

[English]

The review process found that all three promote women's equality and in various degrees they all conduct research, consultation and undertake communications. All three also work closely with women's organizations.

The government concluded that the best way to increase both effectiveness and efficiency would be to consolidate its actions for women's equality at Status of Women Canada. In this regard effective April 1, 1995 the women's program of human resource development will be transferred to Status of Women Canada. The presence and the role of their local, regional and national staff, those offices and their services, will be maintained.

As well, effective April 1, 1995 the mandate of the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women will end. This will result in a streamlining of resources and costs, removing duplication and eliminating all order in council appointments.

The CACSW's research, consultation and public information functions will be consolidated within the overall operations of Status of Women Canada.

The CACSW will be given the time and support it needs to wind up its operations. Once we move the functions to Status of Women Canada we hope we will be able to absorb some of the advisory council's staff to fulfil these functions.

[Translation]

The Canadian government is firmly committed to women's equality. As a matter of fact, this commitment has motivated all our decisions. This consolidation will enable this government to further the cause of women's equality in partnership with women's groups, the provinces and territories, the private sector and volunteer organizations.

[English]

The Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women played a major role in the formative years of Canada's modern women's movement. At its inception in 1973 following the Bird report, the report of the royal commission, it filled an important void. The modern Canadian women's movement was in its infancy. Women lacked a strong voice in the public arena. They also lacked vehicles through which they could advance equality.

Since then Canadian women have made progress in government, in education, in business and in the academic world. More important, women have formed hundreds of small, medium and large organizations throughout the country to ensure that their needs and concerns are heard and met.

These local, regional and national organizations work in many fields like violence against women, child care, the treatment of women in the health, justice and immigration systems, and the needs of women entrepreneurs among others.

As our society evolved the need for some of the functions of the council changed. Over the years its role as an interpreter of the voices of women has been overtaken by many strong, established national, regional and local women's organization.

We owe a great deal to the pioneers who worked within the advisory council. I salute the years of hard work and dedication of the committed women and men who have served the advancement of women through the advisory council.

I wish good luck to its outgoing president. She has been very helpful in my thinking the whole approach through and looking at new avenues for creativity and new dimensions of the work we are about to undertake.

• (1545)

The vitality and the strength of today's women's organizations and the dedication of their members will ensure that the important work done by the advisory council will continue. Its independent research capacity and its ability to consult and communicate information to women and the general public and its documentation centre as well are important supports to public policy making.

Therefore, these functions and the associated financial resources will be maintained. Its initiatives will enhance our ability to understand and respond to women's equality issues that take shape at the grassroots level and create a new synergy between research, policy development and the government's programs.

The consolidation of these three organizations will, I outline and summarize, create a single window operation; eliminate confusion and improve access to government; provide the government with a critical mass of expertise on women's issues; improve research, communications and public information services; strengthen links with local, regional and national organizations, NGOs and universities; ensure that funding for research that is independent of government continues to be available; and allow the government to focus its efforts toward promoting equality for Canadian women.

Since the day the Prime Minister appointed me as Secretary of State for the Status of Women, I have been meeting with women's organizations across this land. I have been having round table discussions with them and with many of the groups here in Ottawa. I have listened to their concerns with a great deal of interest.

In the new structure we will work to reinforce our collaborative partnerships and our abilities to network on a broad spectrum of issues by ensuring the involvement of these many women's organizations with their differing perspectives and the voluntary sectors and the universities works well.

I also want to explore how we can use the new communications technology in this new era of information. I would like to see us build an ongoing dialogue with our constituency using Internet and E–mail or both, or library net. These are all fabulous ways to keep in touch and keep informed and we want to do just exactly that.

We want to make sure that women become full–fledged partners in our society. As the Prime Minister rightly said recently: "In Canada, women continue to further the cause of economic equality. Relying on their own means and abilities, women help shape the future of this country. As for the Canadian government, it is meeting the challenge. Women's equality is not a matter of special interests or rights, but rather a matter of social and economic justice, a matter of good government".

[English]

We will work together and work toward equality in partnership with women, men, and the public and private sectors to overcome the obstacles that are still blocking our way. It is by involving the talents and dedication of every Canadian, all of us, that we continue to enhance our prosperity and make this country still a better place in which to live. When we involve all of its people we are in the best position possible to make things work.

[Translation]

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière–du–Loup, BQ): Madam Speaker, I want to congratulate the hon. member for her convincing speech on the continuous struggle of women towards equality. I have two daughters and I do hope that they will live in a society where equality will be even more of a reality.

My question concerns some measures which seem in contradiction with the objectives and arguments stated by the hon. member.

First, one of the recommendations made by the Liberal majority on the human resources development committee provides that future UI beneficiaries, that is those who never received UI benefits before—this means a majority of young people and women—will have to work a greater number of weeks than other beneficiaries to be eligible for UI benefits and these benefits will be less than those that will be paid to people who have already been in the system for years. This seems to be in contradiction with the principle governing the UI system and with your concept of equality.

• (1550)

Second, the same committee recommended that, in the future, students will have to run up higher debts, something which will affect women even more than men since, in the course of their careers, there are times when they are not gainfully employed, for example when they decide to stay at home to raise their children. Consequently, these women will be burdened with larger debts and for a longer period of time. That also seems to be a contradictory measure.

Finally, there is the plight of women who do not receive any welfare or UI cheques and who are not eligible for programs such as the assistance program for independent workers, which helps people start businesses.

Does the hon. member not agree that the government could have made an extra effort regarding these three areas, or should at least, through the social program reform, ensure that women in Canada and Quebec are not adversely affected by recommendations which are neither appropriate nor adequate in terms of helping them get where they should get in the future?

Mrs. Finestone: Madam Speaker, I thank my colleague for his questions. As a father of two daughters, his interest is clear to me. We are certainly on the same wave length in that both our sons and daughters should enjoy equal opportunities and wage parity. I certainly agree, and I commend him on his position.

I want to say to the hon. member that he should not be too worried about unemployment insurance. So far, no decision has been made. It is still hypothetical. The report drafted by the people who worked so hard to listen to what the public had to say has been tabled, and the final decisions will be made at the appropriate time.

As for female students, if I am not mistaken, in the last two budgets the situation improved, and it is easier for women to get bursaries when they want to do a doctorate. There are certain situations, and I do not remember the exact circumstances, but I will certainly make enquiries and send you the rest of the details, but I know that women have been privileged in this respect, and if we want equality, I hope that the time will come when we no longer have to take this kind of action to ensure that women have the opportunities to which they are entitled.

On the subject of small business, I dare say that for the first time we have, if not threatened, or at least strongly suggested or advised, the banks that if they did not give small businesses the kind of protection they need and did not give them loans on request, we would apply sanctions that would be a little more severe than was previously the case. And when we see that 40 per cent of all businesses started by women have a better success rate than those started by men, I think it is because women tend to take a more thorough approach. They do not take as many risks, that is true, but in the end they have a better success rate.

A study has found that 50.1 per cent of businesses that have been in existence for 25 years are run by women, and these are incredibly successful businesses with sales that are absolutely amazing. I hope that this more or less answers your questions, but I can assure you that we have not yet won on all fronts. We must take action through partnerships with people like the hon. member, and I am counting on the co–operation of everyone, especially here in this House.

• (1555)

Mr. Dick Harris (Prince George—Bulkley Valley, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I listened to the hon. minister's presentation. I appreciate a lot of things she had to say, particularly in the opening part of her statement where she said that women have a very good understanding of fiscal restraint and what it takes to run a business or a household.

My wife is a person who does understand. It is a shame my wife is not here to hear the comments of the hon. member for Halifax. I am sure she would take issue with that. Perhaps she is watching this on television. My wife does understand as the minister rightly said the need for fiscal restraint. My wife also is 100 per cent supportive of my opting out of the gold plated MPs pension plan. Why? Because like millions of other Canadian women who understand the need for belt tightening in these times of financial crisis in order to get our country's finances on the road she believes that leadership should start right at the top, here in the House of Commons.

If the women Liberal government members do support leadership by example, then why do they still cling so fervently to this still gilded MPs pension plan?

Mrs. Finestone: Madam Speaker. Women know how to handle money. They know how to turn a nickel into a dollar. They have been very cautious and careful. They have had to be, because men have not always been very sharing or very open with their wives or their children.

With respect to the pension, my husband thinks the pension is just right, just fair and he has no objection. Quite frankly we all work very hard. I am sorry if the hon. member thinks it is not worth being paid or recognized for working many hours a day. We do not agree with him. I think our pension system with the changes we have brought in is more than fair, more than equitable. My husband is not upset and neither am I.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP): Madam Speaker, I want to ask the minister about her commitment to child care. The budget eliminated a subsidy that allowed for a great deal of transportation funds to be available to farmers in western Canada. In the past, rural women have found themselves having to find child care when child care was not available. With the elimination of the Crow benefit the pressures on the financial aspects of farming will be increased. Rural women who have in the past called for child care I am sure will be asking the minister for her support in the future to see a federal commitment to child care in rural areas.

Can the minister tell us if she continues to be committed to child care, especially in rural Canada?

Mrs. Finestone: Madam Speaker, I want to assure my hon. colleague that I have not changed my mind or my view of society. I have met with the Rural Women's Childcare Coalition. I have met with the farm women of Canada. I am very much in support of measures that will give them the kind of child care they want. A universal system is not always what they want.

The Minister of Human Resources Development has been working with the provinces. There are propositions out there. I can assure the hon. member that our commitment to the increase in child support and child care is a well founded commitment. It will be met within the term of our red book time. I can also assure him we will not change our minds on gun control either.

• (1600)

Ms. Margaret Bridgman (Surrey North, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate in the House, although today's topic does leave a lot to be desired.

Canadians have a debt of over $550 billion. We have continuously overspent our budget, creating annual deficits which we add to our debt. In turn, this increases the amount of interest we must pay, already over $40 billion.

On February 27 the finance minister told us that he, his department and the government had balancing the budget in mind. He said it was a priority of this administration, but the finance minister does not tell us when it will achieve the actual balancing of the budget. Instead, each year we have been told of one more step in the budget balancing stroll that he and this government are leading us on, and that strolling in this manner for three years will achieve 3 per cent of GDP, assuming present conditions affecting this forecast remain constant and that those conditions or situations anticipated actually come to pass.

A plan that takes three years to reduce an annual deficit of more than $35 billion by $10 billion does seem like a stroll down some indeterminate path. It is not suggestive of a plan that would be considered a high priority by the people who implement it when there is no end in sight.

The longer we maintain the need to borrow large sums of money from foreign lenders the longer we will continue to add to our debt, increasing the amount of interest we will pay. The interest money we pay to foreign lenders could be utilized very effectively for services or benefits for Canadians at home.

It reminds me of the situation with credit cards. When a person uses a lot of credit cards to buy certain things and then sit them all in front of them and add up the amount of interest they are paying, it is taking a huge chunk of their salary. The person wonders why they thought buying on credit was a good idea.

By the time the government reaches its target of 3 per cent of GDP in 1996–97 it is estimated the interest payments on our debt will have reached $50 billion. To say it is rather easy for us these days, but it is really hard to identify with the reality of a billion dollars.

I have heard some examples, such as circling the globe at the equator with $2 bills, but it is hard to visualize how big the equator is as well. One example very easy for me to identify with is that if a person made a dollar every second they would be a millionaire in 11 days. To get a billion dollars it would take them 33 years. That puts it into reality for me.

Canadians have expressed concerns about most of the services provided under the social program umbrella, for example, health care, pensions, unemployment insurance, et cetera. We know these programs will be cut in the near future. However, we will not know until the autumn or maybe even later how these cuts will affect our lifestyles.

We also know that federal funding for health, post–secondary education and welfare will be lumped together and cut by $2.5 billion in 1996–97, and a further $4.5 billion in 1997–98. These cuts will have an effect on us, but it will depend on how the provinces allocate the moneys they receive to implement and maintain the services. Again, we do not know at this time the effect the budget will have on our lifestyles.

Even though it is a step toward decentralizing or transferring the management of these programs to the provinces and territories, it is unfavourably implemented when the cash cutbacks are not coupled with compensation in the tax credit area by increasing it.

• (1605)

With this budget plan, it is inevitable that health services will be cut, if not directly this year certainly next or the year following that.

This year health services will probably feel some effect from the cuts as applied to the medical research council, a 10 per cent cut, and the patent medicine prices review board, 15 per cent cut and another 15 per cent cut to the hazardous material information review commission.

Some aspects of the mandates of these departments or services certainly contribute toward the quality of our overall health program. Reduction in the services from some of these sources is bound to influence health care services.

I have identified some areas where cuts are to be implemented. These plus other cuts in the budget are apparently insufficient to prevent the need to continue borrowing possibly large sums of money in order to operate within the budget.

A possible contributing factor is that this government's budget does not apply cuts equitably and fairly across the board, but singles out some services to cut while allowing others to actually increase. Even though the growth rate is restricted there is still an increase taking place. An example of this is the Indian health care service program in which the growth rate will be restricted to 6 per cent for 1995–96 and 3 per cent for 1996–97 and again 3 per cent in 1997–98.

We need to balance our budget as soon as possible. We need to relearn how to live within our means and not continuously borrow horrendous amounts of dollars. Once we have achieved a balanced budget we can implement a plan systematically and consistently to apply funds to our debt and reduce it.

The Canadian people are aware that we have a deficit problem as well as a debt problem. They are aware we must resolve our deficit problem before we can adequately address our debt problem.

Canadians are looking for leadership, for a plan that will not only provide guidance and direction necessary for all Canadians to participate in resolving our deficit problem as soon as possible, but would also identify what it would mean to our lifestyle during the whole process of achieving this.

Two plans have been presented. The government's budget plan reduces our deficit problem by less than half over a three year period, of which one year has already passed, and involves cuts in services to some Canadians and not others.

The Reform Party taxpayer's budget calls upon all Canadians to accept a decrease in services across the board and to participate in a nationwide plan to eliminate the deficit in a three year period.

The Reform Party's taxpayer budget not only achieves the position of living within our means in three years, it also achieves implementing the decentralizing of some services such as health care to their rightful administrative positions, the provinces. It also removes the cash payment whip, increasing the tax credits in such a manner to allow the provinces to acquire the income necessary to meet the standards of the Canadian health care program as dictated by the Canada Health Act.

There is no need to stroll through the years toward the balanced budget target—we do not know when that is—and borrow horrendous sums of money along the way, as we are being directed by the Liberal government. We do have an alternative plan, an action plan complete in three years, not some indeterminate time period.

We have this in the form of the Reform Party's taxpayer budget. We have Reform members in Parliament who, given the opportunity, are willing and committed to provide the leadership necessary to lead the people of Canada to a balanced budget in three years and to eliminate the need to borrow horrendous amounts of money from foreigners in order to live the lifestyles we wish to enjoy.

• (1610)

Mrs. Dianne Brushett (Cumberland—Colchester, Lib.): Madam Speaker, with the taxpayer budget, as the Reform Party presented it, how would the member provide assistance to those old age people who are receiving OAS at the present time with the tremendous cuts they were prescribing for their budget?

Ms. Bridgman: Madam Speaker, to precede addressing specific issues, the Reform's taxpayer budget illustrates all the cuts that would occur over three years. We also look at pensions. The government has not actually identified and will not until autumn what exactly is going to happen there.

We are not suggesting that service will not be there. We are looking at a 15 per cent cut in OAS as an across the board of cut.

The other thing we are looking at is the RPSP concept. We have to look into this and work it out in the business community and see how this is going to work. However, that concept is quite reasonable and feasible to maybe replace our existing system and come up with something that is better in the long run, has a little more control from the individual's point of view as to how they wish to live their lives and also provide them with a sense of responsibility and a sense of security.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean Landry (Lotbinière, BQ): Madam Speaker, I paid careful attention to the speech by the hon. member. I have one small question. I heard her say she wanted to make the cuts in the federal budget over three years. I would like her to tell me how they see unemployment insurance in three years' time, what will become of unemployment insurance?

[English]

Ms. Bridgman: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his questions.

When the idea for unemployment insurance was originally conceived it was seen as an insurance program for people temporarily out of work. That concept was very valid at the time. However, over the years there seems to have been a turn around in attitudes.

Let us get back to the original concept and make it the insurance program it was originally intended to be, directed at the people who need it.

Mr. Dick Harris (Prince George—Bulkley Valley, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I compliment my colleague on her presentation. The Liberal member opposite asked about the Reform Party's cutting OAS payments to seniors.

The Liberal members have not read the taxpayers' budget. If they had listened to the responses to the question they have asked over and over again in this House about how we are going to treat OAS, they would have heard us clearly say time and time again that seniors who have household incomes over $50,000 a year would be the only ones affected by the Reform Party budget. It would not be the seniors on lower income, as this Liberal member well knows.

Ms. Bridgman: Madam Speaker, I may have been a little weak in my comment to the hon. member. I thank my colleague for clarifying that.

Mr. Dick Harris (Prince George—Bulkley Valley, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak today on this budget. I certainly spoke on it a number of times in my riding. The many hundreds of constituents who turned out to the town hall meetings concerning this budget certainly support the Reform position that this budget is as weak kneed as a Liberal Party can possibly get.

• (1615)

The budget will ensure that before the next election the Liberal government will add another $100 billion to our national debt. The budget by the Liberal government will ensure our interest payments on the national debt will rise to $50 billion–plus. All of this will occur before the next election. The Liberal budget attempts to put a happy face on a deficit target of $25 billion in 1997.

In examining all of these factors it is difficult to see how any fiscally conscious Canadian could consider this a tough budget as the Liberal Party purports it be or a budget that will, as the Minister of Finance has said, break the back of the deficit. We have heard this break the back of the deficit statement from finance ministers for over two decades. Yet somehow the government remains committed to a position of spending more money than it takes in in a year.

Finance ministers have consistently projected deficits which in reality turned out to be far higher than their forecasts. I would never go so far as to accuse the government and the finance minister of creative bookkeeping or even fudging the numbers. My confidence in the veracity of the numbers in this 1995 budget is about the same as my confidence in the Liberals reforming social programs before there is a referendum in Quebec.

Speaking of numbers, this necessarily brings me to this notion of targets that the finance minister has been so free with. We have listened day in and day out to the Minister of Finance emphatically declare: "We have hit our targets and we will continue to hit our targets in the future".

I guess when your target is the ocean and you are standing on the end of a pier and jump in, it is easy to say that you hit your target. What is meant by that is the target is so broad and so easy to hit. You cannot miss when you put your target so low.

Simply put, the target is low. This 3 per cent deficit to GDP the Liberal government has been so proud of is insufficient. It was labelled so by the IMF, the OECD and the entire Canadian business community. The Liberals know this. The Canadian Chamber of Commerce was arguing for a zero deficit budget by 1997–98 but the Liberals did not have the political guts to commit to a target like that.

Therefore it was up to Reformers to address the real concerns of the Canadian people. That is exactly what we did in our taxpayers budget. That budget was conceived out of input from the Canadian people that was listened to. It was a budget committed to eliminating the deficit in three years and thereby a budget committed to protecting the viability and the core of our social programs.

The Minister of Finance, despite stating before the finance committee that a balanced budget is the ultimate goal, has refused to lay out any plan that details when Canadians can expect a balanced budget. There are no plans and yet he said it. Could it be that like his predecessors, the minister is really not sure of what the actual deficits will be in the future?

We have heard of targets before and we have continually seen them missed before. So let us hear no more pontification from the government benches about hitting targets. A deficit target of $25 billion and a debt target of $650 billion are certainly nothing to be proud of.

To demonstrate the effectiveness of prebudget consultations held by the Liberal Party, we saw witness after witness in committee. Individuals, associations, business groups and the like appeared before the committee and testified repeatedly day after day, hour after hour against any further tax increases by this government.

After all this consultation process, which the Minister of Finance still is very proud of, which the Liberals also find time to pontificate about, what do we discover in this budget? New taxation measures.

Despite the absence of pro–taxation testimony in the hearings, the Liberal majority on the committee concocted a dozen more possible tax options. They were obviously very good at reading between the lines and listening to what these anti–tax people really meant. They said: "We do not want any new taxes," but what they really meant was: "Yes, please hit us with another tax". So much for consultation. So much for listening to the views of Canadians.

It is shameful that the Minister of Finance, knowing full well that much more substantive cuts must come in the future, allowed this key budget—and it was a key budget. There was a window of opportunity to really break the back of the deficit, but the Liberal government and the finance minister missed that window of opportunity by a mile. They allowed this key budget to be watered down by the soft pedalling socialists in the Liberal Party.

In all, this budget will snatch $3.7 billion out of the economy through taxation in the next three years despite the fact that an OECD job study, a C.D. Howe report and a survey by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce demonstrated clearly that high taxes destroy job creation. The Liberals raised taxes despite the fact that the Prime Minister in June 1991 when in opposition stated, and this is interesting, that taxes on individuals were higher in Canada than in any G–7 country. Although he said that in 1991, the Liberal government raised taxes.

The Deputy Prime Minister when in opposition in 1991 demonstrated a rare concern for the Canadian taxpayer and revealed a suspect sensitive side when it came to their plight. She stated that Canadians are paying too much tax. Despite that, the Liberal government raised taxes in this budget.

That $3.7 billion should have been left alone to create growth in the economy, to create jobs, not rip it out of the economy in taxation. Now the government will say that these new taxes were fair taxation measures. What is fair about a 1.5 cent per litre tax increase on gasoline? This is simply a $500 million tax grab to offset the revenue the government lost when it lowered the cigarette taxes. If the government had the guts to enforce the law when all that cigarette smuggling was going on, it would not have to rip another $500 million out of the economy in a gasoline tax.

I want to wind up by quoting a Liberal. This is really something and members will recognize this: "Once a nation parts with the control over its currency and credit, it matters not who makes the nation's laws. Usury, once in control will wreck any nation. Until the control over currency and credit is restored to Parliament and recognized as its most conspicuous and sacred responsibility, all talk of democracy or freedom is idle and futile".

The Liberal government has ensured the control over our currency and credit is in the hands of our lenders, not in the hands of Parliament and the government where it should be.

• (1625)

Mr. Jean Landry (Lotbinière, BQ): Madam Speaker, I listened very carefully to the speech by the hon. member, which contained figures, figures and more figures.

A year ago, when the members of the Reform Party arrived in the House of Commons, I remember their comments in an initial newspaper article in which they talked about a club sandwich costing less in the parliamentary cafeteria. We in the Bloc Quebecois were talking about tax reform. They then went on to talk about the shoeshine people; we were talking about tax shelters. We were therefore not quite on the same wavelength for savings to really be made.

The government talks about reducing the deficit to 3 per cent of the GDP. Could the hon. member tell us what percentage of the GDP he would like the deficit to be at, himself, so the debt could be paid back as quickly as possible, but without ever losing sight of the most disadvantaged, the unemployed and seniors?

I am not prepared, politically, to say that we are going to go after the most vulnerable in our society, who are unable to defend themselves, and that we will leave the rich alone. As I have said in the past and will continue to say, the good Lord and good common sense must go hand in hand. Therefore there has to be a balance between the rich and the poor classes. I do not want the poor to get poorer. I want a balance to exist.

I would like the hon. member to give me an idea of the rate he would bring his percentage to without affecting the most disadvantaged.

[English]

Mr. Harris: Madam Speaker, for the umpteenth hundredth time in the House, it is amazing that so many members have not been listening to what we are saying. We have said over and over it is not fiscally conscious members of Parliament who are the big threat to our social problems in this country. It is not fiscally responsible MPs who are the threat to the unemployed, the seniors and the needy, as the hon. member said. The biggest threat is our $500 billion debt and our some $50 billion interest payment on that debt.

Imagine if we did not have this huge half a billion dollar debt created by the Liberals and the Tories before them. Imagine if we did not have this $45 billion or $47 billion interest payment what that interest payment could represent in the way of providing services and programs for people and Canadians who are in need.

That is the threat to the social programs in this country, not fiscally conscious MPs like the Reform Party. That has to be understood.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP): Madam Speaker, I have also listened to the Canadian people throughout much of my term as a member of Parliament. The last six years have been very tumultuous times, coming through the Mulroney era of putting a lot of pain on the backs of Canadians, and now sitting through this Parliament and the development of this budget, with taxpayers from coast to coast saying they have been taxed enough.

The finance minister claims this budget did not raise income tax for ordinary Canadians. That is not quite correct. A large number of Canadians were receiving and will receive to the end of this year the northern tax allowance. This tax allowance provides those who live further away from government services a benefit which other taxpayers do not enjoy.

The hon. member shares a part of the country with me, that is, people who currently receive northern tax allowances. Does he not believe it is unfair for those taxpayers in the phase out of the program this year to have to pay additional taxes?

• (1630)

Mr. Harris: Madam Speaker, in answer to my hon. friend from The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, this is a time when the country is in a financial crisis. It is a time that can be compared to a financial crisis in the family home. The time comes when the family does not have enough money to live the lifestyle which it had grown to like. It is the time to separate the wants from the needs.

There are so many different areas in which we spend money which clearly could be described as needs. There is also a tremendous amount of ways in which we spend money that clearly could be described as wants. If we are ever going to get our financial house in order we have to make a clear distinction between our needs and our wants.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway—Human rights; the hon. member for St. Albert—The Treasury Board; the hon. member for Wetaskiwin—Labour.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak in the budget debate, but it is with no joy I say what I feel I have to say. I doubt, with the short time available to me, that I will be able to properly develop the case I would like to make. I doubt whether I will have the time to put on the record the many points which I think are essential.

There are some positive measures in the budget which I fully support. I have in mind the measures for tax fairness, those measures which deal with tax deferrals, with family trusts and with RRSPs. I also fully support the measures to put additional tax on large corporations and the new special tax for banks and bank–like institutions.

I regret that with respect to the balance of the budget I feel there is much that is wrong. Specifically I am opposed to those measures which attack our social programs. In the budget it is proposed that we cut transfers to the provinces for post–secondary education, health care and the Canada assistance plan by $7 billion over the next two years. It is also proposed that we cut from unemployment insurance a minimum of 10 per cent, a program which has already been cut by the last budget and cut savagely many times under the previous Conservative government.

For those Canadians who are not aware of what is covered by the Canada assistance plan let me refer to a few items. By agreement with the provinces it covers payments for food, shelter, clothing, fuel and utilities for disabled people and people who are not able to work. It covers rehabilitation for needy persons. It covers day care centres. It covers hostels for battered women. It covers nursing homes for old people. It covers the cost of children in foster homes. It covers homemaking and home support services. It covers adoption services. That is only a partial list.

These cuts are not only wrong in principle, they are contrary to the campaign promises which we Liberals made in the red book and throughout the last election campaign. They are, first of all, wrong in principle because social programs are not the cause of the deficit. In answer to a question in the House only a few weeks ago the Minister of Finance admitted that the cost of social programs as a percentage of gross domestic product was exactly the same today as it was 20 years ago in the mid–seventies. He admitted that they were not the cause of the deficit. If they are not the cause of the deficit why attack them and why propose such extreme cuts to them in the budget?

These cuts are wrong in principle because they will cause considerable harm and pain to a segment of the population that has already been hit very hard before. I have in mind the unemployed, single mothers, older workers, the disabled, the mentally ill and others. These provisions will widen the gap between the rich and poor, will cause further social unrest and will hurt the economy by causing unemployment and reducing purchasing power.

The cuts are not only wrong in principle but contrary to what we said in the red book, contrary to what we said during nine years in opposition and contrary to what we did during twenty years in government under Mike Pearson and Pierre Elliot Trudeau.

I have the red book here. I do not have much time so I will just read one or two quotes. I could read many. I refer to page 74 of the red book. It reads:

> Since 1984, the Tories have systematically weakened the social support network that took generations to build. Not only have they taken billions of dollars from health care and from programs that support children, seniors, and people who have lost their jobs, but they have set us on the path to becoming a polarized society, divided into rich and poor, educated and uneducated, with a shrinking middle class. This is not the kind of country most Canadians want to live in. In a polarized society, crime, violence, intolerance and group hatred flourish.

That is just one quote from the red book but there are many others that are similar.

I also have here the complete list of the opposition motions that we tabled during the nine years we were in opposition. Motion after motion proposes solutions which are contrary to what is being put forward in the budget.

Again, I do not have time to read them all but I refer to one put forward by the member for Hamilton East on an opposition day:

> That this House regrets that almost one million Canadian children are living in poverty, that 1.4 million Canadians each year must rely on food banks and that the current recession the proposed goods and services tax will make this situation worse; and that the House, desiring the elimination of poverty in Canada by the year 2000, demands immediate programs to ameliorate the plight of the working poor, including a review of the minimum wage, discriminatory employment practices, current available children's benefits and other income support programs.

I also have the amendments that we tabled to the Tory budgets during the nine years in opposition and they state similar sorts of things.

Some people say that times were better then and we could do things when we were in government that we cannot do today. That is not completely true. The government was in better economic shape then but the country, as the Minister of Finance said the other day, is better off today. The gross national product is higher today than it was 30 years ago. Canada is producing more goods and services. Unfortunately they are not being distributed as fairly as they should.

Some members have said, in trying to justify the budget, that being a Liberal means being flexible. One should be flexible but one should be flexible within a framework of principles. To be flexible does not mean that one completely junks all the principles that one has stood for and it certainly does not mean that one throws out the promises that one made in an election only a year and a half ago.

Yes, the red book and the election were only one and a half years ago. As far as I know there has been no significant change in Canada or in the world since that time. If the red book policy had to be changed due to changed circumstances then the case has not been made by the Minister of Finance.

• (1640)

Those are my specific concerns about the budget but I am also troubled by the longer term implications of the budget. There are several measures that continue to strip away in my view the federal government, to strip away the federal authority, to strip away the federal presence in this land, the presence and visibility of Canada as a nation.

I have in mind cuts to transportation, to communications, to the CBC and to social programs. These have always been the national glue, the national infrastructure which has bound this country together for many years. My concern is that the federal authority will be left as a hollow shell once these cuts are made.

I support the deficit reduction goal of 3 per cent of gross domestic product that we put forward in the red book. I support deficit reduction but I support it in the way that we proposed to do so in the red book: by cutting waste, by cutting unproductive expenditure, by encouraging and promoting economic growth, more jobs, more profits for business to bring about more revenue for the government and by filling in and closing down the unfair tax provisions in the Income Tax Act, not by cutting social programs. I support the goal of deficit reduction but not in the way in which we are doing it in the budget.

Yes, the fiscal deficit is important and I agree that it must be addressed. But it must not be addressed at the expense of a social deficit where we have more crime, more social unrest, more family violence, suicide, alcohol and drug abuse.

I saw a very good button the other day on a person. The button said: "If you think education is expensive, try ignorance".

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Ménard (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve, BQ): Madam Speaker, I would certainly like to thank the hon. member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce for his speech, but at the same time remind him that we have one thing in common: we both represent ridings in the Montreal region. And someone who represents a Montreal riding is automatically sensitive, like the hon. member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce, to the issue of poverty and to the hardship that the past two recessions, the last one being the 1982 recession, imposed on a good many of our constituents.

I find the hon. member very courageous, because he belongs to the government majority and it is to his honour that he is able to rise above the prevailing opinion. However, I told myself that he is asking us to remain keepers of the social conscience. He is asking us to make sure that we have an interventionist government and that we maintain one of the government's reasons for being, namely redistribution.

However, we have diverging views on the causes of the deficit. What I found surprising and very pleasing about the hon. member's speech, and I say this without any ulterior motive, was that he states that his government has no other choice but to cut transfer payments. By doing this, his government could destabilize provincial governments and force them to cut services which are basic necessities and financed through the Canada assistance plan.

I would like to hear the hon. member's opinion on the causes of the deficit. As far as we on this side of the House are concerned, the deficit is caused by the fact that it is impossible to maintain a continental country like Canada: Canada is the first and last example of a federation with a narrow ecumene stretched out between two oceans. We say that one of the causes of the deficit—when we analyze how we got into debt—is that we have had a strong central government which meddled in jurisdictions in which it had no right to. The hon. member will recall that he was a member of Parliament when Ottawa created, for example, a department for urban affairs and for recreation, which, under the constitution, were in no way related to the powers granted to the central government.

I would like to know if the hon. member will agree with me that it would be much simpler for Canada and for its financial situation to reorganize the country to give Quebec more power and for Quebec to create its own national government and for us to begin dialogue on the basis of our status as associated states.

• (1645)

[English]

Mr. Allmand: Madam Speaker, The principal causes of the deficit are speculation in currencies which cause changes in the interest rates and globalization of economies which allows large multinational corporations to manipulate and speculate on products, derivatives and currencies. For example, I was told yesterday by a prominent member of government that each time interest rates go up by 1 per cent it costs us $1.7 billion per year in additional payments on our debt. If it goes up by two points it is twice that amount. Those are the types of things that cause the deficit.

In addition, many people are getting away without paying the taxes they should be paying. The tax system is not fair. There was some movement in the budget to correct it. I applaud that and I support that but it did not go far enough.

With respect to the other question the member asked regarding a new way of arranging Canada, I supported in the House and voted for both the Meech Lake accord and the Charlottetown accord. Both were eventually defeated. Those accords would have rearranged the structures in Canada.

I believe in maintaining and even increasing the payments to the provinces for social programs, but I also believe that national standards should be set by the federal government. The federal government can equalize opportunity and care throughout the country. That is the humane thing to do.

Mrs. Dianne Brushett (Cumberland—Colchester, Lib.): Madam Speaker, it is pleasure to rise in the House to take the opportunity to address the second budget of the government as presented by the Minister of Finance on February 27.

I expect in the final analysis the budget of February 1995 will go down in history. It will be the budget that made a significant difference in Canada at a time when Canada was at a crossroads.

The budget will be viewed by future historians as a watershed budget, a turning point in which the government of the day had the courage to make the tough decisions and to make the necessary cuts in spending in accordance with responsible financial management.

While the budget makes drastic and unheard of changes to the face of government through spending cuts, it does so with fairness and compassion. Programs that are efficient and effective in serving Canadians will remain, but programs that are obsolete, redundant and dysfunctional will be eliminated. The budget prepares us for the inevitable trend of the 21st century, which is less involvement by government in the lives of people.

To do this we have implemented a transition process that encourages the individual to more self–reliant, more entrepreneurial, stronger as a community and less dependent on government programs and subsidies.

When the constituents of Cumberland—Colchester elected me to represent them I knew I would be coming to Ottawa at a very crucial time in our history, that I would be part of a government with a fiscal policy that would either make or break Canada, and that the Liberal Party would be the one to ultimately bear the responsibility of piloting the country out of deficit financing.

Canadians from coast to coast told the House that reducing the deficit and debt must be the number one priority of the government. They know how the deficit is like an albatross around the neck of each and every one of us and of future generations to come.

The government accepted the challenge, not only with the budget but with several budgets to come in the future, to work toward a balanced budget. It is not politically expedient but it is the right thing to do.

The measures taken in the budget will ensure that Canadians can face the economic challenge of international competition and that we will be able to do so with growth and confidence. The budget is about restoring confidence in government and confidence in the Canadian economy.

Measures that were taken last year in the first budget of the government showed positive results in our economy. Economic growth is at 4.5 per cent, the strongest of the G–7 nations. The most impressive year ever in Canadian exports was 1994. We showed a massive trade surplus with the United States. Inflation was at its lowest in three decades. There were more improved business profits than ever. Some 433,000 full time jobs were created last year.

• (1650)

The same implementation that saw the economy grow resulted in the annual deficit being reduced by $4.4 billion, lower than was budgeted for the fiscal year ending in a couple of weeks. That is the reality. That is progress in deficit reduction.

If we are to compare ourselves with the G–7 countries on how well our economy is doing, it seems only reasonable to compare ourselves and our debt situation to those of the G–7 countries.

It is sad to say that our net government debt as a nation is over 84 per cent of GDP second only to Italy of the G–7 counties. In comparison the United States has a net public debt of 32 per cent of GDP, while Japan's is around 10 per cent. It was therefore mandatory that the finance minister demonstrate in the budget not only to the nations of the world but to the financial lenders that Canada was serious about reducing its deficit and the high per cent ratio of debt to GDP.

Investors have been satisfied with the budget as have Canadians, but I must remind the House that it is only the beginning of a series of tough budgets until we have won the war on debt.

Cuts in government spending mean pain. The budget is about pain. However the pain was spread fairly to all regions. In the west grain transportation subsidies were eliminated while in the east the Atlantic region freight assistance program was abolished. However both the west and the east including Quebec will receive transitional funding, helping alleviate shipper hardship and upgrade transportation infrastructure.

Last week when I was in my riding I met with public servants whose jobs are being cut because they are classified as surplus or because long established forestry agreements were not renewed. These people are feeling the pain of the budget. However, after looking at options in the transition, one forester said to me: "Even though we are losing our jobs this had to be done and I would still vote for your government".

The people of Nova Scotia did not want me to come here to whine about the cuts. They wanted me to congratulate the finance minister for having the courage to do what he did. The people of Nova Scotia have a tradition of self–reliance and a grassroots fighting spirit. They have an entrepreneurial spirit that goes back to shipbuilding and merchant fleets of the 19th century.

The people of Nova Scotia know that the backbone of the economy is small business and that jobs will come not from government but from the private sector. The economy of Atlantic Canada is the fastest growing in the country. Atlantic Canada ended 1994 with the highest rate of growth per capita. It was 2.7 per cent, the highest of all the regions, followed by the prairie region with a rate of growth per capita of 2.5 per cent.

Dairy farmers in my riding are like dairy farmers across the country. They will see their subsidies cut by 30 per cent over two years. Public utilities will see the energy subsidy eliminated through the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act. Alberta and Nova Scotia are affected by the change. The Nova Scotia Power Corporation has already indicated that higher rates are to be expected, which in turn hinders small business development. There is pain with the budget, but as the old saying goes no pain, no gain. The people of Canada have accepted the pain knowing there will be real gain in the months ahead.

The women of Canada have a greater appreciation for the budget than anyone. Many women have spent their lives living within the household budget and living within their means. I would bet there is not a woman in the country who has not at one time or another in her life watered down the stew and thrown in another handful of barley simply to stretch the pot of stew for another meal. The money she would save would go to buy a dress or a pair of shoes for a child who has a very special concert. I have done it many times. Thousands of women across the country managing Canadian households are the financial experts, and they too have done so.

• (1655)

Under the previous government the 1980s were a time of greed, surplus and waste. The 1990s under the present government are a time of basic need, not greed, a time of high efficiency and productivity, and a time of sustainability, not waste. It is a time to sustain our finances as well as our environment, our resources and our fish stocks.

We made a commitment to the women and the men of Canada to reduce the deficit while restructuring social policy. We take that commitment very seriously. The budget of February 1995 is more than a bunch of numbers. It is one part of a very large social plan, an economic plan as well as a financial plan that maps a prudent, courageous and credible path not only for our generation but, more important, for the next generation of young Canadians.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP): Madam Speaker, I listened carefully and was quite taken with the enthusiasm the member opposite showed for the budget. She talked about the budget being fair and talked in terms of understanding and knowing how the fairness is applied across the country. She talked about the policies of the government that were obsolete, dysfunctional or redundant being eliminated.

Those two matters have to be applied to the communities that I represent in Saskatchewan with the loss of the Western Grain Transportation Act subsidy, the Crow benefit, which the member mentioned in her remarks. The Crow benefit currently represents $560 million. Two years ago it was worth $720 million, $400 million of which applied to Saskatchewan.

How is it that the member can indicate that the Western Grain Transportation Act is obsolete, dysfunctional and redundant when it is anything but?

The loss of the Crow benefit to our communities at the delivery points in my riding represents approximately $1 million to each delivery point. The community of Glaslyn just north of where I live has two elevators and is quite similar to most communities in my constituency. We calculate that in the crop year beginning August 1, 1986 farmers at that delivery point will pay $1 million more for grain transportation in the coming year than they did in this year.

In terms of fairness, what other community in the country has been asked to give up $1 million in revenue? Absolutely none. Communities that service the world with grain from Saskatchewan have to pay extra. I ask the member for the evidence she has that these programs are obsolete, dysfunctional and redundant and that the budget is fair.

Mrs. Brushett: Madam Speaker, to the hon. member on his question as to what community has suffered pain, most of the communities across the country are suffering pain because we had to take the prudent steps in frugal fiscal management that we took. Canadians asked for it. The communities of Nova Scotia, the communities of Quebec and rural communities all have the same needs. The diversification and the competitiveness by which our farmers must meet the 21st century are parts of the budget.

Farmers in my riding, whether they are dairy farmers, feed producers or cattle producers, have told us to get rid of the subsidies. They said they could compete and would compete. Furthermore the government has allowed funding for transitional development through this period.

[Translation]

Mr. Roger Pomerleau (Anjou—Rivière-des-Prairies, BQ): Madam Speaker, I will try to be brief in my comments. We have just heard our hon. colleague tell us that she feels this budget is very tough on ordinary people but that it is a necessary evil. She used the phrase "no pain, no gain". That is what Canadians expect, according to her.

• (1700)

Yet, if we look at all the other members of her own government, we see that the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, for one, feels that social programs are not really the main cause of the debt. Not too long ago, the hon. member for York South—Weston said that what the Liberals were about to do was what they had denounced when the Tories were in office. Our hon. colleague has just read some documents reminding us of the comments made by the hon. member for Hamilton West, who said the exact same thing.

I will close with this: Given that the cuts they are about to inflict on ordinary people are due to Canada's debt and that, despite these cuts, the debt will continue to grow, does my hon. colleague not feel that, in the current situation, there will be much pain and no gain at all?

[English]

Mrs. Brushett: Madam Speaker, no pain no gain is the watchword of today. Not only this government, but businesses have had to cut back. They have had to make the transition to be competitive and now the onus is on government. We have accepted the challenge. This is a watershed in budget. This is a turning point in financing for the government. That is because the people of Canada have asked us to deal with this. It is mandatory.

We are moving into the 21st century. We know we will create the jobs not through government, not through subsidization, but through the private sector. Small business is the backbone.

Nova Scotia is not unlike Quebec. We have so much similarity. Historically, we can go back to a time when Quebec was known as Nouvelle–Écosse. This is so important to us because it is the very backbone. In Nova Scotia with a population of 900,000 we have some 90,000 small businesses. That is one in ten. That is growing in Atlantic Canada, the highest in the country. That is because we are taking the prudent steps to deal with the deficit. We will go through the pain but there will be gain in the end.

[Translation]

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont, BQ): Madam Speaker, I will be sharing my time with the hon. member for Lévis. The show put on these past few weeks reflects how completely outdated our parliamentary institutions are when it comes to public financial management and economic policy.

After the session reopened, when questioned by the official opposition, the Minister of Finance systematically refused to answer any question dealing with public finance, arguing that we would have to wait for the budget to be tabled, a budget prepared in the strictest secrecy as budgets are. Yet, once tabled, the budget speech has nothing short of force of law, since the government majority is forced to support it without debating it in detail.

In our system, the vote on the budget amounts to a confidence vote, as a negative vote would immediately result in the government stepping down and general elections being called. It follows that any member of the government majority who dares to vote against this budget would face immediate expulsion from the caucus and would have to sit as an independent member thereafter.

That is why every Liberal minister and member will stand by each and every page, line and word of this budget, although many of them would call for major changes were they given the choice. The budget preparation and adoption process is getting us nowhere fast. It has to change. We will come back to this in the coming weeks. That being said, because I have very little time, I will get right down to the subject of today's debate.

We have talked at great length, these past few days, about the impact the budget will have on the various population segments that will bear the brunt of the proposed cuts and tax hikes. We too, in the official opposition, have seen through the media campaign designed to make this budget out to be the beginning of a new federalism, when in fact the federal government is passing the buck to the provinces, while maintaining decision–making power in its own hands.

After spending shamelessly in fields of provincial jurisdiction, the federal government still displays the same arrogance by announcing that it will keep on levying taxes, that it will no longer pay the bills, and that it will force the provinces to make the necessary cuts to put the fiscal house in order. Although it may look innovative, this budget uses old recipes which are typical of the federal government's approach.

The financial markets were quick to figure out the government's ploy. After an initial positive reaction which lasted about 22 minutes, the value of the dollar started going down again, while interest rates resumed their upward trend. The financial markets realized that the federal government's consolidation was minimal and that true leadership will have to come from the provinces.

The fact that Ontario's credit rating was put under review the day after the tabling of the federal budget is a direct consequence of that budget. Its impact on Quebec's public finances will also be considerable. However, since this is the referendum year, the real consequences will only be felt next year.

The government's ploy was not any more successful from a political point of view. That the Leader of the Quebec Liberal Party, who was desperately counting on this budget to prove federalism's flexibility, prefers not to comment at all at this point is quite revealing. Maybe he realized that although the federal government has pulled out financially, the same duplication persists, generating the same problems and the same inefficiencies.

This budget has yet to be fleshed out by a thorough restructuring of the federal government. As a society, we have not improved our ability to respond to people's needs and to meet the challenges of economic growth and job creation.

During the last election campaign, the Minister of Finance was an ardent supporter of reducing the deficit through economic growth and job creation. In a matter of months, he has become, at best, a poor accountant. What happened? The present Minister of Finance is largely responsible for the mess we are in today. After an election campaign full of promises that were close to being misleading, he was incapable of doing anything at all, starting with his first budget.

Remember that during the election campaign, the Leader of the Bloc Quebecois proposed a credible plan for reducing federal spending by $10 billion, while the Liberals promised to deal with the deficit through economic growth.

Remember that after the election, the Leader of the Opposition urged the government to act quickly by setting up a special committee of the House of Commons that would determine what cuts were necessary and make them part of the government's first budget. The government refused.

I may recall that after this government's first budget was brought down, the Prime Minister was telling people everywhere in Canada that no new cuts would be necessary to meet his objectives for reducing the deficit. And now that we know what is in the second budget, we cannot really say that the Prime Minister was lying but there is no doubt that he misled Canadians about the real challenges they could expect.

Today we are paying a very high price for this government's refusal to act decisively in its first year. The loss of credibility on financial markets is reflected today in the astronomical level of real interest rates we have to pay. According to the Minister of Finance, in 1995 we can expect interest rates to be 4 per cent higher for the short term and 3.6 per cent higher for the long term than was forecast in the 1994 budget.

If we only consider the cost of servicing the federal debt, higher interest rates will an additional $7.5 billion, although the deficit is not as high as forecasted in 1994. Unfortunately, there are other consequences as well. The level of real interest rates forecast in this budget cannot be sustained when we consider that the Canadian economy is functioning well below its capacity.

• (1710)

Allow me to quote a short sentence from page 21 of the government's budget plan, but which the Minister of Finance took great care not to quote in his budget speech:

> The good economic performance in 1994 and 1995 will substantially reduce, but not eliminate, the amount of spare capacity in the economy. Spare capacity will persist through 1996 as real growth slows—

This is what the Minister of Finance hides in his fine speeches. He who promised to resolve the deficit problem through economic growth and job creation, today predicts that Canada will still experience an amount of spare capacity in the economy in two years' time. This is the real drama of the Canadian economy.

By refusing to act in the first year of its mandate, the government has clearly complicated the essential job of ensuring sustained economic growth. If we want to get out of the rut in which we find ourselves, the provinces must not be content with shouldering the cuts imposed on them by the federal government, they must insist on a complete reorganization of the way the Canadian economy is managed.

Keeping policies on economic innovation and adjustment centralized flies in the face of the very different needs of Canada's regional economies. What is the federal government doing in manpower training, in the area of fishing, for example? The complete fiasco in this regard should prompt the federal government to hand over responsibility to the coastal provinces as quickly as possible.

Clearly the systematic review of the roles of the federal government must no longer be conducted only in secret by federal mandarins. In the case of Quebec, I know we will soon have a favourable referendum. I hope the other provinces in Canada will take the opportunity to develop a framework that suits their needs and those of their people.

[English]

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the words of the hon. member who just spoke.

I recall back in the early 1980s when the debate around the Crow rate, at that time the western grain transportation subsidy, was conducted in the House. The farm organizations and the people of Quebec were very supportive of the western farmers and the desire to maintain a strong transportation link for the export of prairie grown grain. That support carried over and a good number of changes were prevented from being made because of the alliance between western farmers and farmers in Quebec.

I wonder if the hon. member has given any thought to the current debate brought on by the budget over the Western Grain Transportation Act. Can western farmers count on the Bloc Quebecois and the farmers of Quebec for support in maintaining this transportation subsidy?

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay: Madam Speaker, the issue is Quebec's support for western grain transportation subsidies. We must realize that agricultural organizations in Quebec never opposed the measure, as you said, and, on the contrary, supported it for years.

It is far from certain that the federal government has the means to continue subsidizing this area to the same extent. To me, one thing is clear: when the federal government implemented measures concerning energy, western Canada reacted very strongly and demanded changes which eventually were made. In my opinion, it is very clear that Canadian regions, with each totally different economies, now must work things out among themselves and stop waiting for the federal government to do it.

The longer we waited for the federal government, the more and more centralized the decisions became, even though the economies of each of the regions have grown increasingly differentiated. The economic space in which we sell our products is becoming more and more differentiated. Therefore, each region needs its own strategy, and that is what the rest of Canada urgently needs to understand. Do not expect the federal government to do it.

The mandarins in Ottawa, who like to delude themselves that they know the truth, will continue to set the game plan and will continue to think that they know what is best for Canada. It is time for the regions to wake up: they need to create their own transportation policies. They should no longer wait for the federal Minister of Transportation to do it. In any case, this is Quebec's firm belief, and I think that, after analyzing the situation, each region will also see the urgent need to take their affairs in hand.

I think that the vote planned on the sovereignty of Quebec this year, which I predict will be for sovereignty, presents a golden opportunity to reorganize economic relations. For example, a few years ago, Canada's economy exported 20 per cent of its output to the United States. Now, we have far surpassed 30 per cent and are even nearing 40 per cent. Therefore, a reorganization is urgently needed, but the federal government will not initiate it. Regions will have to take their affairs into their own hands.

Mr. Antoine Dubé (Lévis, BQ): Madam Speaker, it is as the official opposition critic on training and youth that I rise today to speak about the impact of the last federal budget on young people.

Like most of my official opposition colleagues, my initial reaction to this budget is that the federal government wants to transfer the blame for its cuts to the provinces.

On February 27, the Minister of Finance announced that, starting in 1996–97, he would reduce by $2.5 billion transfer payments to the provinces for health care, social assistance and post–secondary education.

By combining these three payments into a single consolidated block transfer called the Canada Social Transfer starting in 1996–97, the minister claims that "provinces will now be able to design more innovative social programs—programs that respond to the needs of people today rather than to inflexible rules. However, flexibility does not mean a free–for–all. There are national goals and principles we—meaning the Minister of Finance, of course—believe must still apply, and which the vast majority of Canadians support".

Such is the finance minister's flexibility. It involves national standards that Quebec does not want and never wanted in the first place. In this context, I think it would be a good idea to remind you of Bill C–28 respecting financial assistance to students, which was passed on June 23. This bill provides among other things that, from now on, the Canadian Minister of Human Resources Development, instead of the provincial governments as was the case before, will designate the appropriate authority in each province responsible for choosing educational institutions eligible for federal financial assistance.

Second, the provincial education ministers wanting the right to opt out with full financial compensation must convince the Minister of Human Resources Development that their provincial programs produce the same results as the federal programs in each of the areas targeted by the federal legislation.

Great freedom, is it not? You can develop programs, as long as they are absolutely identical to those decided on by the Minister of Human Resources Development, in an area of jurisdiction assigned to the provinces in the Constitution Act, 1867, an area of exclusive jurisdiction, not shared jurisdiction. Over the years, the federal government has encroached upon this exclusive provincial jurisdiction, pleading the right to spend the money of Canadians and of Quebecers.

Coming back to the cuts in transfer payments, it should be noted that the $2.5 billion figure quoted for all three categories combined in the Canadian social transfer is within $100 million of the cuts announced in the green paper with respect to post–secondary education. This leads to the conclusion that, give or take $100 million, the primary target of government cuts is post–secondary education.

By giving the provinces the choice while maintaining national standards, as it claims to do, the federal government will prompt the target groups benefiting from the three elements of the Canadian social transfer to turn against their provincial governments or fight among themselves to avoid cuts.

The federal government will create a situation where students will be competing with UI and welfare recipients. Our young people are the ones mainly concerned by these three programs.

In January 1995, there were 363,000 unemployed youth between the ages of 15 and 24 in Canada, over 100,000 of whom are in Quebec. If you add to that youth on relief—over 74,000 young people are on welfare in Quebec alone, but I do not have the total number for Canada—it makes for a terrible situation. It goes to show how little compassion this government has had for young people.

In light of a $2.5 billion cut in transfer payments to the provinces, combined with an additional 10 per cent cut in the UI program, the Minister of Finances was able to save enough last year to meet his targets. To meet his deficit reduction target for this year, the minister had to use the unemployment insurance fund, which now shows a surplus.

So to compensate for his improvidence, the Minister of Finance made cuts in unemployment insurance. The neediest in our society have to compensate for the incompetence of the Minister of Finance. This is appalling.

So what does the minister do to make his budget look good? He announces a temporary tax, for two years, that will raise $100 million from large deposit–taking institutions. But meanwhile, the government also makes cuts totalling $2.5 billion at the expense of the unemployed.

I see members of the Human Resources Development Committee who toured Canada with me. Like me, they were met by demonstrations in all major cities. Like me, they listened to the complaints of young people and the unemployed, especially in the Maritimes, about the cuts that will affect them. We will not be able to last until spring, was what we heard from the victims of seasonal unemployment. We heard them all, especially young people.

Today, as a result of a reduction in benefit periods, many are starting to feel the impact of cuts that were introduced last year. However, the $2.5 billion saved were, I repeat, used by the Minister of Finance to meet his budget target.

This is shocking, especially when we realize that last year, the banks made a record profit of $4.1 billion, and some banks managed to avoid paying any taxes at all. I am about to finish, Madam Speaker.

There are also the tax shelters. What did the minister do? Yes, indeed, the response to the official opposition's call for this for the past year and a half, was the announcement that implementation would take effect in 1999. That is impressive. They make the announcement four years ahead of time to the people who enjoy the benefit of family trusts, so that they can consult experts and find other ways to avoid paying tax. Four years ahead of time.

When could a Minister of Finance provide a better example, when does he tell interested parties four years ahead of time? We are not talking about the disadvantaged here. He did not warn the disadvantaged last year. He cut $2.5 billion dollars and, again this year, he is waiting for his budget speech to take effect and another 10 per cent cut is announced. We are supposed to find this funny? I do not find this funny at all, because I come from a riding where MIL Davie shipyards, among others, is located and where 2,000 jobs were lost. These people, who lost their jobs, are affected by the cuts to unemployment insurance and are now on social assistance. They are not finding this funny.

In the proposed reform, 90 per cent of associations, in addition to demonstrations, said no to Axworthy's reform and said no to the so–called improvements to the system. We know that increasing educational costs increases the debt load of students, at a time when there have already been 1,000 student bankruptcies in Quebec. Over 10 per cent of personal bankruptcies in Canada involve students or young people.

We ask them to give thought to the future. A fine message. A fine message, indeed. As the hon. member for Rosemont said, more and more Quebecers are realizing that, with no measures to enable people who want to return to the labour market, no active measures, a choice will soon have to be made. More and more Quebecers are realizing that the choice they have to make in the Quebec referendum in order to get out of this system that offers them little for the future is to vote "yes" in the referendum on sovereignty.

[English]

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP): Madam Speaker, I very much appreciated the words of the hon. member whose concern for youth I also share.

I was quite taken by the debate which began with the paper on social policy and particularly the section that applied to young people and tuition fees. The proposal would see additional money made available to young people, but the result would be a massive increase in tuition fees across the country.

Coming from a rural riding I am concerned for a number of reasons. The ability of farm families to meet some of the costs for post–secondary education are becoming more and more difficult with each passing year. I was quite taken with the words of the hon. member, especially when he quoted some of the figures from the corporations that do not pay any income tax.

I will be very brief. At a time when rural Canadian people, particularly those on the prairies, are being asked by the government to pay, because of the elimination of the Crow benefit, perhaps an additional $14,000 to $15,000 a year to ship their product to market, how can the government allow companies like Canadian Pacific to earn more than $422 million in pre–tax profits without paying a single cent in income tax?

I ask that question of the government. However, in doing so I ask the member who just spoke if he would agree with me that it is certainly not fair for corporations to be allowed off the hook when ordinary, individual, rural families are being asked to pay so much more, thereby compromising the education of their children.

[Translation]

Mr. Dubé: Madam Speaker, my reply will be extremely simple. Why are they not changing the system? Because, for the most part, and here I must admit that the Reform Party may be an exception, Canadian political parties have traditionally been financed by big business.

• (1730)

Six of the 10 largest corporations which financed parties in power—the Liberal Party now and the Conservative Party in the past—were banks. And we should be surprised that banks have a lot of influence on governments, interest rates, etc.? This obviously affects people earning low wages and farmers who need to borrow large amounts and it will affect students more and more because in the future they will have to borrow at least twice the amount that they currently need to pursue graduate studies.

Mrs. Pierrette Ringuette–Maltais (Madawaska—Victoria, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I listened with great interest to the speech made by the hon. member for Lévis. First of all, I found it most interesting that he was defending the status quo, and Canadian federalism, when he indicated that he hoped that there would be no social program reforms, that he was a member of the parliamentary team which toured Canada, and that he had heard various comments regarding the reforms proposed by the Minister of Human Resources Development.

The member defended ardently and with great enthusiasm Canadian federalism and the status quo while the Liberal government has realized that, at the international level, things are evolving, and quite naturally so. As Liberals, we want to make sure that the future of Canadians, including Quebecers, will be much more promising than now.

I would also like to mention that Quebecers understand perfectly that the changes brought upon by this government are necessary to the future well–being of their children. I refer our colleague, the member for Lévis to a documentary, a survey conducted in Quebec, on the quality of instruction in the CEGEPs, which, after all, are the responsibility of the Quebec government. The results are not too encouraging for young people. I believe, therefore, that we should start putting our own house in order.

Mr. Dubé: Madam Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for Madawaska—Victoria, especially for her easy victory over the former minister of unemployment insurance cuts. We will not mention his name, but I want to congratulate her for that. However, she does not get so much praise for her inconsistency last year, when the first budget of her government was handed down and she supported cuts similar to those proposed by the member she helped to defeat.

However, as far as the status quo goes, we do not want any part of it. She misunderstood what I said at the end of my speech. We said that the federal government should mind its own business in the area of post–secondary education, respect areas of jurisdiction and transfer tax points because it is making expenditures in other sectors of education in Quebec. It should do what all the members of the National Assembly of Quebec are asking, even the Liberals.

[English]

Mr. John Richardson (Perth—Wellington—Waterloo, Lib.): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to join in the budget debate. The budget was the defining moment in Canada to develop a new direction in its financial dealings and also a new direction in the way the government does business with its people.

The budget was coherent. It had integrity and a sense of purpose. Every feature presented to us met all three of those features, coherence, integrity and purpose.

The overriding goal of this government since the day it took power has been jobs and growth. We believe good economics and good social policy are one and the same thing. In the most fundamental way good social policy begins with a good job.

• (1735)

We believe a country that continues to care for its citizens must be a country that can pay its bills. We must respond to the challenges of our time. We must adapt to the new economy, the new infrastructure based on ideas and innovation. The very nature of government must change. We must develop a new notion of responsibility. The time has long passed when governments can or should do everything.

Several major things have happened. The world economy has become truly integrated. We must think globally. Trade barriers have been brought down. Communications are instant and transportation is swift. Markets never sleep. There are no longer any islands. Like it or not, there is no place to hide.

Since 1984 our debts have risen by three times. Compound interest is gobbling us up a second at a time. The government has a two track approach, sustained and sustainable economic growth. Growing economies produce jobs. Economies that are not growing produce no jobs. The key to growth is productivity. Productivity is about how well ideas, workers, resources and investment are brought together in a country's economy. Productivity is about ingenuity, better management and paying attention to the common sense of our workers.

High productivity growth increases income. How do we do it? We must improve our skills. We must have better innovation. We must provide a welcoming climate for investment. We must remove disincentives that we have created for people and for businesses. We must get our fiscal house in order.

This budget's plan for action introduces far reaching action to restore the fiscal health essential for a strong, growing economy. The budget will fundamentally reform what government does and how. It will bring permanent change in the way government does business. The objective is to get government right so it can fill its social and economic mandates and be more effective and sustainable will include deep cuts in the level of federal program spending, not simply lower spending growth, but substantial reduction in actual dollars.

One of the things that gives this government integrity is that its plans have been prudent and it has met its targets. The budget actions have delivered on this government's commitment to meet its interim deficit targets and the ultimate goal is a balanced budget.

The interim deficit target is 3 per cent of the gross domestic product for 1996–97. We will be achieving the usual prudent economic exceptions, incorporating credible fiscal action. The deficit could be well below that if economic performance is in line with the average private sector estimates. Significant reforms will ensure that spending will be restrained beyond 1996–97 and the deficit will continue to fall.

What are the major elements of expenditure reform? This budget is the second in a two stage process that began with the February 1994 budget. It takes fundamental action certain areas. It implements results of the long overdue program review and a comprehensive examination of federal department spending. As a result the government will focus on what is essential and we will do it better.

It acts on a new vision of the federal government's role in the economy. It includes substantial reductions in business subsidies.

• (1740)

It introduces major changes in transfers to the provinces that will renew and modernize the federal–provincial fiscal regime, making it more effective, flexible and affordable.

The major fiscal actions in the budget total $29 billion over the next three years, by far the biggest actions of any Canadian budget since the second world war and demobilization. There will be about $7 in expenditure reductions for every $1 in new tax revenues. This is the most significant event since that era.

Three years from now federal spending in programs will be $10.4 billion lower than it is today, approximately 8.8 per cent. The cumulative expenditure savings in that period will exceed $25 billion.

A fairer tax system and sharing the burden of debt and deficit reduction is the goal of this government. The budget reflects the government's awareness and the heavy tax burden borne by Canadians and the cost this imposes on the economy. There are no increases in personal income taxes in the budget. Tax measures are largely directed at removing preferences and increasing fairness. To help meet deficit targets the budget announces increases in taxes on business and an excise tax on gasoline.

Significant features in the budget are jobs and growth. Economic growth is strong. The Canadian economy is stronger than it has been for many years. Real output was about 4.25 per cent in 1994, the fastest of the G–7 countries. There have been 433,000 new jobs created, all of them full time. The unemployment rate has fallen 1.7 per cent to 9.7 per cent this year. Manufacturing output is up a full 9 per cent. At 1.5 per cent, excluding the effects of the tobacco tax, it is the lowest rate in three decades.

Labour costs have fallen by 1.3 per cent since mid–1993. We have a trade surplus. We have a dramatic improvement in the current account and the highest business confidence since 1979. We have been picked by the OECD to be the fastest growing economy in 1995.

The budget will meet the targets set out in it and will meet the red book projection for jobs and growth for Canadians.

[Translation]

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil, BQ): Madam Speaker, after listening to the hon. member for Perth—Wellington—Waterloo talk about this excellent budget in terms of job creation by the business sector, I think that he is probably mistaken. We will continue to have an enormous debt and enormous interest payments on this debt and we will have to keep borrowing from the countries to which we already owe this debt.

Some say that the deficit has been reduced, but it has merely been passed on to the provinces. For example, in the years to come, Quebec will receive $1.5 billion to $2 billion less each year. The federal government says that it may return $1.5 billion less to the province of Quebec. We all agree with that and we would even have preferred that it not return anything to Quebec but that it not tax Quebecers any more.

Finally, what the federal government is doing is not only to continue taxing Quebecers as much as before, but to tax them even more. Moreover, the federal government is increasing the debt of Quebecers by $7 to $8 billion for next year alone. This means that Quebecers will again become poorer and poorer.

When the government says that it wants to transfer to the provinces the responsibilities that belong to them, it must also reduce their tax burden.

• (1745)

But all the government is doing is transferring to the provinces, and especially to Quebec, the burden of the debt and the deficit as well as the horrible task to manage the deficit, a bigger chunk of which Quebecers will be asked to take upon themselves, since the federal government continues to increase taxes while reducing transfers to Quebec. This is unfair and seems to me like a very clever trick designed by the government. I hope Quebecers will see through all this and will understand what the federal government is doing to Quebec by reducing transfers and increasing taxes for Quebecers.

[English]

Mr. Richardson: Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Longueuil points out the tragic part of our fiscal problem. It will be difficult to get our fiscal house in order because of the nature of compound interest and the running up of deficits. The plan is a simple one and is the total purpose of this deficit oriented budget.

I mentioned it was two track. We will grow with it and out of the growth will come jobs and taxes paid back into the treasury. At the same time we will continue to reduce government operations by cuts and by making it more efficient. It will not be easy.

We have heard debate in the House over the past four or five days saying that we have done too much cutting. Others have said that we have not done enough. There is a fine balance and I think we have found that fine balance in this budget.

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Madam Speaker, the hon. member in his presentation said that he was quite proud that the government has met the deficit reduction target of 3 per cent of GDP in three years. The member stated that beyond 1996–97 the deficit will continue to fall under a Liberal government.

If this is the case why does the Liberal government not set a definite date for arriving at a balanced budget? Why does it not set a definite target? The positive results of setting a definite target will be that businesses will expand and new businesses will start up. That is what creates jobs. A positive effect would be lower interest rates and security for social programs which cannot be provided under this continual overspending.

Why will the government not commit to a definite date for eliminating the deficit?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, the government has gained integrity. It has set targets. It is hitting the targets. The more we bring down the deficit the more the membership in the Reform Party goes down. I hope in the four years we keep bringing it down. When we get to zero I hope the membership in the Reform Party is zero.

Hon. Roger Simmons (Burin—St. George's, Lib.): Madam Speaker, first let me congratulate my friend and colleague from Perth—Wellington—Waterloo.

I want to say a few words on the motion of the hon. member for Saint–Hyacinthe—Bagot. It goes without saying that I do not agree with the sentiments in his amendment. If we read what he is saying about offloading on the provinces and doing nothing for the unemployed and so on, I do not believe even he believes that really. It is a nice motion, nicely worded and grammatically correct, but factually incorrect, very incorrect, almost to the point of being irresponsible.

Sure the budget is tough. Is it tough enough? It depends on whether we listen to the Bloc or the Reform. The Bloc says it is much too tough and the Reform says it is not tough enough. I guess that means, as I say to my friend from Lotbinière, that we are probably doing something right over here.

It is a tough budget but it is not tough for the sake of being tough. There are people in this world who get their jollies out of doing tough, rough and crude things. This is not a tough budget for the sake of being tough. This is tough of necessity. This is the way we had to go.

• (1750)

Mr. Benoit: Oh, oh.

Mr. Simmons: That is one of the not tough enough people who just spoke. It is a good opportunity for the gentleman from Vegreville. Does he disown or want to be part of the so–called Reform budget? Is he part of that budget? If so, let his constituents know that he would slash old age pensions to start with. It is not that kind of tough.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Ms. Clancy: You tell him Roger. Who are these people?

Mr. Simmons: I say to my friend from Halifax that it is all right. We have just demonstrated that sometimes these people sing in tune. From time to time they sing in tune.

Madam Speaker, despite the heckling and despite the shouting, the government and the Minister of Finance are on the right track. Is it a perfect budget? No. We are working at getting it right. There are some things in the budget that I do not like. There are some things that other people do not like. On balance, is it the right approach? Yes.

One of my constituents told me—

Mr. Speaker (Lethbridge): That's because you are listening to us.

Mr. Simmons: The gentleman from Lethbridge has had 30 years to get it right. I bow to his wisdom on many points.

One of my constituents phoned me—

Mr. Thompson: Why aren't you out there looking for ships?

Mr. Simmons: Is the gentleman from Wild Rose not interested in what one of my constituents said? Would he deny that constituent the right to be heard here through me?

One of my constituents called and said, "Simmons, did you really clap for that budget? Did you applaud that budget?" I proceeded to tell him why, indeed, I did clap for the budget. I started by saying: "Is it the best thing in the world? Is it what we would really have liked to have done if circumstances were absolutely right? No". Then I put it to him in terms of his family budget. I said: "What a great morning it would be if you could get up and say to your wife, 'This month I have a plan. We are going to buy that Cadillac we have always wanted, the yacht and the extra skidoo'". She would say: "How are you going to do that?" "We are just going to borrow more. Whatever we need we will borrow."

Contrary to Reform doctrine there is nothing particularly sinful about borrowing. If so, many millions of Canadians sin every day on that score. Borrowing is not to sin. Being unable to pay back the loan is a sin.

The credo that says that somehow it is a great crime to borrow is not the issue and that is not what I was saying to my constituent. I was saying that it is a sin if we borrow beyond our capacity to pay back. As I took him through the example I said: "Suppose you say to your wife that you are going to buy the Cadillac, the skidoo, et cetera, and she asks how you are going to get the money and you say, 'We will borrow more. If that is not enough we will borrow more after that'".

Eventually, of course, he put the question to me: "Do you have to pay it back?" I said: "Forget paying it back, just pay the interest on it". Then he said: "Does that not get to the point where you are using all of your income to pay interest?" I said: "Buddy, you have it. You have exactly the problem that the Minister of Finance had".

I told my constituent there was another approach. He could say to his wife in the morning: "Let us pay off all our bills right now. Do not buy any groceries. Tell the youngsters they will not eat for six months because we are paying off the debt". He said: "Come on, Simmons, what are you giving me?" I said: "Basically the Reform budget". "Do not eat now youngsters, just hold your breath. Do not get too thirsty or hungry for six months because we will be back when all the bills are paid."

We cannot do that. What the Minister of Finance had to do, and what I support him in doing, was to present this necessarily tough budget that goes down the middle. It tries its best to reduce the debt and at the same time tries its best to maintain essential programs.

• (1755)

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Simmons: Madam Speaker, I understand that some of my friends in Reform do not agree with that. It pains me to stand here and say something they do not agree with. Sometimes we do not agree on every point. One of the things we do not agree on is that we need a slash and burn budget, that we have to have a budget that destroys essential programs. There is another way.

They shake their heads at me. I am just a bumpkin from Newfoundland. Let me read for them what some other people are saying. I will let them decide whether they are bumpkins and where they are from.

This is what somebody said: "Martin's '95 budget chewed heavily into spending reductions while taking a relatively light tax bite. The result is a budget the Canadian economy should be able to digest without an extreme amount of heartburn or acid indigestion". That person was not from Newfoundland.

Another person said this.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Simmons: Have respect. These are legitimate Canadian citizens who have a right to speak. A second one said this: "Ottawa treats deficit and debt as a serious problem to be dealt with prudently. There is no crisis mentality here. Indeed, there is ample time to plan orderly change rather than risk the chaos that swift and deep cuts can bring". That was another Canadian.

This is one other: "It's the budget—"

Mr. Morrison: What institution is he in?

Mr. Simmons: I am glad the member for Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia asked that question because he is going to get the answer in a moment.

A third Canadian said the following: "It's the budget that grassroots Canadians said long and loud they wanted from this Liberal government. It meets the crucial criteria of leaving money in the pockets of those ordinary Canadians. It heeds the message that there is simply not time to lose in getting this country's deficit and debt under real control in very short order".

Three great Canadians. One edits the Calgary Herald.

Some hon. members: No, no.

Mr. Simmons: One is a Toronto paper and they have written off that part of the country. Their views do not count. There goes Newfoundland. There goes Toronto. We are up to four million people that do not count so far. Let us keep going.

Let us let them show their cards on this one. The second person who said there is no crisis mentality here and it is a matter of orderly change is the editor of the Edmonton Journal

Mr. Morrison: Another colonial paper.

Mr. Simmons: The Southam. Now we write off the Southams and we write off the colonials. The third great Canadian edits the Calgary Sun.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Ms. Cohen: You are quiet now. No response.

Mr. Simmons: I see my time is up unfortunately. We are saying that there are viewpoints in western Canada other than those brought here by the Reform Party.

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Being a rookie in the House, I am not too sure if I am doing the right thing. You can help me if I am not.

I seek unanimous consent for a motion that I would like to move at this time. Under Standing Order 52 I move:

That this House do now adjourn for the purpose of discussing the rail strike.

The strike now includes the longshoremen. In turn it is having a devastating effect on exporters and farmers throughout the nation. People are being laid off by the hundreds at this very moment. This is an emergency and I ask for unanimous consent to debate it at this time.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): The House has heard the motion. Do we have unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Unfortunately the member does not have unanimous consent.

Mr. Thompson: Now we know how they feel about the country.

Mr. Benoit: Madam Speaker, on a point of order I would like to say that it disturbs me—

• (1800)

Mr. Jean Landry (Lotbinière, BQ): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I believe this motion is out of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I would like to remind the hon. member that the motion has not received the unanimous consent necessary in order to be debated.

[English]

The hon. member for Vegreville has the floor on questions or comments.

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the hon. member who just spoke. He talked about how the Liberal budget will do a wonderful job and how it will solve the problem in terms of the present fiscal situation.

How will the hon. member explain to his constituents the loss of jobs, increased and continued high interest rates and eventually the lost social programs that will result from the inactivity of the government?

Let me refer to the interest costs on the debt that have increased from $39 billion from the time the government took office. They will be $51 billion, just the interest payments on the federal debt, by the end of the three–year budget period.

How will the hon. member explain this to the people in his riding who are looking for jobs, looking for relief from high interest rates on their mortgages, and looking for security in social programs?

Mr. Simmons: Madam Speaker, I thank my friend from Vegreville. On the matter of jobs he will know that independent statistics show that 433,000 new additional jobs have been created in the last year and a half.

On the matter of interest rates I would say to him kindly that he is less than honest if he gives the impression that a government of any stripe controls interest rates. As a government we can help create the climate but many elements outside the country determine interest rates.

Yes, the rates are high through no fault of the government. They came down a bit today because of forces outside of our control and his control. He mixes a number of items that are completely unrelated in my view.

If the members wants a yardstick he can look at the Statistics Canada figures which show that Canada's unemployment rate is the lowest in eight years. We must be doing something right.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean–Guy Chrétien (Frontenac, BQ): Madam Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the comments on the budget made by my colleague from Burin—St. George's. Of course, the hon. member found a very simple way of explaining the deficit Canada is now facing by using the vivid image of the discussions he had with his wife. I could tell him that I too had similar discussions at home, but I also went to my constituents to sound them out while Parliament was in recess.

My constituents often tell me that what they want to see most is the federal government setting an example of good management. I have a few examples, such as MPs' pensions. It is surprising that our old hand from Newfoundland made no mention of members' pensions and that his leader said "give me one day and I will solve the problem of MPs' pensions".

Unfortunately, I would like to tell you about the case of the windows in the building on the other side of the river. Madam Speaker, you are interrupting me. Unfortunately, good management is what this government is lacking. There is no vision of the future.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I am not interrupting you, but unfortunately your time is up.

• (1805)

[English]

Mr. Simmons: Madam Speaker, my friend from Frontenac demonstrates that I have difficulty communicating from time to time. He misheard me or I misstated it. It was not my wife; it was another man's wife.

On the matter of pensions there is a basic difference between him and me. He does not plan to be in the country long enough to draw a pension. I do.

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Ref.): Madam Speaker, it is a great privilege to set the record straight on the budget.

Members across the way have spoken about hitting targets. All they are going to hit with the budget is a debt wall. They are talking about hitting the right track. All the track is going to lead to is a catastrophic economic crisis in Canada.

I will illustrate where we are, where we were and where we are going. We had a $550 billion debt and a $220 billion debt provincially which is increasing all the time and has been increasing for the last 20 years. We take in about $120 billion every year and spend about $160 billion.

Last year the government had to borrow $40 billion to meet its obligations. In three years time another $100 billion will be added to the debt, which will increase the amount of money we have to borrow and the interest payment to $50 billion.

Furthermore it will decrease the amount of money we have to spend on government programs from $120 billion to $102 billion. It does not take a rocket scientist to figure out that we have a significant shortfall in the amount of available moneys to carry out government programs, in particular social programs that underprivileged individuals rely on for their well–being.

With the shortfall two things will happen. We will either have to make it up in an economic growth and/or increase taxes. There is no way the economy can possibly make up $18 billion in economic growth. The government will be forced to increase taxes. Furthermore it will crush the life out of the economy and compromise our social programs by having more people obligated to use them. That is the reality.

I will look at a few specific problems in the country. The government disguised its cuts irresponsibly in many ways. First and foremost it said it made cuts. It has actually removed money from the provinces, over $8.5 billion worth. Where does this fall? It will be on the shoulders of the taxpayer, the end point at every level. It is completely unfair and unconscionable.

We in the Reform Party gave the government a budget in two phases. One was in November last year and the other one was before its budget came down. We worked through the process and indicated the solutions to get our country back on track. The government ignored them.

We proposed cuts to the provinces but we proposed to give the provinces tax points to enable them to raise money to fund the programs they want. In effect it is a division of labour and a reduction in duplication. We also proposed a reduction in duplication at the federal level to effect a net savings to the taxpayer.

Let me speak about two specific areas that are close to my heart and close to the hearts of all Canadians. One is health care and the second is post–secondary education. Currently health care costs are rising dramatically, far greater than our gross domestic product, due to expensive technology and an aging population. The situation is not going to get better but is going to get worse.

Funding on the other hand has been stagnant. The government has taken $8.5 billion from the envelope of funding to health care costs, further exacerbating a staggering problem. It has in effect penalized the provinces to get its own so–called funding under control. In the same vein it has said to the provinces that they cannot raise any funds because they will be shackled to the Canada Health Act.

The government has said that it does not want cash register medicine. It does not want to compromise health care. Neither do we in the Reform Party. We are obligated to ensuring that everybody receives essential health care services in a timely fashion, which is not happening right now.

We have proposed that the Canada Health Act be amended to ensure that the provinces have the power to raise the funding and that the government takes it upon itself to ask Canadians to define essential health care services. Once we define the services we will ensure that everyone in the country regardless of income will have the services covered, which is not happening currently.

I will give a couple of examples. A lady in my riding has vertigo, a spinning sensation. She sees things. She probably has a brain tumour in the base of her skull. In Victoria she will have to wait two months just to get her CT scan and her MRI scan is booked on the 12th of never. I ask members to put themselves in her shoes and think about how they would feel. The reason this is the case is that there is not the money for her to have this essential health care service. I could go on and on about many other cases but there is not the time.

The government has also said that our proposal provides for a two–tier health care system. Yes, it does, but we have maintained that it is better to have a two–tier health care system that provides better services for all people than the same two–tier system we have now that is providing progressively poorer health care for all people.

The other aspects about health care are in the realm of the provinces. I do not have the time to discuss them here, but they have responsibility for managing them.

The most important factor in determining employability in the future is post–secondary education. The government has pillaged the amount of moneys available to post–secondary education, further compromising the ability of students to have the skills necessary to compete in the coming economies of the future. That is something we will collectively pay for and pay for in a large way.

We in this party have proposed the income contingent loan replacement scheme, ensuring that funding goes to the provinces. We would make a small cut but also give them the tax points to raise the funds necessary to provide for post–secondary education.

I went to Francis Kelsey Secondary School in my riding last week that looked into an interesting initiative. It looked into the future to determine the economic needs of the country. It is telling its students where the jobs of the future will be. The government should take it upon itself to direct and advise provinces of the economic needs of the country in the future so that they will be able to direct their education programs in that direction.

I would like to make a few points. The budget has added $100 billion to the debt and has severely compromised our social programs much more so than anything that has been done in the past five years. Rather than have a slash and burn policy economically, which is what the government has proposed, we have put forth the only effective solution to save health care, social programs and the other essential programs and to help those most in need. We are trying to preserve the framework of the social net of which we are so proud.

We would take the moneys from the upper third of the income brackets. We feel the moneys we are borrowing now to pay for the debt are in effect being borrowed from future generations.

In conclusion I would say that we in this party are more than happy to help the government out to have a balanced budget but we need to do it within the next three years. Otherwise those who will suffer most are those who can least take care of themselves.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): It being 6.15 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 84(5), it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the amendment now before the House. The question is on the amendment.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Call in the members.

(The House divided on the amendment, which was negatived on the following division:)

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I declare the amendment lost.

ADJOURNMENT PROCEEDINGS

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway, NDP): Madam Speaker, on March 4, 1986 then Minister of Justice, John Crosbie, stood in the House and promised to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act to prohibit discrimination based on sexual orientation.

Today, almost 10 years later, we are still waiting for that promise to be kept. The Prime Minister in 1993 made a firm commitment on the eve of a federal election. He stated the Liberal Party of Canada is firmly committed to banning discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation.

The Prime Minister went on to say in July 1993: "I will not lie. I will not be a Mulroney who made promises and never kept them. I am not that type of politician".

We are still waiting, not for any kind of special rights or privileges but for basic equality. I have here a letter written in November 1993 by the Minister of Justice: "The government remains committed to amending the Canadian Human Rights Act to add sexual orientation as a prohibited ground of discrimination. I will introduce this legislation before the House rises in December".

This is yet another in a long and sorry string of broken promises. What does the Prime Minister have to say now? He said in January that they have four more years in their mandate, and that it is important these amendments receive the full benefit of debate and consultation.

What I find incredible is that this amendment to the Canadian Human Rights Act to include sexual orientation has already been debated for over ten years.

In Quebec, it has been in place since 1977. Quebec was the first province to eliminate and to prohibit discrimination based on sexual orientation. Now, ten years later, there will be a referendum and, frankly, I think that Quebecers must be wondering when the government is going to keep its promises. Gay and lesbian Quebecers in particular must be wondering when the government will follow the example of leadership set by Quebec on this fundamental issue.

• (1850)

It is essential this amendment be brought into force partly because there is still widespread discrimination at the workplace, discrimination in extending benefits, the benefits in recognition of gay and lesbian relationships, and discrimination in recognizing families of gay and lesbian people.

I hope the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice will take this opportunity not to tell us, as the Minister of Justice does, that we remain committed to the principle of this commitment, but that at last this government will move forward on the question of basic justice and equal rights.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway asked a question of the Minister of Justice about the amendments to the Canadian Human Rights Act in the House on December 9, 1994.

In reply, the Minister of Justice reiterated the commitment of the government to amending the Canadian Human Rights Act to prohibit discrimination on the grounds of sexual orientation. He also said the main point is this principle is undiminished and the issue of timing should not be the central concern.

On August 6, 1992 in a case brought under the equality guarantees of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, Haig and Birch v. Canada, the Court of Appeal for Ontario ordered that the Canadian Human Rights Act must be read to include that ground as of that date and be administered accordingly. The Attorney General did not appeal the order to the Supreme Court of Canada.

The government views this as the current and correct state of the law. Thus, gay and lesbian Canadians can already file complaints with the Canadian Human Rights Commission should they find themselves refused a job or a service because of their sexual orientation. Complaints can be filed and the act's protection sought on this ground.

What is left is the very important symbolic act of making the Canadian Human Rights Act reflect the current state of the law. The amendment to which the government is committed would give Parliament the opportunity of bringing the act up to date. It will also bring the federal government into the ranks of the eight provinces and territories, Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, Yukon, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, British Columbia and Saskatchewan, which have already amended their human rights legislation to add the grounds of sexual orientation.

This government wants to add the federal laws against discrimination to the list of governments that have joined in this fight against discrimination and thereby assure Canadians of the same high standard of protection at the federal level.

THE TREASURY BOARD

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Madam Speaker, a week or so ago I asked the President of the Treasury Board to explain the increase in the estimates where the budget for the Treasury Board was being increased to accommodate 10 additional executives at a cost of $3.5 million.

The reply we received from the President of the Treasury Board, from Hansard of March 2, 1995, page 10272, was totally inadequate:

> Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that overall the executive ranks in the public service have been reduced over the last four years by some 26 per cent.

When I asked a supplementary question because it seemed to me he did not have the grasp of the question, he responded:

> Mr. Speaker, I do not know from where the hon. member gets those figures. There is no increase in the staff at Treasury Board.

I beg to differ. The estimates, part III, page 2–43 under activity resource summary quotes management for the Treasury Board, 1994–95 forecast, at 75 full time equivalents at a cost of $6,294,000. The estimates for 1995–96 are for 85 full time equivalents, an increase of 10, at $9,811,000, an increase of $3,517,000.

• (1855)

These quotations are from the estimates prepared by the President of the Treasury Board and tabled in this House by the President of the Treasury Board. Yet, when we ask him a question about his own department, he unfortunately does not know the answer.

The President of the Treasury Board is going to be laying off 45,000 civil servants. These are real people who have families and careers. Their futures are being dashed. At the same time, while these people who perhaps are at the lower end of the civil service scale are being turfed out on the streets, albeit with pension plans and severance packages, we now find out that the Treasury Board is hiring 10 more people at an average cost of $350,000 each.

I do not know what the President of the Treasury Board has in mind with 10 executives at that price. However, if he has anything else in mind other than hiring executives, then there is a total distortion of the facts in the way they are presented here. If he intends to hire 10 more executives, surely he owes this House some justification as to why he intends to pay each of them $350,000.

It is disgraceful that these figures are being presented to us at the same time as the government is downsizing the civil service. We as Reformers have said that you start at the top. You cut at the top. You have no moral authority to cut at the bottom until such time as you have cut at the top.

Therefore, I think the President of the Treasury Board should cut that out of the estimates now so that there is no increase in the executive ranks of the Treasury Board.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board, Lib.): Madam Speaker, frankly I am very disappointed to hear such an irresponsible analysis. The President of the Treasury Board indicated clearly to the member for St. Albert that there had been no increase.

The president undertook, on March 2, to look into the specifics of the matter and to provide him with additional information. And that is what I am doing this evening. I would like to provide a more detailed answer.

[English]

I hope there is no attempt on the part of Reform Party members to suggest their analysis is accurate. The problem may be confusion with the terms executive and management. In the context of part III of the estimates the term executive is a classification term referring to a specific occupational group. The term management is used to refer to an activity, a function or planning element which is used for the purposes of resource planning.

More specifically, reference was made to figure 6 on page 2–43 of the part III for Treasury Board where there is mention of 85 FTEs, full–time equivalents. These FTEs are made up of 19 for the president's office, 16 for the secretary's office, 5 for the office of the chief informatics officer, 22 for the planning and communications directorate, 10 for legal services support and 13 for a special reserve. This total only includes four positions that are executive or the equivalent. Therefore, it was erroneous on the part of the hon. member to draw the conclusion that the secretariat was increasing its executives.

There was no increase.

[English]

I want to finish off very quickly by saying there has been a decrease over four years of about 30 per cent. We expect this decrease will continue.

Surely the hon. member knows that nobody gets paid $350,000 a year.

LABOUR

Mr. Dale Johnston (Wetaskiwin, Ref.): Madam Speaker, on March 3 I asked a question of the Minister of Labour concerning what was then an impending strike at CP Rail. I asked what action the minister planned to take to ensure a continuation of negotiations, thereby avoiding a potentially bitter, long labour–management dispute.

In his response, the parliamentary secretary to the minister stated that his government would simply leave matters to the collective bargaining process. However, in the time that has passed since I first raised my question, strikes and lockouts have occurred throughout Canada escalating to the point yesterday of a complete withdrawal of services by the 3,200 member Brotherhood of Maintenance of Way Employees.

• (1900)

So far the work disruptions involve only the members of that union. However, the other key player, the 4,000 member Canadian Auto Workers union, is prepared to take strike action anytime after March 15, which of course is tomorrow.

The potential consequences of the ongoing labour dispute between the railways and the unions are enormous. To complicate the situation, 405 members of the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union in the British Columbia ports have walked off the job, paralysing the movement of goods in western Canada.

It is imperative the government take quick and decisive action to halt the further disruption of our transportation routes. The fragile Canadian economy simply cannot withstand a blow like this. The uninterrupted operation of our transportation system is an essential element of our economic recovery. No one can dispute that.

More important, when examining the economic implications of a strike, we have to consider the bottom line. Here nobody wins. Too many people are harmed by needless strikes and lockouts. It is simply reprehensible to expose Canadians to more of this kind of nonsense.

Negotiations between CP Rail and the two unions in question have been ongoing for some 15 months. It would appear that neither side is truly serious about arriving at a new contract. If the resolve were there, surely the differences would have been settled peacefully and promptly by now.

Simply suggesting that the two sides continue the collective bargaining process is unsatisfactory. In the meantime, while they continue talks for who knows how long, countless numbers of people will be hurt by a dispute for which they are not responsible.

For this reason, the federal government must now step into this dispute with back to work legislation. This legislation should include a 30–day cooling off period during which meaningful negotiations could take place.

As the work disruption drags on it appears obvious that the government is stalling for time while it drafts anti–scab legislation. A cop–out like that is unacceptable.

Canada's railways account for close to 40 per cent of all freight tonnage moved in the country. Whether they be shippers of newsprint, coal or potash, the auto industry or western grain farmers, importers, exporters and manufacturers they must be assured that they have a reliable method of getting their products to market. Otherwise those markets will dry up.

Foreign buyers need suppliers they can count on. If they cannot rely on the Canadian market they will simply go elsewhere.

Aside from the direct impact of rail stoppages there is immeasurable harm resulting from what is known as the domino effect. Industries which cannot obtain parts or ship their goods will have to shut down production and lay off employees. The longer the government allows this situation to go on, the more far reaching the impact will be on Canadians from coast to coast. This means less revenue for the cash starved federal treasury.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I am sorry. Your time has expired.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Human Resources Development, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for raising a very important issue.

As the Minister of Labour reported to this House yesterday, CP Rail and three of its unions representing 2,900 workers reached a tentative settlement on March 12, 1995 with the assistance of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service. The agreements provide for wage increases, modified employment security and a variety of benefit improvements. The settlements are subject to ratification by the union memberships.

I understand that CP Rail is meeting with the BMWE today and I would encourage them to make every effort to settle their collective bargaining differences.

I am advised that the impact of the work stoppage at CP Rail has been limited and that the railway is continuing to operate its core lines.

Collective bargaining is continuing in a number of railway negotiations. The parties must be given every opportunity to settle their disputes in collective bargaining as provided for under the terms of the Canada Labour Code. However, the parties must accept their responsibility to resume bargaining and conclude an agreement not only in the interests of their members and shareholders but also for the Canadian public.

The railways and the unions have the necessary insight and experience to resolve the complex issues in dispute.

Any discussion of legislative intervention at this time would be premature. The federal mediation and conciliation service remains in contact with the parties, available to assist them in their negotiations.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Pursuant to Standing Order 38(5), the motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted.

Accordingly, the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

(The House adjourned at 7.05 p.m.)

WORLD CONSUMER RIGHTS DAY

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today is World Consumer Rights Day as declared by Consumers International, formerly known as the International Organization of Consumer Unions. Throughout the world, consumers are marking this event by taking part in activities stressing their contribution to the marketplace in our society.

Consumers have a vital role to play in maintaining the wealth and competitiveness in this country. Indeed, over 60 per cent of Canada's GDP is attributed to consumer demand. Consumers' voices should be heard and their rights recognized.

Consumers International has a membership of 185 organizations from 80 nations whose fundamental concerns are to protect the rights of consumers and to promote social justice and fairness in the marketplace. The organization assists consumer groups in developing countries and initiates research action on issues such as pharmaceuticals, pesticides, tobacco and baby foods. It facilitates comparative testing of consumer goods and services—

MINING INDUSTRY

Mr. Bernard Deshaies (Abitibi, BQ): Mr. Speaker, by failing to announce measures to stimulate the mining sector, the latest budget brought down by the Minister of Finance is helping to marginalize an industry that generates major spinoffs for a number of regions in Quebec and Canada, for instance in my own riding and in the ridings of many of my colleagues on both sides of the House.

Through its failure to act and its lack of commitment, the federal government is jeopardizing the operations of an industry that is already experiencing problems. In fact, the Mining Association of Canada refers to the budget measures as both harsh and ineffectual and as a threat to the future of the mining sector.

According to the Association des prospecteurs du Québec, Quebec's mining industry may well consider whether its particular sector would not be better served by a legislative framework under which only the Government of Quebec would have the power to intervene.

BIG ROCK BREWERIES

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Albertans are demonstrating that they are willing to support the arts without massive federal assistance. Yesterday the Toronto based Council for Business and the Arts in Canada announced the winners of the 17th annual Business in the Arts awards. I am so pleased to announce that Big Rock Breweries from my riding of Calgary Southeast has received the award for community support.

The shrinking budgets in all areas of our economy demand we seek new, innovative and creative ways of accessing funds, including the cultural sector. Big Rock Breweries from Alberta is leading the way as a private sector supporter for the arts. Last year Big Rock provided over $100,000 to over 40 different arts groups. It views its cultural support as a wise business practice and not as a charitable donation.

Thanks to the support of Big Rock Breweries, groups like the Alberta Theatre Project and the Muttard Public Art Gallery are thriving. Albertans indeed are leading the way in private sector support for the cultural sector. I applaud Big Rock Breweries.

JAMEL TWINS

Mr. Jag Bhaduria (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville, Ind. Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I wish to extend my congratulations and appreciation to Mr. S.G.P. Jafry, a prominent member of the South Asian community, and to the Scarborough Muslim Association. Mr. Jafry was the fund raising co–ordinator responsible for raising over $175,000 to offset the costs of surgery and care of the Jamel twins.

These 2-year old children arrived from Pakistan last November to have extremely delicate surgery. Since birth they had been joined at the head. On January 23, 1995 a 23-member team of surgeons at the Toronto Hospital for Sick Children performed over 15 hours of surgery.

There have been only 30 such operations performed worldwide and in 60 per cent of the operations only one of the children survives. Young Hira Jamel survived but her sister Nida did not. On behalf of the House, I wish to convey my condolences to the Jamel family. I am sure everyone is hoping for a full and complete recovery for young Hira Jamel.

FRANCOPHONES OUTSIDE QUEBEC

Mr. Nick Discepola (Vaudreuil, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in a speech he made on June 3 at the annual meeting of the Association canadienne-française de l'Ontario, the leader of the Bloc Quebecois said, and I quote: "The agenda proposed by the Bloc Quebecois for today and for the future includes the active solidarity of your communities with francophones in Quebec, within the space we share".

This statement was noteworthy for its understanding and openness, unlike the statement made yesterday by the Bloc's official critic in response to the position taken by the Fédération des communautés francophones et acadienne du Canada. After accusing them of interfering, the Bloc member continued her attack with the following statement, and I quote: "Our message to francophones outside Quebec is clear: Mind your own business".

Once again, the Bloc Quebecois has shown it is determined to muzzle anyone who would challenge its separatist plans.

FRANCOPHONES OUTSIDE QUEBEC

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, francophone and Acadian communities are unwavering in their belief in a united, progressive and dynamic Canada. I was very happy to hear that the Fédération des communautés francophones et acadienne du Canada had asked Quebecers to vote "no" in the referendum on separation.

The members of the Bloc Quebecois are definitely misleading francophone and Acadian communities when they tell them that an independent Quebec would help the francophone community in Canada to better grow and develop.

• (1405)

Furthermore the statement by the hon. member for Rimouski—Témiscouata suggesting that the federal government had bought the francophones and the Acadians is a further insult to our communities.

I would invite the hon. member to publicly apologize for her insensitive remarks to Acadians and all francophones outside Quebec. Canada's francophones and Acadians have every right to speak on the future of our country.

FRANCOPHONES OUTSIDE QUEBEC

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I was very pleased to hear that the Fédération des communautés francophones et acadienne du Canada unequivocally declared that it is in favour of Canadian federalism.

The FCFA is the second organization of its kind to state that it supports the "no" side. Last February, the Société des Acadiennes et Acadiens du Nouveau-Brunswick publicly announced its position, and also begged Quebecers to vote no. These two organizations also believe in a dynamic and progressive Canada which is proud to promote both official languages. This outlook on Canada promotes the growth of the francophone culture as a whole.

The fact that francophone establishments and organizations exist across Canada, be they educational, cultural or financial, proves that the French fact in Quebec and in all of the provinces has persevered and is alive.

The federal government has supported the development and growth of the French language and culture in Canada at all times, not just during the referendum debate. It would be a hard blow to the francophone community elsewhere in Canada if Quebec were to leave the Canadian federation.

Therefore, I hope the referendum will be held as soon as possible so that we can get on with solving the real problems.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Ghislain Lebel (Chambly, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the repeated attacks on the Immigration and Refugee Board over the last several years have regularly made the headlines. Since the Liberal government took office, these criticisms have become increasingly vitriolic, but the government remains strangely unperturbed.

Again yesterday, two former IRB board members estimated that at least half of their former colleagues lacked the training and expertise necessary for the performance of their duties.

They alleged, as have others before them, that patronage appointments are at the root of the board's problems.

It is urgent that the government get to the bottom of the matter and hold a public inquiry into the Board's operations. The longer this government fails to take action, the more lasting the damage to the board's credibility is likely to be.

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Gerry Parsons, a resident of Air Ronge, Saskatchewan, has courageously given his permission for me to use his letter. He writes:

> I appreciate your stand on gun control. I approve of reasonable methods of fighting crime and of taking guns from criminals. I will, I suppose, become a criminal when I refuse to register my hunting guns. Actually, I will probably never use my guns again; I am 75 years old and have a lung disorder which prevents me from doing very much of anything. I have never been charged with anything in my 75 years, it's too bad I have to start now. Thanks for your efforts. It's too bad the justice minister is not as honest as yourself.

Does the justice minister really—

The Speaker: Colleagues, even though we are quoting other people in this House sometimes terms which could not be attributed to ourselves, that is to say, questioning the honesty of another member, should not be imposed because someone else said them. I would ask the hon. member to delete any reflection on the honesty of any member of this House and to please finish his statement.

Mr. Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I withdraw that final sentence.

Does the justice minister really think Mr. Parsons is a criminal? Does he think because a 75–year old man is going to knowingly fail to register his hunting rifles that he should go to jail for up to 10 years? Is the Liberal government going to build more jails to house the thousands of responsible firearms owners like Mr. Parsons? Or is it going to continue to let the real criminals out on the street to make room for those who fail to register their firearms?

FRANCOPHONES OUTSIDE QUEBEC

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Rimouski—Témiscouata, a great champion of francophone rights when it suits her, tap–danced on the backs of francophones outside Quebec yesterday.

She accused the Fédération des communautés francophones et acadienne of interfering with Quebec's affairs by encouraging Quebecers to vote "no" in the upcoming referendum.

Casting doubt on the FCFA's honesty, the hon. member asked if receiving federal subsidies did not help the federation take a federalist stance.

If francophones outside Quebec have survived for centuries, taking their place at every level and in every sphere of activity in Canada, and if there is such a thing as cultural duality in Canada today, it is no thanks to egocentric separatists.

FRANCOPHONES OUTSIDE QUEBEC

Mr. Raymond Bonin (Nickel Belt, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I object to the remarks made by Bloc Quebecois members to the effect that for francophones outside Quebec to oppose Quebec's separation constitutes interference. Such remarks clearly show the Bloc's policy of discouraging debate and silencing any opposition to separation. But the Bloc is ignoring an inescapable fact: you cannot silence a majority.

Francophones from across Canada—Quebecers, Acadians, Franco–Saskatchewanians and Franco–Ontarians—have always actively promoted and preserved their language and culture on this continent where we form a very small minority.

Our efforts have paid off and will continue to pay off because federalism and our political system are responsive and encourage the development of francophone communities. A majority of French Canadians recognize the Canadian federal system as a flexible system that promotes our development.

At the opening of this Parliament, the Bloc Quebecois said it was going to—

The Speaker: I am sorry to have to interrupt the hon. member. I will now recognize the hon. member for Ottawa–Vanier.

FRANCOPHONES OUTSIDE QUEBEC

Mr. Mauril Bélanger (Ottawa—Vanier, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in recent months, francophone communities in Acadia and Ontario have welcomed the leader of the Bloc Quebecois, who is eager to spread his party's message and establish lasting links with these communities.

I was there when the Association canadienne–française de l'Ontario received Mr. Bouchard with decorum and civility at its annual meeting last year in Toronto.

Yesterday, the federation of francophone and Acadian communities of Canada said that Canadian federalism was the most favourable framework for the development of Quebec society and of francophone and Acadian communities.

Instead of admitting that this statement is based on convictions as strong as hers, the hon. member for Rimouski—Témiscouata responded by telling them to mind their own business.

Francophone communities intend to pursue the dialogue initiated by the Bloc Quebecois and, since the future of this country concerns us all, we will mind our own business.

LA POCATIÈRE EXPERIMENTAL FARM

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the sheep industry in Canada and Quebec was stunned to find out in the last budget about the closure of the experimental farm in La Pocatière, which was established in 1910. Against all expectations, the federal government is slowing down the growth of this booming sector.

These cuts are totally inconsistent with the red book commitments on research and development and defeat the efforts made by research establishments in the last few years.

The federal government must review its R&D financing policy and end blind cuts which unfairly penalize growing agricultural sectors.

We hope that common sense will prevail and that the Minister of Agriculture will reconsider his decision as soon as possible, as requested by the committee for the survival of the experimental farm in La Pocatière.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the justice minister participated in a closed door meeting organized by the Liberal member for Dauphin—Swan River. This meeting was declared a farce by Mike Dudar, a resident, who had to demand a seat in a meeting that allowed only 60 people inside while hundreds of citizens along with the media were locked out.

Why is the justice minister refusing to address the very concerns his gun control legislation has created? Why was the media locked out of the meeting in Dauphin, Manitoba last night? Why is the minister unwilling to explain his gun control legislation to the very people it will have the greatest negative impact upon?

This is not the first time the minister has avoided an open public meeting with the people of Canada. He repeated the same practice while in Calgary last January. The minister's actions last night were an insult to the people of Dauphin—Swan River and an insult to all concerned Canadians.

• (1415)

The minister has a duty to stand before all Canadians and defend his draconian gun legislation and demonstrate—

LINGUISTIC DUALITY

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as the member representing the federal riding of St. Boniface, as a French-speaking resident of a province and a region outside Quebec, and as a Canadian of French-speaking origin born in St. Boniface, Manitoba, I am pleased that the Fédération des communautés francophones et acadienne du Canada gave its unequivocal support to Canadian federalism.

The federation, like myself, believes in a dynamic and progressive Canada which is proud to promote its linguistic duality and whose government actively supports the French fact throughout the country. We hope that the referendum will be held as soon as possible, so that all of us, including Quebecers of course, can concentrate our energy on building our country, Canada.

FISHERIES

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, Canada has just proceeded to release the Spanish trawler Estai, after its owners agreed to post a bond of $500,000. As you know, the European Union had made the release of the trawler a condition for resuming negotiations with Canada.

Could the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans indicate whether in exchange for the release of the Spanish trawler, European trawlers agreed to a 60-day moratorium on fishing for turbot, as requested by Canada?

[English]

Hon. Brian Tobin (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Leader of the Opposition for his question.

I want to report to him that this morning the master, or the owner, of the Estai posted bond in the order of $500,000 against his vessel. This is in addition to the $8,000 bail posted against the captain of the vessel a day or two before.

This is in keeping with the procedures of the Canadian judicial system, procedures that have been followed in similar circumstances with other vessels of similar size, shape and value.

We are very pleased to see that a bond has been posted. As a result the vessel and crew are free to leave at any time.

In addition to the bond being posted, some 130 tonnes of product have been removed from the vessel and is being held by the crown as evidence. It will be held in a storage facility and will be disposed of by the court at the end of the judicial proceedings.

There has been no negotiation, nor should there be in terms of the judicial proceedings themselves. I know the hon. Leader of the Opposition would agree with this. The proceedings have been conducted as they ought to be by the court in the normal manner.

Now that both a bond has been posted and there is no fishing on the nose and tail of the Grand Banks, this may well be an opportunity for talks. The Minister of Foreign Affairs and the Prime Minister have given instructions to a negotiating team in Brussels. We shall see.

[Translation]

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the minister whether in connection with the release of the trawler Estai, Canada tried to obtain, or possibly obtained, guarantees from the European Union or Spain that their trawlers will not fish for turbot throughout the forthcoming negotiations with Canada?

[English]

Hon. Brian Tobin (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this is a good question. Canada has made it clear since the beginning of this difficulty between Canada and the EU that we will not negotiate while fish are being caught.

I was pleased to note yesterday we had four or five days in a row of no fishing on the nose and tail of the Grand Banks. For a few hours last night one vessel did cross over into the area of the nose but I can report that this morning it had pulled back again.

For the moment, as we speak here in this Chamber, there are no vessels on the nose and tail. Bond has been posted on this particular fishing vessel. It will sail out of harbour. I should point out it will sail out without a net, without the ability to fish. The net was cut.

• (1420)

I can also report, and I know the Leader of the Opposition will be happy to hear this, that Canadian technology in global positioning systems—I am advertising now to the planet—were successful in allowing us to find and to retrieve today the net from the Estai.

The net that has been retrieved bears manufacturer markings identical to that on part of the equipment still left on the Estai. The fish that were pulled out of the water—we videotaped this—were still kicking. They were alive. This is the net recently cut. The net had a 115 millimetre mesh, which is smaller than the 130 millimetre required by NAFO. In addition, the net in question had an 80 millimetre liner in the net.

Some hon. members: Shame, shame.

[Translation]

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether formal negotiations are now taking place between Canadian diplomats and their European counterparts, but I hope so. However, I would like to ask the minister whether Canada has initiated certain discussions so that formal negotiations can begin as soon as possible between its representatives and those representing Spain and the European Union?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to inform the House that the team headed by the Canadian Deputy Minister of Foreign Affairs is now in Brussels to start negotiations with representatives of the European Union. We are ready and willing, and we want to settle this in a diplomatic way.

There are two things we want to accomplish. First, ensure that the conservation measures we support will be respected, and we therefore hope to reach an agreement with our friends in the European Union on setting up an effective mechanism for surveillance and monitoring. I also want to take this opportunity to say that in a spirit of co–operation, we are prepared to review with European Union representatives the quota share we obtained as a result of the last negotiations.

CANADIAN SECURITY INTELLIGENCE SERVICE

Mr. François Langlois (Bellechasse, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. In a report made public yesterday, the inspector general of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, better known as CSIS, notes serious irregularities in the use of informants on university campuses and in political parties during elections.

How does the Solicitor General explain his statements that CSIS did not spy on or infiltrate political parties, when the inspector general of CSIS criticizes his failure to issue any sort of guideline on dealing with these political party informants during electoral campaigns?

[English]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the report is for a period of more than two years before this government took office. Since that time work has been ongoing to deal with the problems and concerns raised in it. This is something to which we are paying close attention.

[Translation]

Mr. François Langlois (Bellechasse, BQ): Mr. Speaker, there is no need to go back two years. In December, Michel Robert, the chair of the CSIS review committee, stated that Canadian political parties had not been investigated, and, a month later, the CSIS review committee was forced to contradict him, saying that there had in fact been a file entitled "Preston Manning" on the Reform Party.

I would therefore ask the Solicitor General how he can play down the scope of the report by the inspector general of CSIS, which concludes that there is no justification for the use of informants on university campuses and during electoral campaigns.

[English]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that the overall conclusion of the inspector general at that time, some two years ago, was that the use of informants by CSIS was professional, of an appropriate professional level.

As I have said, work is ongoing to deal with the concerns raised by the inspector general at that time.

Finally, I remind my hon. friend that he has once again stated something that is not correct. The file referred to by the acting chair of the security intelligence review committee was not about an investigation of a political party but rather about the possibility that a foreign government had made contributions in a way that was not appropriate.

• (1425)

Therefore, I hope my hon. friend, if he raises the subject again, will describe the matter correctly. It is about time he did so.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, over a month ago the Minister of National Defence claimed to have been ill–informed by the military chain of command specifically concerning information regarding the airborne videos.

Has the minister satisfied himself that these concerns with information from the chain of command have been addressed? What specifically has he done about them?

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there was a particular incident to which the hon. member refers and that concerns the misinformation in a report on the videos. That matter was dealt with by the chief of defence staff who relieved a general officer of his post as a result of not providing both the CDS and myself with the details.

I have full confidence in the chief of defence staff and the military command who work pretty hard at their jobs, as I have confidence in all of the men and women who serve Canada proudly in the armed forces.

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, we have obtained a leaked report written by Brigadier–General Jeffries and submitted to land force command headquarters.

According to General Jeffries, the troops believe that, quote: "Political agendas and careerism have replaced leadership in the defence hierarchy and, furthermore, that the loyalty and focus of senior military leaders is directed upwards and not down". This is a very serious evaluation of the state of affairs.

Is the Minister of National Defence aware of this report? How does he plan to deal with the leadership crisis in his department?

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am not privy to all communications that are made between the chain of command throughout the country.

If the hon. member has such a document that he describes, I will certainly raise the matter with the chief of defence staff to see if the concerns allegedly addressed by Brigadier–General Jeffries have been brought to his attention. Then we will decide how to proceed from that point forward.

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this is not the first time that an internal report has pointed out leadership problems in the Canadian military. To date, however, the Minister of National Defence has promised only cosmetic changes and has put off major decisions with the promise of future inquiries.

Is the minister prepared to address these failings in the leadership and elsewhere in the military or do we have to wait for more videos?

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have just made the statement that the government and I have full confidence in the chief of defence staff and all those in command of the Canadian Armed Forces.

With respect to the renewal of any organization, there are changes made every year. I announced a couple of weeks ago we would be streamlining the general officer ranks by about 25 per cent. Some new people have been brought into key positions at national defence headquarters. I believe this will allay any concerns the hon. member has that we at national defence headquarters do not have dynamic, vibrant leadership.

BURUNDI

Mrs. Maud Debien (Laval East, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

The situation is very tense in Burundi since the murder, in October 1993, of the first democratically elected president of that republic. In recent months, some 50,000 people have died in the conflict between the two main ethnic groups, and there is every indication that another crisis is looming. The recent assassination of the minister of energy and mines has exacerbated the situation and there is a great deal of insecurity in the country.

Can the minister tell us about the current situation in Burundi and the means being considered by the UN and Canada to prevent a crisis?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately, the concerns expressed by the hon. member are well founded. It is sad that the ethnic conflicts which occurred in Rwanda and ended in terrible bloodbaths could now surface in a neighbouring country and trigger a similar tragedy.

• (1430)

This is why Canada has repeatedly asked the United Nations, and also the Organization of African Unity, to immediately get involved and try to find a solution to this increasingly menacing situation.

Mrs. Maud Debien (Laval East, BQ): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, in committee, the minister informed us of the representations he made, among others, to the UN secretary, for sending additional troops to Rwanda in order to restore a balance in the region. As you know, the Security Council rejected Canada's request.

My question to the minister is: Will he pledge to again ask the UN Security Council to quickly organize the multinational forces required to prevent a conflict?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the answer is yes. In the event that the United Nations are not in a position to intervene, we also contacted the Organization of African Unity to see if a regional approach might be more appropriate. A number of countries concerned by the situation in Rwanda and in Burundi could intervene, with the support of the UN, but they would do so on a regional basis, rather than in the context of a global operation under the UN.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would have thought that with the contents of the report being so serious the minister might have had them before now.

Further to my colleague's questions regarding leadership, General Jeffries' report says the troops believe: "Senior leaders are seen to be unwilling or unable to speak to soldiers' needs on their soldiers' behalf. For example, the airborne trial by headlines left personnel feeling disillusioned and abandoned".

Has the minister yet realized how serious the leadership problem in his department is? If so, can he give the House some specifics as to how he intends to deal with it?

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we have to realize the armed forces has been under considerable pressure for the last few years since the events in Somalia became public. This has posed a great problem and a strain.

The armed forces has enjoyed an enviable reputation for many years. The work discharged by the armed forces is exemplary. The Canadian Armed Forces is universally respected.

This week we are preparing to send the first of about a 470 contingent to Haiti. These people are outstanding. They are well led. That does not mean to say that from time to time problems will crop up. Where specific examples of management or leadership are brought to the attention of the government, they are dealt with.

With respect to the issue of Somalia, the whole chain of command and how the troops were deployed to Somalia will be the subject of an inquiry.

For the Reform Party to make blanket accusations about the morale of the troops and about the high leadership of the armed forces is not borne out by the facts. There was considerable disappointment regarding airborne matters and may have been reflected in the alleged report.

The Speaker: I would ask members once again to keep questions and answers short.

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is not the Reform Party that is accusing the minister of leadership problems.

The report also says: "Soldiers perceive their interests and welfare are being sacrificed so that senior leaders can be successful in delivering the same bang for much less buck. Unpalatable though it may be, we will have to cut our suit to fit the available cloth if we are to avoid a hollow army and burnt out soldiers".

Considering the contents of this report, is the minister prepared to institute an immediate inquiry to determine the cause and extent of the problem and propose remedial action to avoid a burnt out army?

• (1435)

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I find it odd that the hon. member wishes me to institute an inquiry based on one memo.

The hon. member was a member of the joint committee of the House and Senate that looked into all aspects and operations of the Canadian Armed Forces. He signed a report concluding that the leadership of the armed forces was top flight.

Now he comes forward based on the contents of one memo, perhaps generated by the very emotional situation of the closing of the Canadian airborne, and wishes to reverse the assessment to which he subscribed less than three months ago. That is not logical.

IRVING WHALE

Mrs. Monique Guay (Laurentides, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. In December 1993, officials of the Department of the Environment gave their minister an internal document which seriously called into question the conclusions and quality of the study on which she based her decision to refloat the Irving Whale.

Was the Minister of the Environment aware of that document and will she tell us why she picked the most risky and controversial solution, which was to raise the Irving Whale, despite her officials' advice?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the only one who thinks this is a controversial issue is the company that did not land the contract. What is truly unfortunate for the hon. member opposite is that people called her leader regarding this issue when he was environment minister, and he held public hearings into the matter in Halifax, Dartmouth and on Prince Edward Island, yet took no action.

As soon as we came to office, we acted and we hope to raise the Irving Whale this summer at the very latest.

Mrs. Monique Guay (Laurentides, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am speaking to the Minister of the Environment who, at present, is the only one responsible for the Department of the Environment, and who is the one who must make the right decisions.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mrs. Guay: How can the minister explain her steadfast refusal to have an electronic inspection of the barge's hull done before raising it, which the experts say is the very minimum which must be done to prevent a major ecological catastrophe from occurring if the Irving Whale were to break up during the operation?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member had read the documents I provided, all of the material in the public domain, including the 1990 report asking the former minister to take action, she would know that we did have an electronic inspection done last June.

[English]

What I find incredibly obscure about the logic of the hon. member is that a few months ago she stood in the House and said we should not wait until next spring. We have to lift the Irving Whale this year. Now that we are moving ahead and have gone to tender, she completely reverses the position she took only a few months ago.

I took a position, unlike her leader. I am going to raise the Irving Whale and finally we will get rid of the ticking time bomb that has been there for 25 years.

LABOUR

Mr. Dale Johnston (Wetaskiwin, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have been informed the government has finally agreed to Reform's demands for back to work legislation in the current west coast labour dispute.

This addresses the immediate problem for Canadian shipping. What is the Minister of Labour prepared to do to prevent further disruptions?

[Translation]

Hon. Lucienne Robillard (Minister of Labour, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in fact the situation has worsened in British Columbia ports. As of midnight last night, there was a complete work stoppage, as hon. members are aware. Yes, since midnight yesterday, the transportation of grain and perishable goods has been halted. In the face of the enormous economic consequences of this problem, the government has decided to act and implement back to work legislation.

We are currently negotiating with the various parties to ensure this legislation is adopted as quickly as possible. I hope that we will obtain everyone's agreement.

• (1440)

[English]

Mr. Dale Johnston (Wetaskiwin, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the minister on her move.

What is needed now is final offer binding arbitration, as put forward in our private member's Bill C–262. Will the minister make a commitment today to support Bill C–262? If not, will she present similar legislation of her own?

[Translation]

Hon. Lucienne Robillard (Minister of Labour, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I can understand my hon. colleague's concerns about strikes in British Columbia ports. Today, however, we have a major crisis with grave economic consequences. The government will act as soon as it has the co–operation of the various parties in this House.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Philippe Paré (Louis–Hébert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

Yesterday, the UN Committee Against Torture ruled that Canada's treatment of Mr. Khan, a refugee claimant from Pakistan, violated the international convention against torture, to which Canada itself is a signatory.

Since the decision concludes that this individual would be in danger of being subjected to torture if Canada sent him back to his native country, does the Canadian government undertake not to deport Mr. Khan?

[English]

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for the question. I am aware of the UN committee's decision.

We have asked the UN committee to reconsider its position on the basis that this individual also had a criminal conviction in Canada in 1993. No longer is this simply a case of protection for an individual. There is also the claim that Canada has every right to uphold the protection of the community and society.

[Translation]

Mr. Philippe Paré (Louis–Hébert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, how does the minister explain the fact that the Immigration and Refugee Board apparently did not look into the grounds for Mr. Khan's request, as the UN committee's ruling indicates?

[English]

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the UN said Canada's system and how it deals with and treats refugee claimants is among the best in the world. With all due respect to the UN, Canada's house is quite clean and quite orderly.

However, it is our right as a country that this decision be not binding on Canada. We have every right to uphold our laws and the protection of our citizens. That is exactly the point we are making to this committee in asking it, even though its decision is not binding, to reconsider the sovereign right of a country to protect its borders and citizens.

LABOUR

Mr. David Iftody (Provencher, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. I appreciated her response on the grain transportation problem.

I stood in the House on February 7 last year with regard to a similar problem. The government passed legislation to put the workers back to work. Now we are dealing with a similar problem again.

What long term measures is the minister willing to employ to ensure that year after year western Canadian grain farmers do not have to go through similar problems?

[Translation]

Hon. Lucienne Robillard (Minister of Labour, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I can understand the concerns of the hon. member for Provencher because work stoppages are indeed, might I say, excessively frequent in British Columbia's harbours. I intend to have an industrial inquiry commission look into the various existing collective bargaining procedures with a view to making a very specific recommendation so that we can have—

[English]

Mr. Thompson: A review! Oh no, not again!

[Translation]

Mrs. Robillard: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but I am unable to respond, with all the racket the hon. members opposite are making.

TAXATION

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, there is confusion surrounding the Liberal position on the electronic transfer tax, otherwise known as the Tobin tax, which seeks to impede the flow of capital around the world.

Last week in Copenhagen the human resources minister said that it was a good idea. He repeated it again in the House on Monday. The finance minister denounced it and now it has been undenounced—

Mr. Young: Undenounced?

Mr. Abbott: Yes, undenounced by the foreign affairs minister.

What is the position? Does the government support the Tobin tax? Yes or no.

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is important for the hon. member to remember that we are making a major breakthrough by bringing to the agenda of the G–7 meeting the question of the revision of the international financial institutions.

During the course of discussions a number of alternatives will be discussed. The Tobin tax, which seems to be very interesting to the hon. member, is one of many subjects that will certainly be looked at and discussed at that meeting.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in the world today international money traders are looking at Canada. They want some kind of feeling of security on where the government is going.

Why do 1970 ideas keep bubbling to the top whenever the Liberals get into their think mode? Do they support the Tobin tax? Yes or no.

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we are supporting a revision and an improvement of international financial institutions. We will be presenting recommendations in this regard at the time of the Halifax summit.

We have asked a parliamentary committee to look at it. I remind the hon. member that his party is represented on the committee. We hope the representatives of the Reform Party on the committee will make valuable recommendations.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

Mr. René Laurin (Joliette, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal. At a press conference in Quebec City yesterday, the vice–president of the Public Service Alliance of Canada revealed actual instances of public funds being squandered. Apparently, the federal government offered courses on stress management through humour, and defensive driving courses to civil servants who do not need to drive as part of their jobs. Talk about defensive!

Will the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs admit that these glaring examples of squandering show that the government is unable to end the cycle of waste in the federal administration?

[English]

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we do not subscribe to government waste. In terms of program review we have gone through in great detail all the programs and services provided by the government.

In order to get our deficit down, in order to get our fiscal house in order, we have made the most major cuts that have been made in government expenditures since the end of the second world war. That will help to bring about a discipline and ensure more than ever before that we have the greatest efficiency and effectiveness in terms of the spending of public taxpayers dollars.

[Translation]

Mr. René Laurin (Joliette, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in light of the minister's answer, I believe he should have his eyes examined.

• (1450)

Why does the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs turn a blind eye to the many instances of squandering brought to his attention by civil servants? Why does he not recognize that he should clean up his own backyard before hitting civil servants with massive layoffs?

[English]

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we do not close an eye to any matter brought to our attention whereby we can improve the efficiency and effectiveness of government programs and services. Any that have been brought to my attention have been or are being examined very carefully.

We do not take lightly the fact that part of our expenditure reduction program involves 45,000 people having to be removed from their positions in the public service. We intend to treat people fairly and equitably in carrying this out and ensuring that we get the fiscal house of the government in order.

IMMIGRATION AND REFUGEE BOARD

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday Mr. Bill Bauer and Mr. Gary Carson, both former members of the Immigration and Refugee Board, confirmed that half the IRB members may not be competent to hear refugee claims, that some cannot function adequately in either of Canada's official languages, and that members are being pressured to make positive decisions.

Will the minister listen this time, dismantle the IRB and start over, or will he ignore Bauer like he ignored us and other Canadians and even his own employees?

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the matter should be put in its proper context.

The government has not accepted the status quo with respect to the Immigration and Refugee Board. We have moved serious reforms both legislatively as well as administratively. Last week the chairman of the IRB responded very comprehensively and very effectively to the Hathaway report.

No one is saying that institution or any institution of government is perfect. Equally so, we should not jump to the opposite extreme and say that everything the IRB does is wrong and every member of the IRB is incompetent, because that is simply not the case.

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Bauer made it clear yesterday that the minister's single member panels are a step backward and will worsen the current mess.

Two former IRB members concluded that Canada accepts terrorists as refugees, that some lawyers are scripting refugee claims, and that in Bauer's opinion up to two–thirds of claimants are accepted under false pretences.

Why does the minister continue to put the interests of bogus claimants, refugee lawyers and advocates ahead of the interests of Canadians who pay $1 billion a year for this disgrace?

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the member does not know what he is talking about. If competence for membership in the Chamber was any guideline he would not be here.

Now he is talking about a $1 billion budget for the IRB. I ask the member to have the decency to put forward the facts, to put forward things that we can do better, things that we can do to build the institution, rather than reduce everything to rubble.

FISHERIES

Mr. Derek Wells (South Shore, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

The minister just revealed that DFO was successful in retrieving the net of the Spanish trawler, the Estai. Congratulations to the minister and his department are in order.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Wells: Would the minister inform the House of the significance of the net's mesh size and the accompanying liner in the matter at hand?

Hon. Brian Tobin (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for his question. The matter is important to Atlantic Canadians and obviously important to people right across the country, given the support the Reform Party has given to the government in pursuit of the conservation of the fishery.

• (1455)

It is extraordinary to see the Reform Party, the New Democratic Party—and I should acknowledge the Conservative Party—and the Leader of the Official Opposition endorse unanimously the conservation measure in the House on behalf of Canadians everywhere. It is a great moment for Canada. I acknowledge the support of the parties opposite.

However, let me in answering the question acknowledge the tremendous leadership of the greatest Prime Minister the country has ever had in standing up for the country.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, you want me to come right to the point and I shall.

The Speaker: Yes, I would like the minister to come precisely to the point.

Mr. Tobin: The significance of the 80–millimetre mesh is that it is some 15 millimetres smaller than the official NAFO approved mesh size for this species. Therefore the animals being caught in the mesh are far smaller. They are juveniles. They are immature. They are far smaller than what should be caught if we are to have a sustainable fishery.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

Mr. Bernard St–Laurent (Manicouagan, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour. After waiting for several months, the federal government has started distributing a working paper on future anti–scab legislation. The proposals in the working paper are unacceptable to workers, in several respects.

Will the minister agree not to interfere in union matters by requiring, for instance, that 60 per cent of union members must be in favour for anti–scab provisions to apply during a labour dispute?

Hon. Lucienne Robillard (Minister of Labour, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as you know, we are reviewing Part I of the Canada Labour Code, and the issue of replacement workers is on the table. We are now engaged in consultations with the various parties, both management and labour. I am prepared to listen to what the various parties have to say. Still, I do hope the member for the Bloc Quebecois is not against this kind of legislation.

TRADE

Mr. Charlie Penson (Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow two of Canada's trade negotiators will be in Washington to discuss the recent restrictions placed on Canadian sugar exports. The government has taken the position that GATT takes precedence over NAFTA. That is because we have imposed new tariffs as high as 350 per cent on butter and other supply managed products.

Does this not put us in a very difficult position when arguing against new U.S. tariffs on sugar?

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister for International Trade let me say that we are conducting these discussions with a very high regard for Canadian interests which will be defended in all aspects of the continuing discussions.

HEALTH

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Health. It concerns the budgetary betrayal of federal funding promises to B.C. and other provinces with a community action program for children or CAPC, a program for vulnerable and at risk children.

In view of the profound concerns of the B.C. Coalition for Children and the B.C. government arising from drastic cuts in funding for 1996 and beyond, how can the minister justify the decision to cut the deficit on the backs of poor and vulnerable children?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we are very concerned that children be treated equally and fairly.

The budget did not dramatically cut CAPC. It reduced the actual growth of the program. That program will be distributed equally across the country.

• (1500)

We also have other programs aimed at helping poor children in this country. One of them is the aboriginal head start program. We have the prenatal nutrition program and the brighter futures program. All of these programs come into play as well.

MULTIPLE SCLEROSIS

Mr. Dan McTeague (Ontario, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Health.

[English]

Fifteen thousand Canadians suffer from multiple sclerosis. In the U.S., the drug Betaseron has been used to treat MS for over a year. Betaseron is currently being reviewed by the health protection branch and can only be obtained under the emergency drug release program at a cost of over $17,000.

Can the minister provide information on when Betaseron will be made available to Canadian MS victims at a price they can afford?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am well aware of the needs of victims of multiple sclerosis.

Unfortunately, the manufacturers of Betaseron chose not to apply to have the drug approved here in Canada at the same time as they did in the U.S. When they did apply we fast tracked the approval of this drug. The price of this drug is quite high. It is under review at this time by the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board.

The Speaker: My colleagues, this brings to a conclusion our question period. I have a question of privilege from the hon. Leader of the Opposition.

PRIVILEGE

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER AND MINISTER OF THE ENVIRONMENT—SALVAGING OF THE IRVING WHALE

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the Minister of the Environment stated in this House, when she answered a question on the refloating of the Irving Whale, and I quote: "I just wanted to remind the hon. members that the first report proposing salvage measures was tabled in 1989 and rejected by the then Minister of the Environment".

Later on, she also said about the Irving Whale: "six years after the first report was presented to the former environment minister—the hon. member for Lac–Saint–Jean".

Mr. Speaker, the fact is that I resigned as environment minister in May 1990 and that the report mentioned by the minister was tabled in September 1990. Her statement is therefore totally false and inaccurate.

Mr. Young: But in any case, you did nothing.

Mr. Bouchard: I hear other ministers say that she was right to lie to the House.

Mr. Young: You did nothing when you were there.

The Speaker: My colleagues, I do not think I heard everything the hon. Leader of the Opposition said, but if the word "lie" was indeed used, I would urge the hon. Leader of the Opposition to reconsider the use of that word.

Mr. Bouchard: Mr. Speaker, I have reconsidered, and I gladly withdraw.

I would ask that, in that same spirit, the transport minister withdraw his remarks that the environment minister was right yesterday to twist the truth around.

Mr. Young: You did nothing.

Mr. Bouchard: It is not over yet.

Mr. Young: That is for sure.

The Speaker: Order. The hon. Leader of the Opposition has the floor.

Mr. Bouchard: Mr. Speaker, what happened yesterday is even more serious. It is so because I submit to the Chair that this inaccuracy was stated on purpose. The minister had the report in front of her at the time, and it indicates the date I just gave.

Moreover, the question was asked by one of her Liberal colleagues, the hon. member for Brome—Missisquoi, who, as a courteous man, certainly served notice of his question to the minister. She knew what to expect and she was able to prepare an answer.

A third point is even more serious than this. The minister altered the official report so that today, Hansard does not contain the words she used yesterday. According to Beauchesne, and more particularly citation 1117, no member is allowed to alter Hansard the way the minister did yesterday after the blues came out.

If you compare the blues and Hansard, you will notice that two substantive corrections were made, so that the words which were so injurious to me yesterday as a member of this House in front of the TV cameras and everybody, while the minister scored political points by heaping ridicule on me and making me look like an irresponsible minister, no longer appear in Hansard today. Therefore, those injurious remarks made publicly yesterday in this House, in front of the TV cameras, must be corrected today in a immediate public statement including apologies by the minister.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, given the gravity of the accusations of the hon. member, I would have thought he would at least have had the courtesy of serving me notice. Had he served me notice, I would have advised him as I did yesterday, as I did several months ago when I actually gave a copy of that particular report to the House. Unfortunately, his caucus I suppose did not advise him of it.

In fact, the Brander–Smith report to which I referred yesterday in the House was initiated by the Right Hon. Brian Mulroney when the hon. Leader of the Opposition was Minister of the Environment. There were several public hearings held while he was Minister of the Environment, including a public hearing that was held in Halifax, another public hearing that was held in Saint John and another public hearing held in Prince Edward Island, which specifically called on the Minister of the Environment in 1989 to act.

In fact, the minister did not act. He did not act; his predecessors did not act; his successors did not act. We acted within 100 days of coming to government.

I would have thought that rather than dragging out the issue—

—rather that resorting to petty politics, the Bloc Quebecois would have done better to recognize the fact that we have made a decision, a decision that neither the former environment minister, his predecessor, nor his successor made.

I will repeat in French so that he understands clearly. When he was environment minister, in 1989, three public hearings were held at which the refloating of the Irving Whale was advocated, and he did not respond. That is what I said in the House yesterday.

[English]

I will put my word on the line against his word any time.

The Speaker: My colleagues, the Chair always takes very, very seriously any question of privilege which is raised by any and all hon. members in this House.

We have heard allegations on one side and a rebuttal on the other. We are getting into debate, perhaps on a question of the interpretation of facts. With your permission, seeing that this has taken place over two days, I wonder if you will give me the time to review the blues as to what was said.

• (1510)

I will come back to the House as soon as I can to give a decision as to whether indeed any hon. member's privileges have been breached in this case. With the time to think about it a bit, I will bring back a decision as soon as possible. For this question of privilege at least at this time, I would like to take the information I have and consider it for a while.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

IMMIGRATION ENFORCEMENT IMPROVEMENT ACT

Mr. Janko Perić (Cambridge, Lib.) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–316, an act to amend the Immigration Act and the Transfer of Offenders Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to introduce my third private members' bill entitled the Immigration Enforcement Improvement Act.

My bill aims to improve the way in which the deportation of violent offenders is carried out. The proposed changes will enable a court in addition to any other sentence to order the removal of a non–citizen convicted of a serious criminal offence.

The bill does not apply to anyone who arrived in Canada before reaching 16 years of age, as long as that individual has been free of criminal convictions for a period of five years. The bill also provides for the removal of foreign offenders to host countries willing to accept them by court order.

I am pleased to announce that my bill has received the endorsement of the Canadian Police Association, Victims of Violence and CAVEAT. I would encourage all members of this House to support this important public safety initiative.

LABOUR

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I seek the unanimous consent of the House for the following motion.

I move:

That notwithstanding the usual practices and rules of the House, the government may immediately introduce and propose first reading of a bill entitled, "An act respecting the supervision of longshoring and related operations at west coast ports", and the said bill shall be disposed of as follows:

(1) Immediately after the completion of all items of business relating to ways and means this day, the House shall take up consideration of the second reading stage of the said bill.

(2) After being read a second time the bill shall be referred to a committee of the whole.

(3) Immediately after being reported from committee and concurred in at the report stage, the said bill shall be taken up at the third reading stage.

(4) The House shall not adjourn this day until the third reading stage of the said bill has been disposed of, but the House shall adjourn immediately after completing the third reading stage of the bill.

The Speaker: Does the hon. parliamentary secretary have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Speaker: Unanimous consent has not been granted.

PETITIONS

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Brent St. Denis (Algoma, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure to present petitions on behalf of constituents in the central Algoma area of my riding, from towns like Richards Landing, Bruce Mines, north of Sault Ste. Marie, Goulais River and Echo Bay. These constituents have expressed concerns about government plans to include sexual orientation in Canada's human rights legislation.

It is my pleasure to present these on their behalf.

Mr. Alex Shepherd (Durham, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to present a petition from 190 of my constituents. Their concern is the addition of the phrase sexual orientation either in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms or the Canadian Human Rights Act.

Mr. David Chatters (Athabasca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to present two petitions from my constituents.

The first petition requests that Parliament amend the Divorce Act, including the provision similar to article 611 of the Quebec civil code, which states:

In no case may a father or mother, without serious cause, place obstacles between the child and grandparents. Failing agreement between the parties, the modalities of the relations are settled by the court.

Further, they request an amendment to the Divorce Act that would give a grandparent who is granted access to a child the right to make inquiries and to be given information as to the health, education and welfare of the child.

INCOME TAX

Mr. David Chatters (Athabasca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the other petition asks that Parliament reduce government spending instead of increasing taxes.

I support the petitioners.

VOICE MAIL

Mr. Claude Bachand (Saint–Jean, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table petitions signed by senior citizens in my riding. Because these people are less experienced with new technology, they ask the government to abandon its plan to install voice mail.

[English]

JUSTICE

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops, NDP): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to present the first of many petitions organized by Nick Carter and others with the JC–55 Super Country Radio station in Kamloops.

The petition is signed by 14,000 people living mainly in the central interior of British Columbia. It calls for immediate changes to our justice system, including changes to the parole system to ensure that dangerous criminals not be allowed to return to our communities prematurely.

The bottom line is that they are seeking safety and security on our streets and in our neighbourhoods.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. David Iftody (Provencher, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions to present today on behalf of people from Ste. Anne, Steinbach, St. Jean Baptiste, Altona and Plum Coulee in my riding.

It states that whereas the majority of Canadians believe that the privileges which society accords to heterosexual couples should not be extended to same sex relationships, therefore, your petitioners pray and request that Parliament not amend the human rights code, the Canadian Human Rights Act or the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in any way which would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships.

• (1520)

Mr. David Iftody (Provencher, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have a second petition to present on behalf of other constituents in my riding.

It states that the concerned citizens of the province of Manitoba draw to the attention of the House that the proposed amendments to the firearms control legislation by the justice minister are unduly harsh and waste dwindling financial resources while attacking the rights of law-abiding citizens without affecting crime.

Therefore, the petitioners request that Parliament separate the provisions into two separate issues that Parliament may proceed to strengthen border controls and the criminal use of firearms, but not proceed with the proposed enhanced controls on legal ownership of firearms.

INCOME TAX

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have four petitions to present today. The first is from constituents in the beautiful city of Hedley, British Columbia. They realize that Canadians are already overburdened with taxation due to high government spending.

Therefore, the petitioners pray and request that Parliament reduce the federal deficit by reducing government spending and refrain from any form of increased taxation.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in the second petition the petitioners pray for two things: first, that Parliament ensure that the present provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada prohibiting assisted suicide be enforced vigorously; and second, that Parliament make no changes in the law that would sanction or allow the aiding or abetting or suicide or euthanasia.

CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the third petition concerns section 745 of the Criminal Code of Canada. Under this section the sentence of murderers convicted to life imprisonment without chance of parole for 25 years are able to apply for a review after 15 years.

The petitioners request that Parliament repeal section 745 of the Criminal Code of Canada.

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the fourth petition is regarding the current gun legislation before the House.

To date I have presented 3,010 signatures. These petitioners from Osoyoos, Oliver, Princeton and other areas in the Okanagan Valley oppose further legislation for firearms acquisition and possession and ask Parliament to provide strict guidelines and mandatory sentences for the use and possession of a firearm in the commission of a violent crime.

I concur with my petitioners.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Philip Mayfield (Cariboo—Chilcotin, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present to the House a petition containing over 100 signatures mainly from the city of Quesnel in my constituency of Cariboo—Chilcotin.

These petitioners request that Parliament ensure that the present provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada prohibiting assisted suicide be enforced vigorously and that Parliament make no changes in the law which would sanction or allow the aiding or abetting of suicide or active or passive euthanasia.

The petition is presented with my concurrence.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Philip Mayfield (Cariboo—Chilcotin, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have one more petition. I would like to present a petition signed by 134 constituents, again from the city of Quesnel and other areas of British Columbia.

These petitioners request that Parliament not amend the Canadian Human Rights Act or the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in any way which would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships or of homosexuality, including amending the Canadian Human Rights Act to include in the prohibited grounds of discrimination the undefined phrase sexual orientation.

This petition is also presented with my concurrence.

CHINESE HEAD TAX

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour of presenting two petitions today. The first is signed by petitioners from my constituency of Burnaby—Kingsway as well as other communities in British Columbia.

It calls on Parliament to support an all-party parliamentary resolution to acknowledge the injustice and racial discrimination inherent in the Chinese head tax—it was imposed from 1885 to 1923—and also in the Chinese immigration exclusion act which prohibited Chinese immigration from 1923 to 1947.

It calls on Parliament to recognize and compensate for the suffering of individual Chinese Canadians and the entire Chinese Canadian community that resulted from this legislated discrimination.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway, NDP): Mr. Speaker, the second petition is signed by hundreds of residents of Kamloops, the Fraser Valley, Burnaby—Kingsway, other communities throughout British Columbia and beyond.

It calls on Parliament to amend the Criminal Code to ensure the right of all Canadians to die with dignity, by allowing people with terminal or irreversible and debilitating illness the right to the assistance of a physician in ending their lives at a time of their choice, subject to strict safeguards to prevent abuse and to ensure the decision is free, informed, competent and voluntary.

• (1525)

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Tony Ianno (Trinity—Spadina, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to present a petition on behalf of some of my constituents of Trinity—Spadina.

The petitioners call on the Government of Canada to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act so as to protect individuals from discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation.

On behalf of my constituents, I humbly submit these petitions.

Mr. Ovid L. Jackson (Bruce—Grey, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have four petitions today from constituents in my riding of Bruce—Grey.

Two of the petitions request that Parliament not amend the human rights code and the Canadian Human Rights Act or Charter of Rights and Freedoms in any way that would indicate societal approval for same sex relationships or homosexuality, including amending the human rights code to include in the prohibited grounds of discrimination the defined phrase sexual orientation.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Ovid L. Jackson (Bruce—Grey, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the next petition requests that Parliament ensure that the present provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada prohibiting assisted suicide be enforced vigorously and that Parliament make no change in the law which would sanction or allow the aiding or abetting of suicide, or active or passive euthanasia.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Ovid L. Jackson (Bruce—Grey, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the fourth petition asks Parliament to extend protection to the unborn child by amending the Criminal Code to extend the same protection enjoyed by born human beings to unborn human beings.

INCOME TAX

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, just before the budget was brought down I presented petitions against tax increases from all over Canada signed by 20,431 people. Ever since the budget came down, more of these petitions have been pouring in.

Today 16,967 more petitioners, for a grand total of 38,297 people from all over Canada, 11,711 of them from my own constituency, together pray—and unlike some prayers this prayer may be in vain—that Parliament reduce spending instead of increasing taxes and implement a taxpayer protection act to limit federal spending as well.

I could not concur more strongly with all 39,000 petitioners.

The Speaker: I am told that eventually all prayers are answered.

JUSTICE

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise again to present another petition in this course of action undertaken by constituents who wish to halt the early release from prison of Robert Paul Thompson.

The petitioners I represent are concerned about making our streets safer for our citizens. They are opposed to the current practice of early release of violent offenders prior to serving the full extent of their sentences.

The petitioners pray that our streets will be made safer for law-abiding citizens and the families of the victims of convicted murderers.

SRI LANKA

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have been asked today to present two petitions to the House. The first petition is with regard to human rights violations in Sri Lanka.

The petitioners urge the Government of Canada to intervene immediately in the decade old national ethnic conflict in Sri Lanka with the view to: first, bring about an unconditional ceasefire, preferably verified by the United Nations; second, to bring the parties in the conflict to the negotiating table, preferably with United Nations mediation so that matters under dispute could be resolved satisfactorily and lasting peace achieved; and, third, to suspend forthwith all foreign aid and, if necessary, impose sanctions until cessation of hostilities and human rights violations.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition is with regard to the Young Offenders Act.

It calls on Parliament to amend the act: first, to lower the age limits which define a young offender to include only those children between the ages of 10 and 15; second, to increase the maximum penalty for first and second degree murder from 5 to 10 years, which has already been done by the government; and, third, to allow the publication of a young offender's name after a second serious offence, and any other changes necessary to ensure that the public interest as well as the needs of Canadian youth are addressed in a fair and balanced fashion.

HUMAN RIGHTS ACT

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to present three petitions today.

The first group of petitioners request that the Government of Canada not amend the Canadian Human Rights Act to include the phrase sexual orientation. The petitioners are troubled about not defining the phrase sexual orientation. They have a legitimate concern that such a broad term could include all kinds of sexual behaviour.

• (1530)

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition deals with the subject of Bill C–68, gun control. The petitioners state that the target for all gun control laws in the Criminal Code of Canada must be the criminals who are a danger to the public safety and not law–abiding, responsible firearm owners.

GOVERNMENT SPENDING

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre, Ref.): The third petition is very appropriate. It deals with budget '95.

It is quite timely. It was collected by small businessmen from my riding including Mr. Brent Stief, Mrs. Neillie Murray, Mr. Phil Walker, Mr. Arch Brown and Mr. Bill Schwartz.

The petitioners request that with Canadians already overburdened with taxation due to high government spending Parliament reduce government spending instead of increasing taxes and I wholeheartedly agree with all three petitions.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. John O'Reilly (Victoria—Haliburton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise and present three petitions today signed by people from West Guilford, Haliburton, Eagle Lake, Minden, Wilberforce and Tory Hill in the riding of Victoria—Haliburton.

They draw the attention of the House of Commons to gun control and ask Parliament not to pass any law that would prohibit the legitimate use of firearms.

A further petition concerns gun control and supports the present legislation before the House.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Rey D. Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present petitions on behalf of my constituents and the immediate neighbourhood of Winnipeg North.

The petitioners are concerned about physician assisted suicide and euthanasia, concerns that I share. They are concerned about the negative impact of such a move on families as well as loss of respect for human life and far reaching negative implications in society.

They therefore pray that Parliament continue to reject euthanasia and physician assisted suicide; that it continue to enforce section 241 of the Criminal Code prohibiting the commission of assisting suicide; and that it consider expanding palliative care accessible to all dying persons knowing that such care is compassionate and therefore will result in the relief of pain and suffering without the danger concomitant with assisted suicide.

GOVERNMENT SPENDING

Mrs. Diane Ablonczy (Calgary North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to join my colleague from Fraser Valley East in presenting a petition from nearly 1,000 people in my riding of Calgary North requesting that Parliament reduce government spending instead of increasing taxes and also that Parliament implement a taxpayer protection act to limit federal spending.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I have a brief point of order with respect to the presentation of petitions. I have noticed that a practice seems to have grown in the House of members' indicating their concurrence with particular petitions.

This is a matter of debate. I wonder whether the Speaker might provide some guidance to the House on this matter because the practice has been growing.

The Speaker: The hon. member raises a very valid point. As a general statement the Chair would not encourage whether a member concurs with the presentation of a specific petition brought to the floor.

I would encourage all hon. members to desist from saying whether they are for or against certain petitions.

I have been letting this go for some time. Hon. members will understand that sometimes hon. members are put into positions in which they do not really want to say whether they are for or against a petition but it is their duty to present petitions to the House.

The point of the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway is well taken and I would encourage all hon. members to desist saying whether there is concurrence or not.

LABOUR

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the work stoppage in west coast ports has dangerous implications for the economy of western Canada and therefore legislation is urgently required to reopen the ports.

Therefore I move, pursuant to Standing Order 53:

That the 48 hours notice be waived in order to permit the Minister of Labour immediately to introduce a bill entitled an act respecting the supervision of longshoring and related operations at west coast ports and,

That the House not adjourn this day except pursuant to a motion by a minister of the crown.

• (1535)

The Speaker: Will those members who object to the motion please rise in their places.

Fewer than 10 members have risen to object, pursuant to Standing Order 53(4) the motion is adopted.

WEST COAST PORTS OPERATIONS ACT, 1995

Hon. Lucienne Robillard (Minister of Labour, Lib.) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–74, an act respecting the supervision of longshoring and related operations at west coast ports.

(Motions deemed adopted, bill read the first time and printed.)

The Speaker: When shall the bill be read the second time?

Some hon. members: Later this day.

POINTS OF ORDER

STANDING ORDER 53

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I was looking at Standing Order 53, the provision under which the motion was presented to the House. I believe the motion presented is actually in contradiction of the intention of Standing Order 53.

Standing Order 53(3) says:

Proceedings on any such motion shall be subject to the following conditions:

(a) The Speaker may permit debate thereon for a period not exceeding one hour;

The intention of Standing Order 53, when it was passed by the House was not to allow debate to exceed one hour. The minister and government have proposed we ignore the intent of this regulation and continue debate until such time as a minister of the crown deems the day is over.

I believe this is specifically against the intention of the Standing Order. I would like the Chair to review this before we proceed any further along these lines.

• (1540)

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway, NDP): Mr. Speaker, as I understand the provisions of Standing Order 53, this is a matter of a very urgent nature in which the normal rules of the House are suspended.

In this instance clearly we are talking about overriding collective bargaining rights and moving directly to a bill. As I understand it, before the question is put on the motion, members of the House should at least be given an opportunity to be heard on whether this matter is of sufficient urgency to should proceed under the extraordinary provisions of Standing Order 53.

This is a very serious matter. I spoke with the president of the Longshoremen's Union Local 514, Doug Sigurdson. He indicated they are currently in conciliation on this matter. The government wants to short circuit the collective bargaining process and move directly.

If that is to happen, the Chair should allow members of this House the courtesy of being heard under the provisions of Standing Order 53. That was not done and I would appeal to the Speaker to reconsider his position and to give us an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, with the greatest respect, what has happened is perfectly proper.

On the motion the government introduced, there seem to be two points raised by the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway and the hon. member for Battlefords—Meadowlake. The points are separate and so I will try to deal with them separately.

The first one is that somehow the motion proposed extends the debate on this motion which has been disposed of by the House for more than an hour. That is not correct. The debate is over. No one who rose to debate the motion when the motion was put to the House.

The Chair put the motion to the House and everyone was sitting in their seats. I looked around to see if anyone was rising in debate and not a soul rose.

The hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway was glued to his seat. He did not want to debate this matter. Then he suddenly realized he made a mistake by not getting up.

The debate is over. The question has been put. There could have been a one–hour debate. The hon. member knows this. No member rose to speak. Therefore the question was put and disposed of by the House.

The motion simply allowed the introduction of the bill which has now been introduced to the House. It has received first reading in the House. We have an additional order that says the House may continue to sit this evening past the ordinary hour of adjournment until a minister of the crown moves adjournment.

That is all we have and that is the way the matter sits at the moment. Members should be content. We will see what develops in the course of the afternoon.

The Speaker: I wish I could say I am completely blameless in all of this. When I put the motion, I paused after the word "and". I did not see anyone rising in their place for debate.

It could be said that I should have called for debate. I did not but I understood that if there was going to be debate, hon. members would have risen at that time. That is why I went on to the second part of the motion. I put before you that I am sort of caught in a bind here. Perhaps I should have said the word debate, but I thought I waited long enough.

• (1545)

If an error has been made it surely has not been made by anyone but your Speaker. I do not know what the resolution of this should be. By the rules we have, the motion is deemed to have been adopted and carried and the matter cannot be re-opened.

I would hope hon. members would give enough leeway to the Chair. I wish I was blameless. I wish I had used the word debate. I understood that hon. members would rise if they wanted to debate, so in the absence of anyone rising I am going to rule in favour, that the motion is now carried. I am going to rule that the matter cannot be reopened. I am hoping for the understanding of hon. members. Perhaps you would give your Speaker a little leeway.

I do not want to prolong this. If the hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake has something to add, I know it is probably against the rules but I will hear him out.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I certainly understand the dilemma you are in because I face a similar dilemma at this end of the House. With all due respect, I believe you are aware that this is the first time in this Parliament the government has seen fit to utilize this section of the Standing Orders.

Therefore, when the minister rose to state that he was rising under section 53 of the Standing Orders, I immediately reached into my desk, pulled out the Standing Orders I have here, and was reading the Standing Orders as you were reading the motion.

It took me a couple of moments to realize that there was a debate on the motion itself. I like many members of the House take some time to understand the full implications of every standing order. With respect, I think it would have been appropriate had the word debate been used to prompt individual members to their feet should they have wished to debate the issue.

Having said that and understanding your position, Mr. Speaker, and given the nature of the debate, the fact that there is much information about the dispute the government is introducing legislation on, perhaps members may wish to reflect upon it.

I would ask for unanimous consent of the House to allow for this hour of debate to carry forward and therefore allow some of this to be discussed prior to putting the motion itself.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, consultation taking place at the moment on the issue to determine whether or not this would be advisable. If and when the House decides to revert to that, this would be no reflection upon the excellent ruling of Mr. Speaker. It would only be because of unanimous consent of the House to revert to that, should the House decide to do so.

While consultation is going on I reiterate for the Chair a further point. On reflection of the issue raised by the hon. member some moments ago, there seems to have been confusion about the fact that the motion as proposed by the minister discussed provision for the hour of adjournment tonight. That seems to have given way to some confusion between that and the one hour to debate the motion itself. I believe that was perhaps the cause of the confusion in the hon. member's mind.

Nevertheless, consultation having been achieved, I am pleased to report that we are prepared to consider unanimous consent.

• (1550)

An hon. member: No.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, on second reflection we will have to wait for that to happen.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, having done the negotiating, I think you would find, in light of what has happened, that we are quite prepared to ensure when the bill comes up for debate that time be permitted to the New Democratic Party to participate in the debate on the bill which otherwise might be jeopardized by some other arrangement.

I undertake to ensure in all negotiations about the debate on the bill that time be permitted to the NDP to participate in the debate. I think that will solve the problem. We need not reopen the issue.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, in light of what has taken place here, I think out of consideration we would accept the offer put forward by the hon. member.

However I wish to stress that the point of the intervention was that the use of the standing order in this case was not introduced properly either by the government or in our understanding of the ability to debate early.

We realize even in the event of the debate carrying on through the evening that New Democrats would likely have an opportunity to speak. However the problem that exists is that the legislation the government is bringing forward, which the government is scheduling to pass this evening, may not be necessary given what is happening on the west coast. Therefore we should debate that process prior to debating the motion itself.

The Speaker: The dilemma that we face in the House seems to have at least a reasonable chance to be resolved without reverting in any way.

The hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake has made his point clear. I personally thank him for his understanding. I probably should have said the word debate. I assure him that the next time I will use the word debate.

My ruling would be that the motion is carried. I want to put the matter to one side, understanding of course the agreement of the governing party that hon. members will have a chance to fully participate in the debate. It would seem that there is unanimous agreement. Is there unanimous agreement?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Speaker: I thank hon. members for their help.

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the hon. member for Wild Rose, requested that you consider an emergency debate tonight on the very issue that will be dealt with in the bill. That confirms the feelings of the hon. member that it is a very serious matter which needed to be discussed by the House.

In light of recent developments the hon. member should withdraw the request. It seems redundant to ask for an emergency debate when we will actually be dealing with the legislation we called for yesterday in the House.

The Speaker: I thank the hon. House leader of the Reform Party. I am sorry I will not be able to hear my hon. friend for Wild Rose. I was looking forward to hearing what he was going to say to the House.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers be allowed to stand.

The Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from March 14 consideration of the motion that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

• (1555)

Hon. Ethel Blondin–Andrew (Secretary of State (Training and Youth), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to rise in the House to speak today on a matter of great importance to the economic and social future of the country, namely the budget presented by the Minister of Finance two weeks ago.

In order to fully understand the measures taken by the Minister of Finance, it is useful to recall the fiscal and economic reality that confronted us upon taking power just 16 months ago. Unemployment and interest rates were high. Corporate profitability had plummeted. Business failures were at record levels. Many Canadians had quite literally lost hope. We were confronted with a huge national debt and growing deficit that threatened our economic and social futures.

It was a daunting challenge. However we tackled it head on and made job creation, economic growth and fiscal responsibility our top priorities.

[Translation]

The Speaker: My colleagues, if you have some things to discuss, I would ask you to do it behind the curtains. I now give the floor back to the Secretary of State.

[English]

Ms. Blondin–Andrew: I thank hon. gentlemen on the other side for observing the decorum accorded each speaker on such an important issue as the budget debate. I hope I did not lose any time.

We tackled the issues head on and made job creation, economic growth and fiscal responsibility our top priorities. The new budget is the latest step in our ongoing drive to restore Canada's fiscal health and reinforce investor confidence. When completed this drive will make Canada a magnet for investment, which will in turn encourage economic growth and create the jobs and training opportunities Canadians need to cope with the technological revolution under way.

The measures announced by the government on budget day were more than a cost cutting exercise. They represent a major restructuring that will redefine the way government operates and what role government will play in people's daily lives. The budget represents a basic restructuring of Canadian society as a whole.

As the Minister of Finance stated in his budget speech, government must only do what it does best and leave the rest for those who can do it better. This presents Canadians with an incredible opportunity to step forward and have a direct impact on the way their lives are shaped and the way their communities develop.

As we debate the merits of the budget today and the necessary actions the government must take to get its fiscal house in order, we must remember we are not in a unique position in Canada. Other countries have waited too long before taking adequate measures and have in a sense hit the wall, while others have taken strong and affirmative actions and as a result have positioned their economies to compete aggressively in the new global marketplace.

We can learn a lot from those examples. New Zealand is a case in point of a country that found itself with debt and deficit that became too large for its economy to sustain. Over the course of the past eight years New Zealand has gone through a dramatic and painful restructuring that saw whole government programs cut, eliminated or commercialized, user fees introduced for many aspects of government services, and the introduction of new tax measures such as the GST.

As a result of these measures New Zealand has drastically restructured its government and improved its fiscal health to the point where it posted a deficit of 1 per cent surplus of deficit to GDP ratio. However the painful lesson learned by New Zealanders and one we must not ignore is what happens when we wait too long to take these measures and what happens when we essentially hit the wall. When this happens countries quickly discover that decisions on social spending are no longer theirs to make but instead made for them by investors and international agencies.

• (1600)

Sweden, a country that has been long looked at as a successful model of society with a highly successful social safety net is on the verge of hitting the wall. In 1994 Sweden's debt to GDP ratio was an alarming 93 per cent while its deficit to GDP ratio was at 11.2 per cent. The year before, Sweden's deficit to GDP ratio was at an all–time high of 13 per cent.

The government there is facing enormous obstacles to overcome and put its fiscal house in order. Because Sweden has waited so long to restructure how its government operates, the very social programs that are the envy of the world are threatened simply because it has lost many of its options to manoeuvre.

This is a situation we must avoid in Canada. On the other hand, there are shining examples of countries that have identified the need to reform before it is too late.

Australia has taken a systematic and measured approach to restructuring how its government operates. It has been done in a way that not only brings down the expenses of government but also makes its programs more efficient, more effective and more relevant to the people who really need help and support. In 1994 Australia posted a 34.4 per cent debt to GDP ratio and a deficit to GDP ratio of 4 per cent.

That is why we have to act now. Our debt to GDP ratio has consistently been rising from 17 per cent in the mid–1970s to more than 71 per cent today. In order to ensure that we remain the masters of our own destiny, of our own ship, we must change. We must adapt.

Last year the government spent nearly $58 billion on social programs. During that same period $38 billion went to pay for interest on the public debt. If we do not get our fiscal house in order now, these interest payments on the debt will be greater than what we spend on social programs. If unchecked, we as other countries have, will hit the wall.

That is what this budget is all about. It is a major step in restructuring the government so that it can give us the kind of strong foundation we need upon which we can build strong social reforms which truly reflect and address the needs and priorities of Canadians in the 1990s.

Initiatives contained in the budget actually support Canada's social policies by creating an economic and fiscal climate conducive to job creation. This budget reflects the sense of balance expressed by a man from the Northwest Territories who responded to the social security reform workbook. He said: "There must be a basic safety net for those who, for whatever reason, are unable to provide the encouragement and the opportunity for people to become self–sufficient".

Some people have been concerned about how the budget might affect Canada's social programs. This is not surprising given the vast amount of speculation and misinformation which surfaced prior to the release of the budget. No doubt most of this has now been laid to rest by the budget.

For those who might still have some lingering doubts, the best evidence of the government's unwaivering commitment to protecting our social programs comes from the social security reform initiative currently under way.

This initiative seeks to improve our current system by helping Canadians respond to technological and workplace change. It seeks to assure them of the jobs training and security they require. It does this by improving the efficiency of the system, thus guaranteeing its sustainability in the future.

At the same time, our government has no intention of waiting for the benefits that will flow from this budget and social security reform. Instead, we are acting now to ensure that all Canadians have the job and training opportunities they need to enter the mainstream of this country.

Here I think especially of those programs directed toward some of the neediest people in this country, the aboriginal people who have traditionally faced barriers to obtaining access to employment, training and promotions.

• (1605)

Pathways is a program designed for aboriginal people by aboriginal people in partnership with the Government of Canada. It is currently being reviewed to ensure it continues to reflect the needs of the aboriginal people in labour market training.

In addition, the new Canada social transfer, CST, will not affect aboriginal peoples living on reserves since there is no relationship between the CST and funding arrangements for social assistance and services delivered on reserves. This is because the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development provides funding on reserves through arrangements that are separate from the current Canada assistance plan. These arrangements will continue to be separate from the CST.

As well, the CST will not alter the existing responsibilities of the provinces for social assistance services to aboriginal peoples living off reserve. This goes for the government's program review as well.

While the program review will affect all aspects of government operations, the government is committed to providing programs and services to aboriginal peoples. We will continue to live up to our commitments in such areas as human resources development, aboriginal strategic initiatives, First Nations and northern communities child care and the pathways strategy which I mentioned earlier.

In preparing for the budget the government used a series of overarching principles to guide its course.

First, it was critical that government get its own house in order. The budget must focus on cutting spending, not raising taxes.

Second, every dollar counts. Governments do not have money. They are given money and with it they must act like every dollar counts because every dollar does count.

Third, it had to be fair and equitable, fair among our regions and fair among individual Canadians. In this essence the north has not been spared in the budget, but has shared equally and responsibly its burden of fiscal restraint.

As an example, the territorial formula financing payments to the Government of the Northwest Territories will be frozen in 1995–96 and reduced by 5 per cent in 1996–97. This will result in $8 million less in the first year and $58 million less in the second year. It should be noted that the majority of the population of the north is aboriginal.

Weather offices will close in Yellowknife and Inuvik, eliminating seven positions. There too, a bit of innovation and imagination is needed. It opens up an opportunity perhaps for the private sector to look at the possibility of offering this kind of service, maybe in partnership with learning institutions to train the individuals necessary to provide that service.

The Geological Survey of Canada office in Yellowknife will close. Considering the amount of activity in that area with diamond exploration, gold and a whole array of mineral exploration going on, it has been difficult to do that, but I think there is a commitment from the industry itself to pursue interests in that area. It is something we are living with.

The Canada–N.W.T. forestry co–operation agreement will not be renewed when it expires on March 31. The federal excise tax on gasoline and aviation gasoline increased by 1.5 cents, increasing the price of goods and travel in the north. We already have prohibitive costs since for the most part the first choice and option for travel is by air. We do not have a highway system. Most of the isolated communities are off the transportation grid.

The tax on airline travel increased by $5 per flight from $50 to $55, increasing the cost of air travel which is so important to northerners. We do not have the luxury of just getting into our cars or vehicles and driving out onto the highway. The highways we do have are in need of repair and are being repaired constantly by the Government of the Northwest Territories with ever depleting resources.

It shows, that every part of the country was affected, including that part of the country. It is the whole effort of getting back to basics. People are taking another look at how they do business, how government runs its administration, its bureaucracy and delivers services.

• (1610)

The elimination of the public utilities income tax transfer is not just a problem for Alberta or some of the other provinces. It is a problem for different communities in my area. It will mean the elimination of $700,000 in transfers to consumers of private utility companies.

This is a very hard pill to swallow. In this country we have a partnership with individual Canadians to get our house in order and this is what this is all about.

As difficult and painful as it is, cuts in budgets and programs to aboriginal friendship centres will affect how the friendship centres in the north operate and deliver their programs. However, northerners are resilient people. Like every Canadian, they recognize the importance of getting our fiscal house in order.

Northerners also see opportunity in this budget. Occasions like this one when new arrangements are to be forged and new relationships to be established create positive opportunities for the territorial government to have greater flexibility and for northerners to have a greater say in developing and administering the programs and services which address their needs.

This is an excellent opportunity to see the successful completion of the northern mineral accord. This can give the territorial government along with its other partners the aboriginal groups greater responsibility and autonomy over the economy and fiscal situation in the north. Greater autonomy also means greater flexibility over the programs and services required to meet the needs of northerners.

Every part of this country wants to become self–sustaining and the Northwest Territories is no different with all of its complex diversity of cultures. Its population is not just one race or one group of people, but it is a whole mix of people. Greater autonomy also means there is greater opportunity for co–operation, for consensus building and a whole range of human dynamics that must be considered.

Restructuring through program review, the territorial transfer or the CST also presents the opportunity for constructive dialogue in a process that is inclusive. It is a process which gives a greater voice to all stakeholders and not just government, including community leaders, activists, social workers, youth organizations. It is a comprehensive and inclusive process. It is an opportunity that can lead to greater independence from government, to become increasingly self–sufficient and self–empowering, to become masters of their own destiny and masters of their own ship.

The fourth principle used by the Minister of Finance is that we must have priorities as a country that mirror our needs as a people. These priorities must be reflected in the way government defines its role. It is that principle I would like to expand on and what this will mean on how government will operate in the future, but more important, on what role government will play in the lives of people.

In order to ensure that the needs of Canadians are met, to ensure that programs and services remain relevant and to ensure our continuing economic sovereignty, the budget measures also included a major restructuring of government through program review. Its main objective was to review all categories of federal government spending in order to bring about the most effective and cost efficient way of delivering programs and services to Canadians.

The exercise of program review is not simply a way of bringing down how much government costs. It also makes government more competent and more relevant to the people who really need help and support.

It is time for government to get back to the basics and to reflect the priorities of people. As the Minister of Finance stated in his budget address: "We are acting on the new vision of the role of government in the economy and in society. In many cases that means smaller government. In all cases, it means smarter government".

This government restructuring will have implications on what role government will play in the daily lives of people. To a certain degree government restructuring also means a restructuring of society, and that is where the real opportunity lies in the budget. As government gets back to the basics there are opportunities for Canadians to step forward, to rethink and redefine their values and responsibilities to themselves, their families and their communities.

• (1615)

Governments do not have all the answers and solutions. In redefining its role in Canadian society, the government will need people to step forward and share the burden of responsibility. Where governments have failed in the past, individual Canadians will have to stand up, play positive roles and contribute not only their knowledge but local solutions to local problems and also their sweat equity, their sweat, blood, and tears, to ensure success.

The government is calling on Canadians to participate and to be part of a process that is going to set the future straight for years and generations to come, to ensure a future for our children. This commitment will need to be ongoing even with restructuring; government can only go so far.

I conclude by saying that in the end active participation is the ultimate challenge of the budget. It is a challenge and a responsibility not only to members of the government and members of the House, but to every person in the country.

As the Prime Minister stated, the key—

The Deputy Speaker: I have given the minister extra time already. I am sorry, her time has expired, unless there is unanimous consent that she be given more time.

Some hon. members: No.

[Translation]

Mr. René Canuel (Matapédia—Matane, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I listened attentively to my colleague's speech. The problems she described in her region sound pretty similar to those in mine, except that the solutions she offers are almost unacceptable, and I will tell you why.

If I understood correctly, she is telling the poor, people with major problems, the unemployed, people on UI and income security that they must show more imagination and initiative.

I also heard the other day one of her colleagues on the other side of this House say that a former member of Parliament who has been without a job for eight years is having a very hard time finding work even though he is well–known. Yet, he is not lacking in either imagination or initiative.

Whenever the poor—whether it is a single person, a couple or a family with a father, mother and four children—are unemployed, they are asked to show initiative and imagination. Yet, when a person whose salary was much higher has trouble finding another job, we commiserate.

The budget may also hit seniors next year. In my region, farmers face cuts of 15 per cent this year and 15 per cent next year for a total of 30 per cent, which represents about $2,500 a year for the average farmer. This leads me to ask my colleague if we are looking for revenue in the right places or if we simply get the money from the pockets of the most disadvantaged and the poorest.

My colleague did not say that these people were lazy, but she said that they should show more imagination and initiative. Seventy–five per cent of the time, they are full of imagination and initiative, but they are still without jobs. I would like her to explain this to me.

• (1620)

[English]

Ms. Blondin–Andrew: Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell my colleague that anything I said certainly was not prejudicial to the people who are poor or people in different wage categories. We understand we have equality of opportunity. Everyone has the opportunity to participate. Everyone has the opportunity of freedom of speech, to be mobile, to move, to look for the opportunities. Sometimes it is more difficult. I agree that can be a problem.

When I talked about innovation I was not just talking about the consumers of government programs or people looking for jobs. I was talking about all sectors of society. It is a process where government will participate but sometimes people or organizations can do it better so we will defer to them because it will be more cost efficient and more effective.

As for opportunities for people, we cannot step back and be ashamed of the fact that we have managed to create 400,000 jobs. One hundred thousand of those were directly related to government initiatives. Many of those jobs were in Quebec. We are not ashamed of that. We are quite happy to recognize that and affirm that we have a commitment to continue helping people.

It is not just government's responsibility. People want us to change the way in which government works so that they will have the opportunity to be active participants rather than to have a passive role. They are dying for the opportunities. We want to make those available to them.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP): Mr. Speaker, in the remarks of the Secretary of State for Training and Youth she commented quite extensively about programs for aboriginal people and the ability of aboriginal people to participate in our economy as a result of budgetary measures.

She mentioned a number of programs but I notice she did not mention the aboriginal economic development program, something that is absolutely essential to provide assistance to aboriginal people who have difficulty in achieving financial commitments from existing financial institutions to develop the economic means by which to create self–sufficiency within their own communities.

The aboriginal economic development program, just when it is needed most, has received a more than unfair reduction in commitment from the federal government, a reduction of approximately 30 per cent as I understand it.

I wonder if the secretary of state could comment on the need for the aboriginal business development program and what her thoughts are about this unfair cut or reduction in federal commitment to that program.

Ms. Blondin–Andrew: Mr. Speaker, I was not speaking just to aboriginal issues. I was speaking to those within the department that I work in. I was not speaking to the ones in the Department of Indian and Northern Affairs or Industry. I am not ashamed to speak to those issues. I am not afraid and I am not reluctant. I just did not mention it.

There was a 25 per cent cut. Part of the effort in the program review and looking at the way we deliver services to people is to make these programs more efficient, more effective, more directly related to delivering services to the individuals, to the people they serve rather than developing an administrative bureaucracy which would tend to serve the industry itself rather than its clients.

Yes, we have made cuts. I just finished saying in my speech that every Canadian is going to share the responsibility in this exercise. I know. I am no stranger to the poverty of those people. Those are my people. I understand that.

Every Canadian is going to share the responsibility. Let us weigh things fairly. The Department of Indian and Northern Affairs which serves aboriginal people was the only department that has an $8 billion budget that is going to have an increase of I believe 6 per cent when all other departments were cut.

• (1625)

I acknowledge that there have been cuts to some aboriginal programs but there have been cuts to almost every program and service across the board in every department and crown corporation.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean H. Leroux (Shefford, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I will share my time with my Bloc colleague, the hon. member for Matapédia—Matane.

The Minister of Finance tabled his budget on Monday, February 27. I rise today in this House to state my position, my concerns and my disappointment in reading this budget. I will also share with you my personal analysis of the negative impact this budget will have on the participation rate of Quebecers in the Department of National Defence. While this budget is well received by the business community in general, and foreign investors in particular, the fact remains that once again low and middle income taxpayers are the hardest hit.

The government wants us to believe that Canadians from every walk of life, including the wealthiest, are affected by its budget cuts, but there is a world of difference between the finance minister's claims and actual fact. The fact of the matter is that the wealthy have until 1999 to convert their family trusts, to shield them from the minister's cuts and not pay any tax on their accumulated and future wealth. Also, the Liberal budget completely ignores the recommendations made by the Auditor General of Canada in his last report which made reference to $6.6 billion in unpaid taxes. The federal government does not propose anything to recover that money.

How can the government pass up so much money without immediately taking the necessary measures? Is $6.6 billion not enough money to spur it to take concrete and effective action?

Let me give you another example which illustrates the inconsistency of the budget and fiscal strategy announced at the end of February by the minister, and which shows that the minister's goal of tax fairness is merely an illusion. This example is also taken from the Auditor General's report: In Revenue Canada's opinion, 470 accounts of over $100,000 each, representing a total of $350 million, were at the collection letter stage, which means that no collection officer was involved, except in terms of reviewing the risk of loss.

By not taking action in this specific case, the Liberal government is sending the message that it is easier to get the money from low and middle income taxpayers, than from corporations or wealthy individuals who do not pay their fair share. This system is supposed to be fair, but who profits from it?

In my opinion, the 1995–1996 budget plan includes other examples of unfairness. Take a look at the summary of the Main Estimates, by department and agencies. Two thirds of the departments and agencies will see their budget reduced, while the other third will be getting more money.

Who will get an increase in 1995–96? The Senate, with a total budget of more than $42 million; the Governor General, with a budget of over $10 million; the Department of Indian Affairs, with an increase of $327 million; Treasury Board, an increase of $32 million; Finance, an increase of more than $9 billion, $9 billion to service the debt; the Privy Council, which is responsible for defending the "no" side in the Quebec referendum, will have an increase of nearly $5 million; and the list goes on.

And even worse, the federal government's total estimates will increase by more than $3.7 billion, which will bring total spending up to $164.8 billion. Incredible. With a deficit of $37.4 billion for 1994–95 and a projected deficit of more than $32.7 billion for 1995–96, we are sinking deeper and deeper into the hole.

By the end of the current fiscal year, the net federal debt will be $578.8 billion. Incredible. The federal government's present financial situation is a reflection of what the future has in store. Furthermore, the budget brought down by the Minister of Finance contains no prospects for jobs in the short and medium term. Where are the jobs we were promised in the Liberal red book? Ask the federal public servants who believed those promises.

The steps taken by the federal government to put this budget together fall far short of the expectations of taxpayers in Quebec and Canada. These measures are an outright breach of our social contract.

Now for a few words about the Department of National Defence. The budget announced cuts totalling $1.6 billion over three years. The Bloc Quebecois, in the minority report of the Special Joint Committee on Canada's Defence Policy, insisted on additional cuts of 15 per cent, which would put the National Defence budget at $10 billion as of the first year.

I question the federal government's strategy, since additional cuts could have been made in certain budget items in the Department of National Defence, including capital expenditures, materiel and new equipment purchasing policy, the armed forces organization and, finally, program management.

For the same three year period, the Bloc Quebecois proposed cuts of $4.8 billion—three times the government's figure. Unfortunately, the federal government preferred to slash transfer payments to the provinces and cut the federal public service this year.

In this regard, I would like to recall the commitment the Liberal Party of Canada made in its famous red book, which it did not keep. It said that, once in power, it would set up a defence conversion program that would have attractive spinoffs for private enterprise. This was their promise.

What did the budget say about defence industry conversion? Not one word—nothing. For the past 15 years, the federal government and the Department of National Defence have failed in their role of equitable allocators of military expenditures for Quebec.

In a study for the École nationale d'administration publique, made public in February, the author revealed a shortfall of $650 million a year for Quebec.

The situation is very clear. Unfair treatment in the allocation of military expenditures has had disastrous consequences for a number of areas of economic activity in Quebec. Although Quebec contributes 25.4 per cent of the budget for national defence, it gets back a meagre 17 per cent in military spending. It has been the same old story for the last 15 years. This very unfavourable distribution continues to cost Quebec jobs and investment dollars.

Quebec is even worse off when it comes to the funds that the Department of National Defence allocates for research and development.

• (1635)

In 1990–91, Quebec received only 12.45 per cent of this spending—12.45 compared with the 73 per cent that went to Ontario. The situation has not changed since then. In addition, francophones have great difficulty rising through the ranks of the Canadian armed forces. While francophones occupy between 22 and 29 per cent of the lower–ranking positions, they occupy only 10 to 13 per cent of the higher ranks, according to the latest statistics. It is not difficult for francophones to enlist in the forces, but it is very difficult for them to become generals. It always has been and still is.

In 1994, the Minister of National Defence took away the country's only French–language military college, the military college in Saint–Jean. What a decision! Once again, the federal Minister of Finance is asking Quebec to do its share in his budget. The government is closing the military base at Saint–Hubert. Over 600 people will lose their jobs. It is cutting another 285 jobs on the Bagotville base. Before the cuts, less than 15 per cent of all federal military facilities were located in Quebec. What is left? Not much.

What should we tell taxpayers in Quebec who feel that the federal government costs them too much money for the return they get on their investment? If Quebec were to patriate the power to tax and to spend—about $30 billion is in question here—we would be able to set up a system which really is fair and we would make our own decisions. That is how Quebec will best be able to develop and grow.

[English]

Mr. John Bryden (Hamilton—Wentworth, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for his remarks. They were spoken with such passion they left me almost breathless.

I would like to put a question to my colleague which will take him a little beyond his remarks. It is probably well known to him as it is to many members in this House that I have an interest in special interest groups.

The budget did introduce for the first time the concept that new guidelines would be brought in for the funding of these special interest groups which receive direct grants from government with very little accountability for what are often advocacy groups.

Does he feel this is an area of reform for the government applicable to Quebec? Should groups which have these special agendas see their funding cut as we hope to see elsewhere in the country?

[Translation]

Mr. Leroux (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank my colleague for his question. All I can say is that if we look at the budget as a whole, the federal government faced a $37 billion or $38 billion deficit last year, compared with a $33 billion deficit forecast for this year. The government is saving money on the backs of the provinces. Since the provinces will have less money, they will have to cut spending for post–secondary education, health care and other services under provincial jurisdiction. That, in my opinion, is tragic.

I would also like to go back to the closure of the military college in Saint–Jean. I think that this is an appalling decision. It is appalling for Canada, because Canada has always maintained that it is a bilingual country and tried to give that impression. However, by closing the military college in Saint–Jean—as we can see, enrolment is already way down, a drop of 40 to 60 per cent this year—the government is simply telling us that, at the end of the day, bilingualism is not important.

• (1640)

Mr. René Canuel (Matapédia—Matane, BQ): Mr. Speaker, on February 27, the Minister of Finance tabled his budget in this House. This event extensively covered by the media was preceded by a fear–mongering effort to scare the public. They said the budget would hurt all taxpayers, but they did not tell us the most important part.

And that is that the creditors to whom the Canadian debt is owed wanted to make sure Canada would be able to pay the interest on its debt in the years to come. That is what the problem was. It was also most important to let it be known that the federal government was waiting until after the Quebec referendum to make major cuts, once again deceiving the people.

When I was first elected to this place by the residents of the riding of Matapédia—Matane, I was sure I was coming here to serve the interests of my region and that is what I have been doing ever since: serving the interests of my fellow citizens. But since February 27, I have had to admit that it is not really the hon. members and ministers opposite who run the country, but rather big financial players.

What are the ministers and members across the way doing here if they let their Minister of Finance table a budget like this without saying a word? I must admit that certain members did stand up and denounce this budget and I am proud of them. I only wish others would follow suit.

What power do these members and ministers have in this House? I hope they are not mere puppets. When the creditors of a country tell its finance minister what to do, it means that the country has lost its monetary and financial independence.

Who has led us into that tunnel? None other than the Prime Minister, when he was the Minister of Finance. The process started with him. That farce shows a serious lack of respect for Canadian taxpayers, particularly those from Quebec, for whom the big cuts will come after the referendum.

Why not tell the people the truth? Why not tell them now what they are in for? Stop hiding your despicable and partisan goals. The Minister of Finance's action lacks any consistency and is a monumental hoax. I can tell the minister that Quebecers will remember him and his party on referendum day. My constituents in the riding of Matapédia—Matane will not be fooled.

The federal budget will hit them very hard. Let me give you a few examples. There will be cuts at the Maurice Lamontagne Institute, in Sainte–Flavie, in the Supply and Services division in Matane, and in the offices of the Department of Human Resources Development; fishermen will be hurt by the service charge in fishing ports and harbours; cuts will also affect farmers and milk producers; finally, there will be a gas tax increase, in a region where gas is already more expensive than elsewhere. Last year, Rimouski residents blocked a road in an attempt to have the price of gas go down. It did go down one cent, but now it is going up one and a half cents.

Since the budget was tabled, the only ones to speak in favour of the government's strategy were the creditors, and even they had mixed feelings about it.

• (1645)

A few days later, we were again faced with rising interest rates and a falling dollar on financial markets, a quick response to the minister's budget.

Blaming Quebec for this country's financial situation shows an unprecedented lack of logic. If Quebec were to blame, would members opposite not tell us to become sovereign as fast as possible?

The impact of this budget will be shocking, and pretty soon the minister will tell this House he can no longer control the deficit or stop the growth of the debt.

In the days following the budget, we saw that Canada's provinces, including Quebec, rejected the minister's vision, and today, everyone openly condemns that vision, especially Ontario.

And now for a closer look at the disastrous impact this budget will have, starting with the catastrophic impact the spiralling federal debt will have on job creation and corporate investment.

For people who do not have a job and those who will be affected by unemployment insurance cuts, the future is very bleak. Because of the poor economic climate, consumers will spend less, and businesses will postpone investment projects because of the high cost of borrowing.

It is clear that this government, which promised hundreds of thousands of jobs, has missed its target by a mile. It misled everyone. I would say it practically lied to the entire population. It has turned its back on its commitments.

In addition to letting the debt grow at an alarming rate—everyone is saying it will reach $603 billion in 1996—the government has just cut 45,000 jobs in the Canadian public service. This government is now producing unemployment instead of encouraging job creation. How many of these government employees will join the ranks of the unemployed? And there are hundreds of indirect jobs that will disappear in the process.

In the outlying regions, these job losses will have a disastrous impact on an economy already weakened by a recession that is still smouldering.

The government has just created a feeling of uncertainly, which will have very serious repercussions on the performance of the public service as a whole and on other related areas of activity.

There is nothing in this budget for the 800,000 unemployed and people looking for work in Quebec. On the contrary. Fortunately, the Government of Quebec knows how to create jobs.

The only good federal program is the infrastructure program, and it is being cut by $200 million.

We are all aware that Canada's debt has mortgaged the country's future. Quebecers have made this point repeatedly. At the hearings on the future of Quebec, everyone where I come from fears the worst, because it is clear that the ship is leaking and the captain has abandoned his duties. The people of Quebec will give a clear response to this government in the upcoming referendum, and neither fear nor threats will change the course of history. After the victory of the "yes" votes, the other provinces will have to decide what sort of country they want. I am sure that others will want to follow the road the people of Quebec are preparing to take.

In concluding, I would say: Long live Canada without Quebec, and long live Quebec without Canada.

• (1650)

The Deputy Speaker: It seems that I must split the time. First, the hon. member for Durham.

[English]

Mr. Alex Shepherd (Durham, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to my colleague's comments. Every time we get into this debate somehow Quebec seems to be a very interesting place with no debt problems but a simple examination of its financial record indicates quite the reverse. I believe the province of Quebec's deficit is currently about $70 billion. This was done in Quebec by Quebecers. It continues to expand and if my memory serves me correctly, it is probably expanding a lot faster than the federal government's deficit.

While the leader of the Government of Quebec is out talking about sovereignty, he is not dealing with the very problems of his own province. It costs $5 million for a sovereignty debate that nobody wants. This is irresponsible. I do not believe the people of Quebec are going to be happy with this expenditure or with the continual pushing of Quebec into a deficit situation.

Bonds are a big financer of government debt. Quebec government rated bonds continue to escalate their interest costs. Why? Because people have many misgivings about where this is going.

The hon. member talked about job creation. Job creation and job losses are an absolute. They must be netted together. Sure, there will be job losses in the civil service. Everybody in Canada, including Quebecers, have said how necessary it is that governments downsize and become more efficient.

I have heard my colleagues from the Bloc say those very things. Stop duplication. When the government stops duplication they say: "You should not lay these people off". The reality is that 433,000 new jobs were created in Canada last year, net job creation. That is positive and it includes Quebec.

Finally, $78 billion of the federal government debt is held by Quebecers. They believe in Canada, but what is their future with this crazy concept they have? How are they going to get reimbursed in this strange emulation of a new country? There is $78 billion that Quebecers hold in Canada.

I would like to have the hon. member answer those questions.

[Translation]

Mr. Canuel: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for his question. You talk about duplication. I want to know what duplication has been eliminated over the past few years. None.

Another point. I agree that Quebec has a high debt. However, for years and years, decades and decades, the federal government has been transferring money to Ontario and to other provinces for research and development, while the money it has been transferring to Quebec has been in the form of unemployment insurance benefits. One thing is sure: when one region is without work while research funds are sent to another, there is something wrong.

Regarding sovereignty, I want to say that even though our debt is high, we can handle it, and that we are prepared to pay part of Canada's debt, because we are part of it and we have a moral obligation to do so. If I were on the other side of the House, a government member from Ontario, the maritimes or the west, do you know what I would say to the Bloc? I would say: "If you want to leave, go".

Why try holding us back? Why tire yourselves out in the effort? We are convinced, I am convinced that we are able to manage our debt intelligently and at the same time help to pay off yours.

• (1655)

Then what more do you want? I, myself, have never understood why the rest of Canada is saying: "Why not you stay with us. This is terrible. It is going to cost you". We are going to spend a few million dollars on the referendum. But how much are you going to spend? I rephrase my question. If we are so poor and have so many problems, why are you so desperate to keep us in the federation?

[English]

Ms. Susan Whelan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to inform the House that I will be sharing my time with the hon. member for Davenport.

Many Canadians are concerned with Canada's future prosperity and with maintaining our quality of life. The finance minister's February 27 budget is a key element in maintaining prosperity and Canada's way of life.

The budget is a plan that will bring this country into the 21st century. It demonstrates our commitment to reshaping government to meet the needs of Canadians and to deliver on our promise to get our fiscal house in order. It supports our primary economic objective to sustain growth and job creation by cutting our deficit. It demonstrates our commitment to fiscally responsible government.

I will not make any bones about it; I believe that the budget is tough, very tough, but fair. The budget is tough but fair both in what it does but also in what it does not do.

Like many members of Parliament, I took advantage of the finance minister's opening up of the budget process. The government held the widest and most open prebudget consultations ever held. To ensure that my constituents had their say, I held two prebudget meetings in my riding of Essex—Windsor. The actions of the finance minister proved that this was not a cynical exercise. My constituents and many Canadians asked the finance minister to tackle the deficit in real terms. That is what this budget does.

This government is the first government in years to set deficit reduction targets and to meet those targets. Let me reassure the House that the deficit will be brought under control and our deficit targets will be met. The government has shown that it has the resolve and commitment to Canada's long term future to do what is necessary to meet our targets.

By 1996–97 Canada's deficit will be at 3 per cent of gross domestic product. That is $24.3 billion. If the economy keeps growing, and it will, this figure may be even lower. The bottom line is close to a cut of $7 in spending for every dollar for new revenues over the next three years.

To ensure fairness, both business and individuals are being asked to share the load. Recognizing that individuals' income taxes have increased over the last decade at a much faster rate than corporate taxes, the budget includes measures to address that inequity.

The large corporation tax rate will rise from .2 per cent to .225 per cent, an increase of 12.5 per cent. The corporate surtax, which is currently 3 per cent of the basic corporate tax rate, will increase to 4 per cent. There will also be changes made to strengthen Revenue Canada's ability to enforce the law and ensure that all Canadians pay their fair share of taxes and to reduce unfair competition for businesses that do play above board, that play by the rules.

Banks and trust companies are also being asked to contribute further toward deficit reduction during the next year and a half. They will contribute $100 million through a special tax on deposit taking institutions.

Big business has often stated that it does not need or want the level of assistance it receives from the federal government. Accordingly, the government has listened and taken these claims at their word. We will reduce spending on subsidies for big business by close to 60 per cent over the next three years.

However, the government, unlike the last one, realizes that a successful tackling of the deficit requires a two track approach, as was advocated in our red book. To eliminate the deficit, the government must also create a climate that creates jobs.

This budget recognizes that small and medium sized businesses are the cornerstone of Canada's economy. They are the number one job creator. To further help small business we intend to work with Canada's banks and trust companies to establish clear rules so that small business loans are easier to get.

• (1700)

In my prebudget consultations many of my constituents recommended Canada re–examine our commitment to foreign aid in view of needs in Canada. The government has done this and will reduce foreign aid by 20 per cent over the next three years for savings of over $500 million.

Many of my constituents also questioned the need for so many agencies, boards and commissions. As a result of the government–wide review of these government bodies, decisions have been made affecting 120 of them: 73 of these will be closed, 47 will be streamlined and restructured. The result will be 665 fewer government in council positions, fewer ministerial appointments and savings of $10 million a year.

In my prebudget consultations my constituents had many suggestions on what action the government should not take. Do not eliminate RRSPs, they said, and we did not. Do not increase personal income taxes. We did not. Do not introduce a health or dental tax benefit. We did not. Do not eliminate capital gains exemptions for farmers and small businesses. We did not. Do not introduce a tax on casino winnings. We did not.

I have said that this budget is tough but fair. Many of the reviews have also been tough but fair. A Windsor Star, editorial of February 28 stated: "What we can applaud in the budget is the vow to create a smaller and smarter government. The 14 per cent reduction in the civil service over the next three years combined with the $10 billion in cuts to departments will result in a fundamental reshaping of government".

The Windsor Star also reported that Windsor's business community was encouraged, shocked even, by the wide swing of the minister's budget axe.

The Windsor Chamber of Commerce chair, Othmar Stein, was quoted in the Star as saying of the finance minister: "He's got the message. A lot of this was overdue. A lot of the subsidies are gone, even for business".

Mr. Stein, a vice–president of Chrysler, concluded: "Overall I'd say it's a very realistic budget, quite positive. It's one of the first budgets in a number of years that has not been smoke and mirrors."

Aron Gampel of the Bank of Nova Scotia says it is a strong fiscal statement that meets all the tests.

The Wall Street Journal reversed its editorial stance regarding Canada, summed up in its headline several weeks before the budget as "Bankrupt Canada". After the budget it proclaimed Canada made a right turn.

The editorial commends the finance minister for showing the determination needed for Canada to claw its way out of the debt hole which decades of spendthrift policies landed it in.

The budget charts a new course for agriculture. In agriculture the government has set a target to achieve by the turn of the century, annual food exports valued at over $20 billion. This is an increase of at least one–third over our record setting performance in 1994.

To do this the government will be introducing a new export credits guarantee program to support grain and other agri–food export sales up to a value of $1 billion.

Consistent with the red book, the government will implement a Canadian agri–food marketing council and Canadian agri–food marketing service to ensure enhanced market development and effective use of the global information highway.

Our first fiscal year was not all doom and gloom. The Canadian economy is stronger than it has been in years. Real economic output grew at about 4.5 per cent in 1994, the fastest of the G–7. Over 433,000 jobs were created in the past year, almost all of them full time.

The unemployment rate has fallen by 1.7 percentage points nationally. Manufacturing output is up over 9 percent in the past year. Improved cost performance has lead to record breaking exports, a growing trade surplus and a dramatic improvement in the current account.

I assure my constituents the budget belongs to a Liberal government. A Liberal government brought in new and innovative programs in the sixties and seventies to meet the challenges and needs of those decades. The government is adapting all programs to meet the needs and challenges of the nineties and the 21st century.

We understand change. We have always been at the forefront of change. The budget is change. The Liberal Party has been traditionally a pace setter. I know the budget sets the pace for the 21st century.

I will end with a comment one of my constituents sent me during the prebudget process. With reference to the difficult choices facing the Minister of Finance, he wished him resolve: "My two young children will thank you, as you will be remembered as the finance minister who saved Canada from bankruptcy".

• (1705)

Hon. Charles Caccia (Davenport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to participate in this debate. Canadians know very well that we have inherited an economic mess from the Conservatives and that steps must be taken to reduce the deficit and the debt. On that we all agree.

The major preoccupation of this budget is to appease the marketplace, in particular rating agencies. Having done so this year one may expect Wall Street to demand more measures of the same kind in future budgets.

To deal with this the Prime Minister is taking the issue of currency speculators and their impact on national economies to the next meeting in June of the G–7 nations, a very timely initiative for which he is to be congratulated.

There are a few positive measures in the budget for which the Minister of Finance is to be congratulated. For instance, from the perspective of sustainable development one could highlight his decision to remove the 20 per cent limit of a donor's income when donations qualify as ecologically sensitive land. There is a commitment in the budget to study barriers or disincentives in the use of recycled materials over virgin materials.

There is a promise to examine the tax system in search of disincentives to energy efficiency and renewable forms of energy. Subsidies were cut in the energy sector that encouraged uneconomic and unsustainable supply development. Much more needs to be done if we are serious about reducing greenhouse gas emissions.

This brings me to the end of the list of good news and back to the question of how to reduce the national debt and the deficit. It is a necessity on which we all agree.

In the weeks and months preceding the budget several presentations were made repeatedly that social spending is not the cause of our economic ills and that our deficit problem, rather than through cuts in expenditures, ought to be resolved through increases in revenue by way of closing tax loopholes. Billions of dollars a year are forgone in revenue because of existing tax loopholes, including items such as lottery winnings, business meals and entertainment expenses and other existing items well identified in a report by the Department of Finance dated January 1994.

To his credit, the Minister of Finance closed a couple of loopholes but the tax system remains unprogressive as a result of nine years of Conservative government, Conservative budget making.

It is time for a thorough review of our tax system as it stands now. This review is made even more urgent and necessary and relevant by the fact that the social envelope as announced in the budget is being reduced by $7 billion. Had more tax loopholes been closed, had the tax system been put under the microscope to the same extent that the social security system has been, it would have not been necessary to reduce the social envelope. We would have funds available to diminish the necessity of cutting expenditures. We would have funds for the creation of employment programs for youth desperately waiting for job opportunities which are now not materializing despite our vigorous economic growth.

In other words, closing tax loopholes would provide the government with badly needed revenues to combat unemployment and to apply less severe cuts. Time does not permit to comment on the many cuts and I will therefore comment only on a couple which are particularly painful.

• (1710)

One reduces the social housing budget by $270 million at a time when in Toronto alone an applicant has to wait over four years.

Why reduce the protection of our natural resources by one third, the estimates of the environment department, and allocate to the department of defence almost 20 times as much, $9 billion? What is more important?

Why reduce international aid at a time when health and development projects are so badly needed for the stability of nations most in need?

How can we implement our red book commitment to sustainable development with a 70 per cent cut in the federal allocation to the Canadian environment industry, while leaving the nuclear industry unscathed from any budget cuts?

How can we maintain and strengthen the Canadian identity when the budget of the Canada Council is cut in half? How can we promote and sustain artistic talents without the support of the federal government?

In a way it is too late to talk about the budget, but not too soon to talk about the next one. For 1996 we will keep on working so the budget will have a different orientation, an orientation to the promises made in the red book, an orientation to deal with unemployment, the protection of the weaker in society and the social needs of Canadians.

Over the years Canadians have turned to the Liberals at election time because they trust us as the party that knows how to strengthen and intertwine social and economic policies. This principle is as valid today as it will be 20, 40 or 60 years from now. Hopefully the budget will have the desired effect and we Liberals will be able to turn our attention to the other half of the equation, developing strong social and job creation initiatives and policies in the second half of our mandate for the benefit of the total Canadian society.

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I wish I could say at the beginning that it is pleasure for me to speak on the budget. I cannot do that. My feeling is one of great disappointment. The government is still not facing the reality or the severity of the problem Canada is in today.

The budget has given us minor cuts when major cuts are needed. It did include some hidden taxes where no tax increases were justified.

We owe a debt of thanks to the thousands of citizens who wrote in and attended tax alerts to send the very strong message to the government that there was no room for tax increases and that the books had to be balanced and that balance had to be brought about by cuts or reductions in spending with no new or increased taxes. We did achieve that to some degree. However, there were some hidden taxes in the budget.

This was a two stage budget. I will review the first budget and this budget. In the first budget it was interesting that the government said: "Canada has a problem. It is not too serious. Do not get too excited about it. Take an aspirin and when you get up in the morning you will feel fine. Do not feel bad. Be happy". It introduced a budget that actually aggravated Canada's condition because our debt over the year of that budget grew from $490 billion to $550 billion. Canada is in much more serious difficulty.

We even thought in that first budget we could buy our way to prosperity. It included the $6 billion infrastructure program.

Canada's problem has worsened. With the second budget the diagnosis is that Canada is gravely ill. We do have a very serious problem with the deficit and the debt and it must be attacked. However, the cure is $650 billion of debt, still overspending by $25 billion and $50 billion in interest payments. I hardly call this progress. I hardly call this a cure. Canada is going further and further into the hole.

• (1715)

The government has diagnosed that it understands the gravity of the situation. The government has moved over to our position. It has agreed that Canada is gravely ill. The only thing we disagree on now is the treatment to cure our problem. The deficit, if we agree, is life threatening. Then why if it is life threatening to our country would we vote for, or go for a slow, hopeful, drawn out recovery; we hope we will get the books in balance.

Suppose someone were in a life threatening situation and the doctor said: "We can give you pills for the next five years and you might recover but the alternative is major surgery and you can be restored to health very quickly and get on with the healing process". Why would he take a chance?

Why would we gamble our future on the uncertainties of the marketplace, of interest rates? We do not seem to have anything in this budget to prepare for the eventual downturn in the economy that will come. It is not a question of if it is going to come, it is going to come. It is a question of when it is going to come.

There are some dark clouds on the horizon. Even south of the border, the situation in the United States could deteriorate and it would have a grave effect on the economy right here in Canada. We know that and we are not preparing for that in this budget. Time is running out. We do not have unlimited time. Unfortunately, that message is not getting through and has not been reflected by the government.

I was interested in the remarks of the Secretary of State for Training and Youth. She spoke about the New Zealand experience, how New Zealand realized the magnitude of its problem and did something about it. New Zealand's debt was at 50 per cent of its GDP when it realized its problem. Ours is currently about 70 or 71 per cent of GDP and we still are not facing the realities and doing the major surgery which needs to be done.

The claim in the first budget was that the government did not have enough time, that it had just taken over. The present government had been in opposition for eight years. What was happening in those eight years? What was happening in those eight years is that those members were adding to the problem in opposing any attempts to bring the deficit and the debt under control. I very well recall the UI debate when there was an attempt to reduce costs. The protest came from the other side at the attempt to reduce spending.

Here we have a budget. We had no plan to get us to zero or to balance the books in the first budget. We still do not have a plan with this budget. There is no fixed date to arrive at what we must arrive at, which is a balanced budget.

We have lost our credibility with the markets in this budget because we did not do anything about the MP pension plan. We had to do something to restore our credibility because it is low. That would have said very loudly and very clearly to the markets and to the Canadian people that yes, the government is serious about the problem and it is showing leadership by example. It failed to do that. Canadians did not miss that message, nor in fact did our lenders. Our lenders have spotted the fact that we were not serious about the problem we face.

There are three ways to get the books in balance. We can raise taxes. We can hope for growth in the economy. Or we can cut spending.

Raising taxes, I would suggest, is no longer an option. The Canadian people have revolted and said that they are taxed to the limit. Raising taxes at this point becomes counterproductive because it fuels the underground economy that is there and is growing.

We can hope for growth in the economy, but we do not control that. That has been the problem for the last 25 years. We projected growth in the economy and at the end of the year it was said: "Oh gee, it is too bad it was not there. We are deeper in debt". We do not control that.

The one thing we do control, the one thing we can do to get our books in balance is to cut spending. We have absolute control there and it is where we should be targeting our efforts. This budget does not do that. It makes some scrapes when indeed it should be making cuts in spending.

We have had 20 years of raising taxes. Those 20 years of raising taxes have achieved the exact opposite. The deficit has grown and the debt has grown. There is absolutely no justification for any tax increase. It does exactly the opposite to what it is hoped to achieve. It is a job killer. It kills the economy.

• (1720)

That there can be no pain is not reality. When we have lived for so many years beyond our means, there has to be some pain. We cannot escape that. The Canadian people understand and are ready for that. The problem is many in this place do not understand that but the Canadian people are ready for it.

We just have to look at the results of the surveys done since the budget came out. The Canadian people supported the move the government made but said they were looking for more. Those same surveys said there should be more cuts and those cuts should be made now because time is running out. We do not have unlimited time.

The tough action we have been taking on the east coast with the fishing problem is interesting. Overfishing is just like overspending. Fish are limited and dollars are limited. There is a bottom to the barrel. We are getting tough on fishing but we have not yet got the message on spending. We still think we can keep on spending. We can kill an industry or we can kill a country. We can kill an industry by overfishing; we can kill a country by overspending.

Moody's fired a shot across our bow and we missed the message. It fired a shot across our bow just as we did to that Spanish fishing vessel. The message Moody's shot across our bow was that 3 per cent of GDP is too low a target and there is no plan to get to zero. The budget has failed on both counts.

For anybody on the other side to assume that the markets have bought this budget, the verdict is not yet in. Moody's has not changed its position. The verdict is still pending on whether the budget was successful in convincing the money markets that Canada is a good place to invest.

We shoot the messenger who is giving us good advice: "You are in trouble. Get your books in balance or we are not going to buy your bonds". As I say, we are still waiting for the background on that.

There was nothing in this budget for small business. My background is in small business. That 1.5 cent increase in gasoline tax is to raise $500 million a year.

In my riding a number of people commute to Toronto. They will have $250 per year in additional costs just to drive to their business. It is also going to increase the cost of doing business for example for those who use gas in delivery services.

It is going to take about $3 million out of the economy of my riding. There goes the new stove, the education and the new car. It really was not necessary and it is not productive to creating the employment we need. There was no justification for any tax increase.

We are indeed living in the greatest country in the world, but we are doing it on borrowed dollars and time is running out.

I see we are making an attempt to get Canadians to invest in Canada by buying bonds and keeping the money in Canada. The answer to getting Canadians to invest in this country is for the government to show some responsibility that it understands the magnitude of the problem and it is going to cut its spending. Canadians will then stop sending their money out of the country and will spend and invest it right here.

Canada is in a battle for its survival, make no mistake about it. I visited Dieppe just a year ago. It was a very moving experience to see the men who had the courage to go over there and give their lives. I am suggesting that it is going to take courage right now to tackle the very serious problem of overspending.

I hear words about compassion, generosity and fairness. What about responsibility, accountability and fairness to the taxpayers who have been carrying the burden all these years? The Canadian taxpayers are demanding some responsibility, accountability and fairness. We owe it to them and we owe it to future generations.

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I found it interesting that the member would spend so much time during his speech defending the Brian Mulroney government saying that somehow the Liberal Party frustrated the prior government for nine years. He is nodding his head now, but I should remind him that the government of Brian Mulroney, which was turfed out, had a majority in both terms and had full control of its actions. We cannot pass on that blame. The member is just making rhetoric. In fact the prior Conservative government got exactly what it deserved.

I listened with interest to the medical analogy the member used when he talked about cuts, that we have only had scrapes and not deep cuts. The member tried to somehow imply there was a tax increase in this budget when he well knows there were $7 of cuts for every $1 of increased revenue and there were no increases in personal income tax. It was pure fabrication.

I want to ask the member a question with regard to his strategy and the response that his own leader gave to this House. His leader stood in this House and attacked the government for cuts to social programs. Yet this member is saying that we should have more cuts than what has been proposed by our government. How does this member square his position with the position of his own leader?

Mr. Harper (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to respond to the questions from the hon. member.

I will deal first with the fact that the Liberals spent eight years in opposition and they could not do anything about the fact that the debt and deficit were increasing. I suggest to the member that they did nothing but encourage the deficit and debt to increase. They did not understand the magnitude of the problem then; they do not understand the magnitude of the problem now. Nothing has changed.

The Conservative government was turfed out for not listening. I would suggest that three years down the road this government will be turfed out because it is still not listening to the Canadian people.

Cuts of $7 for every $1 in increased revenue. There is no justification for any revenue increase. There is more than enough to balance the books in cuts. When there has been overspending for 20 years we cannot keep saying that we need more dollars, but a strong case can be made for saying: "Yes, we have been going into your pockets deeper and deeper; we are going to start pulling back now". Now is the time. If the Liberals have missed that message, they will go the same way the Conservatives did in just a few years.

My leader has never said that social programs should not be touched. The books cannot be balanced without touching the social programs. That is the reality of the amount of money we spend in that area. The word is that they have been responsible for the problem. They have not been responsible for the problem. However, there have to be cuts in there. The books absolutely cannot be balanced without doing it.

The Budget

Mr. Dan McTeague (Ontario, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my hon. colleague for Simcoe Centre made reference to the famous tax rallies which took place across the country. He will know the most notable one took place in my riding of Ontario. An estimated 3,500 people came out to protest against any notion of tax increases.

Of the 3,500 people who attended that meeting not one has called to tell me this was a bad budget. We have had over 50 calls telling us it is a budget that hit the mark and that the government has definitely listened to the voices of Canadians.

What was interesting about that evening was that it crystallized what these tax alerts were really all about. They were fronts for the Reform Party. That is very clear in the presentation I made a couple of weeks ago.

It is more interesting that one of my hon. colleague's cohorts by the name of Diane Francis in her paper The Financial Post on the same day that tax rally took place mentioned Morgan Trust, a famous bank. It does a lot of business in Canada, and has made some $9.5 million in profits at the expense of the Canadian economy and has only paid 3 per cent in effective taxes.

The hon. member says we do not need any new taxes in this country. He applauds the tax alerts that have taken place. But surely to goodness he is not saying that some people should be indulging themselves while advocating austerity for the others as the banks have done.

Mr. Harper (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is talking about tax fairness. I did not get into the question of tax fairness. I will agree with him that the current tax system is unfair and we have to address that.

I do come back to my point that we have a spending problem, not a revenue problem. The government can go after the loopholes and tax the rich but it will not come close to balancing the books. What will balance the books is to get our spending under control right now. That is something we have full control over. We need to do it right away. We cannot afford to delay.

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, we are debating the budgetary policy put forward by this government that permits it to borrow more money using the fragile future of our country as collateral.

• (1730)

The Reform Party appreciates the grave financial situation in which we find ourselves. In fact, it has been our dogged determination to address the issue of government accountability in the areas of spending and taxation that have dictated the course of the government's fiscal agenda.

The Liberal budget took a very tentative first step in the direction of deficit reduction, but it did not go nearly far enough. Overall spending increased. Taxes increased. It failed to make the necessary changes to Canadian social programs. It failed to identify which programs are essential and which are not. It failed to explain where and how Canadians will find jobs. The Liberal budget did not lead by example. Cuts come from the bottom up it appears. Canadians are asked to tighten their belts while the Liberal fat–pack have secured their gold–plated pensions.

There has been much talk about Liberal red book promises. Let us focus on some of the promises that are made in the budget.

The Liberals are promising to borrow $29.8 billion this year because they cannot balance the budget. The Liberals are promising to add over $100 billion to the national debt in the next three years. This will drive the federal debt load well beyond $650 billion by fiscal 1997. This Liberal promise will jeopardize the long term viability of social programs.

The Minister of Human Resources Development had a tremendous opportunity to make a positive contribution to changes in the delivery of social programs. Instead he dropped the ball and in fact has dropped out. What the Liberals are offering now is a block transfer of funds to the provinces. This Liberal approach simply downloads the federal debt, penalizing the provinces, especially provinces like mine, Alberta, which is working aggressively toward a balanced budget.

The Liberals promised to increase funding to special interest groups. To pick one example, the status of women, after we factor in the new grants transferred from HRD, it still has an increase in its operating budget of approximately 20 per cent. How can this be justified when funding to provinces for health care and education has been reduced? Canadians will not tolerate such foolish inequity.

The government has not been entirely open about its plans for balancing the budget. I am going to use the example of the Canadian heritage ministry to illustrate a wilful lack of disclosure regarding budget matters. If such dismal performance exists in one department, in one ministry, does it exist in others?

The Minister of Canadian Heritage had plans for the future of the CBC which he did not include in the budget, but which he did provide to the president of the CBC. Let us look at the Liberals' promises regarding the CBC. On February 3, 1994 in a letter from the minister to Mr. Manera, the minister wrote:

> The government considers that stable multi–year funding for the CBC is the most effective way of enabling the CBC to return to a healthy financial position. I am therefore pleased to confirm that the government is prepared to commit itself to a plan and to affirm that it does not intend to impose new reductions on the CBC over the next five years.

However, in the budget the minister announced cuts of $44 million to the CBC. It now appears that the minister plans to cut of over $350 million to the CBC. When I asked him a question about the plan in the House he denied the plan, suggesting that my allegations were pure invention and that Mr. Manera, who had subsequently resigned, had done so for personal reasons and that no more cuts were planned. It sounded like an incredible soap opera to me. That night, in an interview, Mr. Manera stated that he had resigned because of future cuts to the CBC and not for personal reasons. Only one of the two men could be telling the truth.

The next day in the House I presented to the minister a copy of the secret document, which the minister's officials had given to Mr. Manera, which outlined three years of cuts to the CBC. This is how the minister interprets honest and open government. First, he purposely withheld this information from the budget figures. Second, he denied the document and the accompanying cuts even existed. Third, he now admits the document exists but that it means nothing and that the president of the CBC is misguided.

This kind of pathetic performance eats away at the integrity of government. Canadians want to know how their money is being spent and that it is being spent wisely, based on a responsible plan for future spending. The Minister of Canadian Heritage has a different story every time he is asked a question. How can anyone take him seriously, especially organizations within the cultural community? His performance has left the CBC rudderless, without a chairman, without a president, at a time when it needs leadership the most, at a time when it needs to make the transition to the private sector.

• (1735)

Further, last year the CBC was given a special borrowing authority for $25 million. It turns out that this borrowing authority is $25 million into perpetuity. Last year, at the end of the fiscal year the CBC proved it could not meet its budget and came back, cap in hand to Parliament, and as stated in the supplementary estimates it received another $3 million. The CBC is just one example of gross financial mismanagement in the minister's portfolio.

The finance minister alleged that the Liberal government met its financial targets last year. However that can only be Liberal math, for when we look at the Department of Canadian Heritage's supplementary estimates we see it is very much in the red, that none of the targets were met.

Let us look at some of the government organizations which ran over budget: the Department of Canadian Heritage corporate services program, $1.1 million over budget; the Canadian identity program, $1.4 million over budget; the parks program, $3.5 million over budget; Advisory Council on the Status of Women, which thankfully is gone, $76,000 over budget; the CBC, $3 million over budget; the Museum of Nature, $82,000 over budget; the National Archives, $561,000 over budget; the National Battlefields Commission, $125,000 over budget; the National Capital Commission, $12 million over budget; the National Gallery, $187,000 over budget; the Public Service Commission, $4.5 million over budget; and last, the Office of the Co–ordinator of the Status of Women, $162,000 over budget.

Thirteen organizations under the control of the Canadian heritage ministry went over budget. Canadians expect and deserve more from government. When will the minister finally take responsibility for the complete disarray and overspending of his department?

When governments continue to deficit finance they hurt Canada's future economic health. By failing to balance the budget, by failing even to announce when the budget will be balanced, the Liberals have shown they understand little about fiscal planning.

The Liberal Party continues its tradition of being borrowers of both money and ideas. The continuing failure to bring in a single, new, original thought begs the question of whether it will be able to lead Canada to economic stability within the current mandate.

Mr. John Bryden (Hamilton—Wentworth, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for Calgary Southeast for her remarks but she left me wondering. In the early part of her discourse she reported a 20 per cent increase to the status of women.

I do not know to what organization she refers. I would like very much if she could elaborate on that, what her information is, what details she has and what her sources are, if she would not mind.

Mrs. Brown (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will refer to the estimates he will see that with the inclusion of the Department of Human Resources Development, moneys were brought over from that department. Approximately $20 million is within the ministry of the status of women and represents the increase that I suggested.

Further to this, now that we are on the whole approach of the change to the status of women, it represents a remarkable shift in the Liberal policy. We are seeing economic pragmatism overtake social liberalism, which is incredible.

It is a shift into a Conservative–Reform territory which one would have never anticipated. The Liberals left their liberal ideology and embraced certainly Conservative ideology. The Reform Party has influenced dramatically this approach. We saw it in the budget and we are now seeing it in the downsizing and restructuring of bureaucratic departments.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the hon. member a question. She seemed to get off on a bit of a tangent thinking that all these government departments had overspent. If they spend their budget, she thinks they have overspent. I recognize the trait.

• (1740)

However, sometimes there are reallocations of priorities in the way governments spend their money. That sometimes happens. In this case, I think the government considered what it might do and reallocated some priorities and spent more in some departments that it did in others.

Perhaps the member could answer a question about overspending. I believe her party ran into a lot of trouble with overspending. It was unable to organize its finances and I understand it is running a big deficit.

Does the member not think that the same rules that ought to apply to government ought to apply to a party? Does the member not think that the party ought to get its own finances in order before it criticizes the Government of Canada?

Mrs. Brown (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, that is such a trivial question, it is not even worthy of a response. We are certainly in control of our spending.

When we talk about reallocation of priorities, I am going to address that part of the hon. member's question. It is quite interesting that when we look at what happened in Alberta with the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act. We are talking about reallocation of priorities all right.

I have a letter from a small business person in my riding. This individual wrote talking about Albertans being prepared to make that kind of sacrifice when it comes to helping with the deficit reduction process. But when we see companies and I quote: "such as ours that compete against companies based in other provinces on a national and an international basis, this change of the utilities tax has fundamentally altered the competitive landscape. Our cost of doing business, simply because we are located in Alberta, will go up as a result of this budgetary measure".

That message for the hon. member across the way speaks volumes to me about what the government intended to do with its reallocation of priorities with respect to Alberta.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with Standing Order 78(1), I wish to inform the House that there is an agreement among the representatives of all three officially recognized parties to the allocation of time to Bill C–74, an act respecting the supervision of longshoring and related operations at west coast ports, described in the following motion.

I therefore move:

That Bill C–74, an act respecting the supervision of longshoring and related operations at west coast ports, be disposed of at all stages during the present sitting as follows:

1. Debate at second reading shall be limited to no more than 80 minutes;

2. Upon being read a second time, the bill shall be referred to a committee of the whole, which shall report the bill after no more than 60 minutes' consideration;

3. Immediately upon being concurred in at the report stage, the said bill shall be considered at the third reading stage wherein debate shall be limited to no more than 40 minutes.

4. At the end of the time periods described in this Order, the Speaker or the Chair of the committee of the whole, as the case may be, shall interrupt debate and forthwith put all questions necessary to dispose of the stage then under consideration.

5. No recorded division may be deferred and, when any recorded division is requested, the bells shall be sounded for not more than 15 minutes.

The Deputy Speaker: As was indicated the motion is not debatable. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

• (1745)

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it. I declare the motion carried.

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed consideration of the motion that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will be sharing my time with the hon. member for Gatineau—La Lièvre.

Contrary to what we hear flowing back and forth across the floor, it is an honour for me to participate in the budget debate on behalf of my constituents in the riding of Hillsborough. I congratulate the Minister of Finance on such a finely crafted budget. In my years in this House and in my years in the house of another jurisdiction I can honestly say that this is one of the best budgets I have witnessed.

The budget is about commitments made and commitments kept. During the election we campaigned on a platform of creating opportunity. We asked Canadians to put their trust in us and we put our trust in them to get things moving in the right direction.

We promised to create jobs for Canadians and we have. As has been talked about many times in the last number of weeks, in the past year over 400,000 jobs were created across the country. We promised stable inflation and we have the lowest inflation in the industrialized world. Our exports are at an all time high and the level of business confidence in the Canadian economy is at its highest point since 1979.

The budget moved us further down the road to even more opportunity in the future. As the Minister of Finance has stated, the budget breaks the back of the deficit. The government will reach its deficit target of 3 per cent of GDP by the end of the next fiscal year. Once we have reached that point the government will move to reduce the deficit even further. We will accomplish our goals without punishing the vulnerable.

Some people out there would say and have said that it is just a Tory budget tied up in red ribbons. Nothing could be further from the truth. We have gone about the budgeting process reasonably. Instead of across the board cuts as was the case with the previous government, we have examined every program and every activity of the federal government.

Yes, we can do more. The Minister of Finance chose a scalpel over a meat cleaver in making the cuts. In departments such as in the Department of Transport where the need for their services have declined, the minister has made larger cuts. The commercialization of airports will create new opportunities in my area for businesses to export their goods and promote better tourism marketing.

In the Department of Veterans Affairs the minister made considerably smaller cuts. I know that the Secretary of State for Veterans was keen in protecting services for veterans across the country. As a result few jobs will be lost at departmental headquarters in Charlottetown. This is also something the people of the riding of Hillsborough really appreciate.

Seasonal workers will be happy to know that there will be no changes to the unemployment insurance system. There have been no changes to eligibility criteria or the length of time one can collect benefits. The Minister of Human Resources Development will continue to examine the operation of the program, to streamline the operations, and to find better ways to help recipients of unemployment insurance.

The budget was also a fine example of sharing the burden of deficit control. For the second year in a row the government has refused to increase personal income taxes.

• (1750)

Most Canadians have realized for quite some time that wealthy Canadians enjoy special treatment come tax time. On budget day the Minister of Finance moved a long way toward stopping special treatment by eliminating exemptions for family trusts.

A couple of years ago the former government extended a tax holiday called the family trust exemption. Previously some of the wealthiest families in the country could hide their money away from the tax person by saying it was for their children and grandchildren. Because these family trusts have been exempted for so long it is difficult to estimate how much money is involved. Estimates have ranged from hundreds of millions to a couple of billion dollars that the tax people cannot reach. This special privilege was unacceptable and I am glad to see it gone.

The Minister of Finance placed a special tax on banks that had record profits in the last year. As well the government will be leaning on banks to make sure more capital is available to small and medium size businesses. The government will hold banks accountable on their performance in helping the Canadian economy grow and provide more jobs.

In the budget there is an increase in the taxes on large corporations. This was done because we realized that ordinary taxpayers were already paying their fair share. The budget spreads the burden more evenly.

The government has taken the position that we cannot do it all. Nor should we. It is the job of government to ensure that there is a level playing field for all Canadians to prosper. It is not the duty of government to run businesses the private sector can run better. That is why we are selling, for instance, our remaining shares in Petro–Canada and selling Canadian National Railway. On the list being examined for sale is the Canada Communications Group that has come under fire from small businesses across the country.

In the future we will be looking not only at what government does but why government does it. If we cannot find a legitimate answer then we should stop it. This is about more than smaller government even though government will be smaller. It is also about smarter government.

We must remember the Liberals created Canada's social programs and safety net. While we will be funding those programs in different ways we will insist that certain national standards apply. All aspects of the Canada Health Act will continue to be enforced, especially universality and accessibility. Of that there can be no doubt in the minds of Canadians.

We are well on our way to both fiscal sanity and healthy government. The naysayers and the special interest groups will try to convince Canadians that we have cut too much. Other people will say that we have not cut enough and that we should sacrifice our social programs in the interest of deficit elimination. Neither opinion reflects the needs and the desires of Canadians. The budget is about fairness, balance and a sense of the future.

As I said earlier, there is more we can do. I have mentioned this at different meetings with the Minister of Finance. There are more ways to find waste and other excesses in government. Every stone must be turned to find waste. Public servants out there are willing to talk about it and to tell us but they must be protected.

As Liberals we will continue on our course of creating opportunity for Canadians.

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, as I was listening to the member I could not help thinking the Liberal side of the House must have a special fund set aside for psychiatric help. I have never heard so much talk about how they proudly built the programs and now they are equally proud to dismantle them. I just do not know how they can say that.

I would like the member to address several dilemmas that must go through the Liberal mind. I would not want to call them broken promises. How does he reconcile that the budget broke the workforce adjustment directive when a couple of months before they promised they would not break it?

• (1755)

How can he justify that when the government came into power it said that it would not sign the GATT without a strengthened article 11(2)(c) and then it signed it anyway? The government was not going to sign the NAFTA but it signed it immediately coming into power. The government promised to eliminate the GST but that has not been possible. The government said that it would reform the pension plan of MPs but it just does not have the guts to do it.

Furthermore, things are coming down the road that Canadians know about. The Prime Minister muses that perhaps a 1 per cent or 2 per cent of GDP drop in health care funding is inevitable. That will amount to $10 billion or $15 billion. That is inevitable.

The member proudly said that there were no changes in UI. Yet the minister in charge of that program travelled the country for six months to try to find ways to change it. The member is proud to say that it has not changed. It has to change.

The last question I would like to ask the hon. member is: With respect to the pension plan of MPs, will he opt out or not?

Mr. Proud: Mr. Speaker, to the last question first, my answer is definitely not. I will not opt out. I am not ashamed of the pension plan. We changed the pension plan as we said we would do. We even went further than that. I will defend our pension plan and salary as MPs anywhere in Canada. I am not afraid to do that.

As far as justifying the workforce adjustment directive, the government negotiated with the unions and 15 of the 16 unions agreed to it. It came to a point where it had to be done and we took the attitude that we would do it. We did it and we are going to look after it in the most humane way possible.

We built the social programs and we are not dismantling them. I have said it over and over again. The Prime Minister has said that the costs of health care can be cut. That is what I said in my speech. We have to do things smarter and we will do it. We built the social programs; we will maintain the social programs. The social programs will be as good in 10 years time as they were 10 years ago as long as we form the government.

I have no qualms about any of the questions the hon. member asked. We have lived up to our commitments. Commitments were made and commitments were kept and we will continue to do so.

I have no problem in defending unemployment insurance. Not one change has occurred to the unemployment insurance system as yet. That is what I said. Nothing has changed. Some changes will be made. The minister has travelled the country.

In my speech I was talking about seasonal workers. Seasonal workers are not the problem; it is seasonal work. When we reach the point where such people can work 12 months of the year we will not need unemployment insurance for them. Until that happens, with them in agriculture, fishery and tourism we need to have some kind of compensation for them. I will be the one to make sure, to the best of my ability, that it remains for them.

[Translation]

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in tabling the budget, our Minister of Finance has certainly shown a great deal of courage; it is definitely a first step towards the sound management of public funds.

To have a good understanding of the current economic climate and take effective action, we must, first, identify the economic changes experienced in the last 20 years and, second, have a clear vision of the goals to be achieved and the concrete ways to achieve them.

We are, of course, facing major economic changes. They have brought hardships and restrictions to all our fellow citizens. Their impact on disadvantaged groups is even stronger. Salaries have gone down. Jobs are getting scarcer and less stable. Access to social programs is increasingly restricted.

In the next few minutes, I will review the changes and propose goals and ways to reconcile economic and human considerations.

• (1800)

Successful reconciliation of these considerations depends on our ability to strike a healthy balance between competition and individual achievement, on the one hand, and sharing and co–operation, on the other hand.

In the last 20 years, our economy has been shaken by three major changes: the global economic slowdown which started in 1973; two major anti–inflationary recessions in 1981 and 1990; and, in the last decade, the economic system's gradual rejection of people with little education.

Before 1973, our average standard of living rose by 40 per cent every decade. All classes of society were reaping the fruits of this growth. Since then, the rate of economic development has barely exceeded 15 per cent per decade. Several groups, including less qualified workers, have even seen their standard of living drop in absolute terms. This long term economic slowdown is common to all industrialized countries.

In the wake of the great depression and the second world war, all countries enjoyed enormous catch–up growth potential based on delayed technological development, cheap natural resources and an agricultural workforce ready to move to the cities. It took us a quarter of a century to use up this potential. Since then, all countries from Finland to Canada and from Italy to Australia have been having a hard time. Nothing is easy any more.

We managed for a while to circumvent the new economic constraints. The declining birthrate, the generalization of female labour, the high prices obtained from the sale of our natural resources until 1981, the debt increase in the 1980s allowed us to constantly defer until later the painful adjustment in our material expectations. The strong decline in consumption during the current recession underlines our belated awareness that money no longer grows on trees. Members of the middle class have finally started to tighten their belts.

But people are very nervous. Economic stagnation has resulted in both an increase in the need for social protection and a narrowing of the tax base financing our social safety net. Governments have managed to partly resolve this contradiction by raising taxes, which fuels the anger of taxpayers, already aroused by the state of the economy. This situation threatens our income security system, which is already starting to erode. Sharing does not come as easily when there is no growth.

Most industrialized countries started off the 1980s with an inflation rate of 12 per cent and were blamed for it. At the instigation of central banks, governments then subjected their economies to two anti–inflationary recessions. In 1981, Canada suffered the most severe recession in the industrialized world and inflation was brought down from 12 per cent to five per cent. Later on, starting in 1988, the Government of Canada and the Bank of Canada undertook to finish the job and force the rate of inflation further down, from five to two per cent. This target was just met in 1992.

Once again, Canada stood out because, once again, it put itself through the worst recession in the industrialized world.

These two recessions have led to a massive underutilization of our human and material resources in the past few decades. The resulting loss of income for Quebec is already to the tune of $100 billion. Obviously, this loss is on top of the general economic slowdown I mentioned earlier.

The $100 billion swallowed up by the two recessions represents an astronomical and senseless waste. It is cruel, considering the hardship and countless psychological, family and social problems it caused. It is also fundamentally unfair. In addition, this loss of $100 billion so far is not distributed equally amongst all people. Small businesses and low income earners are being hit absolutely disproportionately. Yet, they are not responsible, in the first place for causing the inflation we are now trying to curb.

Nowhere is growing chronic unemployment more obvious than among workers of all ages who did not finish high school. For the past decade, people in this category have slowly been sinking deeper and deeper. They are offered less and less money for jobs that are fewer and fewer and increasingly unstable; the rate of unemployment is increasingly higher than average. They have started to leave the labour force massively, generally ending up on the CSST or welfare rolls.

One third of Quebecers between the ages of 20 and 64, three times as many as in Germany or Japan, do not have a high school diploma. Barely one third of them have jobs. They are in a desperate situation. Compared to this group, the Gaspesian Peninsula is a real employment paradise. School may get you nowhere, as the saying has it, but it sure seems that ignorance does not get you much further.

Workers with little education were affected by the long term economic slowdown, like everyone else, and by the 1981 and 1990 recessions, which have hit very hard, but they also seem to be gradually pushed aside.

We have in Canada great economists and great minds. In Quebec, we have an economist of nationwide and even worldwide reputation. I have had the pleasure of meeting him on a number of occasions and hearing him testify here, before the finance committee. I am referring to Pierre Fortin, from the Université du Québec in Montreal.

Mr. Fortin has shown a great deal of common sense in his approach to the economic situation. He came up with a three–part social and economic program. That is, first, given the vulnerability of people who never graduated from high school on the job market, he said that we need to create jobs as quickly as possible mostly for their benefit, second, to protect what has already been acquired, and third, to undertake a second educational revolution.

I will now comment briefly on these points. It is very clear that large scale job creation will obviously reduce the amounts paid out in unemployment insurance benefits, social assistance and other benefits. It is also very clear that, by creating jobs, the federal government will generate more revenue for deficit reduction.

Mr. Fortin does not suggest that the government increase spending but rather that it exert pressure to maintain our interest rates under or around the five per cent mark or thereabouts, like our American neighbours.

• (1810)

If interest rates were at five per cent, many small and medium size businesses would have access to the funds needed to create enough jobs to put all of the unemployed back to work. I think that makes eminent sense.

Secondly, we clearly do not want to be irresponsible and to spark another increase in inflation. On the contrary, job creation and increased profits will hedge against the likelihood of inflation becoming a problem. The danger of inflation flaring up over the next three to four months is very minimal.

Thirdly, we must undertake a second educational revolution. Obviously, people between the ages of 20 and 64 who do not have a high school diploma need vocational training. We are not talking about university diplomas, we are talking about training spread over one or two years. That essentially is my conclusion.

I would like to say to my colleagues that there are some good ideas out there and that it is high time that we in the House of Commons take heed of them.

Mr. Yvan Bernier (Gaspé, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the member for Gatineau—La Lièvre. He made a nice speech, but forgot to mention that the Liberals were in office for a long time and that the deficit started growing back then.

I am somewhat sceptical when I hear that restoring confidence in the economy will result in the money markets lowering interest rates which, in turn, will stimulate job creation. I am from the Gaspé Peninsula and I can tell you that fringe areas need catalysts. Unfortunately, that budget does not include any job creating initiatives. There is no catalyst to help people improve their lot.

The government's proposed approach, which is to let the private sector act freely, presupposes that it expects the private sector to create jobs for people with low levels of education. However, these jobs will not be well–paid. I would like to know how the regions will be mobilized. All the nice rhetoric heard in this House is fine, but the regions expect positive measures and guidelines. Instead of that, the government is cutting the financial support available through the Federal Office of Regional Development. Where is the support? Instead of providing support, the government is withdrawing it.

Mr. Assad: Mr. Speaker, I will first answer the hon. member's second question. I said, as did Mr. Fortin to the Standing Committee on Finance, that we have to exert pressure to lower interest rates.

Increasing the deficit will not solve the problem: it will only postpone it and make it worse. We have to find a way to lower interest rates, so that small and medium size businesses can get the money they need to expand. Let us not forget that there is a production capacity in our country.

The hon. member mentioned that the deficit started under the Liberals. That is true. However, when the Liberals left in 1984, the deficit stood at $160 billion, whereas when they came back last year, it had grown to $460 billion. Between 1984 and 1994, the deficit grew by 250 per cent, in spite of unprecedented levels of revenues.

The Deputy Speaker: It being 6.15 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 84(6), it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of Ways and Means Motion No. 20.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

(The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:)

WEST COAST PORTS OPERATIONS ACT, 1995

Hon. Lucienne Robillard (Minister of Labour, Lib.) moved that Bill C–74, an act respecting the supervision of longshoring and related operations at west coast ports, be read the second time and, pursuant to order adopted earlier this day, referred to committee of the whole.

She said: Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today to introduce the West Coast Ports Operations Act, 1995, which provides for the supervision of longshoring and related operations at ports on the west coast of Canada. The labour dispute that led to the tabling of this bill is between the Waterfront Foremen Employers' Association and local 514 of the ship and dock foremen of the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union.

The association has a membership of 16 companies that employ members of the union in longshoring operations in British Columbia. The union has about 500 members and represents all unionized foremen employed in freight handling operations in British Columbia. The collective agreement between the parties expired on December 31, 1992, and the labour dispute was caused by the inability of the parties to renew the agreement.

After direct talks between the parties broke off, a conciliator from the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service was appointed on August 5, 1993 to help the parties settle their differences. The conciliator met the parties during the period from September 1993 to March 1994, and as a result the parties resumed negotiations in March. Conciliation sessions started again in April 1994 and went on until August last year. On October 18, 1994, the parties were informed of the appointment of Mark Thompson as conciliation commissioner in this labour dispute.

On February 10, 1995, after a series of meetings which took place over a period of four months, the conciliation commissioner transmitted his report to the parties. The employer indicated that, on the whole, he agreed with what the report contained. The union, however, rejected the report as a basis for a settlement. Following a meeting of both parties on March 10, union members went on strike on March 13. However, they indicated they were willing to allow the loading of grain shipments. The work stoppage occurred after the employer informed the union that it intended to impose the recommendations contained in the conciliation commissioner's report as of March 20, 1995.

Following the walk–out by the union members, the employer imposed a lock–out in all ports on the west coast, at 1 a.m. on March 15, thus halting the movement of all goods, including grain.

This report contains specific recommendations forming a solid base for settling these negotiations, but it also sheds light on the problem colouring labour–management relations in the port of Vancouver for years.

In his report, Mr. Thompson indicates that repeated intervention by senior government officials in labour disputes in the port of Vancouver have made the parties less interested in reaching an agreement on their own. The commissioner also points out that since Parliament has not allowed work stoppages in the port of Vancouver to continue for more than a few days, the parties are tempted to hold off any agreement until an act is passed or some other form of intervention taken. Unfortunately, this is also what is happening in the present dispute.

For years, the port of Vancouver has been dealing with disputes involving various occupational groups, including longshoremen, foremen, grain handlers and other workers. And all of us in this House know we have had to intervene. Unfortunately, I see the current situation requiring exactly the same type of measure.

This subject would not have been my choice for my maiden speech in the House of Commons, but I have never backed away from problems, and I am not going to start now. My colleagues on both sides of the House are well aware that grain traffic is moving faster than ever before in the ports of Vancouver and Prince Rupert. I congratulate the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Transport on developing and implementing changes that have significantly improved the efficiency of the grain transportation network in the west.

In the first half of the current crop year, that is, from August 1994 to January 1995, grain exports through west coast ports increased by 45.6 per cent. Any prolonged work stoppage now could have a disastrous effect on the agricultural economy of the west, at a time when grain elevators are operating at full capacity. Given the intense competition Canadian grain producers face in international markets and the pressing need to maintain Canada's reputation with its major trading partners, it is essential that this bill be passed.

Although I have primarily spoken about the movement of grain in west coast ports, my colleagues know very well that Vancouver is an important international port that receives a wide variety of bulk and containerized cargo, whose transportation depends on the presence of a stable and efficient workforce in the port. The rapid passage of the bill I have tabled is necessary to maintain the viability of this activity.

As I have already said, the parties have already had the benefit in their negotiations of all the assistance possible from impartial third parties, measures which led to the report by the conciliation commissioner, Mr. Thompson.

In his report, the commissioner indicated that "there is a climate of hostility between the parties, at least as far as the Association and the Union are concerned". He even added that "the members of the Association believe that the Union is refusing to adapt to the evolution of economic conditions in the industry, while the Union, for its part, is of the opinion that the employer is attempting to weaken its position in the collective agreement, particularly with respect to job opportunities".

Mr. Thompson summarized the situation as follows: "There is nothing to indicate that the parties wish or are capable of working together creatively to resolve their problems". Even though he has presented a rather sombre picture of negotiations to date, I should add that the conciliation commissioner pointed out that the parties demonstrated excellent co–operation in their dealings with him, and I take this opportunity to congratulate him on his detailed and thorough report on this situation.

In his report, the commissioner made specific recommendations on all matters remaining in dispute, and as hon. members can see, I have no hesitation in using these recommendations to establish the dispute settlement mechanism described in the bill before the House today.

Many points on which the parties agreed in the course of the negotiations were directly inspired by the existing collective agreement between the parties for persons employed in longshoring on the west coast. The conciliation commissioner made his recommendations so as to guarantee that the port of Vancouver remains competitive with other ports on the Pacific coast and with types of transportation elsewhere on the continent. He also avoided any major changes in the structure of the collective agreement which he found was, on the whole, satisfactory.

In his comments, the commissioner indicated that both parties would probably receive the report with mixed feelings but felt that it offered a firm basis for a settlement. It was this conviction which inspired the bill before the House today.

The West Coast Ports Operations Act, 1995, provides for the immediate resumption of supervision of longshoring and related operations at ports on the west coast of Canada and for the appointment of a mediator–arbitrator to resolve matters remaining in dispute between the parties. As soon as this act comes into force, the employers will be required to continue or immediately resume, as the case may be, supervision of longshoring and related operations at all ports; employees will be obliged to continue or immediately resume, as the case may be, their employment when requested to do so. The term of the collective agreement is extended to include the period beginning on January 1, 1993 and ending on the date fixed by the mediator–arbitrator, which may not be earlier than December 31, 1996. The act provides that as soon as he is appointed, the mediator–arbitrator shall endeavour to mediate the matters remaining in dispute and to bring about agreement between the parties on those matters.

If he is unable to bring about agreement on a matter, the mediator–arbitrator will hear the parties on the matter and arbitrate the matter after taking cognizance of the report of the conciliation commissioner. All costs incurred in the appointment of the mediator–arbitrator and the exercise of his duties shall be paid equally by the parties. In addition, a series of fines is provided for, should the parties contravene the provisions of the act.

Finally, this act shall come into force on the expiration of the twelfth hour after the royal sanction, which will allow the parties enough time to bring employees back to work and give sufficient time for the resumption of the employer's operations.

The passing of this act will permit the resolution of the present dispute, but, in my opinion, we must find long term solutions to the problems that have been the source of labour disputes in Canadian ports for years. My colleagues are aware that an in–depth review of Part I of the Canada Labour Code is currently underway under the authority of the assistant deputy minister of the Department of Human Resources Development.

However, in the case of the present labour dispute, this is the second time in a little over a year that Parliament has had to intervene in a dispute involving the west coast ports. This would seem to indicate that there is a basic problem in the structure of collective bargaining in B.C. ports.

For this reason, I intend to strike a board of inquiry on labour relations, whose mandate will be to report on the ways that parties involved in handling cargo in ports can avoid closing down ports in the future when they are in the process of resolving their labour conflicts, because closure compromises our competitiveness on the world market and our reputation as a trustworthy exporter, and forces Parliament to take rapid action.

Mr. Speaker, clearly, we must avoid a repeat of this situation in the years to come. And I have told my colleagues that I am personally committed to finding a long–term solution to these labour–relation problems which have become endemic to west coast ports. That is why I would like to ask the members of this House to support the bill before us—to ensure that we will be able to move goods destined for export markets through west coast ports in the near future as we did before.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte–Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the official opposition agreed to today's emergency debate on this labour relations problem on the West Coast.

However, we still have questions and—in light of the government's proposals—we will oppose the bill as drafted. We will propose a number of amendments in committee of the whole and if these amendments are approved by the government, we would then vote in favour of the bill.

We have questions because this bill comes after a general strike was called at midnight last night. So a special bill was introduced less than 15 hours after the strike started. Logically, this amounts to calling into question the right to strike. Let us say so clearly. How can we talk about the right to strike when special back–to–work legislation is introduced after 15 hours? In fact, the potential right to strike cannot be exercised if a special bill is tabled less than 24 hours after a strike is called.

Last year, it was the same problem at the same port but with a different group, the dockers. We then agreed that the thing to do was to launch a debate on the issue right away and put in place settlement mechanisms. In this regard, I commend the industrial inquiry commission initiative. However, last year, the Minister of Human Resources Development told us that, in actual fact, arbitration was futile, that we had to move on to the last offer mechanism—the last union proposal and the last offer from management.

This year, we are rediscovering the advantages of arbitration. I think that this shows a kind of inconsistency. Let me say clearly that I favour neither approach. Nonetheless, I fail to see how you could be against arbitration last year and, this year, consider arbitration to resolve the dispute at the very same place, the same port, with more or less the same players.

It seems to me that inasmuch as the right to strike is recognized, it is important to give both sides time to bargain not only before action is taken, but also while pressure is being exercised. Provided of course that negotiations can take place in acceptable and modern conditions.

This brings me to the whole issue of the anti–strikebreaking legislation. Such an act exists in Quebec. In fact, it was enacted as early as 1977 if I am not mistaken. Ontario and British Columbia have since followed suit. This means that 70 per cent of the people of Canada are governed by such legislation.

We are finding out that strikes tend to last much longer in areas under federal authority than in Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia, where anti–strikebreaking legislation is in force. I remember mail strikes. These were extremely violent strikes, but strikes are becoming much less violent in provinces with anti–strikebreaking legislation, and I think that the hon. minister is aware of this.

In Quebec, the CPQ has made no demands denouncing the anti–strikebreaking legislation in recent years.

• (1905)

It used to at first, but I think that based on the results, the benefits of such legislation, the council realized that it made for better labour relations, as negotiations were more meaningful in a way, disputes were fewer and more easily resolved, all because modern legislation was in place.

When I hear that action is urgently required, I agree. But, as I said earlier, we plan to move amendments in committee of the whole. I wonder why it is not considered equally urgent to act to put an end to the strike at Ogilvie Flour in Montreal. That stike has not been going on for 15 hours, but nearly a year. One year, and no anti–scab legislation. Yet, if there is a company which does not care about its workers, it is Ogilvie.

Let me give you some examples. The negotiations were conducted in English. The employer refused to negotiate in French in Quebec. This is illegal under the Quebec Labour Code. Indeed, since law 101 and the various related provisions were passed, negotiations must be conducted in French.

The employer, AND, a company whose board of directors includes former Prime Minister Brian Mulroney, refused to negotiate in French. How nice. So, no anti–scab legislation in the case of Ogilvie. Yet, it seems to me that there is some urgency to that conflict which, as I said, did not start 15 hours ago, but several months back. There is an urgency when profits or the economy are affected—and I agree that there are workers and farmers who are hurt by that strike—and we have to take action. However, when it comes to the economic well–being of workers, their families, their salaries and their health, there is no urgency. This looks like a double standard to me.

You may remember that the Bloc Quebecois tabled an anti–scab bill, back in 1990. The Liberals, who were then sitting on this side, supported that legislation. The Minister of Human Resources Development made passionate speeches, saying that the time had come to pass such legislation. Nothing has been done since. Yet, the government could have taken action, especially in light of the fact that the strike at Ogilvie's has been going on for more than 15 hours. But there is no urgency in that case.

However, —and I know that the federal Department of Labour is considering anti–scab legislation—documents from that department suggest that a majority vote of 60 per cent should apply. For the sake of democracy—and I know that a majority vote of 50 per cent plus one in the Quebec referendum is being challenged, but this is becoming a habit with the Liberals—when a strike vote is conducted under a collective agreement, it should also be subject to the 60 per cent rule. The same bill includes other provisions—even though we were told today that these were only ideas—but I wonder why these ideas are included in a departmental discussion paper.

That document was circulated so as to inform and consult both the employers and the unions, and that is fine. It obviously circulated, because we had it. So, in this document, the door is opened to having replacement workers who are not members of the bargaining unit on strike, but who could belong to a bargaining unit other than the one on strike but with the same company, or who could be non–unionized workers.

Seen one way, this is not anti–strikebreaker legislation, but rather legislation that, in fact, allows for strikebreakers. This is very different from legislation in Ontario, British Columbia or Quebec, which stipulates clearly that only managers, who were managers before the dispute began, may work. So, I hope that if indeed there is, at some point, an anti–strikebreaker bill here, that this notion of strikebreakers would not be made legal because management would be using people from the same company, but from another unit, or non–unionized workers as replacements for unionized workers.

This is nothing more than a legal façade to avoid facing reality. As the minister just told us she was ready to face reality, I imagine she will discover the subterfuge of certain of her deputy ministers, who are circulating documents, which do not in any way, shape or form, resolve the issue of the presence of strikebreakers. I think that anti–strikebreaking legislation would allow us to humanize our labour relations, a far cry from what is happening in certain American states, for example, where shots are fired during disputes, and also far removed from what once happened in Quebec and in other Canadian provinces.

I remember the Robin Hood strike, in 1977, or the postal workers' strike, where there was a lot of violence. At that time, scabs were even paid, with their hotel rooms and all, with federal funds. It was Canada Post that was paying their salaries, their food, and perhaps other things, I am not sure, but at least these things. And the Liberals, who were then in the official opposition, were denouncing that.

Since we are reviewing the Labour Code, I would also like to point this out. We are currently talking about a particular dispute, but it is part of a much greater issue. Hence the need to hold a commission of inquiry on labour relations practices in the port of Vancouver. But I know that this issue is only a part of a broader one which opens the door to a review of the code.

So, I hope that this will also open the door to giving Quebec female workers the same rights, whether they are under the federal code or the provincial code. I am alluding here to the preventative withdrawal of pregnant women. If you are a woman working in the communication or banking sector, depending on the federal system under which you work, you do not have the right to preventative withdrawal under the same conditions as a woman working in Quebec. When there were only eight members of the Bloc Quebecois in the House, we had proposed such an amendment and the Liberals had supported it. So, I hope that they will remember that when they review the code in its entirety.

When we talk about this strike in Vancouver, we must also consider that there are other strikes going on. There is one in the railways and also one in the port of Montreal. It would be interesting if, before we resort to a special legislation to force employees back to work in the port of Montreal, we would choose the mediation process and name a mediator who would bring parties together, since they are already close to a settlement. They are negotiating in Montreal, not any more seriously than in Vancouver, but I think the chances of settling the dispute are better there than in Vancouver.

I have participated in long negotiations and I know that it is often better not to go into a useless mediation right at the beginning of a conflict and do nothing afterwards. But when you are close to a settlement, when you can see that only a few elements still need to be ironed out, mediation can be a very important tool. I hope that, in the case of the port of Montreal, the minister will choose this solution and not a special legislation.

In conclusion, I would like to announce that we will be voting against this bill at the second reading stage, because we feel it does not really allow for negotiations between the parties. I personally think that we are dealing with this situation very seriously, all the more so since we are working with the commission, and therefore I think we should be able to go into mediation without arbitration. First we should proceed only through mediation and let the parties negotiate and the mediator should not become an arbitrator. How can the parties trust anyone who will make suggestions if they know that, in case of disagreement between them, that person will turn the suggestions into obligations?

I think that instead of setting conditions, the mediator could report to the minister, who could in turn report to the Human Resources Committee—since there is no Labour Committee yet, but we will remedy that—or even to this House in order to discuss the issue with all members and parties concerned, rather than immediately determining the conditions after fifteen hours of strike, because that will be the case.

For those who are familiar with labour relations, it is the same thing as for tripartite tribunals. One union representative, one employer representative and a so–called neutral arbitrator. As we know, the decision is always two against one. The arbitrator takes sides. Expenses can be reduced by naming only one instead of three since the result of the vote is already known, even if we do not know at the outset which party the arbitrator will support.

Therefore, the Official opposition will vote against the bill at second reading and we will introduce a series of amendments in committee of the Whole House, hoping that the government will accept them and allow this House, as unanimously as possible, to encourage labour relations that are as fair, acceptable, normal and modern as possible in the port of Vancouver.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): The agreement was that there could be twenty minutes for comments. Is there unanimous consent?

We now resume the debate with the hon. member for Kamouraska—Rivière–du–Loup.

• (1915)

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière–du–Loup, BQ): Madam Speaker, I have been a member of this House for 15 or 16 months now, and I would not have thought that we would have to pass two special pieces of legislation for the same port in such a short time. In little over a year, this is the second time we see that there is something wrong in this work environment.

If I remember correctly, last year the minister in charge, the Minister of Human Resources Development, possibly because of the scope of his duties or maybe because known facts were not taken into account, did not follow up on that special legislation and, now, we have to pass back to work legislation for another group of workers.

Not only did we not learn anything from last year's experience, but we do not seem to be learning very much from the present situation either. I was watching the news on TV, tonight, and I noticed that the transportation sector is in turmoil over labour relations. There are potential labour disputes in the railway industry and in ports all over Canada. The message this legislation sends will be important for future negotiations in these sectors.

If the parties are not convinced of the importance of agreeing among themselves, if we give them the habit of waiting for a third party to settle their problems for them, we create the type of work relations which now prevail in the port of Vancouver. I think that an imposed solution is unacceptable and never brings about suitable results. Therefore, it is important that we send the message to other economic sectors that parties must pursue negotiations as far as the process allows.

The official opposition felt that a debate on this legislation was urgently needed, but I think citizens have a right to know that this urgency is not the result of this one incident. It is the result of the government's lack of foresight, as it has known about the problems at the port of Vancouver for some time now.

The government was aware of problems in this area but did nothing about them. And now, it steps in and says to the people involved, as if they were children, that because they could not work things out among themselves that it is going to have to do it for them. This only perpetuates the idea that they do not have to negotiate with each other to find durable and constructive ways to improve their working climate.

The minister's announcement that an investigating committee will be struck is interesting, but we must ensure that the parties will participate and will find solutions. I think that even if we agree that a mediator must be named and that people must be legislated back to work, the current legislation should allow negotiations to carry on and should not impose an outside solution which, at any rate, will never satisfy anyone.

I think that we will know we have succeeded in transforming labour relations at the port of Vancouver when a collective agreement is signed without third–party intervention and when all of the parties concerned have the impression that they signed an agreement which is to their advantage.

When both parties are ready to be reasonable, they will realize that working conditions are better during a period covered by a collective agreement when it is signed and accepted by all parties involved. This is how we can break the vicious cycle that labour relations at the port of Vancouver have been stuck in.

Hopefully, this will be the last time during this Parliament that we will have to bring in special legislation, because it is always a sign that the system is ineffective.

[English]

Mr. Dale Johnston (Wetaskiwin, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I will be sharing my time with the member for Wild Rose.

For 11 days in 1994 shipping through the B.C. ports was paralyzed. The estimates of the losses to the Canadian grain industry ran in the hundreds of millions of dollars. We are talking about grain in that instance. There were also manufacturers who lost out in the strike in 1994.

What did that strike cost them? It is difficult to measure that. Even more difficult to measure is the damage to our reputation as a reliable shipper. These were not the only losers in that strike. I believe everybody in a strike or a lockout situation is ultimately a loser. The workers on strike will probably never be able to make up for the wages they lost during that time.

It is absolutely ludicrous that such losses should be allowed to occur over and over again. In doing a little research, I came upon some bills that were very similar in nature. Some of them would think we could dust off and they would be suitable for today.

They are dated 1986, 1987, 1988 and 1989 right up to 1994 when we had to consider just such legislation in order to get the port of Vancouver working again. Déjà vu, here we are again. Sixty per cent of Canada's grain exports have been held in limbo. When one ties up that system, it has a domino effect. It backs up right to the farmers' gates. Nobody in a strike situation is in a winning position.

My friend from Rivière–du–Loup pointed out that perhaps because this has happened so often, the collective bargaining process is failing. I could not agree with him more.

Our minister has assured the House she would like to put something in place to ensure this does not happen again. I hear my friend from Rivière–du–Loup saying the same thing. He would like to make sure we do not have to go through this painful exercise, that perhaps when labour and management realize it is only a matter of time before the government steps in they maybe are not bargaining as closely and as honestly as they should.

I would be delighted if the Minister of Labour would look closely at what the Reform Party has put forward. My colleague from Lethbridge has put forward Bill C–262, a final arbitration bill, which we hope would never have to be used. Just because it is there does not mean that it is something we are going to beat up either management or union with and make them settle.

It is intended so both management and union know that if they cannot come to an agreement, they had better bargain hard and fast or this could be implemented.

We also have to look at what kind of a situation we would be in if the strike and lockout situation at the port of Vancouver were settled tomorrow. That contract is only good until December 31, 1995.

Then negotiations will start all over again. Perhaps next year at this time we would be back in the House considering back to work legislation again. Today the Minister of Labour announced the establishment of a commission to study labour relations.

• (1925)

I invite the Minister of Labour to read through our bill, to study our bill and to see the merit in it. If the minister is philosophically opposed to supporting a motion simply because it came from the Reform Party, then fine. Defeat that motion, but bring in another one that is very similar and will accomplish the same thing.

In speaking to the port authority today in Vancouver, it was estimated that in the container business alone, some 7,000 containers at about an average income of $1000 per container for handling has been lost in the little time this strike has been going on. This adds up to $7 million in lost revenue, not to say anything about the damage done to our reputation as a reliable supplier and what it has done to labour management relations.

A chain reaction takes place whenever we have a situation of this type. We are in a situation in which some 405 people have managed to bring the entire west coast shipping to a halt. It completely grinds to a stop from the port right back to the gate of the farmers and the manufacturers.

Is it not odd that these people at the port have never been designated as an essential service until they go on strike or are locked out? Suddenly they are essential. The fact we have to bring in legislation to put them back to work makes them essential in my books.

Bill C–262 would not only be a very useful tool to labour and management, it would not only apply to the port of Vancouver, but also to the port of Montreal where we have a similar situation taking place.

The port of Montreal is a very important east coast facility and we should be considering some intervention in that area. We have been reading in the paper where the port of authority there expects the government to take action, thereby strengthening our case that Bill C–262 would be required reading for the Minister of Labour.

We are not trying to point the finger at anyone in particular. It takes two organizations to come up with a conflict and I am sure there are two sides to this conflict.

Our final offer arbitration bill would be a very useful tool, one probably welcomed by both business and labour and I encourage the House to support that bill.

The Reform Party will be supporting back to work legislation.

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I thank my colleague for his fine words. I am pleased to support this move tonight.

A number of things have crossed my mind since this affair began. I cannot help but remember the first two or three things that came to my understanding. We had some young families in Wild Rose that work for small businesses, exporters, mainly hay processors, that were laid off a week ago because the signs were coming that things were going wrong.

These people were the ones making $9 or $10 an hour. They do not make car payments and they do not make house payments because they cannot do that on $9 or $10 an hour. They have young children and are trying to survive. It is a shame that hundreds of these individuals are trying to get into the work market, trying to make a go of things, trying to stay off of welfare and doing all the right things. Suddenly there is a move about somewhere and they are being held hostage. They cannot go to work. There is nothing to do because a few people somewhere are stopping the work or not allowing the procedure to take place.

There is a discouraging part about it. I stood in this place less than 24 hours ago and asked if the House would consider giving unanimous consent to debate legislation requiring the workers to go back to work. The disappointing part was that right away we heard "no, no way" from the other side of the House. Good grief, here we are one night later doing exactly what I asked to do last night.

What was so unusual about getting going last night? Is it a bad deal that it happened to come from this side of the House? Did we have to wait another few hours to make sure it came from that side of the House?

Mr. Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville): It has to be a Liberal idea.

Mr. Thompson: It has to be a Liberal idea; it is no good otherwise. That is a shame. What did we hear? We heard: "No way", but here we are tonight debating something we all agree on.

There was noise from the opposition as soon as I mentioned that we should debate legislation to get these people back to work. What else did I hear? I heard irresponsible from Bloc members. I will tell them what is irresponsible. It is irresponsible when 295 individuals sitting in the House continually let these kinds of things go on year after year.

I admire and commend the Minister of Labour for her move. She said tonight that we must get something in place to make certain these kinds of things do not happen again. It is a good idea, even if it did come from the Liberal side. It is too bad they did not feel the same way last night. We could have got going a lot sooner, or maybe last year instead of letting it go for 12 days. We are just asking people to wake up.

A small business in my riding, Transfeeder, worked very hard this year to re–establish the business it lost last year. It does not employ a great number of people but it is doing its very best to help. It is part of a big picture. Last year it lost $500,000 in sales during a 12–day strike. Since then it has tried to calm the fears of Japanese businessmen and managed to get new orders.

It is finally getting back on its feet and suddenly everything is in jeopardy because of a stoppage. This small business is really striving. Japanese businessmen are asking why Canada is allowing the stoppage to happen. They do not understand.

Mr. Blair Wright, owner of that business in Olds, Alberta, could only answer like all Canadians by saying that he did not know. Is it not a shame when we in the House of Commons receive calls from our constituents saying that they have to lay people off, things are falling apart and perishable goods are perishing? They are being held hostage. Farmers cannot move their grain. Everything is looking grim. Yet we in the House hear nothing more than silly comments like irresponsible or no way when we try to do something about it.

It is time we woke up, started to get more serious and change our attitudes in this place. Perhaps that would inspire some attitudes all over the country that might make a difference and keep the economy going the way we want to see it go.

Unfortunately if we did not do something all Mr. Wright's work would be in vain. All he has done for a year to try to get going would be in vain. He worries about his staff. Most of them are young families trying to get a start somewhere. Most of them earn a little better than minimum wage. We do not even know what that is like any more, we are so accustomed to our big salaries.

• (1935)

An hon. member: And pensions.

Mr. Thompson: And pensions. We have to start thinking a bit more about the little guys who are trying to get on their feet. When times are tough and we get things rolling right, let us remember that we are trying to provide services and goods that are much needed throughout the world.

In case anyone has forgotten, the most important industry in the world is agriculture. We better not ever forget that. We have to keep our food supplies going where they are needed, keep people fed when we have the opportunity to do so, keep the jobs rolling and keep giving opportunities to young people who are saying that all they want is a chance to prove themselves. They are hard workers. They do not want welfare. They do not want unemployment insurance. However we let these kinds of things go on year after year.

Bless the minister for coming up with the idea to put through some legislation that will put an end to this situation at last. Let us hope it is truly meant and let us hope that irresponsible opposition parties will fall into line and support logical legislation of this nature.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona, NDP): Madam Speaker, I rise to indicate the opposition of the New Democratic Party to this back to work legislation. I suppose it will come as no surprise to those who are familiar with the stance that the NDP has taken in the past on back to work legislation.

I was in the House on a number of occasions when we dealt with some of the back to work legislation members referred to earlier tonight. Unfortunately, I say to the member for Wild Rose, I have heard other ministers of labour say that they had to do something about bringing forward a system to ensure that they would not have to do this as often as they do.

I have two things to say in that regard. I hope this time the government will try to bring in such a system. However we ought not to assume the system it brings forward is one we will automatically agree with. We may have problems with it but certainly the government ought to make an effort in that regard.

It was interesting to listen to some of the remarks members of the Bloc Quebecois, the official opposition, made on this matter. Earlier they had an opportunity in the House to delay the legislation and they did not use it. When the government invoked the standing order that permitted it to proceed without unanimous consent, if 10 Bloc Quebecois members had risen at the appropriate time to object we would not be dealing with the legislation tonight. There seems to be a bit of a gap between rhetoric and reality when it comes to the attitude of the official opposition in this regard.

With respect to the government and its sense of urgency which it did not display yesterday but which it has in abundance today, its sense of urgency is related to the movement of grain and the importance of agriculture. We all know how the argument goes.

I wonder why the government always refuses to take seriously and hold up to public attention that in many of these cases, as was the case yesterday and today before the lockout, the workers were willing to continue moving grain. I know this does not help other shippers but grain is often held up as the reason for the urgency.

In these situations I have seen workers and unions repeatedly offer to keep moving grain. It is the companies, the employers, that will not tolerate the situation because they want the government to step in. They rely on it. They know if grain were to keep moving the political pressure for government intervention would disappear. Therefore they lock out the employees to make sure the grain cannot keep moving to create the appropriate political scenario so the government then has in some sense a false sense of urgency. If the government really had a sense of urgency about moving grain, it would respond to the offer of the employees in the situation and make sure it was accepted by the company. But the government never does that. It never ever does that. That is something I wanted to put on record.

When I last checked about an hour ago bargaining was continuing between the union and management. It would certainly be ironic if by the time we finished tonight they had an agreement. Let us hope so. It is always better if something can be negotiated rather than brought to a conclusion by legislation.

Again going back to the extent to which the government often bases its arguments about its concern about moving grain—and I know my Reform colleagues will not agree with me—this is the same government that announced in the budget the end of the Crow benefit. In the judgment of many, and not just the New Democratic Party, that had an extremely deleterious effect on western Canadian farmers.

We are supposed to believe the crocodile tears that are being offered on the other side for western Canadian farmers when only a couple of weeks ago, in the their budget of February 27, the Liberals completed the job that they started in 1983 in the House when they were in government. It was the Liberal government of that day, I would remind western Canadian farmers who might be listening, that began the demise of the Crow rate.

I was here then and part of that great parliamentary battle. That was before the Tory government changed all the rules so that opposition could not have great parliamentary battles any more. We cannot delay things. We cannot allow time for public opinion to develop. We cannot do all the things opposition parties used to be able to do to give public opinion time to mobilize on an issue. It does take time.

It was the Liberals who started doing the job on the Crow rate then and they are finishing it now by getting rid of the Crow benefit. I do not swallow it when I hear Liberal cabinet ministers or Liberal members or anybody else getting up and giving me the old sob story about western Canadian grain farmers. From our point of view we believe the Liberals are doing far more harm to the agricultural community in western Canada by virtue of the policies announced in their budget than a strike on the west coast could ever do.

I would like to pick up on something the Bloc Quebecois mentioned, that is the need for anti-scab legislation in the federal jurisdiction. There is a campaign on now. I am sure the minister, even though she is new in office, will have inherited a rather large file from her predecessor of letters from all across the country, from locals, regional and provincial federations of labour and other labour leaders calling for anti–scab legislation in the federal arena.

I would certainly like to add my voice as NDP labour critic to the call for that kind of legislation. I say that in an uncritical way. It may be that the government will bring forward a form of anti–scab legislation that will be unacceptable and will only, as the member said earlier, legalize a form of scab labour by sanctifying the movement of employees in a way that amounts to the same thing. We will wait to see exactly what the minister has in mind.

We know that in those provinces where genuine anti–scab legislation has been brought forward there is a lot less labour–management strife. Management has to bargain. It is not that all management bargains in bad faith, but there are rotten apples. Sometimes they bargain in the knowledge that they can put people out on strike and hire scab labour. When that kind of legislation is in place they cannot do that and they have to bargain in good faith. I hope we will see very soon from the government legislation in that regard.

In my riding a strike has been ongoing for two and a half years. I see the same guys walking back and forth in front of the Northern Blower plant in my riding. I believe this is their third winter. They are dealing with a company that has absentee ownership that does not care. It will not bargain. It has scab labour in there. These guys have been in this situation for a long time. If we had that kind of legislation in the provincial domain in Manitoba they would not be in that kind of situation. It is wrong for that to happen to people. I hope that we will see anti–scab legislation in those provinces which do not now have it and at the federal level.

Just the other day I went to the shopping centre in my riding. A fellow stopped me as I came out. The projectionists at Famous Players theatres are on strike. They are being asked by a company that I understand is making good profits to take a 60 per cent cut in wages.

What is going on when companies can ask people to take this kind of beating in their standard of living, particularly when those companies are making money? The company has brought in other people to run the projectors. If it was not able to do that it would have to bargain more seriously with its workers and would not be able to demand these kinds of concessions from them.

I have mentioned the situation of the lockout when it comes to the west coast. We have a similar thing happening at CP Rail right now. The brotherhood of maintenance workers decided to have a series of rotating or geographically isolated strikes, not to shut down the whole system, but to demonstrate anger at the situation without endangering the economy as a whole. What did the company do? The company locked the workers out. The company tries to create a crisis.

Obviously we do not have the crisis yet that the company wants. I am sure it would like to see back to work legislation but I would try to counsel in the same vein as others counselled the minister yesterday. Why not try to do something now about the situation facing us with respect to the railways rather than waiting until the situation develops further?

I am not talking about back to work legislation. I am talking about bringing the parties together and knocking some sense into the railways. They cannot expect railway workers to give up the kind of employment security benefits they negotiated. The workers gave up things for that security at the bargaining table years ago.

The railways cannot have it both ways. They cannot have asked employees in the past to give up certain benefits in order to get employment security and then at some point down the road say: "Do you know that employment security we gave you in return for all those things, well, we want it back. However we are not interested in giving back to you any of the things that you gave us in order to receive employment security".

I have a final comment. These debates always illustrate the kind of philosophical gap that exists between how we interpret the actions of working people and how we interpret the actions of people with money.

I heard the member for Wild Rose talk about the young business couple in his riding being held hostage by, in this case I presume, the longshoremen. I heard somebody else talk about the fact that a small number of people can hold up the whole country in this way. I understand that argument.

Why do we not have the same sense of offence when a small number of money speculators can hold the whole country hostage? Why do we not take the same offence at the small number of currency traders, the global casino operators? Why do we not take the same offence when they say: "I am not getting a high enough interest rate out of you, Canada, so I am going to undermine your economy".

Why is their economic freedom and their self–interested economic judgment to be respected and appeased? Why do we listen for instance to members of the Reform Party get up in the House even today and say: "We have to do what these money markets want us to do". Why is their economic self–interest sacred and yet the economic self–interest of longshoremen is held in a different category, if not in contempt?

• (1950)

I say not just to the Reformers because I have seen this happen long before they arrived here but we make this distinction. When working people say: "I will withdraw my labour because I am not satisfied with the return I am getting on it," we say: "Don't be so unreasonable. Think of the entire economy. Think of the shippers, think of the small businessmen, think of the people you are hurting".

However, when a money speculator or a currency trader or an investor says: "I withdraw my investment. I withdraw my money from this situation because I am not happy with what I am getting," we say: "That is the way the world works, you had better get used to it". This is a double standard that ought to be exposed.

We must treat both arguments for economic self–interest equally. I would be quite prepared to live in a world where unions, like everyone else, were made accountable to the common good. But I am not prepared to live in a world where unions get the argument that they have to take everyone else's welfare into account while money speculators, investors and everyone else can just do whatever in hell they like and that is called reality. No way.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale, Lib.): Madam Speaker, can I ask your advice? How much longer are we debating?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Until 8.07 p.m. We have 80 minutes debate allocated. We have 17 minutes until 8.07.

Mr. Peterson: I am very pleased to be able to say a few words tonight because I believe we are going through a period of incredible transition in our country. We have seen the government having to do things that five years ago we never would have dreamed would have been necessary when we brought down the budget.

Canadians realize that there is no longer that pot of gold out there or that our future is assured or guaranteed. People are uneasy because they know we are facing change. They also know that in Canada we have assets unparalleled in any other country in the world: natural resources and human resources to actually make the transition from a resource based economy to an economy dependent on human skills competing in the global economy.

We can do this but it is going to require a lot of changed attitudes. I do not believe that in the future the concept of management on the one side; labour, be they unionized or not, on the other side, be it government or the public, are going to necessarily be the stakeholders in the way they have in the past.

We have introduced in our country and throughout the western world, for very good reasons, the concept of collective bargaining, the concept that workers have the right to negotiate freely for their conditions and for their terms of employment. Management has the right to lock out workers if they do not accept the union offer. However, more and more we are going to have to realize that workers are citizens of the country, that managements are citizens of the country and that all of us have a stake in finding new ways to deal with labour disputes.

Can we afford to go back to the era of 10 years ago when we had the worst labour–management record of any of the industrialized countries? We were doing it to ourselves. Of course we cannot because we are now competing in a global economy where other nations have learned to resolve their labour disputes in a civilized, non–confrontational, non self–inflicting damage manner. Anytime there is a strike or a lockout it is an admission of failure in the collective bargaining process. Let us recognize that.

I am glad in the present circumstances that we let this thing go as long as we possibly could to see if a collective agreement could be arrived at by a negotiated solution. This is always best, rather than imposing conditions which may not be acceptable to either side.

We had to act however. The member for Wild Rose puts it very forcefully. They went on strike this morning. That is why, with the consent of all members, we are sitting tonight to pass that legislation. Maybe some members, like the member for Winnipeg Transcona, do not necessarily agree with this. I understand some of his concerns for the working person. However we have to recognize that the moment we start using lockouts and strikes, we are denying our competitive ability vis–à–vis all of our neighbours in the global economy. How irrational can we be to allow these things to take place?

Legislation preventing strikes in every circumstance is obviously not the solution. As people with a duty of public leadership in Parliament perhaps we have to work more closely with labour and management to see if we can settle these strikes before they become self–defeating for all of us. Maybe we are going to have to find ways to say: "You just cannot strike in certain circumstances. You cannot lock out in certain circumstances because it is against the national interest".

Maybe we can look at new solutions such as final offer arbitration.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Peterson: Maybe these are some of the approaches we can go into. However, we know the risk is always there if management and labour in a dispute know that government will step in and settle that dispute by legislation. Then they will not negotiate in good faith.

Looking ahead, the solutions are not always that obvious to us. If they were, we would have found them a long time ago. No one in the House believes that strikes and lockouts are the solution. But I do believe that if we keep stressing that we are now in this together, it is not a question of adversaries and stakeholders fighting it out. We are all in the same boat. If we are fighting one another, we are drilling a hole in the bottom of our own boat. This has to be the attitude we bring to our future as management, as labour, as citizens and as government.

With this approach we are going to be able to overcome a lot of the animosities of the past. In doing this, we will have to ensure that we do not allow the injustices to creep in which gave rise during the twenties and the dirty thirties to organized labour that had to strike. We are going to have to make sure that we do not have the rapacious management of the twenties and the thirties that was capable of dictating not only wages and hours, but conditions that were unsanitary, unhealthy and such things. That is not what we are asking for. We are enlightened.

We know that a happy workforce is a productive workforce, is a competitive workforce. We know that a management team that works with labour and shares their problems, that brings them to the table, that opens the books to them, that says: "We have a big problem, how do we fix it together," is the type of enlightened management that avoids problems and brings about the new routes to productivity being employed by many of our competitors around the globe.

Let us not rejoice tonight in the fact that we have had to legislate an end to this work stoppage. Let us recognize that what has happened is a failure for every one of us. It is a failure for everyone in this House who did not use his or her collective strength and ability to say to labour and management, is there not a better way. It is a failure based on the way we have done things in the past. We have done them better recently, but it is only 10 years ago that we had the worst record for lost days because of work stoppages, strikes and lockouts.

• (2000)

Let us say we have done what we have had to do. It was necessary in the public good. Let us say, can we not use this as an occasion to find a better way for the future.

[Translation]

Recognizing the role played by workers, unions, companies, and Canadians in general, we must recognize that the measures taken today are not remarkable and that their sole purpose is to protect exports, harbours, and farmers, and to provide essential services. But, from now on, let us recognize that we must find more efficient and more realistic alternatives to ensure peace on the labour front, and co–operation between unions and management, in order for Canada to become stronger, more competitive and more prosperous.

The Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Deputy Speaker: All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

(The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:)

The Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

(Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went in committee thereon, Mr. Kilgour in the chair.)

[English]

The Chairman: Order. House in committee of the whole on Bill C-74, an act respecting the supervision of longshoring and related operations at west coast ports.

[Translation]

The parliamentary secretary to the Leader of the government in the House has the floor regarding clause 2.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Chairman, some discussions took place between the different parties in this House.

[English]

Mr. Chairman, I think you will find there is unanimous consent if such is required, but you will find there is general consent in the committee to have the amendments put by members of the opposition. I do not believe there are any government amendments to the bill, although there may be some, as the hon. member for Calgary Southwest is keen on saying.

The opposition may wish to move amendments and there would be a disposition to allow all of those amendments to be put, notwithstanding which clause they may be on. Then the discussion could range over all of the clauses and all of the amendments while being nominally on clause 2.

At the end of the discussion I think you would find a disposition to put the question in order on all of the clauses, the amendments appropriately placed for each clause, the title and the preamble, or whatever there may be to put questions on at the end of the bill. I would invite the Chairman to do that if that is satisfactory. I think you will find general consent.

[Translation]

The Chairman: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Chairman: We received 11 amending clauses and I believe all of them are in order.

The chief opposition whip has the floor regarding clause 2.

On Clause 2

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie, BQ): Mr. Chairman, I will table a series of eight amendments supported by the hon. member for Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup, and I will read each of them.

The first amendment reads:

That Bill C-74, in Clause 2, be amended by deleting, in lines 18 and 19, on page 1, the word "arbitrator".

The second amendment reads:

That Bill C–74, in Clause 6, be amended by deleting, in line 7, on page 3, the word "mediator–arbitrator" and replacing it with the word "parties".

The third amendment reads:

That Bill C–74, in Clause 8, be amended by deleting, in lines 30, 36 and 37, on page 3, the word "arbitrator".

The fourth amendment reads:

That Bill C–74, in Clause 8(2)(b), be amended by deleting, in lines 11 and 12, on page 4, the words "and render a decision in respect thereof" and replacing them with the words "and report to the minister".

The fifth amendment reads:

That Bill C–74, in Clause 8, on page 4, be amended by deleting paragraph (2)(c), paragraph (2)(d), paragraph (3)(b) and paragraph (4) and by deleting, in line 18, the word "arbitrator".

The sixth amendment reads:

That Bill C–74, in Clause 9, on page 4, be amended by deleting the word "arbitrator", in line 34, and by deleting all the words following the word "mediation", in lines 40 to 45.

The seventh amendment reads:

That Bill C–74, in Clause 10, on page 5, be amended by deleting the word "arbitrator", in lines 3 and 4.

The eighth amendment reads:

That Bill C–74, in Clause 11, on page 5, be amended by deleting after the word "provision", on line 17, all the words in lines 17 to 21.

• (2035)

Mr. Chairman, I already made a speech at second reading and those amendments reflect the proposals put forth during that speech. Consequently, I have nothing else to add and I will let other members speak on these issues.

Hon. Lucienne Robillard (Minister of Labour, Lib.): Mr. Chairman, the amendments submitted by the Bloc Quebecois, as I understand them, are meant to introduce a mediation system without arbitrators, without a timetale and without any indication of what would be done with the mediator's report.

I would simply like to remind the members of this House that when the conflict began in the western ports, the government followed all of the steps set out in the Canada Labour Code. The first step was to name a conciliator from the department's Mediation and Conciliation Service. This conciliator was named back in 1993 to help the parties negotiate with each other. Unfortunately, the conciliator achieved no real results.

Then, my predecessor officially named a conciliation commissioner. This action was taken back in October 1994. The commissioner worked with the parties for several months and submitted a report quite recently, in February 1995.

Therefore, I think that all of the possible mediation and conciliation steps to bring the parties to an agreement regarding the collective agreement have already been taken. This is why I find myself obliged to tell the Bloc Quebecois that it would be extremely difficult for this government to accept its proposed amendments.

Mr. Duceppe: Mr. Chairman, our amendments clarify a number of points, including what should be done with the report. We suggest submitting the report to the minister. I assume that if the minister received a mediation report which involved the participation of both parties, she would know what to do, which means at least reading it and probably taking some kind of action. That was my first point.

Second, I realize there was an investigation commissioner, but the fact remains that special legislation has something urgent about it and is a major step in the process, and the parties would certainly take the mediator's proposals more seriously in the knowledge that the minister would subsequently receive a report which they had helped to draft and that the minister would be able to intervene, to take this report and bring the discussions and the mediator's proposals before the House.

So I think the basics are there. And if the minister wants to include a time limit in days in the amendments we are proposing, well, we would be happy to oblige if the minister is so concerned about that.

On the other hand, I must say that when we consider how this dispute developed, all the employer did was order a lock–out and 15 hours later we have special legislation. This tends to poison labour relations, and that is exactly what happened.

• (2040)

It should be pointed out that the union allowed grain movement and longshoring. It was management that interrupted these essential services which could be maintained under an anti–strikebreaking act. I disagree somewhat with my colleague from the NDP who said earlier that the Bloc Quebecois had made this emergency debate possible. I think it is important to debate this issue, even though we will be voting against this legislation.

I will remind him that, had his party held its own in the 1990 debate on anti–strikebreaking legislation, perhaps we would not be having this debate now. But the NDP did not do so in November 1990. Principles are one thing, actions are another and actions speak loader than words.

I think that, with our amendments, the hon. minister has enough material to take more significant action in this matter.

Hon. Lucienne Robillard (Minister of Labour, Lib.): Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member from the Bloc Quebecois misunderstood me. First, let me assure the House that, as Minister of Labour, I personally read each and every report I receive. Have no fear, if a report is sent to me, I will read it.

I think the Bloc member did not understand the fact that I already have a report that was sent to my predecessor. We have already tried conciliation at a previous step in this process. There was a concilation commissioner who submitted a report, not only to the minister, but to both parties involved who took cognizance of it.

The conciliation commissioner did an outstanding job. He examined in detail all the problems involved and came up with some answers. His report was handed down not only to the minister, but also to both parties involved. The bill before us provides for the appointment of a mediator–arbitrator, that is to say that the emphasis will be put, first and foremost, on mediation.

This is in line with the wishes expressed by members of the Bloc Quebecois who demanded a mediation process. This bill will ensure that such a mediation process takes place. If the parties cannot reach an agreement, the mediator will become an arbitrator and will then act in such a capacity. So, in that sense, the bill before us addresses the concerns of both parties who, unfortunately, could not come to an agreement.

As I said earlier, a Minister of Labour is always reluctant to introduce back–to–work legislation. It is always better for the parties to come to an agreement by themselves, but since this was not possible, we must act to protect the entire economy of Western Canada.

Mr. Duceppe: Mr. Chairman, I think there is a big difference with this bill. This bill provides for a back to work order which we agree with and do not wish to amend. What is proposed here is a mediation process as a result of the pressure tactics used by the union or a lockout declared by management, and we agree with a back–to–work legislation.

What we say, however, is that it would be much better for the mediator to do his or her job in a setting different from that which existed before the pressure tactics, the lockout and the special back–to–work legislation. This bill contains all the elements needed for the parties to adopt more realistic attitudes, which was not the case when an investigation commissioner was chosen even before any pressure tactics was used by the parties, something they will no longer be able to do after this bill is passed.

Mrs. Robillard: Mr. Chairman, I think that the Minister of Labour can act according to the Canada Labour Code. If I understand correctly, what is wanted is that the bill require a return to work and the appointment of a mediator who would report to the minister.

• (2045)

But what would happen afterwards? How would we make a decision? How would we reach a collective agreement? It is not incumbent on the Minister of Labour to make the final decision and to decide on the clauses of the collective agreement. It is exactly for that reason that the Canada Labour Code gives us the possibility of naming an arbitrator. And therefore it seems to me very appropriate to have a mediator–arbitrator who will be able to play both roles.

The Chairman: Before recognizing the hon. member for Kamouraska—Rivière–du–Loup, I think that I must give some explanation to the House.

[English]

We are having a general debate on all of the amendments so that any member can get up at any time on any amendment. It should be understood by all members that is the case.

[Translation]

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière–du–Loup, BQ): Mr. Chairman, I rise to provide some response to the question the minister asked and to draw attention to what I see as a contradiction between the bill and the excellent decision to set up a board of inquiry. There have been a lot of problems in this sector of labour relations for a number of years. The minister says it is time to clean things up, understand what is going on, change the rules and take the appropriate corrective action.

At the same time, the bill repeats the same old traditional pattern of making special laws for ports, as has been done for a number of years. The practice has always been to decide for the parties. We would expect, and this is the focus of our amendments rather than the elimination of the notion of arbitrator, that the minister would want to change the way things are done, just as the board of inquiry should bring about effective changes in practices and ways of operating.

We must remember that they got to this point because they knew from the outset that this was the way it worked in the sector. Therefore, from the outset, they negotiated knowing that, in the end, they would reach this point and that there might be special legislation because of what has happened in the past. What we must give them is the message that this longstanding pattern no longer works and must be changed.

Therefore, adopting a special law is no solution. We are telling them to return to work and to their bargaining responsibilities, to resume negotiations with a mediator so that they are not relieved of their responsibility, but are rather confronted with it, and will have to reach an agreement as they are the interested parties. This is the meaning of the amendments we made.

Hon. Lucienne Robillard (Minister of Labour, Lib.): Mr. Chairman, I now understand more clearly the intent of the amendments brought forward by the Bloc Quebecois, but I want to say to the members of this House that we have to solve, in the very short term, a problem that exists at this very moment. At 8.45 p.m. tonight, we have a problem in Western Canada and the appointment of a commission of inquiry will not give us short term solutions to this problem.

The appointment of a commission of inquiry will certainly help us in the medium term so that this situation does not happen again. Right now, I agree that we are opting for a more traditional solution, if I may use this expression before the members of this House, to the dispute that is going on. This more traditional solution is the appointment of a mediator–arbitrator who will impose a settlement so that we have a collective agreement that will be effective until at least December 31, 1996.

In the meantime, we will appoint a commission of inquiry which will review the bargaining process and we will be able to see what changes can be made later on. So, the bill before us will help us solve the problem in the very short term, but we will still take a long term look at the whole bargaining process.

Mr. Crête: Mr. Chairman, I would like to draw the attention of the House to the last amendment on our list because it is a little different. That amendment provides that in clause 11, on page 5, line 17, all the words after the word "agreement" be deleted. That clause reads as follows: "Nothing in this Act shall be construed so as to limit or restrict the rights of the parties to the collective agreement to agree to amend any provision of the collective agreement—and the clause goes on—amended by or pursuant to this Act, other than a provision relating to the term of the collective agreement, and to give effect thereto."

The purpose of our amendment is to delete all the words after the word "agreement" so that the parties will have much more freedom to agree on provisions other than those provided for in the bill, more particularly relating to the term of the agreement.

• (2050)

We would like the parties to have the opportunity, if they so wish, to negotiate provisions other than those in the bill, and especially a back to work agreement. It would be important for the parties to have some breathing space to do that.

Hon. Lucienne Robillard (Minister of Labour, Lib.): Mr. Chairman, I have been informed this is already possible under the present provisions of the Canada Labour Code. The amendment proposed by the hon. member for the Bloc Quebecois is unnecessary.

Mr. Crête: Mr. Chairman, if it is already indicated in the Canada Labour Code, then it is a matter of clarification. If it is already in the Canada Labour Code, it would be unnecessary to say what it says in the bill, because this would mean adding something that already exists in the Canada Labour Code. Here, certain clauses restrict the rights of the parties, but we do not want any restrictions on the rights of the parties. This is in line with getting rid of the mediator–arbitrator, but it is an additional element that could apply even if the amendment on the mediator–arbitrator is rejected.

[English]

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Mr. Chairman, it is sad that I must stand here today to talk about putting an end to a strike that should not have happened.

This type of work stoppage has happened again and again. There have been over 25 stoppages in the grain handling system in the last 25 years. There is no need for that.

The irony is that as we debate putting an end to this longshoreman strike, at this very time there is a labour disruption effecting rail movements which will still prevent the proper movement of grain and other commodities to market.

I refer to the Minister of Labour's response in question period yesterday to a question from the hon. member for Simcoe Centre. He said: "The Minister of Labour may have time to wait and sort this out but Canadian farmers do not. Present shipments are in danger. They must plan for future crops now and should not have to worry about whether the rail system will be there when they need it. I ask the minister again, when will the government introduce back to work legislation?"

The response from the Minister of Labour was: "I would like to ask the Reform member to remain calm and to refrain from spreading panic among the parties concerned. As we speak, grain is moving in the west, in Vancouver this very day. We should keep in contact with the parties and keep in mind that it is always better to negotiate an agreement than to envision legislating these people back to work".

The hon. member for Simcoe Centre said in his next question: "We have been calm far too long. When is the time to get nervous? It is right now. There have been 13 work stoppages in 29 years. Our western grain growers cannot afford to bear the brunt of another strike. Canada's transportation system must be reliable or our customers will go elsewhere. Once the back to work legislation is passed, will the government take steps to ensure the threat of future rail strikes is removed once and for all?"

The minister's response was: "As usual, the hon. member is going a bit too fast. At this stage, legislation is out of the question, so I will not answer hypothetical questions".

• (2055)

The minister's response to the Reform member's question was not acceptable then and it is not acceptable now.

Today we are talking about ending a strike which affects longshoremen. It is not good enough to do this today. We must bring in back to work legislation tomorrow to end the rail strike which will still cost farmers and other shippers money tomorrow, Friday, Saturday and the day after that.

The Chairman: The hon. member is speaking to the matter. He can speak to any of the amendments or any of the clauses. The members on the government side were listened to courteously. I think the members of the government side might listen to this member who comes from the grain producing region of Canada.

Mr. Benoit: Mr. Chairman, tomorrow let us get back to work legislation on the rail strikes. Next week let us get legislation before the House that will prevent this from happening again next year and in the years following.

I would like to thank my fellow members of caucus who have worked so hard in pushing for an end to this strike. I would like to thank in particular the member for Wild Rose for asking yesterday for an emergency debate to end the longshoremen strike which stopped movement of grain and other products. I would also like to thank the Liberal government and the labour minister for her action in legislating this strike to an end.

I want to talk about the costs this strike will bring to farmers, that the strike last year brought to farmers, that the rail strike will continue to bring to farmers in western Canada and to others who depend on this movement system.

Particularly for the farmers these costs include demurrage costs on ships that wait to be loaded. It cost millions of dollars last year in the 12–day strike. It took the government 11 days to act last year. I guess it is to be congratulated. It took less time this year with this strike. How long is the government going to take on the rail strike? We have yet to see.

There are 28 ships waiting in port right now with 17 more ships due by Friday. More than 60 per cent of the grain exports are not moving. Grain elevators are backed up. Lost sales which we incur with each of these strikes are the biggest single cost to farmers and for other shipping commodities through the west coast and other ports.

What is the value of lost sales in grain due to this strike, due to the rail strike which still continues, due to the strike last year? Last year the estimated cost over the 12–day strike was over $200 million in lost sales. This year for the longshoremen strike it will be millions more. We do not know when the rail disruption will end. I would like to ask the minister when she plans to end the rail disruption.

Why did this longshoremen strike and the rail strike ever happen? In 1992 a contract ended. We knew, this minister knew, this Liberal government knew, Reformers certainly knew, farmers knew and union members knew there would be a work stoppage.

It has become tradition for unions to depend on back to work legislation to end strikes and lockouts. It has become tradition because they have learned over the past years they do very well by waiting for government to legislate them back to work. In some cases the agreements have actually been better than they have been asking for in negotiation. Labour has come to depend on governments legislating them back to work.

Why did we have to wait until the work stoppage actually came into effect? Why are we waiting for the rail strike to continue? When will the minister act in that regard?

• (2100)

Last year when government legislated an end to a disruption on the west coast, the Reform Party presented during the debate positive alternatives which, if implemented, would have prevented this situation from ever happening. Reform pushed for last best offer arbitration during last year's debate. Nothing was done. I would like to quote from a speech that I gave about a year ago in the House in very similar circumstances.

I want to present one of the Reform options which I presented to the House at that time and which the Liberal government should have responded to then and which I ask it to respond to now.

I talked about two options. The second option:

> —is to put in place a better labour–management negotiation process. This could involve ensuring that a new agreement will be in place before the old one expires—
> To accomplish that an arbitrator could be appointed approximately six months before a contract expires. If a settlement has not been reached within two weeks of the end of the contract, then an arbitrator would ask management and labour to come up with their best offer, their best position. The arbitrator would then pick one, either the labour position or the management position. One position would be completely accepted and the other position completely rejected.
> Under this process a strike would not be allowed to occur. This is good for labour. It is good for management. It is good for western Canadian grain farmers and others using the system. These options should be considered in developing a long term solution to the recurring disruptions in the grain handling system.

That is what I recommended in debate last year.

Since then the hon. member for Lethbridge has put forward a private members' bill on this issue, Bill C–62, which he will talk about later. In that bill is the process for dealing with last best offer arbitration.

I encourage the government after the third hour of debate which takes place at noon on Monday to be here to vote in favour of Bill C–62 so that we will have in place a mechanism that will work and that will satisfy labour and management to some extent. It will prevent these disputes and these disruptions from happening in the future.

I call on the Liberals now to be here on Monday to listen to the third hour of private members' debate and to vote so that these disputes will not occur in the future.

As my last question I ask the hon. Minister of Labour if she will support Bill C–262 which will put in place a last best offer arbitration procedure that will prevent any disruptions in the grain handling system from occurring in the future?

I ask the labour minister that now and I encourage her to support the bill next Monday. I ask her whether she will support this bill.

[Translation]

The Chairman: The Minister of Labour may prefer to answer both members at the same time. The hon. member for the official opposition put a question earlier. Does the minister wish to respond or would she rather wait until the end of this discussion?

Hon. Lucienne Robillard (Minister of Labour, Lib.): Mr. Chairman, in response to the question asked by the hon. member from the Bloc Quebecois, I will remind him that clause 11 of the bill before us allows the parties to amend any provision of the collective agreement, including those that will be imposed on them, other than the term of the collective agreement, of course. Clause 11 gives a fair bit of flexibility.

• (2105)

Second, I would tell my colleague from the Reform Party that the government has already made a decision on all the problems that he has raised. First, it will solve the problem very quickly through this back to work legislation but also by setting up an industrial inquiry commission that will review the collective agreement structure.

I do not know whether the investigation commissioner will draw the same conclusions as the hon. member from the Reform Party, but I think that we should analyse the situation as a whole and that is why we will appoint an investigation commissioner.

[English]

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona, NDP): Mr. Chairman, I have a question for the Minister of Labour. I wonder if she could tell the House whether or not it is the general policy of the government to bring in back to work legislation which does not legislate a settlement, as is the case with this legislation?

Is it the policy of the government to bring in legislation without a settlement? The legislation before us does not have a settlement. It appoints a mediator or arbitrator. Is this the general policy of the government with respect to back to work legislation?

[Translation]

Hon. Lucienne Robillard (Minister of Labour, Lib.): Mr. Chairman, the government assesses each situation on its own merits.

[English]

Mr. Allan Kerpan (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre, Ref.): Mr. Chairman, I was sitting here just a few minutes ago wondering why I was happy to be here at seven minutes after nine on a Wednesday evening. I just realized what it was. I get to sit in the front row once a year. However, that is hardly reason enough to be here once a year; to pass back to work legislation in labour disputes.

Many of the points I want to make this evening to the government and to the opposition have already been made so I will dispense with them. However, there are a couple of questions and a couple of concerns that I do have with this legislation and I would like to spend a few minutes asking a couple of questions.

Before I do that, I had a letter handed to me today from an alfalfa dehydrator in Olds, Alberta. I think it is worthwhile reading it into the record tonight. It is an obvious concern from people in that industry who go through these types of labour disputes on an almost regular basis. Certainly they have concern for the future of their businesses whenever they see one coming down the road.

I will read this letter, if I may:

> If in any small way my name or the name of my company can stop the insane abuse of power a very few people have over so many others, please use them.
> In our industry Canada only has a 3 per cent market share. The U.S.A. has 85 per cent, China and Australia have about 5 per cent each. The Americans cannot be happier, they probably will sell lots more product now and will lock in more future sales because of Canada's poor track record and reliability and with no future end in sight to the strikes. My customers from Japan ask, "How can we be so stupid?" "If you cannot supply them we have no choice". Americans will win again, not because they are better, more competitive, or have better quality but through default.
> If the Dominion of Canada wants me to pay taxes and to help fight the deficit, please help me deliver products I have sold. End this strike forever.

It is signed: "A discouraged export business owner". His name is Blair Wright from Olds, Alberta.

The reason I read that is that I think it is critical. I echo the words of my colleagues who have said that we cannot continue to work under this system. I encourage the minister to develop some sort of system. I encourage her to do that in order to pre–empt these types of labour disputes. As the member of Parliament for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre, I would offer my support to the minister and I would be prepared to help in any way I can to make that happen.

• (2110)

The two questions I would like to ask the minister on the legislation are, first, why are the Montreal docks not included in this legislation? Second, if the Reform Party had been drafting this legislation it would have removed section 8 and replaced it with final offer selection, which has been discussed here before.

I want to be very clear about this. I talked to the minister's officials before the debate began tonight. I understand that the reason behind not using final offer selection is that it was used about a year ago in a labour dispute that was then ongoing. I understand and I accept what they have told me.

However, I would like to ask the minister if she believes that final offer selection could be useful at some point in this process. Would she commit the mediator–arbitrator to move to final offer selection at some point in this process if it is necessary?

[Translation]

Hon. Lucienne Robillard (Minister of Labour, Lib.): Mr. Chairman, with respect to the port of Montreal, why is the situation there not included in this bill? Well, I would say that the situation in the port of Montreal is completely different.

I said earlier that we evaluated each situation on its merits. That is what we have done in the case of the port of Montreal. As you know, there is a labour relations problem there too, but all the other ports in the province of Quebec are now also in operation. Trois–Rivières, Sorel and Quebec City come to mind. Therefore the impact or consequences are not as great compared to the situation in Western Canada. That is my first comment.

My second is that, in the port of Montreal, we have seen over the years that the parties are very often able to reach an agreement. I believe that we have not had a general strike in the port of Montreal for over 20 years. At this point I have complete confidence that the parties can still come to an agreement in the port of Montreal. It is also very clear that I am making them a formal offer of mediation, precisely for the purpose of reaching such an agreement. Under these circumstances, I would consider legislative intervention completely premature.

As for the second question, regarding the possibility of a final offer, I would like to say that the complexity of this year's debate, compared to last year's, is completely different. Last year, there was only one element involved. If I remember correctly, the issue then was whether or not to allow an increase from 65 to 70 cents. The question was very simple: yes or no? The issue was a very straightforward one.

The situation before us today is much more complex. That is why we have opted for mediation–arbitration. If there is a final offer, the decision will be up to the arbitrator.

[English]

The Chairman: The member for Winnipeg Transcona made it clear that he had not finished his earlier remarks.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Chairman, I asked the minister a question earlier.

Concerning back to work legislation, is it the general policy of the government to bring in back to work legislation which does not involve a settlement, but rather a mediator–arbitrator as is the case before us now?

The reason I ask that question is because of the debate which has already ensued here and the comments which have been made about the possibility of further back to work legislation having to do with the rail situation. There is a concern, given some of the things the Minister of Transport has said in the past, that if the government brings in back to work legislation it may legislate a settlement to get rid of or reduce severely the employment security benefits that are in the current collective bargaining agreements.

I want to ask the Minister of Labour whether or not she can give assurances to the House and to the people who are concerned about the nature of that back to work legislation. Has the government ruled out legislating a settlement, particularly in respect of the employment security benefits?

[Translation]

Hon. Lucienne Robillard (Minister of Labour, Lib.): Mr. Chairman, I repeat that each situation is assessed on its merit.

As for the railway situation, it is now 9.15 p.m., so it is premature to talk about back to work legislation. I would not want to base my opinion on assumptions, but we will assess each of these situations. I am happy to see that negotiations were going on, today, in the railway sector. Once again, the main purpose of the minister of Labour is to help parties reach an agreement and to legislate. When we do that, it is because we do not have a choice any more.

[English]

The Chairman: There are four people who want to speak and there are about 15 minutes left. One more comment from the member for Winnipeg—Transcona.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the Minister of Labour with respect, I understand there is no need for back to work legislation now and I hope there will be no need. I cannot foresee a situation in which there would be. But her colleague, the Minister of Transport, also has a responsibility in the area of rail. He has indicated on a number of occasions that the government would act to eliminate the employment security provisions of the collective bargaining agreements if they could not be negotiated away.

What policy does the Minister of Labour bring to this particular situation which I am sure she is familiar with? On the merits of the situation as she now understands it, is she prepared to tell me and this House that the government will not legislate a settlement—

The Chairman: The member has been here as long as I have and would know the matter he has raised is not relevant to the bill now before the House. If the minister wants to make a comment she can, but it is certainly not relevant to what we are talking about.

[Translation]

Mr. Claude Bachand (Saint–Jean, BQ): Mr. Chairman, I have a first question to put this debate into perspective. I keep hearing my colleague talk about strikes and more strikes. I think he mentioned the word five times. To my knowledge and from what I have read about the situation, a report was tabled, the employer implemented it unilaterally while the union was against it. The employer then proceeded to lock out the employees. To my knowledge such was the chain of events. Workers are not on strike, they have been locked–out. This is the first point. Madam Minister, I am asking you to tell us whether I am right or my colleague is right.

As to the actual return to work we have no objections, but we do have objections with what the minister is proposing, a graduated approach. She mentioned earlier a conciliation which effectively took place. Normally, the second stage in labour relations is mediation, followed by arbitration, if need be. I believe that as far as graduated responses are concerned, this one, as my hon. colleague mentioned, is rather swift, since we have already reached the mediation–arbitration stage, only twenty hours after the lock–out started. This is rather quick, and I believe that it sends a dangerous message to Canadian employers as a whole, especially since no life is at risk. I understand that from an economic perspective, this issue is very important.

It is conceivable that, from now on, employers in the rest of Canada are going to say: "If we lock out our workers, what might happen is that the minister and the House of Commons are going to pass back to work legislation which will impose a mediator–arbitrator and they will both abdicate their responsibilities".

My second question to the minister is this: Does she not think that she is going a bit too fast with her graduated back to work measures?

[English]

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Human Resources Development, Lib.): Mr. Chairman, let me take this opportunity to express my warmest and sincerest congratulations to the new Minister of Labour who acted very quickly on this issue in a very decisive fashion. I think that was warranted, given the situation we are facing.

The decision to bring in legislation to force people back to their jobs is never taken lightly. It is a step that is only taken when the stakes are too high for a strike to be left to take its course. This is such a time.

Last February, Canada's grain handling and transportation system was disrupted for 11 days when longshoremen on the west coast went on strike. It was a significant contributing factor in the big transportation backlog. This was only the most recent of several work stoppages in recent years that have affected the grains and oilseeds industry. The direct cost of that strike to the industry was estimated at $35 million above and beyond other significant losses resulting from deferred or lost sales.

Make no mistake about it. Whenever our ability to transport our grains and oilseeds and other crops to port is disrupted, our customers look to other suppliers to meet their needs. These repeated work stoppages no matter what their cause have the same results, a negative impact on our sales. Some of our customers have questioned our reputation for consistent and timely delivery of quality grains and oilseeds.

Last April and May the Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food made an important trip to Japan, Korea, China and Hong Kong. While he was there he was told face to face by some very angry customers that they were not happy with Canada's performance. The message was clear: We had better clean up our act or our customers would find other suppliers.

Immediately after that trip, to avoid any finger pointing or buck passing, as he puts it, the minister called together all the major operational players for a face to face meeting in Winnipeg on May 16. The objective of that meeting was to confront the reality of our problems and to work out practical solutions very quickly.

Now we are faced with the same issue for a second consecutive year. No one can guarantee that our customers will indeed be understanding.

I would like to mention a few specific examples of the potential impact of this strike. The Canadian Wheat Board has indicated that its export program for March is 2.9 million tonnes through both east and west coast ports. This represents an estimated sales value of $511.5 million. Every week the board exports 570,000 tonnes of wheat and barley worth more than $102 million. Over the balance of the crop year we will export more than one million tonnes a month.

Every tonne not moved in March will roll over into the next month, making it more difficult to maintain the planned export program. It does not take a rocket scientist to see that the potential for lost sales from just one week of lost shipping will have a serious impact on our grain exports.

• (2125)

The wheat board has advised us that four vessels are waiting at the west coast port as we speak. Another 18 vessels will arrive this week to load 500,000 tonnes and 12 more will arrive before the end of March. Aside from the potential cost of lost sales, the charges will be significant if work does not resume immediately. No wonder the Canadian Wheat Board has asked the government to take quick action to resolve this critical situation.

On top of the effects the strike would have on wheat and barley exports, is the potential impact on our export of canola, our second largest export crop. Canada will export 4.2 million tonnes of canola seed this year worth $1.6 million. A major portion of it will pass through the ports of the west coast.

The Chairman: Excuse me. I wonder if the member is aware that other members want to speak. There is a relatively short time left. Had the parliamentary secretary finished his remarks or was he just about to finish them?

Mr. Bevilacqua: Mr. Chairman, since the 1970s, Japan has been our largest and most reliable customer of canola seed. In fact, canola has become the predominant vegetable used in Japan. While the Japanese prize the quality of the Canadian crop, they also place a premium on reliability. Japanese crushers purchase canola on the basis of just in time delivery and inventory approach. Needless to say, strikes and other work stoppages play havoc with this system.

With the experiences of the last few years, Japanese crushers are becoming quite concerned about our ability to reliably ship the quantities of canola that are required when they are indeed required.

Last week, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture and Agri–food met with the chairman of the international affairs committee of the Japanese Oil Seed Processors Association. He was seeking assurances that there would be no disruption in our oilseed shipments. The parliamentary secretary assured him that the government would act decisively to ensure that any disruption would be very minor.

For this and many other reasons, I ask this house to support the action taken by the Minister of Labour.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Jake E. Hoeppner (Lisgar—Marquette, Ref.): Mr. Chairman, I am astounded with what I hear tonight. I am totally astounded and ashamed to stand in this House and say what I have to say tonight. Yes, ashamed that I have to say it.

For a whole week I have tried to get some communications through to the port of Montreal. Today I am told that I am such a second class citizen that they will not even listen to me in this House.

I have a constituent who has $200,000 worth of sunflower seeds locked up in the port of Montreal and he cannot get them out without even trying to ship them. The bank manager is talking about foreclosing on him and we are joking around here about the lives of people.

• (2130)

When the House passes legislation where criminals can dictate to the judicial system and get paid for inconvenience and the people in my constituency have to go hungry, something is wrong in the House.

An hon. member: He is talking about the last strike. What about this strike?

Mr. Hoeppner: The member can scream and I can scream too. This is serious to me. I told my constituent today that I would help him to take legal action whenever he can to get this mess cleaned up.

We have tried to work with the government. We have tried to work with the minister to get that stuff out of there so that it will not be ruined. However what are we doing? Nothing, absolutely nothing. That is the type Parliament that has come about. I am ashamed. I feel like taking my citizenship and moving out of the country if this is the kind of justice we have. It is time that we change it.

My uncle was shot before a firing squad in the Soviet Union to get out of a system like that and that is what we are coming to. We had better realize it. When a man who is depending on putting food on his table cannot get his product out of the yard, something is wrong.

The Chairman: Pursuant to the order made earlier this day, it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the committee of the whole stage of the bill now before the House.

Hon. Lucienne Robillard (Minister of Labour, Lib.) moved that Bill C–74 be concurred in.

Mrs. Robillard moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

She said: Mr. Speaker, it is with conviction that I rise again in this House to introduce the 1995 legislation on west coast port operations. As you know, the purpose of this bill is to end the current dispute between two parties.

I have already explained at length all the details surrounding this dispute which, in my opinion and in the opinion of many Canadians, cannot go on. Until now, the government had provided all the assistance it could to help solve the problems. First, we appointed a conciliator.

Then we appointed a conciliation commissioner, whose report was submitted to the parties. Unfortunately, we face a situation which requires government action. Believe me, it is with regret that, as the Minister of Labour, I must table this bill before the members of this House. It would be much better—and we all know it—for the parties to negotiate a collective agreement together, and that is our basic policy.

However, all port operations on the west coast have now come to a stop and the economic consequences are such that the government must act. This bill provides for the immediate resumption of operations and the appointment of a mediator–arbitrator, who, I hope, will bring the parties closer.

In closing, allow me to thank all the members of this House for their co–operation on this bill. This shows, I think, that we all care about this country's economic development.

Mr. Réal Ménard (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve, BQ): Mr. Speaker, you will, however, understand that my speech will differ from that of the Reform Party, even though we are both speaking in opposition.

I would like to say that it is always difficult moment for Parliament when its elected members are obliged to adopt special legislation to force people back to work, since we agree, hope and say that, in the workplace, there is nothing better than a collective agreement that is wanted, negotiated and implemented by the parties.

Therefore, I believe that the Minister of Labour cannot be particularly proud of starting her career here in this House, by imposing special legislation. She will be quite free in the coming days to go down in history by allowing us to adopt anti–strikebreaker legislation, legislation sought by the official opposition from the time there were eight of us, and we continue to think that this must be done.

• (2145)

Therefore, we are saying to the minister that the best way for her to continue her work as Minister of Labour is not to introduce more back to work legislation, but to follow in the footsteps of one of the greatest Quebec democrats, a person she should seek to emulate, I am referring, of course, to René Lévesque who gave the province of Quebec an effective anti–scab legislation.

Since I mentioned anti–scab legislation, I should remind you that in a province or country—the Labour Minister in nodding in approval to the position of the Bloc—there is a direct link between such a legislation and the length of strikes and also, I should say, healthy labour relations.

This is what we are saying to the minister: it is unbelievable that, in 1995, no anti–strikebreaking legislation is in place at this federal level of intervention. I know that she realizes such legislation is necessary and wants to put it in place. She said herself that preliminary consultations were under way and she was committed to consulting the parties. So, she will have the chance in the days to come to go down in history as having given this country an anti–strikebreaking act.

With this in mind, as the hon. member for Laurier—Sainte–Marie said and the hon. member for Kamouraska—Rivière–du–Loup after him, we, the official opposition, fully grasp what a shame it is to have a lock–out bring the West Coast to a standstill. We know how important port activity is to the economy of the region. That is why we hope that a back to work agreement can be signed.

The difference between the labour minister and ourselves is the fact that we do not want a back–to–work order at any cost. Our concern with this bill is that it will shamelessly resort to arbitration. The minister should be consistent with herself. She was very pleased to tell us earlier that the discussions have resumed, that both parties have come back to the negotiation table, although their efforts might be a bit timid. She even linked the resumption of the negotiations to the statement she made in the House during question period.

We should be pleased about the efforts, albeit timid, made by both parties to resume negociations. We take comfort from the fact that, with the resumption of the negotiations, we might be able to avoid arbitration and rely on the mediation process.

It is certainly not because we are naïve or overly tolerant that we in the official opposition continue to believe that mediation would have been possible. Why would mediation have been possible and why is it desirable? Because in the delicate balance of labour relations, arbitration means acting unilaterally. A third party outside the dispute is given the extraordinary power to make decisions on the application and the validity of each clause of a collective agreement. We think that this is not desirable, that the use of arbitration where a person will be able to impose a collective agreement that will be effective until December 1996 is not desirable. I will say it again, we would have preferred being able to continue the mediation process.

A link should also be made with another fact. We believe things would have been different if we had had anti–scab legislation in Ottawa. This debate provides us with an opportunity to do something. The hon. member for Kamouraska—Rivière–du–Loup reminded us that this is the second time the House passes special legislation concerning operations at the west coast ports.

At the time of the first legislation, the present labour minister had other things on her mind, and I am sure she had no idea that she would some day be the member for Saint–Henri—West-mount in the House of Commons. But she must not forget that, at that time, we were already debating back to work legislation.

Why is it that her government, a government that she obviously supports, did not take the opportunity of that first labour dispute to set up a commission of inquiry on labour relations that were already a cause for concern.

• (2150)

Why did we wait so long? Why did we not learn from that first labour dispute and the passing of special legislation several months ago. It is because of all this deteriorating process that we are puzzled by the action taken by the minister.

I want to take this opportunity to really invite my colleague to make an impression as Minister of Labour. We all know that she is a determined and brilliant woman and that she is able, if she wants to, to take advantage of this labour relations review process to bring the parliamentarians to participate in this debate on whether or not we should have an anti–scab legislation at the federal level. We believe so and we have an opportunity to evaluate a model which is the one established by the Quebec National Assembly.

The Minister of Labour, who is a few years older than I am, will recall that this anti–scab legislation has proven right in Quebec, which used to be the champion for lost hours and days of work. The anti–scab legislation played a crucial role in pacifying labour relations. This is what we must aim at in the days to come.

We have to keep in mind, because it is important to do so, that we have two classes of workers, since three provinces have passed anti–scab legislation: Ontario, British–Columbia and Quebec. Thus, this is to say that some 60 to 65 per cent of the Canadian workers are protected by anti–scab legislation. Therefore, there are two classes of Canadians. This situation is far from healthy or acceptable.

To conclude, I want to say to the labour minister that she and I have something in common. Like her, I represent here a Montreal constituency. As hon. members for Montreal, we are obviously concerned with the continuing situation in the port of Montreal.

The minister says she is confident that we can avoid resorting to special legislation and that a negotiated agreement can be reached. I am sure the parties involved will take advantage of the mediation offer aimed at a negotiated settlement, so that we can have a collective agreement that is desired.

To avoid the kind of situation we are now in, it is important to maintain the optimum conditions for dialogue. However, these optimum conditions, that we would like to see for Montreal, can obviously not be maintained on the West Coast, because if the bill is passed, working conditions, non–monetary clauses as well as salary clauses, will be imposed by arbitration.

The Reformers' impatience is hard to understand, because it must be said that they have been behaving in a very unruly manner tonight, and I am sure that my colleagues will agree with me because everyone knows that the members of the Reform were unruly.

In conclusion, we agree with the return to work, but we would like to see ideal conditions for dialogue maintained, which is incompatible with a special bill.

[English]

The Deputy Speaker: Finally, with apologies, the hon. member for Lethbridge.

Mr. Ray Speaker (Lethbridge, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak on third reading of Bill C–74.

We want to move those ships out full of western Canadian grain. I appreciate the member from Winnipeg's indicating that to this assembly.

For many years in my period of time as a member of the Alberta Legislature there were numerous opportunities, I remember about 12, where governments of Canada, both Liberal and Conservative, did not have the gumption or the aggressiveness to deal with this problem.

• (2155)

We in Alberta moved resolution after resolution asking the federal government to pass legislation to put the workers back to work. The governments did it but to a major cost to western Canadian farmers over and over again.

A year ago it cost us a lot of money, $35 million in demurrage and penalties. The Alberta Wheat Pool tells us there was $100 million in terms of loss to the Canadian economy and $450 million in lost sales for grain farmers. That is provided by the figures from the Canadian Wheat Board.

Many dollars were lost. Even in this short time that the workers were off work, we suffered serious losses. One of my colleagues illustrated in the House earlier that the strike cost one of our alfalfa shippers $250,000 because they could not get it off the boat and into the marketplace. That market was lost to some American producers. I do not think that is fair.

I understand the minister and the government were advised several days ago that an agreement could not be reached. Why did we not bring legislation into the House so that if a strike did occur we could act immediately and put the workers back to work?

This is the first step in a series of responsibilities the House will have. We have not settled the matter with regard to Montreal. My colleague, the member for Lisgar—Marquette, has illustrated that point very well on how one of his producers or processors in that province of Manitoba is affected in a very significant way. We have to deal with that. Why did we not deal with that tonight and get it over with for the industry?

We do appreciate that the minister has brought the legislation before this assembly. We give her full credit and compliment her for that and compliment the composition of the legislation as it is. It has met one of the needs of western Canadians. The minister deserves that credit.

I also on behalf of my colleagues want to give the minister credit for the fact that she and the government intend to set up a commission or some body to look at ways we can deal with this problem on a basis that does not require legislation or a knee–jerk reaction every time workers walk off the job or there is a lockout, as is the case at the present time. I give the government full credit for that.

In all the years federal governments have dealt with this issue they have always brought legislation in to put the workers back to work or prevent or stop a lockout and they stopped there. They were afraid to challenge the unions on this very basic question. They were afraid to do what they thought would disturb the collective bargaining process and they wanted to maintain the integrity of that process.

Western Canadian farmers face a very unique situation. It is different. We as farmers in the west are victims of the collective bargaining process. We pay the bills. When there is demurrage to be paid we pay it as farmers. When there is loss of sales we pay it as farmers. Whatever the losses are we are the ones who pay. It is not management. It is not the unions. They do not pay any of it. There are no losses on their part. It is the person who ships the raw product, grain and other agricultural products, or our processed products into the export market. We are the victims.

The collective bargaining process as it now stands is completely unfair. The right to strike in that process does not fit that circumstance at all.

• (2200)

There must be a different approach. I have recommended in private members' Bill C–262 that we look at a process by which there is binding arbitration and that each party provides to the arbitrator a final position.

The arbitrator then would choose one position or the other and at that the work continues and there is an agreement for both of the parties. That is one of the options we should look at. Maybe there are other options.

The minister has indicated there will be a commission. The matter will be studied. I hope that is not a diversion or a delay. I hope the minister and Prime Minister are very sincere that there will be recommendations that will come into either the June portion of this session or into the fall session of the House whereby we deal with the problem once and for all.

It can be done without violating what we talked about, the collective bargaining agreement process by which management and employees can settle their various disputes.

Agriculture is different from General Motors, for example. General Motors has management. Its employees produce automobiles. If the automobiles are not manufactured and sold, management and employees are affected. It does not affect the other people beyond that. That is the very basic difference in terms of these two processes.

We intend to support this legislation. We want the government to support it and move quickly on it. We want it to deal with the other circumstances affecting the export of agriculture and other export products. We want that to happen as quickly as possible. If it needs to be done tomorrow let us do it tomorrow and not wait until there is a major crisis in our economy.

We are looking forward to some major changes in legislation this fall that will deal with this problem on a long term basis.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pick up on something I was speaking about earlier but which was exacerbated by a speech given by a Liberal member who spoke about the national interest.

In the context of talking about the national interest, a double standard exists between how we regard labour when it pursues its economic self–interest and how we regard capital when it pursues its economic self–interest.

When money markets act in ways that hold the country hostage, we do not take the same offence as some members take when a trade union is said to be holding the economy hostage in its economic self–interest.

What I was pleading for was that there not be this double standard that if we want to hold that everyone should be accountable to the common good or to the national interest, we have to do that with some uniformity.

We cannot say that trade unions or working people should be accountable to the national interest but the money marketeers, the currency traders and the money speculators can do what they like, act in their own economic self–interest and that our only role as a Parliament is to appease them, ask them what they want next, do whatever they want so that they will invest in our country. We need to to stop having this double standard.

Picking up on the comment that the Liberal member made about national interest, this is also an interesting concept given globalization and free trade agreements.

Why are working people asked to subscribe to a notion called the national interest? I believe in the national interest, but when we ask the same thing of the corporate sector we are accused of being romantic. We are accused of not being with it. We are accused of not understanding that there are no borders any more.

Investors, capital and corporations move all around the world doing whatever they want. Anyone who wants to talk about the national interest, except when they are trying to morally intimidate working people into giving up their economic self–interests, are called romantic. Why is that? Why is there this double standard when it comes to working people? I do not understand it.

I think ordinary Canadians sense there is something fishy when they are always supposed to act in the national interest but the people who can play with interest rates and the money markets and who can look around the planet for cheaper labour markets or weaker environmental regulations or weaker labour laws, that is okay for them. They can seek their economic self–interests; that is just called finding a good investment climate. However, when working people want to do the same thing, shame on them. They are not taking the national interest into account.

I say, shame on this House for accepting that double standard.

The Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: On division.

(Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.)

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I believe you will find unanimous consent for the following motion:

That on Thursday, March 16, 1995, when proceedings pursuant to Standing Order 38 have been concluded, the motion to adjourn the House shall be deemed to have been withdrawn and the sitting shall be suspended until such time as the Chair may reconvene the sitting for the sole purpose of a royal assent;

That immediately upon return from the royal assent, the House shall be adjourned until the next sitting day, provided that if no royal assent has been held by 9 a.m. on Friday, March 17, 1995, the House shall be reconvened for the sole purpose of being adjourned until 10 a.m. on that day.

The Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to that, colleagues?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Deputy Speaker: There is not unanimous consent to the motion.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I think a formal motion of adjournment is required pursuant to the order of the House earlier this day. Therefore, I move:

That this House do now adjourn.

The Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to that motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

PRIVILEGE

BUDGET SECRECY—SPEAKER'S RULING

The Speaker: My colleagues, I would now like to rule on a question of privilege raised on Friday, March 3, 1995 by the hon. member for Sherbrooke, notice of which was given the previous day just after Question Period. I would like to thank the hon. member for raising this matter, as well as the chief government whip and the hon. members for Berthier—Montcalm, Kindersley—Lloydminster, and Kingston and the Islands for their contributions to the discussion. I would also like to thank the hon. member for Guelph—Wellington for her intervention on this matter on March 13, 1995.

[English]

In his question of privilege, the hon. member for Sherbrooke alleged that there had been a leak of the budget prior to its presentation by the Minister of Finance on February 27, 1995. To support his claim, the member drew the attention of the House to the March 2, 1995, edition of the Hill Times, and more specifically, to a comment made by the hon. member for Guelph—Wellington found therein. In response to the question "Is there too much secrecy surrounding the budget?" the hon. member for Guelph—Wellington is quoted as having said: "I don't think so. There were some MPs who were told beforehand if major cuts were coming to programs in their ridings. They asked for that in caucus so they could prepare to answer questions". The hon. member for Sherbrooke then argued that if certain members had "privileged, secret information before budget day" this would be to the detriment of other members and would hinder them in the performance of their duties. The hon. members for Berthier—Montcalm and Kindersley—Lloydminster echoed the member's sentiments and concerns about a certain group of members being privy to information not available to other members.

[Translation]

The procedural issue before us is not a question of budget secrecy per se. Several members cited citation 31(5) of Beauchesne's Sixth Edition to support the contention that budget secrecy was and is a political convention and not a matter to be dealt with under the guise of parliamentary privilege. Indeed, several members emphasized that what was really at issue was the implication of prior knowledge of the contents of the budget by certain members, and I emphasize the word members, and not others. The questions we must therefore ask are, at first glance, does there appear to be a breach of the rights of certain members, and has something occurred which has impaired the ability of members to carry out their duties as members?

[English]

As I have said on numerous occasions, we have a tradition in the House which dictates that we accept the word of an hon. member as truth. Taking the quote of the hon. member for Guelph—Wellington as represented by the Hill Times, one might be inclined to agree that there was the appearance that certain members had been given confidential information not available to others. However, in light of the comments made by the hon. member for Guelph—Wellington on March 13, 1995, and the text of her memorandum from which the hon. whip read and later tabled, I accept that the hon. member for Guelph—Wellington was referring to the announcement made outside the House by the President of the Treasury Board on February 21 regarding measures for the downsizing of the federal public service and not to a prebudget disclosure.

[Translation]

Consequently, I cannot conclude that members of the House have in any way been hindered in carrying out their parliamentary duties. Hence, I do not find a prima facie case of breach of privilege.

I thank all hon. members for their contributions.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

INDUSTRY

Mr. Paul Zed (Fundy—Royal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the third and fourth reports of the Standing Committee on Industry, pursuant to the order of reference on Wednesday, June 15, 1994.

Your committee has considered Bill C–43, an act to amend the Lobbyists Registration Act and to make related amendments to other acts. Your committee has agreed also to report it with amendments and to provide as well a substantive report which explains the amendments being reported and why other possible changes were not adopted.

I would also like to point out that the third report, which provides explanations and supplementary recommendations, breaks new ground for committees reviewing bills. Your committee felt that such a report was necessary, given that Bill C–43 was referred before second reading, thus broadening considerably the scope of the review that was undertaken.

The 13 amendments that have been set out in the fourth report would, in the view of your committee, significantly strengthen an already good bill.

I would like to thank members of the committee for working together to meet the new responsibilities involved in considering a bill before second reading. The results I believe speak for themselves and deserve serious consideration by all sides of the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, as the critic for the official opposition on the matter of lobbyists, I am pleased to rise very briefly today, following the tabling of the report of the majority, to inform Parliament that I have tabled, with the majority report, a dissenting opinion on this bill.

With all we have heard regarding the management of the affairs of government, I feel the profession of influence peddlar, as it is called in the business, must be regulated. Legislation was needed to re–establish a relationship of trust between the government and the people.

I thought that, with the campaign commitments the Liberals made in the last election, transparency would be the watchword within Parliament thanks to this bill. I also thought that the new parliamentary procedure, which was supposed to permit in–depth debates and improve the role of members of Parliament, would enable me to amend Bill C–43 in keeping with taxpayers' interests. I was fooled, like many others. The procedure failed to live up to promise as did the wording of Bill C–43, and this is why I submitted a dissenting opinion, which is appended to the report. I wanted to let people know of the two major failings of this bill.

BILL C–74

Hon. Alfonso Gagliano (Secretary of State (Parliamentary Affairs) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 56(1), I move:

> That, on Thursday, March 16, 1995, when proceedings pursuant to Standing Order 38 have been concluded, the motion to adjourn the House shall be deemed to have been withdrawn and the sitting shall be suspended until such time as the Chair may reconvene the sitting for the sole purpose of a Royal Assent;
> That, immediately upon return from the Royal Assent, the House shall be adjourned until the next sitting day;
> Provided that, if no Royal Assent has been held by 9 a.m. on Friday, March 17, 1995, the House shall be reconvened for the sole purpose of being adjourned until 10 a.m. on that day.

• (1015)

The Deputy Speaker: Would all those members who oppose such a motion please rise. The requirement being 25, and as only two members are standing, therefore, the motion is carried.

PETITIONS

DANGEROUS OFFENDERS

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise again to present another petition in this course of action undertaken on behalf of constituents who wish to halt the early release from prison of Robert Paul Thompson.

The petitioners I represent are concerned about making our streets safer for our citizens. They are opposed to the current practice of early release of violent offenders prior to serving the full extent of their sentences.

The petitioners pray that our streets will be made safer for law–abiding citizens and the families of the victims of convicted murderers.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have a number of petitions.

The first two petitions are in regard to the Canadian Wheat Board. They request that Parliament continue to give the Canadian Wheat Board monopoly powers in marketing wheat and barley for export.

The other petition goes beyond that and requests that the Canadian Wheat Board marketing monopoly powers include all grains and oilseeds.

The petitioners are from my home riding of Yorkton—Melville.

TAXATION

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): The next group contains 38 petitions again from my riding but also from other ridings in and around Saskatchewan.

The petitioners state that the Saskatchewan government is on the verge of balancing its budget, allowing Saskatchewan taxpayers to see the light at the end of the high tax tunnel. Therefore, they ask and request Parliament to reduce government spending instead of increasing taxes.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): The last group contains 28 petitions. They come from Ottawa and Toronto and many other areas in Ontario, Saskatchewan and Manitoba.

The petitioners ask that Parliament support laws which will severely punish all violent criminals who use weapons in the commission of a crime. They support new Criminal Code firearms control provisions that recognize and protect the right of law–abiding citizens to own firearms. They support legislation which will repeal and modify existing gun control laws which have not improved public safety and have proven not to be cost effective and have proven to be overly complex as to be ineffective and/or unenforceable.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured once again to rise in the House pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition on behalf of constituents of the riding of Kent. They pray that Parliament ensure that the present provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada prohibiting assisted suicide be enforced vigorously and that Parliament make no changes in the law which would sanction or allow the aiding or abetting of suicide, or active or passive euthanasia.

GRANDPARENTS RIGHTS

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this petition from the constituents of Willowdale asks Parliament to amend the Divorce Act to include provisions similar to article 611 of the Quebec civil code. It states that in no case may a father or mother without serious cause place obstacles between the child and grandparents. Failing agreement between the parties, the modalities of the relations are to be settled by the court. They request Parliament to further amend the Divorce Act to give a grandparent who is granted access to a child the right to make inquiries and to be given information as to the health, education and welfare of the child.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege to introduce three different petitions today.

The first petition is regarding Bill C–41. People from my riding and around the province of B.C. have asked that Parliament not pass Bill C–41 and that section 718.2 as presently written not include the undefined phrase sexual orientation in that bill. I am happy to concur with that.

• (1020)

TAXATION

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the next petition was sent to me by firefighters in my riding. They ask and pray for Parliament to allow the tax exemption status to rise from $500 up to $1,000 for their equipment. I am happy to support that measure as well. It has been stuck at that same level for some years.

DANGEROUS OFFENDERS

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the last petition I have the privilege to present was signed by over 1,000 people from my constituency who are outraged over the murder of Melanie Carpenter, an event that occurred I am sad to say within my own constituency.

This petition calls upon Parliament to permit the use of post–sentence detention orders and to pass Bill C–240 which would limit the freedoms of high risk offenders. If Parliament hears this petition, innocent people like Melanie Carpenter would still be alive and and dangerous ones like her murderer would remain behind bars.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. member may not have been here yesterday when the Speaker invited members not to say whether or not they agree or disagree with the petitions.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise today to present a petition that is part of a larger petition of almost 64,000 signatories. This petition contains approximately 18,000 signatures of citizens in and around Edmonton Southwest who are asking that the Young Offenders Act be changed and strengthened so that it would have the effect of deterring criminal behaviour by young people.

There are many citizens across the country who feel that the Young Offenders Act does not do what it was intended to do. These 18,000 citizens of our country are requesting the Parliament of Canada to strengthen the Young Offenders Act.

It is my pleasure to introduce this in the House today.

CRUELTY TO ANIMALS

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition to the House of Commons. The petition contains 8,000 signatures collected by representatives of the Animal Defence League of Canada.

The petitioners note that individuals convicted of wilfully causing pain and injury to an animal presently face maximum penalties of six months in jail to two years prohibition from owning an animal and/or a maximum find of $2,000.

The petitioners note also that in practice they do not know of any maximum penalty ever having been issued no matter how atrocious the offence. The petitioners state that they find this abhorrent and unacceptable when animals are not appropriately dealt with by our laws.

Therefore, the petitioners call upon the Government of Canada to enact harsher penalties for offences against animals and establish an education program for judges to help them understand society's abhorrence and condemnation of acts of cruelty to animals.

DRUG PRICES

Mr. John Solomon (Regina—Lumsden, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I have three petitions to present today pursuant to Standing Order 36.

The first petition pertains to Bill C–91, the drug patent legislation. The petitioners who have signed this petition are from my district of Regina—Lumsden in Saskatchewan as well as the cities and towns of Saskatoon, Borden, Hafford, Speers, Nipawin.

These petitioners are unhappy with the 12 per cent annual increase in prescription drugs since this bill was passed. They are asking that Bill C–91, which has placed financial burdens on them and health care programs across this country, be repealed. They request the House of Commons to do same.

PAROLE

Mr. John Solomon (Regina—Lumsden, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my second petition is signed by petitioners from the Saskatchewan communities of Kelliher, Silton, Watrous, Raymore, Punnichy, Ituna, Simpson, Foam Lake and other locations.

Under section 745 of the Criminal Code of Canada, convicted murderers sentenced to life imprisonment without chance of parole for 25 years are able to apply for a review after 15 years. They are calling for the House of Commons to repeal section 745 of the Criminal Code of Canada.

SENATE

Mr. John Solomon (Regina—Lumsden, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my third and final petition this morning deals with the Senate.

The petitioners are from my constituency of Regina—Lumsden as well as from Pilot Butte, Saskatchewan. In view of the fact that the Senate costs approximately $60 million a year and in their view the purpose of the Senate is useless, they are asking the House of Commons to repeal sections 41 and 42 of the Constitution Act which would in effect abolish the Senate.

• (1025)

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. David Chatters (Athabasca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to present a petition from my constituents containing 2,700 names, which is also part of a larger petition prompted by the murder of Barb Denelesko.

The petitioners state that Canadian citizens from coast to coast are calling for changes to the Young Offenders Act. They want an act serious enough to deter young people from committing crimes and tough enough to provide real justice. In its current format the Young Offenders Act is not meeting these objectives. The petitioners request that the Government of Canada review the Young Offenders Act of 1992 and amend it accordingly.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Deputy Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I think you would find unanimous consent for the following motion. I move:

That notwithstanding any order of the House, that any recorded division to be taken today during Private Members' Business be deferred until Tuesday, March 21 at 5.30 p.m.

The Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

(Motion agreed to.)

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[Translation]

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY—ECONOMIC EQUALITY OF WOMEN

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Québec, BQ) moved:

That this House denounce the government for its insensitivity and its inaction regarding the adoption of concrete measures to promote the economic equality of woman in federal areas of jurisdiction.

She said: Mr. Speaker, I have the honour today of tabling a motion regarding an issue related to International Women's Day.

In my opinion, the motion is urgent, given the government's recent actions. The motion is as follows: "That this House denounce the government for its insensitivity and its inaction regarding the adoption of concrete measures to promote the economic equality of women in federal areas of jurisdiction".

I would have preferred not to have to table such a motion before this House, but its goal is to make my colleagues and Canadians and Quebecers aware that Liberal decision–makers have failed to act on the fine words bandied about within these four walls.

A year ago, I tabled my first motion on the issue, which stated that, firstly, it was important to recognize the principle of economic equality between women and men, and, secondly, that measures must be implemented to guarantee equity in employment, wages and living conditions for women. It was most unusual and remarkable, but government members supported the official opposition's motion.

However, I must admit that they stopped at the first part of the motion and have never gone on to the second. How else can the current situation be explained with the same people in play? How else can we explain the decisions recently taken by this government which purports to be concerned with the economic inequality of women?

How else can we explain the decision to go ahead with the cuts to grants for women's rights organizations which were announced by the previous government? All the while, the Minister of Finance tried to reassure us regarding this issue and, just before the last budget, stated that his government was fully aware of the issue, that the last budget proved it and that the government intended to prove it again in the next.

I recall that the minister then mentioned the important role that organizations play in promoting women's rights and in improving their living conditions.

How can we explain that, in two weeks, the government will cut funding to the initiative against domestic violence, which finances pilot projects, research, public awareness and education campaigns, etc.?

• (1030)

And yet, the Secretary of State declared last March 3: "Violence against women, sexual harassment, inequalities and inequities in employment opportunities, the wage imbalance and gender discrimination must all be addressed. I am pleased the government is continuing to push forward on all these fronts".

Everyone knows that unfortunately little progress can be made without money. How else can we explain the government's policy of tying financial compensation due a woman to her husband's income? Both these trends are obvious in the proposed unemployment insurance and old age pension reforms. And yet, the Minister of Human Resources Development stated last October: "We are putting forward major proposals concerning the problem of family work and the manner in which part–time workers, the majority of whom are women, can be given a certain degree of protection with respect to unemployment insurance and other income security programs".

Since when is a woman's economic equality acquired through dependence on her husband? Women do not accept this approach, nor should they. What explanation is there for the complete absence of references to child care services in the last budget, when the same minister stated on that same date that in the green paper consideration was being given to major child care programs and a national strategy, requiring funding amounting to some 700 million dollars. Where are the budgets needed to create new day care spaces, where are the transfers Quebec is calling for in order to develop its own network? Why is there no interest in finally resolving the thorny issue of pay equity in the public service, when this issue has languished before the courts for several years now, depriving thousands of women of money that is rightfully theirs?

And yet, the President of the Treasury Board said last June: "As an employer we are concerned about pay equity. We would like to resolve this problem as quickly as possible, in order to cut short the long drawn out legal proceeding instituted by the preceding government". Noble words! How does this explain the offensive transfer carried out by the Minister of Finance onto the backs of the provinces, the inevitable result of which will be either a reduction in health and education services and social assistance benefits, or a tax hike?

Yet, on February 8, the Minister of Finance stated: "We are fully aware of the need to deal fairly with women's needs". Does the minister sincerely believe that fairness towards women lies in reducing their standard of living? And how does one explain the Secretary of State for the Status of Women's latest decision to abolish the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women?

The main role of this organization was to do research and disseminate information on problems affecting women. It also played the role of government watchdog by analyzing the economic impact of government actions and decisions on women. Yet, in the same speech in which she announced the abolition of this organization, the Secretary of State repeated the Prime Minister's comments: "For its part, the Canadian government has taken up the challenge. Women's equality is not a matter of special rights or interests. It is a matter of social and economic justice. It is a matter of good government".

The abolition of CACSW is not an example of good government that will help women meet the challenge of economic equality; in fact, it is just the opposite. Women's economic status is not improving. They are the first victims of the massive cuts in the federal public service. Some 45,000 jobs will be lost; and women will be hit the hardest. They are still earning only 72 per cent as much as their male colleagues. In 1920, they were making 50 per cent as much as their spouses. They still account for the majority of single parents, poor people, people living in inadequate housing, and victims of family violence. Women expect measures that will finally allow them to achieve the economic equality they are entitled to.

On March 8, 1994, the Secretary of State said this: "For the first time we have had a government sensitive to the different impact of programs and policies on women. It is a government willing to ensure that gender perspective is taken into consideration in all the proposed changes whether they are fiscal, social or juridical in nature". In fact, the decisions and actions taken clearly show this government's insensitivity to the inequality still plaguing women in Canada and Quebec. It is also obvious that this government has no intention of taking the necessary corrective measures.

It is obvious that this government truly deserves the severe criticisms levelled against it today by members of the opposition on behalf of Canadians and Quebecers. There is an urgent need to act instead of merely indulging in rhetoric. Is "Towards Equality" not the slogan adopted by the Canadian government to promote the world summit on women to be held in Beijing in September 1995? I think that this government is off on the wrong foot. It will go there to brag about what it has failed to do at home.

The Deputy Speaker: Questions or comments? No one? Did I hear correctly that you will share your time? Agreed.

The hon. member for Saint–Hubert.

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, we know full well that, each time the issue of status of women is raised, we lose a large part of our audience. It is not that too much time is devoted to this subject in this House. It is just that many people do not want to hear what we have to say and, more than anything else, they refuse to take action.

I will speak on the status of women anyway, and the status of women in the legal profession in particular. In Quebec, you can be a lawyer or a notary.

I will focus on women lawyers because, unfortunately, a committee has yet to be appointed to look specifically into the experience of women notaries in their everyday practice. All our statistics on women lawyers were provided to us by the Quebec bar association.

In the legal profession, women experience basically the same thing women experience in any area in which they work; by "work", I mean work outside of the home, of course.

If there has been such an influx of women on the labour market, outside of the home, we know this is due to a large extent to socioeconomic factors. It became necessary for women to help maintain the family income. This has been a determining factor.

In 1951, women accounted for less than 25 per cent of the Canadian labour force, as compared to 58 per cent of adult women in 1991. By far the biggest increase in the labour force participation rate occurred among women with young children, the majority of whom have full time jobs.

Women who, by necessity or by choice, head for a career in law face many difficulties inherent in this line of work. The dysfunctional relationships with male colleagues, the under–representation on the bench and the limited number of female teachers in our law faculties are but a few of the symptoms of a serious problem which persists in a world which claims to be eliminating injustice and unfairness.

Women are now part of the labour force, but female jurists form a distinct group. In the public's eye, we are perceived as being privileged. Yet, to become a disciple of Themis, a woman must overcome many obstacles which are not related to her status as a jurist, but to her status as a woman.

The Quebec Bar Association's committee on women lawyers, to which I alluded earlier, took a close look at the issues confronting female lawyers. Unfortunately, the chamber of notaries does not have a similar committee. A poll was conducted among women lawyers and the findings were released in 1992. Those findings are very instructive. They clearly show the obstacles which we must face not just as jurists, but also as women.

In the five years previous to the poll, 71 per cent of female lawyers experienced problems in their vocational practice. It is important to point out that the situation of the majority of these women did not change over that period, whether we are talking about hiring policies, relations with male colleagues, judges and clients, parental obligations, working conditions in general, or career advancement. In short, there is no progress.

• (1040)

Women lawyers practice a profession which was defined by men. Our laws and our precedents are set in a masculine mould. Lynn Smith, the dean of the law faculty at UBC, clearly exposed the problem in an article entitled "A system that's changing". Let me quote and eloquent excerpt: "The roots of the current legal system were planted by men. Developed at a time when women could not vote, be elected, become lawyers or be members of a jury, the law sought to protect the interests deemed important by men, given the realities of their lives as men. When the law did take women into consideration, it was solely from a male standpoint".

The most glaring example of inequity comes from the judiciary. An overwhelming number of judges appointed by the federal government, that is, the provincial superior court judges and the Federal Court judges, are men. Overall, only 134 of the 950 federal judges are women.

By interpreting the law and exerting some moral influence, judges help to shape and develop the fundamental values upon which our society is based. Women have been chronically under–represented among judges. In other words, although they have had the right to practise law for 53 years now, the proportion of women on the bench still remains under 10 per cent of all Quebec judges in the Quebec Court of Appeal, the Superior Court, the Court of Quebec or the municipal courts.

At the Quebec Superior Court, where judges are appointed by the federal justice minister, women represented 11.3 per cent of all judges, accounting for 20 of the 176 judges, as of March 1, 1995.

The situation elsewhere in the country is not much better. Madam Justice McLachlin and Madam Justice L'Heureux–Dubé are the only two women out of the nine judges appointed to the Supreme Court of Canada. They represent 22.2 per cent of these judges, while women account for 52 per cent of the Canadian population.

As of March 1, 1995, women made up only 10.3 per cent of the judges appointed to the Federal Court and the Tax Court of Canada, accounting for 8 out of these 60 judges. I could go on and on with the deplorable data concerning the Canadian women's place in the judiciary, but it would feel like preaching in the wilderness.

It is up to the Minister of Justice to appoint more women judges at the federal level. He is duty bound to review the questionable selection process where potential women candidates must have an impressive number of years of litigation practice, when we know that most women cannot consider that kind of practice because of their parental responsibilities. Such a criterion is not applied at the provincial level. It is hard to imagine how a mother could sit at a trial for three intensive weeks. Yet, it is acceptable for a father to be in the litigation practice and to devote all of his time to his work.

Men's schedules do not change much when they become fathers and have young children. However, this is not the case for women, especially those with preschoolers. Whatever their profession, mothers of toddlers are the most likely to change their work schedules.

For example, 95 per cent of career women, including women judges, work full–time, compared with 68 per cent of women who have preschool children and a similar job. Almost one third of women with preschool children and an irregular work schedule indicated that they had chosen such a schedule mainly to be able to take care of their children.

The selection process used does not reveal how a candidate is chosen and should therefore be abolished. Openness is a necessity, not a luxury.

• (1045)

If the process were more open, the Minister of Justice could no longer hide behind vague excuses like the lack of qualified candidates. If the requirements are the same for men and women, they automatically create inequities since, in general, women do not practise the profession in the same way that men do.

Treating both sexes the same way is creating inequities. The low representation of women among judges is in no way a reflection of their availability since in Quebec they now represent almost a fifth of the Bar membership eligible for the bench, that is, people who have been practising law for at least ten years. Furthermore, with the increased numbers of women who have entered the legal profession since the early eighties we can expect that the number of women eligible for appointment will increase rapidly in the next few years.

I ask the Minister of Justice: Will we see an increase in the number of women appointed to the bench proportionate to their representation among the most experienced members of the legal profession? Time will tell.

Mr. Jean–Guy Chrétien (Frontenac, BQ): Mr. Speaker, our colleague from Saint–Hubert raises an issue that is both sensitive and real.

Indeed, in Quebec like everywhere else in Canada, women are clearly under–represented in the judiciary. I have vivid memories of the 1984 election campaign where the leaders of the four federal parties were proposing gender equality. The governments that have been in power since that time have done nothing, or almost nothing in this respect.

My colleague from Saint–Hubert asked a question of the Minister of Justice who will obviously avoid giving an answer. I would like to ask my colleague from Saint–Hubert if, in her opinion, the federal government demonstrates the will to achieve, within a reasonable time frame, equity in appointments to the bench.

Mrs. Venne: Mr. Speaker, the answer is a simple no. Unfortunately, since the Liberal government came into office in 1993, it has not demonstrated the will to appoint more women to the bench. We just have to look at the appointments that have been made.

On this subject, I would like to add that it is often said that if women are under–represented in the system, it is because they do not want to be elected to the House of Commons, they do not want to attend the conventions, they do not want to take part in the nomination process.

I would immediately say to that that the problem is not that women do not want to participate, but rather that they often do not want to be part of a system that was established by men for men. Women are not used to fighting with each other for a position. They are used to getting a position because of their skills.

When they go to a convention or a nomination meeting and see everybody bickering on the floor, they are very uncomfortable. That is why there are not too many women in politics.

I just wanted to add this observation to explain that it is often for that reason that, unfortunately, there are not more women in this House.

[English]

Hon. Ethel Blondin–Andrew (Secretary of State (Training and Youth), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank opposition members for bringing forward this debate. I rise in the House today to express my deep pride in the government's record in promoting social justice and economic parity for the women of Canada.

I am encouraged by the interest shown by the hon. member of the opposition in the issues of women's economic equality, for what could be more important to Canada than the welfare of more than half its population. I believe it is 52 per cent. It is only when women and families thrive that our country will be renewed.

I welcome the invitation to demonstrate to my colleagues that the federal government can be counted on to keep its promises. We said we would and we are reshaping the country, making it economically strong, socially just and proud of the rich diversity of its people.

Our plan for Canada outlined in "Creating Opportunity" is firmly anchored in the principle that governing is about people. The motion before the House raises an important question: What has the track record of the government been on issues that affect the economic status of women? The short answer is that the government has done a great deal. The government made commitments in the last election campaign and is living up to them.

In the few minutes available to me today I want to discuss the actions we have taken in the important area of employment programs. I want to look briefly at the record in unemployment insurance and I want to talk about the child care issue. I will finish with some comments on the government's proposal for changes to the Employment Equity Act. The document is an empowering document not just for women but for the disabled, for aboriginals and for visible minorities.

First let me establish the context. It has become a truism that the best social program is a job. That point has been made by people from both the right and left of the political spectrum. Therefore well over 400,000 people can say that they have taken part in the greatest social program of all since the government took office in October 1993. There is every evidence that the record will continue strongly and that these are predominantly good jobs and full time work. Women are claiming their full share of the growth.

Let me give a personal view of what it is to be a woman and what it is to be a woman in an area that used to be exclusively male in the number of areas I have occupied in my career. I was in the civil service for many years before I entered politics. My experience was that I never had a problem working with men because those were the people to whom I had the most exposure in the levels I occupied in senior management. It gave me a great deal of opportunity to build human relationships that had a certain dynamic and express co–operation and a bit of a positive attitude about working with other people.

However the real experience I have as a woman comes from the fact that the most influential people in my life have been women. My grandmother was a medicine woman. She was an orator. She was the anchor in my family. She was the leader in my family. There are many strong men in my family. The women in my family are very strong women. They see the opportunity for greatness in almost every opportunity that comes their way.

Another most influential woman in my life has been my stepmother who adopted me when I was three months old. She took the opportunity to teach me good things. I cannot think of a thing women have gained that has just been given to them. I cannot see an empowerment process that women have not fought hard for. Women are truly the instrument of their own empowerment. We are 52 per cent of the population. If women use that instrument, if women use that power device sincerely, it will be the essence of how great our accomplishment can be.

I have travelled around the world. I have seen other societies, other groups across different nations. It sort of sets a stage for what we have in Canada. In our party we have the whole idea of equality of opportunity and I really believe in it. It is interesting when we think about people like Eleanor Roosevelt, the wife of a former president of the United States, who said: "No one can make you feel inferior without your consent". I feel that way about being a woman.

• (1055)

I feel that women have certain natural talents. That does not make us better than men. It just makes us as good as we can be. It gives us the capacity for nurturing, the capacity for co–operation, the capacity for vision, and the capacity for sharing. We are not keeping the power to ourselves but we are sharing the power. The use of a power in a very positive way is a dynamic that women bring to politics, to business and to social development. It is a different style. It is not better. It does not create inequity. It creates the greatest opportunity for women.

If we look back through history to when women in Canada received the right to vote, no one handed it to them. No one made us persons without the struggle of women. Women themselves went out and put up the fight to gain that right, to gain that recognition. We have fought some big battles. They are not battles between the sexes. They are battles for human dignity. They are battles of the individual fitting in society in a way that expresses true human rights and dignity: the right to work, the right to raise children in an environment that is safe and clean, and the right to raise our heads among others without feeling shame or disgrace even when there are problems. That is the kind of country we live in. That is the kind of democracy for which people fight and in fact in some countries for which people have died.

I come from a family in which women play a very predominate role. The men play an equal role in their own area, but I am talking about women today. I am not saying it is just our day. In fact all the men here today can have the honour of being honorary women if they so desire.

The whole issue of economic empowerment is a different dynamic. Many would say that business is a man's world. That is changing. We no longer have a single income society. We have a double income society. People are working, partnering and sharing. There are children to look after and there are competitive forces that impact on families, communities, regions and the country as a whole. Women are major contributors. Not only do women see the necessity of their positive participation. Men also see the positive contributions made by women. It is necessary. It is absolutely necessary.

Women make up 52 per cent of the population. I was in Copenhagen. Empowerment to me is reaching out and having the human experience of realizing the differences, of building tolerance, of building acceptance and of approving of people's differences linguistically, culturally, socially and economically. We are all people.

I was empowered by seeing other women. I had the opportunity to listen to female leaders and male leaders from around the world. On International Women's Day there was much mention that despite the fact women make up 52 per cent of the population they account for 70 per cent of the world's poor. If women account for 70 per cent of the world's poor, implicit in that is that children are involved. There are more women in female centred living circumstances or families than there are males.

We realize the imperative of empowering women. For instance, the government in making its appointments to boards and commissions is constantly vigilant and balancing the number of women appointed to boards and commissions, as are other members of this caucus and other members of the House. There is a balance. It is definitely a commitment of the Prime Minister and the cabinet.

• (1100)

There is still a greater opportunity for us to look at some of the most economically related boards, to look at the financial institutions and to be able to appoint women. There are women who are qualified, woman who have years of experience. I have met them, as have other members of the House. They are women with a lot of experience and equality of education, who have two or three degrees. They are women who are not bilingual, but multilingual.

They are multi–faceted women who have a whole range of talents to bring forward to the process, not only empowering their families and themselves but their communities and this country. There is definitely a role for ensuring that women get to the top in partnership with men. It is not either/or. It is better when they work together.

We also understand the right to be recognized as persons was not conferred on us by a special men's club that thought it was time to make women persons. That did not happen. Women took up the fight. Women won that right.

It is a powerful feeling on Persons day every year watching the women being recognized, outstanding citizens in this country, who have contributed not only to themselves but to their communities and to their country and maybe to the world in a sense by setting an example.

The right to vote was not conferred on women because someone decided. It was a hard fought battle. It was something women felt strongly about and they finally won the right to vote.

Around the world democratic rights is one of the most powerful tools. Look at South Africa. It is a prime example. The right to vote, the right of assembly, the right to speak, the right of mobility are things women have to make work for themselves. That is the basis of a firm foundation on which to build economic empowerment. That makes it a powerful tool.

At this time the government is aware economic growth by itself is not enough. Women still remain clustered in traditionally female occupations such as teaching, nursing, clerical or sales and service work.

I was so pleased when I went to Montreal two months ago and met with a group of young girls in a classroom dedicated to teaching math and sciences to these young women. I want to see these young girls 20 years form now. I want to see them when they are in high school and university. I told one young girl her seat is waiting for her in the House of Commons.

An hon. member: Look out world.

Ms. Blondin–Andrew: Look out world is right. Those young people are going to be a huge factor not in just the empowerment of their specific gender, but of this country. If we use that 52 per cent resource to its maximum, we can help to abate a lot of the social problems. We can help to abate a lot of the economic woes that befall our communities.

In this country we are so good at building infrastructure. If we need a road, we build it. If we need a hospital, we build it. If we need banks, we build them. If we need airports, we build them. The one thing that is critical and has not happened over different levels of successive governments is building that firm human foundation, that firm human infrastructure that is spiritual, social, cultural and linguistic which will result in children staying in school and will not drop out.

That is not always the result because we have a disempowerment somewhere along this infrastructure path we have taken. I am not saying that we should not have infrastructure. I am saying that if we have it, it should work for us. It should give us the results we need.

• (1105)

We should be producing. We have skating rinks and curling rinks. We have these other kinds of institutions and infrastructure. They should be producing better athletes. They should be producing children who will be able to set their goals and reach them with their families and their instructors.

Somehow we have to get back to the basics of making those things work for people, not just women, all people in this country. We need to say real empowerment is not the empowerment of one individual. Real empowerment is the empowerment of our families, of our children, of our communities and of our country.

A country is not about one person. A country is about a collective, all the people who live here, all the people who come here from other parts of the world who believe we still have the best country in the world. I certainly believe that.

I am not turning a blind eye and saying we do not have problems. We have problems, but at least we have the democratic right, the equality of opportunity to be able to deal with those problems, to make a better tomorrow for ourselves and for our children.

If all the government did was rely on the market, as some in the House would prefer, we would see only a glacial change in the labour force situation of women. This government believes it can do better. It recognizes the continuing need to help women move into new growth areas. It recognizes its own programs and services can help to bring us closer to that goal. That is important in terms of the government's employment programs.

Hon. members will be aware of many of the programs and services provided by Human Resources Development Canada. I am sure almost all of us have Employment Canada centres in our ridings. These offices have made real efforts to reach out to women, to make programs and services more accessible, to break down the stereotypes and the barriers to full participation by women.

In the last full fiscal year, 1993–94, more than one–quarter of a million Canadian women, 262,392, participated in HRDC employment programs and services of all kinds. That figure was fully 28,555 more than in the previous year. This is so absolutely important.

There is a lot of technical information I have here which I have not shared with the House. It takes co–operation. It takes true partnership. It takes true dignity and respect to really empower the individual and to empower a community, a family, a country. It can be done by respecting and recognizing the power and the real empowerment of women.

Mrs. Gagnon (Québec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my hon. colleague opposite made some interesting comments. She mentioned points regarding the status of women that certainly raise some questions. I am criticizing my hon. colleague for her government's lack of concrete action.

Both she and her colleagues on the government side point to certain situations, but they have yet to put forward any concrete measures, like a day care system; instead, we get budget cuts hitting community agencies and groups that provide assistance to women, and we get UI benefits based on family income. What does the government intend to do to help women?

They point to certain things, and say that they are aware of the situation, of violence against women, but what have they done to the budget dealing with violence against women? In two weeks there will be no more money for that, and we know very well that the government has not stated what it intends to do about it. As recently as yesterday, the secretary of state let it be known, on the sly, without consulting women's groups, and in a crude fashion that the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women would be shut down. She said, among other things, that the council had been set up by a movement that was in its infancy.

• (1110)

Should we conclude from those remarks that the women's movement has reached its full development? I do not think so. I think that progress has, indeed, been made, but the movement has not reached maturity.

I would like to get specific indications from my colleague. I too can wax poetic about the status of women. I too had to fight to make my way and be elected to this House, and it was not easy. Structures are frequently barriers that are not easily overcome. I agree with my colleague opposite about that, but I would like to have specific facts.

It is no secret that the Axworthy exercise was rather vague as far as the status of women is concerned. The same holds true in other sectors as well, like justice. I would like to hear what concrete action the government will take within a certain time frame and how much money it will spend. With the cuts recently announced, the CACSW will lose 30 per cent of its budget. Women's groups are being told that they are now on a solid footing. Such a statement is dangerous because it is not true. Some groups may be on a solid footing, but discrimination will occur.

How will the minister responsible for the status of women decide which group is to get grants? How will that decision be made? There is a vacuum here and we are left wondering whether there is a real will to help women. In 1995, more than ever before, women will need help because, when we go through a severe economic crisis, violence escalates and women are more than ever in need of help.

[English]

Ms. Blondin–Andrew: Mr. Speaker, I agree that they are confused. On the one hand in dealing with the opposition we find that every time we raise an issue, no matter what it is, women, employment or child care, we are told it is in the purview of provincial jurisdiction, that we have to confer with our provincial counterparts.

The hon. member is suggesting that I make suggestions about specific projects, specific initiatives even though she knows full well we have not had the opportunity to discuss such issues as child care with the provinces, which Quebec feels very strongly about.

There is not a vacuum. The government has undertaken a number of initiatives. Program review and evaluation is one of them. Under that guise we have also looked at women's programs. Change is not a bad thing. What is wrong with change in the name of effectiveness and efficiency? That is what the country wants. Canadians are telling us it is not how much we have, it is what we do with it. They are also telling us change is not such a bad thing. To make change in the name of efficiency and effectiveness is a good thing for this country as a whole, not just women.

It is true we are consolidating the women's programs but it is all in the name of removing duplication, eliminating a number of unnecessary allocations. We need to do that to make it more cost effective and to deliver services to the individual rather than build administrative bureaucracies.

[Translation]

Mrs. Gagnon: Mr. Speaker, it is true that we are asking for money, we are asking for transfers to provinces so that Quebec can finally get the amount of money that it needs to create its own programs. That certainly does not mean that we want the federal government to create the programs. We should not play on words either.

I will quote my colleague, the secretary of state, who was saying just yesterday that she had two good news. These two good news are bad news for the provinces. First of all, there are no tax increases. What does that mean? It means that the provinces will have to increase taxes in order to fill that gap and to pay for programs which will be created in the different provinces.

Second, tax loopholes have been eliminated; the budget makes our tax system more equitable. Which tax loopholes? The ones for big business, for family trusts or the ones for the middle class and the poorest people? That is the question that I am asking my colleague.

1115

[English]

Ms. Blondin–Andrew: Mr. Speaker, there is no way I would expect this hon. member and the opposition to come forward and endorse and kiss the budget that we presented. I do not believe that.

However, she suggests that in the budget we put forward the provinces have no responsibility. I dare say not. The province she is from is preparing a budget that will have an impact. She is fearful that it will not all be good.

These are tough times and we have taken the directions we believe are necessary in order to get our house in order. We are doing what we feel we do best and we are leaving to others what we feel they can do better. That is the way in which we are conducting our business.

There are different levels of taxation. I cannot speak to all of them but clearly there is a responsibility. We have made our move and the next step is up to the provinces.

[Translation]

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I want to put a question to the minister about another aspect of her speech. She says Canada is the best country in the world to live in and anyone can enjoy it. As far as I am concerned, I see things differently. Overall, it is true that Canada is well positioned among western countries, but there are groups in our society which are less fortunate than others and the government should try to improve their situation.

I would like to draw your attention to the aboriginal people. Given the statistics on suicide, alcoholism and various other social problems, I wonder if the best way to help aboriginal women would not be to thoroughly examine the relationship between the natives and the federal government and to review, or discard altogether, the Indian Act, in order to put an end to the shameful way Canada has been treating native peoples over the last century.

[English]

Ms. Blondin-Andrew: Mr. Speaker, I am really quite pleasantly surprised to hear the member opposite speaking about the rights of aboriginal people.

It is no secret that I have been very outspoken on the rights of aboriginal people. I am also quite pleased, as was the rest of the country and the House, that the only department that is experiencing growth, even though it is not enough to meet the increase in demand and need, is the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

I am also quite pleased, on behalf of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, to note that there is a major devolution and dismantling process under way. Something is definitely happening. As an example, an agreement was signed in Manitoba. That is just one area but there are other sources of self-empowerment.

The government has a whole section on self-government. There have been major comprehensive land claim deals signed with the Yukon, a number in the Northwest Territories and also in the province of Quebec. Those are the real empowering sources on which the government has taken an initiative. It is not just this government but other governments as well.

We are not turning away from the people who are the most vulnerable, at risk and disadvantaged. We are there for those people.

We understand that we can do business in a much more effective and efficient way. The Canadian public agrees and is ready for that. In a sense, we are catching up with public thinking on this. I am sure the hon. member will recognize that in doing so we will not turn our back on the people who really need our help.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Guy Chrétien (Frontenac, BQ): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Québec for having introduced this most important motion in the House this morning. I expecially like the part of the motion which refers to: "—inaction regarding the adoption of concrete measures to promote the economic equality of women in federal areas of jurisdiction."

Would the Secretary of State for Training and Youth be prepared to make a commitment before the House this morning that she will take steps at the highest levels of her party to ensure that women will not be affected more than men by the 45 000 job downsizing over the next three years?

• (1120)

She said earlier that women accounted for 52 per cent of the Canadian population. Will the ratio be higher than 52 per cent when those 45 000 civil servants lose their jobs? Will there be many more women than men among those people?

[English]

Hon. Ethel Blondin-Andrew (Secretary of State (Training and Youth), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the President of the Treasury Board is the minister who has that responsibility. I feel he has an eye and an ear to all of the dynamics of balancing on gender the concerns of the people who will be reduced from the work force there. He is considering all the dynamics. I would not even try to improve on the excellent job the minister has done.

I am sure he has a special concern about the view that government has toward the role of women in everything we do. Of course I have support for women in all areas, not just this area, as my colleagues do, some of whom are male.

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise to speak to this issue today. I wish to preface my remarks by saying that although I will not be in complete agreement with my colleagues in the Bloc Quebecois, I believe it is important for all of us in the House to have the opportunity to debate.

It is through debate and discussion that ideas evolve to make for a more effective environment, especially when we are looking at this whole area of the ongoing evolution and devolution, shall we say, of those issues that are particularly important to women as they become more a part of society.

I would like to compliment the minister for youth and training for the philosophical eloquence with which she addressed this issue. My approach is going to be somewhat different because we were asked to assess the impact of the Liberal budget on the whole of society and that, of course, includes women.

The rhetoric that has been used to promote the evaluation of issues pertaining to women has been in my view for far too long framed in the term women's issues. This narrowly defined focus ignores the economic reality and the impact that is felt, not just by women but also by men, our families and Canadian society in general.

The Liberal budget is a good example of this cross–cutting effect, across lines of race, religion, gender, even age. Today I will address three areas on which the budget has a negative impact as these are related to women. I chose to be very specific. I am glad that I did because it does provide a challenge to government, not necessarily in a negative way, but perhaps to challenge its thinking and approach to many of these issues.

The first element I want to focus on is women and their autonomy. I will use the example of a national day care program, highlighting another broken Liberal promise, as well providing a dialogue for discussion from the Reform perspective. It is an opportunity to which I have long looked forward.

The second area for discussion evolves around opportunities for women in Canada and the hollow ring of support provided in the Liberal budget. The focus for this aspect of my discussion is on the department of the status of women. We know that common sense speaks against the notion of social engineering. There is no strength in a tradition that keeps the issues of women from being addressed in a manner deserving of swift action.

Last, this address will look at creative productivity, meaning jobs, jobs, jobs. Does that not have a familiar ring? The Liberals ran on this strong platform plank but have abandoned it in search of a savvy transparent advantage: the need to be liked by an electorate becoming increasingly frustrated by political posturing that does nothing more than foster dependency through the status quo. We will talk about women in business in that section.

• (1125)

Given the economic situation in Canada, the government simply cannot afford expenditures in the area of social programs. Yet the government and the previous one made extravagant promises to Canadians for a national day care system. For financial reasons, the Conservative government broke its promise in 1992–93 and the Liberal government has promised national day care if the economy grows.

The reality is that it is easy for government to continue to make a promise it cannot keep and has no intention of keeping. The Reform Party prefers not to make promises on policies for which it cannot realistically expect to deliver.

As a matter of social policy, the Reform Party believes that the sole responsibility for the care of children lies with parents and that the federal government should not interfere with that responsibility through economic incentives that promote one form of child care over another nor promote subsidized day care facilities.

By advocating universal day care, the Liberal and former Tory governments are both saying that the responsibility for the care of our children lies with the state and not with the parents. Reform will only support a system that keeps the state out of the homes of Canadians and maintains the freedom and responsibility of parents to care for children while providing some form of assistance to only those parents and children truly in need.

The federal government should concern itself exclusively with matters that fall within its jurisdiction such as fiscal and monetary matters. High taxes, unemployment and rising interest rates are by far the major reasons why Canadians have no choice but to work while balancing homes and child care responsibilities. If the government would balance its budget, thereby giving Canadians the leverage to balance their own, not only would options open up for Canadian parents but the number of single mothers and children living in poverty would decrease.

Financial problems are a major contributor to family breakdown and divorce. By alleviating some of these financial hardships, the government will indirectly strengthen the family. That is this country's richest resource and economic foundation.

The debt and deficit situation no longer provides any leverage to the federal government in terms of lost revenues or further expenditures. The government's hands have become tied as far as new programs or financial incentives are concerned to allow the choice for parents to stay home or go to work.

The Reform Party believes that there are various avenues to pursue in anticipation of long term tax relief for Canadians. We continue our work in these areas as demonstrated by the Reform's taxpayers' budget thereby increasing disposable household income and allowing for choice when it comes to caring for children.

From a taxation perspective, we recommend that the government discontinue the child care expense deduction to level out the playing field between stay at home and working parents. It should pursue tax avenues that are not unfairly balanced in favour of one lifestyle or family composition over another.

However, before it does so, it must determine whether federal responsibilities extend to providing child care to Canadian children because current expenditures including the following: the child tax benefit, the child care expense deduction, equivalent to married tax deduction, GST credit, CPP survivor benefits, UI maternity and parental benefits, social assistance and transfer payments to provinces under CAP. These effectively put it in the day care business and directly into the homes of Canadians.

This jurisdiction is one for which it currently has no control. The provinces and territories are primarily responsible for the issue of child care. As provinces enact their own child care legislation and establish the accompanying regulations regarding the number of attendants per child, physical requirements of child care settings and training levels, all important criteria, dwindling transfer payments to the provinces become an even greater issue. How can this government justify downloading more responsibility to already cash strapped provinces?

What I have explained here would introduce a level playing field for both work and stay at home parents and would have far reaching positive economic implications. The potential for single income families could mean a drastic decrease in unemployment. For each person vacating the workforce a job opens up for the unemployed. The parent who chooses to be at home would have the opportunity and time to volunteer at schools, hospitals or local community centres, relieving some of the financial pressures currently facing these organizations which rely on government funding. It becomes a circle for success.

We are advocating in favour of the family and those measures which will help Canadian families remain the social and economic building blocks of this country. These are the issues which affect and concern all of us, women and men. The issues of child care and the choice to work or stay at home predominately affect women.

The Liberal budget demonstrates a lack of understanding and commitment to this fundamental reality. Reform's vision of social policy overall includes the decentralization of spending authority to the levels of government closest to the people, an improved framework of co–operative national standards, the empowerment of families and individuals, and a reinvigorated charitable sector.

It is my belief that complete equality has come to reflect the core values of what I call the new feminism. I see any attempt for change in this regard caught up in the social engineering process as sustained and subsidized by Status of Women Canada.

The Liberal budget did nothing to move us away from a tradition that perpetuates an old style of issues management, review, consult, discuss, a never ending circle of policy development going nowhere. Women want action on these issues which are so important to them.

When the Minister of Finance tabled his budget he announced he was transferring to Status of Women a women's program from Human Resources Development. When he undertook this move he transferred $11.3 million to Status of Women, $8.6 million of it for straight grants to special interest groups, and $2.7 million for the administration and distribution of those grants. That amounts to an administrative overdose of close to 30 per cent. No business can afford to operate like this. No family country can afford to operate like this. No household can afford to operate like this. How can our government?

The move was followed this week by another announcement from the Secretary of State for the Status of Women. As of April 1, 1995 the National Advisory Council on the Status of Women will be disbanded. Yet there was no mention in the budget of an amalgamation of the NACSW with Status of Women Canada.

The secretary of state allowed the estimates for the advisory council on the status of women to be commissioned, estimates which were published and released. They were of no value, for not one month later the announcement was made that the advisory council on the status of women would cease to exist. The secretary of state permitted an expenditure of tens of thousands of dollars in consulting fees to produce part III of the estimates when she knew all the information contained therein would not be used. It would not be needed. What kind of leadership is this?

Not only do we have a department failing to disclose, we have wasted taxpayers money in order to further an unknown agenda at this point with respect to the budget. It is this kind of politics which has caused Canadians to find politicians less than forthright.

On the issue of this department change, it is a tentative step in the right direction in terms of reducing the size of government. I acknowledge that. However, in terms of cost reduction it really is tokenism. A saving of $1 million cast against an exploding debt is cold comfort to Canadians waiting for an improved fiscal climate.

• (1135)

We need a dismantling of Status of Women altogether. I say this for two reasons. It would remove the stigma of special interest groups from women who are seeking to make positive change socially, economically and politically. Canadians would view this with favour as we strive to reach true equality without subsidized funding supporting these groups. It is a divisive practice creating us versus them.

We would see government moving away from the cycle of reviewing, consulting and discussing with no action. The issues important to women would be more readily addressed and quickly if it were moved into the various departments for which there would be authority for action. Violence against women could be dealt with by the Department of Justice. The whole issue of breast cancer and research would move to the Department of Health. The finance department could have the opportunity to address realistically the whole issue of poverty within single parent families which are usually led by the mother.

Last year in her budget speech the secretary of state was very proud to announce that the government recognizes there are inequities in our tax system and income system detrimental to woman. She suggested there would be a review—another review—to address things such as support payments for women. She suggested the government would improve this situation.

Here we are a year later and absolutely nothing has been done in this area. When a bill was presented by my colleague from Calgary Centre to redress this inequity the Liberal government refused to support it.

One questions the partisanship of the House when sound fiscal proposals are introduced. What is the government's position regarding the interest of women, if only to score political points?

Through effective and non–government subsidized efforts litigation and the simple exercise of expression through votes women do wield a lot of clout. When government officials, politicians, lawyers and judges get on side this will facilitate a powerful dynamic for change. In any quest for solutions the best models are partnerships of public and private resources. Resources mean more than money. Governments cannot act alone. They have neither the know how nor the money.

What I speak of has been a long time coming. Our daughters, my daughters and my grandchildren, granddaughters I hope, will view the years prior to the 1970s as the dark ages. Male domestic violence went unchecked. Divorced women were denied a share of family property. Pregnant women were discriminated against in the job market. Rape could be easily laughed out of court by smart lawyers. Women were expected to declare they would love, honour and obey when they took their marriage vows. In fact 27 years ago I said "obey" and thought nothing of it, but how times have changed.

The world was perceived from a male prism, from the use of language to the raised issues that have altered the course of those issues most important to women. Cases on equal employment opportunities, spousal support, fair pensions and equal pay, as well as sexual assault, sexual harassment, rape, pregnancy discrimination and violence against women have been benchmarks for women in the last decade. Remarkable efforts from remarkable men and women have resulted now in a very different world view.

The best models for change are built on the partnerships found in the public and private sectors. This is even more apparent as we move to discuss women in business. Governments provide the environment in which business will thrive. Governments are there to cope with infrastructure development while the private sector seeks to thrive in a competitive and free market.

This leads to my discussion of women in business. Women are starting businesses at three times the rate of men. Of these, 75 per cent start their businesses during the peak child bearing years, placing additional responsibility on the family structure. These, women like most small business people, work long hours, from 50 to 70 hours a week, and earn on average less than $30,000 a year.

I would like to throw out a challenge to those government institutions that become obstructionists to the phenomenon of women entrepreneurs. Women who create employment as small business owners are not a passing fad, but have become a basic trend.

However, there is still discrimination by financial institutions against women who own and operate businesses. This discrimination was detailed in a study released last week by the Canadian Federation of Independent Business and takes the form of higher interest rates and a higher refusal rate for financing requests for women than for men. This discrimination was identified despite the fact that the characteristics used for the study were the same, irrespective of gender.

The characteristics were the age of the business, the sector of activity, the number of employees, the sales performance, the number of credit managers, provincial and financial institutions. Externally it would appear that women are participating on a level playing field.

What possible conclusion could be drawn when women business owners operating with the same parameters as male business owners are either refused their financing requests or are forced to pay a premium rate to compete on this so–called level playing field? The cost of financing is therefore unequal for men and women who own and operate businesses. This is the kind of equality that needs to be challenged and changed because it is not equality at all.

The report concluded by making eight recommendations. I find it shocking that the recommendations suggest financial institutions should change their approach toward women business owners, that financial institutions should investigate ways of better understanding the particular situation of small and medium size businesses, especially women owners.

These kinds of recommendations do nothing to encourage responsible business decisions to be made by our financial institutions based on competency and merit. Instead, although identifying that women business owners are treated unfairly by our institutions, it concludes the fault is that of the women rather than gender bias.

The finance minister stated in his budget speech: "There is so much more that we would like to be able to do for the millions of Canadians who care little about the world of dividends and derivatives and simply worry about making ends meet''.

It is time for this government to worry about making ends meet. A crippling debt and continual deficit stifling the growth of the nation will not lead us to prosperity. Removal of barriers through proper allocation of tax dollars enabling less social dependency and a more self–confident and trained workforce, empowerment if you will, will ensure that prosperous future for all of us, men and women.

Ms. Bonnie Brown (Oakville—Milton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will take a moment to compliment the mover of the motion, the member for Quebec.

In her motion she expresses the feelings a lot of us have, that we would all like to do more at this time to enhance our civilization, the civility of our country, and we would like to encourage those women's groups which have over time spoken out so eloquently and which have demanded more equity in their lives as Canadian citizens.

From that perspective I am in agreement. At the same time, as the government responsible for the fiscal balance of this country, we have had to cut back and it is not just on the backs of women, although that is the focus of today's discussion.

It is rather pretty well in every facet of our society, whether it is a businessman who used to get a grant or a women's group that used to get a grant. It is possible that neither may get a grant now. That does not mean we should leave our ideals behind. The member's motion helps us to keep those ideals in the forefront as we struggle through this period.

• (1145)

As for the last speaker, the member for Calgary Southeast, I find it somewhat difficult to follow her logic. She described the 1970s as the dark ages for women. She used some good examples to describe the days when women were less equal than they are today. At the same time she seemed to agree with the closing down of the council on the status of women and, if I am correct, she suggested that we should close Status of Women Canada.

Does the member feel there has been some progress over the last number of years in the way in which women can participate in our society today in civilian life, in the military and in Parliament? How does she think we got here in 1995? Was it not the work of volunteer women's groups, government funded women's groups, and governments of the past that put budgets together for Status of Women Canada to pursue the issues outlined by women as needing to be improved to improve women's lives?

Mrs. Brown (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for her question. There is no denying that women have moved a very long way. If it had not been for the efforts of the feminists, if we are to use that term here, there would not be the level of awareness of many of the issues I cited in my text. If they had not spoken out change would not have occurred.

We have entered a different era. In my text I was trying to move us beyond the status quo. It is a challenge to government in terms of what I said to find ways to look at equality on the basis of just that with no conditions attached.

We will have to come to terms with the economic reality that the government has very few dollars to spend and start to rely more on volunteer groups as she suggested and those avenues I mentioned in my text to pursue and continue the evolutionary change.

I talked about effective and non–government subsidized efforts. I talked about litigation. I talked about the simple exercise of expression through our right to vote, putting people in the House of Commons. Hopefully that means women and men who will continue to press for change and pursue the opportunities we can without having to rely heavily on governments to fund initiatives. The issue of the dismantling of status of women is an attempt to move us beyond that point.

The government's budget was a startling shift to a different spectrum on the continuum of left to right. The ideology of social liberalism seems to have changed. They too have embraced more of an economic pragmatic approach to how we deal with issues. I am trying to seek different ways of encouraging women as well as men to find alternatives rather than the status quo approach of going to government for money to undertake another policy review or to produce another report with little action.

I appreciate the member's questions and look forward to further discussion with her at some other time.

Mr. Tony Ianno (Trinity—Spadina, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it was very interesting to listen to the hon. member and her approach to the government's budget.

Independence is very important to women and to all Canadians. The budget is taking a first step toward encouraging more independence. Child care is an important aspect of that. It is not just a lifestyle, as the hon. member has indicated, but a need to allow single women especially to get back into the workforce, which gives them and their families dignity. They can then act as role models for their children and contribute in a very meaningful way to Canadian society. Their children will have the independence to do the things they want to do.

• (1150)

One aspect of the budget of the Minister of Finance concerned small business. We should take into account the statistics the hon. member has stated regarding the increase of women entrepreneurs in the system. That should be commended because it will spur the country to become self–sufficient and reduce the overall debt. We should take into account the one way in which small business people can get money to improve and enhance their business opportunities is through the source of capital from banks.

As the minister stated, through the budget the banks have to be encouraged to sit down with government to find ways to lend more money to small businesses. Considering that small businesses run by women are becoming more and more a factor, it is in the right direction to give them the tools they need to help our economy get stronger.

We should take into account the benchmark to which the minister was alluding. We should take into account that some banks are lending small businesses less than one–third of all their corporate loans. One recommendation I put forward was that the government should encourage banks to lend to small businesses at least one–third of the amount lent to all corporate donors. Then we would find an increase in loans to small businesses from $33 billion to $49 billion, or a 50 per cent increase. That would encourage many small businesses to expand and give women more tools to do much better.

Would the hon. member agree that would be a good step by the Minister of Finance?

Mrs. Brown (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for his question.

I would ask the member perhaps at another time to explain exactly what he means by government encouragement. I do not have a clear understanding of what he means by encouragement. However I would support government working with the banks to encourage a plan for action such as the hon. member suggested.

I talked about the whole matter of financial institutions lending to women. I was taken aback by the report undertaken by the Federal Business Development Bank regarding the gender bias that appears to be apparent with respect to women and how women have access to money to foster and create businesses that will thrive. That is the point I would like to make here. It was concern for gender bias. Women do not appear to be treated fairly by financial institutions, given the nature of the report I cited in my text.

From the Reform Party perspective we encourage and recommend competition in banking provided to entrepreneurs such as service to customers and delivery of quality products. We also recommend an independent ombudsman to adjudicate problems such as the ones I have mentioned. That is a form of problem resolution without having to go to government for further money to resolve the problem.

[Translation]

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière–du–Loup, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I think it is interesting to see there is some agreement on the relevance of the motion presented by the hon. member for Québec. I am not saying that members will agree on every single word or that the government or the other opposition party will be in complete agreement, but there seems to be a common concern about the way women will be treated in the future, considering the changes that are taking place.

I will read the motion again:

> That this House denounce the government for its insensitivity and its inaction regarding the adoption of concrete measures to promote the economic equality of women in federal areas of jurisdiction.

• (1155)

I think the operative words in this motion are "the adoption of concrete measures", because policies on the status of women have been discussed for many years. However, I think governments should be judged on what they have actually done in this respect.

Perhaps I may take an example from every day life. Take, for instance, Marie–Hélène, a young student who intends to go to university next September. How does she see her future as a woman? What kind of future can she expect?

Well, as a result of social programs reform, she can expect to be in debt to a far greater extent during the next few years. If she decides to go for a university degree, she will end up with twice or three times the debt she would have if she were completing her schooling now. Which means that a young woman who wants a career and considers what her future will be is going to say: Well, maybe it is not such a good idea to go all out to develop my potential because of the increased debt load I can expect.

It is very surprising that she should think so under a Liberal government that, in the sixties and seventies, tried to do some interesting things to promote equal opportunity. Today, the government makes it very difficult for people to take advantage of such opportunities by telling them that when they go to university, they will have to carry a much heavier debt load. As a result, only wealthy families will be able to send their children to university, and we are thus reverting to a model we had 25 or 30 years ago, which no one wanted and where equal opportunity for education did not really exist.

So that is an example of a lack of concrete measures from this government, a negative action that will turn the clock back 20 or 30 years and give many women cause for concern.

Let us get back to our student. She has finished her education and would like to start a business. She decides that she wants to get into new technologies. Unfortunately, she is not covered by unemployment insurance because she has never worked a sufficient number of weeks to be eligible, and she cannot apply for welfare if her spouse has a job. In other words, she is not eligible for any government program.

I took this particular example because women are more likely to find themselves in this kind of situation. As a result of what I would call systemic measures that are counterproductive, a situation has been created where women who want to start a business will be less likely than men to have access to various types of assistance. This is unfortunate, because the government could have included a number of measures in the current budget to deal with this, but it did not.

I will continue with my example of a young woman looking at her future, making plans and trying to decide how she will go about it.

When she read the red book of the Liberal Party, during the electoral campaign, she might have felt that, whenever she decided to enter a new career, she would be able to take advantage of adequate day care services for her children, allowing her enough time to pursue a career while ensuring that her children receive a proper education and adequate support during their formative years. Now I am not saying that men do not have any responsibilities regarding the education of their children, clearly we have the same responsibilities as women, but the truth is that in the real world we very often ask women to be what we call superwomen, that is to say women able to juggle family, professional and social lives, and more often that not, without much help.

The government could have taken a number of concrete measures, since the Liberal Party had promised during the election campaign that if the gross domestic product was to increase by 3 per cent it would create 60,000 new spaces in day care centers. Recently, we have seen an increase in the gross domestic product, but no increase in the number of day care spaces which would benefit women, except for native people. Thus the commitment which has been made regularly to Quebec and Canada has now been rejected.

The previous Conservative government did not live up to this commitment. The Liberals, who were elected on the promise to bring about changes, in this area as well as others, are following in their predecessors' footsteps. We can see why there is still a great deal of dissatisfaction and why the lack of concrete measures on the part of the government can be denounced.

As a result, a young female student graduating with a heavier debt load and the knowledge that adequate day care services will not be available sees no hope of improvement in her situation. When she learns, at the same time, that the bodies acting as watchdogs for the status of women are going to be axed, she has every right to wonder what is in store for her. This young woman is full of vitality, very enterprising, and wants to go places.

I will now give you the example of another woman also full of vitality, but maybe not as lucky. For the sake of this exercice, let us call her Helen. Helen, a single parent with two children, stays at home. Housing consumes 40, 50, 60 per cent of her income. When she is told that the government is committed to reducing poverty, the first thing she expects is to spend a more reasonable proportion of her income on housing, somewhere around 25 to 30 per cent.

But nowadays, people often spend 50 to 60 per cent of their income on housing. This means that, with a welfare cheque, when you spend between 50 and 60 per cent of it on rent, you have to be a miracle worker in order to feed two children properly and, in the end, prevent them from becoming trapped themselves in the vicious circle of being poor children. Could the Liberal government not have set aside additional money for direct assistance to public housing, following the tour by the Standing Committee on Human Resources Development on the reform of social programs?

Oh, no. On the contrary. A press release by the minister responsible for the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation on February 28, 1995 made a very simple announcement—no fanfare. Nowhere else was this casual approach taken, except with the Advisory Council on the Status of Women, yesterday. Its demise was announced quite simply, without any fuss, during debate. The effect of this approach is just as hidden as in a press release. The press release in question announced a cut in the overall public housing budget of $270 million over three years. What does this say to Helen, the woman I was just talking about, who has a housing unit to pay for and must perform miracles just to survive? What does she understand when she is told the public housing budget is going to be cut by $270 million? So much for the light at the end of the tunnel.

This is a criticism that may be made of the present government. It fails to take solid measures designed not so much as acts of charity but rather to put people in a position to be able to get out of their present situations. The same example applies with respect to the government's continual attempt to use the American model in assisting poor families. The current approach of the government is to say what the Americans have done, basically. The government says it will help poor families, but with the money it currently gives the middle class.

Do you know what the effect of this is? More and more middle class families will become poor families. Then the government can crow over the fact that it sends them a cheque as a poor family. However, the approach in the past in Canada, and the one that worked, was to fight poverty by allowing the people just above the poverty line to continue to hope that their situation will improve and by giving poor families the means to improve their situation as well. But it will not come about by running in the opposite direction, by helping those in greatest need in order to bolster the government's image, while withdrawing assistance from those in the middle class and driving them into the ranks of the poor.

I think that we have here another example of the present government's failure to act that must not be allowed to go unchallenged. To accompany all these examples I am going to read you an extract from a speech given by the Minister of Human Resources Development before the World Summit on Social Development, just to show you what little connection there is between the speech and reality.

The Minister of Human Resources Development said: "Our programs must increasingly be backed up by concrete measures to get people back to work, rather than focussing uniquely on income support". What are there in the way of measures to allow female entrepreneurs to assume their roles in the market place? There is nothing which corresponds to what was said in Copenhagen.

• (1205)

Second, he also says that affordable day care must be available so that heads of single parent families, especially women, can work outside the home. How can a minister give such a speech in Copenhagen, and on the other hand be a minister in a government that has tabled the budget we have just seen? I think that this proves that the motion by the member for Québec is very relevant and we hope that the government will devote the necessary attention to correcting these major shortcomings in the present budget.

Mrs. Gagnon: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his very relevant comments. I appreciate his way of making concrete proposals to the government regarding economic and wage equality, as well as other issues.

The purpose of the motion is to have the government speak up, not about intentions, but about concrete actions which it might take to improve the situation of women. The secretary of state made a comment to the effect that the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women was established because women had a lot of claims.

She argued that the situation of women has since improved within the government. Women have, indeed, made progress, in education, business, university and in other sectors. But these women are part of an elite group and not all women had the same opportunities in terms of access to such traditionally male occupations.

I wonder if the hon. member could again show, in concrete terms, how the government often takes credit for measures geared to an elite group, while forgetting poor people, women, single mothers and the young who are faced with shrinking job opportunities. What concrete action could the government take?

The government says it wants to stimulate businesses run by women, but again we are talking about an elite. This is fine, but a large percentage of women are left to fend for themselves and the government does not seem to have any concrete plan to help them.

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in my short experience as a member of Parliament, one of the things that struck me most is how women's groups, in my own riding and other regions, manage to do so much with so little. On very limited budgets, they find innovative ways to help women and their families, and they get concrete results despite their limited resources.

I suggest that we start by listening to these organizations and by giving them the resources to do their jobs without being in a constant state of crisis. There should be a three-year or five-year plan that would make it possible for organizations, that represent women and help to develop women's goals, to continue their work.

• (1210)

In the course of the hearings held by the human resources development committee, we heard testimony from dozens of women across Canada who talked about their experiences and who wanted to provide a better future for their daughters who today are 5, 10 or 15 years old. They want to ensure that 15 or 20 years from now, special programs will no longer be necessary, because every woman will have a chance to develop her potential and equal opportunity will have become a way of life in our society.

The most important thing is to have confidence in women.

Mr. Gilbert Fillion (Chicoutimi, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am naturally in favour of the motion tabled by the hon. member for Québec, which asks:

> That this House denounce the government for its insensitivity and its inaction regarding the adoption of concrete measures to promote the economic equality of women in federal areas of jurisdiction.

I therefore denounce the government's insensitivity to the situation of women. I would like to take this opportunity to address one aspect, old age pensions, and to show that the present government, despite all the action it has taken in this area, is not preventing an increasing number of older women from falling below the poverty line. The 1995 budget is definitely sounding the knell of the universality of social programs, including public old age security plans.

By way of example, the ceiling on pension benefits based on the previous year's income puts an end to universality. Even though few seniors have incomes over $53,000 a year, seniors far from being rich often may earn higher family incomes in one year by liquidating assets they have accumulated over the years, withdrawing RRSPs or transferring the latter.

This provision of the budget will affect them directly the following year by reducing their pension benefits. It is a known fact that the old age security programs to which seniors have contributed have virtually stopped being universal since 1989.

I have a hard time understanding why the Liberal government keeps going after this sector of the population, who, we must not forget, built this country. They are the government's preferred target, the one is bent on destroying by imposing unacceptable measures year after year, budget after budget, on these, society's most disadvantaged.

People then wonder why Quebecers want to throw off this federalism and become sovereign. The various old age security programs and the guaranteed income supplement are the principal sources of income of people over 65 years of age. These people, especially women, are much poorer than the population as a whole.

Is there anyone in this House who does not know that seniors are more disadvantaged because they are on pension and have lower incomes if they have not worked outside the home. This is the case of our mothers.

Their work at home was not paid nor used to calculate their retirement pension. Their only income therefore in the years to come will be the Canada pension cheque. And for how many years to come?

• (1215)

It is an injustice and the government amplifies it by declaring that old age security pensions will be based on family income in the future. This measure will force a great number of seniors, most of them women, to hand back their pensions.

According to Quebec's minister for the status of women, this measure would set women back 50 years. During that time, they have succeeded in being recognized by society as individuals, but now, because of budget cuts, they will see themselves forced to be viewed in relation to their spouses and to family income, once they retire.

We can justifiably wonder in what direction the federal government is headed when it comes to women's rights. My colleague from the government of Quebec is right when she adds that the principle of family income completely transforms the retirement income security program, replacing what was an insurance program by a social assistance program for needy families.

Canada made very clear public commitments in favour of gender equality and also took statutory measures to reach this objective. I refer to a Canadian document on violence against women. Section E.61 of its action plan states that Canada is committed to analyzing all of the proposed amendments to the tax system in order to expose all of the discriminatory or negative effects that they will have on women. This principle has now been shelved.

Section E.66 of the same document states that Canada is committed to raising and ensuring full indexation of the threshold at which old age security benefits start being clawed back. Once again, this commitment has not been met.

Canada's commitment is very clear in this document: We are supposed to take all of the necessary measures, in particular legislative measures, to amend or abolish acts, regulations, customs and practices which discriminate against women. Is this what the government delivers in its budget? No. It has thrown all of its principles out the window.

The Minister of Finance offhandedly casts aside studies which have cost taxpayers a great deal of money and ignores basic principles in the name of deficit reduction. On the contrary, instead of going forward and giving seniors, in particular women, the means to attain these standards, the budget places these standards further out of their reach.

Let us be serious. I understand very well that everything has a price and that there is a cost associated with this initiative. However, why not hit banks, tax havens and family trusts and leave seniors in peace. They have sweat blood and tears to build this country which, today, is rejecting them. Is this federalism?

Have seniors not already given enough by working all of their lives and paying their taxes? Who else do you think filled the government's coffers?

In conclusion, I would like to remind you that Quebec's sovereignty does not jeopardize senior's incomes. The threat to old age pensions comes from the federal government. That is the price to be paid for maintaining the status quo, the price to be paid for voting no in the upcoming referendum.

In a sovereign Quebec, a matter like the one mentioned at the beginning of this speech, namely the government's insensitivity to the situation of women, will not even be an issue. Equity will be the order of the day.

• (1220)

Mr. Mac Harb (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of International Trade, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am quite amazed to see this motion by the opposition. I would have wished for a preamble which could have read as follows: "That this House commend the government for all the measures it has taken to date to create opportunities for women".

My hon. colleague is forgetting that, in our 1994 budget, we reiterated our commitment at the federal level to provide $100 million to the emergency repair program. We also reinstated the court challenges program which provides funding for cases relating to the provisions of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms that guarantee equality rights.

I want to stress that these programs have expanded jurisprudence relating to positive economic action for women. Also, our government announced the establishment of the Canadian Race Relations Foundation, another major initiative on behalf of women facing discrimination both on the grounds of sex and race.

I could cite at least 15 to 18 different initiatives this government has taken to date to create opportunities for Canadian women. Therefore, I am surprised to hear the opposition parties attack the government like this. I would like to tell my hon. colleagues that one year after taking office, we have accomplished a lot for women, when compared to the record of the previous government over ten years. I wonder why my hon. colleague does not rise to commend the government.

Mr. Fillion: Mr. Speaker, I have trouble commending this government when the status of women just keeps deteriorating. Women, whether young, middle aged or seniors, see their standard of living going down continually.

Take the freeze on student loans for young people who want to further their education, for example. The point was made earlier that, by the time they get out of school, university graduates will be in debt over their heads. That is what Canada has to offer. It was also clearly demonstrated, with figures to back this up, that no new day care spaces will be opened to allow women to re–enter the labour force.

Again, that is what this government has to offer. Furthermore, there is no indication anywhere that something will be done about social housing. Cuts, cuts, cuts. I say this is a disgrace. In the red book, which in my view has turned black, there is nothing, absolutely nothing, in terms of positive measures concerning the status of women.

Of course, one can argue that the government does have a Secretary of State for the Status of Women. But what does she have left besides her title since the advisory council has been abolished? What can she do? With no budget, she cannot go very far now. So, let us eliminate this title, which does more to pay lip service to the government's intentions than to further the cause of women.

[English]

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak on this motion today. Although I have to profess at the very beginning that I do not agree with the motion that has been put forward, I am pleased the member for Quebec has put it forward so that some of the positive moves this government has taken since it was first elected can come to light.

• (1225)

It is important that individuals and particularly parliamentarians are periodically forced to think about issues such as equality, be it between gender, or people of different races or colour, immigrants versus second and third generation Canadians or our aboriginal people.

We come to this place to debate the issues of the day. It is important for us to understand that unfortunately our society is not one that can claim with any purity to practise equality in nearly any aspect of life as Canadians. It is unfortunate that as a tolerant society there is still a tremendous amount of intolerance. It is unfortunate that as a progressive society there is still a tremendous amount of bigotry, a tremendous amount of isolationism and a tremendous amount of hate toward those who are different from us, whoever us is in any particular case.

It is important that we try to put this debate into some context. The Government of Canada, my party, has campaigned for many years on platform of equality. The record and sincerity of the statements of a party or political institution, of a parliament or a government, should be judged by its actions.

The actions we have taken over the last 18 months have been fairly significant. That is not to say they are the only actions that need to be taken. It is quite the contrary. When we are dealing with things like inequality, bigotry and racism we must be eternally vigilant. It has a habit of creeping up and when we take one step forward, unless we are very, very vigilant somebody will push us two or three steps backward.

I suspect this motion came about as a result of some of the budgetary measures. I suspect that some people are concerned, perhaps for good reason, about some of the changes that have taken place because of the fiscal realities of rising deficits and debts and the requirement to try to get our economy moving again.

I suspect that the member for Quebec was concerned that the National Advisory Council on the Status of Women is going to be wound up. I too was concerned when this first became a subject of public debate and consternation.

I note the government has taken the women's program which used to be with human resources development and has folded it in with Status of Women Canada. This is a very significant move by the Government of Canada for two reasons.

In the past when governments thought we had money, when it was thought we had more borrowing authority than we should have had, many times dollars were given to special interest groups. They would be given the money and told to go and represent women in society. That was a terrible thing if we think about it. What was the real intent behind that? Was it to try to say that women's issues were not worthy of perpetual vigilance by parliamentarians? Did it mean they were to be pushed down to become the purview of a "special interest group"?

I have always had trouble with the way governments have funded special interest groups. Government funds me as a member of Parliament to represent the interests of my constituents. Repeatedly over the years it has become an accepted practice that parliamentarians can hide behind the fact that there are other groups to do this. We use taxpayers' money to front and support interests we are supposed to be raising and protecting in our duties as members of Parliament, as members of legislatures and as members of city councils right across Canada.

I do note this government has a good record with respect to the initiatives it has taken to promote equality, not just within areas of the federal purview. Governments must lead by example.

In my view this government has taken one of the most articulate, forceful and believable individuals in this Parliament and made her the Secretary of State for the Status of Women. Any independent observer would be hard pressed to find an individual in the last two Parliaments who has so consistently, forcefully and sincerely put forward the concerns of women and made it imperative that those concerns be dealt with by governments. It was not a fluke of cabinet roulette when it was decided that the member for Mount Royal would be the Secretary of State for the Status of Women.

Most women, most activists and most feminists in Canada, male and female, would agree that the choice of the member for Mount Royal as the Secretary of State for the Status of Women was clearly an indication of the seriousness with which the new government viewed these affairs.

However there have been other things such as Bill C–64, the Employment Equity Act. We came in and strengthened that act. It was one of the acts I have been extremely critical of in the past. I am withholding my praise to see how the recent amendments will play out in actual fact. It is fine to have a piece of legislation, but unless there is overwhelming and compelling reasons for the reporting mechanisms to be adhered to and some enforcement powers behind it we find it can be hollow words on very shallow paper. At least it is a step in the right direction.

The 1995 budget measures had some provisions to try to increase access to capital for small and medium size businesses. As everybody knows about 40 per cent of new entrepreneurs are women. Anybody who has been involved with public life, particularly as a member of Parliament, would know that women are doubly disadvantaged if they go to a bank or a financial institution looking for a loan. They are usually disadvantaged because it will be a small business proposal and the banks do not seem terribly keen on lending money for small business. They should be chastised and at times condemned for that. There is also sexism at play. Sometimes it is systemic, not overt. Women do not seem to be able to access capital in the same way as men.

More needs to be done. During the pre–election period we talked about establishing special programs for women entrepreneurs. The committee on industry has looked at it. I would encourage members of the committee, with all of the work they have on their desks, to recognize that women are doubly disadvantaged as entrepreneurs. That is one promise made in the red book during the campaign that must be fast tracked. We must find ways to set up women's entrepreneurial institutes and make sure there is real access to working capital for women entrepreneurs.

Anybody who has followed the social policy review, if in favour of it or opposed to it, will know that one of the main components was to try to address women and children in poverty and whether or not the current vehicles, the social programs, are addressing the real tragedy out there of women and children living in poverty.

The proposals put forward in the green book clearly addressed those issues. The proposals were meant to cause debate among the Canadian public about whether or not we had the wherewithal, the courage and the foresight to change social policy programs to ensure that some people who are missed, mostly single parent families headed by females, are no longer doomed to a life of hell and poverty for both themselves and their children. I hope some of the good measures in the green book will come to fruition and we will be able to address the real tragedy of women living in poverty and well over a million children living in poverty in Canada.

The red book commitment on the Canada Race Relations Foundation was fulfilled. Some individuals in the House believe with the fullness of their hearts that it was a waste of money to establish the Race Relations Foundation. All they have to do is go into any minority community in Canada, any black or immigrant community, to find out that the sting of racism still exists in Canada and that unfortunately its sting is no less painful today than it was years ago.

The Race Relations Foundation established by the government is aimed not just at minorities in Canada but at the triple disadvantaged in Canada who in many cases are women. Black women and native women are some of the most discriminated individuals in Canadian society. The Canadian Race Relations Foundation is a tangible example of the government's commitment to focusing government effort and attention to solving the real problems.

There are other matters that I will mention quickly. One is the task force on prostitution. I cannot think of a more violent and abhorrent crime against women than prostitution. The government, through the Minister of Justice, has indicated that we are prepared to take tough and decisive action to stop this heinous crime against society, against women, against our daughters and against our grand–daughters. We are serious about it. Tough action will be taken either by the minister or people like me putting private members' bills forward in the House.

• (1235)

On the firearms legislation, 50 per cent of women who are killed are killed in domestic disputes by firearms that are kept in the home. We have taken tough and decisive measures.

In conclusion, the debate should not be only about money. It should be about attitude. When I look around this place and I see the quality of members of Parliament, and the quality of female members of Parliament, I know we have come a long way but we have yet a long way to go.

[Translation]

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Québec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I see that my colleague opposite has also come up with many findings on the status of women. However, the measures he has described are mostly social in nature. They are very worthwhile measures but today's motion deals with the economic measures intended to promote women's equality.

In this regard, I would like to ask the hon. member opposite what he thinks of the proposed labour code reform. I know that in 1993, Bloc members proposed an amendment to harmonize with Quebec's occupational health and safety commission the benefits paid to pregnant women withdrawn from work for precautionary reasons. I know that an internal document is circulating, which totally ignores the motion proposed by Bloc members, even though it was supported by their Liberal colleagues.

Today is a day of action, a day on which we are asking the government to take concrete measures favouring women. In this matter, we see that there are two classes of female workers. Federal public servants who become pregnant and must be withdrawn from work for precautionary reasons earn less than their Quebec counterparts—I think they receive 60 per cent of their salary compared with 95 per cent in Quebec.

Why are they not taking this into account in the proposed reform of precautionary withdrawal?

[English]

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, the simple answer is that I do not know why more attention was not given to that measure. I have to be quite honest. I am not entirely up to date on the Quebec legislation about which the member spoke.

However I listened intently and I can tell the hon. member for Québec that I applaud her efforts to bring issues before the Parliament of Canada, the proper venue for such issues to be discussed.

As a member who is here for his second term, let me say that unfortunately far too often good proposals from opposition members are almost treated with dismissal by others in this place. When we are dealing with issues of fairness and equality, particularly issues that affect over 50 per cent of our population, partisanship has to be removed. When good proposals are put forward the government should look at them.

I look forward to getting more information on the matter. However, if it is a progressive measure which seeks to equalize the role of women not just in Quebec but across Canada, it would be the type of measure I would support regardless of the official position taken by my party.

The hon. member for Québec talked about the fact that the debate was on economic equality. The reality is that social equality and economic equality are intertwined. We cannot deny one and expect the other to be a consequence. Clearly we have to move in tandem to take measures, both in legislation and by example as a federal government and as legislators, to ensure that society moves toward not just perceived but real equality socially as well as economically. To deny one is to ensure that the consequences of the second will be that there will not be the equality that is necessary.

[Translation]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Québec has only 30 seconds left if she wishes to ask another question or make a comment.

Mrs. Gagnon: Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member opposite that economic reality is linked to social reality. But I would point out that they have cut the budgets of community organizations which operate in different areas and put forward social programs designed to help the most disadvantaged in our society.

• (1240)

I agree with the hon. member. What I would like is a concrete fiscal measure that will also support these community organizations' social initiatives.

For the information of the hon. member opposite, an internal document on the proposed reform of precautionary withdrawal is now circulating, which does not mention the motion adopted by the Liberals.

[English]

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for her comment. I will certainly look at that.

The reality is that the best equality is a job, as the member for Western Arctic said. Unfortunately women in our economy do not participate to the fullness of their potential. It is only when we break down those barriers that we will have true equality.

I look forward to working with the member for Québec. I applaud her for her tenacity in raising these issues on the floor of the House. I am sure there are others, such as the member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore who has worked tirelessly on behalf of minority women and women in society, who would be prepared to work with her to ensure that these things come about.

Ms. Jean Augustine (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise with considerable confidence to speak in rebuttal to the hon. member's motion.

I am proud to be a member of a government and party with a heritage of unprecedented sensitivity and action on real and practical measures to promote the economic equality of women. I will deal with the question of our history and the economic reality of women.

The strength and vitality of the women's movement in Canada today can be traced back to the moment of clarity and power experienced 25 years ago. The occasion was the 1970 landmark report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women.

At that moment women in Canada realized that equality of opportunity had become achievable. It was not just a Liberal government establishing the royal commission against all odds in 1967. It was also the will of women to make it happen. It was the alacrity with which the Liberal government of 1970 moved to respond to the commission's recommendations that inspired women to redouble their efforts to advance their status.

I think the member will agree with me that a Liberal government appointed Canada's first minister responsible for the status of women and the work that took place in 1971. A Liberal government established the office of the co–ordinator of the status of women in 1971 which has now become Status of Women Canada, the federal government's lead agency for government policy co–ordination related to women's equality. A Liberal government created the women's program in 1973 to provide financial and technical assistance to women's organizations and other voluntary groups working to promote the equality of women. The member knows the rich heritage and history of Liberals and their commitment to women's issues.

With the support of the Liberal government today women have succeeded in making the workplace more family friendly. Women are obtaining the support they need to balance work and family responsibilities for young children, for aging parents or for both.

Today with the support of the Liberal government women have also put issues like sexual harassment, pay equity, et cetera, on the workplace agenda. With the support of the Liberal government women are convincing other areas in society that these kinds of employment issues are not just women's issues. They are societal issues and they belong to all of us, men and women.

With the support of the Liberal government record numbers of women have started their own companies. In Canada today women operate 39 per cent of small businesses. According to the most recent survey undertaken by the Canadian Federation of Independent Business women entrepreneurs are doing very well.

Small and medium sized businesses are the major engine driving our economy, creating 85 per cent of all new jobs in Canada. According to my math, that makes women the major players in job creation in Canada today.

• (1245)

What is particularly encouraging is the increasingly dominant role younger women are playing in the creation of new businesses. As Le Devoir noted last week, 51.4 per cent of Canadian business proprietors under age 25 are women. According to 1991 figures complied by the CFIB, this compares to a 1981 figure of 30.6 per cent.

This is a good record and one that speaks highly of the government's support of the economic equality of women. This is the substance of the motion. All indications are that the growing prominence of women in small business will prove to be a major factor in our country's future growth.

I am pleased to note that the small business sector was the focus of several important commitments made in the budget of February 27. The finance minister declared the government is determined to remove barriers to the success of small business. We are equally determined to provide practical assistance to help Canada's small business survive and grow. It is essential that small businesses have access to the financing they need in order to continue being our number one creator of jobs.

To add to this the government will be working with the banks over the coming months to hammer out meaningful benchmarks for small business financing. One of the things we will be looking for is hard data on the success rate of women owned businesses so that banks can come to see that opening their doors and their pockets to women makes good business sense.

The budget also announced that we are substantially reducing government subsidies to business. In today's economy these subsidies are simply not cost effective in terms of job creation, productivity or growth. Nobody knows that case more strongly than business itself.

The government has decided to concentrate on the key engines of economic growth, as I mentioned, looking at the areas of science and technology and trade development. In fact, the government is working to create a policy environment that will encourage and reward the innovation and flexibility needed to pursue the opportunities of the new global marketplace.

The potential is clearly there. The government recognizes that the women of our country have the imagination and determination to fully participate in the growing world economy.

It is important for the member who is speaking so eloquently on the gaps in the meeting of our specific and individual needs to note that the government and the members on this side of the House recognize the way in which we need to work and the progress we need to make in order to meet all of the requirements in the provision of the quality of life for women and their families.

In terms of the economic question and the motion on the floor, this motion needs to be rebutted. The Liberal government is fully aware of the commitments we need to make to the economic situation of women.

[Translation]

Mrs. Gagnon: Mr. Speaker, I am in agreement with my hon. colleague when she says that issues surrounding the status of women in 1995 are also societal issues. I agree with her. However, are there not still many women burdened with the responsibility of picking up their children at day care, and then going home to do another shift?

I would ask the hon. member if she is going to be able to get her colleagues to take action on day care facilities, because 50,000 spaces a year were promised and we are short 35,000 spaces in Quebec.

• (1250)

Will the transfer to the provinces take place? We have reached 3 per cent of GDP. It is time the Liberal government delivered on this promise, which was one of the promises in its red book.

I would like to know if we can count on our colleague with respect to this issue, which is a particularly thorny one for women. Without day care facilities, women will not be able to enter the labour market if the government waits too long. There are 2 million day care spaces Canada wide, with a shortage of 35,000 in Quebec.

What we in Quebec want to see is not the enforcement of national standards by the federal government, but the implementation of transfers to the provinces so that the government of Quebec can better respond to a great demand from the women of Quebec.

Furthermore, during the consultations on the future of Quebec, several women's groups asked for this assistance so that women can break into the labour market.

[English]

Ms. Augustine: Mr. Speaker, I agree with the member across the way that in order for women to fully participate in the economic life of the country, it is important that we begin to address issues such as women as child givers, women as care givers and women who participate in the care of elders in a specific way.

It is also important to note that we have made some commitments. We made a commitment to increase the number of child spaces when we reach a certain percentage of the GDP. That promise is still on the books. We have not reversed our position on our commitment to child care or the commitments we made to ensuring employment equity and the whole series of issues and commitments we made to women.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member, who is also the Prime Minister's parliamentary secretary, is probably familiar with numerous issues, particularly those which concern the status of women. A document is currently circulating regarding the Labour Code reform.

I remember that when the last such reform took place, in May of 1992 if I am not mistaken, I proposed an amendment so that the same conditions would apply under both the federal and provincial labour codes, regarding precautionary withdrawal of work for pregnant women. The Quebec Labour Code provides that women get paid 95 per cent of their salaries, compared to 60 per cent under the federal code.

That was a housekeeping amendment which, of course, reflected the notion of flexible federalism, and the Liberals, then in opposition, supported that proposal. Consequently, my question to the hon. member is: Now that the Liberals are in office, why is that amendment not included in the proposed Labour Code reform which the government will table in the next few weeks?

[English]

Ms. Augustine: Mr. Speaker, we need the collaboration and co-operation of the members across the way to do a whole series of things. Just as the member is asking for our co-operation in this respect, there are certain ways in which we also should be asking for his collaboration as we move forward.

The issue of the status of women is not just a Quebec issue. It is not just an issue outside Quebec. It is an issue for all women. Therefore we each need to be concerned about the status of women in Canada, to speak about the status of women in Canada and to work for the laws, regulations, policies, equity issues that would bring about the quality of life for all women.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean H. Leroux (Shefford, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I will share my speaking time with the hon. member for Laurentides.

It is always an honour and a privilege to rise in this House, and members should always remember that when they do, they represent those who elected them.

• (1255)

Today, I am doing exactly that, and I am thinking more specifically of the 52 per cent of the residents of Shefford who are women.

The federal budget for 1995 tabled by the Minister of Finance totally ignored the social contract between the government and the majority of taxpayers in Quebec and Canada. The budget brought down by the hon. member for Lasalle—Émard ignores the economic and social realities facing the middle class and the less well–off groups in our society.

This budget denies women the right to a fairer and more equitable society. In fact, the budget is just a smoke screen to hide the real problems.

Left out of the budget altogether are measures to ensure that women get equal pay for equal work and a better standard of living. Last year, the Liberals voted in favour of measures that would be fairer and more equitable. Today, those promises have evaporated.

In fact, in the key sectors of health care, social assistance and post–secondary education, the Liberal government actually decided to make the worst, not the best but the worst of a bad situation. The first to suffer as a result of cuts in transfer payments to the provinces will be women and children.

The federal government has offloaded its financial problems on the provinces and on, Quebec, without considering the impact these cuts will have on women.

In addition, Ottawa has decided to launch a second attack on women who are senior citizens by calculating the amount of their old age security cheque according to the income of their spouses. This reduction comes in addition to the reduction in the age tax credit announced last year.

I deplore the fact that the federal government has offloaded its problems on the provinces instead of eliminating overlap and dismantling tax shelters that deprive the government of hundreds of millions of dollars annually.

The government's priorities are not in the right place and lack vision. You would think Ottawa was managed by a bunch of brokers looking for a good deal and speculating on the short term market with other people's money.

I do not mean to criticize the profession as such, but this is not what we need here in Ottawa. Those who govern us should be responsible people who are prepared to listen to the majority of taxpayers who are sick and tired of being squeezed.

Take, for instance, the Canada Assistance Plan, also known as CAP. Despite the provisions in the assistance plan regarding subsidized day care services, the shortage of adequate and affordable services remains a significant problem for a very large number of families with one or more children.

The lack of day care spaces is a fundamental concern for low and middle income parents.

This is a deep social concern, a concern which was expressed in the red book, this famous red book of the Liberal Party, which we might have thought would lead to some action plan.

We can read on page 38 of the red book, and I quote: "Canadians with young families need a support system that enables parents to participate fully in an economic life for the country— Recent research by the National Council of Welfare indicates that the single best predictor of whether a family has adequate economic resources is whether it has two wage earners. A growing majority of Canadian families need two wage earners to achieve a reasonable standard of living. The availability of good quality child care at an affordable cost makes the difference between a family living at the edge of poverty and a family living with a moderate standard of living".

• (1300)

This is straight out of the red book. A good child care system, affordable for all, is an economic advantage. It allows poor parents to re–enter the work force instead of having to continue to rely on social assistance and food banks. It also creates jobs, especially for women, since on average one job is created for every five children in day care.

Therefore, the Liberal principle of a service allowing access to financial independence remains a promise, it has been shelved, like all the nice sounding election promises which will be conveniently forgotten before the next election campaign.

According to the Liberal red book, in each year following a year of 3 per cent economic growth, a Liberal government will create 50,000 new child care spaces. We have reached this rate of economic growth this year. Since child care which is funded by governments is funded 50/50 by the federal and provincial governments, what will become of the spaces promised by the Liberals, if the government cuts transfer payments to Quebec by $350 million?

What will become of the 40 per cent of the costs of new child care spaces to be assumed by the federal government, which is evaluated at $120 million in 1995–96, $240 million in 1996–97, and $360 million in 1997–98, amounting to $720 million over three years? These figures come from the red book. It has been a long time since the red book, the Liberal bible, has been mentioned. What happened to all the nice Liberal promises?

Let us now talk about social housing. As a whole, the 1995–96 budget puts an end to any new initiative in this area. Since close to 17 per cent of Quebec families and 16 per cent of Canadian tenants spend more than 50 per cent of their income on rent, it is easy to understand why social housing needs are so huge and why offloading will have enormous long term consequences. Women, who represent an important clientele, or 57 per cent of social housing, will be the hardest hit by these cuts.

The 1995–96 budget also means that the 40,000 people on the co–op housing waiting list of the CMHC—The Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation—will have to wait months, even years, before a unit is available. There is no longer any hope of building new ones.

CMHC will close 20 branches across Canada. In Quebec, the Longueuil office will close while in Sept–Îles, Rimouski, Val–d'Or and Trois–Rivières, only one person will remain on duty, working at home. Successive decommitments by Ottawa clearly demonstrate the limitations of administrative agreements between Quebec and Ottawa in cases of unilateral withdrawal.

Today, Quebec is caught off guard by the extent of Ottawa's financial pull out in the social housing sector, because it counted on the federal government as the major source of funds in the agreement. Unable to compensate for this unilateral withdrawal, Quebec must review its plans and cancel the construction of new low rent housing units that had been promised to municipalities.

Because of the community help readily available there and the low cost of housing, the co–op formula was an interesting option for single parent families, which are headed mainly by women.

• (1305)

Community help such as child care is a very influential factor and explains why a much greater number of single parents living in co–operatives are in the workforce. If we do not respond—

The Deputy Speaker: Unfortunately, the member's time is up. If there is unanimous consent, the member may continue. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Leroux (Shefford): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will be careful in my closing remarks.

Access to affordable, quality housing is recognized as a pre–requisite to the fulfilment of other needs, such as education, health, labour force productivity and social security.

In this period of budgetary restraint, Quebec and Canadian society are giving priority to the housing needs of less fortunate Quebecers and Canadians. These are the people who interest us, the less fortunate. Social housing has a particular role to play in meeting these needs. The federal government must continue to give top priority to funding social housing. By maintaining this program as a priority today, we will avoid higher costs in other areas down the road.

The government has no right to sacrifice so many families, so many women and so many years of hard work in an attempt to maintain harmony in a society that prides itself on being just and fair.

Mr. Mac Harb (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of International Trade, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, how can we ever please our Bloc Quebecois colleagues? One day, they want certain federal responsibilities to be delegated to the provinces and, the next thing you know, they say these responsibilities should remain with the federal government.

Housing is obviously an area of provincial responsibility. But if my hon. colleague is suggesting that the federal government should assume more responsibilities than the provinces, I am prepared to join him in making representations because I agree with him that the federal government often does a better job than the provinces in certain areas.

The hon. member mentioned day care. I want to point out to him that, last spring, the federal government announced the establishment of a task force on the tax treatment of child support. As my hon. colleague knows, this task force was presided by the secretary of State responsible for women's issues. The task force held public hearings and travelled across the country to seek the opinion of the provincial and territorial governments.

I am sure that, if my hon. colleague gives this government just a little more time, he will see that we can put in place legislation that will meet this need. Just bear with us.

Mr. Leroux (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I will say to my colleague that our top priority in coming to Ottawa was to defend Quebecers' interests. That is what we are doing. Second, we hope to set up our own country. Unfortunately, the hon. member did not understand this.

In response to his question, I remember last year's debate on child poverty. However, it must be understood that if there are poor children, it is because there are also poor parents. Children are not living in poverty by themselves. The poorest members of our society are women, and that is what I am saying today.

They are often single parents with sole responsibility for raising their children. As you know, poor children cannot do well in school. If they do not have what they need at home, they cannot succeed and hope to find a way out. It is important to keep this in mind.

• (1310)

As you know, Mr. Speaker, when the Liberals were on this side of the House, they delivered some great speeches. Now that they have crossed the floor—normally, a party, once elected to govern, has a tendency to sit pat—they have not been sitting pat, they have been lying down on the job. What they should do first is look at their social policy. As we remember, under Trudeau, they spoke of a just society, an extraordinary society. I think that today's Liberals put all that aside and are now worse than the Tories.

Mrs. Monique Guay (Laurentides, BQ): Mr. Speaker, once again, it is with great pride that I rise during an opposition day totally dedicated to the situation of women, and more specifically their economic equality.

For the second consecutive year, the Bloc Quebecois, through the hon. member for Québec, tables a motion dealing exclusively with the situation of women. Special days like this one are essential, since they provide us with an opportunity to take a look at our place in society and, hopefully, further our cause.

Today's motion reads:

> That this House denounce the government for its insensitivity and its inaction regarding the adoption of concrete measures to promote the economic equality of women in federal areas of jurisdiction.

First, I want to denounce a recent decision made by the Liberals which clearly shows the relevancy of our motion. I am referring to the merging, as of April 1st, of three women organizations. Indeed, the Secretary of State for the Status of Women announced that she will lump together the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women, the womens' programs of the Department of Human Resources Development, as well as Status of Women Canada.

That announcement made by a woman is very disappointing. It clearly shows a lack of seriousness and respect for women. The secretary of state should be ashamed and go into hiding for making that decision.

By grouping these services under Status of Women Canada, the Liberal government abolishes the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women. This is yet another centralizing measure of the Liberals, who do not know any better.

By merging the CACSW, the government is depriving women of an independent organization which conducted research and promoted education for women, not for the government. The independence of the council was essential to allow it to fulfill its mandate. The council could exert pressure on the government. It could point a finger and denounce the government's inaction regarding the situation of women.

As of April 1st, this so–called Liberal government will have total control over that organization. Women will be gagged.

April 1 will be a sad day for women. I trust that Liberal women will stand up in turn to denounce this decision. Solidarity among women is much more crucial than solidarity at a political party level.

I will not say more about this anti–women decision.

As for unemployment, according to the February 1995 statistics, 642,000 women were unemployed in Canada, or 9.5 per cent. In Quebec, the rate was up to 11.6 per cent, or 187,000 women. There were also 280,082 women on welfare in Quebec.

What is the federal government doing to lower the unemployment rate among women? Nothing. It sits tight and puts its trust in the economic recovery. It has adopted a laissez faire strategy.

Where are the jobs that Liberals kept promising? Where are all the training and upgrading programs for women? Where are the services promoting women's presence in the labour market? None of these promises have been kept. The only measure touted by Liberals as contributing significantly to job creation is the infrastructure program which was to create 45,000 temporary jobs over a three year period.

• (1315)

The Liberals bragged about this so–called beneficial program. They said it would help men and women get back to work.

The results have been rather disappointing. Seasonal temporary jobs. This program only provided short–term jobs to people already in the labour force and did nothing to create new jobs for the unemployed.

This program completely ignored women on unemployment. Indeed, women's groups had asked the minister concerned to establish certain rules that would allow women to have access to some of these mostly non–traditional jobs.

To my knowledge, the minister did not grant what seemed to be a legitimate request.

Despite all the promises made by the Liberals, we still have women on unemployment, women who work for a while on some project or program, then go back on unemployment and end up on welfare. These women are caught in this vicious circle and will never be able to get out of this difficult situation for good.

The federal government is not helping women, worse, I really think it is harming them. The federal employment, training, upgrading and unemployment programs are not up–to–date, they are not flexible nor creative. The programs, services and conditions have been the same for years now, even though the labour market is constantly changing.

The results of this rigid system are terribly disappointing. Women cannot meet the needs of the labour market rapidly and effectively.

I would like to give you a very concrete example which demonstrates how inefficient the federal system is. A few months ago, I met in my riding office a woman who is a single parent living on a meagre $170 a week unemployment insurance benefit.

To get out of this difficult situation, she wanted to attend classes in bureautics offered by her regional school board. This much vaunted program, which offered interesting work prospects, lasted 18 months. The federal government does not pay for 18–month courses. In fact, it only recognizes programs where students graduate after 12 months.

As a result, this woman continued to receive her meagre benefits till the end.

Once her benefits had expired, she enroled in a program entitled "Introduction to non–traditional trades". Thirteen women registered for this 14–week training course leading to a job. According to the information I have gathered so far—since this program is on now—this program clearly does not work.

Non–traditional trades are not that common and job opportunities in these areas are practically non–existent in a tourist area like mine.

Then, why is the federal government offering this program? Why does it spend money in vain? Could it not carry out some studies to see if the labour market in my region is accessible to these women and if job opportunities are really there? If not, what good does it do to direct these women towards this training program?

Unfortunately, it seems this program is simply offered for the fun of it.

And these women can see after a few weeks that they are involved in something that leads nowhere. And yet, they were ready to invest their efforts and energies in this program to see the light at the end of the tunnel, that is, to find a job.

Instead, they are offered a strangely structured program where they are told about self–esteem and about the need to take their future in their own hands, to go for it. They are almost handed a mirror and told: "Look, you are the only one to blame if you do not work. So, do something about it!"

These women do not want that kind of therapy. They want something concrete, something real. They want to learn something that will help them find a job.

As I see there is only one minute left, I will conclude rather quickly.

Women are worth as much as men. Our society, our lifestyles and our values were such that women were not appreciated for their true worth. It is now time to correct this, and fast.

In light of some of its actions, it is clear that the Liberal government is not ready to take big steps in that direction. In spite of all the promises that were made to women in several areas, the federal government is very hard on women. The announced reform in the unemployment insurance program and old age pension does not augur well.

Thus, I encourage all the women in Quebec to say no to an increasingly threatening federal system.

• (1320)

Mrs. Eleni Bakopanos (Saint–Denis, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member opposite has made some remarks that I find very curious coming from her.

Firstly, she talks about solidarity and she belongs to a party that does not promote solidarity among all Canadians, including women. Secondly, with regard to solidarity, we have, on this side of the House, all the women who represent the government who have proven that they are in favour of solidarity. For example, on March 8 of last year, we opened a debate to all women on both sides of the House.

Now, I would like to ask a question of the hon. member. She gave the example of a woman who had come to her office complaining that she did not have access to government programs. Does the member not know that our budget provides for transfers to the provinces so that they can assume responsibility for these programs? They will be the ones who will be delivering these programs. That is what the member's party asked for and that is what we are doing. We both know that when women achieve economic equality, they will have equality in all areas. My question to the hon. member is this: Does she agree with me with regard to transfers?

Mrs. Guay: Mr. Speaker, the government says that it will transfer more powers to the provinces so that we can have our own programs tailored to our particular needs, but it should also consider giving us the money that we need to deliver these programs.

The federal government is getting ready to transfer to the provinces powers or, rather, responsibilities that we cannot afford to exercise. I think it is a very serious problem that we will have to face in the coming years. Imagine! At least Quebec has a good structure, but in some other provinces, particularly the smaller ones, it will be a big problem.

Secondly, when the hon. member talks about solidarity and says that the government cannot count on the Bloc Quebecois, I will remind her that, last year, we introduced a bill on unemployment insurance for women. I do not know if the member remembers that, but we asked women in this House to show some solidarity with regard to this bill so that women who work with their husbands would not be penalized under the unemployment insurance program. The member's party voted against our bill that would have been beneficial to women. We called for solidarity among women. I will tell you one thing: as long as this solidarity among women does not exist, regardless of their political affiliation—and it certainly does not exist in this House at this moment—women will never get anywhere. Yet, we account for 52 per cent of the population. The hon. member has nothing to teach me and I think it is time she got her act together. When she sees a bill like the one we have introduced in this House, she should think twice before voting against it.

Mrs. Bakopanos: Mr. Speaker, I am working for solidarity among all Canadians and, on this side of the House, we have shown that we encourage women to run for elections and get elected. Look at the number of women in the two opposition parties.

But I have a question to ask. We talk about solidarity with regard to legislation. The government recently introduced Bill C–64, an Act respecting employment equity. We asked for the support of the members opposite. I believe that this bill will give women new opportunities to achieve economic equality. Why did the other parties refuse us their support?

Mrs. Guay: Mr. Speaker, I think that the hon. member is wrong. I could show her a bill that was exclusively for women. The bill she referred to is not legislation for women, it is very wide in scope. We will not support a bill just because the hon. member says to.

The bill we talked about dealt exclusively with protecting and helping women. So, when she talks about solidarity, I am sorry, but I beg to differ. She also mentioned her political party, where there is a fair number of women, a party that encouraged women. I can say that in the Bloc Québécois, we as women had to fight on the same terms as men and I am very proud of having been elected here, not because I was chosen by my leader, but because I fought and won in a nomination convention, like everybody else.

• (1325)

Hon. Roger Simmons (Burin—St. George's, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to thank my friend the hon. member for Québec for raising an issue that is both important and relevant. Her motion reads as follows:

> That this House denounce the government for its insensitivity and its inaction regarding the adoption of concrete measures to promote the economic equality in federal areas of jurisdiction.

That assessment does not seem accurate to me.

[English]

The motion gives us an opportunity, I say to my friend from Frontenac, to discuss an important issue but the wording of the motion is a bit dishonest. To put it more bluntly, it is just not true. During the next few minutes let us examine the record, because it is not true. I am very proud to be here because I take real pride in the government's record in promoting social justice and economic parity for the women of this country.

I am encouraged that the member would put forward the motion on the issue of women's economic equality because what could be more important to Canada than the well–being of more than half its population? It is only when women and our families thrive that our country will be truly renewed.

The motion before us raises an important question. What has been the track record of this government on issues that affect the economic status of women? The short answer is that this government has done a great deal in a relatively short time. The government made commitments in the election campaign and the government is living up to those commitments. Before we get on to specific ways in which the government has honoured its commitment, let us look at the context for all of this.

It has become a truism that the best social program is a job. That point has been made by people from both the right and the left of the political spectrum. Well over 400,000 people can say they have taken part in the greatest social program of all since this government took office in October 1993. There is evidence that record will continue strongly. These are predominantly good, full time jobs. Women are claiming their full share of this growth. At the same time, the government is aware that economic growth by itself is not enough.

Women still remain clustered in traditionally female occupations such as teaching and nursing, clerical, sales and service work. If all the government did was to rely on the market as some in this House would prefer to do, we would see only a glacial, painfully slow change in the labour situation as it relates to women.

This government can do better. We must do better to recognize as the government does the continuing need to help women move into new growth areas. It recognizes that its own programs and services can help bring us closer to that goal.

The federal side has a number of innovative projects aimed specifically at addressing the needs of women. Since it is the hon. member for the riding of Quebec whose motion we are discussing, let me talk briefly about a couple of projects for women that are under way in her own province of Quebec.

Since last October, Rimouski has been home to an entrepreneurial training project. Women of all ages with business creation projects have been receiving the skills they need to create successful small businesses. The project has focused on the needs of women without sources of income.

• (1330)

What is equally important is the team that has pulled this project together. The local Canada employment centre, the CEGEP de Rimouski and the group Ficelles, whose purpose is to ensure women's access to work, have all co–operated to make this dream a reality. It is consistent with our interest in encouraging self–employment as the way toward economic self–sufficiency.

In Montreal there have been a couple of projects. In one, women who are on unemployment have been receiving modern technological training and support to help them move back into the workforce and into more highly skilled jobs. In the other, recent female immigrants have been trained as fibreglass mill operators.

These are examples in one province. There are many more in that province and there are many more all across the country. Our new programs for youth share this commitment to the needs of women. Youth Service Canada has been a real success story. In the lead site projects, the ones that tested the concepts beyond Youth Service Canada, 54 per cent of the participants are female.

Some projects were focused on issues of particular interest to women. For example, the Regina family service bureau ran a project that helped 10 young single mothers.

Employment programs and services are only one element of our work for women. Unemployment insurance is a program that continues to play an important role as we move toward a more active labour market policy. There are some elements of UI such as maternity and parental benefits that respond to the labour market reality faced by female workers.

To my friend from Yorkton—Melville and my friend from Edmonton Southwest, despite their professed beliefs it is important we have programs that help women respond to the labour market reality, programs such as maternity and parental benefits.

We do not have to go far back in time to find how this program has been adapted to the needs of women. We need only go back one year to 1994. The government decided to scale back UI benefits. However, in doing so it took into account the situation of people on low incomes. Almost 60 per cent of single parent families with children under 18 live on low incomes. Far too many are single mothers struggling to make ends meet.

It is that situation that caused the government to create the special 60 per cent dependency benefit rate for people who are supporting dependents on the basis of low income. This year people who earn an average $408 a week or less and who's spouses get the child tax benefit or who support a dependent are eligible for this additional UI support. That provision makes a real difference for a single mother. Since the implementation of the dependency benefit rate over 192,000 claimants have qualified. The great majority, 148,000, were women.

The government recognizes the labour market needs of women extend well beyond the traditional programs and services, no matter how sensitive these services and programs. The National Association of Women and the Law stated in its appearance before the Standing Committee on Human resources Development a year ago: "We recognize the growing importance of women in the labour force, but fail to recognize that women have children and women are primarily responsible for their care".

Child care is important. It was a concern of ours during the 1993 campaign. It is a need that we are addressing on three separate fronts.

• (1335)

The government is moving ahead on its First Nations and Inuit child care initiative. The goal is to increase the level of services in those communities. There is so much more. A second front is a research and development component to give us more information in this critical area of child care.

I have pages of programs the government is working on. We are not there yet. We are working at it and I believe when we get there the women of this country and therefore this country as a whole will be the better and the richer for it.

Mr. Jean-Guy Chrétien (Frontenac, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my distinguished colleague from Burin—St. George's is an outstanding parliamentarian, and he regularly demonstrates his skills when he takes the floor.

The thing I disapprove of is that his party and, to a certain extent, the hon. member for Burin—St. George's himself, talk out of both sides of their mouth. I would like to give an example, that of the Canada Labour Code reform and precautionary withdrawal from work.

I do not need to remind you, Mr. Speaker, that the family unit is the most valuable asset of any country. In May 1994, the Bloc Quebecois tabled a motion supported by the governing party, the Liberal Party of Canada, in order to raise the compensation for pregnant women to the 95 per cent level provided by the Quebec CSST. Right now, it stands at 60 per cent.

A discussion paper on the Canada Labour Code reform is being circulated at this time, and the Liberal Party of Canada did not include that motion, which it supported in May 1994, to give substantial assistance to pregnant women who must ask for precautionary withdrawal from work in order to carry their pregnancy to term and protect their unborn baby.

Like the rest of us, the hon. member for Burin—St. George's is certainly aware of the importance of the family unit, that is a wife, husband and children—the complet unit. The children will be the work force of tomorrow and will pay for our pensions. That natural asset of our country is now declining.

We moved a motion that the hon. member's party supported, but what we see and hear in the House today is just a lack of courage, and double talk, Mr. Speaker. Unfortunately, the hon. member for Burin—St. George's is the one who will have to clarify his party's position. I hope he will set the record straight, because this is an important motion on the equality of women.

[English]

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, my French is so rusty these days that I will do the wise thing and talk to him in a language that I know a bit about. I will make a promise to him that I will get back to my long neglected French.

I thank him for his kind comments about my speech. I share very much his views on the importance of the family unit. I thought he articulated it very eloquently a moment ago and I salute him for that.

As to the motion he was talking about, I plead ignorance. I do not remember the details of it and I will not pretend that I do. He put his finger, and rightly so, on one of the many areas in which this government needs to move.

• (1340)

I have always been appalled that remuneration has been on the basis of sex; that females have been getting lower wages for performing the same services. There are thousands of examples of that. I have been appalled that people are paid differently because they live in one region versus another. Two wrongs do not make a right. These disparities have to be corrected.

We are on the matter of women's issues today. I do not like the term. They are all our issues, but I know what is meant by the term.

The member flagged an issue that I pursue and will continue to pursue. The matter of the disparity of wages is untenable and we have to move to correct it as soon as possible.

Mrs. Jane Stewart (Brant, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, while I do not appreciate or accept the tenor of the motion presented for debate by the hon. member for Quebec, I recognize and thank her for giving us the opportunity to talk about such an important aspect as the quality of the connection that Canadian women have to the social and economic infrastructure of Canadian society.

It is a critical topic. As one of the 50 some women elected to the House it is incumbent on me to do whatever I can to encourage our governments and our legislature to understand where that connection is and make it better.

In her motion the hon. member focuses specifically on the economic connection, the economic side of the connection that we as women have to Canadian society. We have to speak about both the economic and social support that we as women need if we are to participate fully and completely in Canadian society and offer a bettering of the society through skills, abilities and qualities we bring as women.

In understanding the connection between social and economic development I turn to September of last year when I had the opportunity as a member of the parliamentary delegation to the United Nations conference on population and development to understand quite fully the impact development has on population.

We did a lot of very good work at the conferences that were the preliminary to those debates in Cairo to encourage an understanding of the impact development has on population management, more specifically to understand that when we talk about development we do and must talk about both social and economic development.

We played a very significant role in helping the world understand that it is the strong connections that women must have to both the social and economic supports that exist in a society that will in turn improve the development and the productivity of a nation and then in turn enhance and help manage population control.

We were essentially talking about development in developing nations. As I worked with and talked to colleagues from around the world I realized this debate is still going on in all developed nations. Canada is at a different level because of the hard and dedicated work of many Canadian women. When we think of the women who work so hard to get us recognized as persons not so very long ago, they helped move us to the position we are in now.

• (1345)

I think of some of my friends. Doris Anderson worked outside the government sector with non–governmental organizations and as a publisher of a well–known women's magazine. I think of the work she has done. I think of Lucie Pépin, a friend and colleague, a former member of Parliament who has worked so hard on behalf of women's issues. All these women have brought us, as a developed nation, to a point that is different from those of the developing nations.

The conversations we had in Cairo focused on the need for women to commit, with development on the social side, to very basic things when it comes to health: access to tetanus, polio and tuberculosis cures and shots, access to clean water. Basic health measures are what they need.

When we were talking about education we were talking about access to primary school education. When we were talking about access to economic support we were talking about the basic notion that it was okay for women to work outside the confines of the defined home as we know it.

For us in the developed nation of Canada, we are talking about things of a different sort at a different level. It is not so much basic health issues but issues of research for women and the impact of breast cancer and the impact of heart disease.

When we are talking about education we are encouraging our young women to complete high school and post–secondary education. When we are thinking about other social aspects such as safety and comfort, not only in our streets but in our own homes, we are having to understand family violence and to accept that it is not in any way, shape or form something that we want to be part of our society.

When we think specifically about our connections with the economic levers we are talking about women having access to financial supports. The government is looking at these things and working on them all. For the Bloc Quebecois to say that we are not is really a falsehood.

When we go back and think about safety and the need for women to have confidence they are supported in our society, we look at the measures the Minister of Justice has undertaken. Just recently he tabled a bill that will no longer allow drunkenness to be a defence, particularly in cases of rape. We will see tabled soon I am sure, considering the importance of support payments to single parents, most often women, some changes in that regard and those will be tabled in the near future.

Today, as we debate Bill C–41 in committee, I will be tabling an amendment to the bill that will ask, under the section where we are discussing restitution, that the courts turn their head to the loss of income and support that can occur in cases of family violence. It should recognize that restitution should be paid to women who have to leave their homes as a result of family violence and perhaps incur costs related to transportation, alternate forms of housing and day care, drug and dental requirements. I hope that members of the Bloc on the committee will support me on that amendment.

These are things the government is doing to make sure that Canadian women are connected and supported on the social side.

I know the Minister of Health is working very hard and diligently and has implemented a fresh start program for aboriginal communities which is very important.

When we think about education, by and large a provincial jurisdiction, as individual members of Parliament, women in particular, we have a strong role to play in making sure that our young women do and are encouraged to carry on to high school, college and university and to set their sights as far ahead of themselves as they possibly can so they do not get stuck in female ghettos, in typically female occupations.

One of the most important parts of my job is to meet with young people in my community, in the public schools and high schools, and talk to them about what a woman can be in our country.

• (1350)

Very recently I attended the Daughters of Invention, where grade seven girls came together and spent a couple of days talking about science and research. As we were discussing role models and women, I asked them: "Back in 1867 when Confederation was discussed, do you think your grandmothers would have voted for Canada or against Confederation?" They put their hands up, some yes and some no. I said: "Do you know what girls? Your grandmothers could not vote back then. They were not even considered persons". There was an embarrassing ah–ha. They did not realize that.

It was at that point I realized that my job as a member of Parliament is to make sure that optimism, I suppose to a certain extent that naivete, cannot continue, that they know that as females there are restrictions on them but that they can participate fully and equitably in our society.

When it comes to the economic side, there are many things we have to do. I can only say how strongly I support the employment equity legislation that encourages Canadian businesses to recognize the importance of having a broad mix of people in their organizations. We are not talking about quotas. We are talking about recognizing people for the skills and abilities they have and that they bring to an environment. It is legislation we are improving and that I strongly support.

With that, I see that my time has gone. There are so many things we can talk about. Again I thank the hon. member for giving us the opportunity to debate and share our ideas in this regard.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte–Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask my hon. colleague, who probably knows, whether there is a different treatment for pregnant women in a situation of precautionary withdrawal of work.

The Bloc Quebecois had proposed an amendment at the time of the last Labour Code revision in 1992 to authorize the federal government to make administrative agreements with any province that had a system providing better conditions than those provided for for women in the Canada Labour Code, in cases of precautionary withdrawal of work.

The Liberal Party, then in the opposition, had supported the amendment put forward by the Bloc. Now, we are about to revise the Labour Code. There is a paper from the Department of Labour circulating, but there is no provision in that paper for administrative agreements between the federal government and any province. That is what the amendment was all about; we were not referring to Quebec but to any province whatsoever, and those administrative agreements were along the lines of flexible federalism, I would imagine.

I would like to know if the hon. member will undertake to ask her government to include in the legislation provisions dealing with precautionary withdrawal of pregnant women in order to enable the federal government to make administrative agreements with any province that has better conditions than those provided for in the Canada Labour Code, since at least in the case of Quebec they are not as good as those provided for in the Quebec Labour Code. Is she agreeable to such a request and will she approach her government's labour minister about that?

[English]

Mrs. Stewart (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I am not completely familiar with the amendment to which the hon. member is referring. I will apprise myself of it.

I would agree and say that we have not come to the point where the salaries paid to women in the workplace are equal to those to men. That is something we are always conscious of, working toward and committed to.

[Translation]

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Québec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for my colleague. I saw her applaud the announcement made yesterday by the Secretary of State for the Status of Women regarding the elimination of the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women.

I would like to ask the member how civil servants can ensure the transparency which, I think, the Council now provides. How can she guarantee that civil servants will implement without any bias the different policies which will be put forward? How, in fact, can the department act as both judge and jury? I would like her to explain this because it seemed to delight her yesterday.

• (1355)

[English]

Mrs. Stewart (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I know a number of the women who for many years have participated on the Advisory Council for the Status of Women and say that we have appreciated the work they have done over the last number of years.

I believe that the announcement made by the minister was a good one. It essentially brings together disparate sectors that have been focusing on improving the status of women in the country in a consolidated effort. In a consolidated way we will be able to make significant progress in effort and on behalf of women with her announcement.

Mrs. Diane Ablonczy (Calgary North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to speak today to the motion introduced by my hon. colleague from Quebec. I commend her for introducing into the House a good discussion on the whole issue of equality. It is an issue that has a lot of interest in the country, one that a lot of people are concerned about.

One of the lessons of history is that personal struggle and achievement go hand in hand. In fact, I know that is true for many of us here. Sometimes the Canadian public feels that members of the House do not know what personal struggle is about. I know from speaking to many of my colleagues, and from personal experience, that we do have personal histories of struggle and achievement.

It is important for many of us to realize that these issues are not just something to be debated in the House, but they are issues which all of humankind have struggled with for many years.

I would like to outline to my colleagues some of my personal background in this area. I am the oldest of seven children. My parents were not well off, I think poor would probably be an accurate word. If I wanted money I always had to earn it. I have worked since I was very young in the summers and weekends to have the money I wanted.

The day I left home when I was 18, my mother came home with my youngest brother and so the family kind of went on even though I was going on with my life. My parents were not able to help me with my education. I put myself through two university degrees. I was also widowed in my thirties. My husband died very suddenly, leaving me a single parent and sole support of the family.

I became a professional person, a lawyer, before there was any affirmative action and before there were any nice government programs to help women achieve equality. Many people who I know are very proud and very happy to have been able to make the achievements in their life on their own merit.

The subject of this debate today is how we can best achieve the kind of results we want from our life—

The Speaker: The hon. member, of course, will know that immediately following question period, we will return to debate and she will be given the floor.

It being 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(5), the House will now proceed to Statements by Members, pursuant to Standing Order 31.

THE BUDGET

Mrs. Carolyn Parrish (Mississauga West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today with pride and some dismay.

I am proud of the Minister of Finance who has proposed in this year's budget the most dramatic comprehensive changes in government since World War II.

I am proud to be part of a government that has met, and will continue to meet, the objectives necessary to wrestle the deficit and debt that are damaging the country to the ground.

My dismay has mounted over the past several weeks while I listen to the members of the third party refuse to join us on this side of the House, however grudgingly, and working for the future prosperity of this beautiful country.

They ran on the concept of a new type of politics that does not follow the old partisan ritual and dogma. Why then are they voting no to the challenge we now face?

Why is their leader currently communing with the spiritual leader of the new right wing of the United States, being tutored in barbaric doctrines which slash seniors pensions and allow orphans to be institutionalized? Why is the leader of the third party not participating in this country's rebirth instead of observing the machinations of an evil, bitter monster to the south?

TAXATION

Mr. Gilbert Fillion (Chicoutimi, BQ): Mr. Speaker, taxpayers in Quebec and Canada have lost confidence in the Canadian tax system. The underground economy is spreading. Tax accounts outstanding exceed $6 billion, and in the case of the GST, $1.3 billion.

Furthermore, the tax system is full of holes. Wealthy taxpayers and large corporations can afford to pay tax experts for advice on how to take advantage of tax loopholes. For instance, they can take advantage of the fact that Canada has signed at least 16 tax treaties with countries considered to be tax havens. Every year, ten of thousands of profitable businesses pay no taxes at all. Meanwhile, the Minister of Finance is letting individuals pay 65 per cent of the tax increases in his last budget, while family trusts will have to wait until 1999.

In spite of all this, the Minister of Finance still refuses to proceed with a complete overhaul of the tax system that would eliminate fiscal inequities.

MOUNT ALLISON UNIVERSITY

Mr. Paul E. Forseth (New Westminster—Burnaby, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in 1991 Mount Allison University in Sackville, New Brunswick was in a financial mess. It had a deficit of $2.5 million and a debt of $10 million. Like the federal government it desperately needed to get its financial house in order. The current president of the university, Ian Newbould, was recently quoted in Maclean's magazine as saying: "If we were a corporation we would have been in receivership".

In over three years that university has eliminated its debt and created a surplus of $13 million. Clearly the goal of the university president was not to achieve a smaller deficit. Instead, satisfaction would only come with no deficit and zero debt. The goal was achieved through responsible control.

The finance minister stood in this House and expected praise for a deficit prediction of $25 billion. Some provinces, and universities such as Mount Allison, have become the national standard of fiscal responsibility. The minister needs to take a hard look at how the real world manages its finances and reflect on how he failed to measure up to the Canadian standard.

RURAL CHILD CARE

Mrs. Marlene Cowling (Dauphin—Swan River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, farming is not a nine to five business. It involves early mornings, late nights and weekends, which most child care operations do not accommodate. As a result parents are forced to leave their children alone or take them along when they work with heavy machinery or livestock.

For every six deaths resulting from farm accidents, one of those victims is a child. Fifteen per cent of those hospitalized as a result of farm accidents are children under 16 years of age.

Last week was National Farm Safety Week. I would like to recognize the people and organizations who are working to find flexible, accessible and affordable solutions for rural child care, namely: the National Coalition for Rural Child Care; the Women's Institute; the Rural Development Institute of Brandon, Manitoba; and many others. I applaud their commitment and dedication to the safety of farm children.

PUBLIC SERVICE OF CANADA

Mr. Andy Scott (Fredericton—York—Sunbury, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I speak today on behalf of our friends and colleagues of the federal public service. Several members of that employment sector are now entering a period of significant change and transition. As the governing body in this House we must fulfil our commitment to ensuring sensitivity, compassion and caring during this passage.

We have asked so much of our people and they will rise to the challenge. However, we must empower decision makers at the local level so they can do their jobs right to ensure that those affected by this change are treated fairly and with dignity and that the best possible course of action is determined one by one, according to the needs of each individual.

Those at the local level are the ones best able to determine how the changes we have asked for can be brought into effect. We must all do our part. I know this government will honour its commitment to ensuring fairness, compassion and flexibility at the local level for the betterment of our people and our nation.

CUBA

Mr. Andrew Telegdi (Waterloo, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today we celebrate the 50th anniversary of Canada's unbroken diplomatic relationship with Cuba.

Canada and Cuba maintain a friendly and diverse relationship which includes political diplomacy, trade and commerce, scientific and economic co–operation, and tourism. In the area of fisheries, Cuba has supported our view on the need for measures to end high seas overfishing.

Cuba is a nation that is now in transition to a market economy, a nation with which we have significant trade, an area that we can and should expand upon. To enable Canadian businesses to compete for new economic opportunities in Cuba, I urge the Minister for International Trade to reinstate the $30 million line of credit to Cuba so that Canadian companies can take advantage of it to increase Canada–Cuban trade.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Mr. Jean–Marc Jacob (Charlesbourg, BQ): Mr. Speaker, three years after the auditor general drew the attention of the government to what it costs taxpayers in Canada and Quebec to train a member of the armed forces reserve—90 per cent of what it costs to train a regular soldier—no steps have been taken to stop this wasteful spending.

In fact, the Canadian Reserve whose training is ineffective and inadequate, is the most expensive in the world after the one in Switzerland, which has no army. It will cost us a billion dollars again this year.

Ironically, the government decided to quietly get rid of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women and save a paltry one million dollars, while the National Defence budget, which totals more than $11 billion, was cut by less than 5 per cent this year.

JUSTICE

Mr. Philip Mayfield (Cariboo—Chilcotin, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the people of Quesnel, British Columbia are outraged by our so–called justice system.

Last Sunday, Quesnel RCMP arrested a 19–year old man who, according to witnesses, dragged an elderly woman into his hotel room, held a knife to her throat and brutally raped her. When the woman's husband entered the scene, the rapist chased him down the hall and threatened him at knifepoint. The community hoped that justice would be served.

The elderly woman who is in what are supposed to be her golden years is in trauma therapy. The loving couple has been scarred forever. Imagine the shock Quesnel residents felt when this rapist was allowed back into the community on a petty $1,000 bond.

Canadians deserve better. While our criminals are given free college tuition or are let go on token bonds to roam the streets, shattered lives are left to heal on their own. Meanwhile, the public continues to ask who the justice system works for, the victim or the criminal?

Will the justice minister please stop wasting time on pet projects and start working to put justice back into the justice system?

FISHERIES

Mrs. Bonnie Hickey (St. John's East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there are 50,000 people out of work in Atlantic Canada because of the collapse of our fishery. These 50,000 people were forced to turn to government assistance to help put food on the table.

During the election campaign, Liberals pledged that our government would support its fishermen, deal with foreign overfishing and help preserve the remaining fish stock. Over the past week, our government has come through on this commitment 100 per cent.

On behalf of my constituents, I commend our minister of fisheries for taking a strong stand against foreign overfishing, ensuring that the turbot does not go the way of the cod. Over the past week I have received faxes, phone calls, petitions and letters of support for the minister of fisheries. That support has been well founded.

Today foreign ships are no longer fishing on the nose and tail of the Grand Banks. We are on the verge of negotiating stricter international rules.

Today I challenge all MPs to stand behind the minister as he continues to fight to protect and preserve the Canadian fishery.

FRANCOPHONES OUTSIDE QUEBEC

Mrs. Pierrette Ringuette–Maltais (Madawaska—Victoria, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Bloc member for Rimouski—Témiscouata and critic for the Department of Canadian Heritage toured the country to tell francophone communities that the Bloc was with them all the way.

But Tuesday, the honeymoon was over when she accused the francophones of this country of being sell–outs.

How embarrassing for the Bloc to have one of its members make such accusations. Talk about double talk. At last the Bloc is showing its true colours to francophone communities.

But when Paul Piché and Laurence Jalbert made it clear they were separatists, after receiving financial assistance from Canadian Heritage for the production of records and videos, did you hear any federalists insulting them?

• (1410)

Not at all, and it goes to show how open-minded federalists are, and we expected Bloc members would show the same respect for the opinions of others.

On behalf of the francophones of this country, I ask that the member of the Bloc withdraw, in this House, the slanderous term she used.

FORUM FOR YOUNG CANADIANS

Ms. Jean Augustine (Etobicoke—Lakeshore, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, last evening I had the pleasure of meeting many participants of the Forum for Young Canadians. This yearly forum has once again brought together high school students from all across the country to learn firsthand the workings of our federal Parliament.

This year Etobicoke—Lakeshore is well represented by Melissa Jenkins of Bishop Allen Academy and Raphael Pacquing of Father John Redmond High School. These two students travelled to Ottawa to exchange ideas and explore their interests in the process of government, the media and the role of members of Parliament.

I commend the efforts of all who have contributed to the success of this year's forum. May these youths return to their communities across Canada with the knowledge this government is working hard to ensure a strong and prosperous country for future generations.

QUEBEC SOVEREIGNTY

Mr. Roger Pomerleau (Anjou—Rivière-des-Prairies, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the English speaking Canadian intelligentsia met yesterday in Toronto, at the invitation of the C.D. Howe Institute, and indulged in a fit of Quebec-bashing the likes of which have seldom been seen.

These great democrats, full of Canadian patriotism, suggested that Quebecers be made to suffer in order to prevent a vote in favour of sovereignty. This idea was not only sanctioned but added to by political science expert Stéphane Dion, who suggested that "the more it will hurt, the more support for sovereignty will weaken".

Since Stéphane Dion is now a freelancer working as an advisor to the Prime Minister of Canada, Quebecers gather that his statement reflects the position of the federal government.

I trust that Quebecers will, as they have done throughout their history, stand tall and defend their right to exist to the face of the world.

LIBERAL RED BOOK

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod, Ref.): Mr. Speaker:

The red book full of promises
That we could count upon
If Liberals were elected
All our problems would be gone.
There'd be a kinder Parliament
With Liberals at the helm
And social programs all survive
We'd have no fears from them.

The budget's now behind us
And plain for all to see
That promises don't mean a lot
Without integrity.
Integrity you cannot buy
There is not much that's dearer
For each and every Liberal
Must look into the mirror.

But one lonely Liberal
Could not have said it better
Liberals have taken the famous red book
And stuffed it in the shredder!

The Speaker: I would appeal to all hon. members not to use props or to rip up props during the statements.

RETIREMENT ALLOWANCES

Mr. John Solomon (Regina—Lumsden, NDP): Mr. Speaker, information acquired through access to information reveals that federal deputy ministers are receiving special retirement allowances of up to $30,000 per year on top of their regular pensions.

The Treasury Board document points out this additional benefit to federal deputy ministers is equal to 2 per cent of the retiree's average salary during their six best years. This bonus is multiplied by the number of years a deputy minister works to a maximum of 10 years. The document states: "There is no minimum vesting period and no contributions are required from the deputy ministers".

The government has just cut 45,000 public servants from the payroll. There are also substantial cuts to agriculture and social programs. In view of these facts, will the finance minister and his Liberal government immediately rescind this abominable perk, this golden parachute enjoyed by richly paid deputy ministers? Or, will the highest paid civil servants continue to be protected and insulated by the Liberals from the harsh realities others in Canada with lesser incomes are now facing?

LEADER OF ACTION DÉMOCRATIQUE DU QUÉBEC

Mr. Denis Paradis (Brome—Missisquoi, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the leader of the Parti Action Démocratique in Quebec had announced that his party would participate in the regional commissions by saying, and I quote: "We can only rejoice over the fact that our conditions have been agreed to. We are happy to contribute to an improvement of the process. We are taking a constructive approach. We hope that many people will take part in the consultation".

Three months later, he said and I quote: "I think that it is not necessarily clear in the minds of all the citizens who came to participate, because if they had been told at the beginning of the consultation that they were wasting their time and that everything had been decided in advance, there might not have been 55,000 participants". The leader of the Parti Action Démocratique is experiencing a rude political awakening. He has realized, but too late, that he has been manipulated by the Parti Quebecois and the Bloc Quebecois.

THE CONSERVATIVE PARTY

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I was amazed to read in the Toronto Star that Ontario Tories are turning to the want ads to find candidates to run in this year's provincial election. The add which ran in at least three Ontario newspapers is seeking Conservatives with common sense.

Over the past several months Mike Harris has been touring Ontario, promising to cut personal income tax by 30 per cent, promissing to bring a balanced budget in four years and not to touch policing, education or health care. Everyone knows with any common sense that the numbers do not add up.

Mark Mullins, Harris' chief number cruncher, stated: "I'm not a member of the Conservative Party. The last thing I need is for anyone to say here is the guru behind the package".

Is it possible that Mike Harris' policies are so far out that not even Conservatives with common sense can support them?

QUEBEC SOVEREIGNTY

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, yesterday at a forum in Toronto hosted by the C.D. Howe Institute and attended by the chairman of Quebec's No committee, Michel Bélanger, one of the Prime Minister's constitutional advisors, Stéphane Dion, said that the worse the economic situation gets, the more Quebecers will change their minds and reject sovereignty.

My question is for the Prime Minister. How can the Prime Minister let one of his constitutional advisors, namely Stéphane Dion, say that the more it hurts, the less support there will be for sovereignty?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Dion is not a constitutional advisor. Furthermore, as everyone knows, I do not spend a lot of time discussing the constitution these days. I am trying to address the economic problems in Canada and Quebec.

I got elected by telling people that I did not want to talk about the constitution. I certainly do not have a constitutional advisor; I do not want to talk about it. I read in the newspaper that he wants to give the Privy Council advice on other things. Personally, I hope that the question will be asked clearly and very soon so that we can stop talking about this and deal with the real problems affecting the population.

I read this article that speculates on what I should do if the Yes side wins in Quebec. We do not even know when the referendum will be held or what the question will be. I am confident that they will lose, so I will not waste my time talking about this.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it is surprising, to say the least, that the Prime Minister, who claims not to be interested in constitutional issues, allocated an additional $7 million or so to his own office so it could set up an operational unit to talk about the constitution during the Quebec referendum.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gauthier: As a preamble to my second question, I will simply remind him that Stéphane Dion is still under contract to his office until March 31. I hope that he at least knows what is going on in his own office.

How can the Prime Minister reconcile the comments made by his advisor, Stéphane Dion, with his own statement that he would respect Quebecers' democratic decision on their political future?

• (1420)

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the people in my office do not talk about the constitution but about how to prevent separation. It is not the same thing. And, in order to prevent separation, all we are asking the Bloc Quebecois and the Parti Quebecois is to finally make a decision and ask the population a clear question: Do you want to separate from Canada? And Quebecers will say No.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, since the Prime Minister refuses to dissociate himself from Mr. Dion's comments, I must conclude that he endorses them.

I ask the following: Since he refuses to publicly dissociate himself from Stéphane Dion's comments, are we to understand that the Prime Minister's referendum strategy has gone from scaring Quebecers into saying No in 1980 to hurting them into saying No in 1995?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on the contrary, what we are doing is telling Quebecers that, with a very good federal government, they will stay in Canada. That is why we tabled, for example, a budget that was very well received by Quebecers. We hope that the Quebec government will stop talking about separation and committees, deal with Quebecers' real problems such as economic problems and job creation, and bring down a budget which addresses Quebecers' real problems, as a government must do.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Canadian Heritage.

The official opposition questioned the heritage minister on several occasions to find out how much will actually be cut from the CBC's budget over the next three years. Only two weeks ago, the minister was still denying that any decisions had been made concerning the corporation's financing.

How can the Minister of Canadian Heritage reconcile his statement with what the Vice–President of Radio–Canada television, Michèle Fortin, said yesterday when she announced that 750 positions would have to be slashed in the CBC's French network to accommodate the cuts totalling $350 million over three years, imposed by the heritage minister?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I checked the information the hon. member is referring to. Radio–Canada, my source, confirmed that no cuts were announced. I assume this means no staff cuts or layoffs have been decided. It is only natural for Ms. Fortin to share her concerns with union reps when she meets with them, but no layoffs have been announced by Radio–Canada.

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu, BQ): Mr. Speaker, as my philosophy professor used to say when he got a flimsy answer like this to a sensible and pertinent question: "Swine have no appreciation for pearls".

My second question—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

The Speaker: My hon. colleagues, we have all had good professors in our school days, but I do not think they should be quoted so literally in this place. I would ask the hon. member to please withdraw his last sentence at least.

Mr. Plamondon: Mr. Speaker, I will gladly comply with your request and withdraw my statement.

My second question is for the same minister. How can he explain the scope of the alleged cuts to the CBC's French network, when it is so successful that its viewing shares can be as much as three times larger than those of the English network? Is it the minister's new cultural policy to penalize those who succeed?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I gather that our colleague did not like my answer. I am just stating the facts, as provided and confirmed by Radio–Canada, but he refuses to hear the truth. I too had good masters and good professors. My grandfather, who was born in Sainte–Flore, Quebec, used to say: "When you let the ewe out of the barn, it comes and relieves itself on your doorstep".

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

• (1425)

The Speaker: Now that we have heard quotes from Shakespeare, a professor and a grandfather, I hope we can hear the hon. members speak for themselves.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, last night in Saskatoon the Prime Minister made several inconsistent statements concerning the national health system.

He said the government would maintain current medicare standards and yet federal funding would be tied to economic growth and would drop as a percentage of GDP.

There is no way current standards can be maintained under this plan, especially since the OECD estimates that Canada's health care costs will double over the next 20 years.

How does he explain this inconsistency and how will current standards be maintained given increased demand and reduced federal funding?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member had read the whole speech, I indicated growth in health expenditures has stopped in the last two years and there is already a start in reduction.

The policies we are developing with the provinces at this time are doing exactly what we had hoped, to stop the growth of expenditures. With the growth in the economy of 4.5 per cent last year and about 3 per cent this year, eventually we will reduce it from around 10 per cent to around 9 per cent, where we were before.

That will be very competitive. It is a sign that we can have comprehensive and universal health care, meeting the five conditions of the Canada Health Act in a reasonable fashion. We will achieve our goal. We will keep medicare. We will not scrap medicare like the Reform Party suggests.

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, wherever costs are lower it is because the standards are not being met right now. It is a sign of things to come.

Experts tell us health care costs are rising by about 50 per cent and the economy is only growing by 4 per cent. The federal government is planning to reduce funding from 10 per cent of GDP to 8 per cent. That means less federal money for medicare, no matter how you look at it.

I have seen the confusion created at the provincial level in Saskatchewan when governments said one thing and did another.

Is the government planning to offload medicare funding on to the provinces by putting a cap on Canada social transfers?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we are planning to make sure that in working with the provinces we will control the cost of medicare so that we can keep universal free medicare for all Canadians.

As indicated, the collaboration between the Government of Canada and the provinces has already seen the result that the public side of health care did not increase last year. It has started to decrease. If we all use the discipline needed we will go back to 9 per cent of GDP and we will still have the best medicare.

We will not be trapped in the private sector nets that exist in the United States, where it spends 15 per cent of its GDP. In Canada it is universal, free, costing around 10 per cent now.

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, we should ask a taxpayer whether it is free.

The Prime Minister speaks in glowing terms about preserving our national health care standards. I will tell the Prime Minister what is really happening.

In Manitoba there is a waiting period of 61.7 weeks, way over one year, for hip replacement surgery. The national standard is 11.3 weeks. Where is the performance? How are we meeting our current commitments? What good are national standards if the provinces cannot deliver on them?

Is the government prepared to bring the Canada Health Act in line with the 1990s and give the provinces real control over medicine delivery and health care financing?

• (1430)

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately there are problems in some provinces. The performance is not the same everywhere. In our system medicare—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chrétien (Saint–Maurice): It is administered by the provincial governments. If they had a better government in Manitoba perhaps they could do better on that score.

ADVISORY COUNCIL ON THE STATUS OF WOMEN

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Québec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

The federal government decided on the sly to dissolve the Advisory Council on the Status of Women, an organization that has always been recognized for its independence of the government and its strong stands in advancing the cause of women.

How can the Prime Minister justify the government's decision to abolish the Advisory Council on the Status of Women by handing over its responsibilities to women's organizations that are already in difficulty?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, women's councils across the country were telling us that they were in a better position to do political analyses than people appointed by order in council.

We hear the Parti Quebecois and the Bloc Quebecois say that the Advisory Council on the Status of Women, which was appointed by the government, is less objective than organizations such as FRAPPE or other organizations not working directly under an order in council. This is why we changed the system.

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Québec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, this is not the opinion of women's groups in Quebec. At least not what I heard yesterday.

My supplementary question is again for the Prime Minister. How can the government claim that the Advisory Council on the Status of Women was meeting needs that no longer exist, when women continue to be the heads of the poorest families in Canada, when they earn less than a man for equal work, when they are the primary victims of violence and when they are always in the most vulnerable jobs?

[English]

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, what the government decided to do was to abolish the order in council positions that are traditionally characterized as patronage positions.

As the hon. member will know, the Advisory Council on the Status of Women named people by order in council. There was a question put by women's groups across the country to which we responded. That question was: How can a person on the advisory council be at arm's length from the government when they are in fact appointed by the government?

It is for that reason we have taken the research funds and the funds that were previously paid to finance the order in council appointments and have ploughed that money back into research, which will be made available to women's groups across the country so that they can set their priorities instead of having them set by order in council appointees.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Jeffries report identified critical leadership shortfalls in the Canadian forces. Nowhere is this more obvious than in the report's lament that soldiers are constantly asked to "do more, with less for less".

General Jeffries has been honest and courageous in saying what the minister seems ready to ignore: that he and his officials demand more but give less.

Will the minister acknowledge that it is the responsibility of good leadership, including himself, to allocate priorities and commitments according to resources, and that this responsibility has been neglected?

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, after question period yesterday I received a copy of the memorandum General Jeffries had sent out and I went through it rather meticulously. Most of the contents of that memorandum paralleled the recommendations and the commentary of the special joint committee on defence to which the hon. member was a signatory.

On page 49 of the parliamentary report the committee said that morale was not a problem because of poor leadership. The hon. member now wants us to believe that the opinion he had with all the rest of the members some four months ago has somehow been changed.

The fact of the matter is that the committee of which he was a prominent member made a lot of recommendations. All those recommendations have been accepted and all the questions that General Jeffries raised are being dealt with in a full and consistent manner.

• (1435)

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I beg to differ with the minister that all the recommendations have been accepted. Quite a number have not been accepted or instituted.

General Jeffries noted:

> The difference between what is necessary and what is affordable is made up by people, people who are required to deploy more frequently, perform more taskings, work longer hours, take more risks.

He concluded that operational capability—

The Speaker: Order. I find today that the questions are really a little long and so are the answers. Would the hon. member please put his question directly.

Mr. Frazer: Mr. Speaker, having received this advice, will the minister ignore it, as he did in the case of the airborne regiment, or take action now to avoid what the report referred to as "a hollow army and burnt out soldiers?"

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to impinge on the goodwill of the House by reading yet another section from the same memorandum but I feel compelled to do so.

General Jeffries states in the memorandum that despite some of the formidable list of dissatisfiers, morale remains for the most part high. He goes on to embellish that. I think that is good enough.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. On January 18, the minister, in reply to a request made by his counterpart in Quebec, refused to explicitly prohibit female circumcision and other genital mutilation, under the pretext that the current provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada sufficed.

Why has the Minister of Justice refused to explicitly add female circumcision and other genital mutilation to the Criminal Code of Canada, as requested by Quebec's justice minister, Quebec's human rights commission and all of the experts in the field?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would first like to point out that opinions on this controversial issue are divided. In fact, according to an article in today's Le Devoir, Quebec's council on the status of women does not necessarily agree with the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women on this issue.

The Quebec council believes that amending the Criminal Code could inadvertently drive the practice even further underground and the federal government agrees. We are more in favour of trying to heighten awareness in communities with a tradition of performing female circumcisions and genital mutilation.

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, how can the Minister of Justice continue to delude himself that the Criminal Code, as it stands, suffices when a gynecologist, Claude Fortin, states that he had to perform surgery on nine Canadian women to treat genital mutilations and that no lawsuit was ever filed against those who committed these barbarous acts?

[English]

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, fewer than two weeks ago in Toronto I met with the advisory council created by the Attorney General of Ontario on this subject.

Twenty–five women from the communities most affected by the issue are preparing a report on the question with specific recommendations on the issue of criminalization. Their present view is that an amendment to the Criminal Code is not appropriate because it will drive the practice further underground and make it more difficult for us to punish it when it is found.

I cannot emphasize strongly enough the commitment of the government to prosecute and punish this criminal misconduct when it is uncovered. However, I must say there are people very familiar with the issue who believe very strongly that it is not in the interest of that cause to make amendments to the Criminal Code as suggested.

LABOUR

Mr. Jake E. Hoeppner (Lisgar—Marquette, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, during the election campaign in Manitoba, the Prime Minister said: "The little guy from Shawinigan will look after the interests of the little guy in Canada".

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hoeppner: I have a constituent who has a shipment of over $200,000 worth of sunflower seeds in jeopardy due to the Montreal dock workers strike.

• (1440)

Now that he is the big guy in Ottawa, what immediate action will the Prime Minister take to provide transportation for this product to Halifax so that this little processor will not be forced into bankruptcy?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Parliament acted very rapidly yesterday in the case of the port of Vancouver. The port was completely closed.

The problem in Montreal is of a different nature. It does not call for legislation at this time and the Minister of Labour is looking into the matter.

Mr. Jake E. Hoeppner (Lisgar—Marquette, Ref.): That answer will not put food on the little processor's table, Mr. Speaker.

Negotiations in the railways are a disaster in waiting. Once again farmers may be called upon to—

Mr. Speaker: I ask colleagues on a supplementary question for perhaps a sentence and then to put the question.

Mr. Hoeppner: Will the Prime Minister immediately ask for a mandatory mediation–arbitration process with binding final offer arbitration as a last resort?

[Translation]

Hon. Lucienne Robillard (Minister of Labour, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday we had the opportunity to explain very clearly the difference between these labour disputes. We also took a first step, with the support of the opposition parties, towards the settlement of the conflict affecting west coast ports.

As for railways, negotiations are taking place today with Canadian Pacific. The situation at the Montreal harbour is completely different and I proposed a mediator to the two sides.

As I said yesterday, each situation must be reviewed on its own merits to ensure that an appropriate solution is found. As a government, our goal is to have the two sides agree to negotiate.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte–Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Canadian Heritage just indicated to the House that no cuts had been announced at Radio–Canada.

Will the minister confirm his earlier answer to the effect that no cuts will be made to Radio–Canada next year?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's logic is astounding. To say that I have no confirmation of any cuts is not at all the same as saying that there will be no cuts.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte–Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I have a second very logical question. How does the Minister of Canadian Heritage explain the fact that Radio–Canada announced yesterday that 750 jobs would be eliminated? I suppose that was mere speculation.

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member may be discreet, but he did not listen to my last answer. I already answered that question a few minutes ago. I explained that discussions had taken place at Radio–Canada, but that there was no—

GOVERNMENT OF CANADA

Mr. Peter Adams (Peterborough, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

I see the budget and all the changes that flow from it as a necessary but risky exercise. We inherited a government weakened by debt and we have to further downsize it in order to get rid of that debt.

Could the minister assure us that the downsized government and its programs will contain the seeds, the foundations for strong federal government in the future?

• (1445)

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Absolutely, Mr. Speaker. In fact, I would like to congratulate the member for the way in which he has articulated his question. The budget sought to deal with those weaknesses in what is otherwise a very strong economy.

As a result, we increased substantially the fairness of the tax system. We are restructuring government to make it smaller and smarter. We are putting the deficit on a permanent downward track. We have reaffirmed our inflation targets. We have given the government credibility. For the first time a Canadian government has hit its targets and we have put the debt to GDP ratio on a permanent downward target.

CANADA POST

Mr. Ken Epp (Elk Island, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday my question regarding the Pérez affair was brushed off because it was deemed to be a matter of the previous administration.

We must remember that this involves two individuals who are currently members of the other place as well as the president and chairman of Canada Post so the issue is very current.

The government promised openness and honesty. I cannot for the life of me figure out why the Prime Minister would not ask the ethics commissioner to clear the air. Why will he not?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the problem is that it is not within the jurisdiction of the ethics counsellor. We had asked a committee of the House to look into the question of lobbying and so on. It made its report today with amendments. It will be given to another committee of the House to look at the code of conduct for members of Parliament and senators.

This has to be decided by the members themselves, not by the government, because this affects the conduct of the members of the Senate and the members of the House of Commons. It is not for the government to dictate to members of Parliament what to do. Members of Parliament are mature and competent enough to give themselves guidelines. The member will be invited to participate if he has views to share.

Mr. Ken Epp (Elk Island, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this is now the third time that we have asked for a response or a study or an investigation by the ethics counsellor. The answer we have received each time is: "No, no, no".

If the Prime Minister will only authorize the ethics counsellor to investigate when it is safe, when and who is going to investigate controversial issues like this one for which Canadians demand an answer?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as I said at the beginning, it is in relation to a situation that occurred when we were not in government. I also said that the question of the conduct of members of Parliament is a matter that is vested with the House of Commons. We will be asking a committee of the House to report on that and the hon. member can deal with this problem.

The government of today does not have to respond to what happened in previous administrations.

IRVING WHALE

Mrs. Monique Guay (Laurentides, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. The minister told us yesterday, with regard to the hull of the Irving Whale, and I quote: "—we did have an electronic inspection done last June". Our information, however, is that the inspection was a sonar side scan. This inspection permitted only a partial check of the hull using an inaccurate procedure. A real electronic inspection would have revealed the solidity of the welding and the state of structural cracks in the barge.

Is the minister going to be satisfied with a partial study, which does not permit any conclusions to be drawn on the real solidity of the hull and is she prepared to assume responsibility for any spill that may occur during refloating?

[English]

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, with the agreement of the House, I would like to table the Irving Whale sidescan sonar survey which was conducted between the June 12 and 15, 1994.

Yesterday the member claimed that no survey had been done. In fact, last night at 5.30 we sent a copy of the survey to her office. I would like to read a portion of the survey to her.

> The sidescan sonar portion of the survey was performed by the Environmental Marine Geology Subdivision of the Atlantic Geoscience Centre, Geological Survey of Canada using a Simrad MS992 dual frequency (120 and 330 kHz) sidescan sonar; and a GeoAcoustics SE880—

Mrs. Monique Guay (Laurentides, BQ): Mr. Speaker, once again, we already have this study, this report. The system is not accurate.

Will the minister acknowledge, finally, that there is some controversy surrounding her decision, with, contrary to what she claims, a number of people, including four experts in ship salvage and a scientific expert from her own department expressing serious doubts about her decision?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, following the requests by members who have made a number of unfounded accusations up to now, it was I who provided her yesterday with the results of the three–day study.

I am not a scientist, but I have much greater faith in the Geological Survey of Canada than in the politics of the hon. member across the floor, who, to date, has not read any report or accepted any analysis and has even refused to read the documents I provided the House on this matter last year.

CROW RATE

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, farmers need clarification from the minister of agriculture as to who the Crow phase out payment is intended to benefit. Is it intended to benefit landowners or is it intended to benefit farmers?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the minister of agriculture who is presently out west talking to a wide number of farm organizations, I will take the hon. member's questions as notice.

The package that was announced in the budget to provide assistance to farmers with the phase out of the WGTA is designed to ensure that the investment can continue to be made for developing a new agricultural industry in western Canada. In this way agriculture can diversify and provide more value added products. That is the criteria the minister of agriculture will use. As he always does, he will use good judgment and good common sense.

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, on February 27, 1995 a departmental paper said the phase out money would go to landowners to help compensate for the loss of land value.

The next day the agriculture minister was quoted as saying that he was open to the possibility of encouraging provincial governments to pass the payment on to land renters.

The minister seems confused. Is the payment meant to compensate for the loss in land value or to help compensate for the extra freight cost? Farmers need an answer on this.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the hon. member's question is a little bit confused.

As I just explained, the minister of agriculture indicated that he is going to discuss this with a wide variety of farm organizations, which is what he is doing today, and to provide those kinds of answers. He made his position very clear.

We want to ensure that the compensation package is used in the most effective way possible to enhance the development and the reorganization of western agriculture so it can continue to offer a major base of economic growth in western Canada.

INTERNET

Mr. Sarkis Assadourian (Don Valley North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry. Ernst Zundel, a convicted Nazi holocaust denier, and other Zundels of the world, intend to use Internet technology to spread direct propaganda.

What action can the minister take, first, to regulate the Internet from being used to spread hate propaganda, and second, will Internet users be made accountable?

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first of all, the propaganda perpetrated by people like Ernst Zundel is as unacceptable on the Internet medium as it is in any other.

We deplore the fact that this kind of material exists in our society. The Information Highway Advisory Council is currently studying whether our existing laws are adequate to deal with problems such as those that arise under the Internet.

DEPARTMENT OF THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Benoît Sauvageau (Terrebonne, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

On December 14, in reply to a question about some land in Vancouver belonging to the Squamish band which the federal government has been leasing, the minister said the following: "I made arrangements to inform the band that future payments after this fiscal year should cease and desist".

Will the minister confirm that the lease payments which already cost Canadian taxpayers $26 million have in fact "ceased and desisted", as she promised us on December 14, since officials from her own department say the opposite is true?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): I can assure the hon. member that, when I answered that question, we had informed the band in question that, after the end of the calendar year, we would not pay them one penny more. And our position on this issue is firm.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Herb Grubel (Capilano—Howe Sound, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, accountants in Canada are in an uproar. The budget proposes to make all professional income statements due at the end of December rather than throughout the year. Accounting costs will skyrocket because of the need for overtime and extra staff at year end. These extra costs will be passed on to the professionals.

Had the Minister of Finance consulted with accountants and professionals on this matter?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, over the course of the last year we had consulted with many Canadians on all of the issues that were in the budget.

The hon. member undoubtedly knows that provided professionals the opportunity to defer, for one full year, income otherwise taxable. It gave them a substantial advantage over other Canadians.

Given the government's commitment to making sure that the taxation system is fair and that all Canadians pay their fair share, we closed that loophole.

It concerns the Stay in School job program which was introduced five years ago for the benefit of young people still in school. Its goal is to directly discourage young people from dropping out of school. Groups which are interested in this issue and which try to encourage young people heard recently that the program would be discontinued.

I would like to hear from the government itself whether it is true that the program will be dropped.

MEDICARE

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister, who yesterday was in Saskatchewan talking about medicare.

At the same time in Saskatchewan, members of the medicare community who had been involved in the fight to implement it over 30 years ago, including former Premier Allan Blakeney, were sounding warning bells for Canadians. Mr. Blakeney in particular said that by eliminating specific funding to the provinces in favour of reduced block transfers with few strings attached will result in a patchwork medical insurance system with different standards in different provinces.

How can the government continue to claim it is defending the principles of medicare when four of the sculptures of medicare are telling us these reforms are going to lead to a patchwork?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if these four sculptures, as he called them, had waited until this morning, they would not have had to hold a press conference because I stated very clearly that medicare will remain as it is.

Mrs. Dianne Brushett (Cumberland—Colchester, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

In light of recent press reports, both domestically and internationally, reporting favourably on Canada's economy, could the minister tell the House why the economic indicators are looking so good?

● (1500)

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as the member undoubtedly knows because she follows this very closely, our growth is up. We are leading the G–7. Our productivity record is superb. Our inflation is very low.

Undoubtedly she is referring to more recent indicators. The composite leading indicator in February was up by 0.5 per cent. In January it was up by 0.6 per cent. Undoubtedly she was referring to the fact that our manufacturing shipments in January were up by 28 per cent over last year.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I nearly forgot to ask this important question. I would like the hon. government House leader to tell us about the business planned for the next few days.

[English]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on Friday, as announced earlier, we will have an opposition day.

On Monday the House will consider Bill C–73 respecting borrowing authority followed by Bill C–68 respecting firearms. Tuesday will be an opposition day again.

On Wednesday the House will consider second reading of Bill C–72 regarding intoxication and when this is completed we will return to the business of Monday at the point it was left off.

Thursday will be another opposition day, the last in the present supply period, which means the House will be asked at the end of the day to vote on final supplementary estimates and interim supply.

On Friday we will begin the second reading stage of the budget implementation bill which we had intended to introduce today but whose introduction has been delayed for technical reasons.

I would like to express thanks to the opposition parties for their co–operation in facilitating discussion and decision last night on the bill to enable work to resume at the port of Vancouver. This attitude on their part is certainly appreciated.

PRIVILEGE

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER AND MINISTER OF THE ENVIRONMENT—SALVAGING OF THE IRVING WHALE—SPEAKER'S RULING

The Speaker: My colleagues, yesterday, March 15, the hon. Leader of the Opposition rose on a question of privilege relating to an exchange that had occurred March 14 during question period between him and the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment. Having heard from both parties, the Chair undertook to review the situation and the records of the original exchange and to return to the House. I am now ready to rule on the matter.

[English]

I have carefully reviewed the comments from both hon. members. I thank them for their interventions. With regard to the basic differences of opinion that exist between them I must conclude this is a dispute as to facts or interpretation of facts. As such, it is a matter of debate and does not constitute a prima facie case of privilege.

However, on careful review of the records of the original exchange, the Chair has found some troubling anomalies. As I see it, it is these anomalies to which the hon. Leader of the Opposition takes exception and it is here that the Chair must take action to grant him redress.

[Translation]

Let me review the sequence of events which leads me to this conclusion. The original exchange on March 14 took place in French. It was taped and transcribed; the transcription was edited; the edited transcript was, as usual, distributed to the intervenors for review. The Office of the Deputy Premier Minister reviewed the transcript as usual and submitted, as is its right, two suggested changes to the blues. However, in the view of the Chair, these suggested changes ought not to have been accepted nor printed as the official record for they constitute a substantive difference to the original spoken words of the hon. member. To further complicate matters, these changes appear in the French Hansard but are not reflected in the English version which is, instead, a literal translation of the original spoken word.

• (1505)

Therefore, to correct these anomalies, I have instructed my officials to print a corrigendum in today's Hansard so that both the French and the English version of the March 14 exchange will faithfully reflect the original spoken words of the hon. Deputy Prime Minister.

[English]

I have asked the Clerk of the House to ensure that the editors of Hansard adhere strictly to the long established criteria in determining what changes are accepted when members submit suggestions for changes when they return their blues.

I trust this remedial action will close this matter.

SUPPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Resuming debate. The hon. member for Calgary North.

I would ask the hon. member for Roberval to withdraw what he said.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Madam Speaker, I wish you would tell me what you want me to withdraw. I did not have the impression I made an intervention.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I can check the blues, but I also heard you here, when you used a word we are not in the habit of using in this House.

Mr. Gauthier: Madam Speaker, I was simply making a reference, strictly off mike, to the Deputy Prime Minister.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I can check the blues. If the words do not appear, I will apologize.

Mr. Gauthier: Madam Speaker, I would appreciate it if you would check the blues.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Madam Speaker, when you check the blues of the proceedings, perhaps I may suggest two points the Chair may wish to consider. First of all, when a parliamentarian says that another parliamentarian has, and I quote: "the right to lie", this reflects on the parliamentarians who, if this is true, did in fact lie, and of course we do not have the right to accuse a parliamentarian of doing so.

However, this also challenges the decision made earlier by the Chair with respect to a difference of opinion that existed, because saying that another parliamentarian allegedly had the right to lie implies that he or she had been given that right by someone else. In this case, the person who ruled on the matter happens to be the Speaker of this House, so the hon. member opposite has in fact challenged the decision of the Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): The blues will be checked, and I will get back to you as soon as they are available. The hon. Opposition Whip, on a point of order.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie, BQ): Madam Speaker, since you are going to check the blues, perhaps you could check yesterday's blues as well, since the Deputy Prime Minister stated here in the House that she had not suggested any corrections in Hansard, and this did not appear in today's Hansard. I assume everyone heard her, since the Minister of Transport even applauded and expressed his support. Some things appear in the blues and some do not. This is appalling. Sometimes it is enough to give you the blues, Madam Speaker.

• (1510)

[English]

Mrs. Diane Ablonczy (Calgary North, Ref.): Madam Speaker, this has to be one of the most interrupted speeches that I have ever had the pleasure of giving. This speech actually started over an hour ago and I had about two minutes to begin, so it is kind of hard to get a flow of thought when one is off again, on again. Perhaps I could start from the top and get through it this time without any interruptions.

The lesson of history is one of personal struggle leading to achievement. This has been very true for many of us in the House. I know of a member opposite who came from another country, did not know any English, started out by waiting tables and now is a member of the House. There are many such stories. I shared a bit earlier the kind of struggles I have gone through.

Many of us have become contributing members of society, business and professional people, helping others making a life for ourselves. Many of us have done this before, these kinds of affirmative action programs, these kinds of let us give people equality movements even started.

Canadians are able and willing to make it on their own merits. We have a very high level of merit. There are many unsung heroes. We will not see them on public platforms. They will not be getting any awards but they have been decent, honest, hard working citizens caring for each other, above and beyond the call of duty to hold out a hand of help and encouragement to others. We need to start judging success on the standards by which many Canadians judge themselves. Many Canadians judge success on what they have been able to give as individuals, not what they have been able to get.

Canadians have figured out what most of us figured out a long time ago, that life is not fair. There is a saying that if you would only accept the fact that life is hard it would be so much easier for you. We continually have people who should know better standing up in the House and saying we have to make things easier for people. We have to make things fairer. Canadians know life is what we make it.

We are talking today about the notion of equality. Equality is essentially fairness and impartiality. That is what the dictionary says. Government cannot make life fair. Parliament cannot create fairness any more than it can legislate goodness or compassion.

Calvin Coolidge, a former president of the United States, said: "The people cannot look to legislation generally for success. Industry, thrift and character are not conferred by act or resolve. Government cannot relieve from toil. It can provide no substitute for the rewards of service. It can of course care for the defective and recognize distinguished merit. The normal must care for themselves. Self–government means self–support".

Does this mean we should find unfairness and discrimination acceptable? Of course not, and we do not. It is not government that helps us to act fairly and impartially. This must come from an act of decision by ourselves as individuals.

Government is really just us. Government is part of us. It is something we create as a society. It is a reflection especially in a democracy of what we want for ourselves. That is why we choose representatives from us to carry out our wishes. Somehow there is a feeling that government should create the kind of ethic that is not otherwise present.

There are things we can and should do as individuals to act more fairly and more impartially. We should do those but it is not something that can be legislated.

Canadians want to see people treated as individuals. We are significant in and of ourselves because we are us, so to speak. We do not have to gain significance because of how we relate in a group. We are significant as ourselves, not as something that is labelled, not because we are women or because we are vertically challenged or because we have more pigment in our skins than some other people. Those things are not relevant.

What is relevant is what is in our hearts, what we are capable of, how we strive to achieve the things that are important to us. That is what is significant. We need to realize that is the sort of self–reliance and desire for excellence that should be promoted.

There seems to be a feeling in this country that somehow somebody owes us something, that we are entitled to the things that for centuries we have struggled to achieve. Now they are owed to us and must be delivered to us. This is not practical. It is not common sense. It flies in the face of every experience in human history.

Some of these notions have been tried in other countries. In the United States, this sort of movement to deliver so–called equality to different groups has not succeeded. The disadvantages have outweighed the very real good that was thought to be promoted by these kinds of programs. It is not that the intention behind these programs was not good; it was very good. We all want fairness. We all want people to achieve their full potential.

I would submit this is not something that can be delivered to people. It is only something we can work for and earn. We can ensure that people have the best opportunities to succeed in those goals by treating them as individuals, by allowing them to have equality of opportunity but letting the result of that opportunity rest with the individual.

Abraham Lincoln said that if you have what it takes, the world will take what you have. I believe that is true. We do not and should not be splitting the world into groups. We should be working together as valuable members of society, as individuals with full potential.

It is important that each one of us make a commitment in our dealings with each other to be fair and impartial, both publicly and privately. It is something we need, but not as something legislated, not as something that is owed to us. It should be something we work and strive together to achieve. It cannot be legislated. It would destroy what we want to have in the spirit of individuals to act otherwise.

I think we each applaud the notion of the hon. member's motion. We want to have equality of opportunity. Our charter of rights says we are equal before and under the laws of this country and that must be maintained. However, to give special preference and special assistance to people is to deny them the right to meet their goals on their own merit with their own achievements. We should not be moving in the direction of this motion.

• (1520)

Ms. Maria Minna (Beaches—Woodbine, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I found the member's speech interesting. She was talking about individualism as if we stand alone and do not need anything else around us.

What I hear her saying is that this country has never had and does not have today any sexism or racism that we need to worry about, that there is no stereotyping of the disabled and the physically challenged. She very well knows those very people came before us and told us that of them, something like 2 per cent or less have university educations. Two per cent or less have proper jobs because they do not and cannot access jobs because of stereotyping. This is just the physically challenged. I am not even talking about the racial situation.

The hon. member was talking about individualism and being able to stand alone, being able to make our decisions alone without any laws, rules, collective understandings or agreements of any sort. There was a time when that did exist. At that time there was also child labour and slavery in the world without any of these laws. I do not believe she is suggesting that we go back to those times.

The hon. member is also forgetting that women had to fight. There is the Person's case. Why do we even celebrate Person's day now? Did we forget that we had to fight for the rights to be considered as people and persons? It was not that long ago and a lot of things are still happening.

We saw in the paper just recently where women in business cannot get loans and have to pay higher interest. They stand alone but it does not seem to help. Being individuals does not seem to help.

Yes, we have a charter. Why do we constantly have to go to the Supreme Court with charter challenges in order to get the rights under that charter? They do not automatically happen just because there is a charter. How did we get the rights under that charter? It was by fighting tooth and nail because they were not in the original draft of the charter.

How does the member expect to stand alone, individually isolated and through osmosis each of us will do the right thing only because we want to and because it has never happened before?

Mrs. Ablonczy: Madam Speaker, it is very important to understand that because we are each responsible for our own future and our own achievements does not mean we are in isolation. Nobody with common sense would even suggest that a society which is a corporate word would want to isolate anyone. I do not recall ever using such a word. Yet, this hon. member is so concerned about branding people and putting them into groups that the word isolation stands out in her mind if you even dare to oppose such a concept.

We must help each other. That is the whole point of society. Everybody has read the poem "No Man is an Island". We know that to be true. What is really important to understand is that struggle is part of the human experience.

Yes, the struggles she talked about were important. Those struggles are going on today and will continue, but the important thing is that we become responsible for what we make of ourselves. If we are delivering results to people and delivering the things they need, then where is the achievement and the merit? It is owed to us and it becomes ours by matter of right. We do not have to work for it.

Discrimination cannot be redressed even though discrimination is a terrible thing. If I had been alive at the time when women could not vote, I would have been up there hollering and screaming as loudly, as articulately and as passionately as anyone else. Discrimination cannot be redressed by more discrimination which is exactly what we are going to get if we are not careful.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I happen to be one of those people who believes we do not do enough research in Canada and probably throughout the world on people issues, the questions of poverty, racial discrimination, et cetera.

• (1525)

I am particularly concerned with the following. Is it the hon. member's opinion that we undertake enough research on people issues in Canada, obviously including issues that are directly related to women in society in general. I refer specifically to equal pay for work of equal value. Do we undertake enough research on other issues are particularly relevant to women, for example in the field of health? Do we undertake enough research in redressing some of the financial injustices women suffer in society?

Mrs. Ablonczy: Madam Speaker, the point I am trying to make is that all members of society are equally important. Why are we singling out a particular group as needing special help? All of us need to be treated fairly and impartially in this society, not just some of us. There is no reason to suggest that some of us are more entitled to fairness and impartiality than others. That is just not sensible.

We need to be concerned about each other. We need to help each other. Throughout the centuries the people of good ethics, solid citizens, the people who were respected were those who cared for the disadvantaged, the poor, the needy, those without a voice, those who were without anyone to fight for them. We must continue to do that.

The only point I am making is that kind of caring cannot be legislated. It must be done on an individual basis. It must be done by working with people. It is not done by creating some scheme where results are guaranteed, but where opportunities are fought for, where people are valued and where their achievements and aspirations can be freely met. It is a far different thing from meeting those aspirations for them. It gives them the opportunity to meet them.

We need to discuss the distinctions in this important area because it is a critical area. We have to care about each other and we do. What is the most caring thing, to give people gifts or to allow them the opportunity to get what they want in life through their own merits, their own struggles and their own efforts?

An illustration is often given of a butterfly that struggles and struggles out of the chrysalis. A chick tries to struggle out of an egg. Both are long and exhausting processes. However if you tear open that chrysalis or that egg, the new creation that comes out of it is weak because it has not had to struggle.

We need to be there for each other. We need to care about each other's struggles. We need to make sure there is fairness and impartiality. We cannot deliver things to people that they can best benefit from by achieving them themselves. That is a very important point in this debate. I hope that satisfies my hon. friend about what I mean in that regard.

Ms. Judy Bethel (Edmonton East, Lib.): Madam Speaker, yesterday the Canadian Federation of Independent Business had a press release. It said that women in new businesses are refused small business loans 20 per cent more often than men in new businesses. It also said that women in business pay 1 per cent more above prime than men in business do. I would like the member to respond to how we as a society should deal with these kinds of inequities.

Mrs. Ablonczy: Madam Speaker, this is an important point. On the face of it, these kinds of statistics look like nothing more than discrimination.

The question must be asked: Are the banks which are clearly in the business of making money simply refusing women loans because they do not like women? If that is the reason, then they should be hammered over the head. It is stupid.

What difference does it make if you are a man or a woman in business? The point is, is there a good business reason as to why this decision is being made? If there is a good business reason, then as a business woman I am going to make sure that I meet the concerns of the bank and qualify for the loan I need. I am going to satisfy the bank that it would be very well advised to give me the needed money because I am a good risk. That is the kind of initiative we need.

● (1530)

Hon. Sheila Finestone (Secretary of State (Multiculturalism) (Status of Women), Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the discussion today. I am delighted that the concerns pertaining to 52 per cent of society are being addressed in a thoughtful manner based on the political observations of people.

Politics makes strange bed fellows, if I could put it that way. Each of us chooses the political party that best suits our interests and concerns. Perhaps the way we view society is reflected by the choice of where we sit in the House. We have been listening to a very interesting approach. Much of it reflects the values I consider important. Some of it is totally outrageous and some of it is strictly political partisanship of the weakest form of politics I could possibly think of.

Notwithstanding, it is vital that we enter into this kind of discussion. I am very pleased to respond to the motion of the opposition member regarding federal action to achieve women's economic equality.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague for her motion. She is asking this House to affirm a principle that is also dear to my heart, the economic equality between men and women. It is not easy to achieve, but it merits discussion, particularly after the speech by the hon. member for the Reform Party.

Our government is firmly committed to helping women attain equality. There is no doubt that the equality of women, fairness and justice for all hinge on economic independence.

We also know that economic equality is fundamental to the well–being of women and indicative of the status of women in our society. Being affluent and having a good job make it easier to stand up for your interests. If you are at the bottom of the scale, if you are a divorced women, if your parents have lived a life of confrontation accompanied by physical abuse, your life will not be quite the same. Equality will be lacking. I believe it is up to society, men and women together, to take an interest in these vital issues.

In my view, women must be able to take part in the workplace, to receive equal pay for work of equal value, and to contribute equitably to our collective wealth. I must tell you that, as a mother who had sons, would I not have wanted the same treatment, the same equality of opportunity for my daughters—had I been blessed with some—as for my sons, and as for my daughters–in–law today? If they have the same education, the same ability and the same experience, why do they not deserve the same treatment? I have never understood why we cannot ensure that our sons and our daughters live their lives on an equal footing. This situation can change if women decide to have children, and this must be taken into consideration as well.

I feel that it is very important to find a way of ensuring that the equitable contribution to our collective wealth benefits everyone, all members of our society, women as well as men.

● (1535)

[English]

I am pleased to be part of a government that is determined to accelerate the advancement of economic opportunity for women not only in the marketplace but also in their daily lives if they choose to work in their homes. I am honoured to serve under a Prime Minister who is committed to exactly the same goal.

The goal of the Liberal Party has not changed. Times have changed. What we saw as necessary many years ago has changed in the new reality of today's world, whether it is the technology that has changed, the organization of society that has changed or the role and place of women in society that has changed.

We can look at the House and at the number of women who have been able to win "gagner leurs épaulettes au niveau politique, elles siègent ici".

An hon. member: On their own initiative.

Mrs. Finestone: Not on their own initiative, I say to my colleague across the floor. From a lot of work by women like me and plenty of others.

The Liberal Party has brought into force a Human Rights Act, a Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and a royal commission on economic equality, all structures of society that express our will to ensure equality for women and that give us the legislative mandate and the tools we need that were not in place when the Royal Commission on the Status of Women first held its hearings.

I appeared before the Royal Commission on the Status Women. I appeared about child care. I appeared about latchkey children. I appeared on the role of the volunteer in society, the needs of the volunteer and the need for recognition for unpaid work. The women here today gained many opportunities right back to the Lavalee case and right through the history of the development of equality and opportunity for women.

The women who think today that there is nothing we need to be concerned about, that violence against women is not a reality, that it is not something society should deal with, and that the Minister of Justice who has been doing a fine job addressing many of the issues should not be doing it, have missed the point that 52 per cent of the population require attention. All those issues in society need to be addressed.

I thought it would be worthwhile to address some of the points raised in my absence this morning. I was attending other duties and could not get back to the House on time. I gathered from what colleagues in the Reform Party said concerning women's equality and the consolidation of the federal government's organizations for women that they accused the government of not taking enough action on equality. They referred to us as a special interest group. They talked about us as a particular bunch in society.

Quite frankly this bunch in society, this gender called women, females, wives, mothers and grandmothers, happen to make up 52 per cent of the population. They are not a special interest group. The gun lobby is a special interest group. The banking institutions are a special interest group. Certainly women are not a special interest group. They are an integral part of society. Their concerns need to be addressed through research, through public meetings, and through advancing their concerns on the floor of the House.

Members of the House should make sure they consult their ridings to find out the concerns of women, their husbands and children. They might be more reflective of real society and stop worrying about the peculiarities of a just society from their perspective which seems to want to throw everybody in jail and throw away the key.

They have called for the government to get out of child care, that women should stay at home and look after children. If all women in the workforce stayed at home over 20 per cent more of the population would be living under the poverty line.

They do not recognize that women go to work not only because they like to and not only because they have confidence and want to but because they need to in order to keep their families above the poverty line. I do not expect the Reform Party to understand that.

• (1540)

They also talked about the question of the lack of need for any special action. There is plenty of need for special action so that the women of the country will be ensured of special action.

[Translation]

I would now like to talk about the project to merge these institutions, a project I have just tabled, and the action the government has undertaken with respect to the three groups serving the interests of women, because I think it a bit unfortunate that this was not well understood. Perhaps the opposition party, the Bloc, did not have an opportunity to carefully read the document I tabled and the time perhaps to read what I said in the House. In this regard, I would like to draw their attention to certain facts.

Through in-depth research undertaken by this government to ensure that it gives careful attention to fiscal matters—and, with all sorts of new things in our society, and with the need to be careful with the deficit as well, we must manage our society very carefully—as part of my mandate with respect to the status of women, I looked at the three major institutions, government institutions. This has nothing to do with the private sector and the organizations in the private sector, which have their own sets of problems. That is another issue. It was not the issue I dealt with; I tried to ensure that they operated better and in a way that would see to their interests from the grass roots right up to Cabinet and from Cabinet back down with the information required.

It was discovered that everything was in triplicate. We had three separate administrations and three levels of duplication, and I took those steps to streamline all these resources, to concentrate our efforts and to reinforce our capacity to achieve equality.

By merging the three groups, we will eliminate confusion and facilitate access to government. This initiative will also provide a more direct link with women organizations at the local, regional and national levels as well as with non-governmental organizations and universities. What is more important is that I get to keep the $700,000 so that—yes, the Bloc member is surprised, but I want him to have peace of mind, I do not want him to worry—the money previously earmarked for the Advisory Council on the Status of Women will be reallocated to research conducted by Status of Women Canada and by women's groups, universities and other organizations.

We are going to see what happens, and we are going to consult on the reallocation, but the money for independent research will be—and this is a commitment I made yesterday—given to arm's length institutions and the results will be published in the interest of women, for women, and will not be touched by the government.

I needed that. Did you think I was going to take this money away from women's organizations? No, you started this for petty political purposes. I must say that this kind of system will be much more efficient. I also find strange that my opposition colleague would criticize the action of the federal government when the Province of Quebec recently restructured its own department on women's equality and she did not say a word. This demonstrates, on her part, a great interest in the status of women in Canada and I commend her for that.

I should make it clear that by consolidating all women's programs into Status of Women Canada we are working in the best interests of all women.

• (1545)

I know that some women are concerned that merging the advisory council with my department would essentially mean that the government could help itself to its funding. Far from it. I will not be a minister all my life. I have worked long enough not to want to pull the rug out from under women's feet, regardless of the government. I worked for ten years on the other side of this House and know how women can be misled and their interests forgotten. Such policies, they are smoke and mirrors; and they did not serve us well. This is not the type of policies this government wants to implement.

This government relies on the public, on women's organizations, to monitor our work and to tell us what they think of our performance. I must say that since my appointment, I have travelled a lot, I have met lots of women all over Canada, more than a hundred or so organizations. I chaired the working group on child care. I listened. This government listens. In Cabinet, we talk about women's interests and we will continue to do so.

We now have a very diversified, very competent network of people who are able to appear before us, whether it be on issues of violence or others. The Minister of Justice and I organized a round table on that subject. Forty groups participated. Some 70 persons came. The government, not the advisory council, paid for these consultations.

When the Minister of Human Resources Development held his consultations, a task force was set up. This cost money, but I insisted on it. No later that three hours after the presentation of the budget, I received a phone call requesting permission to hold consultations across Canada.

As a result of this change, we will no longer have a large office in Ottawa, Montreal and Vancouver. The appointment of women by order in council has become a thing of the past. These offices will be closed, but in each region of Canada, in each city, there are women working closely with the people, who know who should get funded and who should not. They are able to organize gatherings, as they have been doing for me up to now, allowing me to meet people.

I just met with the Quebec women's federation, RESO, Charlotte Thibeault's coalition. These women mentioned that they research the issues they bring forward, but that otherwise they are not involved in research; they complained a lot about the way research is being carried out. I said that, from now on, research will be done according to the needs identified by women's groups and academics, that the choice of who will do it will be theirs, and that results will be published.

You do not like it? Too bad. I believe it is the way it should be done. We will consult women's groups as to the process. It may not be what you want, but I believe that it is the best way for women. Judging by the work women did in preparation for the Beijing meeting, I know that we are making progress. There are still a lot of problems, but we are making progress. Women on this committee held consultations with 2,500 women across Canada. They drafted answers and helped Status of Women to make improvements to the draft working paper.

I believe that the links, the co–operation and the mutual respect we established in many ways are in the interest of everyone.

• (1550)

In this way we are going to improve research and get more out of our consultations. We will be much more direct. We will use a "one–stop shopping" concept, research will be conducted by outside sources, independently, and all aspects of the library, etc, will also be reviewed, as well as distribution, because we will begin using all kinds of new technology. Women are quite advanced in this area.

I know that some people believe that we have stifled the voice of an important women's association and even silenced it. This is not true. This statement only confuses matters. The organization which was closed down was financed 100 per cent by the federal government.

The federal government will transfer close to $2 million for the status of women. I think this is a very good approach and I am very proud of what we just did because there comes a time when we have to turn over a new leaf. The 1970s were different from 1995. We had to closely examine what we were doing, and in doing so, we found a better way to handle women's issues.

Madam Speaker, thank you and I still acknowledge the importance of the role of women. Our political party will persevere, in our interests and in the interests of women—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I regret that I must interrupt the hon. minister, but her time is up. We will now proceed to the question and comments period.

The hon. member for St. Boniface has the floor.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I have listened with interest to the minister's speech and I would like to ask her a question.

Like her, I realize that the government is doing a number of things for the women of Canada.

[English]

For example, we have come forward with an agreement for equal pay for work of equal value. We have the gun control legislation that is being supported by women. We have the prenatal nutrition program. We have the court challenges program that has been reinstituted, centres of excellence on women's health and a number of others.

There is simply a larger proportion of women who are poor, a larger proportion of women in society who are victims of violence and abuse, and a larger proportion of women who are single parents. Women still earn less than men.

Despite various initiatives that have been undertaken by government and because of certain decisions that have been taken—my colleague has addressed one of them—are we assured that we will continue to make progress on these fronts?

I tried to raise a question previously with respect to the importance of research on those fronts. I have a bias, I must admit. I think research on those issues is of critical importance to ensure that we continue to move forward because there are serious problems in society that affect women disproportionately.

Mrs. Finestone: Madam Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague for his question. I have visited Winnipeg and I have met with both English and French women's groups in the area as well as with multicultural groups. I can assure him I am more than ever convinced the research that needs to be done is proactive research as well as reactive research.

In the proactive field of research today, which we did not have in 1972 with the advisory council's arrival on the scene, there are women chairs of study across the land. Within the universities there is capacity to look at many of the problems such as the problems of poverty, the problems of inequality in terms of education and training, the whole area of change in the percentages of men and women in various institutions, and the need for the diversity of Canadians to be better reflected in the House.

A university study was done on the integration of women and visible minorities into the marketplace. When we see the disparity at least once it is put into concrete terms through research at the university level, or at SHRC for that matter, and we are in a position to be able to speak out and effect change on government policy.

I listened to some of the remarks of members of the Reform Party which I do not share. They say that government cannot make life fairer.

• (1555)

If we did not do research through the Canadian Federation for Independent Business, would we know that women who have an excellent record with respect to the creation of jobs in small and medium size businesses are far more effective and far more efficient or that over 40 per cent of the jobs are created by the small businesses in which women are the most successful after five years?

That research was done by the private sector, the CFIB in this instance, not by a university. It indicated that despite their success 20 per cent more women were refused loans at our banks and institutions than men and that when women obtained loans, 95 per cent of them had to pay higher rates with more difficult terms.

That research was extremely pertinent. I am very glad the member asked the question. It is a solid answer to the Reform member on whether or not we need to be doing work on equality for women in the fields of employment and earnings. Yes, we need to reach economic equality. The question was very pertinent. It allows me to thank the member very much.

There is room for research at all levels: through the private sector, through the public sector and through the universities with their great expertise.

[Translation]

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Québec, BQ): Madam Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Secretary of State for the Status of Women. I understand the government's new policy, which led to yesterday afternoon's decision that that would be the best way to operate.

I do not think that there is unanimity among women's groups or that it is as obvious as the minister would have us think. There is concern about the probable lack of transparency there would be in the department when public servants in this department are called upon to promote the department's policies. The role of the advisory council was precisely to criticize government inertia and to suggest possible solutions regarding the various policies of the government concerning the status of women.

Take day care facilities, for example. We know that the 3 per cent of GDP has been reached and that 50,000 day care spaces have been promised. This does not come from the government. We hear about pay equity, while women are still earning 72 per cent of what men earn, and there are other decisions that the government is dragging its feet on. I think that enough has been said today about the various possible solutions that the government could adopt to bring about a considerable improvement in the economic situation of women.

What concerns me is the lack of transparency that might result from this new direction. I am also concerned about the choice we would have to make.

The minister said yesterday in her speech on the budget in the House that the various women's groups were very strong, very effective. I think that some of them are but that others are not so strong and do not have the Canadian Advisory Council's analysis capacity. Without this analysis capacity, how will they manage?

Women living in the outlying regions will have to negotiate with the federal government, to travel, to defend their priorities. The minister may be very positive, but I do not know what the outcome will be in the long term. I do not think, however, that this way of looking at things will be an end in itself.

She seemed to be saying that the women's movement was born of various concerns and that it was in its infancy when the council was created. I would say that, on the contrary, we have not yet reached maturity.

In 1920, women were earning 50 per cent less than men; in 1995, women are making only 72 per cent of what men make. We have clearly lost ground.

• (1600)

Given the economic situation, we know full well that women will be the hardest hit. This afternoon in the House, the Deputy Prime Minister replied to a question I asked on the dismantling of the advisory council—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but her time is up. The secretary of state, for a brief reply.

Mrs. Finestone: Madam Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague. I am aware of her keen interest for women's issues. I know she speaks from the heart and I respect her for that. While I understand her interest for women's issues, I wish she would reply when Reform members make statements in this House, because it is quite frustrating to hear them sometimes.

I must say that, indeed, the advisory council had a role to play, and it played it well. Perhaps it even took a mother–hen approach at times. As I see it, the council was the driving force behind many activities and initiatives. You cannot say that, over the years, the Fédération des femmes du Québec, the National Action Committee on the Status of Women—the similarity of certain names causes some confusion, I know— the National Council of Women and others—there are a dozen organizations out there that I could name, have not been able to make representations and have not done so. And, through independent research, we will make sure that they can decide for themselves what their priorities will be regarding all the women's groups; I will not interfere. I think it will be in their best interest.

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate on the motion tabled by the hon. member for Québec, which deals with the economic equality of women. In spite of all the attention generated by the status of women in Canada, and by a number of legislative measures and policies designed to correct the inequalities of which they are victims, the situation of women remains very different from that of men, and there is still a lot to be done before they can enjoy the same benefits as their male counterparts.

As the member for Drummond, I first want to express my friendship and my support to women in my riding, particularly those who work in organizations dedicated to improving the situation of women in our riding. As the opposition critic on health issues, this is also an opportunity to stress the urgency of establishing a health care system for women.

The moneys allocated to research on women's health issues remain largely inadequate. There are insufficiencies in various sectors such as breast cancer research, gynaecology and obstetrics, chronic and degenerative diseases, mental health, violence, occupational diseases, specific needs of immigrant women of ethnic origin and native women, teenagers, elderly women, and so on.

At the beginning of her mandate, 15 months ago, the Minister of Health told us how she was going to promote women's health. She explained the programs that her government was going to implement, so as to correct the inequalities which affect women in the health care system. The reality, however, is completely different.

Since the Liberals took office, the funds allocated to health care keep diminishing. This government maintained the freeze on transfer payments to the provinces, thus creating a shortfall for provincial health care systems, including Quebec's. The government goes even farther in its last budget by cutting $70 million in the health department's budget, which is a 3.8 per cent reduction. But nothing is done to correct the imbalance between men and women.

Let me tell you about breast cancer. Canada has the world's highest rate of breast cancer.

• (1605)

Finally, the incidence of this terrible disease has constantly increased since the 1960s. Each year, 15,000 new cases of breast cancer are diagnosed, and 5,000 women will die of it this year, that is, one every two hours.

In Quebec alone, 1,500 women will die of this terrible disease. In Canada and in Quebec, a woman has one chance out of ten to develop breast cancer.

A national study, which was published last Thursday, shows that 41 per cent of women in Canada and in Quebec consider breast cancer to be the main threat to their lives.

I think it is about time that we decide to overcome this disease. To do this, we must have a breast screening strategy taking into account both genetics and environmental factors.

This is exactly what emerged from the final report tabled last fall by the national forum on breast cancer in which the health minister took part. This report recommended that national practice directives be adopted immediately to enlighten doctors and promote research and job training. So far, nothing has been undertaken by the government in office.

There is also cardiovascular diseases, which are the main cause of death among women. Indeed, 40 per cent of women will die of cardiac arrest or of cardiovascular complications. Despite these alarming figures, the last budget resulted in cuts to the Tobacco Demand Reduction Strategy.

Resources allotted to this program will decrease from $185 million to $81 million. At the very least, this represents a $104 million reduction, even though the number of smokers continues to rise, especially among women. We know that smoking increases the risks of cardiovascular complications. However, members will remember that tobacco control once was the health minister's favourite theme.

There were reports recently, and again today, in the media about the terrible problem relating to genital mutilation which is wreaking havoc in several countries around the world and is even practised here, in our society. The government is not addressing this crucial issue and we are wondering what it is waiting for.

Quebec has already showed leadership by announcing that it will criminalize this action and sue everyone guilty of genital mutilation. The federal government refuses to clearly add genital mutilation in the Criminal Code, despite the repeated requests made by the official opposition and the government of Quebec and the fact that several European countries and states in the U.S. have already taken such measures.

When can we expect a truly good health system for women? I still remember when birth control was not well known and was hard to get. I remember when women's diseases were considered a normal part of women's lives and their imaginary disorders. I remember when knives were used way too often. We only have to think about all the unnecessary hysterectomies that were performed.

Of course you will tell me that times have changed, that today's policies stress the importance of addressing social and economic problems recognized as being directly related to health. But how are words translated into action? Far from improving, the status of women is even deteriorating.

For years, women's health centres in Quebec have been repeating that the social and economic conditions of women, poverty, the double workload, violence and discrimination are all problems that a pill will not solve.

The solution for women is to eliminate poverty because there is a direct link between poverty and health. Statistics have clearly shown that low income people are sick more often than others.

• (1610)

In this year of tolerance, the International Women's Day that we celebrated last week compels us to have greater respect for ourselves and for others. Women have demonstrated throughout history that they have this extraordinary capacity to obtain a consensus. Our modern societies, whose only values now seem to be those generated by the globalization of economic and cultural markets, need more than ever the involvement of women as mediators.

In the name of profitability, our societies exclude more and more people and fuel the rise of several forms of fundamentalism. Because they are the very ones with the sensitivity and the ability to do it, women will have to assert themselves to lead a successful battle against poverty and radicalization.

I will close my remarks by addressing the women of Quebec, to whom I want to deliver this message. In a few months, we will have a crucial decision to make, a decision that will have a lasting impact on our future. My wish would be to see the women of Quebec taking part actively in this historic moment because no country can be built without the voice, the will and the consent of women. And the new society that we see rising on the horizon must include the women of Quebec.

Hon. Sheila Finestone (Secretary of State (Multiculturalism) (Status of Women), Lib.): Madam Speaker, first of all, I would like to thank the hon. member for being very realistic about the role of women in the political life of a society. They say that when men go into education it is for themselves, whereas women do it for their family, in other words, society.

I am convinced that women, when they see what is happening in Quebec, will certainly get involved in order to maintain their quality of life at an appropriate level and ensure better opportunities for the future in case Quebec separates and becomes independent.

We have travelled the same path. Women respect each other. Redefining borders will not help in any way. It will create a situation where poverty will be worse for women and their families.

I would like to ask a question of my colleague. When she says that we must follow up on what is happening in Quebec because it just ruled that the mutilation of female genital organs is a crime, I wonder if she was absent from the House when the Minister of Justice and myself ruled that our federal legislation would also consider such mutilation to be a criminal act? If we are presented with a case involving such an act, it will be tried and judged according to Canadian laws since it is a criminal act.

I am very happy to see that the Court of Quebec, or rather the Human Rights Commission, has ruled on that issue. I am also happy to see they agree with us on a point that has already been ruled on in the Canadian laws.

There is no need for lengthy analysis to find out that such a practice goes against Canadian values, that it is unacceptable to mutilate female genital organs and that people have to abide by our rules and standards, period. Certainly, for all women, whether they live in Quebec or in Ontario, whether they are from Nova Scotia or Newfoundland or Vancouver, British Columbia, this act of mutilation is unacceptable.

I am asking the hon. member a second question concerning the health issue. In order to eliminate poverty, we took some measures in favour of pregnant women. We also undertook some research on breast cancer, on heart diseases in women and on their prevention. Considering her great interest in that matter, I am convinced that, given her great interest for these matters, if she has other ideas to bring out at one time or another, she will assist the health committee of the House of Commons by making her comments, which will be greatly appreciated.

Is she ready to bring us other suggestions on this?

• (1615)

Mrs. Picard: Madam Speaker, regarding sexual organ mutilation, we note that it is not mentioned that this practice is criminal. Why does this practice still exist? As was noted earlier today, a physician had to perform surgery on young women. How is this still possible? He had to do nine operations. What can we do to stop that? The individuals who performed these barbarous acts on those young women are still running free. This practice is being performed in many places.

When people arrive in Canada, they do not know it is illegal in our country. They should be told, and the fact should be public knowledge. Steps must be taken to prevent that practice. This is happening here in Canada. In 1995, it is unbelievable that we still hear about those practices. In Toronto, a physician told me that he gets calls regularly from women who ask him to perform these operations on the sexual organs of their children. The Criminal Code must either be strengthened or other measures must be enacted because this situation is really alarming.

As far as—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but her time is up. The hon. member for Laval Centre has the floor.

Mrs. Madeleine Dalphond–Guiral (Laval Centre, BQ): Madam Speaker, allotted days on a motion of the official opposition provide special moments in this House, because, by making it possible to ask government about the real issues, they force parliamentarians to consider certain unavoidable realities.

The reality we are currently considering concerns more than half the population, since, today, we are assessing the government's action, or, rather, its inaction with respect to women.

On March 8, 1994, International Women's Day, the Bloc Quebecois tabled the following motion in the House on an opposition day:

> That this House urge the government to recognize the principle of economic equality between women and men and to implement measures, in areas of federal jurisdiction, to guarantee women equity in employment, wages and living conditions.

What has become of this a year later? Women in Canada and Quebec agree: for this government, it is a long way from the cup to the lips. There was not a hint of the grand principle of equity in the budget tabled by the Minister of Finance. And yet women here need real action.

It therefore makes sense for the opposition critic on the status of women to table a motion denouncing the federal government for its inaction in its areas of jurisdiction through its failure to adopt concrete measures to promote the equality of women.

The Bloc Quebecois notes that the Liberal government has failed to keep the commitments it made with regard to promoting equality for women. One has only to look at the situation in various areas of social concern, including child care services, public housing and the struggle to prevent violence against women.

The Liberal government's latest decision to abolish the Advisory Council on the Status of Women is a clear indication of the cabinet's concern about women.

It appears that the government is no longer interested in hearing a voice independent of political power express the rightful claims of women. The council's credibility with various women's organizations was commonly recognized. It is not easy to answer to one's conscience when the will to act is lacking.

It would seem that the activities of this organization will be transferred to Status of Women Canada. What activities are we talking about, however, since $1 million in funding will be cut?

• (1620)

The equal opportunities for women program will also be transferred to Status of Women Canada, but with a budget reduced by five per cent. They say that, for the moment, this cut will not affect grants to volunteer organizations working on the status of women issue. What we really want to know is how long will this moment last.

Of all of the issues regarding the status of women, violence against women is probably the most devastating, as much physically as it is psychologically and it also saps morale. Despite the efforts of groups working to stop violence against women, the incidence of violence has increased at an alarming rate. Can we fight so rampant a social ill with only sentiment and good intentions as weapons? No, Madam Speaker.

The violence that often stems from economic inequality could be eliminated if the government would only assume a strong leadership role in society, put equality high on the list of priorities and channel the appropriate resources to the cause. Governments do not have the right to expose the pursuit of economic equality for women to the whims of the tax system and budgets. Such behaviour is tantamount to subsidizing economic inequality.

More than ever, fighting violence against women must be a priority. Is it acceptable in 1995 that women and families still have to face violence day after day? In January 1994, Statistics Canada publicized the results of a vast survey in which 12,300 women participated. It brought to bear some disquieting facts.

It revealed that 51 per cent of all women have been victims of at least one act of physical or sexual violence. One in five were hurt and one in four were hurt so badly that they required medical attention. In 25 per cent of all cases, the husband or common–law spouse was the perpetrator. What is even more serious is that children witnessed the violence 4 times out of 10.

These figures jive, by the way, with the statistical data contained in a 1991 report called "The War Against Women". The report found that between 63 and 83 per cent of the victims of physical abuse knew the men who abused them. One woman in ten is assaulted by her spouse and, on the average, victims are abused 30 times before they call the police.

The Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women published its own figures, which have quite a story to tell about the treatment women receive. It found that one in four Canadian women were sexually exploited at one point of their lives. In half of the cases, these women were not even 17.

Considering these disturbing facts, how can the government justify its decision to reduce subsidies to organizations against violence towards women when the need is more pressing?

Women will not feel secure before there is true equality between men and women. How much injustice, inequity, inequality, and violence will the women of Canada and Quebec have to endure before the government commits itself to act in a concrete way and proceed with the necessary social and economic changes to achieve equality?

The Liberal government with its current budgetary measures in the area of unemployment insurance, with its determination to cut transfer payments to the provinces in the areas of health, education and social services is working towards a pull–out of the central government in these matters.

The so–called reform of social programs, postponed until 1997, announced a dark future for young people, the unemployed, senior citizens and, of course, women.

Indeed, there is no doubt that women will be the first victims of the changes to eligibility criteria for unemployment insurance, in a large part because it will be based on family income. We can assume that women could be denied access to the plan because of the high salaries of their husbands. What about other payments, in particular old age security?

The same logic seems to apply, since the budget of the Minister of Finance is starting to open a breach into old age security. "If your family income exceeds a certain threshold, Madam, you will no longer get your monthly cheque." For many women, this cheque is tangible proof of a certain financial autonomy, very often the first they ever had. We cannot deny that some aspects of women's reality have been overlooked by decision–makers. But an oversight can be corrected, if only the will to be fair is strong enough for us to admit that we were wrong.

The economic security and equality of women can only be achieved if women are economically independent. In turn, economic independence is tied to the creation of lasting full time and adequately paid jobs. However, in 1993, women accounted for 69 per cent of part time workers in Canada. This ratio is unacceptable. Job insecurity is replacing economic security and equality for women. This is second rate equity.

Instead of jeopardizing the scant efforts made over the past decades to try to provide women in Canada and Quebec with economic equality, the government should recognize that only a sharp directional change in employment strategies will guarantee the women of this country the economic security necessary for individuals to find their balance, for families to be healthy, and for people to enjoy respect. This government has its work cut out, but it remains to be seen if it will have the courage to get down to business.

Hon. Sheila Finestone (Secretary of State (Multiculturalism) (Status of Women), Lib.): Madam Speaker, I would like to add a few comments and make some observations. First, it is not the credibility of the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women which is being questioned here, but the operating costs, the duplication costs. We are talking about a third of the budget being used for three full time employees, the president and two vice–presidents, and some thirty former part–time employees appointed by order in council. I must say that one third is too much. For the rest of the money that we will keep, that the Canadian Council will keep, we will make a review and consult women to determine how to put that money to good use. I believe this is a better way to ensure that many of the questions you raised on certain points, some important questions, will get at least a technical answer. That is another story.

To conclude on your colleague's speech on health issues, my other mandate, that of multiculturalism, has showed me that we should deal with that shameful and hateful issue of genital organs mutilation through education and not only through a judicial and criminal approach. It is through education that we can reach multicultural groups and various ethnic communities and start an information process. We are making a film on that subject for doctors, nurses, families and centres, and I hope this will also help.

Finally, I would like to bring to your attention the fact that it is not the Advisory Council which studied the issues and data on violence which you mentioned several times in your comments. That research was done by a group on violence appointed and paid by the government. It is also Statistics Canada which conducted a comprehensive research effort, known world–wide, and studied the treatment of women in the context of criminal law. These are the people who brought that to our attention.

And it is I, as the minister for the Status of Women, who brought these data here, with my team. Do not create confusion for society at large. What was the role of the Advisory Council on the status of women? What is the role of the status of women, which I am in charge of? What are the roles of various groups in society at large?

I think that some answers to these questions could clarify things a little bit, so that we will know that equality of women will finally be coming. We know that a strong economy and the participation of women are the key to their independence. That independence is very important. Do you not think that, in the future, if we cannot be treated as equals, if we do not have the right to equal salaries, if we do not have the chance to be equal in society, we could be the victims of violence?

Mrs. Dalphond–Guiral: Madam Speaker, I just want to direct a comment to the hon. secretary of state. She talks about very high administration costs, saying that some women were paid outrageous salaries. When will highly paid men see their positions cut, too?

We are talking about education and communications. Since the hon. secretary of state maintains that the council's credibility was recognized, I wonder if the members of the Council on the Status of Women were consulted on the best way to review the overall handling of women's issues.

Women are being short–changed, in terms of equality. In the 1994 budget, there was the whole infrastructure program. I would like to know how many women got jobs in connection with the infrastructure program? And, if some of them did, it would still have been part time jobs.

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Québec, BQ): Madam Speaker, I thank my colleague for supporting my motion and for giving us an overview of the various areas in which the government is being criticized for its inaction. As far as day care centres are concerned, Quebec receives $35,000; and day care needs in Canada are said to amount to $2 million. As far as pay equity is concerned, women earn 72 per cent of what men earn.

I thank my colleague, and I would like to ask her if she agrees with the hon. secretary of state's comments during this week's budget debate. She said that—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I am sorry to interrupt. The time is up, but I will give you 30 seconds to answer.

Mrs. Dalphond–Guiral: Madam Speaker, I have a slight problem. She said that—Not having heard the end, I cannot answer. Since you wanted to give me the time to respond, please allow her to complete her sentence.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I would like to give the hon. member for Québec a short explanation on what is happening, because I see that she was slightly annoyed. When a member of the opposition has the floor, I must also give the other parties the opportunity to respond. If none of them rises to ask a question, I can recognize one of your colleagues.

Resuming debate.

Mrs. Eleni Bakopanos (Saint–Denis, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I would like to start by commending the hon. member for Québec for giving the elected members of this House an opportunity to debate a most important and relevant issue, in my opinion.

In my capacity as member of Parliament, I would like to draw attention to the fine job done by several organizations in my riding, non–governmental organizations of course, who work with women. I have already done so at a brunch to which I invited them on Friday to mark progress toward equality.

In light of the theme for the next world conference on women for equality—there certainly was some discussion on the subject—I would like to congratulate them again, as I did on Monday.

Last week, on International Women's Day, the Prime Minister summed up quite eloquently the role and contribution of Canadian women. I think it is important that all members of this House, both men and women, know what he said in essence.

• (1635)

"Today, said the Prime Minister, more women work in a broader variety of areas in which they have more influence on the decision–making process than at any other time in our history. And we have every reason to be thrilled about this. As we approach full gender equality, we are strengthening our society and opening new horizons for all Canadians. In Canada, women are making progress toward economic equality. Relying on their own means and abilities, women help shape the future of this country." Not only that of one province, I might add. "As for the Canadian government, it is meeting the challenge. Women's equality is not a matter of special interests or rights, but rather a matter of social and economic justice, a matter of good government".

This message is an inspiration to each and every one of us. It sets the role and contribution of Canadian women in the right perspective.

It is undeniable that we have made progress, by dint of hard work and often courage. But this progress does not benefit only women. It benefits the whole of our society.

[English]

This is because women's issues are everyone's issues. They are societal issues. They touch every single citizen.

We need to leave behind the cliché battle of the sexes where women's gains are interpreted as men's losses. We have to accept that when women advance toward equality everyone benefits. It is purely mathematical. When women, who make up 52 per cent of the population, are able to make a full contribution to society, 100 per cent of the population benefits.

[Translation]

What surprises me is the motion tabled this morning by the Bloc Quebecois member. The hon. member obviously does not realize that the best way to help women is first to be a good government.

She should know that by creating 433,000 jobs in one year, the Canadian government makes a concrete contribution to women's economic equality. The member should also know that by putting our fiscal house in order, we protect our prosperity, our social programs and our quality of life, something which equally benefits Canadian women and men.

[English]

The motion we are debating today talks about concrete action. Here are some examples of specific actions taken by this government. The job training and illiteracy programs provide women with some of the tools for greater economic independence. By combining these tools with job creation the government can help women access a full range of choices in their lives.

Our initiatives for small business, including improved access to capital, will help women entrepreneurs and create a climate more conducive to the creation of jobs for both women and men.

The Employment Equity Act improves the employment opportunities for women. Youth Service Canada, a new strategic measure, helps to put out of school and unemployed young people of both sexes back to work. The infrastructure program has funded projects such as the rehabilitation of a children's centre, the construction of community health centres, libraries, municipal day care centres and shelters. All of these are very concrete initiatives to help women achieve economic equality.

[Translation]

To be a good government also means adjusting our structures to make them simpler and more efficient.

This is why my colleague, the Secretary of State for the Status of Women, announced earlier this week the merging of three organizations dedicated to promoting women's equality.

As part of its program review process, the government examined the role of Status of Women Canada, of the Equal Opportunities for Women Program at the Department of Human Resources Development, and of the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women.

It became clear that these three structures promote women's equality and, to various degrees, conduct research and work in close co–operation with women's groups.

Consequently, the government concluded that the best way to improve efficiency was to consolidate its initiatives to promote women's equality under the structure of Status of Women Canada.

This means that the Equal Opportunities for Women Program will be transferred to Status of Women Canada.

• (1640)

As well, the research, communication and public information functions of the advisory council will become part of the routine operations of Status of Women Canada. This transfer will enable us to better manage the human and financial resources involved, eliminate duplication, and put an end to political appointments. These are all measures which the Bloc Quebecois keep asking us to take as a government.

This will help us create a "one-stop shopping" operation; to eliminate confusion and improve access to the government; to improve research, communications and public information services; to strengthen links with local, regional and national women's groups, NGOs and universities; to ensure that funding for independent research is available; and to allow the federal government to focus its efforts toward promoting equality for women. These are tangible actions, not only words. This is a series of dynamic and realistic initiatives, which, put together, help Canadian women to progress towards social and economic equality.

Also, I want to mention that this government managed to take measures when it elected—or appointed, as the opposition would say—qualified women to positions in this House. I think significant progress was made when more women were elected to this House. This is one of many ways to ensure that women are on the road to economic and social equality.

[English]

Ms. Maria Minna (Beaches—Woodbine, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I want to congratulate my colleague for her well presented thoughts.

The commitment of the government to women as well as my commitment and that of my colleague is quite evident. Given that we are talking about women's economic equality, would it help and enhance women's economic equality much faster in all parts of Canada, including Quebec, if we were to get past and get over as quickly as possible this issue of separation which is in effect holding back the whole country economically, not just women?

Mrs. Bakopanos: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for her question. Definitely. I spent 15 years working with Quebec politics and I see no progress for women if we constantly talk about separation, if we constantly talk about dissolving the country.

We have often said on this side of the House the worse way to advance the cause of women is by focusing on the issue of separation and not focusing on the issue at hand, assuring economic and social equality to women.

It is very unusual that members on the other side of the House talk about solidarity among women and yet they cannot talk about solidarity of all Canadians. We have to start by being united and have a united front to attack some of the problems that face women and men.

Women's issues are not simply women's issues. They are societal issues. We must work together in a united Canada to be able to ensure that women progress both socially and economically.

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I was intrigued by earlier comments of members concerning the recent report of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business. It seemed to suggest there was a gender bias of some description in lending.

With some experience in the CFIB mode of surveying, I wonder if this is correct or if this is a reflection of the people who responded.

• (1645)

I would like to put some interesting information on the record. It is from a Statistics Canada national survey on the financing of small business, dated November 1994. Statistics Canada found that 18 per cent of small businesses owned by men who had sought financing had been refused. For women the figure was 24 per cent.

StatsCan noticed that this difference may reflect an industry preference rather than sex discrimination by the lenders. An example that suggested this industry preference is the business and personal services industry which is the largest share of businesses owned by women. In fact, if there was a bias it had more to do with the kinds of business women determined they were going to try to open. It was not a gender bias.

The other was the question of whether or not there was a bias based on interest rates. Research has shown there is not a gender bias. It is strictly based on the credit worthiness of the business.

Mrs. Bakopanos: Madam Speaker, I am very pleased about this question. At least we can stick to the facts about how far women have come in terms of economic equality.

I want to bring to the attention of the member that Pierrette Leroux, who is the executive vice-president of the CFIB, said there is no doubt that women are penalized by banks and financial institutions. In fact, she called it financial sexism.

As this government has said, unless we can take care of our financial house, no one will be able to benefit from the resources we have, including women. When we talk about interest rates, we have proven by the budget we put forward, and the whole economic community agrees with us, that Canada is on the right track. Once we continue with the initiatives we have set forth in the budget, then hopefully we will move even closer to economic equality for women and all Canadians.

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to stand today to reaffirm the position of this government. We are here to ensure that all Canadians, especially those who are most disfavoured, have equal access to the tools necessary for them to lead a prosperous life. That is one reason we are working so hard to get our house in order. However, we are trying to do it in the most compassionate way possible.

For women and all Canadians to lead an economically sound life they also need to be healthy. One thing follows another. We already know that more women than men who are poor tend to have a lower level of health. Women's health is a priority for this government. In the red book we promised to take action to improve women's health. This is a promise I am determined to fulfil. Canadian women deserve no less.

Canadians take pride in our health care system which is considered by many to be the best in the world. If we scratch beneath the surface, it is obvious that not everyone shares equally in its benefits.

Women are the primary caregivers to our families, our friends and our communities. Yet we overlook the factors that assure those same women their health.

The traditional understanding of women's health has focused primarily on reproductive concerns. Clearly, we need to look at women's health not just in relationship to men. It is not enough to simply compare life expectancy or the absence of disease as indicators of health.

We have to ask why women are often mistreated or overtreated by the medical system. We need to question why the distinctive effects of chronic diseases on women, especially in later life, have been overlooked. We have to ensure that diseases exclusive to women are no longer ignored by the scientific establishments.

[Translation]

Medical practitioners and decision makers are realizing more and more that women's health is part of the social and economic context of daily life.

• (1650)

It is increasingly understood that the determinants of our health—our individual and collective experiences as women—are particular to each of us.

Women cannot be viewed as a homogeneous group. Our health is affected not only by gender but by various other factors such as age, race, social status, education and, yes, income.

We have to deal with larger issues such as poverty, violence, racism and a host of other problems that are inextricably linked to the health and welfare of women. Good health and welfare certainly do not depend solely on health care.

Women keep saying—and society as a whole is beginning to believe it—that health care must be based on an holistic approach that encompasses our emotional, spiritual, cultural and physical well–being.

To improve the health of women, we have to eliminate the social and economic inequalities that hinder their personal growth.

We do not want impersonal health care. We believe that we should have a community–based continuous health care system delivered by a wide range of auxiliary health workers and health professionals. Midwives and nurses, among others, can often offer women quality care tailored to their needs.

[English]

We are devoted to the principle of self–care respecting that individuals know their own self–interests. We also hold that individuals have responsible roles to play in their own well–being.

Many of the dossiers I deal with are very difficult and demand some very difficult choices. One of the dossiers I have under me deals with breast cancer. It is a very difficult one and I must admit one that governments have not particularly taken to heart in the past. It is something I am working diligently at addressing to ensure that adequate dollars are put forward for research, not only in the treatment of breast cancer but also in the dissemination of information and research into the causes of breast cancer.

The recommendations brought forward by the National Forum on Breast Cancer underscore the key roles women must play in deciding their own regimen of care and treatment and in determining the direction research should take into the causes of the disease and its prevention.

Through collaborative efforts of Health Canada, non–governmental organizations and industry, it is estimated that approximately $45 million will be available for research over the next few years to address breast cancer. Is this enough? No, it is never enough. We are going to have to continue to work diligently to increase the focus and the attention that is paid to this very, very difficult disease, one which affects many women in this country and has for many years.

We realize that initial prevention and avoidance of harm rather than health intervention is essential if we are to secure personal health and safety as well as economic equality. This is particularly true when we talk about substance abuse and sexual or physical violence. For this reason, harm reduction efforts of a gender specific nature have been critical components of many of our programs.

[Translation]

The women and tobacco initiative, an integral part of our tobacco demand reduction strategy, is another specific program for women.

Smoking is the first cause of premature death of Canadian women. More than 15,000 Canadian women die from the adverse health effects of tobacco.

Thanks to programs specifically designed for women, awareness campaigns, and research, we are now able to help many women quit smoking for good.

In the same vein, we have launched a program to reduce smoking and promote healthy lifestyles. That program is aimed at low income women, undereducated women, single mothers, young women and Native women.

Any investment in those sectors can be productive during a lifetime, sometimes right from birth.

[English]

We are convinced that health promotion and disease prevention are the best long term routes to good health. That is why we believe it is better to invest in the Canada prenatal nutrition program which assures healthier outcomes for both mothers and babies than in high tech heroics to save infants at risk.

• (1655)

We also share concerns about the efficacy of medical devices as well as the ethics and social and health implications of new reproductive technologies. We worry they have the power to fundamentally alter the lives of our children and families because they open the door to genetic technologies.

Expanding our vision of health; reducing our dependence on technology; doing what works, involving a broader array of health providers; self–responsibility; and a greater emphasis on promotion: These same topics match the key priorities identified as crucial to the renewal of Canada's health system and ultimately to our national well–being. They are particularly pertinent to women, but they are not just women's issues. They are society's concerns.

[Translation]

To solve many of those problems, positive response to change is required. I am convinced the health system reform offers the best chance of success. We should also remember in political discussions that we are here to serve the people, to serve Canadian men and women, and not only governments.

Mr. Ghislain Lebel (Chambly, BQ): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the minister for her remarkable speech. I have seldom had the opportunity to listen to such a long speech made by her and I want to congratulate her. Her speech is full of good intentions and I can tell she knows this issue thoroughly.

I am not rising to blame anyone. Unfortunately, in spite of all the policy statements and the good intentions expressed on both sides of this House, on the government side, there seems to be a distortion between what they say and what they do.

We have had many days like today where we discussed the status of women. I remember last December 6 was one of those. The women of the Liberal Party joined the Bloc Quebecois women to denounce the sometimes tragic situation of women.

However, in our daily lives, in our bills, we seem to forget all the promises, all the good intentions and we just brush honourable thoughts under the carpet. For example, the Liberal members and ministers, and perhaps even the minister who just spoke whom I regard and respect highly, are not opposed to measures like the one implemented in last year's budget, which takes into account a husband's salary to determine if a woman will be entitled to unemployment insurance benefits.

When we proposed other legislation, what did they do? Did they fight for child care? I know they are all good human beings and I respect them, but they are just not there when time comes to keep promises, turn words into deed and principles into actions. Unfortunately, they then often slip away.

I said at the beginning of my comments that I did not want to criticize. On the contrary, I hope that, like the health minister, women in the Liberal Party will be able to put pressure on their male colleagues, who are the majority, so that they take some actions in favour of women.

Do not be surprised if it is a man who is telling you this today. I have three beautiful daughters whom I love as much as my son, and I see that the future that we are preparing for them, the environment that they will have to work in, is not always to their advantage.

I am not asking for special privileges for women. I am simply asking that they be treated the same way as men and, often, as some minorities. In Canada, our women are not treated as well as some minorities, and I feel that this is not right.

I thank the minister for her fine speech. We can tell that she knows the subject and that her intentions are good. What I am asking her is, does she intend to promote her ideas within her own party?

• (1700)

Ms. Marleau: Madam Speaker, I must say that it is absolutely necessary to keep working together, not only in this party, because here we really care about the status of women and the status of minority groups. As you know, many women are members of minority groups. My point is that we intend to do everything we can, despite an economic situation that is still pretty serious, to ensure that the dollars we have go directly to those who need them most. These are sometimes difficult decisions. We have groups that do good work, but the dollars we give them do not go directly to those who really need them.

When I consider the spirit of co–operation we see today when we talk about the status of women, especially poor women, and when I consider that for years we have had constitutional debates to decide which level of government should do what, and all kinds of commissions, and all very expensive, I start thinking that if we had worked together and collected all those dollars that were spent over the years and if we had all decided that the best thing we could do for Canadians was to sit down and do something about their economic situation, just imagine what we could have accomplished. We could have a national day care system. We would not have to fight about whether this is a provincial or a federal area of jurisdiction or priority. It would be wonderful if we could do that.

However, the fact is that we have provincial governments that have certain responsibilities which they are not prepared to relinquish. That is mine. Hands off. Even if what you want to do is very good, do not interfere. This causes problems, delays and a lot of frustration, especially for this minister, who realizes that these are very difficult issues.

When we consider what we could do if, first of all, we invested in our children, in children from infancy to 6 years of age, if we could intervene at that level, we would not have to build prisons, which we will have to do because we cannot afford the luxury of helping our children. We will do what we can. I would like to ask all those people who want the best for our children, for women and the future of our country, to get together and work on this and take the dollars we have to really do something good for Canadians.

Mrs. Maud Debien (Laval East, BQ): Madam Speaker, on March 8, we celebrated International Women's Day with all our sisters and colleagues around the world. Let me tell you that our day is no exception to those important days that we celebrate over an eight–day period.

I consider however that a single day is not enough to allow us to say that we have won the game. This day marks a time–out. It lets us have a moment's reflection before going on with the task at hand. On the last day of this octave, I am pleased to rise in this House to draw attention to the substantial and hard–fought gains made by women and set them in the perspective of future initiatives and representations, particularly with regard to Quebec women.

I also take this opportunity to salute all of Laval's women's organizations devoted to the well–being of their fellow citizens.

Let us never forget that the courage, determination and dedication that characterize earlier generations of women before cannot be overstated. These qualities have revolutionized the established order. In their quest for self–sufficiency, these women broke new ground so that their daughters could enjoy equal access to the right to vote, to higher education, the labour market, financial independence, political power and the corporate world.

• (1705)

These past few years have also seen a number of firsts: first woman in space, first woman Prime Minister of Canada, first woman leader of a Republic, first women Supreme Court justice, first women member of l'Académie française, and the list goes on.

In fact, the statement issued following the recent world summit on social development held in Copenhagen reiterated ten commitments, including that of promoting absolute respect for human dignity, ensuring fair and equal treatment of men and women, recognizing and reinforcing the participation and role of women in political, economic, social, cultural and everyday life as well as development.

Where are we now? Today, women collectively ask themselves: Where are we now? What is the result of our efforts? What will be at stake the next time? We all know, from personal experience, that some progress was made. But let us not fool ourselves.

In spite of these improvements, major inequalities continue to exist. In times of budget cuts and high unemployment, women and the poor may well end up paying the price. Some realities remain true: women still only earn 72 per cent of what men make, the majority of them are in low paying jobs without any security, daycare services are inadequate, elderly women are poorer than their male counterparts, and so on.

What is the situation in Quebec? Many Bloc members travelled across various regions of the province in recent weeks, along with the regional commissions on Quebec's future. As you know, the hearings held by the 18 Quebec commissions were a true success. Over 50,000 Quebecers participated in these very productive discussions, as part of the largest public consultation exercise ever held in Quebec. People from every age group and background came and told us what they expect from a sovereign Quebec.

Once again, Quebecers showed that they can listen to each other, understand each other and get along with each other. They came and told the Quebec government about their hope for a generous, united and responsible Quebec which will care about women, children, workers, seniors and young people. Many women's groups participated in the debate. I can tell you that their vision of Quebec's future is not that of the current federal government. Can the gap between the reality in Quebec and the way the federal government is perceiving it be that wide? The Secretary of State for the Status of Women and her Quebec colleagues in the Liberal Party of Canada have missed a first rate opportunity to get back in touch with Quebec's reality.

In any case, since Liberal members were absent, I will try to convey to them what Quebecers told us. First of all, as I mentioned before, women groups told us, as they did during the Bélanger–Campeau Commission hearings, that they want major changes. These women want the federal government to stop interfering in areas affecting them, such as work conditions, family law, income security, day care and abortion.

The involvement of two levels of government in these areas, they said, leads to administrative overlap, program and structure duplication, a lack of harmony between provincial and federal policies, hence a waste of public funds and the inability of the Quebec government to initiate a coherent policy on women's issues.

Do you want examples, Madam Speaker? Maternity leaves are granted pursuant to the Act respecting Labour Standard while compensation for lost income is paid pursuant to the Unemployment Insurance Act, which makes it difficult for Quebec to implement a coherent policy concerning parental leaves.

• (1710)

Let us deal with the preventive withdrawal of employees who are nursing or pregnant. In Quebec these women are covered by the Occupational Health and Safety Act, while federal employees and women employed by federally regulated businesses are covered by the Canada Labour Code. The level of compensation is not the same, which has the effect of creating two classes of female employees in Quebec.

Furthermore, federal intervention in family matters illustrates the double jurisdiction that exists in matters of family law. The federal Parliament has jurisdiction over marriage and divorce; Quebec has the authority to legislate on the celebration of marriage, matrimonial property, adoption and separation.

As the Council on the Status of Women said so succinctly, women, depending on whether they get married, separate or get a divorce may be provincially or federally regulated. Furthermore, this double jurisdiction prevents Quebec from creating a single family court.

I could go on and on and talk about the overlap in income security, social services, day care and many other areas.

There is a lack of consistency that has often been criticized and which women's groups brought up before the regional commissions on the future of Quebec.

My colleagues have, throughout the day, reminded this House of the government's failure to adopt concrete measures to promote the economic equality of women. Bloc members also condemned the drastic cuts in the latest federal budget and made it clear that women may be severely affected. The government claims it cannot afford to take steps to promote equality and equity, but it is not doing a thing to stop the waste, duplication and inconsistencies generated by overlapping federal and provincial policies.

The federal government has proven it is incapable of responding to the urgent needs and repeated requests of women in Quebec. As I pointed out earlier, Quebec is more progressive in a number of areas. All it needs is the tools to go even further and pursue an integrated development process.

There is an English expression that says "if you can't take the heat, get out of the kitchen". Women want the federal government to take this to heart and let Quebec have sole authority over areas connected with the status of women.

For all these reasons, I fully support the motion moved by the hon. member for Québec, and I urge the federal government to withdraw now from all areas under provincial jurisdiction.

[English]

Mr. John Bryden (Hamilton—Wentworth, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I thank my colleague for her remarks. I would like to follow her lead and take the debate in a slightly different direction. I ask her to remember that Quebec society of say 50 years ago was quite a different society than it is now.

It was a society that was very much oriented toward the church and the family. Indeed, during the second world war the francophone population of Quebec opted for the motto of the Vichy French, that the family and home were the important things rather than the traditional French motto of liberty and equality.

After the second world war we moved into a period in which there was the great liberation of Quebec socially. There have been wonderful advances in Quebec in freeing up the contribution of Quebec's women to the economy and culture of the country—not only francophone but anglophone as well.

Does the member not feel this change—it is a profound change that occurred in Quebec in the fifties and the sixties—owes much not just to the forces within Quebec society but also to Canada itself? I remind her that some very positive initiatives were coming from the federal government, particularly under Mr. Pearson and Mr. Louis St. Laurent which led to the kind of society that she wishes to see in Quebec.

• (1715)

[Translation]

Mrs. Debien: Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for his question. Indeed, Quebec has changed a lot, particularly since the fifties and the sixties, in the context of what was called the "quiet revolution".

The hon. member tells me that there was a profound change, and I was part of it; he also says that this profound change was due to forces within Canada that accompanied with the forces within Quebec. I would also like to ask a question to the hon. member. I would like to know what these forces are, because he did not mention them. Saying that there were forces of change is one thing, but we would like to know what they are.

In Quebec, we know what our forces of change were and what contributed to these forces. We admit that there were also forces in Canada, but I would like to know what were the forces of change in Canada that might have had an effect on Quebec. Personally, I do not see them. That is what I am now asking the hon. member.

[English]

Mr. Bryden: Madam Speaker, far be it for me to instruct the hon. member in the history of Quebec. There is no doubt that in the fifties and sixties there was a great reaching out by the federal government under Prime Ministers Louis St. Laurent and Pearson. The history of the federal government did tend to be a history of anglophones prior to the arrival of Mr. Louis St. Laurent and Mr. Pearson and then we had Mr. Trudeau and so on.

We had an attempt, a very successful attempt, to involve Quebec in the life of the nation at large. Quebec has contributed enormously to Canada. I am surprised that my hon. colleague does not appreciate this.

[Translation]

Mrs. Debien: Madam Speaker, I will answer the hon. member by saying that we certainly did not take the same courses in the history of Canada and of Quebec.

[English]

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to spend a few minutes this afternoon on this opposition motion. As I listened to the debate unfold this afternoon, with people speaking with heartfelt conviction from different political perspectives on the whole notion of women's issues, it was interesting to reflect on it based on our own personal experiences, our life experiences.

I thought of my mother and grandmother. My grandmother was a war bride after the first world war. She came from a life of some luxury in Scotland and arrived on the prairies in Vulcan, Alberta to live in a sod hut. I thought of what she went through in her life as they were breaking the prairies. I thought of how her circumstances changed relative to the circumstances of my mother who often said perhaps her life would have been a little easier if she had been a man. I think that was because she did many things which were not normally within the purview of women. To be charitable, she would never rate all that highly on a scale of one to ten regarding her interest in washing floors, dishes, and that kind of thing.

Interestingly she was the first women photographer ever in the newspaper guild in Canada. She edited and wrote a newspaper column for many years. I am very proud of her. She is in her mid–70s. She always wanted to write a book so she wrote a book. We are now getting it published.

In her lifetime and in the lifetime of many of the women and men in the House, the role of women has changed dramatically in our society. It has changed dramatically as a result of the emancipation of both men and women. Perhaps the greatest change that has taken place, at least to my thinking, is the generational change between my parents' generation and my generation, and the relationship we have with our daughters.

Most of us in this room who have daughters expect our children to be treated with absolute impartiality, regardless of their gender.

My wife and I have a daughter who is an engineer. She is a very competent person. It used to drive her crazy every time a male opened a door for her because she could do it on her own, thank you very much. I said to her: "Kate, there are times when you just have to be a little gracious. Perhaps whoever is opening the door for you is just being polite. It is not a statement meant in any way to put you down".

Perhaps one of the things that is missing in this great raging debate between men and women is that every once in a while we have to lighten up and not take ourselves so seriously.

We evolve as a people and as a nation. It is an evolutionary change not revolutionary change. There are those who would say that evolutionary change has a way of being better than revolutionary change.

I believe the debate was worthwhile and placed in good faith by the Bloc. It is worthy of mention that there are all kinds of inequities in life, not just inequities of women. They may feel for one reason or another that their potentials are not realized. It is not just people of different ethnic backgrounds who feel that maybe their potentials are not realized because of that background. These things are not right and it is a value system that we all share.

We recognize that people should not be restrained from the opportunity of achievement because of any physical characteristic, whether they are women or because of their colour or because of their religion, or anything. It is the equality of opportunity that everyone feels is a right in a free society. Circumstance is earned. Provided we, as a society, ensure that everyone; women, men, young and old, have equality of opportunity, then we are on the right track.

Our challenge is to ensure equality of opportunity, that the ladder between success and failure is climbed by the amount of effort put into whatever opportunity is afforded.

I thank the House for the opportunity to put a few thoughts on the record. If anyone has any further comments, I would be delighted to entertain them.

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am anxious to comment on this debate because the whole question of women's inequality and what it means for violence against women forms very much a part of the work that I do as Minister of Justice on behalf of the government. I am happy that this issue has been put before the House today for discussion. I congratulate members of the Bloc for devoting this opposition day to such an important subject.

• (1725)

By way of comment, may I make it clear to my colleagues that the government is keenly aware of the findings of study after study in recent years which have addressed the issue of violence against women, and which have concluded almost invariably that violence against women is connected directly to the economic inequality of women. As a logical consequence, we will never effectively address violence against women until we come to grips with the causes of the economic inequality and correct them. It is surely a matter of common sense.

Most of the unpaid work done in our society is done by women, whether it is volunteer work or work in the home. There is a body of work done by Marilyn Waring, a New Zealand economist who has studied this phenomenon. She contends persuasively that until we find a way to collect census data to value the work done by women, we will never really have a true picture of their contribution to the economy of our society.

We must also bear in mind that women have a disproportionate responsibility for home and family. Despite the social changes of recent decades, preponderantly it is the woman who must take responsibility for the children and for maintaining a stable home environment for the family. They do so at an enormous cost to their professional aspirations, to their economic and financial opportunities. It is a cost that is often unfair, invariably beyond compensation. In the case of family break–up often it is the cause of real financial hardship.

When women do work too often they are consigned to the pink collar ghettos; clerical or secondary, supportive roles in the workforce that deny them the opportunities for fulfilment in the development and use of their full potential. We are told by those who keep statistics that 80 per cent of the clerical positions in the country are held by women. Even when they work in full time positions women earn 72 cents for every dollar earned by men in full time employment.

This ties directly to violence. Women are constrained to stay in abusive relationships by economic necessity for themselves and their children. Because they are in a disadvantaged category in society they do not necessarily have access to means of help to get out of those relationships, with tragic consequences for themselves and for the children.

This issue is of such significance and breadth that I cannot do justice to it in the few minutes allotted to me today. If there is anything I would record for the House before I sit down, it is the profound commitment of the government to do whatever it can in the mandate that the people have given us to address the issues we are discussing today.

In some small way we must start a process of broadening people's understanding of the questions, of working toward their resolution, of turning around the attitudes of people against violence against women and the economic inequality of women so that together, with a better understanding of the issue and a common resolve to see it addressed, we can improve the situation for the young women of Canada who will tomorrow come into their own.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): It being 5.30 p.m., it is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 81(19) proceedings on the motion have expired.

The House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

[English]

CANADA STUDENT FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE ACT

The House resumed from December 5, 1994 consideration of the motion.

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Madam Speaker, it gives me pleasure to address motion M–291 introduced by my leader earlier this year.

Today I would like to talk about education in the new economy. I would like to address not just the details of the income contingent loan repayment idea but how it fits into the bigger picture of training and learning in the new economy and what this means to younger Canadians.

The Journal Policy Options said last November:

> The observation that Canadian universities in 1993 are in a state of serious crisis is now commonplace. Nobody agrees more than administrations, faculty and students. A preoccupation with underfunding pervades every campus.

Yet the demand for university education is skyrocketing. In Saskatoon and Regina near my constituency it is becoming increasingly difficult not only to get into the universities but to get into the colleges that prepare students for university. Thousands of students are being turned away and this is a reflection of our changing economy.

Natural resources have always been part of our country's greatest asset. Our economic and social progress was financed with beaver pelts and fish, with logs and grain, with minerals, with oil and gas and with power generated by our rivers.

Times change. We are increasingly turning our raw natural resources into manufactured goods, everything from cars and snowmobiles to fish sticks and frozen french fries. It is a valued added, information based economy today and those who would tap into this new economy must have the know how and the skills to compete with countries all over the world.

Canada's old economy, labour intensive based on natural resources and basic manufacturing, is no longer able to pay for all the things we want as a country and is no longer providing the jobs we need.

The situation is not unique to Canada. The countries of the developed world are experiencing the most important economic shift since the industrial revolution, the shift to a knowledge based economy in which the brain power of our citizens is our most valuable natural resource.

Government can help to cultivate Canada's most important natural resource, to develop our country's intellectual infrastructure by helping young people get a quality education. Two direct ways to do this are to invest public funds in education, for example by distributing cash transfers through a voucher system, and the other by enabling Canadians to invest in their own education through an improved system of student loans.

For the first time in 40 years and only after the Reform Party brought up the idea, the Liberals are looking at the income contingent loan repayments as a realistic way to help finance post–secondary education.

Let us take a look at the proposals by the Minister of Human Resources Development. The Liberal social policy discussion paper points out that established program financing for education is currently frozen. This funding consists of $3.5 billion in tax points on $2.6 billion in cash. The government says the value of tax points will increase as the economy grows and because of this the cash transfer will taper off to zero in about 10 years if nothing is done. His discussion paper proposes an immediate elimination of the cash transfer and the implementation of a student loan system where repayment of the loans depends on income.

In question period some time ago the Minister of Human Resources Development said the growth and value of tax points represents an increase in education funding, but that is clearly not the case. The reality is the cost of education will probably grow at least as much as the value of the tax points and possibly quite a bit more. All other things being equal, the elimination of the cash portion of federal transfers would represent a funding reduction of over 40 per cent.

• (1735)

The government has recently figured out that we have a debt problem. It is encouraging that the Liberals are finally coming around to the Reform's way of thinking on income contingent loan repayments. A lot of work needs to be done. The crushing debt burden on Canadians, in particular the burden to young Canadians, will force them into more difficulty in the future.

What have we done for our young people lately? There is nothing more important to the future of our country than our young people. This is something politicians say every time they go to a campus or a high school, or otherwise make a political pitch for the youth vote. I say it, the Liberals say it and members of the Bloc say it. Talk is cheap.

Let us consider for a moment what we have done for our young people lately. By creating the national debt we have robbed from the next generation, our young people, to pay for today's consumption. I have said this across the country as I have travelled on the social program reform review. We have loaded off a tremendous debt on to our young people.

The government has spent tax dollars our grandchildren have not even earned yet. We have done something else. Through high debt and high taxes government has aided and abetted the decline of the Canadian job market. One result is that too many young people with degrees are flipping hamburgers or working as bartenders.

The spendthrift ways of our government have also crowded out education funding, resulting in a decline in the quality of education and higher tuition fees. Recently the Minister of Human Resources Development proposed eliminating the cash transfers in support of education altogether. Just a few months ago we saw students protesting hikes in tuition fees on Parliament Hill. As I said, talk is cheap.

We must realistically address the basic problems of the student loan system. Just as if unemployment insurance payments were reduced nationally, the welfare roles would swell. As post–secondary education funding to the provinces dwindled, tuitions rose and students turned more and more to student loans. More and more of them default when they cannot find jobs after university.

By 1992 loan defaults reached unprecedented levels. Almost one–third of outstanding loans were in default. Only two–thirds of those who had reached the repayment stage had begun to pay. Since 1964 the value of defaulted student loans has reached nearly $1 billion. The true cost of the student loan system to the taxpayer is also unrepresented because the government charges only simple interest on defaulted loans.

There is another problem with the present system which works hardship on students. Under the present system students must begin repaying student loans eight months after graduation whether they have a job or not, whether they have a high paying job or not. This leads to an onerous burden on some students and eventual loan defaults with collection costs, loan write–offs and general increased costs to the taxpayer.

Under the income contingent system students would begin repaying their student loan only after they had found a job with a minimum level of income. The federal government would collect the student loans back through the income tax system. This would mean that students would declare their social insurance number on their student loan forms.

If students were allowed the flexibility of repaying their loans over a longer period of time through the income they earn in the future, tuition fees could rise to allow an education of continuing high quality. Students would be able to afford the tuition fees as they could repay over a longer period of time.

An income contingent program would also allow fee structures in universities to be more flexible, introducing a greater element of supply and demand in the system. It would squeeze out the irrelevant and useless courses from our universities, which everyone agrees should be done. If students must pay something more like market value for an education they would choose courses more carefully and universities would begin to supply what was demanded by the market.

I hope this will encourage parents and grandparents to save in an RRSP type fund for their children and grandchildren because of the onerous costs which will be involved.

Mr. Tony Valeri (Lincoln, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to debate the hon. member's motion.

I know the hon. member appreciates the value of a good education and wants to ensure all Canadian students are given every opportunity to fulfil their education potential. On that point I am sure all members of the House are in agreement.

Education is a provincial responsibility. It always has been and always will be. Even though that is a given, the federal government recognizes its role in helping to make the post–secondary education system accessible to all Canadians wishing to participate in it.

The government would be acting irresponsibly if it did not consider support for post–secondary education in the context of our fiscal framework.

I remind the leader of the Reform Party that when the government began reviewing our social security system, we made it clear federal support to post–secondary education would have to be put to the best possible use because of limited resources.

That is still the case. Nothing has changed in that regard. The budget proposes to bring together transfers for health, post–secondary education and social services into a single bloc transfer.

This is a simple recognition of reality, not only the reality of fulfilling the mandate Canadians have given us to bring down our deficit but the reality that in the 1990s this will be a much more effective way for the provinces to administer federal funds that support social programs.

The government also supports post–secondary education through the Canada student loans program. When the government passed the Canada Students Financial Assistance Act last June, it introduced significant reforms to the Canada student loans program.

Intended to help students complete their post–secondary studies without undue hardship, the act provides for the repayment of student loans on an income contingent basis.

My colleagues from the Reform Party actively supported this provision. As a result, I am confused why my hon. colleagues are proposing such an amendment at this time.

Since the act was passed the government has consulted many parties on the concept of linking repayment of loans to income levels and that such a measure is still very much a possibility.

In its report to the House, the Standing Committee on Human Resources Development said that during its nationwide hearings it received energetic and concerned input from many educators in colleges and universities.

We can get a good handle on the desires of Canadians regarding federal support to post–secondary education by examining the committee's findings. The committee's report stated the fiscal situation of all governments precludes additional public spending on higher education in Canada.

The committee pointed out that because the government is reviewing its support for post–secondary education at a time when educational institutions are under increasing pressures, fiscal and otherwise, it must ensure scarce resources are used as efficiently and effectively as possible.

The committee noted that in debating federal contributions to PSE, it is essential to stress provincial jurisdictions over policies governing colleges and universities. It is important to help enhance the viability of colleges and universities while not interfering with provincial jurisdiction.

The committee's report reflects the broad views of Canadians on our post–secondary education system. I believe it is reasonable to ascertain from its input that the direction in which the government is moving has widespread support.

There is another aspect that I do not believe the hon. member's motion takes into consideration. Because of what I mentioned regarding the provincial jurisdiction over post-secondary education, the federal government, even if it had unlimited funds, has no authority to tell the provinces how they should spend current PSE dollars.

There is no equivalent to the Canada Health Act in this area. I would therefore urge the hon. member to make his views on improving the post-secondary education system known to provincial education authorities.

I assure him we would certainly welcome the support of the Reform Party and of all members in strengthening post-secondary education.

Here is the new reality. Beginning in the 1996-97 fiscal year we will consolidate the current transfers under the established programs financing and the Canada assistance plan into a single block fund to be known as the Canada social transfer.

• (1745)

In the first year the CST will be $26.9 billion. That is a drop of $2.5 billion. If we also consider the equalization payment, total major transfers will be only 4.4 per cent less than the current total. However cuts in all other areas of federal spending will be 7.3 per cent compared to the current system. In other words the government is doing what Canadians have asked us to do. We are getting our own house in order.

Equalization payments are not affected by the budget. Hence total cuts to those provinces with greater need will be less than the average cuts to all provinces. While councils that distribute research grants will be doing their share to help meet our deficit reduction targets, universities will still benefit from research grants totalling $900 million for research on medical issues, science and technology and the social sciences and humanities.

The government appreciates that the hon. leader of the Reform Party has brought forward the issue for debate. I assure the hon. member that the Minister of Human Resources Development will work in collaboration with the provinces to establish the shared principles and objectives for CST.

Post-secondary education will not be shortchanged by us or the provinces. We all recognize, as does the hon. member, that colleges and universities play a vital role in training a highly skilled workforce.

Therefore I would like to move an amendment to the motion:

That Motion M-291 be amended by deleting all the words after the word "system".

I urge the House to support the proposed amendment that would endorse the continued investigation of the feasibility of the ICR concept in the broader context of helping students cope with the debts they incur by investing in their own future.

[Translation]

Mr. André Caron (Jonquière, BQ): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to speak to the motion put forward by the hon. member for Calgary Southwest to amend the Canada Student Financial Assistance Act to include an income contingent loan repayment system. I am aware that my colleague from the Liberal Party has just moved an amendment but I do not think this will affect my discussion of the main motion since the amendment is consistent with the spirit of the motion by the hon. member for Calgary Southwest.

The hon. member favours an income contingent loan repayment system. We know that, under the current loan repayment system, loans are guaranteed by the government. A few months after graduation, the student starts repaying his or her loan according to a schedule set by the bank and at regular interest rates. In his first speech, the hon. member for Calgary Southwest pointed out that about 20 per cent of students had trouble repaying their debts under the current system.

Our Reform colleague's proposal links the annual amount and repayment period of the loan to the student's annual income. It also provides for debt collection through income tax.

• (1750)

At first glance, the proposal may seem attractive in the sense that it allows for some flexibility, which is a good thing for a person in debt. It is important that the system be flexible enough to allow for specific situations. Last week, the Quebec ombudsman noted, while referring to young people who have problems repaying their loans, that one of the main problems was that the banks currently do not have the required flexibility to take into account the situation of these young people, with the result that several of them have no choice but to declare bankruptcy. Obviously, some improvements could be made in that regard.

Collecting debts by using the tax system is also interesting in the sense that very few people can avoid the tax man. This would ensure that the debts incurred by young people for their education would be repaid.

However, when you think of it, that proposal is not as good as it may seem. It is seriously flawed in a number of ways. First, it is based on the principle that education is young people's responsibility. It is up to them to pay for their education, whether by holding a job or getting into debt. It becomes a case of every man for himself. It is the law of the jungle. Society admits to no responsibility toward anyone and leaves it up to each individual to fend for himself.

This is not the principle which led to the establishment of the current loan and scholarship program in Canada. It was felt that education was a right and that society had to help young people enjoy that right. It was also felt that education was a social investment. Young people benefit from school training. Just take a look at the figures on job placement and unemployment; they will confirm that. As well, all the personal development and culture gained by young people will prove very useful throughout their lives. But providing an education to young people is also a social investment. The richest and most advanced societies from a socio–economic point of view are those where young people get the best education.

The loan and scholarship program in Canada was based on these premises. The federal and provincial governments were guided by the following principle when they got involved in loans and scholarships: each young person has the right to an education and that education is a social investment. This is why, in Canada, we made sure to keep tuition fees rather low, compared to what they are in some other countries. It is a societal decision, a choice we made as a society because we believe that our young people should get an education for their own benefit and that of society as a whole.

Therefore, I cannot support the motion before us because the hidden agenda seems to be to have students pay their own way. It is particularly striking in the part of the motion that my colleague from the Liberal Party wants to delete, the part that talks about reducing the cost to taxpayers and charging accumulated interest. Basically, the motion put forward by the hon. member for Calgary Southwest arises from a concern to save money for taxpayers and make sure that the government withdraw as much as possible from education financing.

I think that there is a danger for students in there too and that is the danger of long–term indebtedness. Take for instance a student who has accumulated a debt of $15,000, $20,000 or $25,000 while in school. If this student has the misfortune to have trouble finding a job, if he has the misfortune to be poor, he is going to be in debt for a very long time. Perhaps 10 years, maybe 15 or even 20. He will not have much of a chance to get out of debt, especially if, as suggested by our colleague from the Reform Party, we charge him accumulated interest on his debt.

I think that the danger for our young people is long term indebtedness. This is also an indirect way of forcing us to go along with the underlying spirit of minister Axworthy's reform, i.e. shift the financial burden of education on to the students by reducing government assistance in the form of scholarships and asking students to go into debt to get an education.

I think that a proposal like this one could have a negative effect on motivation to pursue their education. My experience as a teacher tells me that positive reinforcement is important if we want our young people to be motivated to get higher education and I think that putting in place an adequate grants and loans scheme plays a major part in this. So, this is why I shall vote against the motion: because, in my opinion, it will institutionalize long term indebtedness for young people and it overlooks the need to maintain a scholarship system.

This motion also disregards the need to provide our young people with incentives to graduate as soon as possible, so as to keep government expenditures to a minimum. It is a matter of completing one's education in good time. If it takes three years to get a degree, take three years but not four, as some are tempted to do because they have to work their way through school.

To conclude, I think that what our young people need when they graduate is to find a good job they can live on and pay their school debts with, not to find themselves having to spend the next 10 to 15 years paying off debts.

[English]

Mr. McClelland: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I believe we have 10 minutes left to speak to the motion as 40 minutes were allotted.

Would it be in order for me to speak to the motion?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Right now I am dealing with the amendment. The House has heard the terms of the amendment.

[Translation]

Mr. Laurin: Madam Speaker, can you tell us exactly what is going on with this amendment at this stage? Was it put to the House?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): The amendment I have here is admissible. I just read it and we will add it later on.

Mr. Laurin: Is the amendment likely to be put to the House?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Yes.

• (1800)

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Human Resources Development, Lib.): Madam Speaker, let me begin by saying that as a government member I am somewhat perplexed by the motion put forward by the leader of the Reform Party.

A clear look at the changes and amendments we made in the Canada Student Financial Assistance Act will show that we included the concept and notion of an income contingent loan repayment system. I would point out to members of the Reform Party that subsection 15.0 of the Canada Student Financial Assistance Act currently provides for the repayment of student loans by borrowers on an income contingent basis.

Having said this, the government would like to take this opportunity to remind the House that thousands of students require financial assistance right now. A number of measures have been taken to help them in this regard.

It is important to remind the House that with the passage of the new Canada Student Financial Assistance Act in June last year, the government introduced important reforms to the Canada student loans program intended to support post–secondary education within a responsible fiscal framework. A number of these reforms are being phased in during the 1994–95 school year. The remainder will come into effect once the new act has been proclaimed.

I believe it is appropriate to remind the leader of the Reform Party and all hon. members about these measures which the government has taken to help students complete their education and become contributing members of Canadian society.

The loans limits had been frozen for 10 years, but they have now been increased. The weekly loan limit for full time students has moved from $105 to $165, an increase of approximately 57 per cent. The increase gives students up to $5,610 per school year, rather than $3,570. We also raised the ceilings on loans for part time students from $2,500 to $4,000. Part time students will no longer be required to repay the principal of their loans while they are studying. The changes give both young and mature students greater opportunities to fulfil their education.

Through consultations with the provinces and student groups, special opportunities grants for students with disabilities are being phased in. The government has allocated approximately $5 million in 1994–95 for these grants which will also be available next year.

The government is also working with the provinces to explore ways that would help ensure that students who must borrow the most are not burdened with debt loads above what they can repay. In so doing, the government wishes to provide an incentive for success.

As well, low income borrowers may be eligible for interest relief up to 18 months following completion of their studies. This applies to workers who are not earning enough money to meet their monthly student loan payments. Such a provision is currently restricted to borrowers who are unemployed or temporarily disabled. We are working with the provinces to apply the Canada student loans program with greater consistency and fairness.

Levels of assistance are being addressed according to the individual student's needs. Changes are easing the financial burden on low to middle income families whose children deserve every opportunity to complete their education. Specifically in this regard, the parental contribution table has been revised to ease the burden on families.

Over the next five years, students will benefit from loans and grants in excess of $6 billion. That is an increase of $2.5 billion over the previous five years. This additional investment will give more than 1.45 million students access to post–secondary education during this same period which is an increase of approximately 200,000 students compared to the last five years.

These new arrangements will reduce defaults and give students greater flexibility to repay and lower the costs for Canadian taxpayers. Lenders will now have more incentive to provide better services and offer income sensitive terms for repayment.

A more equitable system must go hand in hand with measures to reduce and control defaults. To that end, the program's eligibility criteria is being revised to emphasize results. Simply put, we will link financial assistance more closely to the student's successful completion of his or her studies. This will help to ensure the students who require financial assistance receive it.

Another aspect is we are collaborating with the provinces to develop consistent criteria for the educational institutions participating in the Canada student loans program. This too will ensure that aid is targeted wisely and costs are controlled.

The government is also carrying out discussions with lenders on new financing arrangements. The goal is to set terms that are realistic so borrowers will be able to repay their student loans relative to their income. This will improve the situation with respect to loan defaults, thus saving Canadians hard earned tax dollars.

One of the important things as members of Parliament is to relate the changes we make in this House to the community level, to the real lives and the real challenges that Canadians face. So that the people watching this debate have a clearer understanding of the type of impact it will have on their families, on the children and the students, I would like to give some brief illustrations of the type of positive changes we have introduced via the legislation cited earlier.

Let us take for example the case of Danielle who is attending the Technical University of Nova Scotia in Halifax. Danielle comes from a family of four whose annual income is $44,000. Danielle's family cannot afford to contribute to her higher education but she has managed to work during the summer and save approximately $1,800.

Her total assessed educational need is $7,400. Under the old method of assessing need, Danielle would qualify for only $2,600 in maximum aid. Under the new provision of the Canada student loans program, Danielle is now eligible for 60 per cent of her assessed need which is $4,440. That is an increase of $1,840. As for the remaining 40 per cent of assessed need, Danielle can apply to the province for additional assistance.

Or let us take the case of Greg, a student with a disability who is attending the University of Guelph. Greg comes from the city of Vaughan, Ontario where his family earns an annual income of $60,000. Greg's summer job enables him to put $2,700 toward his education and his parents are able to contribute $3,000. That gives him total financial resources of $5,700 and a total assessed need of $4,200.

Under the old system, Greg would qualify for a meagre $500 in aid, but under the new system at 60 per cent of assessed need he would qualify for a maximum of $2,520. However, Greg's disability means he is also eligible for a special opportunity grant of up to $3,000.

These are positive changes that I am sure will improve the quality of life for many students throughout Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): It being 6.10 p.m. it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put all questions necessary to dispose of Motion M–291 now before the House.

Mr. McClelland: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if I might have the unanimous consent of the House to speak to the bill for just a few moments.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): The House has heard the request. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): The member has two minutes.

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.): Thank you very much, Madam Speaker, and colleagues in the House. I would like to address two items concerning this motion. I think it is of significant importance to get them on the books.

The first item is on the amendment to the motion. While it appears fairly innocuous and since virtually everyone in the House is onside on this, it is rather unseemly that it be introduced so late. It does not bind the government anyway because it is just a motion.

The other point I would like to raise concerns the income contingent loan repayment. Information today in the Globe and Mail says that Alberta, Ontario and New Brunswick have decided they are not able to participate as it is presently written. Therefore, whatever we do with the income contingent loan repayment, which is a very good idea, the important element we must bear in mind is to be flexible.

As my colleagues know, we are going into a very difficult time financially. The future of our country depends on the ability of our young generation to be educated so they can use that education as a springboard for opportunity. Therefore, it is important that we look at the income contingent loan repayment in a very flexible, malleable manner if we have to change it. For instance interest may not be chargeable and that might be something we would look at.

I ask hon. colleagues to consider this.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): The first question is on the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea?

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Pursuant to order made earlier today, the recorded division stands deferred until Tuesday, March 21, 1995 at 5.30 p.m.

SITTING SUSPENDED

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Pursuant to the order made earlier today, the sitting is suspended to the call of the Chair.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I have the honour to inform the House that a communication has been received as follows:

Rideau Hall Ottawa,

March 16, 1995

Madam Speaker,

I have the honour to inform you that the Hon. Beverley McLachlin, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in her capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber today, the 16th day of March, 1995, at 9.10 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

Yours sincerely,

Judith A. LaRocque
Secretary to the Governor General

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod as follows:

Madam Speaker, The Honourable the Deputy to the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, the Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

• (2125)

And being returned:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I have the honour to inform the House that when the House went up to the Senate Chamber the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the Royal Assent to the following bills:

Royal Assent

Bill C-46, an Act to establish the Department of Industry and to amend and repeal certain other Acts—Chapter 1.

Bill C-74, an Act respecting the supervision of longshoring and related operations at west coast ports—Chapter 2.

[English]

It being 9.30 p.m., pursuant to orders made earlier this day, the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY—SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Mrs. Diane Ablonczy (Calgary North, Ref.) moved:

That, this House urge the government to recognize that the present social programs are failing and to investigate more secure options such as the Registered Personal Security Plan (RPSP), a system of personalized, tax-sheltered, RRSP-like savings accounts to which Canadians could contribute funds to be drawn during periods of unemployment, for personal upgrading/retraining and for retirement income.

She said: Mr. Speaker, It is a tremendous honour and privilege for me today to introduce to the House and to the Canadian public an innovative new concept which the Reform Party believes will help preserve long term personal security for Canadians.

With so much talk lately of cutbacks and change to social programs, citizens are naturally concerned that this will threaten the benefits they have been promised. Although the welfare state is crumbling, Reformers believe that we can work together to build a better and stronger way to provide for ourselves during times such as unemployment and retirement.

Today we place before the House a motion which addresses this vitally important issue of how best to preserve and protect the personal security of Canadians:

That, this House urge the government to recognize that the present social programs are failing and to investigate more secure options such as the Registered Personal Security Plan (RPSP), a system of personalized, tax-sheltered, RRSP-like savings accounts to which Canadians could contribute funds to be drawn during periods of unemployment, for personal upgrading/retraining and for retirement income.

The Reform Party unveiled its registered personal security plan proposal in our taxpayers budget which we released on February 21 of this year. This was as a direct result of a resolution passed by Reform members at our October 1994 assembly:

Resolved that the Reform Party investigate the feasibility of replacing the compulsory, government operated, privately funded taxpayer subsidized unemployment insurance program with a voluntary, personally financed, privately administered, government regulated registered unemployment savings plan.

Since then we have begun the process of discussion and consultation necessary to examine and test the idea both with experts and in the public arena. Through that process we will expand and refine our proposal and determine whether there is support for moving toward this entirely new way of meeting our personal security needs.

The first question Canadians watching this debate will ask is: what is an RPSP or registered personal security plan? Simply put, an RPSP gives us instead of government ownership and control of the moneys we pay into UI and CPP.

The second question Canadians might ask is: why do we need to change; what is the problem with the unemployment insurance program and the Canada pension plan we have now? I suspect that a lot of Canadians have already figured out the answer to this question.

They have seen the report that the CPP fund will run out of money in 20 years. They heard the finance minister in his budget promising a paper on the changes required in the public pension system to ensure its affordability. They know this means something is deeply wrong. It is the same sinking feeling they get when the doctor says: "We need to do a few more tests".

The finance minister also cut unemployment benefits. Of course this was all carefully worded by Liberal spin doctors. The cuts were styled as "unemployment insurance reform" which "will reduce the overall size of the unemployment insurance program by a minimum of 10 per cent".

In spite of this 10 per cent reduction in benefits, Canadian workers will still hand over the same amount of money to the government. The Liberal spin doctors dress this up by promising no increase in premium rates. One would hope not, considering the benefits are being cut.

It would have been more honest for the finance minister to come right out and say that benefits would be cut by 10 per cent or more. In spite of the coy wording, Canadians figured out that they are getting a smaller benefit for the same money. They worry that it will shrink a lot more as the government sinks deeper into debt.

Over the past 30 years Canadians have been promised that government will meet the lion's share of their most important security needs, but there is increasing evidence that these promises cannot and will not be kept. Our compulsory contributions to government programs have not guaranteed us anything. We are living on borrowed money and mortgaging our children's future to pay for government programs that are simply not working. We would all like to hope that these problems will somehow disappear but in our hearts we know they will not.

• (1010)

Government pension plans as currently constituted do not enhance social security. They pour it down the drain. The government as a pension manager is like an alchemist who can only change gold into lead.

There is something else to consider. Even if we were not losing programs, there are harmful social consequences from encouraging people to depend on government for their personal security. Canadians have a proud tradition of self–reliance, caring for our families and helping those less fortunate.

Many of our citizens have a strong desire to take back control of their resources, their futures and their own welfare. They are willing to be self–reliant and to show compassion for the needy. All they ask is that they be able to keep more of what they earn and that government exercise careful stewardship of necessary tax dollars.

If we move from failing social programs to a new plan, what will be the benefit? The greatest benefit is that your money will go into your own registered personal security plan, RPSP. The money is yours. The interest or profit from the investment of that money is yours. If you die, your loved ones get it. It is your property and your ownership of it does not depend on the management skills or financial health of government.

CPP and UIC turn taxes that are too high into benefits that are too small. The RPSP turns taxes into productive investments and productive investments back into social security. In addition, there are tremendous financial advantages to this type of plan.

Assume that an employee contributes five per cent to an RPSP account monthly, matched by five per cent from his employer. This is about the same amount as the present combined CPP and UI contributions. The employee works from age 20 to age 65. Also assume a moderate investment return of 8 per cent interest compounded quarterly.

A worker earning only $1,000 per month or only $12,000 per year would retire on $3,432 per month before tax for the rest of his life and would leave an inheritance of $514,812 for his family or other beneficiaries. This is someone who earns only $1,000 per month. No doubt this will be astonishing to many people because they have not realized how much more they could receive under an RPSP fund than under the government CPP and UI programs.

Let us look at what an average Canadian wage earner could expect from an RPSP. Someone earning $30,000 or $2,500 per month would retire on $8,580 per month before tax and would leave an inheritance of $1,287,031. Nothing like getting a huge raise when you retire.

The Reform Party will be providing Canadians with tables of such returns for different levels of income which demonstrate why they deserve a whole new system to ensure personal security.

Canada lags behind other countries when it comes to moving toward more rewarding and effective measures in this all important area.

A system similar to the RPSP plan was successfully implemented in the United Kingdom in 1978. Current pensioners were made secure at existing levels of benefits, while future pensioners were given a chance to move into the more attractive retirement option.

Britain's long term pension liability was reduced by more than 30 per cent in the first three years alone of the opting out plan's operation. This guaranteed that future taxpayers will not be overburdened as British baby boomers began to retire.

• (1015)

Chile successfully privatized its pension system more than 15 years ago, in 1981. Like Canada, an increasing number of Chileans were retired compared to citizens still in the workforce. The level of seniors' benefits was exceeding the level of contributions and, like Canada's CPP, Chile's pension plan was a pay as you go scheme.

Because the scheme was broke, Chile moved to a mandatory savings plan requiring employees to place a minimum of 10 per cent of their taxable income into tax sheltered individual retirement accounts managed by competing private sector financial managers.

The results have been remarkable. Private savings in Chile rose from 2.8 per cent of GDP in 1980 to 14.3 per cent in 1991. Very importantly, they have provided investment capital which has been pivotal in the near–miraculous financial renewal of Chile's economy.

I believe that the experiences of the U.K. and Chile provide evidence that there would be tremendous advantages to our own country in looking for similar, innovative solutions to some of the worrisome uncertainties about our own personal security which we see looming on the horizon.

These are some further benefits we see to moving our UI and CPP contributions into our own personal RPSPs. First, working Canadians would be gradually relieved of the burden of paying government pensions to those who are retired. As our population ages there will be far fewer working Canadians shouldering the cost of the benefit seniors have been promised.

In just 20 years the number of seniors will have increased by 40 per cent. At that time working Canadians will be trying to ensure their own personal security, pay staggering yearly interest rates on the debt we have run up, will still have our debt hanging around their necks like a millstone and, in addition, will be asked to pay our seniors' benefits since nothing has been saved up for that purpose.

Not only do we have an obligation to relive them of that burden to the greatest extent possible, we should ask ourselves whether it is fair that they should be asked to carry such an onerous and unfair load on our behalf. We would be wise to see this coming and fix the problem while we still can.

Second, RPSPs would provide Canadians with much greater retirement income than do the present plans. For example, a Canadian born in 1960 would receive only $2.60 for every dollar paid into CPP. For a Canadian born in 1980 the return drops dramatically to only 80 cents per dollar paid in, a dead loss.

By contrast, moneys invested in an RPSP at even 5 per cent interest would yield an average lifetime return of $3 for every dollar invested. CPP is misnamed. It is not a pension plan but a tax to redistribute income from workers to retirees. If it were a true pension plan, properly invested, it would not be in trouble, it would be rich.

Third, rolling UI premiums into RPSPs would provide substantially more security to the unemployed while also creating an incentive to remain employed. Canadians would have far greater control over their own unemployment income. They would have the security of knowing that their premiums are a long term, personal investment even if they are never unemployed.

The Canadian Institute of Actuaries has shown that after only eight years, UI contributions administered through an RPSP would provide the same level of benefits as the maximum under the current UI program. Of course in subsequent years the rate of growth in the RPSP rapidly out performs the return from premiums paid into the current UI program. In addition, workers would have the enormous satisfaction of control and responsibility for personal well–being.

Fourth, seniors could continue to earn income without having their retirement benefits clawed back as happens today with OAS.

Fifth, RPSPs would benefit the poor. Because UI and CPP contributions are taken off the top of their pay cheques low income Canadians do not have anything left to put into personal savings. Under the Reform RPSP, payroll deductions from CPP and UI would gradually be transformed into automatic payments into each individual's RPSP. This means that many working class Canadians would be able to own a personal security account for the first time ever.

• (1020)

Sixth, moving into RPSPs would generate an enormous pool of capital for productive investment in our country, resulting in a host of new employment opportunities. This would create far more jobs than government spending ever could. Although RPSP managers should be able to invest in government bonds at their own discretion, we would recommend that RPSP moneys should not be accessible by government.

Seventh, these personal security funds would be owned outright by Canadians as their personal property. They would not be vulnerable to government mismanagement or squandering. Prudent regulations would ensure sound investments managed by reputable firms. People do not want their retirement savings put into fur–bearing trout farms.

Eighth, RPSPs would allow and encourage Canadians to free themselves from disabling and uncertain dependence on government and government bureaucracy. A return to the ethic of self–reliance would enrich the spirit and vigour of citizens and the country as a whole.

We have begun the work of researching details which need to be addressed. We want to make the transition from the current unsustainable programs to personal RPSPs in a way which protects those already receiving benefits under the old plans. To achieve that we anticipate a long phase in period. We will decide whether any changes to the tax system are needed to move to RPSPs and we will demonstrate how a new direction in personal security will also benefit the poor in society.

Also to be explored is whether the RPSP should be expanded to provide a savings component to fund education and training and other security needs.

As the Reform Party continues to expand this new personal security concept, it will consult with a broad cross section of knowledgeable Canadians, including tax experts, actuaries, investment managers and technical researchers. It will also find a variety of ways to provide information to Canadians to encourage discussion and ensure an informed debate and decision at the end of the process.

This will include surveying citizens on what they need and want; holding open public meetings to present the concept and hear from Canadians; and creating a concrete proposal summarizing all the research and consultation, which Canadians will be able to judge.

In our view it is critical that we move now to carefully examine the issue of our personal security and options for the future. With every passing year the transition to a better and more workable solution becomes more difficult. This is because our population is aging rapidly. In addition, as our debt balloons and interest payments consume more and more of the national wealth every year, we lose needed financial flexibility to protect Canadians who already have retired or are nearing retirement.

The World Bank has also pointed out the urgent need to face the imminent problems of our old age security system. Just a few months ago in its report "Averting the Old Age Crisis" the World Bank urged countries with rapidly aging populations and costly welfare state social programs to shift to greater self–reliance and individual initiatives to meet personal security needs.

It is abundantly clear that all Canadians and especially their elected leaders and representatives need to take thoughtful and vigorous action to protect our future personal security and they must do so now. We are dismayed to see the Liberal government bitterly divided on where to take the country when it comes to this important issue. It has utterly failed to bring forward promised proposals for change.

It is disturbingly clear that the people in charge have absolutely no vision for constructive change to a crumbling social system. Canadians desperately need such a vision. They need hope that there is a way to deal with the disaster they see looming ahead and which they know will rob them of the security and protection that every single individual needs and expects.

It is for this reason that the Reform Party is doing everything it can to fill that need for our citizens. This is why it has come forward to introduce a proposal which it believes will provide a positive and beneficial solution to give hope to Canadians on this critical issue.

The experience of other countries in the world, the recommendations of experts and analysts and just plain common sense all lead to the conclusion that a dollar left in the hands of a mother, a father, a family, a student, a senior, a caring and compassionate Canadian is more productive and will provide far greater personal security than a dollar left to be managed by the federal government. Let us get on with the job.

• (1025)

I appeal to Canadians everywhere to examine the emerging concept of the registered personal security plan. Work together with us to shape its direction and determine its details. Do everything you can to ensure that your elected representatives support more workable and effective ways for you to manage your hard earned dollars, to provide needed security for yourself and your family.

I say to Canadians, it is your money, it is your country, it is your future. Reformers believe that registered personal security plans ought to be a part of that future but the status quo will never change unless we work together to make it happen.

I ask for your support as we move to find better alternatives for Canadians in the 21st century.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I listened with attention to the proposals of the member across the way.

It seems to me it is the Reform Party that is divided all over the map. The leader of the Reform Party is in Washington trying to distance himself a little from the right wing agenda. Meanwhile, Reform minions in Ottawa are still talking about the old agenda prior to his departure to Washington where he had somewhat of a conversion although we are not holding our breath in that regard.

I want to ask a question of the member under whose name that motion is today about the registered personal security plans that that party is offering as an alternative to Canadian social programs.

Does she not think there is something deficient in social programs where we do not have the advantages of pooled risk that we have when society as a whole takes care of social programs?

We cannot put money away unless we have money to start with. Our RRSPs are a form of tax shelter. In order to have a tax shelter, we must have money to shelter away to start with.

For people who do not have that, does the hon. member feel they should be condemned to a life of poverty? Does she not think as I do that instead we should have programs to enable people to have better futures, to enable people regardless of their socioeconomic background to improve in life?

Not all of us were born with gold spoons in our mouths.

Mrs. Ablonczy: Mr. Speaker, it is pretty clear that the Liberals are extremely worried about the fact that our leader is making an extremely positive impact in the country to the south of us. They know that Canadians also are waking up to the common sense, workability and hope that the Reform program offers. I know they are worried. They are trying to tear that down every chance they get, but Canadians are not going to be fooled.

If there were such great advantages to the pooled risks that the member suggests are present in our present programs, why is the benefit of these programs continually being eroded? The government said barely a week ago that unemployment insurance benefits would be cut by 10 per cent or more. Where is the great advantage to the pooled risk there?

This member says: "What about people without no money to squirrel away?" We are talking about how to manage the money we do put away better, UI premiums and CPP premiums. Most Canadians pay those, especially at some point in their life. They are being terribly mismanaged and wasted by the government programs that this member is trying to defend.

It is time Canadians woke up and started doing something better and safer with their money. We are proposing a plan to do that. We believe we will be supported by Canadians.

Ms. Judy Bethel (Edmonton East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, at my town hall meetings in Edmonton East over the past year—we have had many of them—talking about these kinds of reforms, this idea has never come forward. I guess the reason that it did not is that many in society are unable to save.

• (1030)

I see some real discrepancies. For instance, only 14 per cent of tax filers with incomes between $10,000 and $20,000 can make RRSP contributions. How will these people be able to make the savings that are requested? There are other discrepancies as well: 70 per cent of those with incomes above $80,000 contribute to RRSPs.

How can people who earn lower incomes prepare for potential catastrophic events?

Mrs. Ablonczy: Mr. Speaker, I am not surprised the idea has never come forward in Liberal meetings. It takes leadership to provide new ideas and that is exactly what is missing from the government.

I wish the member had listened to my speech. It would have helped her a great deal. In the speech I noted that workers earning only $1,000 a month, which is the working poor, by investing their UI and CPP forced contributions in RPSPs, would retire under the plan with $3,432 per month before tax. That is what will benefit the poor. No wonder they have no ability to save now. They are forced to pay these moneys to the government, which are mismanaged and poured down the drain. They have nothing left to save.

Why not let them keep their money and save it for this kind of return? It would be a tremendous advantage to the working poor. I believe the member will see that and support it if she examines the proposal objectively.

Mr. Dick Harris (Prince George—Bulkley Valley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I sat here in utter amazement as I listened to the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell ask how people were going to squirrel money away when they do not have any money.

That Liberal member could have answered his own question. He knows very well that over 60 per cent of the income of average working middle class Canadians is being paid out in taxes of all forms. It was a predecessor Liberal government that started the deficit and debt spending which was carried on by the Tory Party. Now we have almost a $500 billion debt and we are servicing that debt with about a $45 billion interest payment. If the incompetence of the Liberal Party back in the mid-seventies had not started this downward slide, Canadian taxpayers would have money left in their paycheques to provide for their own personal security.

It goes back to what we have been saying. It is not fiscally responsible MPs like the Reformers that are the biggest threat to social programs. It is the incompetence of previous governments and the high taxes we pay in the country.

The Deputy Speaker: I am not sure those remarks were aimed at the member who was speaking.

Ms. Susan Whelan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise in the House to debate the hon. member's motion. The hon. member says our social security programs are failing. I fail to see how the hon. member arrived at that conclusion.

Before we began reviewing our social security system we heard from Canadians loud and clear. They wanted us to retain these programs, programs that are interwoven into the social fabric of Canada. That hardly suggests failure. It does not mean, however, that Canadians thought we should just leave them as is.

The government recognized social security programs have served us well for many years but that it was time for an overhaul. It was time to make them relative to the needs of the population of the 1990s. That is why we undertook, with the support of the majority of Canadians, the first step in the process of social security reform.

Hon. members are well aware that we carried out massive consultations across the country. The Minister of Human Resources Development and the Standing Committee on Human Resources Development listened to the views of Canadians from all walks of life. More than 600 groups expressed their opinions on social security reform.

• (1035)

To break it down briefly for hon. members, 20,000 Canadians took part in more than 200 town hall meetings held by MPs from all parties. More than 40,000 people completed and returned social security reform workbooks. We held a series of seminars where there was broad public discussion in 25 communities across the nation. The Minister of Human Resources Development has received more than 3,000 letters from citizens expressing their views on social security reform. Over 7,000 people have accessed the minister's Internet bulletin board on social security reform and more than 35,000 people have called the social security reform hotline to request information or material.

Hon. members will also recall that some of the hearings were rambunctious affairs, to say the least. While it is true that those who voice strong opinions may indicate disagreement with some program policy, one thing it certainly does not indicate is complacency. Canadians care about their social security programs.

The government realizes it must move ahead with social security reform in a timely and orderly fashion. The budget confirms this point. We know from the excellent budget presented by the Minister of Finance, a budget that is getting higher ratings than "Hockey Night in Canada", that Canadians agree reform of our social security system is moving in the right direction.

We said from the beginning that meaningful social security reform could only take place in the context of a responsible fiscal framework. The budget has given us that framework. The budget clarifies that effective reform of our social security programs is absolutely essential, given that we must operate with limited financial resources. Let me put to rest the unfounded rumours that social security reform is dead. It is anything but dead.

Here is where we are at. We have completed the very successful consultation process. The government is now studying the excellent report of the standing committee. Now that the budget has given us the fiscal parameters within which to operate, the next phase is to carefully develop an overall design.

In other words, it is time for the architecture. The architecture comes before we start rebuilding the programs. It is a logical process. We need to develop a new structure before we abandon the old or the current one. A key part of the process will be consultations between the Minister of Human Resources Development and the provinces. These consultations will seek to establish national principles.

The government believes that Canadians are equal in every part of this great nation. We will strive to ensure that national principles apply to social security programs for all citizens.

Canadians told us that one of the key areas for reform was the unemployment insurance program. Using the input we have received we intend to develop proposals for the UI program that take into account the views of hardworking men and women.

We have already begun to act. Hon. members will recall that the government had enough foresight last year to make provisions that began January 1 of this year. If the government had not acted, UI premiums would have risen to $3.30. Instead they were reduced to $3. It is estimated that the payroll tax relief will create or preserve 40,000 jobs. We will be able to put additional savings from UI reform toward improved employment development services.

There is more good news on the reduction of UI premiums. The economy is performing extremely well and we have every reason to believe it will continue to do so. For that reason we expect to reduce premiums again, possibly next year but certainly by 1997. I want to stress, however, that the government has not yet determined the amount of any cut to the premium rate. The figures we read in the press are only forecasting estimates.

We plan to move ahead with UI reform this fall. As the budget clearly stated, we intend to have new UI legislation in effect no later than July 1, 1996. It is true that we are shooting for at least a 10 per cent target reduction in program expenditure. How fast we reach that target will depend upon the continued good health of the economy. It will depend upon program details that UI officials are currently working on.

While reform of the social security system is an ongoing process, we know it will function more effectively and with significantly reduced administrative costs as part of the new Canada social transfer. The popularity of the budget tells me that Canadians are very excited about the innovative possibilities and the flexibility that the provinces will have to address the needs of their particular residents under CST.

• (1040)

Again I stress national principles and objectives will be very much a part of the new Canada social transfer. The Minister of Human Resources Development will be inviting all provincial governments to work together on developing a set of shared principles and objectives to provide a solid framework for the new CST. This is one way that all governments can reaffirm their commitment to the social well–being of Canadians.

I think all hon. members will agree that the best form of social security is a well paying, rewarding job. Social security reform is very much a part of the government's job and growth agenda.

With that in mind the Minister of Human Resources Development is bringing together the current programs that support Canadians in preparing for and attaining employment. They will be consolidated into a new human resources investment fund. The fund will pool resources from existing programs to develop a more coherent approach, establish priorities and make use of the best tools available to ensure Canadian workers find stable employment.

The human resources investment fund will take a hard look at the role of the federal government. We will ask ourselves what we should be doing and determine the best way to eliminate overlap and duplication. Streamlining and consolidation will mean some savings in the coming two fiscal years. The result will be that federal employment related programs will make the most efficient use of available resources.

The new programming will recognize clear and distinct roles for the federal government and the provinces. We will co–operate with the provinces to deliver services effectively and at the lowest cost possible to Canadian taxpayers. Together we can ensure that Canadians are capable of functioning at a high level in the rapidly expanding global economy.

We all know that today's motion is based on the ill conceived quasi–budget of the Reform Party and that document in turn owed more than a little to the Reform minority report on social security reform which contained proposals that the member proposing today's motion conceded were not thought through very well before they were rushed into print.

I am most concerned by the Reform's so–called proposals. After examining them it is clear to me that these are old knee–jerk ideas that would move us backward, not forward. I cannot see how Reform's proposals would help Canadians find meaningful employment and reduce social ills such as child poverty.

The Reform Party has come up with the catchy title "Taxpayers' Budget". However when Canadian taxpayers get a close look at it they will see that if we adopted it taxpayers are the ones who would be snagged.

First let us look at the subject of today's motion, the registered personal security plan or RPSP. As I understand it, Reform wants to replace UI, OAS, CPP and some health, education and training programs with an individually based savings plan. This means that when sickness or unemployment strike or when they take their retirement, Canadians will be expected to rely on their own means and the risk pooling features of our current social programs would disappear.

Obviously lower income Canadians would be much more adversely affected by the proposal. I can see nothing in it except for the very well off who would have yet another instrument for feathering their nest egg.

Next let us take Reform's proposals for UI. The party suggests cutting $3.4 billion from the UI program. That is easy to do on paper but the result in real terms would phase out maternity, parental and sickness benefits as well as the fishermen's program. The measure alone would take away maternity benefits from more than 160,000 new mothers, sickness benefits from 150,000 workers who are temporarily unemployed, and badly needed benefits for 30,000 fishermen.

Who will shoulder the burden to help these individuals? Removing regional benefits would affect 1.3 million unemployed workers, which is more than 50 per cent of UI claimants. The Reform Party would slash income support by $4.5 billion. This blanket insensitive approach would drain billions out of the provincial economies—hardly what I would call a responsible move.

This is not what Canadians want. As I have already outlined the government intends to revitalize its UI program. We need to look carefully at how and why people use unemployment insurance and then make adjustments accordingly. We will not wipe out key social benefits like those for maternity leave.

• (1045)

The Reform Party tries to put forward a social conscience with its principle of equality contributions. Its taxpayers' budget states the burden of reduction must fall least heavily on the most vulnerable members of society.

There is no doubt that all hon. members share those sentiments. The trouble is Reform's proposals would have exactly the opposite effect. Instead of helping those most in need, the taxpayers' budget would cut seniors' pensions by $3 billion. How will this measure help vulnerable seniors meet the cost of living?

Reform also proposes that the government eliminate all regional differentiation. How will this help the poorest regions of the country? It also suggests cutting aboriginal programs by 24 per cent. Someone will have to explain to me how this measure will help our aboriginal brothers and sisters who are quite possibly the neediest group in Canada.

The Reform Party's budget suggests cutting the Canada assistance plan transfer payments by 34 per cent and equalization payments by $3 billion, a 35 per cent cut. If the government did that I acknowledge it would certainly lessen the burden on federal coffers. Unfortunately it would devastate the poorest regions of the country. It would place the burden of deficit reduction on the most vulnerable members of society. It would contradict Reform's stated philosophy.

Cuts like these would not renew our social security system. They would outright destroy it. Reform's approach to deficit reduction is simply reckless. It is easy to be reckless when one is not in the driver's seat.

What about the proposal to slash $3 billion from seniors' pensions? The Reform does not provide any details on this proposal maybe because if it had done so it would have had to tell elderly Canadians that more than half of them would see their benefits cut and low income seniors would be among the losers.

The government's approach is to review the needs of seniors into the next century and determine how best to meet those needs. We are not saying there should be no changes. We have never said that. However, a responsible government examines the repercussions of changes before taking action, and that is what we are doing.

Reform wants to replace old age security and the Canada pension plan with an RRSP and registered personal security plan system. The concept has already been tried in the United States. It is called a personal bank account. It actually works very well provided one is fortunate enough to be wealthy. Those less fortunate are out in the cold.

The Liberal Party's policy is for a sound and efficient income system that provides a balance between public pensions and private arrangements. In other words, the government's philosophy on retirement combines realism with compassion, something the Reform Party should thing about.

The Reform Party should also think its proposals through before presenting them and should come clean on how much impact it would have on the lives of Canadians and the social fabric of this great nation.

The government certainly welcomes constructive suggestions from hon. members on the opposite side of the House. The proposals we see in the Reform Party's taxpayers' budget are so poorly thought out that it simply does not give us anything valid to work with.

The popularity of the budget by the Minister of Finance speaks for itself. Canadians recognize that in order to retain strong, viable social programs we have to find the financial resources to fund them. That is why Canadians support the direction the government is taking. With the Canada social transfer we are entering a new era of social policy that will streamline our social security system and bring us into the 21st century.

As a nation that enjoys one of the highest standards of living, there is no doubt in my mind Canadians reject the simplistic notion embodied in today's motion. They know the government is committed to the renewal of Canada's great legacy of social programs. I am sure they share my belief that the Reform Party is in no position to enact the motion before us today.

Mr. Ken Epp (Elk Island, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to this speech. There were a couple of anomalies within it which we should think about.

• (1050)

She indicated this was an old thinking, knee–jerk reaction. To me that is an oxymoron. Knee–jerk is something not thought of before.

The principles we are espousing are based on both experience and thinking. We have found the country did best when there was the least amount of government, when there was less intrusion. To now say we should once again use those principles of self–sufficiency and encourage people to look after themselves and making it possible for them to do that is not knee–jerk. That is good, solid thinking.

The member said Canadians reject this. She said that several times. That is not my experience. I have shared this concept with a number of people for over a year. I am pleased the ideas we had are now coming forward in the House. I have yet to hear a single person indicate anything but enthusiasm for this concept.

With respect to the reduction of old age security benefits, the member made mention that Reform is saying we are going to cut back. I want to make it very clear, I want everyone to know we are forced into this, not by what Reform is doing but what governments over the last 30 years have done. We have run out of money and the Reform policy is to target the remaining money, as little as there is, to those who have true need.

When we are talking about reducing old age security, we are talking about reducing to those who do not need it because they have an income over the national average.

We would be most honest with Canadians if we were to say the Canada pension plan is at risk because we will not have the money. That is the result of Liberal and Conservatives governments. That has to come to an end.

Ms. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has not heard the Prime Minister mention on several occasions that the taxpayers' budget proposed by the Reform Party has forgotten to take into account that our population is aging. The costs of old age security for our seniors will rise every year. It is not in the Reform budget. Maybe the member should take a look at that part and think it through.

The Reform Party constantly claims over and over again that it represents the people, the interests of Canadians and listens to polls and to to Canadians. When 80 per cent of Canadians respond telling us they support public programs for elderly care, does that not send a message to the Reform Party? It should send a message to a party that claims to represent the people. When it hears that 77 per cent support public programs for child care and other programs, does that not send a message? I would think it sends a message.

I would ask the Reform Party to take a look at our budget. Our budget talks about the problems we are going to face. It talks about the fact that we have to deal with old age security and all of our social programs, especially relating to our seniors. The budget has the foresight to deal with that.

Perhaps the Reform Party should actually read the budget.

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, our budget does take into account the fact that the population is aging and that our social programs are unsustainable.

The hon. member should realize that in a few short years we will be paying up to 15 per cent of our income into the pension fund alone to meet the expectations of those retiring in a short time.

The member said social security programs are anything but dead. The studies by the Liberal government show the pension plan is in big trouble. There is less than two years of funds in the pension fund for payouts. The liability in this fund is about as great as our national debt, at over $500 billion. That is the liability in this fund.

• (1055)

This does not give Canadians security. It should be immediately obvious to everyone in the House when you have that kind of liability it is not sustainable, the opposite of security.

If individuals had been contributing into a self-managed fund, they would now have more security. The proposal we are putting forward gives the poor people a lot more security than they presently have with the mismanaged pension fund run by the government.

Does the hon. member feel it is worth exploring a means by which we could make a transition from the present unsustainable system to a more secure system that gives individuals more control over their future? Does she not think this concept is worth exploring?

Ms. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I guess the hon. member was not listening. In the budget the finance minister talked about the fact that we need to review our programs for our seniors.

We have a system in Canada developed by Liberals, a system that met the needs of the 1960s and the 1970s when it was introduced; a system we are trying to up date that will meet the needs of the 1990s and the 21st Century. That is what this Liberal government does and that is what this Liberal government is about. That is what we will do.

The hon. member is not aware, obviously, how programs work in other countries. I am very familiar with how they work. I have an aunt who lives in the United States. I know what happens when you become a senior citizen. I know what happens to programs you have paid into for four years and benefits that are cut off over time. I understand how that system works because I live with that system every day due to a family member who has an illness.

I ask the Reform Party to do a little research into its suggestions before it puts them forward and that it realize what the Liberal government is trying to do.

We recognize things have to change. We started the social security reform and we started the human resources consultations over a year ago. Members on that side took part in them. We are not afraid of that. We are aware of that. We mentioned in the red book that we would deal with the systems and that we would make changes and that is what we are going to do.

The Speaker: It being almost 11 a.m. we will now go to Statements by Members.

JEREMY FREIBURGER

Mr. John Bryden (Hamilton—Wentworth, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, earlier this week a young man in my riding, while driving at night, was in collision with a trailer portion of a tractor trailer which had turned across the highway. He had no chance to apply the brakes and hit the trailer squarely in front of the rear wheels. The crash impact squashed the roof of the car flat and it took a crane to free it from underneath the trailer.

Firemen who arrived at the scene did not believe that anyone could have survived. Inside the wreckage, jammed beneath an air bag and squeezed on all sides by twisted metal, 18 year old Jeremy Freiburger still lived. Not only did he still live, but when at last he was cut out of the vehicle by the jaws of life, he was uninjured, save for a few cuts and bruises.

His parents were ecstatic with joy. Let this story remind us that life is precious and miracles do happen.

ST. PATRICK'S DAY

Mr. Réal Ménard (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve, BQ): Mr. Speaker, today, March 17, is St. Patrick's Day and we want to share the pride of those hundreds of thousands of Canadians and Quebecers of Irish descent whose ancestors left their country in often difficult circumstances to find a new home among us.

With the intermingling of people over time, many of us now have friends and relatives of Irish origin. Their presence has enriched our lives and our societies.

We salute the invaluable contribution of the Ryans, Lanigans, Regans, O'Reillys, Johnsons, Kirkpatricks, Rowans and many others to the development of Quebec and Canada.

Happy St. Patrick's Day everybody!

MULTICULTURALISM

Mrs. Anna Terrana (Vancouver East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in British Columbia we have just completed multicultural week, a week of immersion into the understanding of other cultures, a week of sharing with people of all backgrounds.

Next week on March 21, British Columbia and the rest of Canada will celebrate International Day for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination. On March 21, 1966 in South Africa, a group of people holding a peaceful march were shot at and killed.

[Translation]

March 21 has therefore been designated by the United Nations as International Day for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination. Next week, all Canadians will celebrate that day with special ceremonies, and people of all cultures will meet again to learn from one another.

Today, despite the visibility of human rights at the international level, too many tragedies occur throughout the world and discrimination continues to exist.

[English]

Let us hope that events like International Day for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination and Multicultural Week will help with the respect of human rights all over the world and bring peace.

SHIPPING INDUSTRY

Mr. Herb Grubel (Capilano—Howe Sound, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the type of labour management crisis crippling Canada's shipping industry happens all too frequently. This has to be prevented in the future.

This objective can be achieved without labour legislation. The government only has to declare existing railbeds a common carrier accessible to any railroad company. As a result, shippers can switch from the use of struck railroads to others that are still operating.

In addition, the government should remove all restrictions on the use of shipping routes. As a result, if the docks in one city are tied up in a labour dispute, docks in other cities can be used.

Under these conditions, labour disputes in the shipping industry will become extremely rare. The employers and workers know well what the market will bear. Industries hitherto protected from competition by government granted monopolies and regulation are exposed to the healthy winds of competition. They can no longer hold the Canadian public ransom.

I personally urge the Minister of Transport to propose such legislation and deregulation. It can be enacted quickly.

SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. Andy Mitchell (Parry Sound—Muskoka, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today to congratulate the finance minister for a budget that keeps Canadian small businesses competitive.

In my riding of Parry Sound—Muskoka as in the rest of the country, small business ventures are often the key to the economy. This budget encourages small business growth. It encourages job creation. It encourages prosperity.

The recent budget is but one part of our government's strategy of jobs and growth. It is already paying dividends. Let us look at some examples.

First, the value of manufacturing shipments was $33.1 billion in January, up 25 per cent in just one year. Second, Statistics Canada's index of leading economic indicators, a measure of future economic growth, was up .5 per cent in February. Third, the manufacturing sector in February created over 53,000 new jobs.

We have, as a government, been successful in creating a climate in which small business can create jobs for Canadians. The minister's budget will accelerate—

AIR CANADA

Mr. Maurice Dumas (Argenteuil—Papineau, BQ): Mr. Speaker, a while ago, Air Canada put ads in major Canadian newspapers, inviting anyone interested in a temporary or permanent position in Toronto to apply.

The ad said that ideally candidates should speak English and French as well as another language such as Japanese, Korean and Mandarin, but that Air Canada would consider applications from individuals who spoke English and one of those other languages.

Bloc members are appalled at Air Canada's move, relegating the French language to a position of secondary importance, as in fact the knowledge of English is the only qualification required for the job.

Let us not forget that, despite privatization, Air Canada remains subject to the Official Languages Act and, therefore, we demand that the provision of the act guaranteeing the respect of the French language be enforced.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Brent St. Denis (Algoma, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as a member of Parliament for a rural riding in northern Ontario, I am well aware of the great concern being expressed by the legal gun owning community in regions all across Canada.

I have met with over 1,000 constituents on this matter and have received an even greater number of letters and phone calls. We can only conclude from this that we must find the proper balance between rural and urban needs on the issue of crime control through gun control.

I am calling on my colleagues who represent urban ridings to hear the message from rural Canada that the law–abiding gun owning community not be the victims under any new gun laws. Rather, let us become partners in the fight against crime and continue to create together the peaceful and secure country we all want.

I will continue to bring forward the concerns of my constituents. They deserve to be heard.

• (1105)

I trust we can all work together to produce common sense firearms measures so that just maybe we can put this issue to rest once and for all. That is the goal I have set for myself as Algoma's MP.

GUN REGISTRY SYSTEM

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this statement was inspired by Professor Taylor Buckner from Concordia University in his letter to the Globe and Mail on January 30.

In 1994 the RCMP reported there were 151 incidents of police being accused of misusing confidential data. Further, the RCMP were unable to stop this misuse. This is the same database in which the justice minister proposes to list all firearms and their owners.

The RCMP admission proves that the gun registry system could be illegally accessed by criminals to quickly identify those homes with guns and those without. If they want to steal guns they will break into a gun owner's home while the owner is away. If they want to steal valuables or just trash a house they will break into the unarmed homes anytime they want.

Gun control makes crime easier for criminals, not harder. Split Bill C–68 and give—

YUDE HENTELEFF

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to recognize in the House today Mr. Yude Henteleff of Winnipeg who has been selected to receive a citation for citizenship.

Mr. Henteleff's commitment to improving the lives of special needs individuals has significantly enhanced the lives of many in Manitoba.

As past president of the Learning Disabilities Association of Canada, Mr. Henteleff has worked assiduously to ensure that children and adults with disabilities receive the services they require.

Mr. Henteleff's efforts in championing the human rights of the mentally handicapped and promoting the integration of disabled persons in our society are truly admirable and make him more than deserving of the citation for citizenship.

On behalf of all my colleagues, I congratulate this man who is making society better.

ST. PATRICK'S DAY

Mr. John O'Reilly (Victoria—Haliburton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today is March 17, St. Patrick's Day. There are two types of people in the world: those who are Irish and those who wish they were.

St. Patrick was famous for driving the snakes out of Ireland. Prime Minister O'Chrétien is famous for driving the Tories out of Ottawa.

Happy St. Patrick's Day from the Irish.

OFFICIAL RECORD

Mr. Benoît Sauvageau (Terrebonne, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in his ruling concerning the question of privilege raised by the Leader of the Official Opposition, the Speaker of the House of Commons mentioned that he had found troubling anomalies in the transcription of the deputy prime minister's comments.

It is unacceptable for members of this House, and especially the deputy prime minister, to tamper with the transcription of our deliberations in order to change the meaning of their public statements.

This practice is all the more reprehensible—

The Deputy Speaker: Members are not permitted to comment on the Speaker's rulings.

THE LATE JILL BROWN

Ms. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today our community mourns the death of a courageous woman.

Jill Brown was honoured in this city as a businesswoman, a fundraiser and contributor to numerous charities, as a city councillor, and as a wife and mother.

Yesterday Jill Brown ended her life as she lived it: spirited, defiant, taking charge, refusing to let the leukaemia that had devastated her for over a year decide the time of her death.

I shared with Jill the privilege of representing the people of Britannia ward on city council. She came to know, love and respect them. They in turn loved and respected her.

I convey to her family, her husband Brian, her children, Shannon, Michael and Chris, our condolences.

PRIVATE UTILITIES INCOME TAX TRANSFER

Mr. David Chatters (Athabasca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Natural Resources was quoted as saying that Ottawa may not be able to tax crown owned utilities, but she would like to hear ideas on how to put them on level ground with investor owned electricity and natural gas utilities.

• (1110)

I know for a fact that a coalition of privately owned utility companies from across Canada sent this minister a copy of their document entitled: "Equitable Tax Treatment for Utilities in Canada". It represents a fair alternative that would increase the utility costs by less than 1 per cent for all Canadians instead of a 7.5 per cent increase for Albertans and Nova Scotians as proposed in the budget.

If the minister really is serious about fairness she would seriously consider their ideas before she cuts the private utilities income tax transfer. She would also advise the Minister of Finance to commit to doing this when he meets with Calgary's mayor today.

CANADIAN FEDERATION OF STUDENTS

Mr. Mauril Bélanger (Ottawa—Vanier, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as the member for Ottawa—Vanier I have the honour of representing the University of Ottawa in this House. The students' federation of the university is about to hold a referendum on whether or not the students wish their campus to maintain its membership in the Canadian Federation of Students.

In its eagerness to have the university remain a member, the CFS may have given the students less than completely accurate information to encourage them to vote yes in the referendum. The federation has claimed that it, the CFS, has forced the Liberal government to stop the social security review.

The students of the University of Ottawa and students across the country should know that the social security review is moving forward. That means the government is still committed to finding better ways of working, learning and providing security for those in need of it.

MOCHOVCE NUCLEAR POWER PLANT

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops, NDP): Mr. Speaker, the European Bank of Reconstruction and Development is about to make a crucial decision about the financing of the Mochovce nuclear power plant in Slovakia.

Expert sources indicate this nuclear reactor is neither environmentally nor economically viable. Along with its technical flaws and overall concern for safety, the energy output of this nuclear reactor is not necessary to either the current or future needs of the people of Slovakia.

The European parliament, many countries, and all major environmental groups in Europe, the United States and Canada are calling for a delay or cancellation of this nuclear project. Furthermore, more than half the Slovakian population oppose the construction of nuclear power plants.

For Canada to vote in favour of this project would not only waste Canadian tax dollars in a very dangerous energy megaproject but would also subject the people of Slovakia to a huge debt load.

I urge the Government of Canada to vote against this proposal and not waste Canadian tax dollars.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in the House I asked for clarification from the agriculture minister on exactly who the Crow payment is intended to benefit: landowners or actual farmers. I did not receive an answer to this very basic question. This is extremely frustrating since western Canadian farmers have a number of other questions they would like this government to answer as well.

For example, is the purpose of the $1.6 billion payout to compensate for losses in land value, or is it meant to be a transition fund for farmers who have lost the Crow benefit but are still shipping grain? What accommodations have been made within the phase out plan for renters and lessors? How will the money be paid to farmers? When can farmers expect to receive the money? Specifically, what measures will be taken to allow the system to become more efficient and to give farmers more flexibility in marketing?

The government must not keep western Canadian farmers in the dark on these issues any longer. Farmers must be able to plan with certainty and recoup some of the losses which will result from these cuts.

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger Simmons (Burin—St. George's, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the turbot is a miserable looking little fish. Who in his or her right mind would have ever thought it could have rallied an entire nation and why? Because the latest pillaging of fish stocks by Spanish trawlers has become the straw that has broken the camel's back.

Enough is enough, say Canadians. Canadians right across this country now realize that Newfoundland and Atlantic fishermen and plant workers are the unwitting victims here, not the lazy hangashores they have been portrayed as over the years.

The government of this country has finally done what any government worth its salt should have done years ago when I first raised the matter seven years ago in this House. For that, I thank the Prime Minister for keeping his election promise on this issue. I congratulate my friend and colleague, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, for his handling of the issue.

PEACEKEEPERS

Mr. John Richardson (Perth—Wellington—Waterloo, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to Canada's peacekeepers.

Since 1956 Canada has taken part in almost every United Nations peacekeeping operation. With good reason Canadians are proud of our participation in these forces. Since 1947 more than 90,000 Canadians have participated in peacekeeping missions.

• (1115)

As I speak more than 3,000 Canadians are currently deployed somewhere in the world as part of peacekeeping operations. These proud soldiers made up of part time reservists and full time regulars have given Canada a proud name in this sphere.

In the former Yugoslavia alone more than 2,000 Canadians are working in the most strenuous situations and are performing admirably under the strain.

Over the period of three years approximately 300 of the soldiers serving have been reservists. It is Canada's reserves that are demonstrating the ultimate commitment in the battles of patriotism and duty.

I salute the Canadians currently in peacekeeping operations. Canada's great traditions of patience, forbearance and commitment are safe in their hands.

CANADIAN ADVISORY COUNCIL ON THE STATUS OF WOMEN

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the government. I do not know to whom it is directed, but someone will surely rise to give an answer.

Yesterday, the Deputy Prime Minister said that to avoid patronage and prevent order in council appointments of friends of the government, the government decided to abolish the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women. That is what she said, although it is rather surprising.

Considering the important role played by the Advisory Council on the Status of Women, would the Deputy Prime Minister or another member of the government not agree that it was not absolutely unnecessary to abolish the council in order to avoid partisan order in council appointments and that the government should simply have opted for another appointment process that would guarantee the arm's length position of the members?

[English]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as part of our effort to have a government that is efficient and effective and very conscious of expense, the government has decided to merge these various programs under the very capable leadership of the Secretary of State for the Status of Women. I think this will turn out to be a very effective use of the necessary resources.

The hon. member is always talking about the need to avoid overlapping and duplication. I am surprised he is not praising this initiative because it is exactly along the lines he is calling for, the avoiding of overlapping and duplication.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am sure you understand why I will have to repeat my question. As for eliminating duplication, there are whole federal departments we could get rid of, not an advisory council that serves the status of women, but whole departments that duplicate the work done by provincial departments. We have a few suggestions for the government if it needs some help in this area.

Are we to infer from what the Deputy Prime Minister said that the committee appointed by the government to review the CRTC's decision on direct tv broadcasting, consisting of Gordon Ritchie, Roger Tassé and Robert Rabinovitch, is a committee appointed by order in council, thus involving friends of the government who are responsible for reaching a decision where several billion dollars are at stake, a decision that concerns all Canadians?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member wants to be logical, but where is the logic in his questions when he complains about our merging women's programs and at the same time criticizes duplication and overlap?

Once again, if the hon. member wants to be logical, I would ask him to support our decision, so that women receive the kind of support they need.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, let us get this straight. We referred to a statement by the Deputy Prime Minister in which she said that the Advisory Council on the Status of Women was abolished because it was a hotbed of patronage, because these were order in council appointments, and that the best way to avoid that was to abolish the council. That is what we are talking about.

That being said, since, as the Deputy Prime Minister admitted, order in council appointments are partisan appointments and cabinet still insists on appointing the government's ethics counsellor, would the government not agree that it should change its approach, act on the opposition's request and have the ethics counsellor appointed by the House of Commons instead of by order in council?

• (1120)

[English]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has been opposition House leader for some time now. He should know that is not a supplementary question.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Roger Pomerleau (Anjou—Rivière-des-Prairies, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Again yesterday, the Minister of Canadian Heritage stated the following: "Radio-Canada, my source, confirmed that no cuts were announced. I assume this means no staff cuts or layoffs have been decided". However, all the papers announced yesterday that 750 positions would be abolished at Radio-Canada as the result of the cuts imposed by the government.

Can the Minister of Finance confirm that Radio-Canada will face cuts of $350 million over three years as Vice-President Michèle Fortin reaffirmed on Monday?

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we know that Radio-Canada's management will be well able to meet this challenge. No one here underestimates the challenges facing the CBC. In the end, Canadians will continue to enjoy the high quality broadcasting the CBC is famous for.

Mr. Roger Pomerleau (Anjou—Rivière-des-Prairies, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question.

Would the Minister of Finance confirm that the government had told the CBC that the cuts for the three coming years would be $44 million, $96 million and $165 million, as Mr. Manera informed us when he resigned? The Minister of Canadian Heritage had refused to confirm those cuts.

[English]

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member likes to speculate, and they do not make very good gamblers.

Currently it is up to the CBC to determine the best way to administer its limited resources within the financial realities that exist.

CANADA POST

Mr. Ken Epp (Elk Island, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, we have trouble right here in Ottawa city; that starts with t and it rhymes with e and that spells ethics.

All this week the Reform Party has been asking the Prime Minister to direct the ethics counsellor to investigate the Canada Post building contract and the influence of Jose Perez and political officials in the tendering process. The Prime Minister has refused our request on the grounds that these events took place under a previous administration.

How would an investigation of the postal building contract differ from the investigation of the Pearson airport contract which also took place under a previous administration?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister pointed out that the ethics counsellor had been appointed to review complaints about ministers and other order in council appointees and possibly to look into the matter of lobbyists. The matter raised by the hon. member is not something for which the position of ethics counsellor has been created.

I want to say to the hon. member that certainly, as the Prime Minister said, it was something that took place under a previous government. The Minister of Public Works who reports to Parliament for Canada Post is reviewing the situation. I am sure he will have more to say about it when he completes his review.

Mr. Ken Epp (Elk Island, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, irrespective of the minister's answer, a number of serious issues need to be addressed.

Developers need to be assured that Mr. Perez had no unfair advantage. Taxpayers need to be assured that their money is being spent correctly and wisely. Most of all, Canadians need to be assured that either the politicians and bureaucrats did nothing wrong, or if they did do something wrong that they will be exposed.

I have a supplementary question. Will the government's presumed commitment to restoring integrity in the political institutions allow the ethics commissioner to investigate these issues?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the estimates of Canada Post have been tabled before the House and referred to the appropriate parliamentary committee.

I suggest my hon. friend consider that the matter could well be raised when the Canada Post estimates are studied by the appropriate parliamentary committee. If my hon. friend is concerned about a stronger role for committees, he might examine this possibility.

• (1125)

Mr. Ken Epp (Elk Island, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, integrity is missing; the perception of it is missing. This is not the first time the Reform Party has asked for the ethics counsellor to investigate issues on behalf of Canadians. Every time we get the answer no. It seems the Prime Minister is only willing to unleash his ethics lap dog when it is suitable to the government.

If the government is unwilling to let the ethics counsellor investigate in matters of public contracts, why should Canadians have any trust at all in the ethics counsellor of the lobbyists act?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I think Canadians could ask why they should have any confidence in the kinds of questions asked by the Reform member when the facts are that the ethics counsellor has been appointed to look into matters involving ministers and order in council appointees, and when the Reform Party is not willing to follow up my suggestion that the matter could be explored when Canada Post estimates are being studied by the appropriate parliamentary committee.

Where is their commitment to an effective operation of the House of Commons and its committees?

FUNDING FOR CDECS

Mr. Réal Ménard (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

The Corporations de développement économique et communautaire de Montréal, or CDECs, are funded by Ottawa, Quebec and municipal governments. While the provincial and municipal governments have committed themselves to funding the corporations for the next three years, the Minister of Human Resources Development will only guarantee funding for six months. After this date, the department will no longer be responsible for funding CDECs.

My question is the following: Are we to understand that, after hitting the economy of Montreal so hard in the last budget, the federal government will also refuse to commit to funding these frontline economic development organizations for more than six months?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I believe that, judging from how much the federal government has contributed to various initiatives in Montreal, it is obvious that it plays a very, very important role and we intend to continue to do so.

Mr. Réal Ménard (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve, BQ): Mr. Speaker, given the critical role that these development corporations play in job creation, will the minister responsible for development in Quebec put an end right now to the uncertainty and reassure the CDECs that the federal government will sign the tripartite agreement already reached between the three parties, and end the uncertainty and sign the agreement?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we indicated in our budget that we would review various programs to make them more productive.

We also indicated that we would apply federalism by the book, and spend our money in areas that fall squarely under the federal government's jurisdiction. Furthermore, we have created tens of thousands of jobs in Montreal and Quebec over the past year. We will continue to support policies which brought us such success in Quebec, and in the Montreal region in particular.

CP RAIL

Mr. Jim Gouk (Kootenay West—Revelstoke, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to use an urgent situation in my own riding to outline the impact of the CP Rail strike in many ridings both urban and rural across the country.

Kootenay West—Revelstoke has a pulp mill and a smelter both on the verge of complete shutdown because of the week old rail strike. This will take $2.6 million a week out of an area of less than 20,000 people. Not only is this financially devastating; it is totally unnecessary.

My question is for the Minister of Labour. How much economic pain and suffering has to be felt by innocent third parties, everyone from factory workers to prairie farmers, before the government takes its inevitable course of action?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I understand that discussions are under way between the parties. I also understand the railway is operating.

The hon. member has quite properly raised a very serious situation. This is a message to the parties that they should get down to business and reach an agreement.

Mr. Jim Gouk (Kootenay West—Revelstoke, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, 7,000 cargo containers are presently trapped at the port of Montreal at a cost of more that $2 million a day.

• (1130)

Once again business and individuals across the country are being hurt by this situation, some nearly to the point of bankruptcy. Ten days have now passed and the government has done nothing, although it only took them only one day in Vancouver.

Will the Minister of Labour who is an MP from Montreal take action to end this senseless pain and economic hardship?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Labour, on behalf of the government, is following the situation very closely.

The hon. member has quite properly raised a serious situation. It is an indication why the parties—I understand they have informal discussions under way—should turn them into full collective bargaining and reach an agreement themselves as quickly as possible, which is what they have done on every occasion since 1975.

IMMIGRATION AND REFUGEE BOARD

Mrs. Maud Debien (Laval East, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, but I guess someone else will answer it. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration recently appointed Mr. Jean-Guy Fleury as executive director of the Immigration and Refugee Board. In a release confirming that appointment, the minister failed to indicate that, at one time, Mr. Fleury worked for the Canadian Security Intelligence Service.

How does the minister explain the fact that no mention whatsoever was made of Mr. Fleury's managing responsibilities within CSIS when he was appointed to the Immigration and Refugee Board?

Hon. Alfonso Gagliano (Secretary of State (Parliamentary Affairs) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Fleury is a career public servant. He has worked in the public service for many years and he continues to do so. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration appointed him to that very important position and I do not see why the hon. member objects to that appointment, given the mandate of the Immigration and Refugee Board.

Mrs. Maud Debien (Laval East, BQ): Mr. Speaker, will the minister admit that, through this appointment, he is indirectly doing what his government refused to do directly and which he strongly denounced when he sat in the opposition, namely to link immigration to intelligence and national security issues?

Hon. Alfonso Gagliano (Secretary of State (Parliamentary Affairs) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Fleury has been a public servant since 1965. He worked in several departments and only spent three years with CSIS.

I can understand that the hon. member sees a connection with security issues. However, Mr. Fleury's record in the public service clearly shows that he is a good public servant and that he will definitely continue to provide quality services.

LAND CLAIM

Mr. Dick Harris (Prince George—Bulkley Valley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Six Nations Indian band in Ontario recently filed a legal action against the province of Ontario and the federal government seeking compensation for land, money from land sales, revenue from mineral rights and compound interest on any money owed.

This claim, which relates to all transactions in the province since 1784, is estimated by one of the chiefs to be in the neighbourhood of $400 billion.

I hope we get one clear answer from the government today. Will the government or someone from the government confirm to the Canadian taxpayer if the federal government has in fact advanced any federal funds in support of this legal action?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will take the question under advisement. This is a very specific question where a proper answer is needed. We will get the details for the hon. member and give them to him as soon as they are available.

Mr. Dick Harris (Prince George—Bulkley Valley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would hope in the future we will get a proper answer from the government regarding Indian affairs.

I anticipate we will hear no clear answer. I am surprised that given the magnitude of the lawsuit, being $400 billion, that someone has not been reached on that side of the House on this question.

• (1135)

Can the Reform Party and Canadian taxpayers be assured that a very clear and distinct answer will be given to this question?

PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. René Laurin (Joliette, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board.

After denouncing last week the government's failure to tackle waste in the public service, we must rise again today to denounce the unfairness of the cuts. At this time, 14 per cent of full time jobs in the public service are held by contract employees without job security. These employees are generally young graduates and the majority of them are women.

Does the President of the Treasury Board admit that most of the cuts will affect contract employees and that we are thus sacrificing a new generation of our most dynamic and youngest employees?

[English]

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in short, no. We are making the cuts according to the programs and services we have reviewed. They are going to be cut as part of our endeavours to get the deficit down and to cut government expenditures.

It is the positions that are associated with those programs and services that will be cut. Some of them will be long term positions, some will be contractual positions. We will be monitoring the entire situation to make sure that at the end of the day after the cuts are made, we will still have a public service that is able to provide the needs of Canadians in an efficient and effective manner.

[Translation]

Mr. René Laurin (Joliette, BQ): Mr. Speaker, women represent 62 per cent of those full time contract employees who will be affected by the cuts announced by the government. Does the President of the Treasury Board confirm that these downsizing measures will affect mainly women?

[English]

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I do not believe so. We are going to monitor the situation very carefully.

I have said, that these are positions related to certain programs and services that are going to be cut as a result of budget reduction measures. Treasury Board will be monitoring them to try and ensure that we do not get into a disproportionate situation for any one particular group and that we do maintain a dedicated, professional public services that is able to provide the services Canadians need.

TRADE

Mr. Paul Zed (Fundy—Royal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, a number of members from all parties and from all regions of Canada have come together to form a sugar caucus to address the issue of restrictions placed on Canadian sugar exports to the United States.

Revenue Canada today announced that it is investigating unfair trading practices of sugar exporters in the United States, Europe and Korea. I am sponsoring legislation to address the problems facing Canadian sugar workers and producers. All members are pleased that the minister has launched this action.

Can the minister explain to the House the basis for the investigation into the dumping and subsidization of sugar imports and the benefits which the sugar producers can expect to receive from this important action?

Ms. Susan Whelan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to confirm that today the department initiated a dumping and subsidy investigation into imports of sugar from Korea, the European Union and the United States.

This investigation was initiated in response to allegations filed by the Canadian Sugar Institute that sugar imports are being dumped into Canada and that foreign refiners have been receiving government subsidies which allow them to sell at prices which are sometimes below the cost of production.

These alleged practices have reduced profit levels, forced Canadian refiners to reduce prices to unreasonable levels and to lay off workers. Therefore, the department will now investigate the allegations and should they be proven accurate, apply an extra duty which will take away the unfair advantage enjoyed by imports and once again provide a level playing field for Canadian refiners.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Herb Grubel (Capilano—Howe Sound, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, every December accountants in Canada will have large, extra expenses because the new budget forces all professional income returns to be filed at the same time. Professionals will have to bear this extra cost forever, while the government will have only a one time increase in cash income. By no economic standard is this an efficient tax.

• (1140)

Has the minister estimated the efficiency of the new tax measure by comparing the present value of the higher accounting costs with the one–time gain in revenue?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this is a measure that has received a great deal of support from those affected.

It has been pointed out to me that the Association of Certified General Accountants, the CGA, has supported the move. The members of this organization are obviously those most immediately affected.

Mr. Herb Grubel (Capilano—Howe Sound, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this is not the message I receive from accountants in my riding.

The legislation affecting the accounting years of proprietary professional business leaves unaffected the freedom of incorporated business to choose their accounting year.

What justification does the minister have for discriminating against unincorporated businesses which will now have to spend thousands of dollars to incorporate if they want to retain flexibility in choosing their taxation year end?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there is absolutely no discrimination arising from this measure.

We have said that individual Canadians who had the opportunity at one point to avail themselves of a deferral which was not available to other individual Canadians will no longer be able to do so.

We did this on the basis of tax fairness. That is the way it has been received and it is one of the reasons that I am so glad that an august body like the CGA has supported what we have done.

MONEY LAUNDERING

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the solicitor general. The parliamentary secretary to the solicitor general stated in this House that an investigation was under way to explain the RCMP's lack of co–operation with the Swiss authorities, which resulted in Libertina Rizzuto and Luca Giammarella being set free for lack of evidence in a money laundering case.

Can the Solicitor General give us an update on the investigation announced by his parliamentary secretary, which should shed light on the reasons behind the RCMP's lack of co–operation with the Swiss authorities in the case involving Libertina Rizzuto and Luca Giammarella?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is mistaken. There was close co–operation between the RCMP and the Swiss authorities, and I have been informed that the Swiss authorities are quite satisfied with the support they received from the RCMP.

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, must I remind the Solicitor General that the only officer familiar with the Rizzuto and Giammarella case was on holiday when the Swiss authorities were forced to set them free?

How can the Solicitor General explain that the Swiss authorities, who caught these two individuals in the act of laundering money, were forced to set them free because the RCMP did not co–operate? This was mentioned by the Swiss authorities themselves.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, again, the hon. member's comments are wrong. A second report published a few weeks ago in the Montreal newspaper he has quoted set the record straight. The fact is that co–operation between the RCMP and the Swiss authorities is excellent. I am told that the Swiss authorities are fully satisfied with the support they received and are receiving from the RCMP.

Mr. Lee Morrison (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, last month a plain clothes policeman appeared at the home of Darrell McKnight near Fredericton with a warrant to seize his Franchi shotgun, banned by order in council effective January 1.

Mr. McKnight's teenaged daughter, home alone, phoned her father and on his instruction surrendered the gun's receiver, the minimum legal requirement. The officer insisted that she produce the rest of the gun and told her that he could tear the house to pieces to find the parts.

Given that when Mr. McKnight arrived with his lawyer, two backup police cars had arrived to deal with this dangerous criminal, can the justice minister understand why gun owners are afraid of setting themselves up for future harassment by registering their guns?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will not comment on that specific case except to say that I look forward to seeing what the issue is in light of all the facts when fairly stated.

Let me point out that in respect of firearms that were prohibited effective January 1 of this year the federal government is paying compensation to those people from whom we are taking the firearms. That is point number one.

• (1145)

Second, firearms in that category are being prohibited because they are not used for sporting or hunting purposes. These are assault type weapons that have no place in this country.

Mr. Lee Morrison (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Franchi is a shotgun with a short stock.

The seizures of registered previously legal firearms under Kim Campbell's orders in council have been declared unlawful by Alberta courts. The crown is appealing but the minister has, nevertheless, bulled ahead with more potentially illegal OICs. Why is he not prepared to await the legal outcome to let this run through the courts before confiscating more lawfully owned property from honest citizens who trustingly registered them before the orders were issued?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the case referred to in Alberta is under appeal and the federal government has every confidence that its position will prevail in the appellate court.

FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS

Mr. Ron Fewchuk (Selkirk—Red River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for International Financial Institutions.

Yesterday the secretary of state announced the government is launching a review of financial institutions legislation. Could the secretary of state explain what this review will entail and how can Canadians get involved?

Hon. Douglas Peters (Secretary of State (International Financial Institutions), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question.

The Department of Finance did issue a press release yesterday inviting interested parties to comment on the mandated five–year review of the federal financial institutions legislation which comes up in 1997. That includes the Bank Act, the Insurance Companies Act, the Trust and Loan Companies Act and the Co–operative Credit Associations Act. We have asked that submissions be received from the public by June 30, 1995.

This is a separate issue from the regulatory and supervisory package which I presented in a white paper. We are very much looking forward to submissions from the public.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP): Mr. Speaker, in response to the decision to eliminate the Crow benefit the Canadian Wheat Board has asked the federal government to give farmers a short term break on freight rates. This raises a couple of questions for the Minister of Finance.

Can farmers expect any regulatory control to prevent freight rate increases on grain after August 1, 1995? Can the minister tell us if the government has done an evaluation of the effect the elimination of the Crow will have on the long term future of the Canadian Wheat Board?

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, obviously the changes in the WGTA have a lot of impact on the movement of grain in the west.

The Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food and the Department of Transport have been looking at all of the alternatives. We have had extensive discussions with all of the shareholders, the producers, the railroads. We are very much aware of the concerns raised by my hon. friend.

I want to assure him and the people who are going to be directly affected by the measures announced in the budget that we will take every step possible to ensure the orderly and affordable transportation of grain in western Canada.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP): Mr. Speaker, perhaps to the Minister of Finance this time, can the minister explain why the government's one–time payout for the loss of the Crow is based on an expected reduction in land value and not on the increased costs of shipping grain?

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, all of the negotiations surrounding the method of paying that follows from the elimination of the WGTA have taken into account as many concerns as possible.

No final determination has been made with respect to the method of payment. The discussion is ongoing as to how that will be handled. Without exception, throughout these negotiations the government has been acutely aware of the implications for both the owners of the land and those who are actually farming the land. There has to be a determination on what is in the best interests of those two groups.

GENETIC ENGINEERING

Mr. André Caron (Jonquière, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Health. Last week several European countries took a stand against the marketing of genetic discoveries. Europe is sending a clear message to the biotechnology industry: allowing business to gain control over the gene pool of the human race is out of the question.

• (1150)

Does the Minister of Health not think that it is high time the government made its intentions known and tabled a clear policy preventing the sale of human embryos and genetic manipulation for commercial purposes?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I maintain direct contact with my provincial counterparts and we intend to put forth a policy on new reproductive technologies.

Mr. André Caron (Jonquière, BQ): Mr. Speaker, does the minister realize that the longer she waits to regulate the activities of certain Canadian businesses, the more difficult it will be to enforce regulations to prevent this commercial activity?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I understand fully and you will understand my frustration, especially when I get a question like this one from the Bloc Quebecois, whose members constantly talk about federal and provincial jurisdiction. You know that we must always work in co–operation with our counterparts. That is what we are doing and there is no doubt that something will be done.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, we have been told by a justice official the department is considering linking some private organizations into the proposed gun registration system.

Could the minister verify whether this is true? Is he contemplating providing access to privileged information about private citizens to outside organizations through C–PIC and the gun registration system?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): No, Mr. Speaker. The proposal is to have a registry which will be kept in computer records but which will be part of C–PIC and available only to police.

As secure as the registry system for handguns has been, we have had registration of handguns for decades and there has not once been an instance of anybody breaking into the secure registry system for handguns.

At the moment those who oppose registry are fearmongering, trying to get people to think the registration will result in people getting into private information. That is simply untrue.

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, given past conflicting statements by this minister I am not sure how much comfort our citizens are going to take that he is going to be protecting their privacy.

At the age of 17 Kevin Mitnick hacked into the North American air defense command's main computer. Recently he stole computer files which could compromise the security for anyone on the Internet.

With new hackers every day how can the minister guarantee to responsible gun owners that his new registration system will not simply provide a supermarket for criminals looking for guns?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if we want to spend time in the House looking into the future and conjuring up images that frighten Canadians, I would rather focus on what will happen if we do not have effective gun control.

We will go the way of other countries. We will undermine public safety. We will end up with a gun culture. Canadians do not want that for the future of their country.

HEALTH

Ms. Shaughnessy Cohen (Windsor—St. Clair, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Health.

It is widely accepted that in the past medical research and therefore practice and treatment have to some extent failed women.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Ms. Cohen: It seems the testosterone levels are a little high on the other side today. Those members do not take women's health matters seriously. Maybe when they get their guns they will feel better.

Breast cancer, osteoporosis, heart disease and other ailments remain a serious and deadly threat to the women of Canada, although apparently amusing to the Reform Party.

What is this government doing to keep its red book promises to Canadian women to improve their health care?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the government thinks it is absolutely shameful the amount of neglect allowed to occur in terms of focusing on questions of women's health.

When it comes to breast cancer during this past budget exercise we have been able to keep the moneys we have so we can continue to invest in research and other services having to do with women and breast cancer. Not only that, we are looking at reallocating funds so we can do even more.

As to specific red book commitments, I will refer to the centres of excellence on women's health. We are about to launch the process for the site selections for the centres of excellence. These centres of excellence will link together researchers, policymakers, health professionals and women's groups across the country so we can better focus dollars we have.

Some hon. members: Order.

• (1155)

Ms. Marleau: I find it disgraceful that members of the Reform Party would be so lacking in respect for the very serious problems of women's health.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it has come to my attention this government plans to spend $10 million to renovate the dilapidated World War II barracks at CFB Cornwallis for the international peacekeeping centre.

Could the minister of national expense, I should say defence, explain to Canadians why taxpayers must pay for this ridiculous renovation while modern DND facilities are available across the country?

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that a decision was made to establish a centre at Cornwallis. I am unaware of the details as alleged by the hon. member. I will take the question as notice, advise the minister and I am sure he will provide the hon. member with a fully satisfactory explanation next week.

AIR SAFETY

Mr. Bernard St–Laurent (Manicouagan, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Part III of Transport Canada's Estimates indicates that steps were taken to implement Transport Safety Board recommendations regarding serious deficiencies in the inspection of commercial aircraft.

How can the minister hope to convince us that his department will be able to carry out more thorough inspections and improve follow–up when $12 million were cut from the $82.2 million budget of the departmental unit responsible for these inspections?

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my hon. colleague knows that air safety within Canada and on international flights out of Canada is absolutely essential, and crucial to the success of Air Canada, Canadian Airlines International and other carriers. I am sure that my hon. colleague would not want to raise questions that could cast doubt on the safety of these aircraft.

The main thing to remember in all this is that carriers, pilots, the inspection agency—Transport Canada, in this instance—everyone must do their job. But what was reported, and this is very important, is that the problem may not have been the inspections but the follow–up. In this context, we, at Transport Canada, have undertaken to ensure that, whenever deficiencies are found, they be followed–up much more seriously than in the cases reported by the commission.

FINANCE

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Increasingly we are hearing the Canadian banks being referred to as international casinos as the global gamblers now using depositor's money are re–entering into a casino like existence.

Can the Minister of Finance tell us what he plans to take to the Halifax conference in terms of ensuring this is on the agenda and when some of the details of that will be made public?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that first and foremost on the agenda is the reform of the Breton Woods Institutions. In that area of reform will be the whole question of surveillance and transparency involving sovereign nations and also the whole question of capital flows. I suspect what the member is referring to is the problem of derivatives and the consequences thereof.

I have met with the heads of most of the major Canadian financial institutions. In the course of those discussions they assured me we do have the controls to avoid the kind of problems that exist abroad.

We also have a financial culture which would not lend itself, although you can never tell what can happen, to the kinds of problems to which the member referred.

CUBA

Ms. Judy Bethel (Edmonton East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for Latin America and Africa.

It was reported today that an American congressman suggested Canada defer to U.S. foreign policy on Cuba. He was supporting a bill before Congress that would punish countries that ignore the U.S. embargo.

How will this bill affect Canadian companies doing business in Cuba?

• (1200)

Hon. Christine Stewart (Secretary of State (Latin America and Africa), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to respond to my colleague's important question. The United States has draft legislation in place right now which would have a negative effect, especially on the principals and families of some Canadian companies investing in Cuba.

We hope there will be amendments to this legislation before it is pursued in the United States. However, we have made it very clear that Canada will be pursuing and will continue to pursue an independent foreign policy. This is very well respected world wide.

This week we are very pleased to be celebrating 50 years of friendly relations with Cuba and we expect to have many more such years in the future.

Mr. Benoît Sauvageau (Terrebonne, BQ): Mr. Speaker, for over a year, the official opposition has been asking the Minister of Transport to explain why Marine Atlantic, which is a Crown corporation, had been authorized to operate two of its ships under Bahamian flags, and to correct the situation as quickly as possible.

Can the minister confirm today that all Marine Atlantic ships now fly Canadian flags, and can he tell us what measures were taken to ensure that Canadian government agencies do not operate ships under convenience flags?

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, when the issue was raised some months ago, as the hon. member pointed out, we were looking at a situation which, in some cases, had been persisting for quite a long time. We have decided to commercialize Marine Atlantic's operations. In other words, we will sell all the ships.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Jake E. Hoeppner (Lisgar—Marquette, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to present a petition to the House bearing 904 signatures opposing further gun control.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Jake E. Hoeppner (Lisgar—Marquette, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present a second petition bearing 550 names opposing amendments to the Criminal Code, the Canadian Human Rights Act or the Charter of Rights and Freedoms to include consideration of same sex relationships.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Jake E. Hoeppner (Lisgar—Marquette, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the third petition contains 51 signatures opposing assisted suicide.

INCOME TAX

Mr. Jake E. Hoeppner (Lisgar—Marquette, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the final petition contains 254 signatures from petitioners opposing increased taxes.

I respectfully submit these petitions.

GUN CONTROL

Ms. Margaret Bridgman (Surrey North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I rise to table four petitions today.

The first petition is signed by 195 people from Surrey and surrounding area and requests that Parliament refuse to accept the justice minister's gun control proposals.

The petitioners feel that this anti-gun legislation will do little, if anything, to reduce the incidence of violent crime and will simply restrict the rights of law-abiding citizens and target shooters.

SEXUAL ORIENTATION

Ms. Margaret Bridgman (Surrey North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition is signed by 25 people from Surrey and surrounding area and 170 people from my riding of Surrey North, requesting that Parliament not pass Bill C-41 with section 718.2, as presently written, because of the undefined phrase of sexual orientation.

These petitioners feel that everyone currently has equal status under the law.

AIRCRAFT MAINTENANCE

Ms. Margaret Bridgman (Surrey North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I present a fourth petition signed by 95 people from Surrey and surrounding area. The petitioners pray that Parliament intervene and stop the minister from amending the aircraft maintenance engineering licensing system.

The petitioners feel that the licensing system should be retained in its current form and continue to be monitored as is the current practice.

RIDING MOUNTAIN NATIONAL PARK

Mrs. Marlene Cowling (Dauphin—Swan River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have three petitions to present to the House today.

The first petition is signed by 285 of my constituents who live the rural municipality and village of Rossburn.

The petitioners urge the government to take action on the early construction of an all weather road through the west end of the Riding Mountain National Park to connect the communities of Grandview and Rossburn. The hope is that this road will stimulate the stagnating agricultural economy by promoting trade, tourism, social and cultural exchanges.

EUTHANASIA

Mrs. Marlene Cowling (Dauphin—Swan River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition I present to the House has 58 signatures and is on the subject of euthanasia and assisted suicide.

The petitioners pray that Parliament not repeal or amend section 241 of the Criminal Code of Canada and continue to disallow assisted suicide and euthanasia.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mrs. Marlene Cowling (Dauphin—Swan River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the third petition is signed by 854 agricultural producers from the province of Manitoba that support the Canadian Wheat Board.

The petitioners draw the government's attention to the fact that a very vocal minority are requesting a dual marketing system for wheat and barley for export.

The petitioners therefore request that Parliament continue to give monopoly power to the Canadian Wheat Board for the export of wheat and barley.

SEXUAL ORIENTATION

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to add another 385 names to the hundreds of thousands of other petitioners who have asked that Parliament not pass Bill C-41 with section 718.2 as presently written and not to include the undefined phrase, sexual orientation. The behaviour people engage in does not warrant special consideration in Canadian law.

• (1210)

Mr. Speaker, I have another petition where the petitioners call on Parliament to oppose any amendment to the Canadian Human Rights Act or the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms which provide for the inclusion of the phrase sexual orientation.

INCOME TAX

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have a third petition which is perhaps a little after the fact.

These petitioners pray and request that Parliament reduce government spending instead of increasing taxes and implement a taxpayer protection act to limit federal government spending.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Lee Morrison (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and pleasure pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition signed by 295 of my constituents residing primarily in the villages of Coronach, Fife Lake and Rockglen and the surrounding districts.

These petitioners state that except in police states there is no evidence that the suicidal or criminal misuse of firearms is impeded or restricted by legislation.

They therefore humbly pray that Parliament desist from passing additional restrictive legislation with respect to firearms or ammunition and to direct its attention to the apprehension and punishment of those who criminally misuse firearms or other deadly weapons.

I wholeheartedly concur.

JUSTICE

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present this Melanie Carpenter petition organized by Nick Carter and other staff members from JC–55 SuperCountry Radio station in Kamloops and circulated throughout the Kamloops area, the north and south Thompson valleys and the community of Logan Lake as well as a number of other communities throughout central British Columbia.

This brings to 22,000 the number of names of individuals calling for changes to Canada's justice system and parole system in an effort to make our streets and neighbourhoods safe places in which to live and to raise our families.

Specifically, the petitioners believe that those convicted of dangerous and sexual offences should remain incarcerated until they have successfully undergone treatment and can demonstrate unequivocally that they have been completely rehabilitated.

SEXUAL ORIENTATION

Mr. Paul DeVillers (Simcoe North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have two petitions to present.

The first petition contains the signatures of 50 constituents of Simcoe North and calls on Parliament to oppose any amendments to the Canadian Human Rights Act and the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms which provide for the inclusion of the phrase sexual orientation.

Mr. Speaker, the second petition calls on Parliament to delete entirely section 718.2 of Bill C–41.

I present these petitions because I believe all my constituents are entitled to express their views. However, I fully support the increased penalties for hate crimes contained in Bill C–41.

I call on the Minister of Justice to bring forward the promised amendments to the Human Rights Act to include sexual orientation as a prohibited grounds for discrimination at the earliest opportunity.

The Deputy Speaker: The member may not have heard the Speaker say earlier this week that he does not wish us to say whether we agree or disagree with the petition.

VIOLENCE

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, these petitioners believe that violence and abuse in all forms is a growing concern in our society.

They also believe that these are not necessary in order to inform or to entertain. They are particularly concerned about abuse and violence in various forms that appear in the media.

They ask the government to ensure that the CRTC regulate this and remove it if at all possible or certainly diminish it. They also believe that violence is counter to the values they try to instil in their families. They do, however, point out that there have been some gains. They appreciate the efforts that have been made to date.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 107, 125 and 151.

[Text]

Question No. 107—Mr. Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville):

What is the estimated economic impact in Canada of the firearms and related industries, with attention to manufacturing, sales and repair, international trade, hunting, sports, recreation, tourism and associated activities and what is the impact that previous and proposed gun control measures have had and will have on the firearms and related industries?

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): The firearms industry is substantial, especially when one considers related industries such as hunting. For example, the Canadian Wildlife Service (Environment Canada) reported that in the year 1991 over 1.2 billion dollars were spent by Canadians and Americans on hunting in Canada.

Firearms control is designed to be cost neutral. The measures introduced continue to respect the legitimate uses of firearms for sporting and recreational purposes.

Stricter firearm control measures are essential to public health and safety, and one cannot pub a price tag on the prevention of violence and the added security felt by Canadians.

Question No. 125—Mr. White (North Vancouver):

What legal or constitutional authority provided to Native Band Councils prohibits non–Natives residing on Native lands from exercising their franchise in the election of local Band Council representatives?

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.): Subsection 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867 establishes the authority of Parliament to make laws regarding Indians and lands reserved for Indians.

The Indian Act provides that the election for the chief and council of a band can be held under one of two authorities. One, the Indian Act and the Indian Band Election Regulations: If the chief and council are elected under the Indian Act and the regulations, all voters must be both band members and ordinarily resident on the particular reserve (section 77(1)).

Two, the custom of the individual band: If the chief and council are elected/selected according to the custom of the band, the qualifications for the voters are set by the band, and the band has the sole authority to do this.

Question No. 151—Mr. Caccia:

In light of the recent derailment of tanker cars carrying sulphuric acid which spilled into Lake Masketsi and the Tawachiche River, does Transport Canada intend to undertake an investigation to identify and correct factors which could lead to future derailments of tanker cars carrying toxic substances?

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): The Transportation Safety Board, TSB, an independent agency which operates under its own act of Parliament and reports to Parliament through the President of the Privy Council, is conducting an investigation of the circumstances of the accident. The TSB will issue a public report once its investigation is completed. Any recommendations made by the TSB will be acted upon by Transport Canada should any factors be identified which could lead to further derailments and subsequent leakage of tank cars carrying toxic substances.

In the interim, Transport Canada's transport of dangerous goods directorate is reviewing the design standards of the particular tank cars involved in the derailment to assess the possibility of enhancing their safety performance.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

Mr. Hermanson: Mr. Speaker, I believe there would be unanimous consent to support an order for return of question 131.

SUPPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion.

Mr. André Caron (Jonquière, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate on the Reform Party motion, which proposes to replace Canada's current social security system with a registered personal security plan.

From the outset, the wording of the motion reflects its underlying philosophy or principles. The Reform Party wants to replace a social security system with a personal security plan. A social security system is a plan designed to look after the needs of the poor, so that they have the minimum required to live in adequate conditions. On the other hand, a personal security plan concerns a single individual, namely its beneficiary. Such a system has no social dimension: it only concerns the individual.

The underlying principle of that proposal is obviously the prevailing ideology within certain groups promoting a free market, the law of the jungle and the "every man for himself" philosophy. This is not the principle which guided the building, in Quebec and in Canada, of the current social, economic and even political structures.

This morning, I listened to the hon. member for Calgary North, who mentioned some countries which had set up plans somewhat similar to the one she is proposing. She referred to the United Kingdom under Mrs. Thatcher and Chili under General Pinochet.

I do not think these examples would be acceptable to people who have any social conscience at all. The British experience under Mrs. Thatcher, for the past fifteen years or so, was not a particularly happy one. If we compare that experience with the option chosen by France which has taken a different approach to managing and funding social programs, we realize that people in the U.K. are not better off financially than people in France, at present.

As for Chili under General Pinochet, we need only consider what happened during that period and what this every man for himself, this free market ideology produced. It produced torture, deregulation and anti–union behaviour and made the poor even poorer. I do not think people would welcome that kind of system in Canada, especially since we recently had another example of a government that applied this ideology.

Which country was mentioned in glowing terms by the International Monetary Fund? Which country was, in recent years, applauded for its privatization model? Which country was cited as an example for its cuts in social programs? It was Mexico. And look at where Mexico is today. This is a country that wanted to implement a foreign ideology, a country that took steps that had a disastrous impact, first on the poorest in Mexican society and later on the entire Mexican economy.

We cannot disrupt people's lives for ideological reasons, and we cannot apply half–baked theories developed by academics in their ivory towers. We cannot just go ahead and blindly apply these ideologies to advanced societies like ours.

• (1220)

Clearly, I do not support the motion presented by the Reform Party. I intend to analyse it, however, because there are some aspects that must be condemned outright and that are downright shocking.

First of all, the motion proposes to reform existing social programs which are said to be failing, an expression that has a certain currency among certain groups. Who says social programs are failing? The people who do not need them.

Why do we have social programs in Quebec, in Canada, in the western world? Workers and the least well–off have always sought protection against poverty resulting from sickness, unemployment and old age. Often, when people can no longer work because of age they are poor if they had only their job as a source of income.

Western society, has always, and particularly in the past 20 to 30 years, sought protection against the poverty resulting from these scourges. I think they have clearly succeeded. We have health care programs to help the sick, unemployment insurance programs to support those who have lost their jobs and old age security programs to provide a decent standard of living to seniors who have worked all their lives.

I do not know how we can claim these programs are ineffective. I think Canadians and Quebecers know what is involved; they want to keep their social programs. I have two personal examples for you that will confirm what I am saying.

When the Minister of Human Resources Development tabled his proposed social reforms, I called a meeting in my riding for anyone interested in the subject. Some 200 people showed up—people from community groups, the unemployed, union people—These people made it clear to me that we had to protect the social programs we enjoy in Canada today. We might have to change them a bit, but the conclusion was that they had to be protected.

My second example is the petition given me by the movement known as Solidarité populaire, Saguenay—Lac–Saint–Jean. This petition contains nearly 11,000 names requesting the minister to keep the social security safety net in Quebec and Canada.

In the light of such a showing, I can only support those who elected me, particularly because I share their beliefs, and insist that the government maintain the social programs we currently have in Canada, adjusting them as necessary to suit circumstances and to improve their effectiveness.

We hear a lot about the cost of social programs. Of course, unemployment insurance, old age security and health insurance cost money. To some extent, we can surely limit expenditures. We need think only of the duplication of federal and provincial initiatives, which we could stop.

We could also consider cutting expenses by adapting certain programs to reduce their costs and so that the people running them give greater thought to costs. Given the effects of these programs in social terms, I do not think that current costs are exorbitant.

The problem with these issues of cost is the lack of fiscal resources. Why are we lacking fiscal resources in Canada? Because our policies on employment are ineffective.

• (1225)

Certain circles, especially people from the Reform Party, have the following to say about employment policies: "We do not need to have a policy on employment, because jobs are created by the private sector". This point of view is slowly winning over some of our friends opposite, from the Liberal Party. What a pity. Although it is true that business creates jobs, in advanced societies like ours, the government should blaze the trail and take job creation initiatives whenever there is a need.

I am not suggesting that we introduce initiatives based uniquely on a certain ideological or theoretical framework. We must look at the needs of the population and make sure that they are met, to the extent that this is possible.

I would like to move on to a more thorough critique of the Reform Party proposal, as regards a personalized system. The concept of universality would be thrown out. People who have contributed to a plan would be able to use it, and people who have not made contributions, well, who knows what would happen to them. The principle of universality is important, because it acknowledges a citizen's right to receive services by virtue of being a citizen, and, if all citizens have equal rights, they should all have access to many different kinds of services, like health care, education, social security and old age security, just because they are citizens.

Of course, those who are better off may possibly, through various means such as taxation, be required to pay back the benefits that they receive, but it still remains true, I think, that in a society, it is important that citizens collectively have the right to certain services, by the simple fact that they are citizens.

Under the personalized system proposed by the Reform Party, everybody would contribute to the plan, everybody would invest money in a fund in order to pay for their own eventual social needs. But, what happens to people who, for one reason or another, do not contribute to the plan? What happens to people who are unemployed, who cannot afford to make contributions? The chronically ill? People whose lack of training prevents them from being part of the active population? What would we do about them? Would we create a dual social security system?

And if we did, how would the people who have to contribute to a personalized plan feel? They will say: "We are already paying, so why should we pay for others?" In that case, will we let the poor pay for the poor? We can already see where a proposal like this one would take us. It would take us to a two–tier society with rich people living well and poor people starving. Quebecers and Canadians alike condemn that kind of society.

The proposal refers to tax–sheltered savings accounts. This means that the personalized system will be tax–deductible in a way. In other words, the Reform Party is saying "every man for himself", except that the state will have to give tax deductions to those who contribute funds to this system. I think that this is a covert way of making the state pay. It is all very well to say: "Yes, people will invest, take themselves in hand, put money aside—"

I heard our Reform colleague explain to us this morning that if you invest so much per year, you end up with a fortune after 15 or 20 years. This reminds me of the financial advisors who visit people in their homes and tell them: "If you deposit $500 every six months or $1,000 a year, with interest rates, you will become a millionaire". After he leaves, you see yourself as a millionaire, but you are not one penny richer.

While we are on the subject, our Reform colleague said this morning while explaining her system's benefits: "Assuming that a person invest so much as such–and–such an interest rate and that this person is never sick or unemployed, he or she will be a millionaire in 30 or 40 years". Such assumptions do not feed the poor, care for the sick or provide our old people with the support they need.

As for tax–deductible RRSPs, you may think, Mr. Speaker, that I am against RRSPs in principle, but that is definitely not the case, neither for me nor for my party.

• (1230)

In fact, in prebudget debates, we spoke in support of not taxing RRSPs, in spite of the fact this currently deprives the Canadian government of $15 billion in revenues, because we think it is not fair to change the rules of the game along the way, after a contract was signed or a tacit agreement has been reached by the government and citizens who invest in RRSPs. It had been agreed that these benefits would not be subject to tax.

As a party, we are not against RRSPs. We do not want RRSPs to become taxable, but at the same time we cannot understand why one would want to apply the RRSP formula to everyone in our society.

I see that I am running out of time, but I would just like to address one issue that our colleague raised this morning. What happens to those who invest in RRSPs if something goes wrong with the economy, if banks go under, if bad investments are made, if our currency is devalued, if the interest rates go down, if there is an economic crisis? I could go on and read you the entire Apocalypse. Many things can happen that will cause funds invested in RRSPs vanish. You could then come up to us and say: "Well, I am poor now. You must help me". If the Reform Party members were in power, here is what they would tell you: "Look here, sir, you made investments and you lost money. You are a loser and losers have no right to ask the society for help. When you lose money, you lose money, and you shut up".

Basically, the Reform Party's proposal is for the rich, the healthy and the educated.

The other problem with this proposal is this: these funds can and should be drawn only in an emergency. The proposed plan would replace the Unemployment Insurance Plan, the manpower training programs and the pension plans.

What happens when an individual has the misfortune to become unemployed repeatedly over the course of several years, if he has the misfortune to be ill and therefore unable to contribute to his pension plan? What happens if that he drains his personal registered savings plan and ends up with nothing to fall back on.

I think that the Reform Party's proposal takes a rather simplistic view of society and public finance. They are telling us that the public finance problem would be resolved if there were no public expenditures, which is rather simplistic, since it is so obvious. Except that public spending exists precisely because there is a public, a population, whose needs must be taken into account by politicians.

Solutions such as the one proposed by the Reform Party may seem attractive to someone watching us on television, while relaxing in the living room. However, such solutions are not acceptable to the needy.

In conclusion, since my time is running out, when faced with proposals such as this one from the Reform Party, we must remind our fellow citizens and politicians what social solidarity, society and community living are all about. Nowadays, these realities are too often forgotten. We hear about personal success, free market and registered personal security plan. This is a self–centred philosophy. I will not make a long speech about sacrificing everything, including ourselves, to help others, but we live in a society and we have a responsibility toward social solidarity.

I invite Reform members to reflect on life in a society and to realize that we do not live only for ourselves but also for others, who also live for us. This is how we can all function in a society. And this is what we hope to preserve for a long time to come in Canada and in Quebec.

[English]

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to what my colleague from the Bloc Quebecois had to say. He asked several questions which I think should be answered immediately.

He asked who is saying social programs are inefficient. The Auditor General has said social programs are inefficient. I want to give the member some quotations from the Auditor General's 1994 report in which he says rising social program use and high repeated use suggests that social programs may be creating long term dependency among some users.

The Auditor General also says these social programs create disincentives to work when benefits from social programs compare favourably to earnings from jobs. He goes on to say employers and employees may be using unemployment insurance to support short term layoff strategies.

Another point the Auditor General makes is that interaction among social programs may result in programs working at cross purposes to each other. One of the other things he says is unemployment insurance may be a factor in Canada's rising level of unemployment and the lower level of outputs that result.

The Auditor General has said we need to take a closer look at this.

My colleague then said this is an idea that rich people and Reform MPs have thought up. My colleague seems to think these are just our ideas. I do not think he has any idea of how the Reform Party works and how we arrive at our policies and principles. The very principles and policies we are discussing here today as Reformers have been brought to us by the poor people of Canada as an alternative to protect them.

I would like to point out to my colleague how a grass roots party works. The idea we are debating today started with our members, not with our leader and not with a group of academics working on some government funded ministerial task force of some kind. Some of the best ideas that come forward come from the grassroots people, not from some top down, antiquated, political, bureaucratic system of some sort. The member should listen very carefully because these are not ideas that we have hatched in the back rooms of some office.

I cannot understand where my colleague from the Bloc is coming from. For a party that wants the provinces to have more control, I do not believe he would argue with what we are discussing today. He is supporting more federally run, big, social programs. We are saying they should be decentralized even to the point where local associations and individuals would have more control over their affairs.

One of the advantages of an RPSP is that there would be a lot less involvement of this big government in our lives. Taxes could be substantially reduced as individuals, local associations and charities would assume more responsibility for their lives in the communities. I believe this knew social order he alluded to would have a positive effect even on reducing crime. He should take a closer look at what we are suggesting.

I do not have a lot of time today to go into this, but there are other areas, such as higher education, where we could look at this concept. I will give a personal illustration. I have four children. I did not feel that when it was time for them to go to university or whatever institution they chose that I would have the wherewithal to send them there. Therefore, I laid a little bit aside every month when they were young. It was not very much. It was equivalent to the family allowance given by the government at that time.

• (1240)

That small amount of money has grown to the point where now that they attend university, this RRSP type of saving pays for almost half of their education. The hon. member may not know, but I do not come from a wealthy background.

The plan could be applied in so many areas. Poor people could actually provide for their children and provide more security for themselves.

This country is in need of a major overhaul. The very idea the member suggests is unacceptable. Our country is not defined by our social programs, as many members are suggesting. I do not think Canadians can relate to the concept that we are Canadians and what makes us different from other countries in the world are the social programs we have.

It is individual initiative, responsibility, sharing and co–operation. It is the charities we set up. It is caring for our neighbours and our communities. It is the freedom, the strong families and values we have established, the personal assistance we give to each other, not some great social program. That is what has built up this country.

Thirty years of Liberal social engineering took away the personal responsibility. The very fabric of our society is being destroyed and the morale of the people is being broken.

I would like the hon. member to comment on what I have said. Does he not agree the government has failed miserably in running social programs? If he does not agree with our suggestion, what better suggestion does he have?

[Translation]

Mr. Caron: Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few quick comments on what my colleague just said.

Regarding the auditor general, I recall getting the impression from his report that he blamed Mr. Axworthy, to a certain extent, for proceeding with social program reform before thoroughly analyzing the efficiency of Canada's existing programs.

I do not think that we can determine with any precision whether our social programs are efficient based on what the auditor general says. The auditor general has asked the government to review the situation.

My second comment is about what my colleague from the Reform Party said when he claimed that his party's proposals are grass roots proposals. My proposals and the ideas I shared with you earlier also came from the people. I told you that I met with some constituents. I told you that people from Saguenay—Lac–Saint–Jean asked me to give Mr. Axworthy a petition which 11,000 people signed. Therefore, I can also safely say that my ideas come from the people. I think that people want to keep the social network or social net, which we all have in common.

Now, regarding the opinion expressed that I should be happy to see social programs disappear because I am a sovereignist and because most of these programs are federal, and their disappearance could very well be politically opportune, simply because they are federal, this is not how the Bloc Quebecois sees it. Yes, indeed, we believe that the federal government should leave social programs to the provinces, because social programs do not lie within federal jurisdiction. What we are asking for is a system where the provinces would administer social programs in exchange for tax points corresponding to the cost of administering them.

I think that federalists, like my colleague from the Reform Party, should be more careful when they talk about the importance of social programs, because some Quebecers say that the railway and social programs are what Canada means to them. The railway is being dismantled and so are social programs. Therefore, in the opinion of many people, Canada is also crumbling.

Regarding the question I was asked about social program reform, I agree that the government ought to determine whether each social program meets the end it was designed for. I do admit that, in certain cases, it would be appropriate to adapt the program, and in others, to restrict them because they do not really meet any needs.

• (1245)

In my opinion, Canada must continue to invest in social programs because Quebecers and Canadians are very proud that the neediest people in our society can still live in dignity.

The solution lies in job creation, which will ensure that more Quebecers and Canadians are contributing money to the government. This is how we will be able to sustain the social programs which make us so proud and which make us the envy of many countries of the world.

[English]

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it gives me pleasure to address the issue before the House today.

It is clear to everyone but I suppose the Liberal government that 30 years of social engineering have failed miserably. The main reason social programs have become unaffordable and unsustainable is that they create greater and greater dependency on social programs. No matter how these programs are designed, the end result would always be the same. More and more people use the system and eventually it becomes unsustainable because the government can no longer afford to pay the huge sums of money needed to satisfy everyone's so–called needs.

This is why half the people on welfare today are described as employable. This is why our unemployment insurance program actually creates unemployment. Economists call this moral hazard and people in Saskatchewan call it plain stupid. This is something that must be addressed in the debate. The debt and the deficit seem to be issues that people do not even consider in the comments they are making in regard to this matter.

The Department of Human Resources Development issued a report in January 1994 which provided an even more damning indictment of the negative effect of the unemployment insurance program. I want to address most of my remarks to the unemployment insurance aspect.

The report examined over a dozen existing studies which concluded that the changes made to the Unemployment Insurance Act in 1971–72 resulted in an increase in the unemployment rate in the range of 1 to 1.5 percentage points. That is how much unemployment was raised because of the change. The report also noted two unpublished papers that produced estimates showing that the UI rate was as much as 3.5 percentage points higher than it should be. That is very serious.

Using the range of estimates provided in the government's report, it means that instead of the current unemployment rate of 9.7 per cent it should be somewhere between 9.2 per cent and 6.2 per cent. That is a huge difference.

The UI program is so poorly designed that somewhere between 64,000 and 448,000 workers are unemployed because of it. It has not helped that we have suffered through 30 years of incompetent government and a lack of leadership has brought us to where we are today: on the brink of bankruptcy. Now we have 44 per cent of the people in Canada doubting whether they will ever receive old age pension and 42 per cent doubting whether they will receive their Canada pension even though they have paid into it with their own contributions.

The government's incompetence in dealing once and for all with the annual deficit by balancing the books is directly responsible for the deteriorating lack of confidence in our social security system. Instead of adding to our personal security, the approach of the Liberals to social programs is adding to our insecurity. They think if they just tamper with them a bit—and my hon. colleague from the Bloc suggested that we should tinker with them—they can make them better.

We have tinkered for 30 years and now we are on the brink of bankruptcy. Not only have the Liberal social engineering experiments failed us fiscally and economically but they have also failed us socially. The number of single mothers is increasing dramatically, not because teenagers are not smarter than they were when I was young but because many provincial welfare programs will pay welfare to teenagers who leave home just because they have had a disagreement with their parents. It is clear to everyone except politicians that social programs are also destroying families.

• (1250)

Today I want to look specifically at how the registered personal security plan system we are putting forth might be used to improve the current unemployment insurance program. The Reform Party's policy with respect to unemployment insurance has been developed and approved by Reform Party members at a number of assemblies since 1988. Reformers believe the program should be returned to its proper role as a true insurance program to cover periods of short term unemployment and that it should be administered by the employees and employers who pay the premiums, not by some big government in Ottawa.

At our membership assembly held in Ottawa last October Reform delegates, the supreme governing body of our party, voted almost unanimously in favour of the following resolution:

> Resolved that the Reform Party investigate the feasibility of replacing the compulsory, government operated, privately funded, taxpayer subsidized Unemployment Insurance Program with a voluntary, personally financed, privately administered, government regulated Registered Unemployment Savings Plan.

That is what we are bringing forward today as a suggestion that should be explored by the government.

Reformers are not alone in thinking that the RPSP concept might have applications beyond savings for our retirement. This is what the Canadian Institute of Actuaries had to say about the possibility of expanding the use of RPSPs to replace the existing UI program in its submission to the human resources development committee:

> A well designed Unemployment Insurance Program would be one which would encourage and reward attachment to the workforce. A capital accumulation program would fulfil this role, as this type of plan could be set up to deposit employer and worker contributions into a registered unemployment savings trust account. This account would be tax sheltered and invested at the sole discretion of the worker, similar to a group RRSP arrangement. This program would be compulsory for all workers and would replace the existing UI program. This could be co–ordinated with CPP/QPP to enhance retirement security.

While the Canadian Institute of Actuaries is saying contributions would be compulsory, Reformers have still not made a decision on whether the program should be compulsory or voluntary. The Reform Party is still investigating this concept and it will be a number of months before we will be able to make a final recommendation to our members.

The winning proposal selected in the Fraser Institute's 1992 economy and government competition estimated that replacing the current unemployment insurance program with the RPSP type program could save governments over $5 billion a year. The proposal also estimated the greatest positive impact came from replacing the disincentives to become hooked on UI with real incentives to work.

Another huge benefit described was the increased economic activity and job creation that resulted from having about $12 billion a year left in the hands of workers and employers instead of being sent to government to be wasted by spendthrift ministers and bungling bureaucrats.

Many other benefits were noted in the study including a $1 billion saving in government administration costs, a reduction in paper burden and red tape for employers and employees, more money in private hands for training and upgrading, and ending the duplication of effort between UI and provincial welfare programs. Surely everyone would realize that and support our proposal on that basis alone.

Based on our initial research and the positive reaction to the idea of RPSPs by economists, business leaders, the general public and even the media, Reformers believe the idea is one whose time has come. Reformers invite the government to support our motion Work with us to help complete our investigation of the feasibility and application of the RPSP concept. We want to work together with government members. They said they were going to co–operate. This is one aspect where we can.

Reformers will initiate extensive research effort in the next few months. We will use this background information to launch a far reaching consultative process to get public input. The concept will become part of the Reform Party's policy development process and will lead to discussion and debate in hundreds of constituency associations across Canada, culminating in a vote and a decision at our next membership assembly. If approved by our members the concept will form part of the Reform Party's election platform for the next general election. Reform will campaign using the RPSP concept, and if elected Reform will have the mandate to implement the changes we propose.

• (1255)

The Liberal approach is the reason many Canadians become cynical with traditional parties and old line politicians. They never say what they are really going to do and they never really do what they say. The Liberals are masters of old style politics more than anything else. Reformers came here to change the democratic system.

Voters under a Reform government would have real power as a result of democratic reforms which would include citizen initiated legislation, free votes for MPs, referendums, MP recall and a triple–E senate.

Reformers know the government started out to solve the problem but now government itself has become the problem. My goal as a Reform MP is to get the government off the backs of people and out of their pockets. The registered personal security plan is one that will help us achieve that goal.

That completes my presentation as I am willing to split my time with my colleague.

[Translation]

Mr. André Caron (Jonquière, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the hon. member's comments. I want to ask him about an issue to which I alluded during my speech. What happens to those who make bad investments? What happens when interest rates get too low? What happens when banks go bankrupt? It may sound a bit ridiculous that a bank could go bankrupt, but it has happened in western Canada. It almost happened with the old Barings bank, in England, which experienced serious problems following some unfortunate investments by one of its managers. What happens if the tax–exempt money put in safe banking institutions does not grow? What happens if, after 10, 15 or 20 years, the personal security plan is ruined by some crisis?

[English]

Mr. Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, the question could be put to people who put their savings away today. What happens to savings in a bank today if the bank goes broke? I think the hon. member realizes that banks have insurance, that those funds are insured. The system would virtually be no different.

I would like to turn it around. What is ensuring Canadians today with all the deposits they have made to the Canada pension plan that they will get anything? It has been administered by a government that has run the fund virtually into the red. It is over $500 billion in the hole. The liabilities in the Canada pension plan are over $500 billion. That is of a far greater concern than possibly some bank that may go under.

The government can regulate this kind of thing. We are putting the suggestion out there. It is something that can be explored by Reformers and the government.

A much more serious problem is being overlooked, the fact that the government will not meet the commitment it made to senior citizens. Years down the road it will be unable to fulfil its commitment.

Interest at the present time is eating into our social programs to the point where it will not be very long that we will be paying more interest—and it may be at that point already—than we will be getting back in social programs. This is how critical it has become. This is why we need to look at alternatives and this is one alternative that should be seriously considered.

• (1300)

Mr. Herb Grubel (Capilano—Howe Sound, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the introduction of the current Canada pension plan was preceded by an intense discussion over the merit of fully funded rather than a pay as you go social security system

Under the fully funded system Canadians would have paid taxes to the government which would have been forced to make private market investments with the money. The system could never have gone bankrupt and would have increased enormously the amount of savings in the economy and therefore the rate of investment in economic growth.

However, such a funded system would have resulted in unpredictable retirement benefits since the earnings of the funds would have been uncertain. In addition it would have resulted in high costs of portfolio management and a serious concentration of financial powers in the hands of the managers of a very large amount of money.

The Government of Canada decided to adopt a pay as you go system under which continuously a currently working generation is taxed to pay for the pensions of the retired generation. This approach fit well into the political climate of the time when private markets were distrusted deeply and governments could do no wrong. The system also had political advantages. The population was growing rapidly and was expected to continue to do so.

As a result, the tax burden on the relatively large number of working age people was and always would be low to provide the pensions for the relatively small number of those retired. In addition, the government could set guaranteed pension benefits and cover any unexpectedly high costs by raising government taxation rates.

Sophisticated economic and actuarial models showed that in a world of constant population income there would be perfect intergenerational equity as all working contributors to the scheme would receive in return exactly the same amount they contributed.

The Canadian pay as you go system is now in some trouble because the predicted population growth did not take place. Using reasonable assumptions, the unfunded liabilities of the Canada and Quebec pension plans have a present value of $750 billion. In other words, the amount that is promised to be paid out is smaller than the amount to be taxed under current rates. If we sum all of those future deficiency of payments we will come to a discounted value of $750 billion, about the same as the value of our current debt that is so hotly disputed all the time.

In the early part of our next century the working generation may have to pay as much as 15 per cent of its come to pensioners. Other disadvantages of the present system are that it has lowered the private rate of savings and investment in economic growth. Public opinion surveys show that Canadians have become skeptical about their ability to receive promised benefits when they are retired. The ideals of the system for a population free of worries about retirement finances clearly has not been realized.

With this empirical information about the shortcomings of the present system available now, the Reform Party believes it is time to replace it with a fully funded, what we call private security system. Canadians will continue to make mandatory contributions to their retirement savings just like under the present system, with some money coming from their pay and matching funds from employers. These contributions are deducted from income before taxes are calculated. There would be reasonable maximum contributions to prevent use of the instrument for massive deferral by high income earners.

The biggest difference from the current system is every Canadian would have the option to pay these funds to a private trust administered by approved financial institutions, much like they can now under the registered retirement savings plans.

All income and capital gains earned in the private system investments are also sheltered from income taxes. As a result, the average Canadian worker who contributes to such a scheme during their full lifetime may be expected to have accumulated a surprisingly large sum. This is possible in spite of seemingly small annual contributions they are used to now. The power of compound interest working on a tax free income works wonders.

• (1305)

Rough calculations show that persons now 65 who started to work at age 20 and enjoyed average wages and returns on their investments would be the proud owners of a nest egg greater than $1 million today.

The individual Canadian would own this money and all rights to it. Access to it would no longer be subject to the whims of Parliament and other generations. However, because the fund was built with deferred tax obligations provisions have to be made that taxes are paid at some point on the assets.

For this purpose the owners have the same three basic options that exist under the present RRSP system. The entire fund can be turned into an annuity at age 71, permitting the payment of taxes during the remaining years at the relatively low rates applicable to the annual annuity.

Alternatively the funds can be freed from all restrictions on use by paying income taxes in the years it is done. The third option is that funds can be withdrawn at minimum rates that roughly assure the entire amount is depleted at age 94 or one progressively higher in the future as people live longer. Taxes are payable on the withdrawal of funds each year.

The preceding represents my own tentative ideas on the operation of the proposed personal security system. Actuaries, accountants and economists are needed to work out the details and assure the viability of the system.

Much work has to be done to assure the smooth and equitable transition from the present to the new system. I am confident the devil and the detail will not destroy the basic vision. The system can also be used for the tax free use of funds for mortgage down payments, higher education, medical expenses and possibly unemployment.

Such a universally funded and privately administered system would take Canada into the modern age when governments have to accept that socialism and collective approaches have failed. It would increase freedom and economic growth. Get to it, Canada.

Ms. Shaughnessy Cohen (Windsor—St. Clair, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, during this debate members of the opposition have raised many issues arising from the budget, in particular about building an effective social security system for Canadians.

The motion before the House today and pronouncements from the Reform Party indicate one perspective on social programs, a perspective I do not share, one which no one on this side of the House shares, a perspective not shared by most Canadians and certainly not by the constituents in Windsor—St. Clair.

In the federal budget and in the vision sketched out by the Minister of Human Resources Development there is quite another vision. The difference is clear. While Reform rambles on, indiscriminately cutting here and hacking there, the government is taking a thoughtful approach to human resource issues.

The government is turning the page from the strait jacket of rigidly centralized Tory programs. The government is leaving behind the Tories laissez faire approach of writing cheques and to the more Tories the better.

It is an innovation, something Reform does not know much about. It should not be the Reform Party. It should be the regression party. It is innovative in terms of social programs far beyond the simplistic notions of the Reform Party.

In essence the budget reinvents government for the 1990s. These social programs and the budget are built on our belief that Canadians want communities and individuals to have the tools to make their own decisions while ensuring basic principles are in place on a national basis.

It is very important to listen carefully to what Reformers say so that one can compare what they say to the government's vision of social security, peace and good government for this nation.

Here come the guns. This government's approach begins with a focus on three priorities. We want to keep our citizens alive. We do not want them shooting each other. We are concerned about employability. We want to find the best way to combat poverty.

• (1310)

Employability by helping people to find, keep and improve their jobs and skills and the elimination of poverty are our goals.

We have learned there are many ways to achieve these goals. The employment needs of a single parent led family in a housing project in Toronto are substantially different from the employment needs of a family which formerly made its living in the Atlantic fishery. In a country as diverse as Canada, there is no one size fits all, quick fix answer like Reform would suggest.

For that reason provinces and territories are joining us in finding these new answers. They know innovation is not reserved to one level of government in our Constitution. One place that will become clear is the new Canada social transfer. This will shift federal support for post–secondary education, health, social assistance and social services into one package starting in the fiscal year 1996–97.

Currently transfers under the Canada assistance plan come with a lot of strings attached. Strings have become less and less relevant to today's world. We believe some of these strings are unnecessary. We believe they impede innovation, restrict flexibility and increase administrative costs. They also impede regional solutions to very real and very different regional problems.

In short, this cost sharing approach hampers provinces that need the breathing room to design and deliver social programs in line with their local needs.

We believe the provinces share our goals to improve the employability of Canadians and to reduce poverty. What they also want is the flexibility to deal with these problems in a way that responds effectively to people's needs.

Under the Canada social transfer we will allow this to happen while remaining faithful to certain fundamental national principles. First and foremost the conditions of the Canada Health Act will be maintained. In other words, universality, accessibility, portability, comprehensiveness and public administration will be respected.

Canadians also do not want to see their mobility restricted because of minimum residency requirements. Beyond those principles but consistent with them always there will be flexibility and partnerships.

The Minister of Human Resources Development will be inviting all provincial governments to work together to develop through mutual consent a set of shared objectives that will underlie the new Canada social transfer. By achieving a coherent framework with provinces and territories we will be able to tackle the core problems of employability and poverty.

This government wants to work with the provinces and territories to increase access to good quality child care. This can help improve the employability of many Canadians with low income. It can offer children a great environment that helps them learn and grow.

We would like to work out better means of helping persons with disabilities to get jobs and to achieve greater independence. We believe provinces and interested groups will welcome that commitment and will help us achieve it.

In these two areas, as in our entire array of federal–provincial relationships, we want to build new partnerships that focus on results and that are grounded in common values.

While that is the government's approach, what about Reform? The record is silent. Reform has nothing of substance to say about any of these issues. Employability? Who knows. Reducing poverty? I think we can guess what Reform's perspective is.

Perhaps I should simply move on to some other subject on which Reform members actually do have a policy. Unemployment insurance is a very good example. Their position is that we should knock $3.4 billion loose from the unemployed by cutting out all special benefits and the interest differences tied to local unemployment rates.

Who would pay? Women would pay. There would be no more Maternity benefits. That is the Reform's idea of a baby gift. Welcome to Newt Manning's Canada, little one. The sick would pay. The sickness benefits under unemployment insurance would be cut out. Under Reform's plan we would have to guess that we might break our leg in advance and save up for it. Welcome to Preston Gingrich's Canada, convalescent Canadians. People in less prosperous regions would pay. Reform wants to see UI entrance requirements that would be sharply higher than they are now to bring them up to the level of the wealthy regions. Welcome to the land of neo–Newtism, unemployed Canada.

Can the UI program be reformed? Absolutely, but this is not the way. The government has been quite clear that we need to move forward from the current unemployment insurance program. We believe it does not do enough to help people get back to work. We believe it can be a far more active policy. We have set a target for program savings of at least 10 per cent.

As the Minister of Human Resources Development has already said in the House, unlike Reform we will not achieve these results at the expense of 165,000 new mothers a year. We will not achieve these results at the expense of 155,000 people who fall sick annually. We will not achieve these results at the expense of 30,000 fishers. These are precisely the people Reform is attacking when it claims saving for a rainy day equals an intelligent social policy.

The same holds true for seniors and seniors benefits. The Reform Party claims there is $3 billion waiting to be plucked from the old age security program. I cannot wait to hear what the seniors I meet for coffee at McDonald's on Wyandotte Street in east Windsor have to say about that.

Like so many Reform proposals, we know the price but it will not tell us what we would be buying. Precisely who would lose their benefits and how much would they lose? Would it be a clawback? At what rate? From what income level? There is no way anyone can squeeze $3 billion from OAS without taking it from the seniors, whom no one would call wealthy.

It is clear from the budget response Canadians support the direction the government has taken very strongly. They see the complaints from the opposition and from some provincial capitals about this new direction for what they are: pure politics, old fashioned politics, politics as usual. Our citizens know, even if some partisan politicians do not, we must build real ways to work together productively. They have no time for transparently obvious grandstanding. They have no time for ideological shell games.

The government is determined to build a better system of social security for Canadians, one which could be sustained financially, one which sets clear goals and one which enlists consistent support to achieve those goals. The government's budget is a blueprint for that system.

At the end of the day we have to wonder which approach is better. Canadians clearly prefer the approach of the government and reject the simplistic, facile approach of the Reform Party.

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have seldom heard as much distortion of another party's policy at one time. The member has done an excellent job of that and I congratulate her if that is her goal. There has not been that much distortion from a single member in a long time.

The member referred to the Liberal budget and how there has been so much flexibility given to programs under the budget. I would like to ask the member how this budget gives flexibility when it will still mean adding $24 billion per year, by the finance minister's own figures, to the debt and when interest payments on the debt will increase to $51 billion per year by the end of the three–year period?

How does that give flexibility to social programs where billions and billions more will have to be taken from social programs to make interest payments? How does that give flexibility if the Canadian economy collapses and we go hat in hand to the International Monetary Fund asking for a loan and it says that we have to get rid of a lot of our social programs, otherwise it will not lend us the money? How does that give flexibility?

Ms. Cohen: Hello. Earth to Reform. Mr. Speaker, Canadians want the deficit handled. They want the deficit managed. We are doing that. We are taking a little longer than Reform would because we do not want babies to starve in the street, we do not want children to miss their education and we do not want old people to not have income support.

Hello. Earth to Reform. This is the real world over here.

• (1320)

Mr. Herb Grubel (Capilano—Howe Sound, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have never heard such rubbish.

Is it really an honourable debate of issues when somebody gets up and says the superior Liberal Party doesn't want to kill people and doesn't want babies to starve on the streets? By implication it is suggesting the people on the other side would have policies which deliberately would kill people and make babies starve.

We do not by that kind of debating style advance the cause. Let us understand that all of us wish to have the best for all Canadians. The issue is how do we best get there. Only by discussing the issue of how we get there is any progress being made.

Let me take the issue of unemployment insurance. The hon. member has never read any of the royal commissions made by previous governments, including Liberal, on the examination of the unemployment insurance system. They have universally said that system was created to protect Canadians from the hazard of unemployment. There was never any conception this should be used to pay for people who choose to become pregnant or who are ill, as she noted.

The point is we have different systems for taking care of these things. It is totally inefficient and inequitable to ask some people to pay for hazards for which they are not exposed.

Her calculations on welfare payments are totally off. We are currently paying $20 billion in UI and government OAS benefits to retired people. We are paying $18 billion in CPP–QPP. That is $38 billion.

If $3 billion is cut out of that from the top, the arithmetic shows it is not necessary to go to the lower level. That is the kind of discussion we need, not saying we want to save lives and the other people want to kill Canadians. That is totally inappropriate for the Chamber. It is an indignity.

The Deputy Speaker: I would invite the hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair not to use that phrase, which she has used twice before. It does not contribute to the dignity of the House.

Ms. Cohen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the admonition. Whatever the language, we just heard it. The Reform Party does not want to support women who choose to get pregnant.

Mr. Grubel: That is not true.

Ms. Cohen: The Reform Party does not want to support sick people. That is what I just heard.

Mr. Grubel: Rubbish.

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is amazing what we are hearing here today.

A prominent politician told me recently that politics—I know the Liberals may not agree with this—is the art of the possible. The member for Labrador told me that. I agree with that statement. Politics is the art of the possible.

The Reform Party has given the House an idea. What we are hearing is the idea being stifled, not legitimate criticism or maybe a suggestion or two to add to the idea, but accusations and fearmongering from the other side of the House. It is unacceptable.

This government has one answer to the problem of poverty and one answer to the problem of people being unemployed. That is massive amounts of government money being thrown at the problem when it is shown clearly that it has not worked.

The government is like a baby. At one end it has a huge appetite and at the other end it has no sense of responsibility.

Ms. Cohen: Mr. Speaker, I am trying to figure out what part of the anatomy is at the other end from the brain where the sense of Reform responsibility comes from.

• (1325)

Mr. Ken Epp (Elk Island, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin by focusing on what we are talking about today. Maybe we could begin by agreeing on the things that we agree with.

We agree that all Canadians living in the best country in the world would expect from their government good fiscal management, so that all of our resources, all of the people with all of their energy, with all of their integrity, would be able to manage their affairs. Those affairs that are managed for them by the government would be done in such a way that the benefits are sustainable.

In my short life I have had a number of occasions where we have been beneficiaries of living in this country. The first one is the privilege of being able to come here.

I am a first generation Canadian but I remember distinctly my grandparents. Long before they passed away, they use to speak of the privilege of being in Canada. They did not want handouts. My grandparents were rugged, self–sufficient individualists. When they immigrated to this country they declined government benefits. They said they will live poorly but they will make it. They did.

I am happy to be in a family that has a rich record of helping other people. It is not true that you can only help people by having the government pluck the pockets of the taxpayers, spin it around in the whirlpool in Ottawa, use up a whole bunch of it for administrative purposes, have politicians and bureaucrats decide of the money that is left who is entitled to it. That is a false assumption, if you stop to think about it.

They have not created any money. They have not created any wealth. All they have done is taken the wealth away from the people, thereby reducing their ability to help those around them in need.

I know of what I speak. I am old enough to remember before all of these programs were in place. I remember as a youngster one of our neighbours was very sadly, suddenly and tragically killed in a farm accident. There was no government program at that time to help the widow harvest her crop.

I remember my dad organizing the neighbours. I was probably only five or six. I still remember that our neighbours went and that lady had her crop harvested first. When that was done, each one of the neighbours went back and did their own. That is the essence of charity. That is the essence of looking after people.

There was a young couple my wife and I were familiar with who did not have regular jobs. They had financial difficulties. They obviously needed a lot more help than just money thrown at them. I am very happy to say that one of the best experiences of my life was I, one of the leaders in the group, got a number of mutual friends together. This man who was in financial trouble, was living in subsidized housing and the rent was high. He said he could get into a housing program if only he could get a down payment. There was a house builder who had really good starter homes, but he did not have the down payment. His payments if he got into it would be less than his rent.

The most fun I ever had was when this small group of us could get together. Some of us made a donation to this. Some of us gave interest free loans. We went to this couple and we said we have arranged for the $6,000 they need as a down payment, let us go and buy the house. That was fun. The couple picked up on that and said that they now had an obligation to pay it back. They became more accountable. It did not take them long to pay back the money some of us had given them as interest free loans.

That really was a good experience. However, that was before the government was taxing us to death. Now we are getting more and more government intervention which prevents us from looking after ourselves.

This plan the Reform Party is promoting today simply says: We reject the premise that the government can look after our long term savings, our long term benefits or our temporary need for assistance when we are out of a job. We reject the premise that the government can do it better than we can ourselves or with the help of someone close to us. It is too far away and too inefficient.

The Deputy Speaker: It being 1.30 p.m, the proceedings on this matter have now expired.

The House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

[English]

CHARITABLE AND NON–PROFIT ORGANIZATION DIRECTOR REMUNERATION DISCLOSURE ACT

The House resumed from February 10, consideration of the motion that Bill C–224, an act to require charitable and non–profit organizations that receive public funds to declare the remuneration of their directors and senior officers, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. With respect to the motion for second reading of this private members' bill, should the question come to a vote, I think you would find there is unanimous consent to amend the order to read:

> That the bill not be referred to a legislative committee, but to the Standing Committee on Government Operations.

The Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Dumas (Argenteuil—Papineau, BQ): Mr. Speaker, before speaking on Bill C–224, I would like to take this opportunity to mark St. Patrick's Day and wish all our Irish friends a very happy St. Patrick's Day. I would also like to call your attention to Claude Bourguignon's excellent article published in La Presse today on this subject.

Mr. Bourguignon is a resident of my riding of Argenteuil—Papineau. In his paper, he relates the history of the massive presence of thousands of Irish Canadians from coast to coast. Claude Bourguignon is also one of the founders of the Irish Quebecers interpretation centre, located in Saint–Colomban, in the riding of Argenteuil—Papineau.

The principle of Bill C–224, the Charitable and Non–profit Organization Director Remuneration Disclosure Act, introduced by the hon. member for Hamilton—Wentworth is to force non–profit organizations and charitable organizations that receives, directly or indirectly, any assistance from the public funds of Canada to disclose the remuneration and benefits paid to their directors and senior officers.

This means that the remuneration and benefits received by the directors and senior officers of charitable organizations would be disclosed upon receipt of federal government or public funds. This way, Canadians would have the assurance that public funds do not go to the directors and senior officers.

Because it is all too often perceived as a charitable activity carried out on an individual basis and in isolation, volunteer work is overlooked in our political debates on the Canadian economy. However, individual volunteers' efforts are far from negligible given their economic impact. There is an obvious need to promote volunteerism. This essential element of society is also a lifestyle and a social duty.

Yet, in recessionary times, volunteer organizations will have to use other financing methods because government assistance is getting increasingly restricted. It must also be noted that the survival of those services and programs people rely on is not guaranteed.

• (1335)

The old stereotypes concerning volunteers, their activities and their motivation are no longer valid. Today, two thirds of volunteers in Canada belong to the paid labour force and most of them hold full time jobs.

This bill contains a few flaws, however. First of all, clause 3, line 17, reads in part as follows:

and receives, directly or indirectly

This very broad wording could refer to a great many non–profit organizations which do not feel they have anything to do with the federal government. It should simply read, "and receives directly".

Second, the next line reads in part as follows:

from the public funds of Canada

The expression "public funds of Canada" is very ambiguous because it does not specify if these funds are strictly federal or if they include provincial and municipal funds.

The main purpose of this bill is to avoid any possibility of fraud by directors and senior officers of non–profit organizations.

All Canadians and Quebecers alike recognize that volunteerism is a great blessing to society. According to Statistics Canada, in 1987, Canada benefited from the work of over 9 million unpaid volunteers. Their work represented over one billion hours, or an average of two hours per week per job from November 1986 to October 1987, or more than 500,000 full–time jobs for a year.

The three main sectors relying on volunteer work are religious organizations, sports and recreation, as well as education and youth development.

Close to one quarter of male volunteer workers are involved in recreational endeavours, while another quarter participates in religious and educational activities. Women are more likely to do volunteer work with religious organizations, with one fifth of them in that sector.

Overall, 38 per cent of the volunteer work is related to the collection of funds, 36 per cent to the provision of information, and 35 per cent to the organization, monitoring or co–ordination of activities.

It is surprising to see that most volunteers are not older or retired people. Close to half of them are in the 25–44 age group; a little over a quarter are in the 45–64 category, while the others are 15 to 24 year olds. Volunteers in the 25–44 age group hold close to two thirds of the jobs in education and youth development, and three fifths of the jobs in sports and recreation.

As the official opposition representative and critic for issues concerning seniors, I want to point out that volunteers aged 65 and over hold close to one fifth of the jobs related to social services, including health care and support.

Moreover, the majority of volunteers come from middle–income households. Over 40 per cent of all volunteers come from households whose income is in the $30,000 to $60,000 range, 14 per cent come from households with an income of over $60,000, while only 5 per cent come from households whose income is less than $10,000.

Volunteers with a household income of over $60,000 are found mostly in organizations with an economic or international focus, the percentages being, respectively, 19 and 21 per cent. Those with a household income of less than $20,000 are usually in social services and represent nearly one–quarter of all volunteers, which reflects the high ratio of senior citizens in this area.

At least 19 per cent of volunteers in social services are aged 65 and over.

In an article that appeared in La Presse on February 6, 1993, journalist Clause Masson discussed the use of funds collected during telethons, saying that if we consider the preparations for a telethon, the need to maintain a permanent staff and also the promotion campaign, the cost of producing this kind of show is enormous and that is where a substantial amount of money collected is spent.

• (1340)

And that is where the organizations that conduct these telethons will have to make some changes. For instance, there is definitely something wrong when a total of $3 million is collected and only 10 or 20 per cent is donated to the actual cause. To make a telethon worthwhile, at least 50 per cent or $1.5 million should go to direct services.

We must keep telethons from being a way for people and organizations to perpetuate the so–called charity business. Just because organizations are not for profit does not mean we should trust them implicitly.

In 1991, Quebecers gave over $400 million to a myriad of organizations appealing to their generosity, that is charities, foundations, church parishes, recreational organizations, etc. Canadians on the whole, excluding business, gave roughly ten times more, that is, some $5 billion dollars, according to the Canadian Centre for Philanthropy. Thus, on the subject of transparency, it would be interesting if the organizations receiving federal government or public assistance were required to reveal the benefits and salaries of their officers.

Canadians could then verify that public funds used to support charitable organizations do not simply go into the pockets of the people administering them. In conclusion, subject to the two points I raised earlier, we would be prepared to support the spirit of this bill.

[English]

Mrs. Dianne Brushett (Cumberland—Colchester, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak in support of Bill C–224, an act to require charitable and non–profit organizations that receive public funds to declare the remuneration of their directors and senior officers. My colleague from Hamilton—Wentworth has spent a great deal of time and research on this matter in the interests of deficit reduction and in the interests of the Canadian taxpayer.

Accountability has been the battle cry of the 1990s. We have heard this cry coming from all sides: from business, from special interest groups and most important, from the individual Canadian taxpayer. What this bill does is provide for accountability in the charitable and non–profit sector of the economy, and the very large segment of the economy that it is.

This bill is about disclosure of the real value of non–profit and charitable organizations, not only in the human resource but in financial dollars to the Government of Canada. The people of Canada have a right to know. The reason I believe this is that we rationalize our growth as well as our debt against GDP. Therefore it is very important that we have accurate information on the real value of GDP. It should include the value to the Canadian economy of non–profit and charitable organizations.

This bill is not intended to harm or embarrass anyone. However it is intended to provide transparency and accountability. While Canadians hold their government responsible for its actions, they also trust it to report on all public matters with accuracy, openness and truthful representation.

These same keystones must exist for charities and non–profit organizations which receive public funds. After all, if government is to be fully accountable to the Canadian people and if we are to efficiently execute our mandate as the trustees of public funds, then it follows that we must have complete and accurate reports on where and how public money is spent.

At the present time there is no process in place that will allow for complete scrutiny, at least not without applying to the courts. Even then, full disclosure may not be possible. This problem has been a longstanding one which arises from the Income Tax Act and the legal system.

Neither department can absolutely or clearly define which category charities and non–profit organizations should come under because these groups cross several lines with regard to existence, function and purpose. They function like a business but unlike a business they do not make a profit.

Quite often not for profit organizations make large investments which earn interest or capital gains yet they are not taxed on this money. They have no product or service to offer in the normal sense of the word. However, we have heard the complaint that a not for profit organization will operate a tavern and pay no taxes while a small business person across the street pays taxes on a similar operation. Is this fair competition? Is this a level playing field?

• (1345)

These not for profit groups have a social function to ease or remedy some problems which may exist in our communities or national settings. They receive funds in one form or another, a portion of which are the taxes paid by hard working Canadians. With these funds they run their programs, pay salaries and execute daily business.

As anyone can see, a clear definition as to where charities and non–profit organizations belong is no easy matter. Since the assent of the Income War Tax Act of 1927, the courts have tried but have not yet been successful in absolutely defining any organization which has as its focus the improvement of the human condition.

This special category which charities and non–profit organizations are given exempts them from paying income tax. Yet there seems to be an inequality here. The amount of information these groups must provide to Revenue Canada, which exempts them from tax, and the accountability they have to funding ministries is minimal. Smaller still is the amount of information available to the very people who actually fund them, the Canadian taxpayer.

For example, the public is made aware daily through the press of the salary of every hon. member of the House. They are aware of the tax free allowance and they are bombarded with information regarding the MPs' pensions, all of this rightly so. Would it not seem fair that the same public have access to the same information of high profile heads of non–profit organizations?

One that comes to mind is David Somerville, the president of the National Citizen's Coalition, a non–profit organization. Mr. Somerville does great work on behalf of the public so should they not have a right to know his salary, his pension and his total benefit package?

If Bill C–224 becomes law, within 30 days of fiscal year end there would be full disclosure of salaries and benefits paid to directors and senior officials of these charitable and non–profit organizations.

I mentioned earlier that charitable and non–profit organizations were a large sector of our economy. To demonstrate how significant these numbers are, we know there are more than 130,000 organizations in Canada classified as charities or non–profit organizations. Available estimates show that approximately $120 billion flow through these organizations annually and that $49 billion comes from the various levels of government.

We know these organizations act in the public interest but we also know there is no measurement to gauge the effectiveness of the programs. By anybody's standards, that is a big bundle of money.

Some months ago we read in the newspapers in every city in the country where the Chamber of Commerce in Quebec City gave a gift to the premier of Quebec. The gift was a mansion worth $650,000 and $150,000 worth of furnishings. This was a gift to a politician, to Jacques Parizeau. The moneys that paid for this political gift were moneys claimed as 100 per cent business deductions passed through this Quebec City Chamber of Commerce as donations to non–profit organizations and the Chamber of Commerce bought the house as a gift to a politician.

Does the public not have the right to know how much money is going through non–profit organizations to buy mansions for politicians across the country? Does the public not have the right to know how many politicians at all levels may be receiving financial support or valuable gifts from non–profit organizations? I think most Canadians will agree with me that we have a right, especially since most Canadians are paying their fair share of taxes. In the final analysis, those who are paying are picking up the tab as well for those who are not.

If we are to be the guardians of the public trust and if we are to be fair to all sectors of the economy then I believe we have a great opportunity to at least take a first step toward more fairness with the implementation of Bill C–224.

I come from rural Canada, the Atlantic region, where people are generally very kind, very charitable with their friends and neighbours and very generous with what money they have. In most instances they would give you their last dollar if you really needed it. That is the Canadian spirit. I believe in my heart that with disclosure, the Canadian spirit of giving would be enhanced. The openness of information would generate greater trust and financial support to those organizations that we depend on in our communities and the thousands of volunteers who give so generously of their time and energy.

At this very crucial financial period in our nation's history, when the government has taken unprecedented bold, courageous steps to cut programs, to cut jobs and to cut spending, surely we have that same bold courage to support this bill.

• (1350)

Canadians are generous in their donations and each of us places great value on the work our charities and non–profit organizations do in our communities. However, I am sure that each of us has wondered where exactly the money goes. How much is spent on very high paying salaries and how much really reaches the needs of the child or the researcher for which it is intended?

Bill C–224 provides that information to the public. It provides disclosure. I believe that having full knowledge of where the money is spent, Canadians will be even more generous to the groups that are deemed worthy of financial support. I commend my seatmate, the hon. member for Hamilton—Wentworth, for his foresight, for his diligent research as well as his integrity and determination to do what is right. I believe in times to come this bill may be considered the very most important piece of legislation that comes before this 35th Parliament.

I believe Canadians are ready for this legislation and that the bill is very compatible and may even be considered a companion to the very recent budget bill.

In conclusion, it is my hope that all hon. members of the House will give serious consideration to this bill and offer their full support.

Mr. Dale Johnston (Wetaskiwin, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to rise to speak on this private member's bill. I would like to congratulate my friend from Hamilton—Wentworth for putting it before the House.

This is a bill which I do not think the Reform Party would have any problem supporting. It is about two things which we feel very strongly about, accountability and public disclosure.

We all have made contributions to non–profit groups and to charities and I am sure that all of us at times have wondered just what percentage of our dollars actually goes to the cause, which was mentioned by the previous speaker. How much of it goes to the cause and how much of it goes to administration and bureaucracy? This bill will go a long way in allaying some of our fears. There is nothing like information to put one's mind at rest. Certainly speculation and fear of the unknown are things which lead to more and more speculation.

While we are talking about accountability and public disclosure, I note that the previous speaker mentioned the pension plan. It was my understanding that there was great difficulty trying to get the record of who had received parliamentary pensions in the past, the amounts and also the amounts which were put in by the member and the amounts which were paid by the taxpayer. Perhaps a companion bill sometime down the road, along the lines of public disclosure and accountability for publicly paid pension plans, would be a great idea as well.

I have to make apologies to my research assistant, who actually wrote two speeches for me today, but I am using neither of them. I send my apologies to him.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): It sounds pretty good to me.

Mr. Johnston: I hope it sounds good to my research assistant too, who should take some solace in that.

I am sure that most people in the House realize and recognize that Reform MPs are making considerable donations in their constituencies, as a percentage of their income, to charities. We are all fairly well versed in the charities that are available in the community. As the previous member also said, this is intended in no way to call into question the good which these charities and non–profit organizations do.

• (1355)

As a matter of fact, I could see this as being an augmentation to the good they do. If too much of their collected funds actually do go to administration and so forth, then I am sure the people who have volunteered many hours to ensure these organizations and charities are a success would be very disheartened to learn of exorbitant salaries and fees paid to board members and executives.

I do not intend to take up my full time on this bill. A few words are as good as many words in a case of this type.

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, until the member for Kent comes back into the Chamber I would like to stand and support my colleague for Hamilton—Wentworth.

This bill is an example of how a member of Parliament can come into this Chamber and with proper research support, with a very specific idea and with a lot of hard work can put something on the national agenda which touches every community, every city, every part of our country very positively. I salute my colleague for Hamilton—Wentworth for this tremendous achievement in bringing the bill this far.

In regard to a specific aspect of the bill, this type of accountability for Canada's not for profit sector is going to create internal efficiency within these organizations. We have all read stories from time to time where various organizations have been accused of being too heavy in administration with not enough going to the line after the administration expenses have been accounted for. It casts aspersions on the organization because it cannot put all of its books and records into the public. It also does not allow the not for profit organizations that are acting efficiently to make their performance record open to the public.

This bill will achieve a renewed interest in the volunteer sector. We will be depending upon that sector more and more as we move into a very difficult period in terms of fiscal discipline. The organizations which are operating efficiently and which are meeting their constituents' needs are going to be rewarded by those in our society who appreciate that type of efficient volunteer service.

I thank my colleague and give him my full support.

Mr. Dick Harris (Prince George—Bulkley Valley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I support the hon. member for Hamilton—Wentworth's bill as well. Listening to the previous speakers, I heard the member for Cumberland—Colchester say that it could become the most important piece of legislation during this session. The member for Broadview—Greenwood said it was a magnificent achievement.

I am looking for words to give it even more applause but unfortunately, I cannot reach that high in my praise for this bill. However, to compliment the hon. member for Hamilton—Wentworth, I will say it is a good bill. It is a very necessary bill and certainly I and my colleagues of the Reform Party have no problem supporting it.

When Reformers came to Ottawa we said we would not be here on this side of the House simply to criticize the Liberal government. The way it has turned out in this 35th Parliament we have not had much choice but to criticize. The Canadian people who tune in to what is happening in Parliament will know that whenever we criticize we do at the same time offer constructive alternatives.

This is one of the times when we really do not have to criticize this bill because quite frankly after all the exhaustive research we have done on it we really cannot find too much wrong with it bill. I want to the let the House know that while the member for Hamilton—Wentworth and his research assistants have done exhaustive research to define the bill clearly, we have done exhaustive research to determine whether this was a good bill or not and indeed it is.

We basically want the non–profit organizations and the charity organizations to become more accountable in their bookkeeping primarily so we can find out what the leading members of the organization are getting paid for their services.

We know the Government of Canada contributes a lot of money to non–profit organizations, special interest groups. Of late we have had examples where expenses have been seen to be exorbitant because of the lack of accountability in how these expenses are reported. We have seen many cases where these special interest groups and non–profit organizations will skip some of the lines on the income tax return and just put in a lump sum showing lump sum salaries paid to some of the top people in the organization. This will do away with all that. We are going to get more accountability.

When I am talking about accountability I have to hold the member for Hamilton—Wentworth blameless in this because he seems to have a good understanding of what accountability means. I would encourage him to apply the same principles he did to this bill to his conversations with other members of the Liberal Party. What the Reform Party came here to do was to demand accountability from the government.

The hon. member for Hamilton—Wentworth appears to have a pretty good handle on accountability. In supporting this bill I want to encourage him to talk to as many of his colleagues as he can so that we may finally get some accountability from the government as we go forward in the 35th Parliament.

We support this bill.

Mr. Ken Epp (Elk Island, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure and an honour to speak in favour of the motion.

A couple of things have come to mind in the last few minutes while I have been listening to the other speakers. I would be remiss if I did not add to the commendation of the hon. member who has proposed this bill. I have had the privilege of working with him in the Bill C–43 committee. It is a very healthy sign and gives me a little glimmer of hope that perhaps there are some Liberals who do believe in accountability. Sometimes we get the impression that is not there.

The hon. member was instrumental in adding to the strength of Bill C–43 in a couple of areas, in particular disclosing. When lobbyists receive government funds they must now disclose it. I believe disclosure is the first step to elimination of receiving the funds.

The best legislation in the House seems to come from private members. It is really the only time when we have this large envelope of unanimity. Perhaps we ought to consider changing the rules of the House and have government business the last time of the day on Friday and have private members' bills the rest of the time. Perhaps we would be able to change the system.

I commend the member on this principle. It is close to my heart because I believe strongly in charities and the work they do. I also believe in accountability. If it were not for that I would not have come here as a member of Parliament. That was one of my prime motivations.

I remember listening to my son whom I have mentioned before in the House. He is currently working as an administrator in an orphanage in Rwanda for a charitable organization. He and his wife are helping to look after some 400 children whose parents were killed in the unfortunate occurrence there. My son has been doing this type of work for five or six years, having been in Somalia, in the Sudan, in Bosnia and in other areas. He made a statement that I thought was very significant. He said that in the areas where he has worked the non–government organizations, the NGOs, are about twice or more as efficient as government organizations.

He talked about salaries. When he goes there he basically gets an expense allowance and that is about it. Whereas other people who are supposed to be helping receive huge salaries. He said he could not believe it. I will not mention the organizations because that would be unkind since they are not here to defend themselves. After working over there for five or ten years some of the people he mentioned will come back to Canada with a pile of wealth in their accounts because they were not spending it over there.

A charitable organization has potential for the greatest accountability. The whole idea of bringing the good we do to help people down to people and away from government needs to be strengthened. That will happen if we open the accountability and the desire of organizations to be open and honest with the people that support them.

In my experiences I made it a policy many years ago of not supporting private charitable organizations that will not open their books. In some instances I have actually written and and said: "Please send me your annual statement for last year. If it is not audited by an independent auditor I will probably not help you". I believe in that principle and it ought to be applied right across the board.

It is refreshing to see it being done in this area of tax expenditure. I say in the very best sense I can that I wish the hon. member for Hamilton—Wentworth would spread this virus of accountability throughout his caucus so we can infect every agency of government with total openness, total accountability and total declarations of how much money was received and how it was spent.

I am pleased to have spoken in favour of the motion. I certainly will be supporting it.

The Deputy Speaker: Under the circumstances the hon. member for Hamilton—Wentworth might wish to close the debate.

Mr. John Bryden (Hamilton—Wentworth, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I wish from the bottom of my heart to thank my colleagues on all sides of the House who spoke in favour of the bill.

All things aside I believe the bill is important and will have a profound effect on Canadian society in what it proposes to do. For me as a member of Parliament the experience of presenting the bill to the House and having the support of my colleagues on all sides fills me with great pride in this 35th Parliament.

The Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Deputy Speaker: Accordingly, this bill is referred to the Standing Committee on Government Operations.

(Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to a committee.)

POINT OF ORDER

RAIL STRIKE

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in light of the very serious rail strike that is currently tying up the rail system in our country, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill, notice of which was given Sunday morning by means of a special Notice Paper, entitled an act to provide for the maintenance of railway operations and subsidiary services.

I seek the unanimous consent of the House to permit the bill to be introduced and given first reading at this time.

Mr. Speaker: My colleagues, I wish to inform the House that in accordance with a representation made by the government, pursuant to Standing Order 55(1), I have caused to be published a special Order Paper giving notice of introduction of a government bill. In just one moment I am going to lay upon the table the relevant document.

However, I have a point of order from the member for Kingston and the Islands. Is there any comment? I invite comment only for the reason that I thought the hon. member for Laurier—Saint–Marie was rising to his feet before I put the question. There being no comments, is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Unanimous consent is not given for the introduction of the bill at this time.

GRAIN EXPORT PROTECTION ACT

The House resumed from March 2 consideration of the motion that Bill C–262, an act to provide for the settlement of labour disputes affecting the export of grain by arbitration and to amend the Public Service Staff Relations Act in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mr. John Maloney (Erie, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and privilege today to speak to a bill introduced by the member for Lethbridge. The bill seeks to make it illegal for anyone, employee or employer, to cause any cessation of work at any stage of the progress of grain from the premises of the producer of the grain to export.

It should be obvious that the bill would affect a large number of Canadians, indeed everybody who comes near the grain, from the farmer who grows the grain to the trains and ships which carry the grain. It would directly affect my riding of Erie whose economy includes the entire spectrum from grain production to the marine industry.

I wish to focus on one aspect of the bill and what it brings to the labour relations atmosphere with the government's own employees. That is the provision in the bill which would amend the Public Service Staff Relations Act by adding new criteria, limiting the right to strike.

The bill seeks to add to the Public Service Staff Relations Act in section 2 and subsection 78(1), words which have the effect of prohibiting employees from engaging in any strike activity in areas related to "the orderly progress of grain from the premises of the producer of the grain to export".

When the Public Service Staff Relations Act was introduced almost 30 years ago, legislators included a unique concept to labour legislation. This was the notion of designating employees as essential and denying them the right to strike. That is to say that employees whose duties included functions which were performed in the interest of the safety and security of the Canadian public, those employees could not engage in a strike. If one was to search the Canada Labour Code or other labour codes, one would not find many examples of such a concept.

In my opinion, this is a good, reasonable and justifiable concept. Employees of the federal government and numerous other federal institutions should not be in a position to withdraw services which would cause harm to the safety or security of Canadians.

This provision has stood the test of time. When public servants engage in strike activity, a number of their colleagues continue to work and provide essential services to the public. The last public service strike provided us with many examples of this provision.

Both air and marine search and rescue operations continued. Ice breaking continued. Mariner's charts and maps continued to be produced and updated, and the all important function of providing notices to shipping carried on. As well, the fisheries patrols were maintained and employees involved in this function continued to provide a service to the public.

Air operations continued and airport facilities were maintained. Weather observations continued. Forecast were prepared and communicated to users. Of great comfort, notification bulletins affecting aviation safety continued to be produced and disseminated.

Naturally prison guards and correctional services are deemed an essential service and continued to perform their tasks. All those employees, including those who provide care and security for inmates, medical care, food, heating and all those functions necessary to maintain the system, continued to perform their duties.

Health care was maintained by designated employees in such areas as poison control, hazardous product identification, medical support at federal hospitals, ambulance drivers and dental and chronic care in isolated areas. Also designated were some employees who were involved in research related to health care which used laboratory animals.

Essential to Canadians, income security programs such as UI, family allowance and the Canada pension plan continued. This included the processing of new claims as well as issuance of benefits.

Employees involved in customs and immigration control remained on the job. Included among these essential jobs were employees responsible for the primary inspection of meat and fish products imported to Canada.

Not surprisingly, the provisions of the Public Service Staff Relations Act also preluded those involved with national security from striking. Included among these were the civilian and federal employees who provide support to RCMP operations.

Of interest to members, parliamentarian operations were designated an essential service. Hansard continued to be printed, along with commission reports and other parliamentary publications. As well, simultaneous translation services continued to be offered.

These are some of the examples of services considered essential for the safety and security of the public, and for which the public service employees could not withdraw services.

The central theme throughout this list is: these services are essential for the safety and security of the Canadian public. It is evident that the current provisions of the Public Service Staff Relations Act have by and large served the Canadian public well. By tinkering with these provisions and including the notion of economic hardship in the grain industry, are we trying to fix what is not broken?

It is an unfortunate but accepted reality that strikes will cause inconvenience and maybe even economic hardship to some. If we are to accept that employees have the right to strike to put pressure on their employer, then we must accept the results. If it is our view that strikes should not cause hardship to anyone, then it is my suggestion that all strikes be declared illegal.

This bill starts along this road. It is heading toward a destination that can only bring grief to employer–employee relations in the country. I would not argue that the movement of grain is not important to Canadians. Obviously it is. However, I do not believe that the production or movement of grain is essential for the security of the public. The movement of grain is, like many other commercial activities, an important economic activity in the country.

If we were to introduce the idea that there can be no strikes or lockouts in the grain industry which sector would be next? Is it the auto industry? Is it the shipping industry? How about forestry services? In certain sections of the country ore production is extremely important. Should we consider banning work stoppages there? If we are to use economic criteria I am confident that every member of the House could cite an enterprise worthy of consideration for a bill such as this.

I would like to remind members that in many jurisdictions police are given the opportunity to withdraw from their jobs. Medical practitioners and teachers also have this ability.

As I mentioned, if we accept that employees have the right to strike and to exert pressure on their employer, then they must be permitted to do so. The introduction of a provision in the Public Service Staff Relations Act prohibiting strikes in one specific area, be it grain handling or some other industry, begins to erode this right. Employees either have the right to strike or they do not.

The provision restricting the right to strike in the federal public service to those performing services essential for the safety and security of the public is a restriction but I think it can be reasonably argued. In addition, this provision has been in place for almost 30 years and still allows the public service employees to withdraw services. As we saw during the last public service strike, employees still have the ability to exert considerable pressure on the employer.

Seeking to expand restrictions to cover economically important services, first one and then many other industries or activities, will ultimately remove the right to strike effectively.

I can envisage the time when any strike which puts any pressure on any employer or others will then be proposed for exclusion under public service staff relations and the Canada Labour Code. Legislators will slowly and painfully remove the right to strike from any employee as a means of exerting any pressure at all. Is this what our country has to offer its workers and its representatives? I think not.

The introduction of further restrictions to the right to strike will, without any doubt whatsoever, worsen labour relations in the country. As we all know, these relations are already strained. It is my personal belief that after a number of years of difficulty it is time for all parties to labour relations to bring a positive and constructive approach to them for the future.

Times are changing and everybody must change with them. I do not feel that the way to begin a positive and co–operative renewal of labour relations is by introducing legislation which begins to erode what labour considers a basic right. If we are going to give labour the right to withdraw services in order to exert pressure in collective bargaining, then we must allow this withdrawal of service to have some effect. We either fish or cut bait. To carry the analogy further, we cannot tell employees that they can fish but they cannot have worms.

I am sure the member for Lethbridge did not intend anything sinister but was simply advancing a proposal which would protect the interests of the grain industry and this is to be commended. However, I believe the results of considering this bill cannot but lead to other interested parties looking to protect another and then another and no doubt an important industry through labour legislation. While the reasons for desiring protection from strikes or lockouts are noble in themselves, we must look at how we propose to do this and the results such a proposal would bring.

In conclusion, while I agree with the member that the grain industry is important to Canada, as are many other industries and activities, I cannot accept the notion that Parliament legislates protection at the expense of the rights of other Canadian citizens. Despite what I believe are good intentions, the results would be inappropriate and I cannot support the bill.

[Translation]

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to what the hon. member had to say, and I realize that the grain industry is very important to the Canadian economy and to western Canada in particular. But I would like to say that grain is surely not more important than the lives and health of our fellow countrymen.

• (1115)

But people's lives and health, and these are under provincial jurisdiction, can also be affected by a labour dispute. What was the best solution found after a lot of research and trial and error? In order to strike a balance between the right of workers to strike and the priority right of individuals to health and safety, it was determined that the best solution was to establish the principle of essential services. Essential service does not mean the right to strike is taken away.

Those who dream of the day there will be no more strikes should realize that taking away the right to strike does not guarantee there will be no more strikes. In fact, history has shown that before the right to strike existed, there were many, extremely rough strikes, for the simple reason that there was no legislation. The strikes were there before the right to strike. If we want labour relations to be more harmonious, if we want grain and health to be priorities, we must ensure that labour relations are more conducive to dispute settlement.

We must not forget that, especially at a time when for more than ten years, in many cases, workers have had to tighten their belts, make all kinds of concessions and pay more and more taxes, when the economy starts picking up, these workers would like to have their modest share, at least. We must not forget that in this country, we see executives of private companies getting outrageously high salaries and benefits, although they are hardly as productive as Japanese companies. In Japan, the gap between the salaries or incomes of executives and employees is much narrower than in this country.

We cannot afford an economic model where executives can earn whatever they please and workers will just have to tighten their belts and watch others take their share of the profits. We must not forget why we have labour legislation. We have labour legislation because we had to deal with the flagrant injustice that existed at the time. And if we think that bringing all this back will lead to prosperity and harmonious labour relations in this country, I have got news for you. It will not happen.

The Deputy Speaker (Mr. Kilgour): As we are at the beginning of the week, I would ask each of you, in so far as you can, to co–operate and always address your remarks to the Chair.

Mrs. Lalonde: Clearly, I could not use these words in reference to you. This is not news for you, because you already know full well that this sort of unfair situation cannot be allowed to develop so blatantly on the assumption that the workers alone will always be asked to contribute an ever increasing share.

Today, tomorrow and in the coming days, we will be talking about railway workers. We will see that they too, with each successive collective agreement, have had to forgo working conditions they previously enjoyed. This is the truth. They have done so in order to take refuge in what they considered essential in a time of unemployment—a sort of job guarantee.

• (1120)

And now, because the employer is not budging—and we will have to see what the government does in this—we are about to see these workers as well lose some of their working conditions.

As regards this particular bill, I understand and I share the desire for harmonious labour relations. However, when it is unreasonably assumed that the right to strike may be withdrawn without provision being made for sufficient means to settle working conditions, I do not expect grain transportation to be harmonious and secure. This will not be the case. History has shown us that this has not been the case in the past; it will most likely not be the case in the future.

I would add, particularly since the government has not seen fit yet to propose anti–strikebreaking legislation, which would allow re–establishment of a balance of power. If we want to establish labour relations, and in the area of essential services as well, which permit a balance—and not only the appearance of a balance but real healthy labour relations—attention must be paid as well to the balance of power. Many provinces have a provision for this, and it has proved its worth.

As for our case, the work that remains to be done at the federal level to ensure labour relations that permit public enjoyment of the services they are entitled to, but without the cost of the cuts we must face being passed on to the workers concerned, will involve paying greater attention to finding this balance. This is the only way to ensure that the same protection accorded to grain in Canada is accorded to health and life in the provinces.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): To meet the test of fairness and the spirit of fairness I must humbly submit that I failed to recognize the proper sequence of speakers, not having taken into account all the speakers who spoke previously in this debate.

For the next two interventions I will go to the Reform Party if there are two speakers. Then I will be back on track.

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, today, March 20, 1995, marks a very troublesome day for those who depend on the railways and for those who must use the port of Montreal to get their products to customers.

Canadians are feeling the full effects of strikes and lockouts, and back to work legislation for the railways is in the works. We have been in this situation before. Last Wednesday we sat late debating Bill C–74, back to work legislation to settle the labour dispute on the west coast.

A little over a year ago we also debated back to work legislation with Bill C–10 to handle a similar dispute which lasted for 12 days.

Unfortunately these are not isolated incidents. Canadians have felt the effects of similar disruptions many times. I believe 13 have ended with back to work legislation in the past 30 years.

Unless both sides in the CP Rail dispute can reach an agreement some time very soon, we will be debating back to work legislation again today, tomorrow or soon.

I find it ironic that components of the grain handling and transportation system are consistently treated as essential services when work stoppages occur. I am here today to ask the government not to provide essential service legislation. I am asking the government to carefully consider the very positive impact of Bill C–262; the impact it would have in ameliorating recurring problems between labour and management.

• (1125)

Currently there is no effective collective bargaining taking place between labour and management. Both sides know they can depend on government to legislate them back to work. Let us not pretend we have productive collective bargaining taking place right now. We do not. Let us end the charade and do what Reformers called for in last year's emergency debate and what the hon. member for Lethbridge is currently calling for in his private member's bill, Bill C–262.

Bill C–262 provides a tool for both labour and management to prevent these disruptive and expensive work stoppages which affect people all across the country when they occur. The current work stoppage at CP Rail and at the Montreal port would not have happened if Bill C–262 were in place. These disruptions in grain handling and grain movement and in the movement of other goods must not be allowed to continue.

The collective bargaining process must be allowed to work where it can work. In the vast majority of cases, in situations between labour and management, they do reach agreement and the process works fairly well. In other cases the process does not work well. When this happens labour and management both lose. Unless an agreement is reached the operations will close down.

The case of grain handling and shipping is unique. It is unique because the cost of a disruption can and will be borne by farmers in three ways. First, added costs cannot be passed on to the consumer because farmers are price takers in a very competitive marketplace. Second, there is a loss of revenue in present sales and, more important, in future sales through the loss of long term customers. Third, farmers have no real alternative. They have no way to get around the system. They must ship through the rail transportation and grain handling systems currently in place. They cannot choose to use another system which is offered by someone else because it does not exist.

That is why work stoppages should not be allowed in the grain handling system. I hope the hon. member for Mercier will now understand why stoppages in the grain handling system are so important and why they are every bit as important as the welfare and health of members of labour unions. The welfare and health of farmers is directly affected by these work stoppages. This is coming from someone who has lived and worked in agricultural communities through these disruptions over the years.

The extra stress caused by farmers being deprived of income makes one of the most dangerous businesses in the country today even more dangerous. By allowing these disruptions to happen continually farmers' health and welfare is affected every bit as much as members of the labour unions. I hope the member will now understand that the concerns of farmers and the stress and the danger to their health are every bit as important as that of labour union members.

How do we deal with the situation in a way that is fair to labour, to management, to the all too forgotten party, grain farmers, and alfalfa shippers and other shippers? Bill C–262 provides a solution through final offer selection arbitration. This process is triggered upon request by one party if the parties concerned are unable to reach an agreement through the collective bargaining process. The key features of this process as outlined in Bill C–262 are as follows.

The trade union and employer are requested to provide the minister with the name of a person they jointly recommend as arbitrator. The trade union and employer are required to submit to the arbitrator a list of matters agreed on and a list of matters still under dispute. For disputed issues each party is required to submit a final offer for settlement.

• (1130)

The arbitrator then selects either the final offer submitted by the trade union or the final offer submitted by the employer. In the event that one party does not submit a final offer, the other party's offer is automatically accepted. The arbitrator's decision is binding on both parties.

As you can see, final offer selection arbitration does not prevent the collective bargaining process from following through to a conclusion. It simply speeds the process up. However, it does prevent the very few from doing unacceptable damage to so many.

There are the other workers and the loss of work and income for the other workers shut down by the stoppage. There are the other businesses involved in grain handling and movement. There is the damage done to business enterprises and Canada's now faltering reputation as a reliable grain exporter. There are the farmers who must shoulder most of the costs for short and long term damage resulting from lost markets. They have no way of passing those costs on to the consumer or of recouping those losses.

Legislation that provides a long term solution to this problem should have been passed years ago. In this regard I would like to pledge continued leadership by Reform members of Parliament in continuing to press for long term solutions to this and similar problems in the grain handling system.

We cannot afford to have disruptions continue in the grain handling and transportation systems. I am asking for support for Bill C–262. Indeed in the past, several members of the government side and others have provided support for final offer selection arbitration.

I do not have time to read all the quotes, but these quotes are from the Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food himself, and the Minister of Human Resources Development, and from the chief commissioner of the Canadian Wheat Board, Lorne Hehn. He stated that the grain industry cannot afford any more strikes and lockouts and said: "We cannot afford to shut down a multibillion dollar industry for the sake of a few people. I think that we have to do something about this situation".

Mr. Hehn went on to state that he would favour a first offer selection. "If an agreement could not be reached through the collective bargaining process," he said, "I think that would bring people to the table in a more honest fashion. We could settle these things without shutting the system down". I believe this first offer arbitration is much like the final selection process we are proposing here today.

The senior grain transportation committee voted on October 14, 1994 to support a system of final offer arbitration. It is down in black and white from members of this government.

The most effective way I can present the importance of stopping these disruptions in the future comes from farmers. My father lived through these disruptions in his farming career and each time I saw the stress and the pain. I know the hurt that caused him and his neighbours. As for myself, in my farming career I have lived through several of these disruptions. I know the pain and the loss these have caused my neighbours and myself.

Finally, I would like to stress that it is not only labour unions that are being tough on this issue. Farmers have threatened in the past—and there could come a time when this will happen—to take over the process of grain movement in any way they can on their own. Farmers will not let these disruptions continue indefinitely. They must stop. I encourage this government to support Bill C–262 to ensure this is the end of these disruptions in grain handling and grain movement.

Mr. Allan Kerpan (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am very proud and honoured today to rise in this House and give my full support to Bill C–262 which was presented by the hon. member for Lethbridge.

The timing of this particular debate in the House is absolutely perfect. We are sandwiched between back to work legislation which occurred last Wednesday and certainly the potential of another forthcoming round of back to work legislation in the rail industry. We could not have asked for a better time to talk about this ongoing problem which has occurred many times in the history of western Canada as far as the agriculture business goes.

• (1135)

Today I would like to do something just a little bit different. Rather than dwell on how the innocent third party is affected by this proposed legislation, I would like to look at all aspects. I would like to look at how this would affect labour and management and also of course, how it would affect the third party, in this case, the shipper.

I want to talk about how this would affect the shipper in this case. In my position I am most familiar with how it would affect the agriculture industry in Saskatchewan particularly in Moose Jaw—Lake Centre.

I want to look back at the labour dispute in Vancouver a little over a year ago. We looked at something like 11 days of tie ups. The grain industry never recovered all summer from that labour dispute. I know that firsthand. I live about two and a half miles from the grain elevators in my home town and our community never recovered and Saskatchewan never recovered from that short labour tie up.

I also looked at some of the evidence I received in the last few days. There is a statement from Mr. Blair Wright of Olds, Alberta, an alfalfa dehydrator. He said that his company was just beginning to make inroads to Japan. He estimated that he lost $500,000 in revenue during that shut down in Vancouver last year.

He also said that the Japanese businessmen he deals with stated they cannot understand why Canada allows such destruction of its export business. Mr. Wright is obviously concerned that he will lose his Asian markets entirely for this emerging product. He also stated that the American ports on the west coast are actively promoting their continuous delivery to Asian markets. The port of Vancouver has the potential to lose major customers if this government does not take legal means to prevent further labour disruption.

I also talked to alfalfa dehydrators in Saskatchewan last week. They told me that a labour dispute of one week is an annoyance. A labour dispute of two weeks inflicts serious pain on their industry. Anything longer than a two week labour dispute is a complete disaster to the industry.

With regard to things like canola prices, although they may not be directly affected, on Monday, March 13 the price of canola was $9.44 in my hometown. By Wednesday morning it had dropped to $9.20, a drop of some 24 cents. Is that directly related to labour problems? Perhaps some of it could be related.

Having said that, I look at the innocent third party, the shipper. I know this piece of legislation would do the job to alleviate those types of problems and frustrations. I look at labour and the unions. There have been arguments in this House that it is not fair to labour to have final offer selection. I do not agree with that. I see what long term labour disputes do to labour. I have seen it in my home area of Moose Jaw.

There have been two major strikes at Moose Jaw Sash and Door. The people were on strike or locked out for more than three years. The company ended up closing its doors. Did that help labour? No.

Moose Jaw meat packers were on strike for some 18 months recently. I had the opportunity to drive by their strike location many times. These people were playing horseshoes and cards because there was no work to do. Did that help those people? No. The labour dispute did not solve one thing for labour in that instance. I talked to many people on the line. They were willing to go back to work. They wanted to go back to work, to some real work. There is no way in the world they could ever hope to recoup any of the financial loss they faced by being out on strike for so long.

Looking at that, labour is in a no win situation. In a discussion paper written by Mr. Errol Black and Mr. Jim Silver, they quote the idea of final offer selection. They say: "The fact is that final offer selection is aimed at a real need, namely, the problems of workers in weak bargaining units".

• (1140)

They go on to say: "Final offer selection provides such workers with an alternative to strikes which they have little chance of winning. Any repeal of final offer selection", which by the way is in place in Manitoba, "and this problem—unionizing and winning gains for workers in weak bargaining positions—will remain". This is more evidence that long labour tie ups have a harmful negative effect on workers.

I want to talk about management, or the businesses and companies. When they face long term labour disputes either by strike or lockout it really disrupts the orderly flow of any product. Again, in this case I look at agriculture products from Saskatchewan to either Vancouver or Thunder Bay. When we see a tie up like that, there is no way in the world to recoup financially those losses faced in a very short period of time.

I look back to last year's labour dispute and remember talking to people in the grain industry. They said there was no way in the world they could catch up to what they had lost in a very short time. Those effects are felt immediately.

I spoke earlier about the labour dispute at Moose Jaw Sash and Door. That company was locked out and on strike for so long that it closed its doors. The company is no longer in existence. Did that solve any problems for the good of business? I do not think so. That is why we have to look at some alternative to bring this thing together so that we do not have these problems as time goes on.

If we talked to all three parties we could sell them on the idea for final offer selection and for this bill. In my mind, as a farmer from central Saskatchewan, as my colleague mentioned before, I have seen the effects firsthand of these types of labour disputes. We never recover from them.

My colleague across the way said we cannot call this an essential service. I am not calling it an essential service, but it is essential to the livelihood and future of those people in my province. Their financial lives, perhaps not their physical lives, depend on getting their products from their farm gate to the port. That is the way we do business in Saskatchewan. That is the way we make our living. If that is interrupted then it is essential in my mind because it has a very far ranging, serious effect on my livelihood.

In conclusion, again I would urge all members of this House to support this legislation. It is the first real positive step I have seen since I have been in this House to eliminate a big, broad problem with a wide ranging approach, a fair approach and an approach that makes a lot of common sense to me.

Mr. Bernie Collins (Souris—Moose Mountain, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege and pleasure to rise this morning and speak on Bill C–262 which is before the House. As a former member of a trade union for many years, I find it interesting that this bill would be put forward at this time, although the issues before us are very serious.

The bill calls for amendments to some sections of the Canada Labour Code which impact labour dispute settlement mechanisms. Specifically, the title of the bill states that it is intended to provide for the settlement of labour disputes affecting the export of grain by arbitration and to amend the Public Service Staff Relations Act in consequence thereof.

I strongly suggest the bill is not appropriate both in the legislation and in its timing as it would introduce an unfortunate mechanism. The government is currently in the process of making unprecedented changes to the grain transportation system which will have far reaching effects, rather than bringing yet another complex mix and not bringing about the change we are looking for.

• (1145)

This is not the way we want to solve the problems we are experiencing in the grain handling system. It is important to note that we already have the means to alleviate the problems. Recently introduced legislation meant that dock workers had to return to their jobs in Vancouver and grain and other shipments were moving.

The issue demands more than just a temporary measure. The labour minister has introduced a commission to study labour relations at established ports. The commission will look into the long term solutions to this dispute and similar ones in the future. The commission, I should add, is only part of the government's ongoing efforts to streamline Canada's grain handling system.

These problems do not go unnoticed. As a result the Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food on May 16 gathered a group together to examine many of the issues. The group was formed to look at short term grain movement, the problems of long term resolution and of recurring difficulties. It included labour unions representing the grain handling and transportation system.

The movement of grain is not done in isolation by any one collective workers group. That is why the team approach has to be taken. For further proof we need only to look at the records or the grain shipments to many terminals in this crop year.

We recognize that we have had labour problems in the past with grain handling. I believe the way to resolve the problems is not by providing arbitration to prevent strikes and lockouts. Rather labour must be productive and constructive and become a partner in developing an effective process for the movement of grain.

There is no doubt that it is a serious problem. We are prepared to respect the collective bargaining process to promote co–operation between the parties in a dispute either through mediation or conciliation.

My colleagues at human resources development have indicated that 90 per cent of collective agreements referred to conciliation are resolved without a work stoppage. In instances that result in negative impacts on entire sectors the government has demonstrated as recently as in the past week it is prepared to step in and break deadlocks. As such there is no need to introduce amendments to the Canada Labour Code. If we look at the experiences of countries in which compulsory arbitration is widely practised we see that strikes continue to occur.

Grain transportation is a very large and very complex industry involving numerous trades. For instance, 12 companies are operating terminal elevators, 14 companies are operating transfer elevators and 19 elevator companies are in the prairies. In addition we must add the two major railways that move our grain products by vessel to the Great Lakes and to our external ports.

Are we prepared to remove the collective bargaining rights of all these people? There is an enormous degree of complexity and we understand the concerns of all. To single out one group of men and women, the vast majority of whom have never had an industrial dispute through Parliament, strikes me as less than fair. Co–operation is the way to establishing partnerships fundamental to the economy and the well–being of society.

The adoption of Bill C–262 is not likely to produce results even close to what is desired. Rather I would suggest members support the efforts currently under way to reduce problems in our grain transportation system.

It is fundamental that changes have to take place in the western grain transportation system. These changes were recently introduced in the federal budget. They will create a less rigid and more responsive operating environment in which a faster, lower cost and more efficient system may evolve, the benefits of which will be shared by all.

Therefore, for all these reasons I do not feel I could support introduction of new legislation at this time.

Mr. Monte Solberg (Medicine Hat, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, let me start by pointing out that I think it is important to put into context the whole debate about back to work legislation, the shutdown of the railway system and best offer arbitration.

Let me do so by pointing out that Canadian farmers are probably the best farmers in the world. They are the most productive and the most efficient. If it were just on that basis they had to make their living everything would be fine; they would be extremely prosperous and the country would benefit as a whole. However there are all kinds of other issues that raise their head and stand in the way of farmers actually being able to earn a proper living.

One of them is the trade war that seems to be ongoing with the U.S. and Europe. At the same time we have huge government debts and deficits that contribute to high input costs, high taxes and high interest rates which all conspire to make it very difficult for Canadian farmers to compete particularly against Americans.

Meanwhile we have farm institutions like the Canadian Wheat Board and the transportation system that are in desperate need of reform. There is tremendous pressure on the wheat board to change, not only from Americans, our competitors, but from inside, from people who actually support the wheat board. They want to see change. The hon. member for Vegreville has been at the forefront of pushing for a democratic wheat board elected by farmers and with farmers on the board. That makes sense to me.

I want to talk for a moment about the history of the transportation system in Canada. Even when it is not shut down by a strike it is at best inefficient and slow. I do not know how many calls I have received over the last year and a half from people asking: "Why are there no cars at my elevator? What happened to my grain as it disappeared down the track?"

We need Bill C–262. There is no question in my mind. It is one thing the government can do to bring to an end the problem we face today. As fate would have it, we are debating Bill C–262 on a day when we have a rail strike in the country. It will also provide a long term solution.

I encourage the government across the way to set aside partisan differences, to consider what is for the greater good and to consider farmers across the country. Actually the unions and the employers will benefit by this type of legislation, by best offer selection arbitration. We encourage the government to set that aside and to join with Reform today, the hon. member for Lethbridge, to bring the whole issue to an end by supporting Bill C–262 and by bringing some sanity back into the transportation system.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): It being 11.53 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 93, the time provided for debate has expired. Accordingly the question is on second reading and reference of Bill C–262. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Call in the members.

(The House divided on the motion, which was negatived on the following division:)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I declare the motion negatived.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. Lucienne Robillard (Minister of Labour, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the paralyzing effect of the national railway strike requires urgent action by Parliament. Pursuant to Standing Order 53, I move the following:

[Translation]

> That the forty-eight hours' notice be waived in order to permit the Minister of Labour to introduce immediately a bill entitled an act to provide for the maintenance of railway operations and subsidiary services; and
> That the House not adjourn this day except pursuant to a motion by a minister of the Crown.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Debate is allowed for a period of not exceeding one hour.

[Translation]

Mrs. Robillard: Mr. Speaker, I would like to give members of this House the background which I feel is important regarding the negotiations in the railway labour dispute. As you know, most of the collective agreements, with very few exceptions, expired on December 31, 1993. Therefore, we have been without collective agreements per se since December 31, 1993, and negotiations have been ongoing.

We have tried to help the parties to find a solution. First, a conciliator was appointed, and then, in November 1994, my predecessor, the Minister of Human Resources Development, appointed a conciliation commissioner, Mr. Hope, to work out a solution with the parties. He submitted his report to the parties in February 1995.

• (1230)

Since then, negotiations have continued, but they have been strained, and, as you know, the unions decided to concentrate their efforts on pressuring Canadian Pacific. Fortunately, last week, three unions, representing approximately 3,000 people, reached an agreement in principle and Canadian Pacific was able to continue all of its other activities.

Unfortunately, last Saturday, there was a full work stoppage at Canadian National and VIA Rail. Following this work stoppage, I called all of the parties, that is the three companies and the union representatives from these companies, to a meeting. I met with them yesterday afternoon and I asked them to resolve all of the issues in dispute, or, at the very least, to reach an agreement on the process which will lead to a solution to the dispute, which will be binding on the two parties.

I told them that the current government has faith in the collective bargaining process and, therefore, that we would regret being obliged to step in if the parties were unable to reach an agreement. I even advised them that it would be in the best interest of both parties, as much the companies as the unions, to agree at the very least on the process to be used to resolve the dispute, which would be binding on both of them.

Unfortunately, the parties did not come to an agreement, so that we find ourselves in this House at 12.30 p.m. on a Monday without any CN or VIA Rail services in operation as we speak, although some operations are still under way at CP. Even though some operations are affected, some others are still being carried out.

What is the impact of a complete work stoppage as we speak? Let us first look at the VIA Rail situation. The impact on the majority of passengers using VIA Rail services is, I think, quite obvious. I would remind the members of this House that VIA Rail serves at least 500 communities from coast to coast, which means that all its passengers have been paying the price since Saturday, especially those who commute to work by train. This morning, we witnessed the possible consequences for the population, especially in densely populated urban areas.

True, there are other means of transportation but when we look at what is happening, for example, around Toronto and Montreal, it is clear that not all passengers can be accommodated by public bus or even private car transportation. On this Monday morning, all these passengers, all these people were penalized by the work stoppage. I think that we should allow VIA Rail workers to go back to work as soon as possible, so that these people are no longer penalized.

• (1235)

It is true that the situation is different at CP Rail. Canadian National is not an operation serving the public but rather providing transportation services essential to the Canadian economy.

Needless to say this will have tremendous financial implications for the various train transportation users and industries that ship their goods by train. Many Canadian industries depend on the railway system. The impact of this withdrawal of transportation services may vary from industry to industry depending on the availability of alternate means of transportation.

Of course, bulk commodity shippers in general—commodities such as sulphur, potash and grain as well as mining companies, major electrical household appliance manufacturers and car manufacturers—are the main users of the train system. Many transport companies and associations, including the Canadian Industrial Transportation League, the Canadian Wheat Board and several car manufacturers, have indicated that a prolonged work stoppage would be extremely prejudicial to their operations.

It is clear that at the industry level, in various sectors like Western grain, this work stoppage may have a very major economic impact. As we speak, we are told that Canadian National is losing between $9 million and $10 million per day.

We can see right away how serious the situation is and how it can compromise this country's credibility as a reliable supplier, even on the export market. The impacts are tremendous. On the one hand, you have impacts affecting the public at VIA Rail and, on the other hand, economic impacts for several industries.

While we regret having to bring in back–to–work legislation—I repeat, regret, because we continue to believe that a negotiated settlement would be better—the government must assume its responsibilities and take action. That is why I hope that the opposition parties will realize what is at stake and give consent so that we can debate this bill today.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I simply want to clarify a point. Pursuant to Standing Order 53, the debate may not exceed one hour. No member may speak more than once, nor longer than ten minutes.

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Bloc Quebecois is opposed to passing that legislation today. We are aware of the impact of a work stoppage in a sector such as railway operations. The minister said that Canada must be a reliable supplier and she also pointed out the economic consequences of such a conflict. However, she did not say anything about the plight of those who—and they did not do it for the fun of it—had to walk out under very unpleasant conditions.

• (1240)

As far as I know, Canada has a labour code. If back–to–work legislation is tabled every time the Labour Code is invoked by workers who have no other means to negotiate a settlement, this means that the mechanisms required to ensure strict and fair labour relations do not exist.

What this bill really does is prove the employers right. I wish that were not the case, but just take a look at the newspapers and read the recommendations made by commissioner Hope, who reviewed the issue. He says that the employers were very uncompromising and that, in fact, the unions' demands were never taken into consideration.

It is very easy to speak against a given union or union member. However, let us not forget that company managers and executives often enjoy personal benefits, salaries, bonuses and stocks which do not make any sense and which do not exist in other countries. I always think of Japan, where the gap between employers and employees' salaries is much narrower than it is here.

Canadian workers are in a difficult situation. No one mentions the fact that, over the years, they waived many rights to preserve a single one: the right to a job. It is important that these workers can tell all Canadians that they made concessions, but that they are not prepared to lose the essential in an industry which needs skilled workers.

It is important to remember, although this is not necessarily popular, that workers have acquired certain rights and that, at the very least, they have the right to exercise this kind of pressure—not an easy thing to do—to show that they exist and to avoid being crushed by the system.

I would have liked to hear the minister talk about people. If the government decided to intervene every time certain behaviours were found to be harmful to the economy, it would often have cause to do so, not only in labour disputes. It would intervene in the case of companies whose practices do not promote productivity. Workers are not pawns, they are people. If a company is to be productive, workers must have working conditions that reflect a minimum of fairness, otherwise the cost will be far greater than that of a strike that does neither party any good.

Yes, some workers are on strike, but others have been locked out. And others were swept along because they refused to cross picket lines. All things considered, we are not very happy about the situation.

However, this does not mean we should deny these workers their rights. Canadians should at least be told about the conditions they gave up for the sake of one, and that these workers should have access to a fair and equitable settlement. Today, we should confirm their right to use pressure to defend their position and to engage in free collective bargaining. Otherwise, if employers can always count on the government to deal with their problems, they will never agree to a fair settlement.

Sure, they have certain constraints. Sure, these constraints are genuine. But in a situation like this, there are always two parties, and employers cannot take the position that only their interests should guide Parliament and the government. For these reasons, because we want to encourage free collective bargaining, because we want workers to be able to stand up for their rights and because we want Parliament to respect its own legislation—I am referring to the Canada Labour Code—we will not agree to fast tracking this legislation today.

[English]

Mr. Dale Johnston (Wetaskiwin, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak today. The whole transportation system in Canada being tied up is a matter of pressing concern.

These services are never considered to be essential until after the services are withdrawn. We are not talking strictly about a strike. We are talking about a work stoppage. A work stoppage can be brought about whether it is a strike or a lockout. Whenever I refer to this situation I am talking about the work stoppage. People will understand we have work stoppages taking place in two separate areas. One is the withdrawal of services and the other is an area where the people are actually locked out.

These work stoppages result in a lot of lost jobs. My friends in the government party have campaigned vigorously on restoring jobs. This is certainly an opportunity for them to put up in this case, put their best foot forward and come up with legislation that will put these people back to work.

This is a stop gap measure. This is not a solution for the long haul. My party has been encouraging the government to come up with some long term solutions. For labour and management to have the possibility of back to work legislation constantly a threat they do not exactly sharpen their pencils and come to their best position. A case in point is where we have these contracts expiring up to 27 months before the actual work stoppage takes place. That is not collective bargaining at its best. That is not the process working.

In the House on March 3 I asked the minister what she was prepared to do in order to come up with some long term solutions. I was assured the collective bargaining process was working wonderfully and could expect it to work that way in the future.

• (1250)

Obviously it has not. Here we are once again trying to get unanimous consent from the House. I hope we do so we can get the parties back to the table, the rolling stock moving on the rails again, the passenger trains running again and the freight moving to its customers. That is of utmost importance. It is not just that we are looking at losses to farmers. We are looking at losses to farmers, huge losses, but there is a great spinoff of lost jobs as well.

Once these jobs are lost it will be impossible to get them back. Once the buyers of our services and our goods have decided they can get them from other sources it will take a lot of negotiation and a lot of proving that we will not put up with this kind of labour disruption in the future to prove to them that we are a reliable supplier of goods and services.

The people in the Bloc seem not to support the notion of introducing this legislation. It is of utmost importance to introduce this legislation today. I call on my colleagues from the Bloc to give their consent to this legislation so that we can debate it properly and get the parties back to the table and the freight moving again. To do otherwise is partisan politics at its worst, not looking at Canada's overall benefit.

Our colleagues in the Bloc could easily dismiss this as one of Canada's problems. After all, their ultimate goal is to separate from Canada. They could implement any kind of labour legislation they like. I would plead with them to support the introduction of this legislation today.

I assume me colleagues in the NDP will not support the introduction of this bill today. It would be extremely difficult for them to justify to their constituents how they could hold up a bill for another 48 hours which would effectively bring to the market the goods their constituents are producing. This is an extremely costly situation. It is not just the direct jobs, but the spinoff jobs. The long term effect of this has not been addressed.

Many customers of Canada's goods in the past have put up with disruptions of this type and are counting on back to work legislation. If this is not dealt with, to get these people back to the table and to get these parties talking again and the stock moving at a reasonable pace, our customers will say this is the last time they are prepared to put up with this kind of here today, gone tomorrow freight service. They will start looking for alternate routes to ship their goods.

Mr. Lorne Hehn, chief commissioner of the Canadian Wheat Board, said we cannot afford to shut down a multibillion dollar industry for the sake of a few people. These services are never considered essential until after they have been withdrawn. Suddenly these are essential services.

When will this government come up with legislation to deal with these problems over the big picture, rather than this crisis management attitude?

• (1255)

At the moment crisis management is something we must consider in order to get us over this hump. I implore the government to come up with similar legislation to what it so very efficiently defeated here, presented by my colleague in Bill C–262.

The senior grain transportation committee voted on October 14, 1994 to support a system of final offer arbitration for all labour negotiations affecting grain movement. I have heard some of my colleagues in the Bloc say this effectively bans the collective agreement process. This is absolutely ridiculous. It is an augmentation to the collective bargaining process. This is not something imposed on the partners in the collective bargaining process from on high. It is something either one of the parties can invite.

It induces those parties to come up with a reasonable offer, their best offer to begin with. Instead of having negotiations or pseudo negotiations for 27 months, as in the case of one union, they could get their heads together and figure out their final position and present that position to begin with, rather than to parley back and forth for 27 months without getting anywhere.

This is a controversial bill and some of my colleagues in the House are philosophically opposed to having this bill presented. I implore them to allow it to be presented. I passionately ask they allow first reading of the bill so we can at least debate it and get it on the floor of the House where it belongs and to do what we can to begin to replenish or regain our reputation as a reputable supplier of goods.

[Translation]

Mr. Nick Discepola (Vaudreuil, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would first like to thank the Reform Party members who have already indicated they would further support this bill. I would ask the Bloc Quebecois members to think a bit before maintaining the position they have taken.

I could talk to you today of the disastrous effects this crisis is having on large businesses such as General Motors, Hoechst Canada, Canadian Celanese, Ford and others, but who in this House is speaking on behalf of all Canadians, not just those in my own riding, who have no means of defence?

As we talk, Canadian National is, to all intents and purposes, closed down; so is VIA. Canadian Pacific is operating at barely 85 per cent capacity.

With each hour we waste, the impact grows more serious. Certain grain exports have frozen. Last week, the minister tabled a bill for a return to work in the port of Vancouver. It seems to me that the political stand taken by the Bloc Quebecois members will hamper the settlement of this dispute and an eventual return to work.

With the tabling of the budget, last week, I got barely one phone call in my riding. With this dispute, however, which has gone on for months already, I have received calls from all sorts of people, including ordinary businessmen and businesswomen who are unable to go and collect the raw materials they need and whose business, therefore, could well close tomorrow, because the production line is stopped. It seems to me the problem is serious, serious enough for us to give thought to it and to put an end to the dispute.

• (1300)

Bloc Quebecois members accuse us of robbing these people of the right to negotiate. The bill that we are introducing today does not, as they claim, violate their freedom to resolve this dispute, when we consider that they have been trying to work their problems out for fifteen months now. It is true that they were unsuccessful, however, this bill does not rob the various parties concerned of their freedom to go back to the bargaining table.

The minister herself made many personal attempts. Last night, she met with the three unions. Last night, the three parties admitted themselves to the media that they have come to a dead end. Is it advisable to wait another day or two? Is it advisable, as the New Democrats and the Bloc Quebecois advocate, to vote against this bill simply in order to forestall the inevitable?

[English]

I would like to speak for the average Canadian who is affected, whether as a commuter on the Rigaud line or the Deux Montagnes line to Montreal, who relies on the rail service to get to work every day and who does not have the benefit of a second or a third car. Who speaks for them? Who speaks for the small entrepreneurs who are trying to get their imported goods off the docks in Montreal?

It is very easy to convene a press conference when you are General Motors or Ford Motor company. It is for those small business people that I feel we have to solve this problem.

It is true this has a tremendous economic impact, not only for the large rail companies but for the local economy in the Montreal area for which I speak with great vigour. The port of Montreal has paralysed shipments and the railway has paralysed shipments across Canada. I take my hat off to the Minister of Labour who has only been here a short while but has certainly been indoctrinated very quickly. She has done an excellent job and has introduced two very difficult measures.

As the minister said in her preamble, as a government we would have preferred not to introduce back to work legislation. It is always more desirable when both parties can agree. But both parties have not been able to agree. They have been trying for almost 15 months.

I would like to quote a report in this morning's Gazette by the federal conciliator, Mr. Allan Hope, who is quoted as saying: "All three railways have tabled extremely controversial and provocative demands that they see essential to their financial health and viability". He wrote in February: "It would be difficult to conceive of an bargaining initiative more likely to provoke an impasse". The parties have tried. Right now we are at a standstill. It is not going to get any better.

From talking to various people and watching television reports yesterday with stranded commuters about the threat of the possible shutdown of suburban railways, people will have more difficulty getting to work. I would ask all members on both sides of the House to support legislation so we can adopt it as quickly as possible.

It may not solve the deep rooted, underlying problems in the railway industry which we have discussed before. But I hope that despite this return to work legislation that all parties on both sides will continue to try to solve the long lasting dispute, put aside their differences for the betterment of the country, for the establishment of a reliable service that Canadians, importers and exporters, that small as well as large businesses can rely on. We do not have a law——like we have in Quebec, an act on essential services. It would be ideal if the federal government had similar legislation, but it does not.

[Translation]

• (1305)

For example, when there are municipal disputes, basic services still have to be provided.

[English]

In this case we cannot provide a reliable service where there is ongoing, continual labour conflicts. It puts in jeopardy not only the economic viability of the country but the local economy as well. The local economy in Montreal has suffered enormously.

[Translation]

In closing, I would like to ask my colleagues from the Bloc Quebecois to reconsider the impact which this dispute has already had and will continue to have on the province of Quebec and on the Montreal region especially and perhaps decide to vote in favour of this bill.

[English]

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I would like to register my objection to the process that is unfolding here this morning. I do so on the basis of the fact that the government has had an alternative in this regard for some time, ever since its election in October 1993. The government could have been moving on the policy front toward a transportation system or policy which would have reassured people working in the railways that there is a future for them and the railways in this country.

If rail workers had that assurance and did not feel that in some ways the rail industry was not targeted for total extinction or anything quite like that, but nevertheless not being enhanced by the appropriate policy decisions and therefore suffering over time continuous decline, then perhaps rail workers would feel more confident in their negotiations with the company in the context of negotiations about job security and employment security and a variety of other things. Because they feel that one decision after another seems to point to an increasing downsizing and diminishing of the role of rail transport in our overall transportation policy they are obviously not willing to accept that when push comes to shove it is their particular economic self–interest that has to be sacrificed.

I will go back to something I said last week when we were debating back to work legislation. If there was a capital strike in this country, as there sometimes is in various ways, would we have an emergency debate? Would we have an emergency motion? Would we have long and sober debates on trying to make capital pay attention to the national interest and to the needs of the Canadian economy? It would be quite the contrary.

We are forever exalting such decisions as good business decisions that we have to somehow appease, the decisions that investors make, money speculators make, currency traders make or others make when they do not take the national interest into account and when they do things that destabilize the economy, put people out of work or advocate a high real interest rate policy that maybe causes people to lose their homes. All kinds of things happen because of the decisions that other people make in their economic self–interest and we simply say: "That is the way it is. That is the marketplace. That is life so get used to it. Let us see if we cannot do something to give these people what they want so they will not make these kinds of decisions".

When working people strike we see how important they are to the economy, do we not? The whole thing depends on day after day people getting up and doing their jobs, whether it is running trains, maintaining the tracks or whatever the case may be. But when working people strike all of a sudden the full force of the law is brought to bear on them.

Opposition members of Parliament are expected to walk freely into the tent, consult with the government and then do whatever the government wants them to do. Two weeks ago if I had had an opinion on railway concerns I might as well have spoken it into the great white telephone, for all the attention I would have received from the government.

Now the government wants me to agree. Now it wants workers to agree. In the meantime it has no qualms about getting rid of the Crow rate, or deregulating, or privatizing CN or doing all kinds of things like that. That is okay.

It is in protest of that and not just on some kind of a principle having to do with back to work legislation that I object to the process this morning.

[Translation]

Mr. Osvaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ): Mr. Speaker, since I am a former FTQ trade unionist, I must rise to tell you that compulsory back–to–work legislation does not solve the problems. I was active in the FTQ for 19 years. Despite the many laws passed at both the provincial and federal levels, the problems continue to exist and sometimes even get worse, because this is not the way to resolve labour relations problems, especially since this goes against the principles adopted by the government and supported by both union and management.

The right to negotiate, which has been recognized by the International Labour Organization, the Government of Canada, the provincial governments, the employers and the unions, must be fully exercised. I think that until now, the unions did not have the opportunity to negotiate with the employers. I think that the companies have acted in bad faith toward the employees in these negotiations. The companies have tried to dictate the issues to be negotiated, to impose their strength and arrogance on the unions. The unions are not responsible for the negotiations dragging on, because it is the companies that want to go against the basic principle of job security.

No union or employee in the world can say yes to employers who want to cut thousands and thousands of jobs in an attempt to make mobility one of their labour relations goals. Workers want a certain level of job security and some protection with regard to their job descriptions. Of course, all strikes present disadvantages, but the right to strike is a universal right which is exercised in every country, including the U.S.

Disadvantages are part of the rules of the game which, again, have been recognized by international organizations, the employers, the government and the unions. I was surprised that the minister would make a speech on her bill but not say a word about the workers' legitimate demands or to condemn companies for trying to impose their views knowing that the government will protect them, this Liberal government is behind them.

We want these 7,000 workers on strike or lockout to also be afforded representation, to have someone speak on their behalf in Parliament. That is what we, the Bloc Quebecois, are doing and we do not want to debate this back–to–work legislation today. Even Commissioner Hope said, in his report, that the companies did not bargain in good faith. He did not use these very words but when he said that the companies are trying to impose their own agenda and ignore union demands, that is what he meant.

• (1315)

I am surprised that the hon. minister did not say a word about labour relations in the rail transportation industry, not mentioning that problems exist and that the government has neglected to deal with them because the collective agreements expired on December 31, 1993. That is why I fully support the remarks made by our critic in this area, the hon. member for Mercier.

[English]

Ms. Mary Clancy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to stand in support of the government on this measure.

It is very interesting that we should get this impassioned defence.

An hon. member: Why did you not vote on the other bill?

Ms. Clancy: I did not vote for that bill because this is a much better bill. If the member will read them both, he will see it. Perhaps that may be a difficulty for him.

At any rate, with regard to this legislation and the response of the official opposition, Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, may I say that it is very interesting. I stand here as the member for Halifax, the city with the great port which needs the railway to ensure that the port continues to bring prosperity to the people of the metropolitan Halifax area, to Nova Scotia and to Atlantic Canada.

It is very interesting that we hear from the members of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition all this rant about the workers. The hon. member for Bourassa who just spoke chose to come to this country and we are so glad he did. While we are glad he chose to come here in one way or another, the answer too is that he obviously chose Canada because of the way we do protect workers but we protect the peace, order and good government of this country as well.

A rail strike such as this is not the kind of protection or the kind of activity that means this country will continue to be prosperous. Look at a few of the things that are taking place because of this industrial action.

There is the loss of $10 million per day to Canadian National alone, a permanent loss of rail traffic to truck, therefore sapping the financial viability of our rail system. As one of the members opposite actually said—and I agree, do not faint—once these jobs are gone, it is very difficult to get them back. There is also the adverse image of Canada as a reliable supplier to world markets, Japan, for example.

As I said before, the problems of the ports and most particularly the port of Halifax in my estimation is something we could no longer let go by the boards.

May I offer my congratulations to the Minister of Labour who has certainly come through in an amazing way. She has had her baptism by fire as a new member in this House. We on this side are very proud of the minister. We want to congratulate her. I certainly want to congratulate her on behalf of my constituents and the people of Nova Scotia.

She has been a lucid voice in an otherwise overly emotional debate. The minister stood up this weekend and prior to it and asked people to do the right thing, to think of the country as a whole and to come back to the table. Only when all else failed did she say that the answer was back to work legislation.

The minister met with representatives of all companies and unions to urge them to resolve their disputes, or at least to agree on a binding process to resolve their disputes. When the parties reported that they were unable to reach such an understanding, when they reported that collective bargaining negotiations had reached an impasse, she knew that nothing could be gained by further delay.

Most of these collective agreements expired on December 31, 1993, well over a year ago. For some others it was as long ago as December 31, 1991. Extensive federal assistance has been provided to the parties including the assistance of conciliation officers and a conciliation commissioner. The process has been going on for well over a year.

This government acted and will continue to act in the best interests of the people of Canada. It does not act with a hidden or secret agenda. It is absolutely necessary that the railway business continues, that it goes on for the proper commercial work to be done in this country. Whether one lives in my riding of Halifax with a port, or anywhere across this great country, the railway has been and will continue to be an absolutely essential link in the commerce of Canada.

To do this is not in any way, shape or form—as has been suggested in a manner I find distasteful—contrary to the interests over the long term of Canadian workers. It is not so and cannot even for a moment be considered to be so because the health and prosperity of this country is the first and foremost concern of this government, beginning with the Prime Minister and working down to everyone who sits on this side of the House.

Action on the railway bill is absolutely urgent because CN is shut down, VIA is shut down, and CP is operating at 85 per cent capacity or less. The impact grows with every day and every hour. That impact is bad for every Canadian from coast to coast.

Grain shipments are compromised. Auto plants depend on just in time deliveries that will not make it. Layoffs can be expected to start today. That is not very good for the workers of Canada. I would like to know what my hon. friend on the other side would say to that.

Raw materials movement will be minimal while this goes on. As I said before, our reputation as an exporter is at stake. That is certainly not good for anyone who works in this country, be it someone who labours in the particular field or be it a member of Parliament. People are affected, especially commuters around Toronto and Montreal. With 50,000 who use commuter rail every day, the result is traffic chaos in two of our major cities.

Is there any value to waiting any longer? The process between the parties is at an impasse. Negotiations, as I have said, have gone on in the shortest of cases for over a year, in the longest for over three years. There have been conciliation officers and a conciliation commissioner. The minister has listened and has made a decision. The government and members on this side of the House support her decision and we will continue to do so.

This is an absolute necessity for the people of Canada, for the health of this country. I am proud to stand and support this legislation, to support this government, and most particularly to support our newest Minister of Labour.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat disappointed by the hon. member's comments to the effect that the member for Bourassa was not born here, but came to Canada later. She wondered if he was aware of the working conditions here.

I believe he was very aware of those conditions; in fact, he probably knows them better than she does. It is deplorable that such a distinction be made by a member of this House.

As regards the port of Halifax, I want to point out that the Bloc Quebecois took the same stand in the case of both Vancouver and Montreal harbours. I did not hear the hon. member allude to the port of Montreal, where a lockout has been in effect for some ten days now. Is this because it was just fine with the people in Halifax? Some of her Liberal colleagues told me: the strike or lockout in the port of Montreal can go on because, in the meantime, Halifax is doing very well. Things were going well, but this is no longer the case.

In Montreal, the union proposed to go back to work if a mediator was appointed. Last Wednesday, the labour minister promised that such a mediator would be appointed, but she has not done so yet. Part of the problem in Montreal is that one employer, Calmar, which belongs to CP, refuses to let normal activities resume in the port of Montreal.

An hon. member: Is that so?

• (1325)

Mr. Duceppe: Yes, they are opposed to the resumption of normal activities in the port, something the longshoremen are prepared to do with a mediator. It has been 20 years since there was a labour dispute in the port of Montreal. A tradition of good bargaining. At Canadian Pacific, the current attitude to labour relations has been to take a hard line and let labour disputes fester without resolution and then ask for special legislation.

I heard the chairman of the Quebec Liberal Caucus say earlier: "But there are no essential services". And why not? Do you know why? Because there is no anti-scab legislation. There are no anti-scab provisions in the Canada Labour Code. This government came to power a year ago. It promised to introduce legislation but it never did. It was in favour of such provisions when it was in the opposition but not any more. We have seen nothing so far. Sure, a working paper was distributed with several proposals for anti-scab legislation where it would take 60 per cent and scabs would become legal. Quite something. They call it anti-scab legislation, but they would allow scabs under this proposal.

One last comment, since my time is almost up. I agree there may be emergencies and I agree that from time to time we may have to consider legislating workers back to work. But after 15 hours, in one case, and 24 hours, in the other? Let us get this straight: Either they have the right to strike or they do not. If we want no more strikes, we should pass legislation accordingly, but we should not give the parties the impression that this right exists—if they have that right, they should exercise it—while resorting to special legislation. We cannot have it both ways. Either the right to strike exists and it may be exercised, or it does not. Let us stop resorting to special legislation. Let us put our cards on the table and be logical instead of pretending to support public service employees during the election campaign and then doing what they are doing now.

This party talks like the New Democratic Party during the election campaign and acts like the Progressive Conservative Party once it is in power. That is the Liberals for you.

[English]

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I was not proposing to take part in this debate. However, since there is time, I am quite happy to say something in response to the ridiculous comments we have heard from opposition members as to their excuse for not supporting this urgent and important legislation that really should be dealt with in this House.

Many of my constituents are gravely inconvenienced by this strike. They are more than just inconvenienced. The question which arises in respect of this strike is the economic loss to our country as a result of the failure to ship the things that have to get to port to be exported from Canada. This country is going through an export boom. To have a serious disruptive strike, whatever the problems that may have arisen to cause it and whatever the reason, is a serious economic loss to Canada at this stage in our economic cycle.

The Minister of Finance recently tabled a budget. Clearly, the success of that budget depends in part on the export growth that is booming in Canada today and which should be supported by every member of this House. We have an obligation to see to it that Canada's prosperity is not obstructed by some serious work stoppage which is preventing one of the most important things in our country, that is, exports which are going on at this moment and every hour of every day. They are being blocked because the opposition is unwilling to bring an end to this strike through some lawful means.

We proposed a fair solution to it. Members may not like it but it is a fair solution. Opposition members know that perfectly well, yet they persist in obduracy and say they will not allow us to change the rules in respect of this bill. They allowed the rules to be changed last week and I grant that, but they will not do so with respect to this bill to ensure that these people are put back to work so that jobs are not lost to Canadians.

We believe in creating jobs in this country. That is part of the philosophy of the Liberal government. I am surprised the opposition does not share that philosophy. One of the ways we create jobs is by exports. This strike is stopping exports. It is costing Canadians jobs. We should end it right away and the faster the better. The opposition knows it perfectly well.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Pursuant to Standing Order 53, the period of one hour has expired.

It is now my duty to ask all members who object to the motion to rise.

And more than 10 members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Ten or more members having risen, pursuant to Standing Order 53, the motion is deemed to have been withdrawn.

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1995–96

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C–73, an act to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year beginning on April 1, 1995, as reported (without amendment) from the committee.

Hon. Alfonso Gagliano (for Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.) moved that the bill be concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Call in the members.

(The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:)

The Speaker: I declare the motion carried. When shall the bill be read a third time? Later this day?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think you would find unanimous consent to call it two o'clock, thereby allowing for 15 minutes for statements under Standing Order 31 and continuing with the question period for 45 minutes so that no time is lost for either statements or questions.

The Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Speaker: It being 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(5) the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31, with the proviso that question period will end at approximately 3.08.

JOURNÉE INTERNATIONALE DE LA FRANCOPHONIE

Mr. Martin Cauchon (Outremont, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today, March 20, is the Journée internationale de la Francophonie.

Moreover, this year is the 25th anniversary of this celebration of French culture and language, which was marked by the creation of the Cultural and Technical Co-operation Agency.

The Francophonie, which unites 47 countries, can be described as the community of peoples who speak French to varying degrees.

Since 1970, Canada has played a leading role in the development of the Francophonie. Through its membership in the Francophonie, Canada shares with the rest of the world our physiognomical traits and gives French speaking Canadians, who number 8.5 million, access to the world and development possibilities in a wide range of countries located in all parts of the world.

I would like to wish all francophones and francophiles in Canada a happy Journée internationale de la Francophonie.

JOURNÉE INTERNATIONALE DE LA FRANCOPHONIE

Mr. Jean H. Leroux (Shefford, BQ): Mr. Speaker, today, francophones the world over celebrate the Journée internationale de la Francophonie. On this day, we must reflect on the future of the Francophonie in light of the social and cultural changes shaping our societies.

Despite the fact that parliamentarians observe this day each year, Bloc Quebecois members deplore the omission of any mention of the Francophonie's flag in the Minister of Canadian Heritage's document entitled: "Canadian Flag, Flag Etiquette in Canada". However it does describe the flags of three important international organizations, the United Nations, NATO and the Commonwealth, of which Canada is a member.

The Francophonie, must we remind the Minister of Canadian Heritage, is celebrated in all countries of the world, starting with Canada.

We send our best wishes to francophones the world over.

CANADA WINTER GAMES

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate four young people from my riding and home town of Camrose, Alberta, on their outstanding performances at the Canada Winter Games recently held in Grand Prairie, Alberta.

All are members of the Camrose Composite High School ski club. They competed in the biathlon, the same sport in which Canada won a gold medal at the 1994 Winter Olympics.

Seventeen–year old Kristine Saugen won three gold medals. Amy Ford, 18 years old, won a gold, silver and bronze medal, while 18–year old Erin Phillips placed fourth in the 10–kilometre individual race and received a gold and silver medal. Finally 19–year old Carlos Settle won a bronze medal in the 15–kilometre individual race while placing fourth in the 10–kilometre sprint.

Congratulations to Kristine, Amy, Erin and Carlos. They are all true champions and fine athletes.
